Tho' the conſtable had, already, occaſioned much miſchief to France, by perſecuting the duke of Burgundy, and compelling him, as it were, to throw himſelf into the arms of the king of England, he did not judge it ſufficient, to ſecure his quiet; for Iſabella of Bavaria, wife to Charles VI, ſeemed ſo diſpleaſed to be ruled by a ſubject, that he was apprehenſive, ſhe would, at laſt, find means, to deprive him of his authority. This was not impoſſible; for, the king being of an eaſy temper, it would have been eaſy to gain him, in one of his intervals; nor was it impracticable to perſuade the dauphin, to rid himſelf of ſuch a troubleſome governor. Thus, the conſtable's deſtiny hanging by ſo ſlender a thread, whilſt he had ſuch an enemy, at court, he believed, that, to ſecure himſelf, it was abſolutely neceſſary to remove her; and the queen afforded him a ſufficient handle, by her behaviour, which was not altogether conformable to the rules of decency. The conſtable, taking this advantage, infus'd into the king and dauphin ſuch ſtrong ſuſpicions of her, that ſhe was ſent away to Tours, where ſhe remained, as a priſoner, not knowing on whom to rely, to free herſelf out of captivity. This fatal policy was a freſh ſource of calamities to France; for the injured mother could never forgive her ſon the affront ſhe had received; and, unfortunately for the kingdom, it was but too much 1417. much in her power to ſatiate her revenge. The conſtable's violent proceedings, the death of the two dauphins laid to his charge, the queen's baniſhment, with numberleſs other occaſions, furniſhed the duke of Burgundy with a pretence to make a diverſion, in favour of the king of England; and he publiſhed a manifeſto, againſt the conſtable, aggravating his faults and oppreſſions, with all the reſentment of an injured enemy. Then he wrote to the king, that, as firſt peer of France, it was his duty to endeavour to prevent the utter ruin of the kingdom; and, by the ſame reaſon, he attempted to ſtir up the cities of France, and gain them to his intereſt. In fine, finding that ſome of the towns had already declared for him, he approached Paris, at the head of an army, when the king of England was in readineſs to embarque for France; deſigning to lay the dauphin and conſtable under a neceſſity, either of quitting Paris, to oppoſe the king of England, or of ſuffering the Engliſh to act, without oppoſition, if they intended to ſave Paris; but they took the latter courſe, chuſing rather, that part of the kingdom ſhould fall into the hands of the Engliſh, than to be diſpoſſeſſed of the government, by their private enemies.

Henry lands at Tonque.

Henry, deſirous of improving ſuch a favourable juncture, ſailed, about the end of July, and landed, at Tonque, in Normandy; and his army conſiſted only of 25500 effective men, too inconſiderable a number, for the conqueſt of France, had he not been aſſured of meeting little oppoſition. Upon his arrival, he laid ſiege to the caſtle of Tonque, and became maſter of it, the 9th of Auguſt; and, after the conqueſt of ſome other ſmall places, he beſieged Caen, which ſurrendered, the 9th of September.

The perplexity of the court of France.

The court of France was, then, in extreme perplexity; for the duke of Burgundy, at the gates of Paris, prevented their regulating the affairs of the kingdom. They ſhould have had two armies, in the field; one to oppoſe the Burgundians, and another to defend Normandy, againſt the Engliſh; but they had ſcarce troops ſufficient to defend Paris, where the king, dauphin, and conſtable were ſhut up; and their only refuge was, to renew the negotiations with Henry. With this view, they demanded a conference, between the ambaſſadors of the two crowns, to conſult about means to conclude a peace; and Henry conſented to the propoſal, but without diſcontinuing the war, being unwilling to loſe ſuch a precious opportunity. The court of France, chuſing the archbiſhop of Rheims, for firſt plenipotentiary, appointed, on his part, the earl of Warwick and ſome others, who were to meet with the French, at Bernonville, in Normandy; which congreſs, for what reaſon I know not, was deferred to the end of November; and, in the interim, Henry became maſter of Bayeux, Argentan, Chateau de l' Aigle, Alenſon, and ſome other places.

Whilſt the king purſued his conqueſts, the duke of Burgundy did him great ſervice, not only by the diverſion he made, about Paris, but principally by fomenting the troubles, in France, ſo as never more to be appeaſed. Queen Iſabella, baniſhed to Tours, had been, hitherto, an enemy to the duke of Burgundy; but, as ſhe had no other way, to be revenged on the dauphin and conſtable, ſhe diſpatched truſty meſſengers to acquaint him, that ſhe was ready to join with him againſt their common enemies. The duke, at once, accepted the offer, and privately concerted meaſures with her, to releaſe her from confinement; and then he ſuddenly departed from Corbeil, where he was encamped, with only a ſmall body of choſen horſemen. He was ſo expeditious, that, before his deſign could be known, he was at the abbey of Marmoutier, near Tours, where he found the queen, who came thither, under the pretence of devotion; and, not being ſuſpected of attempting to eſcape, he eaſily carried her off, and conducted her to Troye, in Champagne. When ſhe herſelf embarqued, ſhe aſſumed the title of regent, pretending that the king, her husband, was captive in the hands of the dauphin and earl of Armagnac.

1417. Iſabella joins with the duke of Burgundy.

Henry takes ſeveral places.

In the interim, Henry made ſeveral conqueſts, in Normandy, without any reſiſtance; for the conſtable choſe rather to ſee the ſtate periſh, than reſign his authority; and the duke of Burgundy favoured Henry, to the utmoſt of his power.

The congreſs of Bernonville. Act. Pub.

The interview, between the plenipotentiaries of the two crowns, was held, at Bernonville, on the 28th of November; and, as Henry was jealous, that the court of France ſought only to make him loſe time, he determined to defeat that expectation; and the conference was no ſooner opened, than his ambaſſadors ſet forth his pretenſions, aſſuring, withal, that there would be no abatement. The ſubſtance of his offers was, That he would marry the princeſs Catharine; that Charles ſhould enjoy the crown, for his life, but, after his deceaſe, it ſhould come to the king of England; and that, during Charles's life, Henry ſhould be regent of France, becauſe of the king's infirmity. Moreover, he demanded ſuch ſecurities, as ſhould enſure the performance of all theſe articles; but, as the French ambaſſadors were not ſufficiently impowered to treat on theſe articles, and it was not Henry's intereſt vainly to prolong this negotiation, the congreſs, immediately, broke up. He was juſtly apprehenſive, that the court of France would have improved this occaſion, to raiſe a jealouſy in his allies, and particularly in the duke of Burgundy; and, in the mean while, intent on the ſiege of Falaiſe, he took the town, on the 20th of December; but the caſtle held out, till February.

A truce with Bretagne, &c. Act. Pub.

Some time before the congreſs of Bernonville, the duke of Bretagne came and made a truce with Henry, for a year, and another, in the name of the queen of Sicily, as guardian to Lewis, her ſon, for Anjou and Maine; and, thus, by degrees, Henry extremely weakened France, by depriving her of the aſſiſtance ſhe might have received from her vaſſals.

During the king's abſence, in France, Oldcaſtle,

1417. caſtle, of whom I have ſpoken, elſewhere, was ſeized and brought to London, to the great ſatisfaction of the clergy; who were reſolved to ſacrifice him, for a terror to all the reſt of the Lollards. Notwithſtanding his birth and merit, he was ſentenced to be hung up, by the middle, with a chain, and burnt alive; tho', by the way, his being burnt evidently proves, that he was condemned, for hereſy, rather than, for conſpiring againſt the king; but, however that be, his ſentence was executed, amidſt the curſes and imprecations of the prieſts and monks, who even laboured to prevent the people from praying for him. Thus, died Sir John Oldcaſtle, baron of Cobham, with an aſtoniſhing conſtancy, perfectly anſwerable to the firmneſs, with which he had, all along, maintained the doctrine of Wickliff, being the firſt nobleman, that ſuffered, on the account of religion; and, after the execution, the parliament enacted freſh ſtatutes, in order to the utter extirpation of the Lollards, the clergy inceſſantly requiring their blood, with all the eagerneſs imaginable.

The queen dowager is accuſed of a conſpiracy againſt the king.

Some writers affirm, that, this year, queen Joanna of Navarre, widow to Henry IV, and mother-in-law of the reigning king, was accuſed of conſpiring, with her confeſſor, againſt the king; and ſome add, that ſhe was condemned to a 10 years impriſonment, and that her confeſſor was killed, by the chaplin of the tower, in a diſpute, on that occaſion; but this is all that can be ſaid concerning this accuſation, which is very confuſedly related by the hiſtorians.

The pretended invaſion of the Scots is refuted.

As for the Scotch invaſion, placed by ſome, in this year, and, according to them, repulſed by the duke of Bedford, with 100,000 men, I dare venture to aſſert it is all a miſtake, ſince it is not mentioned, either in the publick records, or in the hiſtories of Scotland; for all we find, with reſpect to the Scots, is, that they threatened to invade England, in 1415, about the time of the king's firſt expedition into France.

1418. Henry takes ſeveral places in Normandy. Act. Pub.

As the ſituation of affairs, in France, was very advantageous to Henry, he did not fail to improve it; for the campaign, begun, in Auguſt, laſted all the winter, without the leaſt interruption. The caſtle of Falaiſe ſurrendering, on the 16th of February, Henry divided his army into ſeveral bodies, and gave the command to the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, his brothers, the duke of Exeter and the earl of Salisbury, with orders to attack ſeveral places, at once; being reſolved not to neglect ſo fair an opportunity. In the months of March and April, he became maſter of St. Lo, Carentan, St. Sauveur le Vicomte, and many other places, in Normandy; ſo that, of all the fortified towns, he only wanted Cherbourg and Roan, to compleat the reduction of that province. Evreux ſurrendered, in May; and, preſently after, he beſieged Cherbourg, which held out three months.

Martin V. tries to unite the two factions.

During the ſiege, the court of France ſuffered a new revolution not favourable to Henry; tho', at firſt, it ſeemed to procure him great advantages. The council of Conſtance, 1418. which had been opened, ever ſince 1414, having depoſed the three popes, who contended for the papacy, had choſen, on the 10th of November, 1417, cardinal Colonna, who aſſumed the name of Martin V. who, upon his aſcending the papal throne, ſent two legates into France, in order to appeaſe the troubles, and unite the two factions; and their ſollicitations were ſo powerful, that both the parties ſent their deputies to Montereau-Faut-Yonne, where it was agreed, that the dauphin and duke of Burgundy ſhould jointly govern the kingdom, during the king's infirmity. If this agreement had been executed, and the two parties ſincerely reconciled, probably, Henry's affairs would have received a remarkable prejudice; but the conſtable and the chancellor, his creature, could never bear to ſee the duke of Burgundy in the adminiſtration again; and, therefore, preferring their private intereſts to the good of the publick, they ſo managed, that the agreement remained ineffectual.

The Burgundians become maſters of Paris. T. Livius.

This proceeding rendered the conſtable odious to the publick, and ſtrengthened the Burgundian faction, in Paris; who, at length, May the 18th, at night, found means to introduce into Paris Liſle-Adam, governor of Pontoiſe, and a zealous adherent to the duke of Burgundy. He entered only with 800 horſe; but, at his arrival, the Burgundians, being under arms, made a terrible ſlaughter of the Armagnac's. Tanneguy du Chatel, governor of the Baſtile, being unable to remedy the diſorder, ran to the Louvre, and carried off the dauphin, in his ſhirt, to ſecure him in his fortreſs; but, next morning, the dauphin fled to Melun, not thinking himſelf ſafe, in the Baſtile; the king remained in the power of the Burgundians; and, the ſame day, the conſtable, being hid, in a maſon's houſe, was diſcovered, and thrown into priſon.

A freſh maſſacre at Paris.

However, this was only a prelude to a much greater commotion, in the ſame city, ſome days after; for, upon the news of what had paſſed, the exiles being returned to Paris, from all quarters, the maſſacre was renewed, June the 12th; the conſtable was taken out of priſon, murdered, and ignominiouſly dragged thro' the ſtreets; and the chancellor, ſeveral biſhops, and others, to the number of 2000, met with the ſame barbarous treatment. The maſſacre being over, the queen and the duke of Burgundy entered Paris, in triumph, on the 14th of July; and the plague, which afterwards broke out, in that city, and which, in three months, ſwept away above 40,000 perſons, added freſh calamities to thoſe above-mentioned. In the interim, the queen and duke, having the king in their power, iſſued out in his name, what orders they pleaſed; and on the other hand, the dauphin, aſſuming the title of regent, threatened all that ſhould obey the duke of Burgundy. Thus, which ſide ſoever the French eſpouſed, they could not avoid being called rebels, by one or other of the factions; and neutrality itſelf was accounted a crime.

An agreement between the two factions.

In the mean while, in ſpite of the animoſity of the two parties, the troubles appeared, for ſome time, to be about to expire; for, as there was not yet any cauſe of perſonal enmity, between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Bretagne had ſo managed, that each of theſe princes had conſented to an agreement. Every thing was ſettled; but ſome perſons, about the dauphin, perſuaded him not to ſign; which was attended with fatal conſequences. Thus, by means of the diſſenſion, between the two factions, each had two enemies to oppoſe, the contrary party and the Engliſh; but Henry, far from looking upon both parties, with the ſame eye, was an avowed enemy to the Armagnac's, whilſt he was only a pretended enemy to the Burgundians.

A truce in Guienne, between Henry and the Gaſcoign rebels. Act. Pub.

Henry, now, began to reap ſome benefit from the late revolution, in the court of France; for the new earl of Armagnac, the lord d' Albret, and the other Gaſcoign lords of that party, who were waging, in Guienne, fierce war with the Engliſh, concluded a truce with him; for, conſidering that, ſince the conſtable's death, the government of France was in the duke of Burgundy's hands, they believed it repugnant to their intereſt, to continue a war, which could only prove advantageous to their enemy; and, by this truce, inſtead of being obliged to ſend ſuccours into Guienne, Henry drew from thence ſome troops, with which he reinforced his army, in Normandy.

The ſiege of Roan.

Cherbourg having, at length, capitulated, after a three months ſiege, France had nothing left, in Normandy, except Roan, the loſs of which would deprive her of all hopes of recovering that province; and, therefore, without delay, Henry beſieged that city, about the latter end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September. According to Mezerai, the ſiege began, in June, which is a miſtake; but, however that be, it was extremely remarkable, for the vigorous defence of the beſieged, who held out, five months, and endured the greateſt miſeries, before they came to a capitulation. They applied to the duke of Burgundy, but to no purpoſe; for France, in changing her governor, had not acquired new ſtrength; and the duke of Burgundy, copying after the earl of Armagnac, was more careful to defeat the practices of his enemies, than oppoſe the progreſs of the king of England. Nevertheleſs, he put the pope's legates upon trying, whether, by a negotiation, he could interrupt the ſiege of Roan; and, this method not ſucceeding, he aſſembled all the forces in his power, feigning a deſign to give the Engliſh battle; nay, he carried the king, as far as Beauvais, but all this proved abortive. Perhaps, he was not very deſirous of obſtructing the king of England's progreſs; tho' it is uncertain, whether, after his being at the head of the government, he preſerved the ſame ſentiments for that monarch, as when baniſhed from court. It may, at leaſt, be affirmed, that it was not ſo much his intereſt to promote his affairs; yet he could not avoid ſhewing ſome regard for a prince, who had in his poſſeſſion a writing capable of ruining him, with all the French, of what party ſoever. On this account, ſince the revolution at the court of France, his conduct had been very ambiguous; for he ſeems to have been reſolved, to do neither good, nor hurt, to the king of England, till he ſhould be determined, by the events. 1418.

The dauphin offers to make an alliance with Henry.

The duke of Burgundy not relieving the beſieged, they had recourſe to the dauphin, who was as little able to raiſe the ſiege, by force; and the way of negotiation appeared, to him, more proper to produce that effect; tho' it is difficult to know, for certain, whether he really intended to make a peace and an alliance with Henry, or deſigned only to amuſe him. However that be, he ſent him word, that he deſired to treat with him, upon three articles: Firſt, about the means of reſtoring a peace to France; ſecondly, concerning the marriage already projected; and, laſtly, about a league between them both, againſt the duke of Burgundy. Henry did not reject theſe propoſals; for, perhaps, he did not much rely on the duke of Burgundy, or elſe had an intent to raiſe the jealouſy of the court of France, in order to procure more beneficial offers than had yet been propoſed. He appointed, for his ambaſſadors, at the congreſs with the dauphin, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the earls of Warwick and Salisbury, Philip Morgan, and ſome others; whoſe inſtructions, dated, at the camp before Roan, October the 26th, were, in ſubſtance, as follows:

The king's inſtructions to his ambaſſadors.

I. That they ſhould do all that was poſſible, to induce the dauphin's ambaſſadors to declare all their propoſals, and abſolutely reject all offers of the countries already in his poſſeſſion.

II. If the French ſhould propoſe, at length, to put all things upon the foot of the treaty of Bretigny, they were to demand, how the king ſhould be aſſured of the performance, ſince the dauphin was not authoriſed, for that purpoſe.

III. He judged, that they would, therefore, inſiſt only on a truce, in which caſe, he ordered his ambaſſadors to require, what dominions ſhould be given him, for making the ſame.

IV. He expreſly prohibited them to treat of his alliance with the dauphin, till the peace, or truce, was ſettled; tho' he did not leave them at liberty to conclude either; for he ordered notice to be ſent him, when matters ſhould be brought upon the point of concluſion.

V. As to the alliance with the dauphin, he ſaid, that prince's view was, probably, to procure his aſſiſtance againſt the duke of Burgundy; and, if ſo, he forbad them to agree, on an inconſiderable aid; but he enjoined them to offer forces ſufficient, to reſtore the kingdom of France to a ſtate of tranquillity.

VI. He, at the ſame time, expected, in conſideration of theſe forces, that the earldoms of Artois, Boulogne, and Flanders ſhould be given him; but, if this was refuſed, the ambaſſadors were to lower their demands to the earldom of Flanders only, provided the dauphin would aſſiſt in the conqueſt of it; and he offered, 1418. offered, on his part, to reſign to the dauphin whatever ſhould be conquered, elſewhere, upon the duke of Burgundy.

The king's view in treating with the dauphin.

Theſe inſtructions plainly ſhew, that Henry did not believe this congreſs would end in a peace, nor even intended to conclude with the dauphin, who had no power to deliver up, to the king, what had been taken from his predeceſſors, ſince the treaty of Bretigny; and it may, therefore, be preſumed, that he ſolely intended to excite the jealouſy of the duke of Burgundy, who, being maſter of the king's perſon, was alone able to make a ſolid peace. This likewiſe appears from the king's writing, the very day he ſigned theſe inſtructions, to the duke of Burgundy, that, if the negotiation for a peace was renewed, he would do his utmoſt, to render it ſucceſsful; and, upon this letter, Charles ſent him word, that he had nominated the biſhop of Arras and Beauvais, the firſt preſident of Morvilliers, and ſome others, for his plenipotentiaries. Thus, Henry entertained hopes, by treating with both parties, at once, he ſhould raiſe ſuch a jealouſy, as ſhould pave the way for a happy concluſion to his affairs.

The congreſs of Alenſon. Elmham.

The congreſs, between the king's and the dauphin's ambaſſadors, was held, at Alenſon, the 10th of November; and the Engliſh abſolutely refuſed to treat, concerning the alliance, before the terms of the peace were ſettled; but, at length, after evading all the captious offers made by the French, they obliged them to come to their laſt propoſals; viz. the towns and provinces contained in the treaty of Bretigny, on condition of homage to the crown of France. However, the Engliſh rejected theſe overtures, unleſs the ſovereignty of the provinces was added, purſuant to the tenor of the treaty of Bretigny; moreover, they demanded Normandy, ſtarted difficulties, about the dauphin's inability to perform theſe conditions, and required, how he deſigned to accompliſh them, ſuppoſing their maſter ſhould accept them. The French replied, that it was needleſs to talk of the manner of performance, ſince the offers themſelves did not pleaſe; upon which, they broke up the conference.

Another between the ambaſſadors of the two kings of no effect. Act. Pub.

Preſently after, another congreſs was held, at Pont de l'Arche, between the plenipotentiaries of the two kings; or rather the ambaſſadors of the two crowns met, to confer together, in the preſence of the pope's legates; but, in the firſt meeting, king Charles's ambaſſadors inſiſted, that the conference ſhould be managed in French, which the Engliſh refuſed. In a word, at the preſſing inſtance of the legates, Henry conſented, that there ſhould be two Protocols, one in French, and another in Latin, of which the latter only ſhould be accounted authentick; but, the French rejecting this expedient, the conference, about the peace, was not ſo much as opened. Probably, the duke of Burgundy did not ſeriouſly intend to enter into a negotiation, being ſtill undetermined, as to his courſe; or rather, he was then forming a deſign, which we ſhall ſee come to light, the following year.

1419. The dauphin wants to renew the treaty. Act. Pub.

However, this interview alarmed the dauphin, who, doubtleſs, was ignorant of what paſſed; for he was afraid of being prevented by the duke of Burgundy, evidently perceiving, that, if a peace was made between the two kings, it muſt tend to his prejudice. In this belief, he ſent to Henry, intreating him to appoint the place where the negotiation, begun at Alenſon, might be renewed; and Henry readily complied with his requeſt, as nothing could be more advantageous to him, than the mutual jealouſy of the factions; wherefore, it was agreed, that the ambaſſadors ſhould meet again, at Louviers, the beginning of February.

The taking of Roan.

During all theſe tranſactions, Henry had not diſcontinued, one moment, the ſiege of Roan, tho' his army ſuffered much, by the ſeverity of the ſeaſon; but the beſieged were in no better condition, being reduced to eat horſe-fleſh, and all kinds of animals; and, even this ſort of food failing them, they capitulated, on the 13th of January, to ſurrender, on the 19th, if they were not relieved, by that time. Henry continued to them all their privileges, for 300,000 crowns; and, by the ſurrender of Roan, all Normandy, a few caſtles excepted, became again ſubject to the kings of England, 215 years after it was taken from them by Philip Auguſtus, in the reign of John Lack-land; and, after the taking of Roan, Henry ſent part of his army into Picardy, under the duke of Exeter, who became maſter of Dieppe and Montrevil *.

The duke of Burgundy takes new meaſures.

Affairs were, then, at a criſis, which could not fail to produce ſome remarkable change; for, as the duke of Burgundy had ſought the king of England's alliance, only to diſpoſſeſs the dauphin and earl of Armagnac, he no longer wanted his protection, being maſter of Paris, and the king's perſon. On the contrary, on the account of his ſtation, it was his intereſt to oppoſe the progreſs of the Engliſh arms; but the dauphin was the duke's ſworn enemy, againſt whom it was chiefly neceſſary to be ſecured. Beſides that prince's natural right to govern the kingdom, during his father's illneſs, he was alſo as the head of a powerful party; and it was not impoſſible, that, either by the king's death, or ſome other way, he might recover the advantage he had loſt; in which caſe, the duke would rather have ſeen Henry in poſſeſſion of all France, than the dauphin triumphant. In the interim, whatever turn affairs ſhould take, he evidently foreſaw, that he ſhonld not be able to preſerve his authority, tho' Henry ſucceeded in his deſigns; and, indeed, it was unlikely that Henry would truſt him with the government, when he ſhould be maſter of France. Thus, ſtanding, as it were, between two precipices, he was, ſome time, in ſuſpence, being at a loſs, what to reſolve; which, probably, prevented his more effectual endeavours,

1419. vours, to relieve Roan; for he durſt not break with the king of England, leſt he ſhould ſtand in need of his farther aſſiſtance againſt the dauphin. However, he determined, at length, to do all that was poſſible, to be reconciled with his enemy, in order to break ſafely with the king of England; for, by a hearty reconciliation with the dauphin, he might hope to have ſome laſting ſhare in the government, and hold the ſecond rank; whereas he ſhould render himſelf odious to all true Frenchmen, if he ſhould openly abandon the intereſts of his native country. If he had privately relinquiſhed her, it was with remorſe; and he was excited to it by the ſole thirſt of revenge. However, the execution of the deſign, he had formed, was not without difficulties; for the dauphin had conceived an inveterate averſion to him, on all occaſions, fomented by the friends and adherents of the late duke of Orleans, who were continually about him, and carefully watching all opportunities, to revenge that prince's death. In ſpite of theſe obſtacles, the duke of Burgundy became, more and more, confirmed in his reſolution, perceiving no other way, to ſave himſelf and the kingdom; and he, therefore, undertook to accompliſh this reconciliation, by all ſorts of means, even to the forcing the dauphin to it, by the fear of ſeeing France otherwiſe loſt; in fine, if the dauphin's hatred and obſtinacy ſhould render it impracticable, he was determined to take the deſperate courſe of rendering Henry maſter of France.

The conference of Louviers. Act. Pub.

At the ſame time that the duke of Burgundy came to his final reſolution, the conference, between the ambaſſadors of Henry and the dauphin, was held, at Louviers; and the difficulties, that occurred, at the congreſs of Alenſon, rendered this alſo fruitleſs. It was only agreed, that the king and the dauphin ſhould meet and confer together; but this interview, the time of which was twice prolonged, did not take effect, becauſe the dauphin took other meaſures; yet, to continue the duke of Burgundy's jealouſy, Henry granted the dauphin a truce, from the 12th of February, till Eaſter, for all the country, between the Loire and the Seine, Normandy excepted.

The dauphin refuſes to be reconciled with the duke of Burgundy.

Purſuant to the duke of Burgundy's project, he ſent and ſued for the dauphin's friendſhip, offering, on his part, to deſerve and cultivate it, to the utmoſt of his power; intimating, at the ſame time, that it would be expedient to have a conference together, as well mutually to confirm their reconciliation, as to concert meaſures, for the welfare of the kingdom; but the dauphin ſcornfully rejected this propoſal, being too apprehenſive of ſharing the authority with the queen, his mother, and the duke of Burgundy, or rather of being himſelf ſubject to them. The ſole command of the province, that owned him, for regent, he imagined, was preferable to the advantage propoſed, from a reconciliation, which could not be made, without leaving the queen, his mother, and the duke, a ſhare in the adminiſtration; ſo that the duke of Burgundy was reduced to a neceſſity, of ſeriouſly endeavouring to make a peace with England, if the dauphin perſiſted in his obſtinacy. The congreſs, at Louviers, having alarmed him, he was afraid of being prevented, and that he ſhould not, afterwards, be in a condition to reſiſt the king of England and the dauphin, if they ſhould join in a league againſt him; wherefore, he reſolved to unravel affairs, ſome way, or other. With this view, he ſent Henry word, that king Charles was inclined to a peace; and, to ſucceed the more eaſily, he propoſed an interview, that the two kings, aſſiſted by their councils, might fix the terms, and conclude the intended marriage. Henry readily fell in with the propoſal, and even granted a three months truce; during which, the time, place, and manner of the conference might be ſettled. 1419.

Fruitleſs attempts to reconcile the dauphin with the duke of Burgundy.

All France was juſtly alarmed at this reſolution; for it was obvious, that the peace and marriage could not be made, in ſuch a juncture, without the kingdom's being delivered to the king of England. On this account, ſome lords, who had the intereſt of their country at heart, did all that was poſſible, to procure a peace, or, at leaſt, a truce between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy; and the dauphin would have conſented to a three years truce; but the duke would have it only for two months; intending to conclude a peace with England, if, by that time, he could not agree with the dauphin. The pains taken, to perſuade them to ſuch a neceſſary union, proving abortive, the project of the interview, between the two kings, was, at length, accompliſhed, after ſeveral prolongations, till the 30th of May; and it was agreed, that it ſhould be, near Meulant, in a field choſen for that purpoſe, where a magnificent pavilion was erected. As king Charles's infirmity hindered him from being preſent, in perſon, it was agreed, that his queen and the duke of Burgundy ſhould act, as his procurators; and that the duke of Bretagne ſhould be there. In the mean while, to avoid the heats, which might ariſe from the diſcuſſion of affairs, commiſſioners were nominated, on both ſides, to ſettle the particulars; and Henry was pleaſed to honour the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, with being the heads of this commiſſion. The court of France being, at Pontoiſe, Henry came to Mante, to be near the place of conference; and, from theſe two towns, the two courts repaired, every day, to the place appointed. The firſt day the queen of France brought the princeſs Catharine, her daughter, who charmed the king of England; and, the effect of this firſt ſight being very viſible, the queen believed, that ſhe ſhould inflame the deſires of that prince, by not ſuffering her daughter to appear any more; but Henry ſoon perceived, that the princeſs was to ſerve as a decoy, to enſnare him; and, to fruſtrate the queen's expectation, he aſſured the duke of Burgundy, that he would never quit his arms, till he had the king and the princeſs, his daughter, in his power, and had expelled him the kingdom, if he oppoſed it. At any other juncture, the duke, who was as high-ſpirited 1419.

1419. as Henry, would, doubtleſs, have returned him a ſharp reply; but, not to exaſperate too much a prince, whoſe aſſiſtance he might want, he only ſaid, that he did not doubt but he would have reaſon to be tired of the war.

The conference of Meulant ran upon three articles, required by Henry, as preliminaries to the peace and marriage.

Henry's demands. Act. Pub.

I. That he ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of whatever was granted to Edward III, by the treaty of Bretigny.

II. That, beſides, all Normandy ſhould be delivered to him.

III. The full and independent ſovereignty of whatever ſhould be reſigned to him, by the preſent treaty.

As Henry would not recede from theſe articles, the duke of Burgundy evidently perceived, that, by directly oppoſing them, he ſhould occaſion the breaking up of the conference, the only way left to bring the dauphin to a reconciliation; and, therefore, without diſputing, or granting, the king's pretenſions, he preſented to the king the counter demands of France; which were ſo drawn up, as to be liable to great objections, that he might either urge, or relinquiſh, according as he found what ſteps the dauphin would take. In a word, the duke of Burgundy's view was, to give the dauphin a little more time, before any thing was concluded with the king of England; and the demands of France, with the king's anſwers, were, as follows.

The demands of France. Act. Pub.

I. That the king of England renounce the crown of France.

'The king agrees to it, provided this clauſe be annexed, [except what is granted to him, by the preſent treaty.]

II. That he diſclaim Touraine, Anjou, Maine, and the ſovereignty of Bretagne.

'The king diſapproves of this article.'

Probably, by reaſon of the ſovereignty of Bretagne, which he claimed, as duke of Normandy.

III. The king of England ſhall ſwear, that neither he, nor his ſucceſſors, ſhall receive, at any time hereafter, on any account whatever, the ceſſion of the crown of France, from any perſon, who hath, or pretends to have, a right.

'The king conſents to this, provided his 'adverſary will ſwear the ſame, &c.'

IV. The king of England ſhall cauſe the renunciations, promiſes, and engagements to be recorded, as the king of France and his council ſhall judge moſt expedient.

'The king diſlikes this article.'

V. Inſtead of Ponthieu and Montrevil, the king of France ſhall have liberty to give an equivalent, in ſome other part of France, as he ſhall think proper.

'The king is diſpleaſed with this article.'

VI. As there are ſtill, in Normandy, ſeveral places unconquered by the king of England, which are to be given up, by the treaty, he ſhall, therefore, reſign all his other conqueſts, elſewhere. Every one ſhall be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of his eſtate, wherever it lies; and an alliance ſhall be concluded between the two kings.

'The king approves of this, on condition 'the Scots and the rebels be not included in 'the alliance.' 1419.

VII. The king of England ſhall repay the 600,000 crowns given to Richard II, in part of the 800,000 promiſed with queen Iſabella, and alſo 400,000, for that princeſs's jewels detained, in England.

'The king agrees, that this article ſhould 'be allowed out of the arrears due, for king 'John's ranſom; but he is ſurpriſed at the 'demand of 400,000 crowns, for queen Iſa-'bella's jewels, when they were not worth a 'quarter of that ſum.'

The duke of Burgundy's deſigns.

It plainly appears, from the nature of theſe demands, that the difficulties were too inconſiderable to prevent the concluſion of a peace, if both parties had been equally willing; but, on the other hand, they were ſufficient to keep the treaty depending, during the pleaſure of the court of France. In the duke of Burgundy's ſituation, he inſiſted on the articles, diſapproved by the king, no farther than was neceſſary; and he was extremely glad to find, that Henry believed the peace was about to be concluded, as, indeed, it would have been, were it not for the obſtinacy of the dauphin; for the king ſo little doubted it, that, on the 5th of July, that is, about a month after the opening of the congreſs, he gave full power to the archbiſhop of Canterbury to go to Paris, and conclude the peace, in his name, with king Charles.

The dauphin and the duke of Burgundy are reconciled.

However, whilſt Henry pleaſed himſelf with this expectation, the duke of Burgundy endeavoured to diſconcert all his meaſures; and, as he had made uſe of negotiations, now with the dauphin, then with the duke, in order to ſtir up the jealouſy of both, he was himſelf over-reached, in his own way. The congreſs of Meulant, where the duke of Burgundy's chief deſign was to frighten the dauphin, produced the deſired effect; for the young prince, alarmed to ſee ſo near a concluſion a peace ſo very diſadvantageous to France and himſelf, believed, that he ought not to refuſe, any longer, to be reconciled with the duke of Burgundy; which was the only means to prevent ſo great a misfortune; wherefore, after ſeveral private conferences, between ſome truſty friends of the two princes, a reconciliation, ſo eagerly deſired by all true Frenchmen, was, at length, effected. On the 11th of July, they met, about three miles from Meulant, in the road to Paris, and embraced each other; and then they ſigned a treaty, mutually engaging, 'to love one ano-'ther, like brothers, and jointly to oppoſe 'the damnable enterprize of the Engliſh, the 'antient enemies of the kingdom.

The duke of Burgundy breaks off the conference of Meulant.

This ſtep being taken, the duke of Burgundy no longer deſired the concluſion of the peace, but ſtrenuouſly inſiſted, in the conferences ſtill continued, at Meulant, on the demands of France; moreover, leſt Henry ſhould deſiſt from his objections, he added ſome freſh articles; and, in explaining the third demand of France, he clogged it with 1419. so many reſtrictions, that, in all future caſes, neither Henry, nor his ſucceſſors, kings of England, could ever claim, or acquire, any part of that kingdom; Henry, tho' he, was very willing to renounce his pretenſions to France, as deſcended from Edward III, thought it very unreaſonable to be obliged to extend this renounciation, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, to all caſes that might happen, and could not poſſibly be foreſeen; and he likewiſe complained, that the duke of Burgundy required things that could not be granted, without offending God, and violating his oaths. I cannot imagine, what this was; but, in fine, the duke attacked the king's demands, againſt which he had alledged nothing, before his reconciliation with the dauphin. He affirmed, that they were extravagant, obſcure, ambiguous, and unjuſt, without deſcending to particulars; and he expected, that Henry ſhould accept the offers of France, abſolutely and ſimply, without any explanation; yet, leſt he ſhould be taken at his word, he would not conſent, that the articles, already agreed on, ſhould be committed to writing.

Henry had, hitherto, believed, for what reaſon I know not, that the duke of Burgundy's reconciliation with the dauphin would be no obſtacle to the peace; for we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, on the 18th of July, ſeven days after their interview, Henry impowered the archbiſhop of Canterbury, to conclude his marriage with the princeſs Catharine. It might be conjectured, that he was ignorant, as yet, of what paſſed, on the 11th, between the dauphin and duke of Burgundy, if a letter, in the ſame Collection did not ſhew, that ſome of his courtiers had received intelligence of it, on the 14th. He was ſo prejudiced, on this occaſion, that, on the 19th, he appointed commiſſioners to prolong the truce; but the duke of Burgundy's new demands, or rather his cavils at the treaty, broke off the conferences, and all went and prepared for war.

Henry takes Pontoiſe.

On the 28th of July, Henry ordered a detachment, headed by the duke of Clarence, to ſtorm Pontoiſe, ; and this enterprize was crowned with the expected ſucceſs. L'Iſle-Adam, the governor, was unexpectedly ſurpriſed and forced to fly, with part of the garriſon; and as the court of France, who reſided, in this town, during the congreſs of Meulant, were gone, but a few days, the Engliſh ſoldiers found it ſtill full of the baggage of the courtiers; for the booty is ſaid to amount to above two millions of crowns.

The poſture of Henry's affairs.

The taking of Pontoiſe opened the king a paſſage to the very gates of Paris; yet the poſture of his affairs was not changed, for the better, ſince the union of the two factions, by which France was divided. Whilſt they were deſtroying one another, an army of 25000 men was ſufficient for the conqueſt of Normandy; for no enemy had appeared, to force him to raiſe his ſieges; and he had been, all along, publickly, or privately, favoured by one of the factions; but, now, he could ſcarce expect, with his own troops alone, to accompliſh his enterpriſe. He deſigned nothing leſs than the conqueſt of the whole kingdom, or, at leaſt, of what England had loſt, ſince the treaty of Bretigny; and yet, after a ſix years war, and in ſuch favourable junctures, he was maſter only of a ſingle province. Beſides, he was ſenſible, his obſtinate continuation of ſo hazardous a war was not univerſally approved by the Engliſh, and that it was openly ſaid, that the conqueſt of France would be the ruin of England. He had alſo juſt received a letter from Bayonne, of the 22d of July, informing him, that a powerful fleet was equipping, in Caſtile, for the dauphin's aſſiſtance; and, ſoon after, he had another from the mayor of the ſame town, acquainting him, that Arragon had declared for the dauphin; that the Caſtilians and Arragonians, having entered Bearn, were ravaging the country, about Bayonne, and ſeemed to have a deſign to beſiege the town; and that the Caſtilian fleet was ordered to ſail for Scotland, and tranſport from thence a body of troops into France, to ſerve under the dauphin. On the other hand, he could not doubt but the Flemings, who had refuſed to ſerve the duke of Burgundy, againſt France, would be ready to obey him, in defence of that kingdom; yet, in ſpite of theſe ſudden and accumulated difficulties, he perſiſted in his firſt reſolution. He had even the aſſurance, to offer king Charles, as a favour, that he would be ſatisfied with what he had demanded, at Meulant, provided Pontoiſe, which he had juſt taken, was confirmed to him; tho' it is undeniable, that he would have been greatly embarraſſed. When he undertook the war, he depended on the diſſenſions of the French; to which were owing the eaſy conqueſts he had, hitherto, made; but, now, he was obliged to undertake, with an inconſiderable army, the conqueſt of a kingdom, of which he yet poſſeſſed but a ſmall part; however, his good fortune, or rather the dauphin's animoſity againſt the duke of Burgundy, happily freed him from this embarraſſment.

The dauphin cauſes the duke of Burgundy to be aſſaſſinated.

At the conference between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, they agreed to meet again, on the bridge of Montereau-Faut-Yonne, the 18th of Auguſt, to conſider, how to proſecute the war againſt the Engliſh; but the duke with extreme reluctance went to the place appointed. He appeared to have a ſurmiſe of what was to happen; yet, as a too great diſtruſt might have diſconcerted his meaſures, he reſolved to perform his engagement. Without entering into the particulars, related in all the French hiſtories, I ſhall only ſay, that the dauphin cauſed the duke to be aſſaſſinated, on the very bridge choſen for their interview; I ſay, the dauphin, whatever pains ſome authors have taken to clear him. The deed was done, before his eyes, and at his feet, and he ſtill retained the murderers in his ſervice, who were the principal officers of his houſhold; and this would have ſufficiently proved his guilt, if none of the 1419. the hiſtorians had been ſo faithful, as freely to own, that he was the author of it.

The face of affairs is changed.

This accident ſuddenly changed the poſture of affairs. Probably, the duke of Burgundy, at the time of his death, was well-affected to France; but Philip, his ſon and ſucceſſor, being tranſported with the deſire of revenging his father's death, did not ſcruple to ruin the kingdom, to gratify his paſſion. The ſpeedieſt and moſt effectual means, to attain his ends, was to make a league with the king of England, and queen Iſabella, an inveterate enemy to the dauphin, her ſon; and all the reſt of the year was ſpent in ſecret negotiations, which ended, at laſt, in putting France into the hands of the Engliſh. In the interim, the new duke of Burgundy held the poſt enjoyed by the duke, his father; that is, being maſter of the king's perſon, he was conſidered, as regent, by thoſe who were not in obedience to the dauphin.

The Pariſians apply to Henry.

Since the taking of Pontoiſe, the court of France was removed, on account of the continual inroads of the Engliſh, to the very gates of Paris; and the Pariſians perceived, that they were in manifeſt danger. The duke of Burgundy, wholly engroſſed by revenge, did not provide for the defence of Paris; upon which, the inhabitants thought it their duty to try to prevent their ruin, by an agreement with Henry; and there were ſeveral negotiations, the reſult of which was a ſeparate truce for Paris, from the 20th to the 25th of November. This afforded but ſmall comfort to the Pariſians; yet, as the treaty, between the king and the duke of Burgundy, was going to be concluded, that they had no occaſion for a longer truce, ſince they were to be included in it; moreover, Henry did not intend to deprive himſelf of the advantage, which the neighbourhood of Pontoiſe gave him upon the Pariſians, if the treaty, he was negotiating with the duke of Burgundy, ſhould be broken, by ſome unforeſeen accident. After the duke of Burgundy's death, couriers and envoys continually paſſed, between the king and the new duke; and Henry did not refuſe to make the ſame alliance with him, as with the deceaſed; but, having been circumvented by the father, unwilling to run the hazard of being deceived by the ſon, before he joined with him againſt the dauphin, he reſolved to ſecure a peace with king Charles.

Henry claims the crown of France.

At the congreſs of Meulant, Henry had limited his pretenſions to the articles of the treaty of Bretigny, with the addition of Normandy; but, tho', after the conferences, he had made a ſhow of inſiſting on theſe terms, without relaxation, it may be preſumed, that, if the duke of Burgundy's murder had not very ſeaſonably happened, he would have conſiderably lowered his demands; at leaſt, the poſture of affairs would have left him no room, to hope to compel France ever to grant him ſo great advantages; but, now, being earneſtly courted by queen Iſabella, and the new duke of Burgundy, he did not doubt but it was in his power, to impoſe upon France what terms he pleaſed. He forgot, therefore, his offers, at Meulant, and reſumed his former pretenſions to the crown of France, with the condition that Charles VI. ſhould be king, during his life; and theſe are the articles he propoſed, as a foundation for peace. 1419.

Preliminary articles of the peace. Act. Pub.

I. That he ſhould marry the princeſs Catharine, without any charge to her relations, or the kingdom.

II. That he would not interrupt king Charles in the enjoyment of the crown, or poſſeſſion of the revenues of the kingdom, during his life; and that his queen Iſabella ſhould alſo enjoy, during her life, the rights annexed to her dignity.

III. That, upon the death of king Charles, the crown of France ſhould deſcend to the king of England and his heirs, for ever.

IV. That, becauſe of king Charles's infirmity, which rendered him incapable of governing, the king of England ſhould act, as regent, during the life of the king, his father-in-law.

V. That the princes, nobles, corporations, burgeſſes, &c. ſhould ſwear to the king of England, as regent, and oblige themſelves, by the ſame oath, to own him, for ſovereign, upon the deceaſe of king Charles.

VI. That, for ſecurity of the performance of theſe articles, the king of France ſhould give the king of England his letters patent, under his great ſeal; and that he ſhould cauſe the like letters of approbation to be given him by the queen, the duke of Burgundy, the nobles, &c. in clear and expreſs terms, as ſhould be agreed on by the parties.

VII. That the king of England would give, and cauſe to be given, the like letters.

Henry's pretenſions being, thus, ſettled, in theſe few fundamental articles, the duke of Burgundy ſigned letters patent, by which he approved of theſe articles, as good, beneficial, reaſonable, and conducive to the welfare of France and all Chriſtendom; then a general truce was publiſhed, from the 24th of December to the 1ſt of March; and, as ſoon as the affair, relating to the peace, was ended, the plenipotentiaries of the king and the duke of Burgundy ſigned a private treaty of alliance, containing the ſix following articles.

The treaty between Henry and the duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub.

I. That one of the king's brothers ſhould eſpouſe a ſiſter of the duke of Burgundy.

II. That the king and duke ſhould love and aſſiſt each other, like brothers.

III. That they ſhould jointly endeavour to puniſh the dauphin, and his accomplices in the late duke of Burgundy's murder.

IV. That, if the dauphin, or any of the murderers, were taken priſoners, they ſhould not be releaſed, without the duke of Burgundy's conſent.

V. That the king of England ſhould cauſe to be aſſigned to the duke, and his dutcheſs, daughter of king Charles, lands adjoining to his demeſnes in France, of the yearly value of 20,000 livres, to be held, in fee, of the crown; and that letters, under the great ſeal, ſhould 1419. ſhould be granted, for that purpoſe, which the king of England ſhould confirm, when in poſſeſſion of the regency *.

VI. That, if any perſon, hereafter, under the pretence of being married to a daughter of France, ſhould claim the like aſſignment of lands, the duke ſhould aſſiſt the king, to the utmoſt of his power, to prevent it.

1420. This treaty was ratified by the two princes, in the beginning of January, 1420.

Though the peace was not yet ſigned, it was conſidered as concluded, ſince the terms were ſettled; and Henry was ſo ſecure of it, that, January the 24th, that is, four months before the ſigning of the treaty, he promiſed, by his letters patent, to maintain the Pariſians in their privileges, when king of France.

In the interim, as it was neceſſary to draw the articles agreed on, in the moſt exact form, and to avoid all obſcure and ambiguous expreſſions, it required ſome time; which occaſioned the truce to be often prolonged; and, during that interval, Henry had ambaſſadors, at Troye, to draw up the treaty of peace, jointly with the duke of Burgundy. For the greater precaution, it was firſt digeſted, like preliminary articles, that every one might examine what was to be added, retrenched, or explained; and then Charles confirmed all the articles, by his letters patent, dated April the 9th. It is remarkable, that, by the XXI, Henry was to ſwear, that, on no occaſion whatever, during the life of king Charles, he would aſſume the title of king of France; and yet, in the Collection of the Publick acts, there is one of his ordinances, dated April 18, for coining new money, in Normandy, with an H on one ſide, and theſe words round it: "Sit "Nomen Domini Benedictum;" and on the other, "Henricus Francorum Rex †.

Henry takes the title of king of France on a new coin.

The preliminaries being approved, an interview between the two kings was agreed on, for ſwearing and ſigning the treaty, ſomewhere near Troye: But Henry, afterwards, conſented, thatit ſhould be in Troye itſelf. As king Charles was not fit to appear, in publick, the queen and the duke of Burgundy were impowered to ſwear the peace, in his name; and Henry, arriving at Troye ‡, May the 20th, found there the king of France, the queen, and the princeſs Catharine, to whom he preſented a ring of great value. On the morrow, the treaty was ſigned, and ſworn, with the uſual formalities; and, the ſame day, Henry was betrothed to the princeſs; but the marriage was not conſummated, till the 2d of June. The ſubſtance of this famous treaty was, as follows:

Henry comes to Troye, ſigns the treaty, and betroths Catharine.

The TREATY of TROYE.

The treaty of Troye.

'I. THE king of England, now, ſon †† to the king of France, by his marriage with the princeſs Catharine, ſhall honour the king and queen of France, as his father and mother, &c. 1420.

'II. He ſhall not interrupt the king of France, during his life, in the quiet poſſeſſion of the royal dignity, and revenues of the crown; and queen Iſabella alſo, whilſt ſhe lives, ſhall enjoy the royal dignity, with the rents, revenues, honours, and prerogatives belonging to the queen of France.

'III. Queen Catharine ſhall have, for her dowry, in England, 40,000 crowns per annum, according to the uſual cuſtom of the queens of that nation.

'IV. This dowry ſhall be ſo ſettled upon her, that ſhe may enjoy it, from the day of the king her husband's deceaſe.

'V. If ſhe ſurvive Henry, there ſhall be paid to her, out of France, a yearly revenue of 20,000 livres, to be raiſed upon the lands belonging formerly to queen Blanche, wife to Philip.

'VI. After the death of king Charles, the crown of France, with all its rights and dominions, ſhall remain to the king of England and his heirs.

'VII. As the king of France is often rendered, by his infirmity, incapable of reigning, the king of England ſhall, from this day, be regent of the kingdom, and govern it, with juſtice and equity, with the advice of the princes, peers, barons, and nobles of the kingdom.

'VIII. The parliament of Paris ſhall be maintained, in their juriſdiction over the places ſubject to the king.

'IX. The king of England ſhall preſerve the privileges, rights, liberties, immunities, and cuſtoms of the peers, nobles, communities, and of all the king's ſubjects, in general.

'X. Juſtice ſhall be adminiſtered, according to the laws, cuſtoms, and uſages of the kingdom.

'XI. All the offices, both civil and military, ſhall be filled with perſons duly qualified, according to the laws of the realm.

'XII. The king of England ſhall do all that is poſſible, to reduce to the obedience of the king all the provinces, cities, and towns, which have joined the party, commonly called the dauphin's or Armagnac's.

'XIII. All the princes, peers, barons, nobles, ſtates, both ſpiritual and temporal, cities, communities, burghers, &c. ſhall ſwear, 1. Punctually to obſerve, what ſhall be enjoined by the two kings and the preſent queen. 2. To obey the king of England, as regent. 3. To own him, after the death of king Charles, for their lawful ſovereign, and to obey none but him. 4. Not to aſſiſt, with their advice or conſent, any conſpiracy againſt his perſon, and to diſcover to him all ſuch plots as ſhall come to their knowledge.

‘ XXXI. The king of England ſhall alſo ‘ give the ſame, for himſelf, the princes, his ‘ brothers, the reſt of the princes of the ‘ blood, and others, as the king of France ‘ ſhall require.

Given, at Troye, May the 21ſt, in the year of our lord, 1420, and of king Charles, the 40th.

The marriage being conſummated, June the 2d, the two courts ſet out together, next morning, for Sens, which was now inveſted; but, this place holding out, only 10 or 12 days, the army marched to Montereau, where the duke of Burgundy was murdered, and took the town, in a ſhort time; and the duke of Burgundy, finding there the body of his father, very indecently buried, in his doublet, ordered it to be removed to Dijon. Sens is taken. Act. Pub.

About the middle of July, the army beſieged Melun, which was defended by the lord de Barbazan, the governor, four months. The king of England, with his army, was lodged, on the ſide of the town, towards Gatinois; and the duke of Burgundy, with his troops, on the ſide next La Brie. This ſiege became famous, by the brave defence of the beſieged, who repulſed ſeveral aſſaults; but famine, at laſt, compelled them to capitulate,

* Henry probably inſerted this obſcure reſervation, with reſpect to Scotland. Rapin.

1420. about the middle of November. A French hiſtorian affirms, that the capitulation was not obſerved, by which the garriſon were to have their lives, without ranſom, except ſuch as were concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy; whereas, inſtead of being permitted to depart, they were impriſoned, at Paris, and ſtarved to death. To judge of the truth of this fact, it is neceſſary to ſee the articles of ſurrender, and to know, whether thoſe, carried to Paris, were not expreſly excepted; but it is more probable, they were really of this number, becauſe the ſame author ſays, that the king and the duke of Burgundy demanded 24 hoſtages, by name; and that theſe hoſtages were conveighed to Paris, with as many more as could be ſeized. This ſeems to ſhew, that the garriſon were releaſed, and none but private perſons ſeized, who might be ſuſpected, as well as the hoſtages, of being concerned in the duke of Burgundy's death; but, however that be, as Henry ought not to be excuſed, for a breach of faith, ſo neither ought too raſh credit be given to a ſingle hiſtorian, who appears, in other reſpects, extremely partial againſt Henry, and even does not refrain from abuſive language. After the ſurrender of Melun, the two courts returned to Paris; where the two kings made their entry together, on the firſt Sunday in Advent, and the queen's, the next day.

The ſtates of France confirm the peace of Troye. Act. Pub.

In the beginning of December, the ſtates-general met, at Paris; and king Charles, on the 6th, repreſented to them, that, of his own free will, he had made a peace with the king of England, being perſuaded it would be beneficial to France, and deſired them to confirm it, by their authority. The king's declaration, in his preſent condition, was not a ſufficient reaſon, to prevail on the ſtates to ratify a peace, which, in their judgment, violated the moſt ſacred rights of the kingdom, to ſet the crown on the head of a foreign prince; but, in their own circumſtances, it was hardly in their power to examine the conſequences, or freely to ſpeak their minds; and, therefore, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the peace of Troye ſhould be obſerved, and held as a publick law; and that all the French ſhould be obliged to take the oaths mentioned in the treaty. This is an improper place to examine Henry's pretenſions to the crown of France; they were the ſame that were formerly advanced by Edward III, which I have copiouſly related, in the Hiſtory of his reign; but, however, it may be ſaid, that, when the French ſwore to this peace, they thought it very unjuſt; and, conſequently, little ſtreſs could be laid on oaths, which they conſidered, as involuntary. Accordingly, they, afterwards, diſregarded them; and yet Henry, with all his policy, depended on theſe extorted promiſes, as if the French, then living, had been more ſcrupulous, than thoſe who had ſworn to the treaty of Bretigny.

On the 23d of the ſame month, king Charles's council being ſummoned, on that account, the duke of Burgundy, in a mourning habit, demanded juſtice againſt the murderers of the duke, his father; and Mezerai affirms, that the dauphin was ſolemnly called to the marble-table *, and, not appearing, was attainted and convicted of cauſing the duke of Burgundy to be killed; pronounced unworthy of all inheritance, particularly of the ſucceſſion to the crown; and baniſhed the realm, for ever. It is ſcarce credible, that ſuch a hiſtorian would advance ſuch a fact, without good authority; and yet this ſentence, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, mentions neither the ſucceſſion to the crown, nor the baniſhment of the dauphin; for the ſentence is general, againſt all the murderers of the duke of Burgundy, without naming the dauphin, or his accomplices, at leaſt, in the Purvieu. Indeed, in the preamble, notice is taken of the treaty, between the dauphin and duke of Burgundy; and it is afterwards ſaid, that the duke was killed by him; which words, By him, evidently relate to the dauphin, named a few lines before; and yet it is manifeſt, that the ſentence was ſo worded, that the dauphin was included only in the general notion of the murderers of the duke of Burgundy; and, conſequently, it was not natural to ſpeak of the ſucceſſion to the crown; ſo that, probably, Mezerai had more regard to the intent of the decree, than to the words themſelves.

1420. The ſentence upon the murderers of the duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub.

The dauphin appeals, to God and his ſword. Paradin.

The dauphin, finding that all ſorts of means were uſed to deprive him of the crown, appealed to God and his ſword, from whatever had been, hitherto, or ſhould be, for the future, tranſacted againſt him, in the name of the king, his father; and, ſtill aſſuming the title of regent, as ſuch, he removed the parliament and univerſity of Paris, to Poictiers, where ſome of the members of both theſe bodies repaired. Thus, were ſeen, at the ſame time, in France, two kings, two queens, two regents, all the officers of the crown double, ſeven or eight marſhals of France, on each ſide, two parliaments, and two univerſities of Paris.

1421. France is divided between two factions.

If Henry was declared regent, and heir of France, it was only by the Burgundian faction; for the dauphin had ſtill a powerful party, who, far from ſubmitting to the peace of Troye, maintained, that, tho' the king had been free, and in perfect health, he could not diſpoſe of the crown to Henry, much leſs, being diſtempered, and a captive. The provinces diſtant from Paris, not being overawed by the Engliſh arms, for the moſt part, adhered to the dauphin; and even the country, about the metropolis, was divided. In the ſame province, ſome places were for the Engliſh, and others for the lawful heir to the crown; ſo that, notwithſtanding the peace, the war was ſtill continued, ſince the two kings were under a neceſſity of expelling the dauphin out of all the towns and provinces he poſſeſſed; which was a difficult task, tho' the union of the Engliſh forces, with the Burgundian party, gave them a great ſuperiority.

Guienne,

1421. A pardon is granted to the Gaſcoign rebels.

Guienne, part of which was ſubject to Henry, was alſo a very conſiderable advantage, as it kept in awe the provinces beyond the Loire; tho', till the death of Armagnac, the conſtable, this province had rather been a charge, than a benefit to the Engliſh; for there was a conſtant occaſion for a ſtanding army, to defend it againſt the continual attempts of the party, that had declared for France, about the end of the reign of Edward III. The houſes of Armagnac and Albret, who were at the head of this party, had given Henry great uneaſineſs, eſpecially, after the earl of Armagnac was entruſted with the management of the publick affairs; but, upon the death of that lord, the heads of the party thought fit, as I ſaid, to make a truce with Henry, that they might not favour the duke of Burgundy, by their diverſion. After the treaty of Troye, they ſued for peace, believing that they could no longer reſiſt; and Henry, expecting great advantages from the quiet poſſeſſion of Guienne, readily received them into favour, and granted them letters of pardon, upon their renouncing, by a publick inſtrument, the appeal of their anceſtors to the court of the peers of France, in the time of Edward III. Some affirm, that, by the peace of Troye, Guienne was to be united to the crown of France, upon the deceaſe of Charles VI; but, in the treaty of Troye, there is not the leaſt mention of Guienne; and it manifeſtly appears, from what has been related, that Henry had no ſuch intention; for it is rather evident, that he founded on the treaty of Bretigny his preſerving, as king of England, the ſovereignty of Guienne, independent on the crown of France.

Henry returns to England.

Henry, having ſettled his affairs, in France, ſo glorioufly, for himſelf and his country, reſolved to return into England, where three things required his preſence: Firſt, his queen's coronation; ſecondly, the confirmation of the peace of Troye by the parliament, and the demand of a ſubſidy, to enable him vigorouſly to carry on the war againſt the dauphin; and, laſtly, the neceſſity of concerting ſome meaſures againſt the Scots, who had ſent ſuccours to his enemy, under the earl of Buchan, the regent's ſon. Upon leaving France, Henry gave the command of his troops to the duke of Clarence, his brother; and then he embarqued, with his queen, and ſafely arrived, in England, about the end of February. A few days after, the queen was crowned; and a parliament was ſummoned to meet, at Leiceſter, the 2d of May.

Whilſt the people were employed, in chuſing their repreſentatives, the king took a progreſs into ſeveral counties, and continued ſome weeks, at York; deſigning, under the pretence of ſhowing the queen the country, to procure, by his preſence, elections of members attached to his intereſt,; for he was ſenſible of the nation's diſcontent, at being obliged to bear the expences of the conqueſt of France. According to ſome, Henry, during this progreſs, iſſued out a proclamation, prohibiting the admiſſion of eccleſiaſticks into benefices, by the pope's proviſions, contrary to the rights of the patrons; but it is more probable, that this proclamation was not publiſhed, till after the parliament of Leiceſter, purſuant to an act made for that purpoſe. However that be, it was a mortal blow to the court of Rome, to whom the clauſe of Non-obſtante, ſo frequently uſed by the popes, became fruitleſs, at leaſt, with reſpect to the collation of benefices. 1421.

The duke of Clarence is ſlain.

Before the meeting of the parliament, the king received the melancholy news, that the duke of Clarence, his brother, was ſlain, April the 3d, in a battle in Anjou. The duke had led 10,000 men into that province, to reduce it in ſubjection to Henry; but, whilſt he was engaged in this expedition, he heard, that the earl of Buchan, with 7000 Scots, had entered the province, and was encamped, at Bauge; and he had, at the ſame time, falſe intelligence, that the vanguard of the Scotch army was ſo far from the main body, that it would be eaſy to rout them, provided they were ſpeedily attacked. Upon this information, he haſtily headed his horſe, leaving the earl of Salisbury orders to follow him, with the reſt of the army; and, when he came to Bauge, he found, indeed, ſome Scotch troops intrenched in the church-yard. He charged them, immediately, and diſmounted, in order to head his troops; but ſo much time was ſpent, in forcing the Scots from this poſt, that the earl of Buchan had leiſure to come to their relief. Then the duke, remounting his horſe, furiouſly attacked the new-comers, notwithſtanding the inequality of his forces; and he gave proofs of an uncommon valour; but, at length, being overpowered by numbers, and unable to bear the thoughts of retreating, he was wounded, in the face, by a Scotch knight *, and killed by the earl of Buchan himſelf. His death occaſioned an entire defeat of the Engliſh horſe, of which 1500 were ſlain, and many taken priſoners; and, among the former, were the earl of Kent, the lords Grey and Roſs, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction; but the earl of Salisbury, tho' he was unable to advance, in time, to aſſiſt the duke of Clarence, had the ſatisfaction to recover from the enemy the body of the prince, which he ſent to the king, his brother.

The advantage, gained by the Scots, rendered the king's preſence neceſſary, in France; yet he had no leſs urgent affairs, in England. The parliament meeting, the 2d of May, readily ratified the peace of Troye ſo glorious to England; and they granted a ſubſidy, for proſecuting the war againſt the dauphin; but, at the ſame time, they preſented to him a petition, in which he was told, that it was but too true, that the conqueſt of France proved the ruin of England. To obtain this aid, the king had laid before the parliament a ſtate of the revenues and expences of the crown; and

The parliament's petition could not but be extremely diſagreeable to the king; for, as one half of France was ſtill unconquered, and the provinces ſubject to the king were ſo exhauſted, that there was no proſpect of drawing, from thence, the neceſſary ſupplies, for carrying on the war, the burden was ſtill to fall upon England; but the parliament grew weary of furniſhing money, at a juncture when it was more neceſſary, than ever, on account of the diverſion, with which the Scots threatened the kingdom.

The affairs of Scotland, with reſpect to England, ſince the beginning of this reign. Buchanan.

I have deferred, till now, to ſpeak of the affairs of Scotland, becauſe, ſince the acceſſion of Henry V. to the throne of England, nothing had paſſed, in Scotland, worthy to interrupt the thread of the Hiſtory; but, at preſent, it will be requiſite briefly to mention them, to give light to the ſequel. We have ſeen, in the late reign, that, in 1406, James Stuart, then prince of Scotland, was detained, in England, and, ſoon after, became king of Scotland, by the death of his father; but this new dignity was ſo far from redounding to his advantage, that it rather cauſed him to be more ſtrictly guarded. The duke of Albany, his uncle, having aſſumed the regency, was too well pleaſed with it, to endeavour effectually to procure his liberty; for, tho' he, every year, ſent ambaſſadors into England, under colour of ſolliciting the releaſe of the king, his nephew, it was the fartheſt from his thoughts. The principal motive of theſe frequent ambaſſies was, to negotiate the exchange of the earl of Fife, his ſon, for young Piercy, ſon to the earl of Northumberland; the former of whom had been priſoner, in England, ever ſince the battle of Halidon; and the latter was ſeized, in Scotland, by way of repriſal for the king. This exchange was effected; and yet the ambaſſies were no leſs frequent, ever under the pretence of treating about the young king's freedom; but, in reality, to influence the king of England, to detain him in priſon. Buchanan affirms, it was on condition the regent would engage not to moleſt Henry, by diverſions in favour of France; otherwiſe the Scots would never have ſo peaceably ſeen France attacked by the Engliſh. In the interim, as, to induce the Scots to remain quiet, contrary to their intereſt, it was neceſſary to give them ſome ſeeming ſatisfaction, the regent publickly and preſſingly demanded the liberty of the king, his nephew; but Henry knew, that he ſhould diſoblige him, in granting his demand; and the difficulties, he raiſed in this affair, were a certain means, to prevent diverſions from the Scots.

Act. Pub. In 1415, whilſt Henry was preparing to paſs into France, he received intelligence from the northern frontiers, that the Scots were reſolved to beſiege Berwick, with 60,000 men; upon which, the duke of Bedford had orders, to levy an army; but it does not appear, either that the Scots did, then, beſiege Berwick, or that the duke marched againſt them. The Engliſh hiſtorians relate, that the king, upon the foreſaid advice, called a council, to deliberate, whether it was adviſable to relinquiſh the project againſt France, and heartily apply to the conqueſt of Scotland; and that it was reſolved, that the firſt deſign ſhould be purſued. This is poſſible; but, very probably, the king was then agreed with the duke of Albany; and the rumour of the invaſion, and the meeting of the council, in England, was only to induce the Scots to believe, that the regent acted, with ſincerity; and, indeed, we do not find, in the Hiſtory of Scotland, the leaſt ſigns of ſuch a conſiderable armament, in 1415, or of a reſolution to beſiege Berwick; moreover, that very year, a truce was concluded, between the two kingdoms, whilſt all Henry's forces were employed, in France. In a word, Buchanan affirms, that it cannot be ſaid, that, during the whole reign of Henry V, there was any war between England and Scotland, all the hoſtilities being only mere roberies; and he alledges, as a reaſon, that the duke of Albany took care not to diſoblige the king of England, leſt the king of Scotland ſhould be releaſed. However, Henry was apprehenſive, that it would not always be in the regent's power to keep the Scots quiet, who were ſo greatly concerned to prevent the ruin of France; and it was, doubtleſs, on this account, that, in 1416, he gave king James leave to paſs, ſome time, in his own kingdom, having taken ſecurity, for his return; for he hoped, that this journey would create, between the uncle and his nephew, ſuch diſſenſions, as would divert the Scots from all thoughts of aſſiſting France.

The affairs of Scotland continued, in the ſame poſture, till 1419, when the dauphin ſent thither the duke of Vendoſme, to deſire aſſiſtance; but, the ſtates being aſſembled, on this occaſion, the regent could not prevent the decreeing a levy of 7000 men, which were ſent into France, under the command of the earl of Buchan; and, the victory that general gained over the duke of Clarence, at Bauge, procured him the ſword of conſtable of France.

Henry was concerned, to ſee the Scots declare ſo openly for the dauphin; and, perceiving, either that the duke of Albany had not the ſame credit, as formerly, or, had altered his maxims, to diſconcert the meaſures of the dauphin's adherents, in Scotland, he judged it neceſſary to gain the king of Scotland to his intereſt, and make him his inſtrument; which was partly his deſign, in returning to England. Upon his arrival, he repreſented to that prince, that it was his own fault, if he was not releaſed, provided he would uſe his authority, to recall his ſubjects, who were in the ſervice of France, and join with him againſt the dauphin; and James, paſſionately longing for liberty, after 15 years captivity, very readily complied with Henry's deſires.

1421. deſires. A private agreement was, therefore, made, between theſe two princes, the articles whereof are unknown, except one, namely, that James ſhould accompany Henry into France, and ſtay with him, until the end of the war. Accordingly, James attended him into France; but, when he commanded the earl of Buchan to return into Scotland, the earl replied, he did not think himſelf obliged to obey him, whilſt he was in the power of others; for which reaſon, Henry, thenceforward, treated, as rebels, all the Scots that fell into his hands.

Henry, having finiſhed the affairs which called him into England, left his queen there, great with child; and, appointing the duke of Bedford, his brother, regent, in his abſence, he returned into France, where his preſence was neceſſary. He ſailed, the 10th of June, with a new-raiſed army, amounting, according to ſome, to 4000 men at arms, and 24000 archers; and, arriving at Calais, he ſent ſeveral detachments to take ſome caſtles, ſtill held by the dauphin, in Picardy. He likewiſe ordered a conſiderable body to march to the relief of the duke of Exeter, who was almoſt blocked up, in Paris; and then, marching himſelf, with the reſt of the army, he came to Bois de Vincennes, from whence he went and joined his father-in-law, at Paris.

A few days after, he heard, that the dauphin, was before Chartres, and began to batter the town; and deſiring nothing more earneſtly, than to decide the quarrel, by a battle, he, forthwith, aſſembled his troops, and marched directly to Chartres; but his forces were ſo ſuperior, that the dauphin did not think fit to expect him. Henry purſued him, with all poſſible expedition; but, perceiving he could not overtake him, he attacked Dreux, which ſurrendered, upon terms. It is ſaid, that, during this ſiege, a hermit boldly reproached him with the calamities, brought on France by his ambition, and threatened him with the judgments of God; and ſome add, that Henry's death, which fell out, the next year, was a proof of the hermit's inſpiration; but ſuch conſequences are not always juſt.

He returns to Paris.

After the ſiege of Dreux, the army being ſeized with the flux, Henry ſent his troops into ſummer-quarters, and refreſhed himſelf, at Paris; but he re-aſſembled them, in October, to beſiege Meaux, though the ſeaſon was not very fit for ſuch an undertaking. Mezerai and ſome others are miſtaken, in ſaying, that this ſiege was laid, before the king went to England; for it is evident, that it was not begun, till four months after his return *. The ſame hiſtorian adds, that this place held out, three months; but he ſhould have ſaid, ſeven, ſince the ſiege commenced, the 6th of October, 1421, and did not end, till the 2d of May, 1422. It is true, as the town was divided into two parts, viz. the town and the market-place †, the firſt was taken, by 1421. ſtorm, during the winter; but the market-place held out, till May.

Whilſt the king was employed in the ſiege of Meaux, he received the agreeable news of his queen's being ſafely delivered, at Windſor, of a prince, named Henry; the duke of Bedford and the biſhop of Wincheſter ſtood godfathers, and Jacquelina, counteſs of Hainault, godmother. This princeſs, who had united, under her dominion, Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Friſeland, was married, firſt, to 1422. John, duke of Touraine, ſecond ſon to the king of France; but, this prince dying, in 1416, ſhe eſpouſed John, duke of Brabant, couſin-german to the duke of Burgundy. She was ſoon tired of her ſecond husband, and, under the pretence of their being too nearly related, formed a deſign to have the marriage annulled; and, with this view, ſhe procured ſome knights to carry her away, and conveigh her into England, that ſhe might act more freely. This pretended rape was no ſecret to Henry, ſince we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a ſafe conduct for this princeſs; moreover, at her arrival in England, he aſſigned her a monthly penſion of 100 l. ſterling; for his intent was to marry her to the duke of Glouceſter, and, by that means, put him in poſſeſſion of four of the nobleſt provinces of the Low-Countries. The duke of Burgundy was extremely offended at the king's diſregard for the duke of Brabant, his couſin, in protecting Jaquelina, in his dominions; which affront, in his opinion, reflected upon himſelf. Beſides, it was his intereſt that Jaquelina ſhould not be divorced from the duke of Brabant; yet Henry, preferring the duke of Glouceſter's intereſt to that of the duke of Burgundy, ſeemed to overlook the occaſion of complaint given that prince.

The birth of prince Henry. Walſing.

Henry was extremely deſirous of advancing his two brothers, who were both princes of great merit, and with whom he was well pleaſed; for, in 1419, there was a ſecret negotiation, between him and Joan, queen of Naples, who, being preſſed by her enemies, promiſed to adopt the duke of Bedford, and declare him her ſole heir; and, this project failing, upon that queen's affairs taking a new turn, Henry would have obtained, for the duke of Bedford, the only daughter of Frederick, burgrave of Nuremberg, and, afterwards, a daughter of the duke of Lorrain. At the ſame time, he treated of a marriage, between the duke of Glouceſter and Blanche of Navarre, queen dowager of Sicily; and, in fine, an opportunity offering to procure, for this prince, Jacquelina, counteſs of Hainault, he readily embraced it, as this match could not but be beneficial to England; but, as her marriage with the duke of Brabant was firſt to be annulled, this affair could not be accompliſhed, before the king's death.

The king even excepted all the Engliſh, Iriſh, and Scots, and all that were concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy; alſo all thoſe that had any towns, or caſtles, in their power, till they were ſurrendered. In fine, he reſerved four officers of the garriſon, namely, Lewis du Guaſt, Dennis de Vaurus, the baſtard of Vaurus, and another, to be proſecuted, according to the juſtice of the laws; Du Guaſt was beheaded, but the other three ſuffered a more ignominious death; and the baſtard of Vaurus was hanged on a certain tree, from him named the Tree of Vaurus, becauſe he had hanged on it many Burgundians, to revenge the death of the earl of Armagnac. This was a rigorous capitulation; which gave the beſieged cauſe to repent of their obſtinacy, when, probably, they had no proſpect of being relieved.

Queen Catharine returns to France. Walſing. Act. Pub.

About this time, queen Catharine arrived from England, attended by the duke of Bedford, who left the regency to the duke of Glouceſter, his brother; and, the two courts joining, at Bois de Vincennes, went, ſoon after, to keep the Whitſun-holidays, at Paris. Henry lodged in the Louvre, and Charles in the palace of St. Pol, where he had but a ſmall court; whilſt that of the regent-king was numerous and ſplendid. On Whitſunday, they dined together, in publick, the two kings and queens, with crowns on their heads; but thoſe of the French, who had yet any remains of regard for their country, could not, without grief, behold the king of England, tho' paying an outward deference to the king, his father-in-law, ruling France, with an abſolute ſway; and their diſcontent was inflamed by a tax, impoſed by Henry, for coining a new ſort of money. The Pariſians loudly murmured, but in vain; for their condition was widely different from what it was, a few years before, when their adherence to one of the parties decided the fate of both.

Whilſt Henry was preparing to renew the campaign, interrupted by the queen's arrival, he heard, that the dauphin had taken La Charite, which opened him a paſſage over the Loire; and ſhortly after, news was brought, that he was beſieging Coſne on the ſame river, and the beſieged had capitulated to ſurrender, unleſs relieved by the duke of Burgundy, before the 18th of Auguſt. The duke's honour being engaged to relieve that place, he deſired the king to ſend him a re-inforcement; to which the king anſwered, that he would come himſelf, and, accordingly, began, immediately, to march, at the head of his army; but, whilſt he pleaſed himſelf with the hopes of a victory, that would render him maſter of all France, he was ſeized with a flux, that obliged him to ſtay, at Senlis; yet, leſt his illneſs ſhould prevent the relief of Coſne, he ordered the duke of Bedford, with the beſt part of his troops, to join the duke of Burgundy. The dauphin, hearing of their junction, being too weak to engage them, retired; and the dukes, upon this, marched towards Troye. In the interim, Henry, hoping that his diſtemper would wear off, took litter, with a view of heading the army; but, his illneſs ſtill increaſing, he returned to Vincennes.

The duke of Bedford, being informed, that the king was dangerouſly ill, directly came to him from Troye; and he found him at the point of death, but expecting his approaching diſſolution, with great firmneſs. Before he expired, he ſent for the dukes of Bedford and Exeter, the earl of Warwick, with ſeven or eight Engliſh lords; and, with his dying breath, he told them, "His reign had been ſhort, "but glorious; and, tho' his pretenſions to "France had occaſioned a great effuſion of "blood, it could not be charged upon him, "ſince nothing leſs than force could have "brought the French to a reaſonable peace. "For his part, the near view of his end did "not give him any concern; but he could not "help lamenting the fate of the prince, his "ſon, who, on account of his age, was incapable of compleating a work ſo happily "begun; wherefore, he conjured them, for "God's ſake, to remain ſtrictly united, for the "ſervice of the infant prince, who would "ſhortly be their king; to take care of his "education, and to give the queen all poſſible conſolation, who had ſo great occaſion "for it; adding, that his laſt advice to them "was, to cultivate diligently the duke of "Burgundy's friendſhip, and, by no means, to "releaſe the Azincourt-priſoners, till his ſon "was of age to aſſume the reins of the government; and that, if they thought fit to "conclude a peace, it ſhould not be without "ſecuring the ſovereignty of Normandy to the "crown of England. Finally, he ſaid, it was "his deſire, that the duke of Bedford ſhould be "regent of France, and the duke of Glouceſter "protector of England, during his ſon's minority."

His dying ſpeech. Monſtrelet. Le Fevre.

Having ſpoken theſe words, he asked the phyſicians, how long they thought he had to live; upon which, one of them anſwered, kneeling, with tears in his eyes, that, without a miracle, he could not live, above two hours. The king, not, in the leaſt, diſturbed, at this terrible ſentence, ſent for his confeſſor; and, having made his confeſſion, he ordered his chaplains to read the ſeven pentential pſalms. When they came to theſe words of the 51ſt, "Build thou the walls of Jeruſalem," interrupting them, he declared, upon the word of a dying prince, that, "after having ſettled "a ſolid peace, in France, he really deſigned "to wage war upon the Infidels, for the recovery of Jeruſalem out of their hands." The moment they had finiſhed their devotion, this renowned prince expired, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, in the 34th year of his age, after a triumphant reign of nine years, five months, and 11 days. His body was carried into England, and interred at Weſtminſter, among his anceſtors, with a funeral pomp ſuitable to the grandeur he enjoyed, whilſt alive, and to the eſteem conceived of him by his ſubjects; and his queen, to honour, in an extraordinary manner, the memory of ſuch an illuſtrious

The character of Henry V.

If, in this monarch's character, we follow implicitely the encomiums beſtowed on him by the Engliſh hiſtorians, we muſt imagine him the moſt accompliſhed prince that ever appeared in the world, before him; for they all, to a man, unanimouſly repreſent him, as a perfect hero. On the contrary, the French have been no leſs induſtrious, in ſhading his portraiture with certain ſtrokes that ſully the luſtre; ſo that, if we would form a juſt idea of him, we muſt conſider his actions, with their circumſtances, independently of the admiration of the one, or the envy of the other.

Firſt of all, with reſpect to the government of England, he ought not to be denied his due praiſe; for, avoiding the ſteps of Richard II, and even of his own father, he never incroached on the liberties and privileges of the people. His readineſs, on all occaſions, to give the royal aſſent to ſuch acts, as the parliament judged neceſſary, for the welfare of the kingdom, was an evident proof of his regard for the happineſs of his ſubjects; yet, in this very particular, he was guilty of exceſs, ſince, contrary to his own inclination, and the dictates of his reaſon, he conſented to the perſecution of the Lollards, out of pure condeſcenſion to the clergy. Indeed, it was next to impoſſible, that a prince, of his exquiſite penetration, ſhould not perceive the falſhood of the accuſations againſt them, in the beginning of his reign; and yet, rather than publickly retract, he ſtill feigned to believe it true, even when he pardoned ſome condemned perſons, who perſiſted in a denial of the pretended crime.

But it is not chiefly for his actions in England, that the hiſtorians have been ſo laviſh of their praiſes; his martial exploits are the principal ſubject of his panegyrick; and yet he was, perhaps, in no reſpect, leſs remarkable, notwithſtanding the glorious ſucceſs of his arms. The conqueſt of France, conſidered abſtractly from all its circumſtances, has ſomething grand and marvellous; but the deſcription of the affairs of that kingdom renders it, doubtleſs, leſs ſurpriſing. Lewis VIII, father of St. Lewis, ſubdued England, in a like juncture, and yet no one ever ſolely aſcribed that conqueſt to his wiſdom, or valour. Henry projected his enterprize, at a time when, by reaſon of their civil diſſenſions, the French were in no condition to oppoſe him; and the towns he took were defended, only by the beſieged themſelves, nor did any army ever appear to relieve them; however, ſome of theſe places held out, ſeveral months, and were ſurrendered, only by famine.

The battle of Azincourt is, then, the great, and almoſt ſole, warlike exploit; which can juſtly afford matter for panegyrick. In this famous action, he diſcovered an uncommon conduct, reſolution, and bravery; but this very battle, tho' ſo glorious in its ſucceſs, alſo gives occaſion to tax him with imprudence. It may be ſaid, that, if he proved victorious, it was, becauſe he had reduced himſelf to an abſolute neceſſity, of vanquiſhing, or dying; to which a general never expoſes himſelf, but he cauſes his conduct to be ſeverely cenſured. His reſolving to retire to Calais, without foreſeeing the difficulties of the march, or being ſecure of a paſſage over the Somme; and his wilfulneſs, in attempting to paſs that river, in order to force his way thro' an army, ſo ſuperior to his own, ſeem excuſable, only by the ſucceſs of the battle of Azincourt, which was a ſort of miracle. Had he been vanquiſhed, which would have been the natural conſequence, he could not poſſibly have avoided the charge of indiſcretion or raſhneſs; and the neceſſity he was reduced to, during his march, if we may give credit to the French hiſtorians, of offering to reſtore Harfleur, and repair the damages he had cauſed to France, ſhews, how much he himſelf was convinced of his error. This battle, therefore, was more glorious for him, becauſe of his perſonal valour, than with reſpect to his military capacity; and, indeed, no prince ever expoſed himſelf more in a battle, or gave more ſignal proofs of true valour, than Henry did, on that occaſion. 1422.

As for his other conqueſts in France, I cannot tell, whether his greateſt admirers have reaſon to wiſh, that he had met with greater oppoſition; for what might have happened, in ſuch a caſe, ſurpaſſes human knowledge. However, it muſt be confeſſed, that the victory of Azincourt prepoſſeſſes us in his favour; but what may be extolled in him, without danger of being deceived, is the excellency of his genius, and the ſolidity of his judgment. He underſtood, how to manage the grand undertaking he had formed, with ſurpriſing addreſs, wiſely improving all the revolutions, in France, to his own advantage; for few princes would have ſtopped, like him, after ſo ſignal a victory as that of Azincourt, and preferred a repoſe, which, tho', in appearance, leſs glorious than the continuation of the war, was, in reality, more beneficial to him. This policy, in my opinion, is one of the brighteſt paſſages of his life, and beſt proves the ſoundneſs of his judgment; tho' his negotiations with the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, at the ſame time, and his inſtructions to his ambaſſadors, are evident indications of his abilities, and ſhew, that it was extremely difficult to circumvent him.

It is not very ſtrange, that the fortunate ſucceſs of his undertakings ſhould gain him extraordinary praiſes from the Engliſh nation; eſpecially, ſince it cannot be denied, that his ſucceſs was no leſs owing to his prudent conduct, than to favourable junctures. In general, he compelled the French to own him, for regent and heir of the kingdom; and ſuch actions ſeldom fail of being applauded, beyond meaſure. Accordingly, hiſtorians have not only compared him to David, Alexander, and Cæſar, but have given him the preference; but, without going ſo far for compariſons, which, after all, ſeem not very juſt, he might, I think, with more reaſon, be put in parallel with Edward III, his great grand-father.

However,

1422. However, I ſhould hardly ſcruple to affirm, that Edward ought to have the precedence, becauſe he was concerned with all France, united againſt him; and the difficulties he encountered, in his conqueſts, were incomparably greater, and required an abler head to ſurmount them, than thoſe which oppoſed the progreſs of Henry V.

What I have, hitherto, ſaid of this prince properly relates only to his principal action, viz. his war with France. I ſhall, now, deſcribe his other qualifications; which, tho' not ſo glaring, no leſs merit admiration, than the glorious ſucceſſes, which have almoſt entirely engroſſed the attention of the publick; for it is certain, that he had all the endowments of body and mind requiſite to form a great man. His ſtature was tall and majeſtick, tho' ſomewhat too ſlender, and long-necked; his hair was black, and his eyes, of the ſame colour, were exceeding lively; and he was ſtrong and robuſt, expert in all bodily exerciſes, chaſte, temperate, at leaſt, after he aſcended the throne, inured to hardſhips, being patient of hunger and thirſt, heat and cold. In all this, he was a ſtanding example to his troops, of moderation and conſtancy; and he was a great lover of juſtice, following it himſelf, and cauſing it to be punctually obſerved. He was religious, without hypocriſy, and perſevered in piety, being conſtant in his private, as well as publick devotions; a great protector of the church and clergy; and, by theſe qualities, he gained the eſteem and affection of the eccleſiaſticks, who did not a little contribute to heighten the luſtre of his glory. He was prudent, in council, bold, in undertaking, and reſolute, in executing; and he gave continual proofs of his valour, through the whole courſe of his life; moreover, he revived military diſcipline, which was almoſt entirely neglected, in England, ſince the reign of Edward III. The Engliſh nation never ſhined with ſuch luſtre, as under this renowned prince; who was ſo fortunate, as to end his days, in the midſt of his proſperity, whereas Edward III. lived to ſee the fruits of all his labours deſtroyed.

Having related what is advanced by the Engliſh, to this prince's advantage, the faithfulneſs of an hiſtorian requires, that ſome failings, charged upon him by the French, and aggravated, perhaps, by malice and envy, ſhould not be paſſed over in ſilence. In the firſt place, they tax him with cruelty, founding this charge, not only upon the ſlaughter of the priſoners, at the battle of Azincourt, but alſo upon his putting to death ſeveral officers, after the taking of Caen, Melun, and Meaux. As for the priſoners of Azincourt, doubtleſs, the maxims of war, and the neceſſity of providing for his own ſafety, will juſtify his orders, on that account, if they were not too haſty; but, as to his treatment of the burghers and garriſons of the conquered places, perhaps, he might be, ſomewhat ſwayed by revenge, by reaſon of the time theſe brave men made him loſe; yet this is no more than a conjecture. That he was ſevere to ſome is certain; but his motives are unknown; for, to diſcuſs ſuch facts, more circumſtances are requiſite, than are come to our knowledge. However, thoſe of Meaux are known to have incurred the guilt of ſeveral murders, for which, queſtionleſs, they deſerved to be puniſhed. It was neither unjuſt, nor cruel, to hang the baſtard of Vaurus, on the ſame tree, on which he himſelf had hanged all the duke of Burgundy's adherents, that fell into his hands; and, as for the other three, executed, at the ſame time, I am ignorant of the reaſon; but it is to be preſumed, that they were not capriciouſly diſtinguiſhed from all the reſt of the garriſon, to be inſtances of the ſeverity of the conqueror. As to the Engliſh and Iriſh, who were in the ſervice of his enemies, their being excepted in the capitulation needs no apology; and it could be wiſhed, for Henry's reputation, that it was as eaſy to vindicate his refuſing to give quarter to the Scots, under the pretence, that they would not obey their king, who was actually his priſoner. 1422.

The French, likewiſe, accuſe this prince of exceſſive pride, inſomuch that he cauſed, as they aſſure us, the marſhal de L'Iſle Adam to be committed to the Baſtile, for daring to look in his face, when ſpeaking to him *. Indeed, if he had no other reaſon, this was a high ſtrain of haughtineſs and rigour; but is it to be denied, that a bare look, or geſture, may be ſometimes very offenſive? Poſſibly, the marſhal, as he ſpoke, uſed ſome aggravating circumſtance, or raſh expreſſion, that deſerved chaſtiſement; which has been induſtriouſly concealed, to render the king's action more black and odious.

Avarice is another failing, with which he is confidently reproached. It is pretended, that, after he was declared regent and heir of France, he was never liberal, either to any of the Burgundian party, in his ſervice, or to thoſe of the dauphin's, who voluntarily ſubmitted to him. I ſhall not undertake his vindication, in this particular, ſince it does not appear, that he was very bountiful to the Engliſh themſelves, who ſerved him, whether on account of his great expence, or, becauſe he was otherwiſe inclined; for, tho' he had many able officers, and excellent generals, we do not find, that he rewarded them, in proportion to their merit and ſervices. We muſt, however, except the earl of Dorſet, to whom he aſſigned a penſion of 1000 l. per annum, when he created him duke of Exeter; Faſtolf, to

To which he anſwered, with an air of confidence, "That he had it made, to wear in the boat that brought him down the Seine." Henry, from the manner of delivering this anſwer, was provoked to ſay, "You are too rude in your behaviour, Sir; how dare "you ſo boldly look on a king?" Sir, replied the marſhal, "In my country, if one man ſpeak to another, tho' "the greateſt on earth, with a downcaſt look, we think him conſcious of ſome baſeneſs or guilt. 1422. whom he gave a conſiderable eſtate, near Harfleur; the capital of Buch, of the houſe of Foix, who had the lordſhip of Longueville; and the earl of Salisbury, on whom he beſtowed the earldom of Perche; but, after all, perhaps, Henry's want of liberality was the effect of his prudence. I have obſerved, that the revenue of the crown amounted only to 56,000 l. and that he was forced to pawn his jewels, towards defraying the charges of the war. Was it proper to appear liberal, in ſuch circumſtances? Upon many occaſions, it were to be wiſhed, ſovereigns would moderate their bounties, which are but too often, at the expence of the poor people.

Laſtly, the French accuſe him of a boundleſs ambition. To know, whether their accuſation be well-grounded, it ſhould be examined, whether he was in the right to renew, or rather to continue, a war againſt France, occaſioned by her breach of the treaty of Bretigny, and begun by herſelf; but this inquiry is needleſs, after what has been ſaid, upon this ſubject, in the reign of Edward III. However it cannot be denied, that Henry was very ambitious; for, tho', at firſt, he only projected the reſtoration of the peace of Bretigny, when he perceived a poſſibility of aſcending the throne of France, his ambition prompted him to improve every opportunity, in order to obtain it. I have taken notice of his intent, to make one of his brothers king of Naples, and the other of Sicily; and of his uſing, certainly, not very honourable means, to procure the duke of Glouceſter four provinces of the Low-Countries. The Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that he deſigned to purchaſe the duchy of Luxemburgh of the emperor Sigiſmund, and to treat with him, about his pretended claim to Dauphine; and it farther appears, that he would have paid the ranſom of a lord of the houſe of Blois *, priſoner to the marqueſs of Baden, probably, to aſſert, one day, the pretenſions of that houſe to the duchy of Bretagne. 1422.

Henry, by Catharine of France, his queen, left only one ſon, of his own name, about eight or nine months old; but the queen, his widow, forgetting that ſhe had been wife to ſuch a renowned monarch, and was deſcended from the moſt illuſtrious family of Europe, eſpouſed, ſome time after, Owen Tudor, a Welch gentleman, by which ſhe gave great offence both to the Engliſh and French. It is pretended, that he was a deſcendant from the antient kings of Wales; but I do not know, whether this deſcent be ſufficiently proved †. Owen Tudor had, by the queen, three ſons, viz. Edmund, Jaſper, and Owen; the eldeſt of whom married Margaret, only daughter to John Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, grandſon to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, and Catharine Roet, his third wife; and he was father of Henry VII, who left the crown to his poſterity, as the ſequel will inform us. THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XII.

The Reign of HENRY VI. with a Diſſertation on the MAID of ORLEANS.

15. HENRY VI. ſirnamed of Windſor.

1422. HENRY VI.

HENRY V. ſeemed to have been taken out of the world, by a particular direction of Divine Providence, which ſometimes puts a ſtop to the beſt concerted undertakings, when on the point of being accompliſhed. The peace of Troye not being firmly ſettled, as yet, and the prince, his ſucceſſor, an infant only nine months old, all things ſeemed to concur, to deprive the Engliſh of the hopes of ſeeing France and England united, under a king of their nation; but, on the other hand, the noble qualities of the dukes of Bedford and Glouceſter encouraged the moſt timorous. How great ſoever their loſs might be, they did not think it irreparable, ſince the valour, experience, and wiſdom of theſe two princes enabled them to ſupport the new king's minority; wherefore, by proclaiming, young Henry king of England, and heir of France, they ſhewed, that they were reſolved to maintain what the king, his father, had ſo gloriouſly eſtabliſhed.

Henry VI. is proclaimed king of England and heir of France.

The duke of Glouceſter had governed the kingdom, by the title of guardian, ever ſince the duke of Bedford, his elder brother, attended the queen into France; but this dignity expired, the moment young Henry was proclaimed*. Indeed, the late king had ordered, on his death-bed, that, during his ſon's minority, the duke of Glouceſter ſhould be regent of England; but the parliament's confirmation was requiſite, before he could exerciſe that important office. For this, and ſome other no leſs urgent reaſons, the council ſpeedily ſummoned a parliament, for the 9th of November; and, till the two houſes ſhould ſettle the form of government, during the king's minority, the council, of which the duke of Glouceſter was preſident, iſſued out all neceſſary orders, for whatever would not admit of delay.

A parliament is called. Cotton.

A few days after, the council was informed of ſome motions, in Wales and the neighbouring counties, of dangerous conſequence. Very probably, as the earl of Marche had great intereſt in thoſe parts, ſome of his moſt zealous adherents intended to raiſe commotions, in order to try, at ſuch a juncture, to revive the earl's claim to the crown; it may, at leaſt, be preſumed, that theſe motions appeared to be of no ſmall importance, ſince, beſides the orders of the council to the ſheriffs, commiſſioners were appointed, to put them in execution.

The Welch begin to ſtir Act. Pub.

During the interval, between the calling and meeting of the parliament, died Charles VI, at Paris, the 21ſt of October, having ſurvived Henry V, his ſon-in-law, only 55 days; but this event entirely changed the poſture of affairs; for it was not doubted,

that

1422. that the dauphin would aſſume the title of king of France, and exert himſelf, to procure a crown which, he believed, fell to him, by the death of the king, his father. Whilſt Charles VI. was alive, many of his ſubjects judged it their duty to obey him, without inquiring, whether what he did was conformable to the laws, and advantageous to the ſtate, becauſe their oath to him was not conditional; but, after his deceaſe, they thought it no leſs incumbent upon them, to own the dauphin, his ſon, for ſovereign; for the treaty of Troye, which deprived that prince of his right, carried in it too viſible marks of ſeduction and violence, to be conſidered by true Frenchmen, as a fundamental and inviolable law, though many, that believed it very unjuſt, had been forced to approve it; ſo that the dauphin, who, in the latter years of the king, his father, might, in ſome meaſure, be accounted a rebel, was on better terms, when he could aſſume the title of ſovereign.

Henry VI. is proclaimed king of France, at Paris. J. Chartier.

Theſe conſiderations obliged the duke of Bedford; who continued in France, ſeriouſly to reflect on all the ill conſequences of this change, and to project means, to prevent them. Charles VI. had no ſooner cloſed his eyes, than he ordered Henry to be proclaimed king of France, and, purſuant to the will of the late king, aſſumed himſelf the title of regent; and then he broke the great ſeal, cauſing a new one to be made, with the arms of France and England, and the effigies of the young king holding a ſcepter, in each of his hands.

The French lords ſwear allegiance to Henry. Hall.

The ſucceſſion to the crown of France being ſettled, by the treaty of Troye, the regent was of opinion, that he might, without a new conſent of the ſtates, put the king, his nephew, in poſſeſſion of the kingdom; wherefore, contening himſelf with aſſembling, at Paris, all the great men of the Engliſh party, he made a ſpeech, exhorting them to acknowledge young Henry, for their ſovereign. He inſiſted on the peace of Troye, and their oath to maintain it; and he labour-ed to convince them, that it was for their own, as well as the kingdom's advantage, inviolably to obſerve it; upon which, all that were preſent ſwore fealty to Henry, and did homage to him, in the perſon of the regent, for the lands they held of the crown; and the ſame was, afterwards, required of thoſe that were abſent, and the towns in ſubjection to the Engliſh.

A deputation to Henry. Monſtrelet.

This ceremony being over, the regent, council of France, and city of Paris ſent deputies to London, of whom the biſhop of Terouenne was the principal, to congratulate the new king, upon his acceſſion to the crowns of both kingdoms; and they had likewiſe orders to go by the Low-Countries, and exhort the duke of Burgundy to remain firm to the alliance; for it was feared, the death of Henry V, and of Charles VI, might induce him to alter his meaſures.

The dauphin takes the title of king of France.

In the mean while, the dauphin, was no leſs intent upon his own affairs; who was at Eſpaly, a houſe belonging to the biſhop of Puy, when he heard of his father's death. He ſhed many tears, on that occaſion; whether nature rouſed herſelf, at the news, or he had really always preſerved an affection for a father, who was not to be blamed, for the injuries he had done him. The firſt day he appeared, in mourning; but, on the morrow, he put on ſcarlet, and was proclaimed king of France, with all the ſolemnity the circumſtances of his court would permit; and, after this, he went to Poictiers, were he had removed the parliament of Paris. He was crowned there, in the beginning of November; for the city of Rheims, where the coronation of the kings of France is uſually performed, was in the hands of the Engliſh. 1422.

The neceſſity of joining together the hiſtories of France and England.

Thus, Henry VI. and Charles VII. aſſumed, both at the ſame time, the title of king of France; and they diſputed the poſſeſſion of the throne, 30 years; on which account, the hiſtory of the preſent reign is ſo interwoven with that of France, that they cannot be ſeparated. The Engliſh were reſolved to preſerve, for young Henry, the crown of France, acquired by his father's labours, and of which they believed his anceſtors were unjuſtly deprived; whilſt, on the contrary, Charles intended to take poſſeſſion of the ſame crown, which, in his opinion, he held, not ſo much from the king, his father, ſeduced by ill counſels, as from a long train of anceſtors, who had enjoyed it before him. This important quarrel produced numberleſs events, of which we ſhall not be able to form diſtinct ideas, without an exact knowledge of the ſtate of the affairs of both kings, in the beginning of their reigns; and it is no leſs requiſite to know the perſons that managed the affairs, as well civil as military, of the two kingdoms. In a word, to perceive wherein conſiſted the advantages and diſadvantages of each king, during this tedious war, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to take a general review of the then ſtate of France, with reſpect to the aſſiſtance each might have, as well from the princes and vaſſals of the crown, as from foreigners,

The ſituation of the affairs of both kings.

Firſt, then, for the perſons of the two kings, Charles was 21 years old, and Henry but an infant; yet Henry, in this very thing, had the advantage, his affairs being managed by two uncles of great abilities, and by the wiſeſt council, then, in Europe. On the other hand, Charles, who never paſſed for an extraordinary genius, was, by reaſon of his age, more difficult to be ruled; for his paſſions often hindered him from following the beſt advice. He had, hitherto, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, neither by his valour, nor conduct; and, being more inclined to pleaſures than war, he appeared very unfit to reſtore the affairs of the French monarchy, which was upon the brink of deſtruction. The duke of Burgundy's murder, committed, in his preſence, and, doubtleſs, by his orders, had raiſed prejudices againſt him; nor had he been more ſcrupulous, with reſpect to the duke of Bretagne, his brother-in-law. This prince, whom the earls of Pontievre, by a notorious treachery, had carried away, by force, and long detained in priſon, found,

1422. after his releaſe, that the plot was contrived againſt him, with the dauphin's conſent; and, therefore, it might be ſaid, it was not Charles's fault, that the duke of Bretagne had not ſuffered the ſame fate with the duke of Burgundy. Theſe particulars made a deep wound in his reputation; whilſt nothing could be alledged, in his favour, except that he had not meanly ſtooped to his enemies; but it did not requre a great genius, to refuſe running into manifeſt deſtruction.

As to the forces of the two kings, Henry, beſides his poſſeſſions, in France, had England, on his ſide; whilſt France was ſo divided between them, that each had whole provinces under his obedience, and, in others, each had fortified towns and adherents. There was hardly a walled town, that had not a garriſon, for the one, or the other; which rendered them the ſeat of the war, above 30 years.

Charles was poſſeſſed of all Languedoc, from whence he had lately expelled the earl of Foix, whilſt Henry V. was employed in the ſiege of Melun; and he appointed, for governor, the earl of Clermont, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Bourbon; from which time, the earl of Foix had attempted to recover that province, to no purpoſe.

The dauphine was alſo entirely ſubject to Charles, with Berry, Auvergne, Touraine, part of Xaintonge, the city of Rochel, and Poictou; and he likewiſe conſidered, as countries dependent on him, Provence, Maine, and Anjou, for reaſons mentioned, hereafter.

Henry was in poſſeſſion of Normandy and Guienne, the moſt flouriſhing provinces of France; and Picardy, Champagne, La Brie, and the iſle of France belonged to him, except a few places, that ſtill held out for king Charles. In a word, he was maſter of Paris, the metropolis of the kingdom, which alone was equivalent to a large and rich province; and he could, moreover, rely on the two Burgundy's, Flanders, and Artois, belonging to the duke of Burgundy, his vaſſal and ally.

From what has been ſaid, it is obvious, that the war might be carried on, in all the provinces of France, Bretagne excepted, which, hitherto, had ſtood neuter; but Picardy, Champagne, La Brie, and the iſle of France were more particularly expoſed to the fury of the ſword; and that becauſe the Engliſh, before all things, would clear theſe provinces of king Charles's garriſons, to attak him afterwards, beyond the Loire, without being conſtrained to leave any thing behind them; and, for the ſame reaſon, it was Charles's intereſt to proſecute the war, in the ſame provinces, to prevent his enemies from extending their conqueſts into the ſouthern provinces, which were his laſt refuge.

Having ſeen the diſpoſition of the provinces, it will be neceſſary to examine that of the French princes, immediate vaſſals of the crown; and, firſt, of the duke of Bretagne.

The ſituation of the duke of Bretagne.

Ever ſince the beginning of the war, John V, duke of Bretagne, had remained neuter, with reſpect to a quarrel, that could not fail of drawing the war into his country, if he had been ſo imprudent as to declare for either of the kings; but, after the peace of Troye was ſigned and ſworn, he thought it no longer poſſible to continue, in a ſtate of neutrality. Charles VI. and Henry V. being united by the peace, as there was only one king of France, he could not help owning him, unleſs he would openly join with the dauphin; but ſuch a proceeding was, by no means, adviſable, ſince the dauphin was ſo low, that there was no proſpect of his ever retrieving his affairs. Upon theſe accounts, the duke no ſooner ſaw the two kings united, than he ſent Henry V. word, that he was reardy to ſign the peace of Troye, and do homage, for his duchy, to king Charles; but this negotiation, tho' begun, in 1420, could not be ended, before Henry's death. Probably, the duke of Bretagne prolonged it on purpoſe to ſee the event of the war, againſt the dauphin; but, however that be, Henry dying, before it was ended, the duke of Bretagne found himſelf in the ſame ſtate, as before the treaty of Troye, that is, at liberty to chuſe his ſide, or ſtand neuter, as the effect ſhould determine him; tho' there was one ſtrong reaſon, for his not eſpouſing the dauphin's cauſe, viz. the diſcovery of his being deeply concerned in the conſpiracy of the Pontievrians; yet, preferring the peace of his ſubjects to the gratification of his revenge, he declined to declare for England. 1422.

The ſtate of the earl of Richemont.

Arthur, earl of Richemont, brother to the duke of Bretagne, was taken priſoner, at Azincourt, in 1415, and conducted into England, where he remained, till 1420; and, in the interim, the duke, his brother, being ſeized by the Pontievrians, he deſired king Henry's leave, to go and endeavour to free him; which was granted him, provided that, on Michaelmas-day, 1422, he returned to London, and appeared before the king, or his ſucceſſor, the lord chancellor, or the mayor of London.

That, during the term of his enlargement, he ſhould not enter into an alliance with the dauphin, or any other perſon, againſt the king of England, or the duke of Burgundy; nor ſhould he attempt any thing, contrary to the treaty of Troye.

That Alan de Rohan, the duke of Bretagne's lieutenant, with the ſtates and barons of the country, ſhould promiſe the ſame, during the earl's abſence from England.

For the ſecurity of theſe conditions, the earl of Montfort was to be delivered to the king, who was to be reſtored, upon the earl of Richemont's return to London.

The earl, having ratified and ſwore all theſe articles, departed for Bretagne; but, Henry V. dying, a month before the expiration of his leave, inſtead of his returning into England, purſuant to his oath, he ſtill remained, at the duke his brother's court, who was releaſed from his impriſonment. Thus, at the time of Charles VI's death, he was actually priſoner to the Engliſh, tho' he was not in their power; and 1422. and he was alſo chargeable with breach of faith. Some have endeavoured to vindicate his conduct, by ſaying, that he only ſtood obliged to the perſon of Henry V, and, therefore, upon his deceaſe, was freed from his oath; but this pretended limitation of his engagement is deſtroyed by the foreſaid articles.

Beſides the duke of Bretagne's diſpoſition, with reſpect to the two rival kings, he was prompted to ſide with the Engliſh, by the earl of Richemont, his brother, who had a great influence over him; for Arthur not only, by this means, intended to free himſelf from his engagement, but had other views, which ſhall be mentioned, hereafter; ſo that it may be affirmed, that, tho' the duke of Bretagne ſtood neuter, or was deſirous of ſtill paſſing, for ſuch, he was on the point of declaring for England.

The ſtate of the duke of Burgundy.

As for the duke of Burgundy, it is unneceſſary to repeat, here, his reaſons to remain firm to the alliance of the Engliſh; for it will be ſufficient to ſay, that he did not believe the death of the duke, his father, fully revenged, whilſt Charles enjoyed any part of France.

Of the duke of Anjou, king of Sicily.

Lewis III, duke of Anjou, and king of Sicily, poſſeſſed, in France, of Provence, Anjou, and Maine, was entirely in the intereſt of king Charles, his brother-in-law; but he had been, ſome time, employed, at Naples, in ſecuring the inheritance of Joan II, queen of that country, who had adopted him for her ſon; and, in his abſence, Violante of Arragon, his mother, had the adminiſtration of affairs, who continued firmly attached to king Charles, her ſon-in-law.

Of the earl of Foix and his brothers. Oſhag. Hiſt. of Foix and Bearn.

The houſe of Foix made, then, a very great figure, in the kingdom*. Matthew of Caſtlebon, earl of Foix and ſovereign of Bearn, dying without iſſue, in 1399, Eliſabeth, his ſiſter, wife to Archembald de Graille, captal of Buch, in Guienne, took poſſeſſion of his dominions; but Charles VI. attempted to deprive the captal and his wife of this noble inheritance, tho' they found means to keep poſſeſſion. Archembald died, in 1413, leaving five ſons, all of diſtinguiſhed merit. John, the eldeſt, was earl of Foix and Bigorre, and ſovereign of Bearn; Gaſton, captal of Buch, adhered to Henry V, who made him knight of the Garter, and earl of Longueville, from whom deſcended the houſe of Candale; Archembald, lord of Noailles, the third ſon, was killed, on Montereau-bridge, with the duke of Burgundy; and Matthew, the fourth brother, married the heireſs of Cominge; but it will appear, hereafter, that a quarrel, between him and his wife, cauſed the country of Cominge to fall into the hands of Charles VII. Peter, the youngeſt, was, at firſt, a Franciſcan friar, then biſhop of Leſcar, and, at laſt, cardinal and legate a Latere, in France, under the pontificate of Martin V; 1422. who founded the college of Foix, at Thoulouſe.

Thus, we ſee, that the houſe of Foix was very conſiderable, as well for extent of dominion, in the ſouthern parts of France, as for the merit of the four brothers, of whom it conſiſted; and the neighbourhood of Guienne obliged the earls of Foix, to pay great regard to the kings of England, who were maſters of that dukedom. Foix, Bearn, and Bigorre could eaſily be invaded by ſuch potent neighbours, and with difficulty be aſſiſted by the kings of France; moreover, the captal of Buch and the earl of Cominge were vaſſals to the king of England; and an antient quarrel, between the houſe of Foix and the earls of Armagnac, was a farther motive, to induce them to continue under the protection of the Engliſh, and the duke of Burgundy, an avowed enemy of the Armagnac's. Theſe conſiderations prevailed on Henry V, upon his being regent of France, to give the government of Languedoc to the earl of Foix; and he made an agreement with the earl, to ſupply a conſiderable number of troops, to keep that province in obedience to Charles VI. He was, as has been ſaid, expelled by the dauphin, who placed the earl of Clermont, in his room; but, Henry V. dying, the earl of Foix renewed the agreement with his ſucceſſor, who made him governor again; tho' it was not in his power to diſpoſſeſs the earl of Clermont. Afterwards, the earl, finding that this agreement was diſregarded, went over to king Charles; but, in the beginning of this reign, he and his brother openly declared for the Engliſh.

Of Armagnac and Albret.

On the contrary, the houſes of Armagnac and Albret, very powerful in Guienne, declared for Charles VII, tho', a little before, they fell in with the times, and made their peace with Henry V.

Of the duke of Orleans and earl of Angouleſme.

The houſe of Orleans conſiſted of two princes, Charles, duke of Orleans, and John, earl of Angouleſme, his brother, both priſoners, in England; the firſt of whom had been there, ever ſince the battle of Azincourt, in 1415; and the ſecond was given, in hoſtage, to the duke of Clarence, in 1412, for ſecurity of the payment of the Engliſh troops, ſent by Henry IV, to aſſiſt the princes in league againſt the duke of Burgundy. Theſe two princes, being priſoners, were, as to their perſons, neither ſerviceable, nor hurtful, to either of the parties; but their fortified towns were at the diſpoſal of king Charles. Some affirm, that the duke of Orleans entered into a treaty with Henry V, by which, in conſideration of a great penſion paid, annually, for his expence, he obtained of that monarch a neutrality, for his city of Orleans and all his other places; but this pretended treaty is

* The earls of Foix, a part of Gaſcoigne, were in ſuch eſteem, in the court of France, that they took place of the earl of Vendoſme, tho' a prince of the blood, and lived in a ſtate equal to moſt kings, in Chriſtendom. Francis Phœbus, by eſpouſing the heireſs of Navarre, added that kingdom to Foix, in 1479; and Anthony of Bourbon, duke of Vendoſme, marrying Joan, heireſs of this houſe, became king of Navarre, earl of Foix, and ſovereign of Bearn, whoſe ſon, Henry II, king of Navarre, &c. aſcended the throne of France, in 1589, being grandfather to Lewis XIV, late king of France.

1422. a mere chimera, ſince the foundation of it, viz. the penſion, had never any exiſtence. The Collection of the Publick Acts of England abounds with papers, relating to the duke of Orleans; and yet there is not one that gives the leaſt hint of this penſion, much leſs of the pretended treaty. Beſides, it is very improbable, that Henry V. ſhould, in his proſperity, grant ſuch a neutrality, for places ſituated in the heart of a kingdom, he had undertaken to conquer.

Of the duke of Alenſon. John, duke of Alenſon, about 13 or 14 years of age, ſon to the duke of Alenſon, ſlain in the battle of Azincourt, began to give proofs of an extraordinary valour and conduct, for which he was conſidered, as a prince of great hopes; and he was firmly attached to king Charles, as well as Peter, his baſtard-brother, who was reputed one of the braveſt warriors, in the kingdom.

Of the earl of Eu. Charles d' Artois, earl of Eu, was priſoner, in England, ever ſince the battle of Azincourt; but, not being releaſed, till 1434, he made no figure, in France, in the beginning of the preſent reign.

Of the duke of Bourbon. John, duke of Bourbon, head of the illuſtrious houſe of Bourbon, which was divided into ſeveral branches, was priſoner, in England, ſince 1415; ſo that, tho' he was a prince of uncommon merit, he had no ſhare in the tranſactions of France; but the earl of Clermont, his eldeſt ſon, with all his father's towns, inviolably adhered to king Charles.

Of the earl of Vendoſme. Lewis, earl of Vendoſme, of the houſe of Bourbon, was alſo a priſoner, in England, ſince the battle of Azincourt; for, tho' he agreed with Henry V, for his ranſom, and had even paid a part of it, not being able to raiſe the reſt, he was ſtill in confinement. The French authors ſay, that, in 1423, he miraculouſly eſcaped out of captivity; in memory of which he inſtituted an annual proceſſion, at Vendoſme. I am ignorant of the manner of his eſcape; but the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that, in May, 1423, he was taken out of the tower of London, by the king's order, and delivered to Sir John Cornwall, who took him priſoner, at the battle of Azincourt; that, in July, he obtained leave to go into France, to provide the remainder of his ranſom; and, in all probability, he fully ſatisfied the king, ſince it does not appear, that he was re-demanded. I cannot, therefore, apprehend, wherein his eſcape could be miraculous, unleſs it was his abuſe of his paſs-port, in which caſe, the miracle could not be very great; but he might inſtitute a proceſſion, at Vendoſme, in memory of his 18 years captivity.

Having taken notice of the princes of the blood, it will be proper to mention the other lords and generals, in the ſervice of king Charles.

The earl of Buchan. The earl of Buchan, a Scotchman, ſon to the regent of Scotland, and firſt-couſin to king James I, was conſtable of France; a dignity conferred on him by the dauphin, after the battle of Bauge.

Other generals. Among the other generals, the moſt conſiderable were the marſhals de la Fayette and de Severac, Andrew de Laval, lord of Loheac, John d' Harcourt, earl of Aumarle, John de la Haye, lord of Cologne, Culant, afterwards high-admiral, Aymeri, viſcount of Narbonne, Pothon of Xantrailles, Stephen de la Hire, ſirnamed Vignoles, Graville, and ſome others of an inferior rank, or leſs remarkable; to whom may be added the baſtard of Orleans, natural brother to the duke of that name, tho', as yet, he did but begin to appear, becauſe he became very famous, in the preſent reign. 1422.

The ſtate of Charles's court. It will be farther neceſſary to ſay ſomething of the moſt eminent perſons, belonging to the court of the new king. I have, already, deſcribed the perſon and qualities of king Charles; and, as to Mary of Anjou, his queen, ſhe was a princeſs of tranſcendent beauty, but much more valuable, for her extraordinary merit; yet the king was continually drawn aſide by other amours, which poſſeſſed her place in his heart. However, ſhe bore his coldneſs, without the leaſt murmur, or reproach; ſtill hoping to gain his affection by her patience, moderation, and dutiful behaviour. If this conduct was incapable of inſpiring the king, with a tenderneſs for ſuch an accompliſhed ſpouſe, it commanded, at leaſt, his utmoſt eſteem, and conſtrained him to diſcover it, by conſulting her, generally, in his moſt important affairs. Mary, queen of France.

The queen of Sicily. Violante of Arragon, queen of Sicily, and mother to the queen, was, for the moſt part, at Charles's court, and in great credit, on the account of her merit and capacity.

Tannegui du Chatel. Tannegui du Chatel was the king's principal favourite; who firſt ſtruck the late duke of Burgundy, on Montereau-bridge. It was not doubted, that, as he was the firſt, in executing, ſo he had been the chief, in adviſing that deteſtable treachery; and yet all the French hiſtorians repreſent him, as a very honeſt man; but I cannot conceive, how that character can be reconciled with an action, which, whatever may be alledged, in its vindication, was wilful murder.

Louvet. Louvet, preſident of Provence, was the next, in the king's favour, who had the management of the finances; but as he was very covetous and ambitious, he commonly preferred his own, to his maſter's intereſts. He is ſaid to be one of the adviſers of the duke of Burgundy's murder; and the duke of Bretagne conſidered this miniſter, as well as d'Avaugour, another of Charles's courtiers, as the principal authors of the Pontievrian conſpiracy, becauſe they perſuaded the dauphin to approve it.

La Trimouille. La Trimouille, of a very antient family, was in great favour with the king, tho' not ſo much as Du Chatel and Louvet; and, being extremely ambitious, notwithſtanding his high birth, he regularly made his court to the favourites, to increaſe his credit.

De Giac and Beaulieu. De Giac and the Camus de Beau-lieu, creatures of Louvet, were conſiderable, at court, becauſe of the intereſt of their patron.

Theſe were the moſt eminent perſons, of Charles's court, which, uſually, was not very numerous; for moſt of the princes of the blood were priſoners, in England, and the other 1422. ther great men chose rather to follow the army, the king's circumstances not affording them any great prospect, at court.

The English lords.

I shall, now, consider the principal managers of the publick affairs of the English, both at court and in the army.

John, duke of Bedford, regent of France, was the most accomplished prince, at that time, in Europe; and, being wise, judicious, of uncommon valour, solidity, and penetration, master of his passions, and of a genius superior to all employed by him, he seemed born for a crown, tho' Providence ranked him among subjects. Besides all these qualities, he had a majestick statelines, becoming his birth, and exalted station, in France and England; but he never made any farther use of this advantage, than to command a due respect and regard, for his person and authority. In a word, he perfectly resembled the late king, his brother, and, in all his actions, took him for a pattern. He had with him, in France, the earls of Warwick, Salisbury, and Arundel, the dukes of Somerset, Fastolf, Talbot, and many others, all remarkable, for their valour and experience in the art of war. The French authors, who have written the Life of Charles VII, rarely mention these generals, without an honourable epithet; and, therefore, I shall only just name these illustrious persons; who were so famous, in the History of those days, that all the encomiums, I can bestow on them, would give no new lustre to their glory and reputation.

The generals of the duke of Burgundy.

The duke of Burgundy had, at the same time, three generals, whom I shall place among the English, because they were in the service of the same prince; and their actions well deserve an honourable mention.

The earl of Ligny.

The first was John de Luxemburgh, earl of Ligny, son to Valeran de Luxemburgh, constable of France; who signalised himself, during the whole war.

Lisle-Adam.

Lisle-Adam, marshal of France, was a bold and enterprising warrior, and also capable of managing the most difficult undertaking; who, in 1419, made the duke of Burgundy master of Paris; but, afterwards, incurring, by his excessive haughtiness, the displeasure of Henry V, he was committed to the Bastile; from whence the duke of Bedford had lately released him, at the duke of Burgundy's request.

Toulongeon.

Toulongeon, commonly called marshal of Burgundy, was highly esteemed by the duke, his master, for his valour and parts.

The court of England.

I must, now, pass into England, and briefly mention some of the princes and great men, who were principally concerned in the management of young Henry's affairs.

The duke of Gloucester.

Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, younger brother to the duke of Bedford, was a prince equally qualified for the camp and the cabinet; and his noble endowments, improved by an extensive knowledge of the sciences, would have put him upon a level with the duke, his brother, had he been more master of his passions, or less haughty and ambitious; but I shall have frequent occasions, hereafter, to display more fully this prince's character.

1422. The princes of Lancaster.

The princes of the house of Lancaster, legitimated by the name of Beaufort, held the next rank to the duke of Gloucester. Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and Henry, his brother, bishop of Winchester, were sons to John of Gaunt and Catharine Roet, his third wife; and John, earl of Somerset, their elder brother, at his death, left four sons, of whom, Henry, the eldest, bore the title of earl of Somerset; but, of the other three, Thomas, John, and Edmund, the last only was at court, the other two being prisoners, in France.

The duke of York.

Richard, duke of York, son to Richard, earl of Cambridge, beheaded, at Southampton, in 1415, and grandson to Edmund de Langley, duke of York, fifth son to Edward III, was the only male issue of this family, and very young, at the time I am speaking of; but I shall have many opportunities, to take notice of him, in the course of this reign.

Humphrey, earl of Stafford, was son to Ann of Gloucester, daughter to the unfortunate duke of Gloucester, whom Richard II, his nephew, caused to be strangled, at Calais.

Henry, earl of Essex, half-brother to the young earl of Stafford, had espoused Isabella, sister to the young duke of York.

Ralph Nevill, earl of Westmoreland, was related to the royal family, by his marriage with Joan Beaufort, sister to the duke of Exeter and bishop of Winchester.

Thomas Courtney, earl of Devonshire, married a sister to the duke of Somerset.

Henry Talbot was husband to a sister of the earl of Essex.

Henry Holland, earl of Huntingdon, sprung from a half-sister of Richard II, was prisoner, in France, since the battle of Bauge, in which the duke of Clarence was slain.

Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, and John Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel, had espoused princesses of the house of Marche.

Nothing more remains, in order to conveigh a general knowledge of the affairs of the two contending monarchs, than to see, how some foreign princes stood affected towards them.

How the princes of Europe stood affected, with respect to the two kings.

It is very surprising, that, during this long war of 38 years, no prince, in Europe, would be concerned in it. Immediately after the treaty of Troye, Henry V. sent ambassadors into several parts, to negotiate alliances, with an intent to render himself so superior to the dauphin, as to put it out of his power to make any resistance; but it does not appear, that his design proved successful; for, if he made alliances with some princes, they were so worded, as not to oblige them to be parties in the war.

The emperor Sigismund might, by vertue of his league with Henry V, have assisted his son; but he was embroiled in troubles, on the account of religion, in Bohemia, which wholly employed him. The rest of the German princes were regardless of what was transacted, in France; not being sorry to see the English 1422. Engliſh and French unable, by their diſſenſion, to diſturb their neighbours.

Italy. All Italy ſtood neuter; and the duke of Milan alone was inclined to king Charles, tho', hitherto, he had ſent him no ſupplies.

Spain. Caſtile, Arragon, and Portugal were in peace, or truce, with the two rival kings, and aſſiſted neither; for their policy was to let them beat one another, and afterwards join with the conqueror.

The duke of Lorrain. The duke of Lorrain was inclined to king Charles, by reaſon of the alliance between their families; but he durſt not aſſiſt him, leſt he ſhould draw the war into his country.

Among all the neighbouring princes of France, Amadeus, firſt duke of Savoy, and Lewis de Chalon, prince of Orange, were thoſe, on whom the eyes of both parties were chiefly fixed, becauſe of the diverſions they might make, in Provence and Dauphine; but theſe princes, as yet, obſerved a neutrality, pleaſed with being courted both by the Engliſh and French; however, it was obvious, that they leaned to the Engliſh, on account of the duke of Burgundy, the prince of Orange being his nephew, and the duke of Savoy his vaſſal.

The Low-Countries. As for the neighbours of England, none, except the princes of the Low-Countries and the Scots, could be ſo concerned in the quarrel, as greatly to advantage, or prejudice, the rival kings. The duke of Burgundy poſſeſſed Flanders and Artois; John of Burgundy, his firſt couſin, held Brabant and the earldom of Limbourg; and, by his marriage with Jacquelina of Bavaria, daughter to the late earl of Hainault, he had likewiſe acquired the ſovereignty of Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Friſeland. The firſt of theſe two princes was firmly united to the Engliſh; and the other took care not to declare againſt them, leſt he ſhould deprive his ſubjects of their beneficial commerce with England.

Scotland. As for the Scots, it is certain, that their intereſt required them to do all that was poſſible, to ſtop the progreſs of the Engliſh, in France; for, beſides their antient alliance, which obliged them to aſſiſt the French, it was manifeſtly dangerous to their ſtate, to ſuffer the king of England to grow ſo very powerful; but the regent, for his own ends, had hindered them from taking this adviſable courſe, till, at length, they ſent 7000 men to the dauphin. The Scots, thenceforward, perceiving more and more their error, in permitting the Engliſh to become maſters of France, reſolved to ſend thither a greater ſupply; but, the duke of Albany dying, in the interim, and Mordac, his eldeſt ſon, a prince of a mean genius, ſucceeding him, as regent, inteſtine troubles aroſe, that prevented them from putting their deſign in execution; ſo that, till the death of Henry V, they had acted nothing, in this reſpect, and king James returned into England a priſoner, as before.

Having, thus, preſented my readers with a general view of the affairs of the two kings, it is time to reſume the thread of our Hiſtory.

The parliament met, on the 9th of November, purſuant to the ſummons; and the duke of Glouceſter, by a patent under the great ſeal, was commiſſioned to hold it, in the king's name, according to the uſual practice, when the ſovereign is not in a condition to be preſent, in perſon. The parliament, firſt of all, ſettled the government, during the king's minority; they nominated the members of the council, filled the offices of the crown, and gave the great ſeal to the biſhop of Durham; but it was likewiſe neceſſary to appoint a protector, who ſhould have the management of the publick affairs, during the minority. Henry V. had ordered, on his death-bed, that this high dignity ſhould be conferred on the duke of Glouceſter, his brother; but, in obeying his will, a great injury would be done to the duke of Bedford, the elder brother, the ſecond perſon in the kingdom, and preſumptive heir of the crown, whilſt Henry was without iſſue; for he would, by this means, have been below the duke of Glouceſter, his younger brother. Indeed, he was regent of France; but, very poſſibly, he might return into England, during ſo long a minority; wherefore, it was neceſſary to project ſome expedient, to perform the will of the late king, without derogating from the right of the elder brother. 1422.

The duke of Bedford is made protector; Act. Pub. After a ſerious examination of the affair, the parliament nominated the duke of Bedford, "Protector of England, defender of the church, "and firſt counſellor to the king;" but a clauſe was added, that he ſhould exerciſe this office, only whilſt in England, without having, in his abſence, any concern in the adminiſtration; and, at the ſame time, the protectorſhip was conferred on the duke of Glouceſter, with power, to act, only in the abſence of the duke of Bedford, his brother, who, upon his return into England, was to be owned as ſole protector; and the annual ſalary of the protectorſhip was ſettled, at 8000 marks.

and in his abſence the duke of Glouceſter.

The jealouſy of the council againſt the duke of Glouceſter We have ſeen, that the duke of Glouceſter was not ſo moderate, as the duke of Bedford, his brother; he was impatient of the leaſt oppoſition to his will; wherefore, the privy-council were continually on their guard, to hinder his aſſuming a greater authority, than belonged to his ſtation. As they held not their places of him, but of the parliament, they were the leſs afraid of diſpleaſing him, ſince it was not in his power to remove them; and, on this account, there was, in the council itſelf, a ſort of confederacy againſt him, managed by the biſhop of Wincheſter, his uncle; whoſe oppoſition to the protector, at length, occaſioned a quarrel, the ſad effects of which will be mentioned, in the ſequel of this reign.

Governors are appointed for the king. Hall. The parliament afterwards appointed governors, to take care of the king's perſon and education, viz. Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and Henry, his brother, biſhop of Wincheſter, both great-uncles to the king; but I am altogether unacquainted with the qualities of the former, not having met with his character, in any hiſtorian.

As for the biſhop of Wincheſter, he was a prince more qualified for the world and a court, court, than the church; yet ſome place him among the learned of thoſe days. After he was made biſhop of Wincheſter, in 1405, his principal care was to accumulate riches; and he was commonly reckoned the wealthieſt of all the Engliſh nobles. Henry V, his nephew, had ſome regard for him; but, being no ſtranger to his intriguing temper, he oppoſed the pope's promoting him to the dignity of a cardinal. Indeed, he was a man of ſenſe, and tho roughly verſed in all the means, human prudence ſuggeſts to the ambitious, to accompliſh their ends; his birth, parts, riches, and office of governor to the king, gave him great credit, in the council, and, conſequently, in all the reſt of the kingdom; and, in a word, he had a better intereſt, than the duke of Glouceſter, his nephew, tho' protector, and ruined him entirely; but the occaſion of their quarrel is not certainly known. According to ſome, the biſhop, reſenting the duke of Glouceſter's being preferred before him, in the government of the kingdom, which he would rather have had, than that of the king, inceſſantly plotted to ſupplant him; but others, on the contrary, affirm, that the duke of Glouceſter deteſted him, purely, becauſe he always oppoſed his aſſuming an immoderate authority, as regent; which, at laſt, proved fatal to their common maſter.

Whilſt the courts of the two new kings were equally employed in affairs, that would admit of no delay, the war was but feintly proſecuted, in France; moreover, the ſeaſon did not permit, after the death of Charles VI, on the 21ſt of October, great armies to keep the field; ſo that, from this time to the end of 1422, the troops of the two kings took ſome repoſe, in order to prepare to renew the war. There is nothing, therefore, remarkable, in this interval, except the taking of St. Valery, a place of great importance, ſurrendered to the Engliſh, purſuant to a capitulation made, ſome months before, and of Buſſi, in the earldom of Guiſe, by the earl of Ligny; whilſt, on the other hand, James de Harcourt became maſter of La Rue, in Picardy, and La Hire of Vitry, in Champagne.

1423. The duke of Bedford's deſign, purſuant to the late king's project, was to reduce all the towns Charles ſtill held, in the iſle of France, and the neighbouring provinces, that he might, afterwards, attack him, beyond the Loire; and, beſides, ſo long as Charles had places about Paris, the Engliſh durſt not remove from the metropolis, without leaving a ſtrong garriſon, and thereby greatly weakening their armies. Before the regent had finiſhed his preparations, to execute his deſign, he received the ill news, that Graville, one of king Charles's captains, had taken Meulant, by ſtorm, the 4th of January; which loſs gave him extreme uneaſineſs, not only as it retarded the execution of his projects, but on account of the neighbourhood of Meulant, which was no more than ſix leagues from Paris; moreover, the taking of a place ſo very near him was an affront that he could hardly digeſt; and, therefore, he reſolved to open the campaign with this ſiege.

Meulant is taken, by ſtorm, by the French. Monſtrelet. Hall.

1423. They take alſo La Ferte-Milon.

Shortly after, king Charles's troops took alſo La Ferte-Milon, a ſmall town, between Meaux and Soiſſons; but, the caſtle making a gallant defence, the marſhal de L'Iſle Adam had time to relieve it, and expelled the French.

The regent beſieges Meulant.

In the beginning of February, the regent himſelf beſieged Meulant; but as it was king Charles's intereſt to keep the war in the iſle of France, and the adjoining provinces, he ordered the earl of Aumarle to join Stuart, the commander of the Scotch troops, and march with him to the relief of that place. The French give Stuart the title of conſtable of Scotland; but it does not appear, that he was ſtiled ſo by the Scotch hiſtorians; and I imagine, that the miſtake of the French proceeded from their ignorance of the Engliſh and Scotch tongues, where the title of conſtable may be given to any commander, in chief, of a body of troops, without his being conſtable of the kingdom. However that be, the earl of Buchan being then in Scotland, Stuart commanded the auxiliary troops of that kingdom; and the two generals were actually joined; but, a conteſt ariſing, about the command, they parted again, without action. Graville, hearing of it, capitulated, the 2d of March; and the capitulation ran, that ſuch of the beſieged, as had any caſtles in their power, ſhould ſurrender them to the regent; purſuant to which agreement, the regent took poſſeſſion of Marcouſſi, Montlheri, and ſeveral other places.

Meulant capitulates.

Tho' theſe towns are inconſiderable, at this day, they were, then, of great importance, principally becauſe of their lying near Paris, and keeping the Engliſh at a diſtance from the Loire, which was very advantageous to king Charles; wherefore, he ſo managed, that his adherents fortified themſelves, in all the towns and caſtles capable of making any reſiſtance, in order to continue the war in thoſe parts; and this likewiſe was the reaſon, that determined the regent to form the project, of clearing the iſle of France of all theſe garriſons. However, he would not have opened the campaign ſo early, had he not been compelled to it, by the loſs of Meulant; for he was intent upon a much more important deſign, which he executed, immediately after the retaking of that place.

An interview of the dukes of Bedford, Burgundy, Bretagne, and earl of Richemont, at Amiens. April. Act. Pub.

We have ſeen, that the duke of Bretagne made ſome advances towards ſwearing the treaty of Troye; but that the death of Henry V. broke off the negotiation. The duke of Bedford perceiving, how beneficial it would be to the king, his nephew, to gain this prince to his intereſt, had ſpent the whole winter, in negotiating an alliance with him, by the duke of Burgundy's mediation; and, his expectation being fully anſwered, he came to Amiens, where he met the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, with the earl of Richemont, his brother. Purſuant to the plan, before, formed, they ſigned a treaty of alliance, againſt king Charles; and, to ſtrengthen this union, they alſo concluded two marriages, 1423. viz. between the duke of Bedford and Ann, fifth ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy; and between the earl of Richemont and Margaret, eldeſt ſiſter to the duke, and widow to Lewis, the dauphin, who died, in 1415. As the earl of Richemont had been the means of engaging the duke of Bretagne in this league, it was very reaſonable that he ſhould find his advantage in it; and, as the young earl entertained an extraordinary opinion of his own merit, his vanity was agreeably flattered by this marriage. Indeed, it was no ſmall honour for him, to marry a ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy, widow to a dauphin of France; but, to obtain her conſent, he was conſtrained to agree, that, according to the cuſtom of England, ſhe ſhould retain the title of dauphineſs, becauſe ſhe abſolutely refuſed to take the inferior one of counteſs of Richemont. The treaty, between theſe princes, was concluded, April the 8th.

The regent conſummates his marriage. Monſtrelet.

Soon after, the duke of Bedford went to Troye, where he conſummated his marriage; and an hiſtorian affirms, that the duke of Burgundy, provided he died, without male iſſue, promiſed him the earldom of Artois; but there was no occaſion to perform this engagement. In conducting his bride to Paris, the regent ſtaid, ſome time, in Champagne, to form the ſiege of Pont-Sur-ſeine, a ſmall town of that country, which was carried, by ſtorm; and then, coming to Paris, he lodged in the Hotel des Tournelles, which he had ordered to be repaired, and magnificently furniſhed.

The earl of Saliſ- beſieges Montaigu. April. Monſtrelet.

In the beginning of the year, the earl of Salisbury was inveſted with the government of Champagne and La Brie, and received orders from the regent, to clear theſe two provinces of king Charles's garriſons; and this general, having taken the field, in April, beſieged, or rather blockaded, Montaigu, an extreme ſtrong caſtle, ſeated on a cape, belonging to the province of Burgundy, but running into Champagne. There were only 120 men in the caſtle; and yet, by reaſon of its ſituation, it was almoſt impregnable. The earl of Salisbury, having formed the blockade, leaving the earl of Suffolk, with ſome troops, marched to other conqueſts; and, in June, he became maſter of Vertus, Sezanne, Epernay, and ſome other places.

Tannegui attempts to relieve Montaigu.

In the interim, king Charles ordered Tannegui du Chatel to relieve Montaigu; but the earl of Salisbury, who had left only few troops, before that caſtle, fearing ſome misfortune, poſted, immediately, to their aſſiſtance; and with ſuch expedition, that Tannegui du Chatel, tho' he was now far advanced, finding himſelf inferior to the Engliſh, retired into Burgundy, where the French had lately ſurpriſed Macon and Crevant, at the two extremities of that province. Salisbury purſued him; but, not being able to overtake him, he laid ſiege to Crevant, a ſtrong place upon the Yonne, three leagues above Auxerre.

Charles had no ſooner received this news, than he ordered Stuart, who was lately reinforced from Scotland, to draw ſome troops out of the neighbouring garriſons, and join du Chatel, in order to attempt the relief of Crevant; and all theſe forces together made 10,000 men, of which, by the king's order, the marſhal de Severac went and took the command; but, as it required ſome time, before they could be joined, in a body, Saliſbury had leiſure to take the place; after which, being ignorant, as yet, of the deſigns of the French, he joined Suffolk, before Montaigu. 1423.

Crevant is taken.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, in Burgundy, the duke of Bedford cauſed Orſay to be beſieged, a ſmall place between Paris and Montlheri; but, as the garriſon held out, ſix weeks, and ſurrendered only, at extremity, he reſolved to make them an example, for a terror to the other ſmall towns. All the officers and ſoldiers were carried away priſoners to Paris, and ordered to be put to death; but, fortunately for them, the ducheſs of Bedford, meeting them as they were going to execution, obtained their pardon.

Orſay is taken by the Engliſh. Monſtrelet.

In the interim, the French army, drawn together, in Auxerrois, marched to Crevant, which they had not been able to relieve, and beſieged it; and the army was commanded by the marſhal de Severac, who had under him Du Chatel, Stuart, Ventadour, and ſome other noted officers. The ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, then at Dijon, ſent, immediately, to the marſhal Toulongeon, and all the Burgundian lords, to try to relieve Crevant; and ſhe likewiſe deſired the earl of Salisbury to join her generals; who, being very ſenſible, how neceſſary it was to comply with the ducheſs's requeſt, leaving part of his troops, before Montaigu, the garriſon whereof was reduced to 20 men, repaired to Auxerre, and joined the Burgundians. Next day, they marched together to Crevant; and they had, in all, no more than 6000 men; but they were ſome of the beſt ſoldiers, then in Europe. The beſiegers, hearing of their march, raiſed the ſiege, in order to meet them, and poſted themſelves, at ſome diſtance from Crevant, upon a hill, where it was very difficult to force them; and the reſolution of the French generals ſurpriſed the Engliſh and Burgundians; who, perceiving that it was impoſſible to attack them, in their preſent poſt, altered their rout, and, as if they had ſome other view, paſſed the Yonne, at Cologn-le-Vimeaux, with an intent to repaſs it, at ſome other place, and proceed to Crevant. The French, finding that, by this march, their commodious ſtation was rendered uſeleſs, deſcended from the hill, and poſted themſelves, by the river-ſide, to defend the paſſage; and the two armies remained, above three hours, in ſight of each other, with the river between them; but, at length, a body of Engliſh, gaining a certain bridge, withſtood the efforts of the French army, with uncommon bravery, and gave the reſt of the troops time to come to their ſupport; which action, one of the boldeſt, was performed, with ſo much valour, regularity, and conduct, that the French were unable to beat them from the bridge. All the Engliſh and Burgundians were no ſooner over, than they ſo vigorouſly.

The battle of Crevant. P. Daniel.

1423. vigorouſly attacked their enemies, that they put them to rout; but the marſhal de Severac was blamed, for retiring too ſoon, and leaving Stuart engaged with his Scotch troops. Above 500, moſt of them Scots, were ſlain, on the ſpot; and as many more were made priſoners, among whom were Stuart and Xaintrailles, with 40 officers of note.

Macon and other places are taken by the Engliſh.

The French, by reaſon of their loſs, on this occaſion, being incapable of keeping the field, before a victorious army, the earl of Salisbury returned to the blockade of Montaigu; and, a few days after his arrival, the place capitulated, and the fortifications were demoliſhed. Then, being apprehenſive of no oppoſition from the French, he divided his army with the earl of Suffolk, who took Macon, whilſt he himſelf finiſhed the conqueſts of Champagne; after which, Salisbury entered the iſle of France, and took Coucy and ſome other caſtles.

The ſiege and capitulation of Crotoy. Monſtrelet.

In the mean while, the regent had beſieged Crotoy, a town, in Picardy, ſituated on the Somme, over-againſt St. Valery; and Ralph Boteler had the management of this ſiege, which employed him, till October. At laſt, James d' Harcourt, governor of the town, agreed to ſurrender it, the 1ſt of March next, if not relieved, by that time, which ſort of capitulation was very common, in thoſe days. On the day fixed for the relief, or ſurrender, of the place, the beſiegers drew up under the walls, expecting their enemies; which was called Tenir Journee; and, if no army appeared, that day, to give them battle, the place was ſurrendered, purſuant to the capitulation. Tho' the governor of Crotoy had given ample time, to prepare for his relief, Charles was not in a condition to attempt it; and the town was ſurrendered to the duke of Bedford.

The battle of Crevant was the more prejudicial to Charles, as he loſt many officers of diſtinction, ſome of whom were ſlain, and the reſt priſoners in the hands of the Engliſh, or Burgundians. Among the latter, Xaintrailles was the perſon whom he moſt lamented, knowing him to be one of the braveſt officers in the kingdom, and moſt capable of doing him ſervice; and, tho' he had not much money, he ſent him, what was ſufficient to pay his ranſom. Xaintrailles, to convince the king of the grateful ſenſe he retained of this favour, preſently after his releaſe, found means to ſurpriſe Ham and Guiſe; and La Hire, or Vignoles, did the like, by Compiegne.

The loſs of theſe places extremely mortified the regent, as it obliged him to keep his forces, near Paris, in ſpite of the projects he had formed; wherefore, he ordered all the three towns, taken by ſurprize, to be beſieged, at once. If I ſhould ſtop to relate the circumſtances of all the ſieges, on both ſides, during this war, it would inſenſibly lead me into numberleſs relations, for which few people would be concerned; ſo that I ſhall only mention the beginnings and events of the ſieges.

The regent, having reſolved upon the retaking theſe three places, the earl of Ligny inveſted Ham, and the marſhal de l' Iſle-Adam made an attempt upon Compiegne; but l' Iſle-Adam, falling into an ambuſh laid for him by La Hire, loſt 300 of his men; yet he obliged his enemy to keep within the walls. After Ligny had taken Ham, he inveſted Guiſe; but Xaintrailles, who commanded in that place, finding that, with his few troops, he ſhould make but a feint reſiſtance, went away, in queſt of relief. However, inſtead of ſucceeding, he fell himſelf into the hands of the Burgundians; and Guiſe ſurrendered, immediately. Upon this, Ligny joined l' Iſle-Adam, before Compeigne; and La Hire was conſtrained, at laſt, to capitulate; ſo that all the benefit Charles received, by taking the three places, was making the regent loſe time, which, of itſelf, was of ſome conſequence, conſidering the ſituation of his affairs. 1423.

Charles receives an aid from the duke of Milan.

After the duke of Bretagne went over to the Engliſh, Charles ſaw nothing, in France, able to ſupport him; and, therefore, he determined to apply to foreign princes, for aſſiſtance; tho' he could expect aid, only from Philip Maria Viſconti, duke of Milan, and the Scots. Philip was uncle to the duke of Orleans, and, of courſe, a friend to the houſe of Valois; and, his affairs being, then, in a good ſituation, he ſent king Charles 1000 men at arms, and 500 lances, at the time when the loſs of the battle of Crevant had led him to deſpair of keeping the field. Theſe troops being arrived, on the borders of France, Grolee, governor of Lyonnois, and Culant, lately made admiral, went to receive them; but, as they were entering Baujolois, the governor of la Fuſſiere ſent the generals word, that he was in negotiation with Toulongeon, marſhal of Burgundy, to ſurrender the town; and, as the marſhal knew nothing of their march, it would be eaſy to ſurpriſe him, when he came to take poſſeſſion. This ſtratagem was executed ſo ſecretly, that Toulongeon, entering la Fuſſiere, with 700 men, was made priſoner, with all his followers; but the duke, his maſter, exchanged him, afterwards, for Stuart taken, at Crevant.

1423. The battle of Gravelle.

This ſmall advantage was incapable of comforting king Charles, for all his loſſes; but, ſhortly after, he had a freſh occaſion of joy, in the news, that a body of Engliſh troops were defeated, in Maine, with great loſs. John de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, the French having no army in the field, departed from Normandy, with a body of troops drawn out of ſeveral garriſons, and, throwing himſelf into Anjou, burnt the ſuburbs of Angers; and then he retired, with a booty of 12000 head of cattle, taken in his incurſion. Whilſt he was employed in this expedition, the earl of Aumarle, governor of Anjou, aſſembled ſome troops, to ſtop his progreſs; and the young duke of Alenſon, Loheac, Coulonge, the baſtard of Alenſon, and ſeveral others joining him with what troops they could raiſe, overtook the Engliſh, at Gravelle, in Maine.

Pole

1423. Pole, perceiving that it was impoſſible to drive away his booty, without fighting, drew up his troops, and, intrenching himſelf with his carriages in the front, received the French, with undaunted reſolution; but, whilſt his men were courageouſly fighting, a detachment of the enemy attacking them, in the rear, it being impoſſible for them to defend themſelves, on both ſides, after a very obſtinate reſiſtance, they were, at length, defeated, with the loſs of 1400 men, and all their booty; and Pole himſelf was taken priſoner. Charles's flatterers would have perſuaded him, that he was, now, revenged, for the buſineſs of Crevant; but there was a vaſt diſparity between theſe two actions, with reſpect to the conſequence; for the battle of Gravelle did not affect the affairs of the Engliſh, whereas that of Crevant had almoſt ruined Charles.

Charles receives aid from Scotland. Buchanan.

However, this ſucceſs raiſed his hopes, eſpecially, when it was ſeconded with the advice of the arrival of 5000 men, brought him from Scotland by the earl of Buchan; who had returned into his own country, to take care of the intereſts of his new maſter, to whom he was entirely devoted; and the great men of Scotland were very much inclined to his ſentiments. The new regent being a prince of a mean genius and no credit, it was eaſy for the earl, his brother, to be ſerviceable to king Charles; and, by his care and ſollicitations, he procured an aid of 5000 men, commanded by Archibald, earl of Douglaſs, his father-in-law. Douglaſs was a lord of great repute, in his own country, by reaſon of his qualities, riches, and alliances, but ſtill more conſiderable, for his merit and experience in military affairs. At Rochel, he landed his troops, which could never more ſeaſonably arrive; and Charles pleaſed, as may be imagined, to ſee theſe ſupplies, loaded the principal Scotch officers with honours, careſſes, and favours. He had already conferred on the earl of Buchan the higheſt military poſt; Douglaſs was created duke of Touraine; and Stuart was made baron d'Aubigni, and afterwards earl of Evreux, with licenſe to quarter his arms with thoſe of France; and, to give the Scots a farther proof of his eſteem and confidence, he choſe out of them a company of gaurds, which, in proceſs of time, was increaſed to a regiment; and, in a word, he did every thing, that tended to gain the affection of the Scots, in order to engage them to ſend him greater ſupplies, or make a powerful diverſion, in England.

The birth of prince Lewis.

Thus, the affairs of Charles began to flouriſh, by the ſuccours of the Scots and the duke of Milan; and his joy, at the arrival of theſe troops, was preceded by the ſatisfaction of having a ſon born, on the 4th of July, the ſame year; to whom he gave the name of Lewis, with the title of dauphin.

The earl of Richemont quarrels with the duke of Bedford.

Moreover, an event was preparing, in his favour, that was no leſs proper to reſtore his affairs; namely, the earl of Richemont's change, which drew after it that of the duke of Bretagne. Richemont, having conſummated his marriage, at Dijon, where the duke of Burgundy came, with the dauphineſs, his ſiſter, went and paid a viſit to the duke of Bedford, at Paris; and, during his ſtay, he often intimated to the duke, that he was extremely deſirous of commanding the Engliſh army, to which he offered to join a conſiderable body of the duke his brother's troops; but the regent did not judge it adviſable to place, at the head of his army, a young foreign prince, who had never commanded, in chief, nor even ſerved, ſince the battle of Azincourt. The earl of Richemont, being extremely haughty and ſelf-conceited, could not digeſt this refuſal; but, conſidering it, as a great affront, from that moment, he reſolved to be revenged; and, how he executed his reſolution, the ſequel will inform us. 1423.

A truce for Burgundy and Lyonnois.

Soon after, Charles and the duke of Burgundy made a truce, for Lyonnois and Burgundy; which was abſolutely neceſſary for theſe two provinces, as well as for the duke of Savoy, by whoſe means, it was procured; for, his ſubjects and the inhabitants of Burgundy and Lyonnois not being able to live, without trading together, the war was very detrimental to them.

The affairs of England. Act. Pub.

Whilſt France was the ſeat of war, England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, by the good order eſtabliſhed in the government; and, in May, Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, was made governor of Ierland, with a very extenſive authority; for policy required, that, during Henry's minority, this prince ſhould be removed from the kingdom, becauſe of his right to the crown. Not that he had given any cauſe for ſuſpicion; but there was a poſibility, that even, without his conſent, he might occaſion commotions, which the wiſdom of the council was willing to prevent; but he did not depart, till February, or March, the following year.

A ſubſidy is granted. Act. Pub.

The parliament, that met, on the 20th of October, granted the king a ſubſidy, for the ſupport of the war, in France, where king Charles ſtill maintained his ground, notwithſtanding the great diſproportion between his forces and thoſe of his rival.

A treaty about releaſing the king of Scotland. Act. Pub.

I have obſerved, that this monarch extremely careſſed the Scots; and that the nation began to follow maxims entirely different, from thoſe they had obſerved, during the duke of Albany's regency. The duke of Glouceſter and the council of England, perceiving this alteration, which might prove very prejudicial to the king's affairs, judged it neceſſary to countermine Charles's deſigns, by means of the king of Scotland, a priſoner in England, ever ſince 1408; and, with this view, they reſolved to releaſe him, upon ſuch terms as ſhould attach him to the intereſts of England. This was, indeed, the only method to ſtop the career of the Scotch nobility, who were almoſt all inclined to an open rupture with the Engliſh; but, whilſt the council was projecting, how to proceed, without too plainly diſcovering their deſign, an accident, in Scotland, ſaved them the trouble of making the firſt advances.

Buchanan.

Murdac Stuart, regent of Scotland, ſince the death of the duke of Albany, his father, had three ſons, all very ill-tempered; and who 1423. who gave him a great deal of trouble and vexation, becauſe he was neither able, nor had ſufficient, ſteadineſs to reſtrain them within the bounds of their duty. The youngeſt, asking, one day, for a certain hawk, being denied, wrung the bird's neck, tho' he knew it to be extremely valued by his father; but, this action convincing the regent, how difficult it would be for him to govern the nation, ſince his own children had ſo little reſpect for him, he aſſembled the ſtates, and propoſed a negotiation with England, about the liberty of king James. A motion, ſo agreeable to the wiſhes both of nobles and people, was received, with joy and applauſe; and, leſt he ſhould repent, ambaſſadors were, immediately, named, and impowered to negotiate the affair; who, as the court of England ſtood affected, met with a very civil reception; and commiſſioners were appointed to treat with them, whoſe inſtructions were, that they ſhould conſent to king James's enlargement, on the following terms: That the captive prince ſhould pay the king 40,000, or, at leaſt, 36000 marks, for his expenees, in England, during his captivity; and that a truce ſhould be made, during which, neither of the kings ſhould aſſiſt the other's enemies. Moreover, they were ordered to intimate to the Scotch ambaſſadors, that it would be very expedient to marry their king to a princeſs of the royal family of England; but the council wiſhed, that, if, poſſible, this motion ſhould come from the Scots.

The firſt conference, upon this affair, was held, at York, in the beginning of September; and, on the 10th of this month, the plenipotentiaries agreed, that James ſhould have his liberty, and return into his kingdom; that he ſhould pay, at ſeveral times, 40,000 marks, and give hoſtages, for ſecurity of the payment. In the ſecond conference, held, at London, on the 4th of December, all things, relating to the payment of the money, and the quality of the hoſtages, were ſettled; and then it was agreed, that the king of Scotland ſhould marry Joanna, ſiſter to the duke of Somerſet, and niece to the duke of Exeter and biſhop of Wincheſter; on account of which marriage, ſolemnized, in the beginning of February, next year, Henry, or the council, in his name, abated 10,000 of the 40,000 marks to be paid by the king of Scotland.

A match agreed upon between James and Joanna of Somerſet. Act. Pub.

1424. After this, the ambaſſadors of both nations ſigned a ſeven years truce, to commence, May the 1ſt, 1424; during which, each of the two kings was obliged to hinder his ſubjects from doing any damage to the other; ſo that, by this treaty, James bound himſelf, indirectly, to recall his troops out of France, before May the 1ſt; but, whether he neglected to ſend orders, for their return, or, as is moſt likely, his generals found ſome pretence, to evade them, theſe troops, as we ſhall ſee preſently, were there, in Auguſt. All theſe negotiations being, thus, ended, James was conducted to the borders, and ſet at liberty, the beginning of March.

A truce between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

An Engliſh hiſtorian affirms, that, before James left England, he ſwore fealty, and did homage to young Henry, in Windſor-caſtle, for the whole kingdom of Scotland; but it could be wiſhed, that, in advancing a fact of ſuch importance, and ſo very improbable, this author, who relates the very words of the oath and homage, had diſcovered the fountain from whence it was drawn. It is undeniably evident, that, ſince John Baliol, all the kings of Scotland had conſtantly refuſed this homage; for we muſt not rank, among the kings, Edward Baliol, who, to obtain the crown, had made himſelf a ſlave to Edward III. but it will be ſufficient to remark, that Robert III, refuſed homage to Henry IV; and that nothing had been ſettled upon this point, ſince that time; ſo that James was upon the ſame terms with the king, his father. If, therefore, he did homage to Henry VI, it muſt have been, by vertue of a new agreement; and yet we do not find, in the inſtructions of the Engliſh commiſſioners, any orders concerning that point. The conventions of the plenipotentiaries, appointed to treat about the liberty of king James, do not give the leaſt hint of this homage, tho' they are very copious, upon particulars of much leſs importance; nor is there any thing like it, in the treaty of truce. In a word, in above 30 ſeveral acts, extant in Rymer's Collection, relating to the affairs negotiated in 1423, and 1424, between the Engliſh and Scots, there is not a ſyllable alluding to any ſuch homage. Upon all which accounts, it is to be preſumed, in my opinion, that what is advanced by this hiſtorian, and by ſeveral others after him, about the pretended homage, at Windſor, is the pure effect of their prejudice. They really believed, as many do ſtill, that this homage was due from the king of Scotland; and, accordingly, they imagined the captive king would not be releaſed, without being obliged to pay it; but, beſides the reaſons which the king of Scotland had to refuſe it, the ſilence of the records, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, I apprehend to be a clear demonſtration. The reader may look back to what has been ſaid, upon this ſubject, in the reign of Edward I; where the rights of the Engliſh and Scots were ſufficienrly explained.

1424. Miſtakes of the Engliſh hiſtorians concerning the homage. Hollingſh.

Whilſt the king of Scotland's enlargement was negotiating in England, the war was continued, in France, with various ſucceſs; but, in the beginning of the year, the French took, by ſcalade, Beaumont upon Oyſe, a ſmall town, in the iſle of France, ſix leagues from Pontoiſe.

Beaumont is taken by the French. Monſtrelet.

On the contrary, Perrinet Graſſet, a Burgundian adventurer, ſurpriſed La Charite, a place of great importance; which by opening the Engliſh a paſſage over the Loire, might enable them to carry their arms, beyond that river.

La Charite is ſurpriſed.

The taking of places, by ſurprize, was then ſo frequent, that it is a wonder, the daily inſtances ſhould not render the governors more vigilant; and the duke of Bedford was extremely concerned to find, that, as he promoted his projects, by taking the enemy's towns, about Paris, others were ſurpriſed, that retarded his deſigns. His ſcheme was, as I obſerved, to 1424. clear the northern provinces; and yet he could not accompliſh it. Before he could execute his from the French; wherefore, he opened the project, it was neceſſary to take Beaumont campaign, in March, with an army of 10,000 men; and, after he had recovered this place, he made himſelf maſter alſo, in the iſle of France, of ſeveral caſtles, which did not a little incommode the Pariſians.

Whilſt he was employed in theſe mighty expeditions, he was informed, that Giraut, a captain of king Charles's party, had ſurpriſed Ivry, on the frontiers of Normandy; but, poſting, immediately, into thoſe parts, not to give the French leiſure, to provide for its defence, he beſieged the town, in the beginning of July. Giraut, perceiving that he could not long defend it, without relief, capitulated to ſurrender, on the 15th of Auguſt, if not relieved, by that time; but Charles, having early intelligence, of this capitulation, reſolved to relieve Ivry, at any rate, and to employ, in that ſervice, the Italian and Scotch troops lately arrived. To theſe he joined about 11000 men, drawn out of ſeveral provinces and garriſons; foreſeeing, that, without a great ſuperiority of forces, it would be extremely difficult to ſucceed in his deſign. All theſe troops, in a body, made an army of 20,000 men, which was formed, in Maine; and Charles never had one ſo numerous, before. It was the earl of Buchan's place, as conſtable of France, to command, in chief; but he was pleaſed to reſign that honour to the earl of Douglaſs, his father-in-law; to whom the king ſent, for that purpoſe, a patent, conſtituting him his lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom, otherwiſe the conſtable could not have been under his command.

The earl of Douglaſs commands the army of France.

All the French noblemen of Charles's party repaired to the army, in order to ſhare in the glory, expected from this expedition; and the French, beginning to march, paſſed, on the 12th of Auguſt, by the walls of Verneuil, a town in Perche, poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. On the morrow, they came in ſight of the Engliſh army, which was advantageouſly intrenched, before Ivry; and Douglaſs had no ſooner viewed the enemy's camp, than he judged it impoſſible to be attacked; upon which, he, immediately, returned, reſolving to lay ſiege to Verneuil. He thought, that he ſhould have time ſo to fortify his camp, as to expect the Engliſh, with advantage; or, if they would not venture to attack him, the taking of Verneuil would make the king an ample amends, for the loſs of Ivry. Upon his appearing before Verneuil, the garriſon prepoſterouſly imagined, that he was come from defeating the Engliſh, before Ivry; taking it for granted, that, with ſo great a ſuperiority, he would never return, without action; and, in this belief, which the French took care not to deſtroy, they ſurrendered, upon the firſt ſummons, and Douglaſs garriſoned the place with French.

He does not think fit to attack the Engliſh. Hall.

P. Daniel.

The earl of Salisbury, hearing of the march of the French, haſtened to join the regent, with 1000 men at arms, and 2000 archers, who arrived at the camp, on the 14th; ſo that the Engliſh army was about 15000 ſtrong. 1424.

On the 15th of Auguſt, Ivry opened her gates to the beſiegers, according to the capitulation; and, next day, the regent marched to Verneuil, where the French ſtill remained; and, when he came within a league of their camp, he ſent a herald to offer them battle. At the ſame time, he bid him tell Douglaſs, "He was come to take a bit with him; to which the other anſwered, "He ſhould find "the cloth laid." Naturally, it was the duke of Bedford's buſineſs to advance, who was in queſt of his enemies; but, knowing the impetuous humour of the French, he did not doubt, that, being ſuperior in number, they would come and attack him; and, therefore, he reſolved to expect them. He choſe an advantageous poſt, for his camp, and for the field of battle, a ground flanked by a hill, on which he placed 2000 archers; and he ordered his foremoſt ranks to take ſuch piles, as the late king had ſo ſucceſsfully uſed, in the battle of Azincourt, for the better reſiſting the efforts of the French cavalry, among whom were all the nobles. In this poſture, he waited the enemies reſolutions, hoping they would be ſo imprudent as to attack him; and he was not deceived, in his expectation.

Ivry ſurrenders.

The earl of Douglaſs, having viewed the Engliſh camp, called a council of war; and he repreſented, that the duke of Bedford, inſtead of advancing, deſigned to fight, with advantage, on a ground choſen by himſelf; wherefore, it was, by no means, adviſable, to attack him, in that ſituation; that the danger, to which it would expoſe the king's affairs, was of too great conſequence, to hazard a battle; but that, if it was judged neceſſary to fight, the beſt way would be to chuſe an advantageous poſt, and there expect the enemy, in order not to engage, till ſuch precautions were taken, as would, in ſome meaſure, warrant ſucceſs. This advice, being given by a foreigner, was thought too cautious by ſome of the council; and, amidſt the debates, a party was formed, againſt the general, headed by Aymeri, viſcount of Narbonne. This lord alledged, that, if, with ſuch a ſuperiority, a battle was avoided, the reputation of the king's arms would be irreparably loſt; that this cowardice would ſtrike ſuch a terror into the troops, that it would be impoſſible to lead them againſt enemies, who were avoided, when they ought to have been attacked; that the king's affairs could not be reſtored, without ſome great action; and, as there could not be a fairer opportunity, to vanquiſh the enemy, to neglect it would be to betray the intereſt of the king and kingdom. Notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, the conſtable and oldeſt captains were of the general's opinion; but the contrary party were reſolutely bent to carry their point. Narbonne, their head, going out of the council, ordered his banner to be diſplayed, and began to march towards the enemies; and they, that were of his mind, did the ſame, who were joined by all the volunteers

Diſſenſions in the French council of war.

1424. luntiers of the army. Douglaſs was enraged at this diſobedience; but neither his, nor the conſtable's authority, could oblige them to return. Had he been in his own country, he would have left theſe raſh men to periſh; but, being in a foreign kingdom, he was afraid of being charged with cowardice, or with having voluntarily ſuffered part of his troops to be loſt. Moreover, the number of the diſobedient continually increaſing, he found himſelf forced, tho' with extreme indignation, to march with the reſt of the army; upon which, they readily left the general the conduct of the army, congratulating each other, for having conquered his obſtinacy. In the interim, in ſpite of Douglaſs's care, his troops, fearing victory would eſcape them, were in ſuch diſorder and confuſion, that, when they came in ſight of the Engliſh, they were almoſt quite out of breath; yet they, immediately, attacked them, regardleſs of thoſe that adviſed to reſt a little, before they engaged. The Italians, being expoſed to the arrows of the 2000 archers on the hill, were the firſt that took to flight; for the French and Scots behaved better; but they were concerned with ſoldiers inured to war. In a word, the leaders, finding the attack unſucceſsful, and themſelves liable to everlaſting diſgrace, and ſome even juſtly fearing an exemplary puniſhment, choſe an honourable death, before a ſhameful retreat; and, the earl of Douglaſs, the earl of Buchan, Narbonne, Ventadour, Graville, and Rambouillet being ſlain, and many others of the principal officers being wounded, there was ſcarce a general left, to lead the ſoldiers to the charge; ſo that the whole army was entirely routed, and hotly purſued. Then it was, that the greateſt ſlaughter was made, as it commonly happens, on ſuch occaſions; and, the Italians returning, upon a falſe information, that their friends had the advantage, many more of them were ſlain by the victorious Engliſh. Theſe foreign troops would have been all cut in pieces, had not the night cooled the ardor of the conquerors; and the French and Scots loſt above 5000 men, who lay dead, on the ſpot, beſides a great number of wounded and priſoners. Among the laſt, were the marſhal de la Fayette and Gaucour; and the young duke of Alenſon, who had behaved moſt gallantly, was found among the dead, with ſome remains of life, and, by the extraordinary care of the regent, cured of his wounds; but, as will be ſeen, hereafter, he purchaſed his liberty, at a very dear rate. The Engliſh loſt 16 or 1700 of their braveſt ſoldiers; and, the 17th of Auguſt, and the next day after the battle, the regent inveſted Verneuil, where Rambure commanded. This governor could have long defended himſelf, had he been well ſtored with proviſions; but that want, and, perhaps, the conſternation of the garriſon, obliged him to ſurrender, the third day; and there was found, in Verneuil, all the baggage of the French, Scotch, and Italian generals, with the money intended for the payment of the army. As they entered the town, the Engliſh met the corpſe of the viſcount of Narbonne, going to be buried; and, becauſe he was one of the duke of Burgundy's murderers, they took his body and hung it, on a gibbet. 1424.

The battle of Verneuil.

After the battle of Verneuil, the regent, leaving the command of the army to the earl of Salisbury, poſted to Paris, where ſome mutiniers had raiſed a ſedition, believing that he could not fail of being defeated by the French; but this commotion was appeaſed by the death of ſome of the ring-leaders; tho' it convinced the regent, that he muſt not truſt to the affection of the Pariſians, unleſs it was in his power to keep them always in awe. A commotion, at Paris, is appeaſed by the regent. Hall.

The earl of Salisbury, being in a condition to make ſome conſiderable attempt, entered Maine, and beſieged Mans, the capital of the province, and one of the ſtrongeſt cities, in France; and the governor made a long and brave defence; but, at length, deſpairing of relief, he came to a capitulation. After the taking of Mans, the Engliſh general inveſted La Ferte Bernard, another place in the ſame province, which could hardly be carried, by ſtorm, on account of its ſituation; but, whilſt part of his troops, kept it blocked up, he over-ran the reſt of the province, and took St. Suſanne, with ſome other places; and he finiſhed his glorious campaign, and the conqueſt of Maine, with taking La Ferte Bernard, after a four months blockade. Salisbury conquers Maine.

The defeats of Crevant and Verneuil had thrown king Charles's troops, and all his towns, into great conſternation; and, were it not for the approaching winter, probably, the Engliſh would have puſhed their conqueſts farther; but this delay, which the ſeaſon gave king Charles, would have only retarded his ruin, a few months, if a favourable and unexpected event had not given him time to breathe. I mean the quarrel, between the dukes of Glouceſter and Brabant, in which the duke of Burgundy was alſo engaged; and it may be juſtly affirmed, that this affair cauſed the Engliſh to loſe the fatal moment, which, probably, was to determine the ruin of the houſe of Valois, and render them maſters of all France. This will be manifeſtly ſhewn, in the ſequel; but it will be neceſſary, firſt, to give a brief account of the riſe of this quarrel, which proved ſo fatal to England. A favourable event for Charles.

William of Bavaria, late earl of Hainault, had, by Margaret, his counteſs, daughter to Philip le Hardy, duke of Burgundy, an only daughter, named Jacquelina, who had been eſpouſed to John, ſecond ſon to Charles VI; who, being dauphin, by the death of his elder brother, Lewis, died, at Compiegne, in 1416; and Jacquelina remained a widow, at her father's houſe. The earl, her father, dying ſhortly after, ſhe became heireſs to his dominions, viz. Hainault, Holland, Zealand and and Frieſland; and ſuch a noble inheritance could not fail to attract the addreſſes of many princeſſes; but the counteſs, her mother, deſirous of procuring this rich match, for a prince of her own family, caſt her eyes on John, duke of Brabant, her nephew, and perſuaded her daughter to marry him. The new-married couple ſoon quarrelled, for reaſons foreign The affair of Hainault.

1424. to our purpoſe; but their quarrel grew to that height, that Jacquelina, at laſt, cauſed herſelf be run away with, by ſome Engliſh knights, who conducted her to London. I have obſerved, in the preceding reign, that this voluntary rape was not a ſecret to king Henry V. for, in all probability, this monarch had then thoughts of marrying Jacquelina to the duke of Glouceſter.

Upon this princeſs's arrival, in England, ſhe attempted to annul her marriage with the duke of Brabant; and, with this view, ſhe applied to the anti-pope, Benedict XIII, who, tho' depoſed by the council of Piſa, perſiſted in retaining his title and dignity. The pretended pope, overjoyed at this addreſs, annulled Jacquelina's marriage, and permitted her to marry again; but, whether Henry V. was afraid of diſobliging the duke of Burgundy, couſin-german to the duke of Brabant, or judged it too irregular to uſe the diſpenſation of a pope, whom he did not own, for ſuch, he did not haſten the concluſion of the projected marriage.

Henry dying, in the interim, the duke of Glouceſter, believing that he ought not to delay, any longer, ſo beneficial a marriage, eſpouſed Jacquelina, either in 1422, or, at leaſt, in the beginning of 1423; for there is, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a petition dated, March 7, 1423, and preſented to him, under the title of earl of Hainault. However this be, the duke had no ſooner conſummated his marriage, than he reſolved to take poſſeſſion of his ducheſs's dominions, now in the hands of the duke of Brabant; but, in the mean time, the duke of Burgundy, foreſeeing that Jacquelina's third marriage might create a war between the two princes, her husbands, had a conference, on that ſubject, with the duke of Bedford, at Amiens, and afterwards another, at Paris, in December, 1423. They agreed, that the deciſion of this affair ſhould be referred to the pope, as the proper judge of ſuch caſes; and the duke of Brabant approved of the expedient, being ſenſible that there was no ſufficient reaſon to induce the court of Rome to annul the marriage; but the duke of Glouceſter rejected it; tho' he proteſted, that he would readily conſent to a reaſonable agreement. In the mean while, he made preparations, to ſupport his pretenſions, whilſt the duke of Bedford triumphantly proſecuted the war, in France. At laſt, in October, 1424, he arrived, at Calais, with his ducheſs, and brought with him 5000 men; and he ſtaid there, till about the middle of November.

The duke of Burgundy comes to the duke of Bedford, at Paris.

Tho' the duke of Burgundy was entirely in the duke of Brabant's intereſt, he ſtill continued his good underſtanding with the Engliſh, hoping the duke of Glouceſter would deſiſt from his pretenſions; and the more, as the duke of Bedford, his brother, endeavoured to perſuade him. The arrival of the Engliſh troops, at Calais, did not alarm him, being yet ignorant that they were deſigned againſt the duke of Brabant; nay, very probably, they were ſent from England, to ſtrengthen the regent; and, therefore, whilſt the duke of Glouceſter ſtaid, at Calais, Philip, remained at Paris, partaking of the diverſions and entertainments made by the regent, on account of his glorious campaign. At his return to Dijon, he celebrated his ſecond nuptials with Bona of Artois, widow to Philip, earl of Nevers, his uncle; who was ſiſter to the carl of Eu, a priſoner, in England, and half-ſiſter of the earl of Clermont, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Bourbon. 1424.

The duke of Glouceſter becomes maſter of Hainault. Hall.

Whilſt this marriage was ſolemnizing, at Dijon, the duke of Glouceſter departed from Calais, and, with Jacquelina, his wife, marched towards Hainault; and he paſſed through part of the duke of Burgundy's dominions, but did not ſuffer his troops to commit any diſorder. Bouchain opened her gates to him, and, ſoon after, all the other towns of Hainault, ſubmitting, ſwore fealty to him and the ducheſs; upon which, the duke of Burgundy ordered Ligny and Liſle-Adam, to draw an army together, with all expedition, and join the earl of St. Pol, brother to the duke of Brabant, who was preparing, at Bruſſels, for the aſſiſtance of the duke, his brother; but, before we proceed in this affair, it will be neceſſary to conclude the account of the occurrences of the year 1424, with what paſſed, in England.

Sir John Mortimer, uncle to Edmund, earl of Marche, having been, ſome time, a priſoner in the tower, was accuſed of attempting his eſcape, in order to excite an inſurrection in Wales; for it was pretended, that he deſigned to proclaim the earl of Marche, his nephew, and, upon his refuſal, to proclaim himſelf; but, whether this accuſation was proved, or it was thought proper to diſpatch a perſon, who, if he had eſcaped, might have done miſchief, he was condemned and executed.

The death of the earl of Marche.

The earl of Marche, his nephew, did not long ſurvive him; who died, in Ireland, about the latter end of the year, without iſſue; and, by his death, the title of earl of Marche, and his right to the crown of England, deſcended to Richard, duke of York, his nephew, ſon to Ann, his ſiſter, and the earl of Cambridge, beheaded, at Southampton, in 1415. All the Engliſh hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that this prince, then under age, did not, as yet, bear the title of duke of York, which, they affirm, was not conferred upon him, till the parliament of Leiceſter, in 1426; but it appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he is ſtiled duke of York, in an act dated, February 26, 1425, 13 months before the parliament of Leiceſter, where he was only knighted.

1425. The miſerable ſtate of king Charles's affairs. P. Daniel.

In the beginning of the year 1425, king Charles's affairs were in a deplorable condition; for the battles of Crevant and Verneuil had deprived him of his troops and beſt generals; and, having neither money, nor credit, all his revenues being mortgaged, he was unable to bring any army into the field. The dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, the two moſt potent vaſſals of the crown, were in ſtrict alliance with the Engliſh; the king of Sicily, his 1425. his brother-in-law, who had juſt loſt Maine, could ſcarce preſerve the reſt of his dominions; and the king of Scotland, the ally of France, had made a truce with the Engliſh, which prevented him from ſending any ſuccours. Charles, being reduced to this wretched ſtate, was, as it were, forced, beyond the Loire, without hopes of keeping any longer his towns, about Paris; moreover, he was juſtly apprehenſive, of quickly ſeeing the enemy's armies in Berry, Languedoc, and Dauphine; and the Engliſh called him only the earl of Ponthieu, or in deriſion, the king of Bourges.

Doubtleſs, if the duke of Glouceſter had ſhewn the ſame zeal, for the king his nephew's intereſts, as for his own, and ſent the duke of Bedford the troops and money, he employed againſt the duke of Brabant, it may be reaſonably preſumed, that France would have been utterly ruined; and that Charles would have never been able to wreſt that conqueſt out of the hands of the Engliſh. This was the critical minute, which that nation ſhould have improved; for they were near the end of a war, that had laſted, 10 years, and, probably, was going to end, according to their wiſh, in ſecuring the crown of France to the kings of England. The duke of Bedford evidently perceived it; and he inceſſantly ſollicited his brother to defer the execution of his deſigns, till a more convenient ſeaſon, when he might even employ all the forces of France and England; but his remonſtrances were incapable of diverting the ambitious duke, from an enterprize that promiſed him the poſſeſſion of four of the fineſt provinces of the Low-Countries. He was a younger brother, and, if the king, his nephew, ſhould die, without iſſue, the crown of England would come to the duke of Bedford, before him; wherefore, he reſolved to embrace an opportunity, not likely ever to offer again, that would raiſe him above the rank of a ſubject; tho', at the ſame time, he hindered the duke, his brother, from compleating the conqueſt of France. The great number of garriſons requiſite, in a kingdom, where all the towns and caſtles were fortified, drained the Engliſh army; ſo that the regent, not receiving any ſupplies, by reaſon of the unhappy diverſion of Hainault, as well as Charles, was unable to bring an army into the field; which is the true reaſon, why, during the year 1425, the war was, as it were, diſcontinued, in France, by both the contending parties.

A continuation of the buſineſs of Hainault. Monſtrelet.

I left the duke of Glouceſter maſter of Hainault, and the duke of Burgundy preparing to diſpoſſeſs him; and, in Burgundy's orders to his generals, for levying an army, he repreſented, that, having agreed with the duke of Bedford, upon an expedient to end the quarrel, it was accepted by the duke of Brabant, but rejected by the duke of Glouceſter. The Engliſh prince, hearing of this, ſent the duke of Burgundy a letter, dated from Mons, January the 12th, 1424-5, charging him with ſaying an un-truth; and the duke of Burgundy, returning a very abuſive anſwer, told him he lied, and offered to prove his aſſertion, in ſingle combat, and to take the duke of Bedford for judge. The duke of Glouceſter accepted the challenge, and appointed St. George's day, for the combat; and ſeveral other bitter letters paſſed between them, but of no conſequence to the ſequel. 1425.

Braine is taken by the Brabanders.

Whilſt theſe two princes, thus, reviled each other, the earl of St. Pol, brother to the duke of Brabant, beſieged the ſmall town of Braine, in Hainault, defended by 200 Engliſh; but, after a feint reſiſtance, the garriſon capitulating, the Brabanders violated the articles, put the Engliſh to the ſword, and ſet fire to the town.

A truce between the duke of Glouceſter and Brabant.

In the interim, as the ſingle combat of the dukes of Burgundy and Glouceſter was to decide the principal quarrel, between Glouceſter and Brabant, it was judged proper to make a truce; upon the ſigning of which, the duke of Glouceſter returned into England. He would have taken his ducheſs along with him; but the people of Mons ſo preſs'd him to leave her behind, that he could not deny their requeſt; however, he obliged the magiſtrates to ſolemnly ſwear to defend her, at the peril of their lives, againſt all perſons whatever.

Charles takes advantage of the Hainault diverſion. P. Daniel.

The war of Hainault ſuſpending that of France, Charles endeavoured to improve this happy diverſion; and, in a great council, held to conſider the ſtate of his affairs, it was unanimouſly agreed, that there was only one way, to free him from his preſent circumſtances; namely, to offer the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne a Carte Blanche, in order to gain them from the Engliſh. The firſt had openly broke with the duke Glouceſter; and the other might be prevailed on by the earl of Richemont, who had a great influence over him, and, moreover, was highly incenſed againſt the duke of Bedford. This was a favourable juncture; and, on the other hand, Bona of Artois, lately married to the duke of Burgundy, being French, and half-ſiſter to the earl of Clermont, the king's zealous adherent, it was probable, that ſhe would readily exert herſelf, to gain the duke, her ſpouſe.

Upon the reſolution, then, taken, with reſpect to the two dukes, Charles ſent to the earl of Richemont private emiſſaries, who told him, what a great eſteem the king had for him; intimating, that he had often ſaid, he ſhould account himſelf invincible, if he could have him at the head of his army; which was attacking the prince, in the moſt ſenſible part. As he had a high conceipt of his own merit, it was no ſmall pleaſure to him, that Charles offered him a poſt, ſcornfully refuſed him by the duke of Bedford; yet, perceiving that the perſons that talked to him, thus, were ſent only to ſound him, he contented himſelf with returning a civil anſwer to their compliments, and artfully inſinuating, that he was ſtrongly inclined to ſerve their maſter.

Charles, afterwards, ſent to him the queen dowager of Sicily, his mother-in-law, with 1425. Tannegui du Chatel, and impowered them to offer him the conſtable's ſword; which poſt had been vacant, ever ſince the death of the earl of Buchan, ſlain in the battle of Verneuil. The queen of Sicily and Du Chatel found the earl entirely diſpoſed to the change; for, being exaſperated againſt the duke of Bedford, and extremely proud and vindictive, he was pleaſed with a proſpect of revenging his contempt; ſo that, without much ſollicitation, he accepted the king's offer, with great demonſtrations of gratitude, and promiſed to engage the duke, his brother, in his intereſts. However, he required two conditions, without which, he proteſted, he could not accept this honour, nor promiſe any thing, with regard to the duke, his brother. The firſt was, that Louvet and d' Avaugour, the principal authors of the Pontievrian conſpiracy, ſhould be removed from court; and the ſecond, that the duke of Burgundy ſhould conſent to the propoſed affair, becauſe he had engaged himſelf, by oath, with the duke of Burgundy, in the treaty of Amiens. He was not ſo ſcrupulous, with reſpect to the duke of Bedford, tho' he was no leſs engaged with him, than with the duke of Burgundy; but paſſion frequently cauſes the ſame thing to appear, in different lights, according to the perſons with whom we are concerned. The queen and Du Chatel readily aſſured him, that the king would comply with his demands; upon which, he came to Tours, where Charles took care to flatter his vanity, with all poſſible civilities and careſſes; but the earl plainly told the king, that he could liſt in his ſervice, only upon the two conditions propoſed. The king gave him hopes of the firſt, without fixing the time; and, as to the ſecond, he was pleaſed, that he ſhould talk with the duke of Burgundy, to obtain his conſent; moreover, he ſent to the duke of Burgundy the biſhops of Puy and Chartres, with orders to ſound him, whether it was poſſible to diſengage him from the king of England.

The duke of Burgundy is leſs tractable, with regard to Charles VII.

Tho' the duke of Burgundy was extremely incenſed againſt the duke of Glouceſter, he did not appear ſo inclinable to an agreement, as Charles and his council expected; for, the murder of the duke, his father, being ſtill freſh in his mind, he ſhewed, at firſt, an extreme averſion to a reconciliation. Nevertheleſs, preſſed by the king's envoys, who, to excuſe their maſter, caſt the blame on his evil counſellors, he replied, that the king ſhould diſmiſs thoſe pernicious counſellors, and then it would be time to confer, about an accommodation; which was a ſufficient intimation, that he was not inexorable, eſpecially, as he readily conſented, that the earl of Richemont ſhould accept of the conſtable's ſword.

The king's perplexity about his favourites.

Charles, in all appearance, had reaſon to congratulate himſelf, upon his good fortune; for he might now gain the duke of Bretagne; and, beſides, he had hopes, that the duke of Burgundy would not be proof againſt a reaſonable ſatisfaction. However, the terms impoſed upon him threw him into great perplexity; for, to procure theſe advantages, he muſt part with his two principal miniſters, favourites, and confidents, viz. Tannegui du Chatel, who ſlew the duke of Burgundy, and Louvet, preſident of Provence, whom the duke of Bretagne conſidered, as author of the Pontievrian conſpiracy. Du Chatel ſaved him part of his trouble, who came and fell at his feet, intreating him, in reward of his ſervices, to permit him to retire, ſince his preſence, at court, for the future, muſt, of courſe, be prejudicial to ſo good a maſter; but it was a long time, before the king could reſolve to grant his requeſt; tho', preſſed by the continual inſtances of a faithful ſervant, who deſired his leave, only to give him a freſh proof of his zeal, he ſuffered him, at laſt, to retire. There are few favourites, who, thus, prefer their maſter's good to their own; and Louvet, who was not ſo diſintereſted, would have kept himſelf in his poſt, at the expence of all the advantages the king could expect from an alliance with the duke of Bretagne. 1425.

Charles cannot think of diſcarding Louvet. P. Daniel.

In the mean while, the earl of Richemont, not doubting, in the leaſt, that the king would perform his promiſe, with reſpect to Louvet, came to him, at Tours, where he received the conſtable's ſword, the 7th of March, 1425; and he had promiſed to gain the duke of Bretagne from England; but, Louvet and d'Avaugour continuing ſtill about the king, he did not haſtily make good his engagement. Charles was not unwilling to ſacrifice the laſt; but Louvet had a firmer footing, at court. Beſides his being beloved by the king, one of his daughters, wife to the lord de Joyeuſe, ſhared Charles's heart with Agnes Sorrel, who began to appear, at court, as a favourite; ſo that, to gain the duke of Bretagne, Charles was forced to diſmiſs a beloved miniſter, and diſoblige a miſtreſs. On the other hand, Louvet did all that was poſſible, to ruin the conſtable, in his maſter's favour; repreſenting to him, how haughtily he had impoſed terms on his ſovereign, as if he had been his equal, and cauſed it to be conſidered, as a favour, that he was pleaſed to accept of the conſtable's ſword; and, in a word, he ſo managed the king, that Charles, who was very obſtinate, reſolved, at no rate, to part with his miniſter.

He is forced from court by the conſtable.

The conſtable, being diſappointed, determined to ruin Louvet, even in ſpite of the king; wherefore, knowing that this miniſter was not beloved by the great men at court, he ſo caballed with them, that a plot was formed, to remove him from the king. As ſoon as he was ſecure of the ſucceſs of his project, he withdrew from court, without taking leave, and ſent the king word, that he would never return, whilſt Louvet was there. Charles, regardleſs of his retreat, ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution to keep his miniſter; but, finding that, by degrees, the great men retired to their governments, under various pretences, that they refuſed to receive his orders, and that he had but two or three towns leſt, which he could call his own, he ſaw, that he muſt reſolve to part with Louvet, or his kingdom; and he was then apprehenſive, that the conſtable would 1425. would deliver the duke of Bretagne's places to the Engliſh; ſo that he was conſtrained, tho' with extreme indignation, to diſmiſs his miniſter, who had ſtill ſo much credit as to cauſe his creature, De Giac, to be received, in his room.

The duke of Bretagne does homage to Charles. Du Tillet. P. Daniel.

Upon this removal, the conſtable would have returned to court; but Charles was ſo provoked with him, that he could not bear to ſee him. However, the ſtate of his affairs obliged him, at length, to admit him again; and the conſtable, content with having accompliſhed his deſigns, performed his promiſe, relating to the duke, his brother, and brought him to Saumur, where he did homage to the king.

A quarrel between the duke of Glouceſter and biſhop of Wincheſter. Hall.

Whilſt the earl of Richemont was raiſing diſturbances, in the court of king Charles, Henry did not enjoy greater tranquillity. I have obſerved, that the duke of Glouceſter and the biſhop of Wincheſter, his uncle, were enemies; and, on which ſide ſoever the fault lay, they loſt no opportunity of plaguing one another; and the Hainault expedition furniſhed the biſhop with one, which he knew how to improve. When this undertaking was propoſed, in council, he ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and evidently ſhewed, how prejudicial it might be to the king's affairs; but, tho', on this occaſion, he was in the right, the duke of Glouceſter had intereſt enough to have it approved; and he departed with a mind imbittered againſt his uncle, and with a reſolution to be revenged, the firſt opportunity.

The hiſtorians do not inform us, how the government was ſettled, during the duke of Glouceſter's abſence, which laſted, about a year; tho', very probably, the biſhop of Wincheſter had the greateſt ſhare in it, making uſe of this advantage to create his enemy many vexations; and ſome even ſay, that all his proceedings tended to deprive him of the protectorſhip, in order to obtain it for himſelf.

The duke returning to England, about October, 1425, this quarrel was kindled afreſh, with great animoſity, on both ſides; and, one day, intending to go to the tower, Sir Richard Woodville, the governor, refuſed him admittance, by the advice of the biſhop of Wincheſter. The protector, who was extremely high-ſpirited, flew into a furious paſſion with the biſhop, and proceeded even to threats; and, in a word, the quarrel roſe to ſuch a height, that they both began to arm their friends, either to attack, or defend. The duke of Coimbra, prince of Portugal, then in England, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury attempted to reconcile them, but to no purpoſe; and an hiſtorian affirms, that the biſhop of Wincheſter was forced to fly for refuge to the tower, and that eight or ten of his people were killed by the duke's; but this is improbable; ſince, in their mutual complaints, laid before the enſuing parliament, there is not the leaſt mention of any ſuch thing.

The duke of Bedford comes into England. Hall.

The prelate, having no warriors, on his ſide, did not find his account, in deciding the quarrel, by arms; for the intrigues of the cabinet were more within his province; and, therefore, to prevent the miſchief that might befal him, if things continued in this ſtate, he wrote to the duke of Bedford, deſiring him to come into England, repreſenting, in his letter, that, unleſs he made all poſſible haſte, the kingdom was in danger of being expoſed to fatal commotions, by his brother's impetuous temper; and the duke of Bedford, perceiving the importance of this quarrel, ſet out, immediately, leaving, in France, Richard de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, to command, in his room, and arrived, in England, the 20th of December. 1425.

England proclaims war with Bretagne. Argentre.

A few days after his arrival, the duke of Bedford, taking notice, in council, of the treachery of the duke of Bretagne and the earl of Richemont, repreſented, how prejudicial it was to the king's affairs; upon which, and by his advice, it was unanimouſly reſolved, to declare war againſt the duke of Bretagne; and it was proclaimed, on the 15th of January. Moreover, to find that prince employment, in his own country, and prevent him from aſſiſting king Charles, a reſolution was taken to ſupport the Pontievrians, his enemies, in order, by their means, to raiſe a civil war, in Bretagne; and, with this view, ſafe-conducts were diſpatched to the two brothers of Pontievre, tho' it came to nothing; probably, becauſe their intereſt was not great, in that country.

A continuation of the quarrel of the duke of Glouceſter and biſhop of Wincheſter. Hall.

This affair being over, the duke of Bedford wholly applied himſelf, to procure a ſincere reconciliation between the duke, his brother, and the biſhop of Wincheſter; and the way was to favour neither. Had he eſpouſed his brother's cauſe, as the ties of blood ſeemed to require, he would not have been qualified for the office of a mediator; but, beſides the character of brother and nephew, he had another to maintain, viz. that of protector, principally concerned in the good of the ſtate, independently of the duties of nature. To determine, therefore, ſo nice an affair, he aſſembled ſome of the prime nobility, at St. Albans, in hopes of finding, with their aſſiſtance, ſome expedient, to content theſe two princes; but their animoſity was ſo great, that it was impoſſible to ſucceed, by this means. After many fruitleſs endeavours, the deciſion of the affair was referred to a parliament ſummoned, at Leiceſter, for March; and, when the parliament met, the duke of Glouceſter exhibited, againſt the biſhop, the ſix following articles.

Articles of accuſation againſt the biſhop. Hall.

I. He accuſed him of cauſing him to be denied entrance into the tower, and ſo rendering the dignity of protector contemptible.

II. That he would have removed the king from his palace, at Eltham, to Windſor, with an intent to become maſter of his perſon.

III. That,

1426. III. That, not being ſatisfied, with cauſing him to be denied admittance into the tower, he had placed armed men, on London-bridge, and in Southwark, on purpoſe to murder him.

IV. That he had concealed a villain, in the late king's room, when prince of Wales, in order to murder him.

V. That he had adviſed the ſame prince, to ſeize the crown, before the king his father's death.

VI. That his letter to the duke of Bedford evidently ſhewed, that he deſigned to raiſe a civil war in the kingdom.

The biſhop's reply.

The biſhop gave a particular anſwer to theſe accuſations, by explaining ſuch of his actions as might have been miſinterpreted or by denying the facts laid to his charge.

He is declared innocent.

The parliament, appointing commiſſioners to examine into this affair, declared, upon their report, that the charge was groundleſs, and acquitted the biſhop; and they obliged the two princes to be reconciled; upon which, they ſhook hands, and, in appearance, parted good friends, tho' they were, as much as ever, enemies to each other.

Expedients, to ſatisfy both parties. Act. Pub.

In the interim, as the times and circumſtances of affairs would not allow the duke of Glouceſter to be entirely ſacrificed to his enemy, the protector took care to procure him alſo ſome ſatisfaction; for, taking the great ſeal from the biſhop of Wincheſter, he gave it to the biſhop of London; and, beſides, as it was impoſſible for the two adverſaries to be together in the council, without great prejudice to the king's affairs, he perſuaded the biſhop to accompany him into France, under the pretence of performing a vow; but, to repair the injury his abſence might do him, he permitted him to ſollicit a cardinal's cap, which he received, ſhortly after.

Mowbray is reſtored, and the duke of York, with 40 others, is knighted.

This affair being, thus, happily over, the protector reſtored John Mowbray, earl marſhal, to the title of duke of Norfolk, which his father, Thomas, was deprived of by Richard II. and he made 40 knights, among whom was the young duke of York; which, doubtleſs, is the reaſon, that he is ſaid to receive, in this parliament, the title of duke of York; tho' it is certain he bore it, before, as has been obſerved.

The conſtable Richemont takes Pontorſon, and beſieges Beauvron. Argentre.

Whilſt the duke of Bedford was, thus, employed, in England, the conſtable Richemont levied an army, in Bretagne; being extremely impatient to ſhew, that he was not unworthy of his poſt; and, by his care and credit, this army amounted to 20,000 men. With theſe numerous forces, which the earl of Warwick was unable to withſtand, he entered Normandy, and took Pontorſon, about the end of February; and then he beſieged St. James de Beuvron, where the Engliſh had a ſtrong garriſon; but this ſiege proved more tedious and difficult than he expected. He had been promiſed a convoy of money; but De Giac, who had the management of the treaſury, was in no haſte to ſend it, being glad to have ſuch an opportunity of mortifying the conſtable; for he was apprehenſive, that, if he gained reputation, at this ſiege, he would grow more haughty and imperious, and pretend to rule the court, at his pleaſure; and, in the mean while, the army daily diminiſhed, by deſertions; which diſappointments exceedingly troubled the conſtable, who dreaded, that his reputation would be blaſted, in his firſt notable action. In a word, he had falſe intelligence, that the Engliſh were aſſembling all their forces, to raiſe the ſiege; and his fear of a diſgrace led him to reſolve to ſtorm the town, tho' the breach was not, as yet, ſufficiently wide or prepared. To ſecure himſelf againſt the dreaded relief, he detached 2000 men, with orders to poſt themſelves, on the road to Avranche, and oppoſe the firſt efforts of the enemy, if they came, during the aſſault; and then he cauſed the breach to be vigorouſly attacked; but the garriſon, which was very numerous, made ſuch a brave defence, as gave the beſiegers very little hopes of being maſters of it. Whilſt both ſides fought, with equal ardor, the detachment, hearing no news of the enemies, and imagining it diſhonourable to expect them, in vain, whilſt the reſt were engaged, haſtily returned to aſſiſt, at the aſſault; but their coming threw the beſiegers into a panic; who fancied, that the detachment, being repulſed by the enemies, were flying for refuge to the camp, and, in this belief, relinquiſhed the aſſault. The conſtable did all that was poſſible, to undeceive them; but the diſorder was already ſo great, that it was to no purpoſe. In the mean time, the beſieged, ſeeing the confuſion that prevailed in the camp, ſallied out; and, ſuddenly attacking the troops already terrified, they eaſily put them to flight. The conſtable himſelf was forced to follow them, and leave his baggage and artillery in the power of his enemies, extremely concerned to find all his projects confounded, by this unfortunate accident; yet, as he had not loſt many men, he was ſtill able, after drawing his army together, to march into Anjou, and take la Fleche and Galerand, belonging to the Engliſh. 1426.

He cauſes De Giac to be ſtrangled. P. Daniel.

However, the taking of theſe two places was incapable of comforting him, for his misfortune before St. James's; he openly accuſed De Giac of being the cauſe; and, regardleſs of the king's reſentment, he reſolved to be revenged. The moment he returned to court, after the campaign, which the deſertion of his troops forced him to end, ſooner than he intended, he cauſed De Giac to be ſeized, in his bed, and, by a ſentence, as violent as it was raſh and irregular, ordered him to be ſtrangled, and then thrown into the Loire. After this, he boldly declared, that he would treat, in the ſame manner, any perſon whatever, that ſhould endeavour to engroſs the king's favour; and the Camus of Beaulieu, notwithſtanding theſe menaces, accepting De Giac's place, was, by the conſtable's means, aſſaſſinated, in the king's own palace, and even before his eyes. Such was the haughtineſs of this prince, that he could not bear any perſon, at court, that was not his creature; but, by the way, this monſtrous arrogance is far from agreeing with the exceſſive encomiums beſtowed upon him.

Charles

1426. Charles, on account of theſe haughty proceedings, would not ſee the conſtable; nay, he could not hear him mentioned, without horror; but his diſpleaſure was diſregarded by a man, who had both the nobles and people, on his ſide. It was univerſally thought, that he did the king a favour, to ſerve him, in his extremity; and, upon the leaſt diſcontent, they threatened to abandon him, for the Engliſh, who received, with open arms, thoſe that ſubmitted to their ſovereign. Moreover, the earl of Warwick had now inveſted Montargis, about a month; and it was not poſſible for Charles to relieve that place, without the help of the Bretons; ſo that, at the inſtance of La Trimouille, he permitted this proud prince, to pay his reſpects to him; but his affairs were not, the more, advanced by it.

The king refuſes to ſee him.

Whilſt the duke of Bedford was, in England, the earl of Warwick, who commanded, in France, did all that lay in his power, to maintain the affairs of the Engliſh in a good ſituation; tho', at firſt, he was too weak, to oppoſe the conſtable's entrance into Normandy; but, hearing that the Bretons had diſbanded themſelves, becauſe there was no money to pay them, he believed himſelf in a condition to make ſome attempt. He entered Maine, with 5000 men, and retook ſeveral caſtles, which the Bretons had ſeized; for the ſurpriſing of places was, then, ſo frequent, that ſometimes the ſame town changed its maſter, twice or thrice, in a year; but it would be endleſs to relate the circumſtances of every particular. The earl of Warwick, finding that the conſtable's defeat, before St. James's, the deſertion of his troops, and the broils, in Charles's court, had long diſabled the French from having an army in the field, formed a deſign, to become maſter of Montargis; a place neceſſary for the execution of the regent's project, to carry the war, beyond the Loire. Indeed, he could not expect, with his few troops, to take Montargis, by a ſiege, in form; but yet he entertained hopes, that the place, being cloſely blocked up, would be obliged to ſurrender, before it could be relieved. The river Loin parting into three branches, near this town, there was a neceſſity for ſeparating the troops into three different quarters, the principal of which the earl of Warwick commanded; the command of the ſecond was given to the earl of Suffolk; and that of the third to John de la Pole, his brother. Theſe quarters were joined, by bridges of communication; and, in this poſture, the Engliſh patiently waited, till hunger ſhould compel the beſieged to come to a capitulation.

The defeat of the Engliſh, at the blockade of Montargis. Monſtrelet.

The blockade had now continued, three months; and Charles had taken no care, about relieving the place. At length, the beſieged acquainting him, that they could no longer reſiſt, without relief, he caſt his eyes on the conſtable for that undertaking. Richemont, who had now no army, refuſed the commiſſion; being unwilling, with new-levied troops, to expoſe himſelf to a diſgrace, like that of St. James; but, upon his refuſal, it was given to the baſtard of Orleans, who was returned from Avignon, where he had retired with Louvet, his father-in-law. This young lord, then only 22 years old, had already made eight campaigns; and, on ſeveral occaſions, he gave ſignal proofs of his conduct and valour; and he muſt needs have been young, to undertake ſuch an enterprize, with no more than 1600 men, againſt the earl of Warwick, whoſe reputation was equal to that of the moſt renowned generals. 1426.

The beſieged having intelligence, that ſuccours were preparing, let go their ſluices, to favour them; but the Loin was ſo ſwoln thereby, that the bridges of communication, between the Engliſh quarters, were overflown. The baſtard of Orleans arriving, in the interim, judged, that he ought, immediately, to attack the enemy, before the waters were fallen; and he gave half his troops to La Hire, to attack Pole's quarter, whilſt, with the other half, he fell upon the earl of Suffolk. It was a ſtrange ſort of battle, the ſoldiers, on both ſides, ſtanding up to their middle, in water; but, at laſt, after a long reſiſtance, the two quarters were forced, with the loſs of 1500 of the Engliſh; many of whom were drowned, in attempting to paſs into the other quarter, becauſe the bridges were under water. Warwick, perceiving it impoſſible to aſſiſt his men, choſe to retreat, in good order; and this action acquired the baſtard of Orleans a great reputation, being, thenceforward, conſidered, as a perſon, that would, one day, become a famous general.

Since the end of the preceding year, the dukes of Burgundy and Glouceſter had been preparing for their ſingle combat, which, probably, as it was not fought, at the time appointed, viz. St. George's day, was deferred, by conſent; but, tho' theſe two princes ſeemed to have nothing more to manage, and the deciſion of the affair of Hainault was likely to depend on the ſucceſs of their combat, the duke of Burgundy did not believe himſelf obliged to confound his perſonal quarrel with the duke of Brabant's affairs, or to overlook the advantages procured him by the truce, to put that prince in poſſeſſion of his wife's dominions. The duke of Glouceſter was no ſooner out of Hainault, than he began, by private emiſſaries, to cabal among the chief men of the country, for the delivery of Jacquelina, who continued, at Mons; and the counteſs, her mother, ever a friend to the houſe of Burgundy, came into the plot, tho' ſhe induſtriouſly concealed it from her daughter. When matters were brought to maturity, the towns of Hainault, ſuddenly, declared for the duke of Brabant; and the earl of St. Pol, his brother, appeared, before Mons, with an army. Then the magiſtrates of the city, pretending a fright, and intimating, that they could not alone bear the brunt of the war, entered into a treaty with him; and, as every thing had been ſecretly ſettled, they promiſed to deliver Jacquelina to the duke of Burgundy, till the pope ſhould decide the point in diſpute; and Jacquelina heard nothing of the matter, till it 1426. was too late to prevent it. She wrote to the duke of Glouceſter, complaining of being baſely betrayed; but her complaints were ineffectual. On the 13th of June, 1426, ſhe was compelled to leave Mons, under the conduct of the prince of Orange, who guarded her, as far as Gaunt, the place appointed for her reſidence; and, after this, all Hainault unanimouſly received the duke of Brabant, for ſovereign.

The continuation of the affair of Hainault. Monſtrelet.

Jacquelina was inraged to find herſelf a priſoner; but, as reſiſtance would only render her condition more inſupportable, ſhe feigned to be pleaſed, that her affair was referred to the pope's deciſion; and this diſſimulation procured her a gentle and honourable treatment, which ſhe knew how to improve. In September, ſhe found means to eſcape, in man's cloaths, and retire into Holland; where ſhe was well received by ſome of her ſubjects; whilſt others choſe rather to adhere to the duke of Burgundy, perceiving how difficult it would be to ſupport her againſt ſuch a powerful enemy. The duke, being vexed, at her eſcape, carried the war into Holland, to hinder her from fortifying herſelf, in that country; and this war, foreign to our hiſtory, laſted the year 1427, and part of 1428. I ſhall, hereafter, relate the ſucceſs; but, in the mean time, I muſt return to what paſſed, in France.

1427. The weakneſs of both parties, in France.

The earl of Warwick's loſs, before Montargis, and the neceſſity of garriſoning ſo many towns, prevented his keeping the field; moreover, the duke of Bedford had ordered him, to ſpare his troops for an important expedition, which it was not yet proper to diſcover; and Charles, all the while, was in no better condition; for the advantage, lately gained by his troops, had not augmented his forces. Thus, both ſides were forced to remain inactive; or, at leaſt, to content themſelves, with attempts to ſurpriſe ſome places.

The duke of Suffolk is ſurpriſed, in Mans, and relieved by Talbot. P. Daniel.

In the beginning of this year, the earl of Foix, who went over, at length, to king Charles, ſent him ſome troops, under the command of count d' Orval, of the houſe of Albret; and this general, approaching Mans, where the earl of Suffolk was, with a few ſoldiers, held intelligence with ſome of the burghers, who promiſed to ſurrender the city. Accordingly, he was admitted, and the earl of Suffolk forced to retire into the caſtle, where he had only three days proviſions; and, in this extremity, he ſent to Talbot, then at Alenſon, deſiring him to endeavour to relieve him. Talbot did not loſe a moment; for, by the next night, he was with ſome troops, at the foot of the caſtle, towards the country, and entered, at a poſtern-gate, whilſt d'Orval thought himſelf ſafe in the city, not imagining that the beſieged could be ſo ſoon relieved. At break of day, Suffolk and Talbot ſallied out of the caſtle, and, taking the French unprepared, expelled them out of the city; ſo that the place was, almoſt as ſoon, recovered, as loſt, by the extraordinary diligence of Talbot, one of the braveſt and moſt experienced commanders of the age.

After this expedition, the two generals marched to Laval, a ſmall town, in Maine, and took it, with eaſe; and then, joining the earl of Warwick, who was marching to thoſe parts, they beſieged Pontorſon, taken by the conſtable Richemont, the preceeding year; but, as this ſiege was very long, I ſhall leave the generals there, in order to relate what paſſed in other places. 1427. Suffolk and Talbot take Laval.

The duke of Bedford arrived from England, the beginning of this year, according to the Engliſh hiſtorians, or ſome months ſooner, if we believe the French, with a formidable reinforcement; being accompanied by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who had received, at Calais, a cardinal's cap, given with great ceremony. We find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was generally ſtiled the cardinal of England, doubtleſs, becauſe he was of the royal family; and yet the Engliſh authors ſeem to have been ignorant of this circumſtance, becauſe they always call him only the cardinal of Wincheſter; and I ſhall give him the ſame title, for the future. Shortly after, the biſhop was made the pope's legate, in England; by which means, he had an opportunity of increaſing his riches and credit, to the great prejudice of the duke of Glouceſter, his enemy. The duke of Bedford returns to France.

Richemont withdraws from court. P. Daniel. Hall.

The ſiege of Pontorſon ſtill continued, tho' king Charles was unable to relieve that town; for he was then employed, about much more important affairs, that more nearly concerned him. The conſtable Richemont was retired to Vannes, in Bretagne, extremely diſpleaſed at the king's coldneſs; for, ſince his receiving the conſtable's ſword, he had done nothing, to anſwer the expectations he had raiſed of his valour and abilities On the contrary, inſtead of advancing the king's affairs, he had rendered the royal authority ſo contemptible, that, by his pride and oppreſſions, and violent proceedings, it may be ſaid, that, now, Charles was leſs a king, than before; for the princes and great men, at court, after his example, preſumed to give law to their ſovereign. Since the death of Beaulieu, La Trimouille was the ſole favourite, and had ſuch an aſcendant over the king, that nothing was done, without his direction; and the conſtable expected, at firſt, to have been a great gainer, by this change, becauſe the new favourite had always profeſſed a friendſhip for him; but he was ſoon convinced of the contrary. His behaviour to the former miniſters making La Trimouille apprehenſive of the ſame treatment, he exerted himſelf, to inflame the king's averſion to him; and the whole court quickly perceived it, with extreme concern; for the great men could have no proſpect of preferments, unleſs the king's affairs were in a good ſituation, and were perſuaded, that the conſtable alone was capable of reſtoring them. For this, and ſeveral other reaſons, the new favourite became exceeding odious; inſomuch that, at laſt, a confederacy was formed againſt him, of which the earls of Clermont and De la Marche, his couſin, were the heads; who began with an attempt upon 1427. upon his life, after Richemont's example. Being informed, that the king was gone to Loches, and had left La Trimouille, at Bourges, they aſſembled ſome troops, and marched thither, to ſeize him; but they found, that he had already followed the king; however, not to loſe their labour entirely, they reſolved to carry away La Borde and De Prie, two of his creatures, who were retired into the great tower. De Prie was killed in his own defence; but La Borde held out, till the king himſelf came, to reſcue him. This affair turned to a civil war, which, having continued ſome months, was, at length, ended, by the duke of Alenſon's mediation. This young prince, who was taken priſoner, at the battle of Verneuil, was lately releaſed, by the duke of Burgundy's interceſſion, who, tho' an enemy to king Charles, ſought all occaſions, to gain the friendſhip of the French princes; but it coſt the duke of Alenſon 200,000 crowns, a very conſiderable ſum, at all times, but eſpecially at the preſent juncture; for, to procure this money, he was obliged to part with his jewels, and ſell the duke of Bretagne the town of Fougeres, at a very low rate. King Charles, in return for his late ſervice, made him a preſent of 80,000 crowns, tho' himſelf was in great want; and, in the interim, La Trimouille ſtill kept his poſt, at court.

Whilſt Charles was employed, in quelling his domeſtick enemies, the duke of Bedford was intent upon executing a deſign, formed, before he left England; namely, to reduce the duke of Bretagne to the obedience of king Henry. Ever ſince June, he had cauſed Pontorſon to be beſieged, a ſtrong town on the borders of Bretagne, which might have greatly obſtructed his entrance into that dukedom, had it continued in the hands of the French; and, this ſiege, which had been very long, being over, the duke of Bedford repaired to the army, with a reinforcement that increaſed it to 20,000 men. With this powerful body, to which he knew his enemies had nothing like it to oppoſe, he prepared to enter Bretagne, threatening the country with utter deſtruction; but, whether the duke of Bretagne was ſurpriſed, or was glad to have an excuſe, to abandon king Charles, whom he had joined, only out of condeſcenſion to the conſtable, his brother, he wiſely prevented the impending danger. He evidently perceived, that Charles was unable to protect him; and, beſides, he was diſpleaſed with him, on the account of the conſtable; wherefore, he ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Bedford, to ſue for peace, upon what terms he pleaſed.

Tho' it was in the regent's power to be revenged on the duke of Bretagne, he judged it his duty, to prefer the intereſts of the king, his nephew, to his own ſatisfaction; and, indeed, it was much more beneficial for the king, to make, of the duke of Bretagne, a willing friend, by civil treatment, than a private enemy, by rigorous uſage; ſo that he required nothing more of him, than to ſwear to the peace of Troye, and cauſe all his ſtates to do the ſame, purſuant to his engagements with Henry V; and to promiſe, with an oath, to do homage to young Henry, when required. This moderation made great impreſſion on the duke of Bretagne, who, ever after, was a faithful friend to the Engliſh, even in the decline of their affairs. On the contrary, tho' the regent found, that he could expect no great aſſiſtance from the duke of Bretagne, becauſe of the influence the conſtable, his brother, had over him; yet he believed that the gaining that prince, from Charles's party, was no ſmall advantage to the Engliſh. 1427.

The continuation and end of the affair of Hainault. Monſtrelet.

I left the duke of Burgundy at war with Jacquelina, in Holland, under the plauſible pretence of ſupporting the honour and intereſt of the duke of Brabant, his couſin; tho', as the ſequel will ſhew, in reality, it was only for his own private views. This war, as may be preſumed, did not turn much to Jacquelina's advantage; for there was too great a diſproportion between the two parties. The duke of Glouceſter could not, of himſelf, give his ducheſs the aſſiſtance ſhe wanted; for, in order to this, he muſt have employed the publick revenues of England, or procured an extraordinary ſubſidy of the parliament; but that was not eaſily to be obtained, at a time when the war, in France, was expenſive to the nation. However, in the parliament held, this year, the duke had ſufficient intereſt to procure a ſmall aid; and we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the parliament petitioned the king, to aſſign the duke of Glouceſter 5000 marks, out of the ſubſidy granted him, to enable him to aſſiſt his ducheſs. To this ſum, the king advanced 5000 marks, upon the ſalary annexed to the protectorſhip; and, with this aid, the duke ſent a reinforcement of ſome Engliſh troops, under the command of Silvatier; but, theſe troops being defeated by the duke of Burgundy, preſently after their landing, Jacquelina was reduced to a very deplorable condition. In a word, by the duke of Bedford's interceſſion, ſhe obtained a truce, during which, the duke of Glouceſter was brought to conſent, that his affair with the duke of Brabant ſhould be decided by the pope; for the duke of Bedford had now annulled the ſingle combat, between the dukes of Burgundy and Glouceſter. Some time after, the pope publiſhed his ſentence, annulling Jacquelina's marriage with the duke of Glouceſter, and confirming her firſt marriage with the duke of Brabant, who ſurvived this determination, only a few months, and was ſucceeded by the earl of St. Pol, his brother. Upon the death of the duke, her husband, Jacquelina ought to have had peaceable poſſeſſion of her dominions; but the duke of Burgundy diſcovered, on this occaſion, that the duke of Brabant's intereſt was not the motive of his proceedings. He ſo managed, that Jacquelina's ſubjects refuſed to receive her, and made himſelf mediator between them; but the lion, in the fable, was literally practiſed, in this agreement; for the duke obliged Jacquelina to reſign to him the government of her dominions, appoint him her heir, and promiſe never to marry again.

The duke of Brabant dies.

The

1427. The hiſtorians generally place theſe occurrences, in 1427; and yet we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this affair was not over, May the 18th, 1428. At leaſt, the duke of Glouceſter and Jacquelina had not yet ſubmitted to the pope's ſentence; for Henry VI, ſpeaking there of this princeſs, calls her Jacquette, ducheſs of Glouceſter and Holland, his well-beloved aunt. Probably, the duke of Brabant's death had inſpired them with hopes, that their marriage might be confirmed, or a diſpenſation obtained to marry again; and, accordingly, it was, doubtleſs on this account, that the duke of Burgundy exacted from Jacquelina the foreſaid conditions, in order to lead the duke of Glouceſter to deſpair of ever returning into the Low-Countries. However that be, the duke of Glouceſter, preſſed by his brother and the council, who ſaw, how prejudicial, to the king's affairs, his obſtinacy was, relinquiſhed Jacquelina, and, ſoon after, eſpouſed Eleanor Cobham, whom he had long kept, as his miſtreſs. Thus, ended the quarrel, which had proved ſo fatal to England.

The duke of Glouceſter quits Jacquelina, and marries Eleanor Cobham. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Tho' the Engliſh were no longer concerned in Jacquelina's affairs, it will not be improper briefly to relate the ſucceſs; and likewiſe to ſhew the growth of the houſe of Burgundy's greatneſs. This princeſs, in ſpite of her involuntary engagement, married afterwards Borſel, a Zealander; upon which, the duke of Burgundy made war upon them. Borſel being made priſoner, Jacquelina was conſtrained, in order to free him, to conſent, that her children, by her late marriage, ſhould be incapable of inheriting her dominions, and to ſurrender all her towns to the duke of Burgundy. She lived 10 years, after this; and, upon her deceaſe, the duke of Burgundy was owned, for earl of Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and lord of Friſeland. Before Jacquelina's death, he had taken poſſeſſion of the earldoms of Zutphen and Namure, of which he had purchaſed the reverſion, after the deceaſe of the earl of Namure, which, fell out, in 1428; and, in 1430, he inherited the duchies of Brabant, Lothier, Limbourg, and the marquiſate of Anvers, by the death of Philip, duke of Brabant, his couſin, without iſſue; all which dominions, joined to Flanders, Artois, the two Burgundies, and the towns on the Somme held of the king of England, put him upon a level with the crown'd heads. Let us, now, return to the war in France.

The continuation of Jacquelina's affairs. Monſtrelet.

1428. The Engliſh had ſtill a great ſuperiority over king Charles; for, tho' the buſineſs of Hainault had ſomewhat diſordered their affairs, they were, notwithſtanding that diverſion, in ſuch a flouriſhing condition, as ſeemed to promiſe certain ſucceſs. The duke of Bretagne no longer gave them any uneaſineſs; the earl of Richemont was at variance with king Charles, without the leaſt probability of a reconciliation; and the duke of Burgundy, having finiſhed the Holland-war, could, for the future, powerfully aſſiſt his allies. In fine, beſides their numberleſs garriſons in France, the regent had on foot a body of 20,000 men, and alſo expected a ſtrong reinforcement with the earl of Salisbury from England.

1428. The ſuperiority of the Engliſh, in France.

On the contrary, Charles was without allies, or refuge. Indeed, to obtain ſuccours from Scotland, he was negotiating a marriage, between the dauphin, his ſon, and Margaret, daughter to king James, tho' they were yet both in their infancy; but this was a diſtant proſpect. Moreover, the king of Scotland had not diſcovered the leaſt inclination to break the truce with the Engliſh; ſo that Charles, having no view of ſupporting himſelf, appeared to have entirely given over all care of preventing the deſigns of his enemies; and he lived in a ſurpriſing indolence, without loſing any of his uſual diverſions.

The poſture of the affairs of the two nations made the duke of Bedford conclude, that two or three campaigns would infallibly expel Charles out of the kingdom; wherefore, he reſolved to exert himſelf, during ſuch a favourable opportunity; but, as he had many troops, it was neceſſary, firſt, to provide for their ſubſiſtence. With this view, he held an aſſembly of the chief men, at Paris, to whom he propoſed revoking all the grants made to the church, for 40 years paſt; but he was ſo ſtrongly oppoſed by the clergy, that he was obliged to deſiſt, and to make uſe of other means, for the ſupport of his army.

The ill ſtate of king Charles. Buchanan.

An aſſembly of the chief men, at Paris. Monſtrelet.

Before he entered upon the execution of his projects, he loſt the aſſiſtance of the valiant earl of Warwick, who returned into England, being appointed governor to the king; who was deſigned for this place, immediately after the deceaſe of the duke of Exeter, in 1426; but, as he was neceſſary, in France, his patent was not drawn up, till the 1ſt of June, this year; for it was, probably, judged expedient to ſtay, till the earl of Salisbury, who was to lead a powerful reinforcement to the duke of Bedford, was ready for his departure.

The earl of Warwick is made governor to the king. Act. Pub.

The earl of Salisbury arrives, in France, in July, with 5000 men, raiſed, at his own charge, purſuant to an agreement with the council; and, upon his arrival, at Paris, the regent gave him the command of an army of 16000 men; which was more than ſufficient to be maſter of the field. The regent's intent was, to drive Charles, beyond the Loire, knowing that, when that prince was at a diſtance, all his towns, on this ſide of the river, would ſurrender, of courſe, for want of ſuccours; wherefore, there was a neceſſity of taking from him the places, which preſerved the communication with the northern provinces, in order to deprive him of all hopes of returning.

The earl of Salisbury arrives with 5000 men. Act. Pub.

It was with the ſame view, that the earl of Salisbury, aſſiſted by the earls of Suffolk, Talbot, Faſtolff, and ſeveral other famous generals, marched towards the Loire, the beginning of Auguſt. Orleans was the moſt important place, in thoſe parts; which belonged to the duke of Orleans, who was a priſoner, in England. The pretended treaty, as I obſerved, between Henry V. and the duke of Orleans, about the neutrality of this city, is a mere chimera; for it was invented

to

1428. to render the ſiege of Orleans odious, and make it believed, that Heaven interpoſed, in behalf of France, to puniſh the pretended perfidiouſneſs of the Engliſh. However that be, the earl of Salisbury holding a great council of war, it was reſolved to beſiege Orleans; and the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that this reſolution was taken, without the duke of Bedford's privity, and contrary to his opinion. To ſucceed in this undertaking, the neighbouring places were, firſt, to be ſecured; and, accordingly, the months of Auguſt and September were ſpent, in that work; during which ſpace, the Engliſh took Jenville, Mehun, Baugenci, Gergeau, Clery, Sully, and ſome other ſmall towns, and, at laſt, appeared before Orleans, the 12th of October.

The ſiege of Orleans is reſolved. Act. Pub.

The French lay in ſtores. Act. Pub.

The French evidently perceived, from all the Engliſh general's proceedings, that he intended to beſiege Orleans; and, therefore, whilſt he was elſewhere employed, they had ſent thither both men and ammunition. Gaucour, a creature of the duke of Orleans, commanded there, tho' he was ſtill a priſoner of the Engliſh, and releaſed, upon his parole, only to provide his ranſom; who had even been recalled, ever ſince June; and the baſtard of Orleans, d'Orval, La Hire, Xaintrailles, Thouars, Bouſſac, Chabannes, La Fayette, Graville, and ſeveral other noted officers had thrown themſelves into the city, to acquire reputation, in the ſervice of their ſovereign.

The beſiegers raiſe forts, about the city, to prevent ſuccours. Hall.

The Engliſh army not being ſufficiently numerous to inveſt the city, on all ſides, the beſiegers received ſuccours, in the very beginning of the ſiege; but the earl of Salisbury, who apprehended this enterprize to be a deciſive action for the king, his maſter, and his own reputation, did all that was poſſible, to deprive the beſieged of that advantage. He run up round the city 60 forts or redoubts, then called Baſtilles; and, how great ſoever this work might be, nothing could divert him from it, ſince the ſucceſs of the ſiege entirely depended upon it; for it would be to no purpoſe for him to puſh his attacks, if the enemies could continually introduce freſh ſupplies; moreover, the ſeaſon, now far advanced, ſuggeſted to him, that he would be forced to paſs the winter in the camp, and, during that time, be expoſed to many inſults.

Among the 60 forts, ſix were much ſtronger than the reſt, upon the ſix principal avenues of the city; for the French could, before, eaſily introduce convoys into the place, and had frequently made uſe of that advantage; but, theſe forts being built, it was extremely difficult for them, even now and then, to give ſome aſſiſtance to the beſieged. Upon theſe ſix great redoubts, the general erected batteries, that thundered againſt the walls; but, as the artillery was not, then, arrived to its preſent perfection, it is not to be imagined, that the canons did the ſame execution.

It would be tedious to relate all the attacks, ſallies, and daily skirmiſhes of this ſiege, either to introduce or repulſe convoys; but it is natural to conclude, that one of the ſtrongeſt places of France, defended by a numerous garriſon, under the conduct of the moſt valiant and experienced general officers, then, in France, and aſſaulted by Engliſhmen, eſteemed the moſt undaunted warriors in the world, furniſhed the beſiegers and beſieged with many occaſions to diſcover their valour. 1428.

Charles comes to Chinon. Monſtrelet.

Charles plainly ſaw, that the taking of Orleans would deprive him of the advantage, of continuing the war in the northern provinces of France; but, having neither men, nor money, he could not raiſe the ſiege. However, he approached it, and came to Chinon, where he aſſembled the principal men, and obtained an aid of money; but whilſt he continued there, the conſtable Richemont ſent him an offer of his ſervice; but whatever his diſtreſs was, and however preſſing his want might be of a ſpeedy aſſiſtance, he could not reſolve to forgive him.

In the interim, the ſiege was vigorouſly proſecuted; and, the bulwark of the Tournelles being much ſhaken by the beſiegers canon, and the beſieged ſetting it on fire, the Engliſh extinguiſhed the flames, and lodged in that poſt. At the ſame time, they became maſters of the tower, on the bridge, from whence the whole city could be viewed; but the taking it proved fatal to the earl of Saliſbury, for, one day, as he was looking out of a window, a cannon-ſhot from the city hit him, as it paſſed, on the right ſide of his head, carried away his cheek, and ſtruck out one of his eyes; and he died, a few days after, at Mehun, whither he had been removed. Tho' this loſs was exceeding great to the Engliſh, it did not interrupt the ſiege; for the earl of Suffolk, taking the command of the army, carried it on, as vigorouſly, as before, being aſſiſted by Talbot, one of the braveſt and moſt experienced captains of his age.

The earl of Saliſbury is ſlain. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The garriſon and army both are increaſed, during the ſiege.

Nothing fell out daily, except continual aſſaults, ſallies, and skirmiſhes, in which the beſieged behaved, with equal valour and conduct; yet, in ſpite of the precautions of the Engliſh, to prevent ſuccours from being thrown into the city, troops and convoys were, from time to time, introduced, tho' always by dint of ſword. Thus, the garriſon, that, at firſt, conſiſted only of 1200 men, became 3000 ſtrong, by the end of December; and, on the contrary, the army of the beſiegers was augmented to 23000, by the ſupplies ſent by the regent.

1429. The battle of Herrings. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The Engliſh had now been, four months, before Orleans; and the ſucceſs of their enterprize was ſtill uncertain. The regent, who began to be uneaſy, at the length of the ſiege, was confirmed more and more in his opinion, that it was a raſh undertaking; yet, willing to do all that was in his power, he ſent from Paris a convoy of ſalt-fiſh, it being the lent-ſeaſon; and he committed the conduct of it to Faſtolff, one of the braveſt and moſt able generals, the Engliſh then had, and gave him a guard of 1700 men. Charles, having intelligence of the day the convoy was to ſet out from Paris, commiſſioned the earl of Clermont to way-lay it; who, at the head 1429. of 3000 men, attacked the convoy, on the road to Orleans, February the 12th, at ſeven in the morning. Faſtolff, hearing of the approach of the French, had made an intrenchment with his carriages, behind which he had ſecured himſelf againſt their firſt charge; and it was, indeed, very vigorous; but the Engliſh ſo reſolutely ſuſtained it, that, inſtead of being routed, by the firſt ſhock, they put their enemies into extreme diſorder, by the great ſlaughter of their men. Faſtolff, perceiving their confuſion, ordered the carriages to be removed; and, falling upon the French troops, already diſpirited, he entirely defeated them, with a great ſlaughter. Sixſcore lords, or officers of diſtinction, fell, that day, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers; but, the baſtard of Orleans, who had ſallied out, to aſſiſt the earl of Clermont in defeating the convoy, preſerving a preſence of mind, in this rout, found means to re-enter the city with 400 men. This action was called the battle of Herrings.

King Charles, upon this defeat, found himſelf upon the point of loſing Orleans; and the thoughts of ſeeing the Engliſh ravage the province, beyond the Loire, and ſo diſable him from continuing the war, could not but trouble him exceedingly; which misfortune would infallibly follow, upon their being maſters of Orleans. In this extremity, he deviſed an expedient, proper, in his opinion, to rob them of this advantage; imagining that they would be ſo blind, as not to ſee thro' his artifice; and this was, to impower the commanding officers to deliver the place to the duke of Burgundy, to be kept in truſt, till the end of the war. Xaintrailles and others, appointed to treat about this affair, going to Paris, made the duke of Bedford the offer, who laughed at the ſtratagem; and he roundly told them, that they were greatly miſtaken to think, he would beat the buſh, for another to run away with the game. Some affirm, that the duke of Burgundy was extremely offended with this reply, and even withdrew his troops from the ſiege; but this is a mere invention. The duke of Burgundy had no cauſe for complaint, on the account of the regent's refuſing to deliver a place of that importance to him, to gratify his enemies; moreover, we ſhall ſee, preſently, that the regent was, all along, very well ſatisfied with the duke of Burgundy.

Charles thinks of retiring into Dauphine.

This project failing, Charles ſeeing no other way, to ſave Orleans, entertained thoughts of retiring into Dauphine, when a very extraordinary accident gave a ſudden turn to the affairs of the two contending nations; for we are about to ſee the ſtrangeſt and moſt unexpected revolution, ever mentioned, in hiſtory. The French, from vanquiſhed, are going to be, on a ſudden, victorious; and the Engliſh, hitherto, accounted invincible, are to be every-where defeated, and, at laſt, expelled the kingdom; and what is ſtill more ſurpriſing is the inſtrument, that brought about this amazing revolution; but, before I deſcend to particulars, I muſt caution the reader, that, in my account of this remarkable event, I follow the French authors, without, however, warranting the truth of all their aſſertions. 1429.

An account of the maid of Orleans. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel. Hall.

About the end of February, 1429, a country girl, called Joan of Arc, a village, in Dommremy in Lorrain, came to Robert de Baudricourt, governor of Vaucouleurs, and told him, that ſhe had received expreſs orders from God, to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, and crown king Charles, at Rheims; who, at firſt, conſidered the girl, as a viſionary; but, afterwards, finding that ſhe talked very ſenſibly, in the reſt of her diſcourſes, he ſent her to the king, who was ſtill, at Chinon. Charles, being informed of her coming, declared, that Maria d'Avignon, a nun, had formerly told him, "Heaven would arm one of her ſex, in "defence of France;" adding, that, perhaps, this girl, was the perſon appointed by Heaven. This was ſufficient to ſatisfy the court, beforehand, that Joan of Arc's calling was miraculous; for the ſupernatural miſſion perfectly agreed with the ſentiments of the queen, of Agnes Sorrel, the king's miſtreſs, and of the principal courtiers, who did all that was poſſible, to diſſuade the king from his purpoſe of retiring into Dauphine; ſo that nothing was more proper to divert him from his retreat, than the proſpect of a change in his fortune. In theſe diſpoſitions, was Joan of Arc expected; and, the firſt time ſhe appeared, at court, ſhe addreſſed herſelf directly to the king, diſcovering him, among all his courtiers, tho' ſhe had never ſeen him, and he had taken care to have nothing about him, to diſtinguiſh him. However, he ſeemed, at firſt, to take very little notice of this girl; but, ſtrenuouſly preſſing him to believe her words, which were the ſame ſhe had ſpoken to Baudricourt, he reſolved to have her examined. The divines, her examiners, declared, upon what evidence I know not, that her miſſion was divine; and then ſhe was ſent to the parliament, at Poictiers, who were of the ſame opinion; laſtly, to confirm this belief, the king declared, that ſhe had told him, ſecrets unknown to any mortal but himſelf.

Every one being, now, prepoſſeſſed, that Joan of Arc, commonly called la Pucelle, or the Maid, was ſent from God, to ſave France, ſhe was beheld, with eyes of admiration; and all her actions, words, and geſtures were interpreted to her advantage. There was diſcovered in her a fine genius, ſolid judgment, greatneſs of ſoul, and a knowledge very uncommon, in one of her ſex and condition; but this is the uſual effect of prejudice. It is eaſy to apprehend, that this might be an artifice, to revive the courage of the French, and, perhaps, of the king himſelf, diſmayed at ſo many loſſes, and ſeeing the kingdom juſt about to fall under the dominion of foreigners; but that this invention, if it be one, ſhould fully anſwer the deſign of the authors, affords juſt cauſe of admiration, and ample matter for moral and political reflections.

In the mean while, the ſiege of Orleans being carried on, Charles reſolved to attempt to throw a convoy into the city; and Joan, deſiring 1429. firing to be of the party, and to have arms and a man's habit, eaſily obtained her requeſt. To render herſelf more remarkable, ſhe would have a certain ſword ſent for, from the tomb of a knight buried, in the church of St. Catharine de Fierbois; and the convoy, intended for Orleans, departed, April the 25th. Several French writers tell us, that Joan commanded the guard, and conducted the convoy into the city; but Monſtrelet, a contemporary author, aſſerts the contrary. The convoy being arrived, on the 29th, in the morning, near the Burgundian gate, the baſtard of Orleans made a ſally, to favour their paſſage; and a fierce and bloody battle enſued, in which, after a long reſiſtance, the Engliſh were defeated, and compelled to let the convoy enter; and Joan made her entry into Orleans, amidſt the generals, and acclamations of the people, who aſcribed to her the ſignal ſucceſs of that day.

She takes four of the beſiegers forts. Monſtrelet. Hall.

On the 4th of May, Joan, at the head of a detachment of the garriſon, attacked, ſword in hand, the fort of St. Loup, one of the ſix largeſt above-mentioned; and, after a conflict of four hours, the fort was taken; and, of the 1200 Engliſh, that defended it, 400 were killed, on the ſpot. Two days after, ſhe alſo aſſaulted the fort of St. John; but, as it was almoſt abandoned by the Engliſh, ſhe met with little reſiſtance. Preſently after, without giving her troops any reſpite, ſhe led them againſt the fort, called London, the principal of the ſix, built upon the ruins of the church of the Auguſtines; and, in ſpite of the gallant defence of the Engliſh, this was alſo carried, with great loſs on their ſide. Joan's troops expected ſome reſpite, after ſo hard duty; but, immediately, ſhe marched them to the fort of the Tournelles; and, not being able to attack it, that evening, for want of day-light, ſhe kept it inveſted, all night. On the morrow, at break of day, the aſſault began, and continued, 14 hours, without intermiſſion; and the French were repulſed, four ſeveral times, and as often renewed the charge, Joan animating them, by her words and actions, tho' wounded with an arrow, between the neck and ſhoulders. At length, about eight at night, the fort was taken like the reſt, and 600 Engliſh cut in pieces; and, in all theſe actions, Joan gave proofs of an extraordinary valour and reſolution.

The Engliſh raiſe the ſiege. Monſtrelet. Hall.

It is natural to conclude, how great the conſternation of the Engliſh was, after the ill ſucceſs of that day; and, the loſs of four of their largeſt forts not permitting them to continue the ſiege, they raiſed it, the 12th of May, after having been before the place, ſeven whole months.

It appears from a fragment of the duke of Bedford's letter to the king, his nephew, after the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, how much the Engliſh, and the duke of Bedford himſelf, were diſcouraged by this ſurprizing event.

The great alteration of the French and Engliſh.

The raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans uſhered in the decline of the Engliſh affairs; for, after it, the French ſeemed to have mutually changed tempers and characters. The Engliſh were ſeized with a ſpirit of terror and aſtoniſhment, whilſt the French were inſpired with a courage, almoſt entirely loſt, ſince the battles of Azincourt and Verneuil. Tho' the number of the French did not then exceed 6000, they, in a brisk and undaunted manner, purſued the Engliſh, who, tho' they were ſtill more numerous, retreated, in a ſtrange diſorder; and their conſternation was ſuch, that, not knowing what they did, inſtead of keeping together, to withſtand their enemies, they amuſed themſelves with throwing numerous garriſons into the places, conquered before the ſiege, about the Loire; by which means, they ſo weakened themſelves, that they were no longer in a condition to expect their enemies who cloſely purſued them. As they dreaded a battle, as much as they had formerly deſired it, they retired, at a diſtance, and gave the French leiſure to retake theſe places, one after another; and the earl of Suffolk was made priſoner, in Gergeau, where he had imprudently ſhut himſelf up, with only 400 men; which muſt have proceeded from his conſternation, at the defeat of his troops. Of all the places, in thoſe parts, Baugenci held out the longeſt; but it, at laſt, underwent the ſame fate, with the reſt; and, in a word, diſorder and confuſion ſo poſſeſſed the Engliſh, that Charles, by Joan's advice, reſolved to be crowned, at Rheimes. In the interim, this city was ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh; moreover, there was a neceſſity of traverſing above 120 miles of the enemies country, and of taking ſeveral places, which, at any other time, he would not have ventured to approach; an amazing effect of the terror ſtruck into the Engliſh by a woman, and of the confidence inſtilled into the French by the ſame!

The conſtable brings him troops. Hall.

The conſtable Richemont, perceiving the proſperity of the king's affairs, became leſs haughty and imperious; for, tho', hitherto,

he

1429. he imagined himſelf neceſſary, the late events convinced him, that he might be entirely forgotten, and loſe his ſhare of the glory the king would, probably, acquire. In this belief, he aſſembled all his friends; and, forming a body of 1200 horſe, and 12000 foot, he marched, to join the king who was then before Baugenci; and the duke of Bretagne, doubtleſs, connived at this levy, in his country, the late revolution inducing him to alter his meaſures. Whilſt the conſtable was upon his march, La Trimouille artfully perſuaded the king, that he was coming, with a powerful army, to have his perſon in his power; and this firſt impreſſion ſo affected Charles, that he was on the point of raiſing the ſiege of Baugenci, to give the conſtable battle; but, upon better information, he was pleaſed to receive him, with his ſuccours; however, which was extremely mortifying to a prince of his character, in complaiſance to Trimouille, it was required, that he ſhould not pretend to govern the king, nor even be preſent at the coronation.

The battle of Patay.

Baugenci being taken, the king was informed, that the Engliſh were aſſembling, in Beauce; upon which, Charles holding a council of war, it was unanimouſly reſolved to give them battle. Indeed, there was no likelihood of going to Rheims, with the enemies in the rear; for king Charles's army was, then, 10,000 ſtrong, including the Bretons, brought by the conſtable; but, of the 22000 Engliſh, lately before Orleans, there were only 6000 left with Talbot, who had taken the command of the army, after Suffolk was priſoner. Such was the amazement of the Engliſh, ſince the affair of Orleans, that they ſuffered themſelves to be ſurpriſed, near Patay, by the French; and they had ſcarce time to draw up, which was done, in ſuch confuſion, that they made but a very faint reſiſtance. Talbot alone maintained the fight, by his conduct and bravery; but, at laſt, this general being taken priſoner, the Engliſh army was routed, with the loſs of 2500 men. Faſtolff run away with the flying troops, being ſeized by a panic terror; which, whilſt it laſts, deprives a man of the uſe of his reaſon, and may happen to the moſt courageous.

The duke of Bedford ſhuts himſelf up in Paris.

If the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans was a great checque to the affairs of the Engliſh, the defeat of Patay was a no leſs grievous and fatal blow; for the regent was now forced to keep within the walls of Paris, being unable to appear in the field, to oppoſe the progreſs of his enemies. In the interim, Charles improved theſe advantages; and Lewis III, duke of Anjou and king of Sicily, his brother-in-law, returning from Naples, where he had made a long ſtay, brought him, immediately after the battle of Patay, a ſupply of ſeveral valiant officers, who had attended him into Italy.

King Charles's adherents increaſing, in proportion to the proſperity of his affairs, he reviewed his troops, at Gien, and found them 1429. augmented to 15000 men; part of whom he gave to the conſtable, to make a diverſion, in Normandy, or rather, under that ſpecious pretence, to remove him, that he might not aſſiſt at the coronation, purſuant to agreement. The earl of Perdriac had another party, to carry the war into Guienne; and both theſe detachments contained no more than 5000 men. With the remaining 10,000, Charles took the road to Rheims, knowing there was no army in the field to oppoſe him; and, in paſſing thro' Burgundy, he ſummoned Auxerre, which promiſed to follow the example of the principal towns of Champagne. Troye and Chalon ſurrendered, upon the firſt ſummons, and a few days after, the citizens of Rheims drove the Engliſh garriſon out of the city, and ſent deputies to the king, to preſent him with the keys of their gates. Thus, every thing anſwering to his expectation, Charles entered Rheims, in triumph, and was crowned, preſently after. The ceremony being over, Joan would have retired, affirming that ſhe had nothing more to do, having executed what God had commanded; but the king ſollicited her ſo preſſingly, that, at laſt, he prevailed with her to ſtay.

Charles enters Rheims, and is crowned. Monſtrelet. Hall.

It is, now, time to ſee what paſſed, in England, during the late fatal revolution, in France. The quarrel ſtill ſubſiſted, between the duke of Glouceſter and the biſhop of Wincheſter, who was returned to London; and, as the prelate's new dignity rendered him more haughty, than ever, the duke of Glouceſter made uſe of that dignity, to give him a ſenſible mortification. St. George's day, patron of the moſt noble order of the garter, approaching, the cardinal was to officiate, as biſhop of Wincheſter; but the duke of Glouceſter and his friends oppoſed it, alledging that he could not hold the biſhoprick of Wincheſter, with the dignity of cardinal *, without the king's expreſs licenſe. The affair being brought before the council, it was reſolved, that, for this time, the cardinal ſhould not not officiate, as biſhop of Wincheſter; and two lords were ſent, to inform him of this reſolution. Next day, he came himſelf to the board, and demanded, why he was deprived of his right; but the council, perſiſting in their reſolution, replied, that it was for fear of prejudicing the prerogatives of the crown; whence the cardinal perceived, that his adverſary's intereſt was ſtill much greater than his own.

The duke of Glouceſter mortifies the cardinal of Wincheſter.

Soon after, the prelate received the pope's bull, appointing him his legate, in Germany, and general of the Cruſade againſt the Bohemian hereticks. The pope's deſign was to draw a powerful aid from England, againſt the Huſſites †; nay, it is not improbable, that, as he was a great friend to king Charles, he intended to weaken England, by draining the kingdom of men and money, under the pretence of the Cruſade. However, the car-

That no perſon ſhall be obliged to contribute money, for the Cruſade, but every one give, what he pleaſed; that the ſums, voluntarily given, ſhould be lodged in ſuch hands, as the council ſhould nominate; and that the gold, or ſilver, ſhould not be conveighed, beyond ſea, but expended in the kingdom *.

That the cardinal ſhould be impowered to levy only 250 lances, and 2500 archers; and that even this ſhould be granted, only on condition that the pope, out of regard to the king and kingdom, ſhould not impoſe any tax on the laity or clergy.

That no ſoldiers ſerving, in France, ſhould be liſted or received among the troops of the Cruſade.

That the cardinal ſhould give the council ſufficient ſecurity, for the return of theſe troops.

That he ſhould exert himſelf, to perſuade the king of Scotland to leave England, in quiet, and obſerve the truce.

That, in publiſhing the Cruſade, it ſhould expreſly be ſaid, that it was with the king's aſſent and licenſe.

That the officers ſhould be nominated by the cardinal, but commiſſioned by the king.

That it ſhould be the ſame, with reſpect to the conſtable, or commander in chief of the army.

That, if the Cruſade did not take place, the money, furniſhed by private perſons, ſhould not be employed, without the king's approbation.

New levies for France.

Theſe reſtrictions evidently ſhew, how careful the council was, to prevent the pope's exerciſing, in the kingdom, an authority but too much abuſed by his predeceſſors.

The cardinal is to ſerve in France, till December. July. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the news of the battle of Patay, flying into England, cauſed a great conſternation, and made it eaſily concluded, that the regent wanted a ſudden and powerful aid; and, therefore, without loſing a moment, the council ordered new levies, the command of which was deſigned for Sir John Ratcliffe; but, as, at this juncture, it would have been very imprudent to ſend troops into Bohemia, the council reſolved to make ſome alteration, in what was granted to the cardinal of Wincheſter; and, upon this preſſing occaſion, a new agreement was made with him, by which he engaged to ſerve, in France, under the duke of Bedford, till the end of December, with the troops of the Cruſade, provided they were not employed in any ſiege. 1429.

The duke of Bedford's inſtructions to Garter. Act. Pub.

A few days after, Garter king at arms †, arrived from France, to inform the council of the ſtate of affairs, in that kingdom; and the ſubſtance of his inſtructions from the regent was, as follows.

I. That it was neceſſary to forward the departure of Ratcliffe's and the cardinal's troops, and let the regent know the preciſe time of their embarquement:

II. The dauphin (for ſo the regent called Charles) was maſter of Troye, Chalon, and ſeveral other places, ſome of which had voluntarily ſurrendered; that he was to enter, that very day, July the 16th, the city of Rheims, in order to be crowned; and that he afterwards deſigned to do all that was poſſible, to take Paris, but ſhould find it more difficult than he imagined.

III. That the duke of Burgundy had fully diſcharged his duty; and the city of Paris, were it not for him, would have been loſt, before now; and that he departed, that very day, for Artois, to haſten his troops, and join them with the Engliſh army.

IV. That the regent was to ſet out, within two days, for Normandy and Picardy, where he would draw the garriſons together, and expect the troops that were to come from England.

V. Laſtly, The council of France moſt humbly petitioned the king, to come and be crowned, at Paris.

Upon this laſt article, it was reſolved, that the young king, now only eight years old, ſhould go into France, and be crowned; but that he ſhould firſt be crowned, in England.

Henry is crowned, at London.

Purſuant to this reſolution, the ceremony of the coronation was performed, on the 6th of November; and, ſix days after, the parliament, then aſſembled, ordered the dignity of protector and defender of the church to be ſuppreſſed; but that the duke of Glouceſter ſhould retain that of firſt counſellor to the

† There are three kings at arms, in England; namely, Garter, Clarencieux, and Norroy. Garter is the chief, inſtituted by Henry V, as has been related; and his buſineſs is to attend knights of the Garter, at their ſolemnity, and to marſhal the funerals of the greater nobility. Clarencieux was created by Edward IV, who, attaining the dukedom of Clarence, by the death of his brother, made the herald, belonging to the duke of Clarence, a king at arms, and called him Clarentius; whoſe proper office is to marſhal the funerals of the leſſer nobility, or gentry, on the ſouth ſide of the Trent. Norroy's office is the ſame, on the north-ſide of the Trent, as his name ſhews, The Northern King. The buſineſs of the heralds is, alſo to proclaim war, or peace, or to be employed in the king's martial meſſages; and they are likewiſe judges of gentlemens arms, marſhal all the ſolemnities, at the coronation of princes, &c. Verſtegan derives the word Herald from Here, an Army, and Healt, a Champion, i. e. The Champion of the Army; and, beſides the three kings, there are ſix others properly termed Heralds, as they were created to attend dukes, &c. viz. York, Lancaſter, Somerſet, Richmond, Cheſter, and Windſor. There are four others, called Marſhals, or Purſuivants at Arms, who commonly ſucceed in the place of heralds; namely, Blue-Mantle, Rouge-Croſs, Rouge-Dragon, and Port-Cullis.

This was an extreme as well as unexpected mortification to that prince; and, indeed, as the king's coronation did not increaſe his capacity, the kingdom ſeemed ſtill to require a protector; but it was pretended, that the protectorſhip was inconſiſtent with the dignity of a crowned head. The ſequel will ſhew, that this rule was not always obſerved; however, the duke handſomely ſubmitted to the ordinance, as far as it concerned him, the rights of his brother, the duke of Bedford, remaining entire.

Charles continues his conqueſts. Hall.

During the preparations, in England, for the coronation, Charles continued his conqueſts, with great rapidity; tho' his coronation detained him, 11 days, at Rheims. If the regent had, then, been provided with an army, he might eaſily have incloſed him in that corner of France, where he had but few places, ſurrounded with the enemies garriſons; but the duke was, at that time, in Picardy, with few troops, expecting thoſe that were to come from England; and Charles improved the advantage of that prince's diſtance. The inhabitants of the Engliſh towns being, generally, well affected to him, nothing hindered them from giving him proofs of their affection, ſince the duke of Bedford had been conſtrained to weaken the garriſons extremely, to compoſe an army; and, on this account, in a very ſhort ſpace, Charles became maſter of Soiſſons, Provins, Chateau-Thierry, Crepi, and ſome other places, even before they were attacked; for the Engliſh garriſons were unable to prevent the burghers from following their inclination.

The regent marches towards him. Monſtrelet.

In the mean while, the duke of Bedford, having, at laſt, received the expected ſupplies, began to march, with an intent to ſtop the progreſs of his enemy; and, at Crepi, Charles heard, that the duke was advancing, to give him battle. A few days after, the two armies approached very near each other, on a large plain, where nothing hindered their engaging; and the number of the troops, on both ſides, was much the ſame; but, as the king had more horſe, the regent was unwilling to attack him. Moreover, the poſture of his affairs required, that he ſhould not fight, without advantage; and, therefore, he ordered his camp to be ſtrongly intrenched. He was in hopes, that the impetuous humour of the French, would lead them to commit the ſame fault, as at Verneuil, and on many other occaſions; and that they would attempt to force his intrenchments, in which caſe, he promiſed himſelf certain victory; but, for once, he was diſappointed. Charles, grown wiſe, by ſo many former inſtances, was content with facing him, and trying to draw him out of his lines, without hazarding an attack, the ſucceſs of which ſeemed very doubtful; but, at laſt, finding the Engliſh kept their ſtation, he left his, to purſue his conqueſts, knowing that moſt of the towns were inclined to receive him. The regent cloſely followed him; but, as he would run no riſque, without an apparent advantage, he had the mortification to ſee him enter Senlis, Beauvais, Compiegne, Creil, Pont St. Maxence, Lagny, Bray, Gournay, Melunt, and Sens; all which places opened their gates to the king, being no longer overawed by the garriſons. 1429.

On the other hand, the conſtable Richemont, having found means to augment his troops, to the number of 8000, had taken Evreux, in Normandy, and threatened the whole province; but the duke of Bedford haſtened thither; not being able to bear the thoughts of loſing a country, from whence flowed, in a great meaſure, his ſubſiſtence.

Charles makes an attempt upon Paris. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Whilſt the duke of Bedford was employed, in Normandy, Charles, maſter of the field, in the iſle of France, approached Paris, and encamped, at Montmartre; and he, immediately, publiſhed a general pardon for the Pariſians, fancying that, terrified by his conqueſts, they would take up arms, and expel the Engliſh; but the regent had ſo ordered matters there, that not a man ſtirred. At laſt, perceiving that nothing was to be expected from the citizens, he attacked the ſuburbs of St. Honorius; but his troops were repulſed, with great loſs. Joan, who had greatly expoſed herſelf, in this aſſault, was wounded, and thrown into the ditch; and ſhe was thought to be dead, but, being drawn out, in the night, recovered of her wounds.

Lagni and St. Dennis are taken by the Engliſh.

The ſeaſon not permitting the two armies to keep the field, any longer, Charles, retiring, paſſed the winter, at Bourges; the regent, alſo, after driving the conſtable out of Normandy, returned to Paris; and, during the winter, he carried by ſcalade St. Dennis and Lagni, which exceedingly annoyed the Pariſians.

The diſpoſition of the duke of Burgundy, ſince the turn of affairs. Monſtrelet.

Before we conclude the occurrences of this year, it is neceſſary to ſhew, how the duke of Burgundy ſtood affected, ſince the revolution, in the Engliſh affairs. Charles, notwithſtanding his proſperity, was ſenſible it was inſufficient, unleſs he could gain the duke of Burgundy; and, indeed, if that potent prince had thought fit to aſſiſt the Engliſh, with all his forces, he would have, doubtleſs, prevented this fatal revolution; nay, if after the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, he had aided them, in proportion to his power, he would ſtill have turned the ſcale, on their ſide; but he had been, for ſome time, taking other meaſures. His policy ſuggeſted to him, that, by too powerfully aſſiſting the Engliſh, he ſhould procure himſelf troubleſome maſters, as he had already experienced, in the affair of Hainault; and, therefore, ſince he muſt have a ſovereign, he choſe much rather, to ſee a prince of his blood on the throne of France, than a foreigner; but he took care to conceal his ſentiments. It was manifeſt, that openly diſcovering his inclination, to abandon the Engliſh, would have been very prejudicial to him; for it would have rendered Charles leſs eager to agree with him; and, perhaps, the duke of Bedford would have endeavoured to prevent him, by making a ſeparate peace with the French, excluſive of him. This was, at leaſt, what the duke of 1429. Burgundy had reaſon to fear, conſidering the poſture of the affairs of the Engliſh, ſince the battle of Patay; and, therefore, he reſolved to continue to aſſiſt the Engliſh, but ſo as to give Charles ſome hopes, that, his reſentment was abated. He rightly judged, that, by this courſe, he ſhould procure better terms, or, at worſt, might remain in his preſent ſituation, till what he deſired was offered; and, Charles, having had ſome intimation of the duke of Burgundy's diſpoſition, diſpatched ſecret agents, to treat with him; but the duke did not think it proper, as yet, to diſcover himſelf, being apprehenſive that, if the duke of Bedford ſhould know it, he would, without him, agree with Charles; whereas his view was, to make his own peace, at the expence of the Engliſh. The ſequel evidently proved this to be his deſign; and it is moſt certain, that he was now determined, tho' he did not believe it expedient to begin the negotiation ſo early. A remarkable inſtance this, of the inſtability of the ſeemingly firmeſt alliances; a ſad effect of inſincerity, too common among men, and eſpecially among princes. In ſpite of their treaties, they cannot truſt one another, but live in continual fear of being deceived by their allies; and, therefore, taking for granted that they may be abandoned, they endeavour to prevent, and, without ſcruple, violate their engagements, upon the proſpect of any conſiderable advantage; nay, let a man run over all hiſtories, as well antient as modern, and he will hardly find any one conſiderable alliance, that was not broken by ſome notorious deceit.

Burgundy

1430. Murmurings in England. It would be difficult to deſcribe the concern, trouble, complaints, and murmurings, in England, upon the revolution, in France. Some accuſed the generals, of not diſcharging their duty; and others, perceiving no natural cauſe of ſuch a ſurpriſing change, affirmed, that it muſt have happened by the malice of the devil, who had made uſe of Joan, for his inſtrument, and boldly aſſerted ſhe was a witch. In a word, ſome threw all the blame on the council, and the duke of Glouceſter; and they juſtly charged them, with unſeaſonably proſecuting the affair of Hainault, when, if all the forces of England had been united againſt France, they would have infallibly compleated the conqueſt of that kingdom. In ſhort, nothing but complaints were heard, from all quarters, every one ſeeking, in the faults of the miniſtry, for a cauſe of this fatal revolution; but, among all the reflections caſt on the government, the council took moſt notice of their reaſoning, who ſaid, "It was "an extremely great error to keep the French "princes, and particularly the dukes of Or-"leans and Bourbon, ſo long priſoners, in "England; that none could be ignorant, "what ſignal advantages were reaped by the "late king, from the diſſenſions of the French; "and that, conſequently, the priſoners ſhould "have been ſent home, where, probably, "they would have renewed their old quar-"rels; whereas detaining them captive had "procured France a tranquillity, deſtructive "to England; that, at leaſt, if the dukes "of Orleans and Bourbon had been, in "France, with king Charles, the Engliſh "would have had greater aids, from the duke "of Burgundy, than what he had, hitherto, "furniſhed. In a word, it was not yet too "late to releaſe theſe two princes; and as "England was drained by ſuch a tedious war, "their ranſoms might ſerve to put things "on a better footing." Theſe reaſons ſeemed very ſpecious; but, on the contrary, the late king's orders, concerning the priſoners, were, to the duke of Glouceſter and the council, an inviolable law. 1430

There were, however, eſpecially, as to the duke of Bourbon, motives, which might have induced the council to overlook the late king's orders; for, in 1421, that prince made a treaty with Henry V, promiſing to ſwear to the peace of Troye, to pay a certain ſum, for his ranſom, and deliver two of his ſons, and his fortified towns, in hoſtage, till his engagements were fully performed. Henry V. dying, before the treaty was executed, it was renewed, with ſome alteration, in 1428; and young Henry had received, as king of France, the duke's homage. There was nothing wanting, except the ratification, which was ſolely deferred, leſt the people ſhould diſapprove of this proceeding. In ſhort, this year 1430, all difficulties were ſurmounted, and the treaty was ratified; but ſome obſtacles, that occurred in the execution, hindered the duke from being releaſed; who died, at laſt, in England, in 1433, after an 18 years captivity. Articles for releaſing the duke of Bourbon. Act. Pub.

Another motive, inducing the council to treat with the duke of Bourbon, was the hopes, that his ranſom would help to defray the charges of the king's journey, who was in a readineſs to embarque for France; but, this means failing, it became neceſſary to have recourſe to borrowings, which manifeſtly diſcovered the low condition of the treaſury; and, with how great difficulty, ſufficient funds were raiſed, for carrying on the war.

Henry departed, at length, on the 24th of April, attended by many of the nobility, and particularly the cardinal of Wincheſter, who was appointed chief counſellor to the king, with a large ſalary; for this honourable pretence was uſed, to keep him out of England, leſt, in the king's abſence, and under the duke of Glouceſter's regency, who was made guardian, their diſſenſions might create commotions. Henry, arriving at Calais, proceeded immediately to Roan, where he ſpent, almoſt all the reſt of the year; whilſt preparations were making, at Paris, for his coronation, which could not be finiſhed, till December. About the middle of this month, he came to the metropolis; where he was crowned, on the 17th, with all the ſolemnity the preſent juncture of his affairs would allow. Henry goes to France.

Whilſt the king was, at Roan, the duke of Bedford, foreſeeing the duke of Burgundy's deſigns, and their dangerous conſequences, did all that was poſſible, to prevent them; The duke of Bedford ſecures the duke of Burgundy to England.

1430. them; and it coſt him Champagne and la Brie, or, at leaſt, the places he ſtill poſſeſſed, in thoſe provinces, to ſecure him in the alliance of England; but, at the ſame time, he was enabled, by this means, to ſtop the progreſs of Charles, who had carried on his conqueſts, with an amazing rapidity.

The duke of Burgundy's third marriage.

Another reaſon, to keep the duke of Burgundy in the intereſt of the Engliſh, was, his third marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, a near relation to the king of England, and who had not the ſame affinity with king Charles, as Bona of Artois, his former wife; ſo that the duke of Bedford, receiving an aid from the duke of Burgundy, took the field, and became maſter, in the iſle of France, of ſeveral places; which, tho' inconſiderable in themſelves, were of great importance, as they were incommodious to Paris.

The duke of Burgundy beſieges Compiegne.

Soon after, the duke of Burgundy himſelf entered France, at the head of a numerous army; and he retook firſt Torſy and Soiſſons, and then beſieged Compiegne. Flavy commanded, in that place, with an able garriſon, and ſix months proviſions; but, upon the firſt news of this ſiege, the maid of Orleans and Xaintrailles threw themſelves into the town, not without the governor's ſecret reſentment, who eaſily perceived. that they came to rob him of the honour of the defence.

The maid makes a ſalley, and is taken priſoner. Monſtrelet.

On the 25th of May, Joan, making a ſalley, fought, with great conduct and reſolution; but, being, at length, forced to retreat, ſhe put herſelf in the rear, and, now and then, made a ſtand, to ſtop the enemies, by whom ſhe was preſſed. In this manner, ſhe preſerved all her men; but ſhe found the gates ſhut, and the draw-bridge up, when ſhe would have entered the town. It is ſaid, that this was done by the governor's order, to deſtroy her, who pretended, that he did not know ſhe was ſtill without; but this circumſtance is not ſufficiently proved. However it be, Joan, finding it impoſſible to eſcape her purſuers, ſurrendered herſelf priſoner to the baſtard of Vendoſme, who, forthwith, delivered her to the earl of Ligny, the duke of Burgundy's general; and the duke of Bedford, over-joyed that this prey was in the power of his allies, demanded her ſo urgently of the earl of Ligny, that he could not deny him; yet he required a reward ſuitable to the importance of his priſoner. ſome time after, the town was relieved by the earl of Vendoſme, who introduced troops and ammunition, when it was almoſt reduced to extremity; upon which, the earl of Ligny, commander in chief, deſpairing of ſucceſs, raiſed the ſiege; and the duke of Burgundy, who had ſtaid, all the while, at Noyon, retired into Artois.

Bouſſac and Xaintrailles are deceived by a ſhepherd. Monſtrelet.

I paſs over in ſilence numberleſs attempts, on both ſides, which contributed very little to the deciſion of the main affair; however, it will be proper to obſerve, that Joan's pretended inſpiration had made ſuch an impreſſion in the minds of the French, that marſhal Bouſſac and Xaintrailles ſuffered themſelves to be deceived by an artifice, which, doubtleſs, would have miſcarried, had it not been ſupported by this prepoſſeſſion. A ſhepherd, living near Roan, came and informed the marſhal, that Heaven had revealed to him a certain private way, by which he would lead him into the very city of Roan; and Bouſſac imparted the ſecret to Xaintrailles; upon which being both perſuaded that they had God himſelf for their guide, they marched, with a body of choſen troops after the ſhepherd, who led them into an ambuſh, where Talbot expected them; and, their troops being cut in pieces, Xaintrailles remained a priſoner, in the hands of the Engliſh. 1430.

Theſe are the moſt memorable events, in France, during the year 1430, with reſpect to the war; but we muſt now return to what paſſed, in England.

The cardinal receives a freſh mortification. Act. Pub.

During the cardinal of Wincheſter's abſence, the duke of Glouceſter repreſented to the council, that the cardinal deſigned to leave the king, in order to take his place in the council, with an intent to raiſe troubles in the kingdom; that his deſign was the more criminal, as he intended to make uſe of the pope's authority, to free himſelf from the obligation to aſſiſt the king, in France; which was evidently ſubjecting the orders and regulations of the council, to a foreign power; and, upon theſe complaints, the council iſſued out a proclamation, prohibiting all the king's ſubjects, on pain of impriſonment, to attend the cardinal, if he left the king, without licenſe.

A truce with Caſtile,

On the 8th of November, a truce of one year was concluded, at London, with the king of Caſtile, to commence, the 1ſt of May, 1431.

and Scotland.

About the middle of December, the ambaſſadors of England ſigned, at Edinburgh, a five years truce with Scotland, to begin, the ſame day with the former.

1431.

Joan having been in the hands of the Engliſh, ever ſince the ſiege of Compiegne, the duke of Bedford had ordered her to be conducted to Roan, were he reſolved to ſacrifice her, to the vengeance he thought due to the Engliſh nation; and there was, doubtleſs, great policy, in this reſolution. All France was poſſeſſed with the Belief, that ſhe was ſent from God; and the Engliſh ſoldiers fancied, that, in fighting againſt her, they had to deal with the devil. Wherever ſhe appeared, they imagined the French troops invincible; at leaſt, the conſternation that ſeized their ſouls, and the ſurpriſing change it wrought in their tempers and diſpoſitions, cannot be aſcribed to any other cauſe; and it was, therefore, of the laſt importance to undeceive them. The taking of Joan had already begun to produce this effect; for it was very naturally inferred, that, had ſhe acted by God's command, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that ſhe could fall into ſuch a misfortune; but, to confirm this firſt impreſſion, it was very expedient to inſinuate to the terrified Engliſh, that all that ſhe had done was, by way of witchcraft and ſorcery. Perhaps, this was the, duke of Bedford's own opinion, as may

1431. may be concluded from his expreſſions, in the foreſaid letter to the king; but, however that be, he ſo managed, that the king, by the advice of his council of France, ordered Joan to be tried, for a witch; and, accordingly, ſhe was delivered over to eccleſiaſtical judges, who, after a long examination, condemned her, as a heretick, to do penance, upon bread and water, all the days of her life. Some time after, under the pretence of her relapſing into her former errors, ſhe was tried again by the ſame judges, who delivered her over to the ſecular arm, to be burnt alive; which ſentence was executed, in the old market-place at Roan, the 30th of May, 1431.

The maid is condemned to impriſonment, and afterwards to be burnt. Monſtrelet.

Various opinions about her.

Thus far, the French and Engliſh agree; for it cannot be denied, that Joan performed remarkable exploits, and inſpired the French with courage, whilſt ſhe terrified the Engliſh; but the French aſcribe what appears wonderful, in her, to the ſupernatural power of God, and the Engliſh to the artifices of the devil. How, then, ſhall we form a judgment? Perhaps, they are both miſtaken; and, indeed, there is a third opinion, that does not want plauſible reaſons. As the examination of theſe three opinions would occaſion too large a digreſſion, I ſhall not ſtay, to diſcuſs them, here; and they, who deſire a more particular account of this matter, may peruſe a Diſſertation, inſerted at the end of this reign, where I ſhall endeavour to ſet this point, in as clear a light, as the nature of it will allow.

The extreme weakneſs of the two kings.

Charles, notwithſtanding his advantages, was not in a condition to continue the war; for moſt of the places he had taken, being ruined, were incapable of giving him much aſſiſtance. Moreover, as they had voluntarily ſurrendered, he was unwilling to preſs them, leſt they ſhould return to the Engliſh; for it was not in his power to place in them garriſons, of ſtrength ſufficient to keep them in awe. On the contrary, the Engliſh, by reaſon of their many loſſes, were alſo unable to keep armies in the field; ſo that, during the reſt of this year, the war was continued only by parties, and ſurpriſing of places, moſt of which were but weakly guarded.

The French ſurpriſe Chartres. Monſtrelet.

Thus, the French became maſters of Charters, by means of a cart loaden with wine, which they cauſed to be overturned, juſt under the port-cullis; and the Engliſh took Montargis, by holding intelligence with a young woman, who perſuaded a barber, her lover, to introduce them into the town.

The fair of Caen is plundered. J. Chartier.

Lore, a French captain, made an inroad, to the very gates of Caen, upon a fair-day, and carried away 2000 perſons, with a very great booty; and he, afterwards, retired to Silley, a ſmall town, in Maine, where he was beſieged by the earl of Arundel; but the duke of Alenſon, on a ſudden, coming to his relief, obliged the Engliſh to retire.

Other exploits of the two parties. Monſtrelet.

This year, Xaintrailles and Gaucour, ravaging Normandy, were defeated and made priſoners; and a party of Engliſh took alſo Villeneuve lez-ſen from the French. Nothing elſe, that was remarkable, paſſed, in France; but a more important event fell out, in Lorrain, wherein king Charles and the duke of Burgundy were concerned, and which, therefore, it will not be improper briefly to mention. 1431.

The war of Lorrain. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Lewis, cardinal of Bar, and marqueſs of Pont-a-Mouſſon, being the laſt male of the houſe of Bar, the children of Violante, his ſiſter, queen of Arragon, became his heirs; among whom, Violante of Arragon had married Lewis II, king of Sicily, and duke of Anjou, and by him had three ſons, Lewis, Rene, and Charles. Of theſe, the cardinal duke of Bar choſe Rene, for his heir, and married him to Iſabella, third daughter to Charles, duke of Lorrain, who had no iſſue male; and it is ſaid, that Iſabella's two elder ſiſters had renounced the ſucceſſion of the duke, their father. Rene, being duke of Bar, by the deceaſe of the cardinal, his uncle, would alſo have taken poſſeſſion of Lorrain, upon the death of the duke, his father-in-law; but Anthony, earl of Vaudemont, ſon to Frederick, younger brother to duke Charles, diſputed the ſucceſſion with him; which cauſed a war between theſe two princes, wherein king Charles ſupported Rene, his brother-in-law, and the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Vaudemont. On the 2d of July, this year, the two competitors fought, at Bulegneville, a bloody battle; where Rene was defeated, taken priſoner, and carried to Dijon; and 1200 French were ſlain, in this action; which loſs, doubtleſs, helped to hinder Charles from continuing his progreſs.

An attempt to take the ſee from the biſhop of Winchester.

The affair relating to the ſee of Wincheſter, of which the duke of Glouceſter would have deprived the cardinal, was rather ſuſpended, than determined, in 1429, by an order of council to the prelate, to forbear, for that time, officiating, as biſhop, on St. George's day; for the duke, taking advantage of the cardinal's abſence, who was with the king, at Paris, about the end of this year, procured this affair to be brought again upon the board. On the 6th of November, the king's attorney-general, appearing before the council, required, that the cardinal ſhould be deprived of his ſee; alledging that, by the laws of the land, the ſame perſon could not be a cardinal and biſhop, in England; and he ſupported his allegation with the examples of Simon Langham and Robert Kilwarby, formerly archbiſhops of Canterbury, who, upon their being made cardinals, reſigned the archbiſhoprick. Then the duke of Glouceſter, addreſſing himſelf to the biſhop of Worceſter, requeſted him to declare, upon his oath of allegiance to the king, whether the cardinal had not obtained of the pope an exemption from the juriſdiction of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, for himſelf, the city, and even the whole dioceſe of Wincheſter; for his intent was to ſhew, how inconvenient it was, to ſuffer a cardinal to hold a biſhoprick, in England. The biſhop of Worceſter, after ſome intreaty, replied, that the biſhop of Litchfield, being at Rome, had ſued for, and obtained this exemption for the cardinal, who had reimburſed all the charges; and that he had this from that prelate's own mouth. After a long debate about this affair, in the coun-

1431. cil, it was, at length, reſolved, that, before any deciſion, the cardinal ſhould be heard, and the judges conſulted; ſo that it was, as yet, impoſſible for the duke of Glouceſter to compaſs his ends.

A conference about a peace. Monſtrelet.

Whilſt Henry was in France, pope Eugenius II, ſucceſſor to Martin V, ſent thither the cardinal of Santa Cruz, in order to perſuade the two kings to a peace; and he prevailed with them, at laſt, to ſend their ambaſſadors to Auxerre; but this congreſs was ineffectual. They did not ſo much as enter into a conference, becauſe, if we may believe the French hiſtorians, the ambaſſadors of England refuſed to own king Charles's for ambaſſadors of France; however, the 31ſt of March, the enſuing year, was appointed for their meeting; but to no purpoſe, ſince no place was appointed for holding the congreſs. The court of England had named, for plenipotentiaries, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſome others.

1432. The ill ſtate of the duke of Bedford, in France.

Henry returned into England, the beginning of the year 1432, being full 10 years old; but neither his journey into France, nor his return, produced any alteration, in his affairs; which were ſtill managed by the duke of Bedford, in France, and by the duke of Glouceſter, in England; but the government of two kingdoms was a weighty burden for theſe princes, at a time when the king's affairs were manifeſtly in a decaying condition. The duke of Bedford was obliged to be always on his guard, to reſiſt his enemies, now, very formidable; but this was nothing, in compariſon of the trouble, occaſioned by his perpetual diffidence of his own pretended friends. The duke of Burgundy's ambiguous proceedings juſtly gave him uneaſineſs; the duke of Bretagne was not a firmer friend; and, in a word, ſince the decline of the affairs of the Engliſh, the towns, that ſeemed to ſide with them, were faithful, only in proportion to the ſtrength of their garriſons. Paris herſelf, the metropolis, on which, in a manner, all depended, was not ſo well affected, as that any ſtreſs could be laid on her fidelity; or, at leaſt, her attachment to the intereſt of England had an entire dependence on that of the duke of Burgundy. To this may be added, the inconſiderable aids of men and money, received by the duke of Bedford, at a time when they were the moſt wanted; and, to compleat his misfortune, the regent found himſelf almoſt alone, burdened with the weight of the publick affairs, as well military as civil; thoſe who had aſſiſted him, in the beginning of his regency, being, for the moſt part, either dead, or priſoners in the hands of the French. In this perplexity, he propoſed to king Charles the exchange of Talbot, for Xaintrailles; and his offer was accepted. As he durſt not leave Paris, and the war was carrying on, in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, he could not be without ſuch a general, as Talbot; tho', to procure him, he was obliged to reſtore his equal to the enemy.

If the affairs of the Engliſh were upon an ill footing, in France, they were not in a better ſituation, in England; for ſubſidies were granted by the parliament, with great reluctance, for continuing ſuch a deſtructive war, which did not proſper, as formerly; and, on the other hand, the quarrel, between the duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal, ſtill ſubſiſted, with greater animoſity, than ever, and began to turn, to the duke's diſadvantage. In the laſt year's parliament, the cardinal, having found means to gain the commons to his intereſt, extremely mortified his adverſary; and the houſe, to ſhew him marks of their favour, petitioned the king, that, in conſideration of the cardinal's great ſervices to the ſtate, he would give him a full pardon, for whatever he had done contrary to the laws, particularly, with reſpect to the ſtatute of Præmunire; and, this petition being granted, the cardinal was ſcreened from all proſecution. However the duke of Glouceſter ſtill pretended, that he had ſufficient evidence, to prove the cardinal guilty of high-treaſon; a crime which could not be ſuppoſed to be included in the letters of pardon. The cardinal, then in Flanders upon the king's affairs, ſpeedily repaired to London, without asking leave, and ſo furniſhed his enemy with a pretence to ſeize his baggage; and, the very day after his arrival, he went to the houſe of lords, with a deſign, as he ſaid, to vindicate his innocence, againſt any that ſhould offer to accuſe him. The duke of Glouceſter not thinking it proper to ſupport what he had advanced, the prelate was anſwered, that, as no accuſer appeared, he was acknowledged, for a loyal ſubject; and he thanked the houſe for this declaration, deſiring that it might be drawn up, in form, which was granted. Then he complained, that, at his arrival at Sandwich, his baggage was ſeized; and he petitioned the reſtitution. He alledged, that the ſeizure was unjuſtly made, and offered to lend the king 6000 l. for ſix years; and that, if, in that time, the ſeizure was proved lawful, the money lent ſhould be forfeited to the king; and he likewiſe offered to lend him the like ſum, and to defer the demand of 13000 marks, due to him, on another account, on condition that the payment of the whole ſhould be aſſigned, out of the next ſubſidy granted to the king. His view was, to ſhew his regard for the king's and the people's wants; and his offers were accepted, and the ſeizure reſtored. Thus, the duke of Glouceſter, inſtead of triumphing over his enemy, had the mortification, to ſee him receive the applauſes of both houſes; but, in the interim, this diſcord produced very ill effects; for, whilſt the duke and the cardinal were ſolely intent on their own private concerns, the war, in France, was neglected; tho' it was, now, more neceſſary, than ever, to do all that was poſſible, to ſupport it.

1432. A continuation of the quarrel between the duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal.

The indolence of king Charles.

England, had ſhe improved her preſent advantages, might have repaired ſome of her former loſſes. King Charles languiſhed in the arms of Agnes Sorrel, his miſtreſs, leaving the management of every thing, however important, to his miniſters and generals; and it

1432. was with extreme reluctance, that he beſtowed a few moments upon the war, and the affairs of ſtate. So impatient was he to return to his pleaſures, interrupted by theſe perplexing cares, that he only ſtudied to intruſt with others whatever might embarraſs him; and La Trimouille, his favourite, was generally accuſed of ſoothing him, in this ſupineneſs; but it was perceived by perſons of penetration, that the king, growing weary of him, was uneaſy under a yoke he had impoſed upon himſelf. The conſtable, tho' abſent, ſoon received intelligence of it; for his ſpies at court were too vigilant, to ſuffer ſuch an important thing to be long concealed from him. As he was of a haughty and violent ſpirit, he could not bear, without indignation, to be ſurpaſſed by La Trimouille; and he had reſolved to ſerve him, as he had done Louvet, De Giac, and Beaulieu. When he found, that the king had not the ſame regard for him, as before, he thought it a fair opportunity, for executing his reſolution; but, finding that Trimouille's ruin would not ſo far reſtore him to the king's favour, as that he could hope for his place, he projected to introduce Charles of Anjou, the queen's brother, into this poſt; a ſtrange project, haughtily to attempt to deprive a prince of one favourite, and give him another, againſt his will, or, at leaſt, without conſulting him! As ſoon as matters were ripe for execution, La Trimouille was ſeized, in his bed, in the king's own houſe, who was then, at Chinon, and carried to priſon, at Montreſor; but, Charles incenſed at the news, would immediately, have taken vengeance, had not all the princes of the blood, and the great men, at court, declared againſt this favourite. He, with dread, remembred the confederacy formed againſt him, when he would have ſcreened Louvet; and, his diſguſt againſt this miniſter, who was no more than a favourite, in name, being added to that political reaſon, he abandoned him, without extreme concern. Charles of Anjou came to comfort him; and ſuch was his ſucceſs, that he became the favourite, and La Trimouille was forgotten.

It is natural to conclude, that a prince, of Charles's character, would not have been very formidable to the duke of Bedford, if the ſupplies from England had been ſufficient, to put him in a condition to make ſome conſiderable attempt; but he had not, for ſome time, been able to bring an army into the field, without diminiſhing his garriſons, and ſo expoſing his towns either to be ſurpriſed, or tempted to follow the example of thoſe, that had voluntarily ſurrendered to king Charles.

Lagni is taken by the French. Monſtrelet. J. Chartier.

About the end of the preceding year, Foucaut had conquered Lagni upon him, a place often taken and retaken, and which the neighbourhood of Paris rendered of the laſt importance; and, a little after, the regent, to no purpoſe, attempted to retake it. In the beginning of this year, the marſhal de l'Iſle-Adam and the earl of Arundel attacked it, in vain, being compelled, by a vigorous ſalley from the town, to abandon their enterprize; and, at laſt, in the beginning of Auguſt, the duke of Bedford beſieged it himſelf, with an army of 6000 men; but, on the 10th of the ſame month, the baſtard of Orleans, in ſpite of the duke's precautions, introduced a convoy, and then paſſed the Marne. This march leading the duke to apprehend, that he held ſome intelligence, in Paris, he ſuddenly raiſed the ſiege, to prevent his deſigns; and thus, Lagni was, beſieged, unſucceſsfully, three times within the ſpace of ſeven or eight months. 1432.

The French ſurpriſe Montargis, and quit it again. J. Chartier.

On the other hand, a ſmall body of French, drawn out of the garriſons, near the Loire, ſurpriſed Montargis; but, the caſtle making a vigorous defence, the French, being unable either to force it, or keep the town, were obliged to retire. In Normandy, 1200 Engliſh inveſted la Hire, in Louviers; and, after a three months blockade, he conſtrained the place to come to a capitulation.

The death of the ducheſs of Bedford. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Theſe were inconſiderable events; but, on the 13th of November, there happened one of much greater conſequence, viz. the death of Ann of Burgundy, ducheſs of Bedford. This loſs was common to all the Engliſh, ſince it broke the bond of union between the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy; and, by the coldneſs ſucceeding it, it proved very fatal to England.

An ambaſſy to the council of Baſil. Act. Pub.

The council of Baſil had been aſſembled, ſince the laſt year, but England had ſent no ambaſſadors; and, about the end of this year, the pope and council, who were diſputing about pre-eminence, ſending, each a-part, legates to the king, the archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Rocheſter, the earl of Huntingdon, and ſeveral others were appointed to go to the council.

1433. An inſurrection, in Normandy. Monſtrelet. J. Chartier.

In the beginning of 1433, there was a dangerous inſurrection, in Normandy; which would have been no leſs prejudicial to the Engliſh, than the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, if they had not, by their diligence, timely prevented part of the miſchief, which might have enſued; for 60,000 peaſants of that province, having taken arms, divided themſelves into two bodies, one of which, conſiſting of 40,000 men, marched into Vexin, and the other towards Caen. Had Charles's army been near enough, to ſupport them, he would, doubtleſs, have been maſter of all Normandy; for the rebels ſoon conquered Caen, Harfleur, Dieppe, and Lillebonne; and, probably, they would have made a much greater progreſs, if the earl of Arundel had not, with the utmoſt expedition, marched againſt thoſe that were aſſembled, in Vexin. Theſe men, being without an eminent leader, were ſurpriſed, in the night, and eaſily yielded him a victory, more beneficial to his maſter than glorious to himſelf; but thoſe of Caen, tho' not ſo numerous, would have given him more trouble, becauſe the marſhal of Rieux was at their head; yet, terrified by the defeat of their companions, they retired, file after file, to their own habitations. The marſhal, being thus deſerted, taking with him ſome of the braveſt, threw himſelf into Dieppe; and, in the interim, Arundel, improving their conſternation, found means to recover Caen

1433. and Lillebonne; but Dieppe and Harfleur, places of very great importance, remained in the hands of the French.

The duke of Bedford marries Jacquelina of Luxemburgh.

The ſame year, another event contributed to diſconcert the affairs of the Engliſh; for the duke of Bedford, being a widower, eſpouſed, in March, Jacquelina, daughter to Peter of Luxemburgh, earl of St. Pol; and this marriage gave great offence to the duke of Burgundy, becauſe it was made, without his knowledge. He expected, that the duke of Bedford would have ſhewn him more reſpect, ſince, beſides the many ties by which they were united, he married the daughter of one of his vaſſals. The duke of Bedford, who was very circumſpect, had, doubtleſs, his reaſons for haſtening his marriage, without imparting it to the duke of Burgundy; yet, as it highly concerned him not to incenſe that prince, he paid him ſome compliments, by the cardinal of Wincheſter, who even procured an interview, at St. Omer, where the two princes met, in April; but an unfortunate diſpute, about precedency, prevented their reconciliation. Theſe two princes had formerly frequent meetings, without the leaſt conteſt, on that account; but the duke of Burgundy was obliged to ſtart ſome diſpute, now, for a cloke to the ſteps he deſigned to take; tho', as he owned Henry, for king of France, and the duke of Bedford, for regent, uncle of the reigning king, how could he pretend to the precedence?

The duke of Burgundy takes ſome places from the French. Monſtrelet. Hall.

During this year, nothing of importance paſſed, with reſpect to the war. Charles ſeemed to have entirely relinquiſhed all care of his affairs, the better to reliſh the pleaſures of love and eaſe; and the duke of Bedford was weak, and, receiving no farther ſupplies from England, was more ſollicitous to keep what he had, than to make new conqueſts. In the mean time, tho' the duke of Burgundy reſolved to make a ſeparate peace with Charles, he believed it would be more advantageous, if he could do it, with full hands; wherefore, he became maſter of St. Valery, which Gaucour had ſurpriſed; and the town of Ham, defended by the baſtard of Orleans and Xaintrailles, with Laon and Provins, were likewiſe taken by him. On the contrary, the earl of Arundel beſieging Silley-le-Guillaume, in Maine, the conſtable Richemont forced him to raiſe the ſiege; but the French were ſcarce gone, when the earl returned and took the town.

The duke of Orleans offers to mediate a peace. Act. Pub.

During theſe tranſactions, the council of England were more intent, how to procure a peace, than to recover the king's loſſes, in France; and the duke of Orleans, ſtill a priſoner, at London, made the firſt overtures, offering to uſe his utmoſt endeavours, to accompliſh an affair, on which his freedom depended. With this view, he propoſed to bring to Calais, or any other place the council ſhould name, the queen dowager of Sicily, Charles of Anjou, her ſon, the duke of Bretagne, with the earls of Richemont and St. Giles, his brothers, the duke of Alenſon, the earls of Armagnac, Foix, Perdriac, Clermont, and the archbiſhop of Rheims, to treat with the ambaſſadors of England; and he alſo deſired leave to be at the congreſs, to promote, to the utmoſt of his power, the concluſion of a peace. As he deſigned to engage the court of England to enter into a negotiation, he demonſtrated, that it would be very beneficial to the Engliſh, whether this treaty broke off, or ſucceeded; and the two articles he propoſed to the council, concerning himſelf, are, as follows. 1433.

His offers. Act. Pub.

I. Provided a peace was concluded, between Henry and the Dauphin, for ſo he ſtiled king Charles, he promiſed to do homage to Henry, whenever required, and never to own any other king of France, than him, or his lawful ſucceſſors.

II. He promiſed the ſame, for all his vaſſals, for the duke of Alenſon, the earls of Armagnac, Perdriac, Angouleſme, and the dukes of Milan and Savoy.

In another article, he ſuppoſed, that the dauphin would be contented with an honourable and conſiderable appenage; which was the very point the Engliſh aimed at, in this negotiation.

But, if a peace was not concluded, the duke engaged to acknowledge Henry, for ſole and lawful king of France; promiſing alſo to deliver to him Blois, Orleans, and all his demeſne-towns, with Rochelle, Mont St. Michel, Limoges, Bourges, Chinon, Poictiers, Tournay, Beziers, Saintes, and Loches, or what other places he pleaſed, inſtead of theſe, except Rochelle and Mont St. Michel, which were not to be changed.

That, if the king ſhould grant him any demeſne, in England, he would own him, as king of England, for his liege-lord, and, as ſuch, ſwear fealty to him.

That he would do all that was poſſible, to put the king in poſſeſſion of the countries and cities of France, which did not yet own him, and would ſerve him, at his own expence.

That, if the treaty did not ſucceed, he promiſed to return a priſoner to England, till all the articles were performed, on his part, on condition that he ſhould afterwards be releaſed, without a ranſom.

They are accepted.

Theſe articles, previouſly concerted, between the king's commiſſioners and the duke, being approved by the council, the duke ſigned and ſealed them, and ſwore to obſerve them; then paſſports were prepared for the queen dowager of Sicily, and the reſt mentioned, in the firſt article, that they might repair to Calais, in October; and the council likewiſe appointed plenipotentiaries, to treat with the French.

Reaſons why the duke of Orleans did not act ſincerely.

When the engagements, here entered into by the duke of Orleans, are conſidered, they evidently prove, that he joined with the court of France, to impoſe upon the court of England; which plainly appears from the hopes he gave, that Charles would be ſatisfied with a bare appenage; a thing, doubtleſs, very far from that prince's thoughts, and which was inſinuated, only to cauſe the Engliſh the more readily to fall into the ſnare. Moreover, in engaging 1433. engaging to bring to Calais the queen of Sicily, and the other French princes and lords, he would have intimated, that it was their intent to conclude a treaty, upon that foundation; which was, however, directly contrary to their design, as the sequel shewed; and, in the next place, the duke's servile expressions to the king of England, calling him, in the articles, his king and sovereign lord, are a manifest proof, that he flattered him, only to deceive him. In a word, he promised things, that he was unable to perform; for instance, to deliver places which did not belong to him; but, in this, precisely, consisted the fraud, because he designed to intimate, that he was impowered, tho' the court of France judged it improper, openly to discover themselves. These are not mere conjectures; for the consequences of this negotiation demonstrate, that the duke did not act, with sincerity; and yet this is the same duke of Orleans, whom the French would represent, as a saint, and, upon whose account, Joan pretended to have several revelations.

1434. It is obvious, that the duke of Orleans acted, in concert with the court of France, when it is considered, that Charles was now reconciled with the duke of Burgundy, who only wanted a pretence to break with England. The constable Richemont had concluded a separate treaty, in an interview with the duke, at Nevers; whither he repaired, under colour of adjusting a difference, between the duke of Burgundy and the earl of Clermont; and where all the articles of the separate peace were settled with the duke. All he, now, wanted, was an occasion to take this step; to which the project of a conference for a general peace was made subservient. It was well known that the English would not consent to the terms that should be proposed to them; and their refusal was to be the duke of Burgundy's pretence to make a separate peace. This was the real motive of the duke of Orleans's large offers to the king of England, on condition a peace was not concluded; and the design was, to engage Henry's council in this negotiation, by amusing them with hopes, that, whatever was the result of the conference, it would prove very advantageous to England. The duke of Bedford and the council of England, being entirely ignorant of what passed, between king Charles and the duke of Burgundy, fell into the snare; but they had no sooner agreed to the proposed negotiation, than the duke of Burgundy, pretending to be still strictly united to the English, so managed, that, instead of Calais, the city of Arras was appointed for the place of congress, where all the parties concerned were to send their ambassadors; and we shall, presently, see what was transacted, in this assembly.

The English are imposed upon.

The continuation of the war in France. Monstrelet.

In the mean time, the war, in France, degenerated into real plundering; and, both kings being unable to keep great armies on foot, only small parties acted, on either side. The most memorable occurrences of this year were these: The French having surprised Rue, in Picardy, the earl of Arundel posted thither, to retake the town; and, whilst he was on his march, he heard, that the French were fortifying Herberoy, near Beauvais; but he expected to expel them from thence, before their works were finished. Accordingly, he appeared, before that place; yet, upon intelligence that Vignoles and Xaintrailles approached, with 1200 men, he raised the siege, to go and meet them; and a bloody battle ensued, wherein the earl of Arundel was mortally wounded, and made prisoner; who died, a few days after, to the great grief of the regent. 1434.

About the same time, the earl of Clermont, now duke of Bourbon, by his father's death, became master of Corbeil and Brie Compte-Robert, sold him by the governors; and a Scotch officer found also means to take Vincennes, but could not keep it.

Talbot arrives in France, and retakes several places.

In the mean while, Talbot, arriving from England, with 3 or 4000 men, to whom he joined some other troops, drawn out of the garrisons, became master of the field, so that all the French vanished before him; for, with little opposition, he retook Beaumont upon Oyse, Creil, Pont St. Maxence, and Clermont, in Beauvoisis. He even began the siege of Beauvais, but the extremity of the weather obliged him to desist; and, during these inconsiderable exploits, king Charles went into Languedoc and Dauphine.

Charles's advantages in the continuation of the war. Stow.

The frost, which was very severe, about the end of this year, and the beginning of the next, did not prevent the two parties from continuing the war, all the winter, by sieges, and surprisings of several places; but the French had a great advantage, in that most of the English towns thought of returning to the obedience of king Charles, because the affairs of the English were gone to decay; but it was not from these progresses, that Charles hoped to conclude the war. It must have been long, before he could have taken, one by one, all the places possessed by the English, in France; but the congress, which was to be, at Arras, promised him much more beneficial successes, since he was sure of making a peace with the duke of Burgundy.

The congress of Arras. Monstrelet.

The news being spread over Europe, that a peace, between France and England, was about to be negotiated, at Arras, there was hardly a sovereign prince that was not desirous of sending ambassadors; and pope Eugenius II. and the council of Basil, still at variance, sent theirs also, but separately. From the pope came the cardinal Santa Cruz; and from the council the cardinals of Cyprus and Arles. King Charles sent 17 plenipotentiaries; the principal of whom was the constable Richemont. Henry appointed 27, for France and England, of whom the duke of Burgundy was the first, impowering eight of them, viz. four English and four French (among whom were to be the duke of Burgundy and the archbishop of York) to sign the peace; and the same power was afterwards given to the cardinal of Winchester. Hitherto, the duke of Bedford and the council of England had no 1435.

1435. ſuſpicion of the duke of Burgundy's ſincerity; which appears from his being truſted with the ſecret of the ambaſſy, ſince nothing could be treated, or concluded, without him; and it cannot be denied, that the duke acted a baſe part, in this congreſs. However, ſoon after, private advice was received, in England, that he had deſired the pope to abſolve him from his oath to Henry V; upon which, the king wrote to the pope, to know the truth. Eugenius replied, that no French prince had ever applied to him, on any ſuch account, that he had never granted ſuch a diſpenſation, and, for the future, would behave, in that reſpect, ſo as to give the king entire ſatisfaction; but, how he performed his promiſe, the ſequel will inform us.

Charles's propoſals for peace. Du Tillet. Hall.

The congreſs of Arras was opened, on the 6th of Auguſt; and it began with king Charles's propoſals. His ambaſſadors offered, in his name, to king Henry, Normandy and Guienne, provided he would renounce the title of king of France, and do homage for thoſe two provinces: That is, he offered, as a favour, the two provinces which the king of England was entirely poſſeſſed of; a favour, which he was to purchaſe with the reſignation of the title of king of France, and a great part of the kingdom ſtill in his poſſeſſion. If there was no other proof of Charles's being certain of gaining the duke of Burgundy from the Engliſh, this alone would be ſufficient; for otherwiſe, how could Charles, who, for three years paſt, was in no condition to bring an army into the field, make ſuch a propoſal? but, as was obſerved, it was not his deſign to conclude a peace with the Engliſh, but only to furniſh the duke of Burgundy with a pretence to proceed, as he had reſolved. The ambaſſadors of England, ſurpriſed at an offer, ſo remote from what the duke of Orleans had led them to expect, on a ſudden, broke off the conference, and withdrew, extremely diſſatisfied, without vouchſafing an anſwer. Several French writers diſplay their eloquence, on this occaſion, to ſhew to what height the Engliſh had carried their pride and inſolence, in rejecting ſo reaſonable offers; a remarkable inſtance of the uſual prejudice of hiſtorians, in favour of their own nation.

The duke of Burgundy makes a ſeparate peace with Charles.

The retreat of the Engliſh did not ſurpriſe either the duke of Burgundy, or the French ambaſſadors; who muſt have foreſeen, that ſuch offers would be refuſed. Nay, it may be aſſerted, on the contrary, that, in making them, conſidering the poſture of affairs, their ſole view was to induce the Engliſh ambaſſadors to withdraw; yet this abrupt departure was highly exaggerated, and repreſented, as an undeniable evidence, that they never intended to make peace; and this alſo gave the duke of Burgundy a pretence, to conclude a ſeparate treaty with king Charles. He pretended that he was not obliged to render the war everlaſting, in complaiſance to their humour; and, upon this foundation, the pope's legate abſolved him from all his oaths, as well to the late as to the preſent king of England; after which, as all the articles were previouſly ſettled, his ſeparate peace was ſoon concluded. 1435. No king of France had ever made ſuch a diſhonourable peace; for Charles was bound, by this treaty, to diſown the murder of duke John, to deliver up the murderers, or, if this was impracticable, to baniſh them the realm. He likewiſe engaged to found certain chapels, where the ſoul of the deceaſed was to be prayed for, day and night; and he conſented, that the duke of Burgundy ſhould nominate the prieſts that were to officiate, and a croſs ſhould be erected, on Montereau-bridge, for a ſtanding monument of the reputarion of the murder. Moreover, he promiſed to pay 50,000 crowns of gold, for duke John's equipage, which was pillaged, and to reſign to the duke of Burgundy certain towns, for the charges of the war; and, laſtly, he freed him from all homage, during life. The duke agreed, on his part, that the king might redeem the towns of St. Quentin, Peronne, Amiens, and Corbie, ſituated on the Somme, for 400,000 crowns; which ſhews, that the duke was not very ſcrupulous, ſince he ſold to France places, held only by the bounty of the king of England, purſuant to his engagement with the duke of Bedford. It may be proper alſo to remark, that the ſervice done by the duke to France, in making a ſeparate peace, greatly outweighed, in the opinion of the French hiſtorians, all his proceedings againſt her; and this has made them extremely cautious in their expreſſions, before the treaty of Arras, leſt their language ſhould diſagree with what they had to ſay afterwards; but, after this happy peace, they have extolled to the skies his goodneſs, wiſdom, and probity. However, this was the very man, who, to gratify his revenge, had ruined France; and he found no other way, to repair his fault, than by a notorious treachery to England. What would the French have ſaid, if he had always firmly adhered to the Engliſh? I am ſorry to be obliged to ſpeak, thus, of a prince, who was ſirnamed the Good; but it is of uſe to prove, how the ſirnames and encomiums, beſtowed on princes, ſometimes contradict their real character.

I ſhall paſs over the diſpenſation granted to the duke of Burgundy, leaving every one to his own reflections upon it; and only add, that, in November, was publiſhed, in England, pope Eugenius's foreſaid letter, atteſted by the king; and, probably, it was intended for an indirect information of the court of Rome's ſincerity. Act. Pub.

The treaty of Arras changes the affairs of the Engliſh for the worſe. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The Engliſh no ſooner loſt the aſſiſtance of the duke of Burgundy, than their affairs began ſo viſibly to decline, as to portend their ſudden ruin; for, as they had not troops ſufficient to defend all their towns, they were obliged to rely on the loyalty of the inhabitants, who very frequently proved falſe; and, on the other hand, the places upon the Somme, reſigned to the duke of Burgundy, being now againſt them, it was neceſſary for them to provide for that quarter, leſt they might be uſed to invade the neighbouring provinces; ſo that their whole attention was confined 1435. confined to the preſervation of Normandy and Paris, it being impoſſible to take care of all, by reaſon of the continual defection of the towns truſted to the inhabitants. Houdan, St. Denis, Pontoiſe, Melun, Pont St. Maxence, and Meulant, voluntarily ſurrendered to the French, during the congreſs of Arras, or a little before; but the duke of Bedford, retaking St. Denis, razed the walls; and then he ordered Meulant to be inveſted, but the baſtard of Orleans raiſed the ſiege. The lord of Chatillon, governor of Epernay, for the Engliſh, going out of the town, found the gates ſhut againſt him, at his return; and the inhabitants called in the French.

The death of queen Iſabella of Bavaria. Monſtrelet.

Iſabella, queen dowager of France, perceiving the proſperity of the king, her ſon, whom ſhe mortally deteſted, and the deſperate condition of the Engliſh, died, at Paris, with vexation, 12 days after the concluſion of the treaty of Arras. She was univerſally hated by the French, who regarded her, as the principal cauſe of the ruin of the kingdom; and the Engliſh had very little eſteem for her; at leaſt, they did not ſhew much regard for her, ſince ſhe was become unſerviceable to them.

The death of the duke of Bedford. Hall. Sandford.

Her death was of no conſequence to either party; but the deceaſe of the duke of Bedford, on the 14th of the ſame month, at Roan, was of the laſt importance. In all probability, his indignation to be, thus, impoſed upon by king Charles, and the duke of Burgundy, occaſioned the ſickneſs, of which he died, four days before the concluſion of the treaty of Arras, the fatal news of which he expected, every moment; for he foreſaw, with a mortal concern, that king Henry's affairs were upon the point of being irretrievably reduced to a very deplorable condition. During the whole courſe of his adminiſtration, he behaved, with ſo much wiſdom and prudence, as juſtly ranked him among the greateſt men of the age; and his valour, and other martial virtues, ſhone, with no leſs luſtre, on all occaſions, where he commanded, in perſon. Had he been well aſſiſted by England, he would, probably, have compleated the war, to his own glory, and the king's advantage; ſince he had every qualification proper to accompliſh the greateſt undertakings; but, unhappily for him, he was abandoned, when he, moſt of all, wanted aſſiſtance. The only thing, he could be charged with, was his ſuffering himſelf to be ſurpriſed, in the affair of the congreſs of Arras; but is there any man, that can always guard againſt treachery? Nothing better demonſtrates the eſteem, due to this renowned prince, than the regard Lewis XI, ſon of Charles VII, expreſſed for him, when he could have no inducement to flatter him; who being, one day, in the church of Roan, and looking upon the duke of Bedford's tomb, a certain lord of his retinue adviſed him, to demoliſh that ſtanding monument of the diſhonour of the French. "No, replied the "king, let the aſhes of a prince reſt in peace, "who, were he alive, would make the "boldeſt of us tremble; I rather wiſh, that "a more magnificent monument was erected "to his honour.

The duke of York is appointed regent of France.

Upon the duke of Bedford's death, the duke of York was, immediately, appointed regent of France; but Edmund Beaufort, aſpiring to that dignity, ſo managed, by his intrigues, that his rival's patent was long deferred. Probably, he expected to obtain a change, in his favour; but this delay proved extremely prejudicial to the king's affairs, as the relation of the occurrences of the next year will inform us.

All England was extremely incenſed, at the news of the duke of Burgundy's defection; and the moſt opprobrious names were, there, liberally beſtowed upon him. In the interim, the duke, to ſhew ſtill ſome regard for Henry, ſent two heralds, to excuſe him, for concluding a ſeparate peace; pretending that his ſubjects were exceedingly oppreſſed, by the continuance of the war. This is the uſual pretence for a peace, tho' generally the intereſts of the poor people are overlooked, when a war is undertaken; and the duke likewiſe offered his mediation to Henry, if he deſired to conclude a peace with king Charles. This offer was conſidered, as a freſh inſult; and, indeed, what could be expected from the mediation of a prince, who had ſo openly ſacrificed the intereſt of England to his own advantage? Accordingly, no anſwer was returned to his letters; which, beſides, were writ in a ſtile very different from what he had, hitherto, uſed; and his heralds were received with indignity. The law of nations had like to have been violated, on their account, and all the Flemings and Burgundians, then in England, torn in pieces by the populace; ſo highly were they inraged againſt their prince; but this behaviour was very ſerviceable to the duke. He only wanted a pretence to join the French; and he did not fail to find one, in the inſults upon his heralds and ſubjects; for, in May, this very year, he ſent the conſtable Richemont 500 lances, under the earl of Lalain, by which he openly declared himſelf an enemy to the king of England.

The conſtable approaches Paris. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The conſtable, joining this aid to 6 or 7000 men, drawn together from other places, approached Paris, where no more than 1500 Engliſh remained, under Sir Richard Woodville; and, beſides, the conſtable held intelligence with the inhabitants, who, being almoſt all attached to the duke of Burgundy, ſided with England, purely out of reſpect to that prince. Whilſt he adhered to king Henry, Paris wanted no other guard, but her own citizens; but, upon his declaring for king Charles, they all changed with him; ſo that it was no wonder, if 1500 Engliſh could not keep them in awe. The death of the duke of Bedford, the abſence of the new regent, and the little care taken, to ſend ſuccours from England, diſabling the Engliſh to keep an army in the field, the conſtable proceeded on his march, without the leaſt oppoſition; he took ſeveral ſmall places, near Paris, and ſlew 500 of a detachment, ſent by the governor to throw themſelves into St. Denis;

1436. nis; and then he encamped, at the very gates of Paris, with his little army. In the mean while, there were continual parlies between the burghers and beſiegers, the governor being in no condition to prevent it; and, at length, the whole city roſe in arms, whilſt the marſhal de l' Iſle Adam ſcaled the walls. The garriſon, advancing to repulſe the aſſault, were pelted with a ſhower of ſtones from the windows, whilſt all the city reſounded with, "Long live the king, and the duke of Bur-"gundy." The governor, finding it in vain to reſiſt ſo many enemies, retired into the Baſtile, with all his people; and, immediately all the ſtreets were chained, to hinder his return. In the interim, l' Iſle Adam entered the city, with eaſe, and opened the gates to the conſtable; and, thus, Paris was taken, for king Charles, by the very l' Iſle Adam, who had ſurpriſed it, in the ſame manner, 17 years before, for the duke of Burgundy. The Baſtile, which might have held a long ſiege, had it been well ſtored with proviſions, was ſo deſtitute, that it could hold out only three days; and it was very well for the governor, that he could obtain an honourable capitulation.

England thinks of a peace.

The decline of the affairs of the Engliſh was ſo viſible, that the council of England were extremely deſirous of a peace; for the war, in France, no longer concerned the conqueſt of that kingdom, as in the reign of Henry V, and till the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans; and the little that king Henry could expect to preſerve, by vigorouſly carrying it on, coſt England immenſe ſums. This was a very ſpecious reaſon, to perſuade the publick, that it was neceſſary ſeriouſly to think of a peace; I ſay, a ſpecious reaſon, becauſe it was not the real motive of the council's proceedings, The cardinal of Wincheſter had, for ſume time, gained ground upon the duke of Glouceſter, his rival; and the council, at length, was filled with his creatures, who, no more than himſelf, found their own advantage, in the continuation of the war; which, being unſucceſsful, rendered them odious to the people. Coin was become exceeding ſcarce, in England; and yet the council was obliged continually to project means, to raiſe money, which of courſe, occaſioned great murmurings; and, on the other hand, the cardinal was in hopes of ruining his enemy more eaſily, during a peace, becauſe the war, and the unexpected accidents thence ariſing, rendered the perſon and councils of the duke of Glouceſter abſolutely neceſſary. In a word, as theduke was ever of opinion, that vigorous efforts ſhould be uſed, to recover what was loſt, in France, this was an argumenr for the contrary party to inſiſt, with the ſame earneſtneſs, upon the neceſſity of concluding a peace; and, this opinion prevailing in the council, the duke of York, whoſe commiſſion to be regent of France, was, at laſt, ſigned, had inſtructions and full power, to treat with king Charles, if he ſaw any proſpect of ſucceſs; moreover, on ſuppoſition of a negotiation. the council impowered the cardinal of Wincheſter and the duke of Burgundy, jointly to treat of king Henry's marriage with one of his adverſary's daughters.

The duke of York drives the French out of Normandy. Monſtrelet.

Soon after, the duke of York embarqued for France, and landed, in Normandy, a good body of troops, with which he retook many ſmall places, or caſtles, ſeized by the French, ſince the death of the duke of Bedford; and, among the reſt, Feſcamp was recovered by the regent, but, preſently after, retaken by ſcalade.

The duke of Burgundy prepares to beſiege Calais. Monſtrelet.

Tho' the duke of York was maſter of the field, in Normandy, and about Paris, it gave him not a little uneaſineſs to hear from all parts, that the duke of Burgundy was drawing all his forces together, in Picardy, and making great preparations for a ſiege; and, as theſe preparations could be deſigned only againſt Calais, he ſent notice to the council of England, that they might provide, in time, againſt the threatened ſiege. Indeed, a powerful fleet, a great train of artillery, and an army of 50,000 men, aſſembled by the duke of Burgundy, were evident proofs, of his reſolution not to be diſappointed, in the deſign he had formed; and this news flying to England, the whole nation was alarmed, and, more than ever, exaſperated againſt the duke of Burgundy. The council, trembling for Calais, the firſt conqueſt of the Engliſh, in France, reſolved to do all that was poſſible, to preſerve it; and, with this view, they ordered 15000 men to be raiſed, and petitioned the duke of Glouceſter to undertake the relief of that place. Fifteen thouſand men were ſcarce ſufficient for ſuch an undertaking; but it was expected, that the regent would join them, with all his forces; and, beſides, the enemy's army was known to conſiſt almoſt entirely of the militia of Flanders, who were very little valued.

Henry diſpoſes of Boulogne and Flanders. Act. Pub.

Whilſt the troops were levying, with the utmoſt diligence, the king, by the advice of his council, to expreſs his reſentment againſt the duke of Burgundy, granted, by letters under his great ſeal, the earldom of Boulogne to the lord Beaumont, and Flanders to the duke of Glouceſter; but it was eaſier to give them, in parchment, than to wreſt them out of the hands of the poſſeſſor.

The duke of Glouceſter comes before Calais. Monſtrelet.

All things being in a readineſs, for the departure of the army, intended for the relief of Calais, the duke of Glouceſter ſet ſail, and landed, in Normandy, the beginning of October. The duke of Burgundy had now been, before Calais, ſix weeks, with his numerous army, and vigorouſly carried on the ſiege; and the beſieged made as brave a defence. In the interim, the duke, tho' he hoped to acquire immortal glory, by taking one of the ſtrongeſt pleaces, in Europe, was yet very far from ſucceeding; nay he began to perceive, that the attempt was impracticable; and, his fleet, by the unskilfulneſs of the pilots, or ſome other accident, comnig too near the town, at low water, run on ground, and was reduced to aſhes, before his eyes, by the beſieged. This was a very mortifying accident, but a worſe befel him, preſently after; for, a rumour being ſpread in the army, that the duke of Glouceſter was approaching, to relieve 1436. lieve the town, the Flemings, diſheartened by the fatigues of the ſiege, and terrified, at the approach of the Engliſh, ſuddenly unpitched their tents, and began to retire. The duke endeavoured to remove their fears, but to no purpoſe; and, the ſcouts of the Engliſh army beginning to appear, it was ſtill leſs practicable for the duke to ſtop his diſpirited troops, who ſought only to avoid a battle; ſo that the duke was forced to follow them, in their retreat, which was made in great diſorder, tho' with ſo much ſpeed, as to prevent the Engliſh from taking any advantage. He was farther mortified to receive a defiance from the duke of Glouceſter, offering him battle, and not to be in a condition to accept it, tho' his army was much ſuperior to that of his enemy. Moreover, he was ſcarce returned into his own country, when the towns of Flanders revolted againſt him; he was even in danger of loſing his life, at Bruges, in a ſeditious tumult of the inhabitants; and he was himſelf wounded, after ſeeing, with grief, l' Iſle Adam torn in pieces by the mutinous populace. In the interim, the duke of Glouceſter over-ran Artois, Flanders, and Hainault, and carried off 1200 waggon-loads of booty; and thenceforward, the duke of Burgundy had ſo much diſturbance, at home, that he was but little ſerviceable to king Charles.

The marriage of Lewis, the dauphin.

In June, this year, Lewis, the dauphin, ſon to king Charles, married Margaret of Scotland, daughter to James I, about 12 years of age.

1437. The death of the two queen dowagers of England.

The beginning of 1437 was remarkable, for the death of Joan of Navarre, and Catharine of France *, both queen dowagers of England; the one widow to Henry IV, and the other to Henry V, who had eſpouſed Owen Tudor, a Welch gentleman, deſcended, as it is reported, from the antient kings of Wales. I do not know, whether, in thoſe days, this deſcent was much regarded, or was attempted to be traced, till after the crown was devolved to the family of the Tudors, by the advancement of Henry VII. to the throne; but, however that be, when queen Catharine married Owen Tudor, the marriage ſeemed ſo unſuitable, that all England was offended at it; and the more, as it was made, unknown to the duke of Glouceſter, then protector; but that prince's veneration, for the memory of the king, his brother, prevented him, from giving the queen, his ſiſter-in-law, any trouble. Upon her deceaſe, the council thought it their duty to puniſh her ſecond huſband, for his raſhneſs, in preſuming to eſpouſe the king's mother, without the conſent of thoſe who governed the kingdom, and ordered him to be ſent to the tower; yet, ſome time after, Tudor made his eſcape, but was taken, and put under cloſer confinement. Some affirm, that he eſcaped, a ſecond time, but, being retaken, was beheaded; whilſt others ſay, that he did not loſe his head, till 1460, upon being taken in battle, fighting for the houſe of Lancaſter. I cannot tell, whether it be certain, that Tudor was put to death; but it may be ſaid, that they, who ſay it was, in 1460, miſtake Owen Tudor, his third ſon, for Owen Tudor, the father. 1437.

Tudor's iſſue by queen Catharine Sandford.

Tudor had, by queen Catharine, three ſons, Edmund, Jaſper, and Owen; and the eldeſt was created earl of Richmond by Henry VI, his half-brother, who gave him in marriage Margaret, only daughter to John, duke of Somerſet; from whom deſcended Henry, earl of Richmond, whom we ſhall ſee, hereafter, aſcend the throne of England, by the name of Henry VII, all the male heirs of the houſe of Lancaſter being extinct. Jaſper, the ſecond ſon, was made earl of Pembroke; and Owen, the youngeſt, loſt his head on the ſcaffold, in 1460.

The ſecond marriage of the ducheſs of Bedford. Act. Pub.

Jacquelina of Luxemburgh, widow to the duke of Bedford, followed the example of queen Catharine; and, after the death of the prince, her husband, ſhe eſpouſed Sir Richard Woodville, who was only a knight, and much her inferior. This match was almoſt as unſuitable as queen Catharine's; for it was not only made, without the king's licenſe, but alſo contrary to Jacquelina's expreſs oath, not to marry, without his permiſſion; ſo that both the bride and bridegroom would have been liable to the rigour of the law, had not the king been pleaſed to forgive them.

The death of the king of Scotland.

On the 19th of February, James I, of Scotland, was murdered, in his bed, by aſſaſſins ſuborned by the earl of Athol, his uncle; and James II, his ſon, ſeven years old, was his ſucceſſor, under the guardianſhip of Joan of Somerſet, his mother, who was herſelf wounded, by endeavouring to ſave the king, her husband; but it is, now, time to return to what paſſed, in France.

The affairs of the Engliſh, in France, begin to have a better face.

After the arrival of the duke of York from England, the affairs of the Engliſh began to be upon a better footing. King Charles, ever a ſlave to his pleaſures, had no conſiderable body of troops in the field; and the revolt of the Flemings hindered the duke of Burgundy from ſending him any aſſiſtance. Indeed, the towns, that had voluntarily ſurrendered to him, conſiderably ſtrengthened his party; but, at the ſame time, his army was much weakened, on account of the garriſons he was obliged to keep. As matters then ſtood, in France, both monarchs had almoſt equal reaſon to fear the diſloyalty of their adherents; who, for the moſt part, were attached rather to the fortune of their maſter, than to his perſon, or the juſtice of his cauſe; ſo that the preſervation of the towns, they were poſſeſſed of, entirely depended upon the ſtrength of the garriſons.

The firſt months of this year, the cold was ſo exceſſive, that the generals, on both ſides,

* Queen Catharine died, January 3, 1437, in the monaſtery, of Bermondſey, in Southwark; and, on the 18th of February, her body was brought to St. Catharine's by the tower, from thence to St. Paul's, and ſo to Weſtminſter-abbey, where it was interred; but, her corpſe being taken up, in the reign of Henry VII, when he laid the foundation of his new chapel there, ſhe was never ſince buried; but ſhe remaineth ſtill above ground, in a coffin of boards, near the ſepulchre of Henry V, her firſt husband. Sandf. Geneal.

1437. did not appear desirous of forming any enterprize, till it should be abated; however, Talbot, who found nothing impossible, reaped a considerable advantage from the French, caused by the severity of the season. On Shrove-Tuesday, at night, he scaled Pontoise, by means of the ditches being frozen, and carried it, whilst the garrison and inhabitants were wholly intent upon their diversions. The taking of this important place was a great blow to king Charles; especially, as it extremely annoyed the Parisians, who were exposed to the continual incursions of the new English garrison, to the very gates of Paris.

The French, in some measure, repaired this loss, by the acquisition of Dreux and Chevreuse, sold them by the governors.

The duke of Burgundy rouses king Charles.

The superiority the English had recovered, in France, rendered the duke of Burgundy apprehensive of some fatal revolution; being sensible that, without his aid, king Charles could never end the war; and, as he had openly declared against the English, it was his interest that they should be entirely expelled the kingdom. In the mean while, it grieved him to act alone, for the benefit of a prince, whose indolence kept him from all the enterprizes, where he ought to have been the principal actor; but the duke, in order to rouse him out of this lethargy, represented to him, that his honour and interest called upon him to assemble all his forces, put himself at their head, and approach Paris, to drive his enemies out of the heart of his kingdom; and, at the same time, he offered to make a powerful diversion, in Picardy, to favour his undertakings.

Charles heads his army.

No prince was ever less inclined to war than Charles VII. and yet never did any king of France make greater conquests than he, since it may be said, that he conquered his whole kingdom; but it was chiefly by his generals, who, most of them, were men of eminent merit. The duke of Burgundy's remonstrances and proposals having raised him from his sloth, he drew all his forces together, to approach Paris, where he was greatly wanted; and, by the way, he attacked Montereau-Faut-Yonne, whilst the duke of Burgundy besieged Crotoy, a strong place, in Picardy.

Crotoy is infested by the duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub.

It was about the end of August, when the duke of Burgundy invested Crotoy, with a numerous army, whilst four French ships blocked up the place, by sea; and the duke of York, being recalled by the intrigues of the earl of Somerset, his enemy, was about to depart, and only waited for the arrival of the earl of Warwick, who was to succeed him in the regency; wherefore, not being able to undertake the relief of Crotoy, in person, he commissioned the valiant Talbot, for that purpose, whose name alone was sufficient to intimidate the enemies of the English. Talbot, at the head of 5000 men, boldly advanced towards Crotoy, to relieve it, tho' the river Somme parted him from the duke of Burgundy's camp round the town, which was on the other side; but the duke, hearing of his march, left part of his troops, at the siege, and, with the rest, posted himself, on the river-side, to oppose his passage. Such was the aversion of the English to this prince, that they thought nothing impracticable, when an opportunity offered to be revenged; and Talbot, improving this disposition, rushed first into the river, sword in hand, and, by his intrepidity, so animated his troops, that they instantly followed him; and, the more bold, or rather rash, this action was, the more it astonished the Burgundians, who, fancying they had to deal with devils rather than men, took to flight; and, their terror infecting those, that were left at the siege, the whole army ran away, and it was not in the duke of Burgundy's power to rally them. At the same time, the duke of York appeared, with seven men of war, in sight of four French ships, and chaced them so briskly, that they very narrowly escaped to St. Valery. Talbot entered the town, in triumph; and, after levelling the trenches of the besiegers, he marched back to Normandy. In his return, he conquered five or six small places, in Picardy; and, retaking, once more, Tancarville, in Normandy, he entered Roan, covered with glory. 1437.

The success of the siege of Montereau. Monstrelet.

The success of the siege of Montereau was not so favourable to the English; yet it was not inglorious; for Thomas Gerard, governor of that poor place, made a long defence, in spite of the vigorous efforts of the besiegers, tho' he had only 400 men. Hitherto, king Charles was not remarkable, for his valour; but, at this siege, he performed such exploits, as began to conveigh a higher idea of his courage; and, after a pretty long siege, he took the town, by storm, having been himself one of the first to mount the breach, and fight, hand to hand, with those that defended it. Doubtless, he had been told, that it was necessary to procure the esteem of his subjects, by some extraordinary action; and the intrepidity, he discovered, on this occasion, greatly redounded to his advantage; for, henceforward, his friends, as well as enemies, entertained very different thoughts of him from those they had before. In the interim, the garrison retiring into the castle, a second siege was to be formed; but Charles, with the glory acquired, in the first, and, perhaps, discouraged with the fatigues he had endured, left the management of this to the dauphin, his son. Gerard, who was no less brave than experienced, held out, 15 days longer, and then was forced to capitulate; but, when he came before the dauphin, he very politely told him, that, against any other but him, he should have been able to make a longer defence; which compliment was well received by the young prince, who was pleased to see himself set, in some degree, above the king, his father; but Charles, being informed of it, was extremely mortified; and it is said, that, from this time, he began to be jealous of the prince, his son, which proved very fatal to him.

Whilst the war continued, in France, the duke of Orleans, a prisoner, in England, projected means to obtain his liberty; and nothing 1437. thing but a peace, between the two kings, could poſſibly procure it; wherefore, no one was more concerned than he, to attempt to ſet on foot a freſh negotiation. With this view, he deſired leave to go and confer with the duke of Bretagne, at Calais, who was thought to be the only prince, that could be employed, as mediator; and the council, being all inclined to peace, would have readily granted his deſire; but it was judged neceſſary to ſee firſt, how Charles was diſpoſed; moreover, the duke of Glouceſter was of opinion, that a peace was not to be thought of, till it could be made, with advantage.

The cardinal gains ground upon the duke of Glouceſter.

In the mean time, as the king advanced in age, the credit of the duke, his uncle, ſenſibly declined; and that of the cardinal of Wincheſter daily increaſed. The cardinal had gained ground upon his adverſary, in that his riches enabled him often to lend the king money; for the kingdom was ſo exhauſted, that aids of this ſort were conſidered, as the greateſt ſervice to the ſtate. He artfully improved the king's diſpoſition towards him, to prevent any freſh attacks from the duke of Glouceſter; for, by letters under the great ſeal, the king granted him a general pardon, for all offences whatever, to the 26th of June, 1437.

1438. A plague and famine in England and France. Hall. Monſtrelet.

The year 1438 abounded with few memorable events; for a terrible famine, raging, at the ſame time, in France and England, and followed by a plague, hindered the generals, on both ſides, from forming any great projects. However, there were ſome unſucceſsful attempts, and others inconſiderable; but I ſhall only take notice of the moſt remarkable. Surienne, governor of Montargis, for the Engliſh, being ſurrounded with the enemy's towns, and receiving no aſſiſtance from England, ſurrendered that place to the French, for 10,000 ſalutes of gold; which, at preſent, was of little importance to the Engliſh, ſince they could not poſſibly carry the war from that quarter; but, ſhortly after, Edmund, earl of Mortagne, brother to the earl of Somerſet, leading ſome troops from England, and joining Talbot, they made ſome inconſiderable conqueſts, in Normandy.

The duke of Burgundy makes another attempt upon Calais.

The duke of Burgundy's diſgrace, before Calais, grieving him extremely, he wanted to repair it, by taking that place; but, as it was difficult to take it, by a ſiege, in form, he reſolved to make uſe of another method. He was informed, that, by digging through a certain bank, the town would be infallibly overflowed; and that, lying within diſtance, with an able body of troops, it would be eaſy to enter it, amidſt the conſternation of the garriſon and inhabitants. This project was executed; but, the ſea being lower than the town, all the water ran out; and the duke, being diſappointed, reſolved to attempt the ſiege of Guiſnes. However, the earl of Huntingdon, coming very ſeaſonably from England, with a ſupply of troops, obliged him to retire; and the troubles, which were, ſoon after, rekindled, in Flanders, found him ſo much employment, for ſome years, that he had no leiſure to form any new deſigns againſt the Engliſh.

1438. The truce is renewed with Scotland. Act. Pub.

The dauphin's marriage raiſed ſuch a jealouſy in the Engliſh, that, after ſeveral inſults, on both ſides, England and Scotland came, at length, to an open rupture; but, in the interim, the minority of James II, and the favourable diſpoſition of the queen-mother to the Engliſh, her country-men, procured a nine years truce, from the 1ſt of May, 1438.

The duke of Somerſet's brother is exchanged for the earl of Eu.

John and Thomas Beaufort, brothers to the earl of Somerſet, having been long priſoners, in France, it had been often attempted, to exchange them for others of the French, but to no purpoſe. By the agreement, in 1430, with the duke of Bourbon, that prince had engaged, to procure their releaſe, without ranſom; but, as that agreement was never put in execution, they remained priſoners. I am ignorant, what became of Thomas, who bore the title of earl of Perth; perhaps, he died, during his captivity; but, this year, John was exchanged for the earl of Eu, of the houſe of Artois, who had been confined, in England, ever ſince the battle of Azincourt. He afterwards became duke of Somerſet, upon the deceaſe of Henry, his elder brother; and there was alſo a fourth brother, named Edmund, who ſucceeded them, and, of whom, much will be ſaid, in the ſequel of this reign.

1439. The conſtable Richemont beſieges Meaux, and takes it, by ſtorm. Monſtrelet.

The famine and plague ceaſing, in England and France, both ſides took up arms again; and, in March, 1439, the conſtable Richemont, at the head of a powerful army, beſieged Meaux, one of the ſtrongeſt places, in France, which had formerly held out, ſeven months, againſt Henry V. The baſtard de Thian, an officer of diſtinguiſhed bravery, was governor; who made ſuch a gallant defence, as aſtoniſhed the conſtable. However, after a three weeks ſiege, the city was taken, by ſtorm; but the work was but half finiſhed, ſince the garriſon retired into the market, for ſo that part of the city is called, which is ſeparated from the other, by the Marne. The Engliſh breaking down the bridge of communication, the conſtable was conſtrained to begin, on the other ſide of the river, a ſecond ſiege much more difficult than the former; which very thing happened to Henry V, when he inveſted this place; but the conſtable, having taken the governor priſoner, in the aſſault, cut off his head, becauſe he was a Frenchman. This is what king Charles's generals had not, hitherto, ventured to practiſe, on account of the great number of priſoners in the hands of the Engliſh; yet they no ſooner found themſelves ſtrongeſt, than they overlooked that conſideration, being no longer apprehenſive of reprizals.

Talbot throws in ſuccours. Monſtrelet.

The difficulties of the ſiege of the market of Meaux daily increaſing, the conſtable drew round his camp lines with redoubts, to prevent all relief; and the king came to the army, to animate the troops by his preſence. In the mean time, Talbot, who did not doubt, that the beſieged would make a long reſiſtance, was prepared to relieve them; and, however difficult this undertaking ſeemed, he 1439. he did not fail to attempt it. The obſtacles he foreſaw ſerved only to invigorate him, the more; for, with a good body of choſen troops, he boldly advanced towards the beſiegers lines; and, aſſaulting and taking one of the redoubts, that obſtructed his paſſage, he entered the place, with a convoy. On the morrow, he ſallied out, whilſt the beſiegers were ſtill diſmayed, at the action of the preceding day, to prepare for a freſh effort; but the conſtable, incenſed to receive ſuch a diſgrace from a handful of men, ſo vigorouſly preſſed the place, that the garriſon were compelled to capitulate, before the ſuccours could be ready.

Talbot raiſes the ſiege of Avranche. Hall.

The ſiege of Avranche was not attended with the ſame ſucceſs; for, after the conſtable had been, three weeks, before that place, Talbot, with the troops deſigned for the relief of Meaux, attacked and forced the lines of the beſiegers, and ſupplied the town with proviſions.

and beſieges Harfleur. Monſtrelet. Stow.

Talbot, perceiving that, after this exploit, the French were diſheartened, and their troops ſo weakened, that they could not withſtand him, appeared, before Harfleur; but, his army not being in a condition to form a ſiege, he choſe to block up the town. With this view, he ſo intrenched himſelf, in an advantageous poſt, that an army of 50,000 men was incapable of forcing him; and the earl of Somerſet kept the place blocked up, by ſea. The earl of Eu, lately arrived from England, where he had been long a priſoner, approached, to attack the intrenchments of the Engliſh; but, finding it impracticable, he retired, after a faint attempt, in which Gaucour was taken priſoner. At length, after a four months blockade, Talbot became maſter of this important place, the firſt conqueſt of Henry V. and he afterwards cleared Normandy of the garriſons, which the French ſtill kept, in ſeveral caſtles; ſo that nothing remained to them, in that province, except the town of Dieppe.

The diſpoſition of the duke of Burgundy.

The duke of Burgundy was concerned, to ſee the affairs of the Engliſh begin to be reſtored, and dreaded the conſequences; for king Charles waged war, in a very careleſs manner, and could ſcarce be prevailed on to head his army; and France was ſo ruined, that he could draw but few ſuccours from the provinces he poſſeſſed; whilſt, on the other hand, the war, in Flanders, wholly employing the duke, afforded him no proſpect of any conſiderable aſſiſtance from that quarter. If the Engliſh had, then, exerted themſelves, they would, probably, have recovered a great deal of ground; but, out of blindneſs, or inability, they made only faint efforts, being ſatisfied with ſending, from time to time, ſuch ſupplies, as were inſufficient to recover what they had loſt. Thus, on both ſides, it was manifeſt, that the war would be eternal, if it was continued, till one of the two kings ſhould loſe, one after another, the places in his poſſeſſion; for which reaſon, the duke of Burgundy reſolved either to procure a peace, if poſſible, between the two kings, or ſecure himſelf by a neutrality; but ſuch a deſign required great prudence and caution, in the management of it, leſt both parties ſhould agree, to his prejudice, or the Engliſh grow more reſerved, if they knew his intention. 1439.

They begin to talk of peace.

In the mean while, the pope exhorted the two kings, by the cardinal of Santa Cruz, to put a ſtop to the effuſion of chriſtian blood, ſhed in their quarrel; and he likewiſe wrote to the duke of Bretagne, deſiring him to be a mediator of peace. The duke, ſending to both monarchs, found them equally inclined to a treaty; and the duke of Burgundy gladly received the propoſal. The duke of Orleans offered, on this occaſion, his mediation to the king of England, jointly with the duke of Bretagne; and he renewed his inſtances, for leave to confer with the duke, at Calais. This was granted him, tho' the duke of Glouceſter oppoſed it, with all his might, becauſe he evidently perceived, that prince could not be an impartial mediator; but, for ſome time paſt, the duke of Glouceſter had loſt his intereſt, in the council, where it was even continually affected, to proceed contrary to his opinion. Beſides, the counſellors were ſo deſirous of peace, that they forgot, or were willing to forget, that the falſe ſtep taken, in ſending ambaſſadors to Arras, was altogether owing to the vain hopes given the duke of Orleans; ſo that this captive prince was conſidered, as a diſintereſted mediator, tho' it was obvious, that he was entirely byaſſed, in favour of king Charles. The duke of Burgundy was extremely well pleaſed with the preparations for a conference; which would either end in a peace, between the two kings, or give him a pretence, to conclude a ſeparate truce with England. The two courts being, thus, diſpoſed, commiſſioners were appointed, on both ſides, to ſettle the preliminary articles of the congreſs; who, being met, judged, that, to ſucceed in a negotiation of peace, a truce was abſolutely neceſſary; upon which, Henry impowered his to conſent to it, tho' ſome obſtacles occurred, that prevented the concluſion. What has been ſaid, about a peace, was tranſacted, in 1438; but I thought proper to defer ſpeaking of it, till now, that I might not interrupt the recital of what relates to this affair.

The place of the congreſs is appointed. Act. Pub.

In January, 1439, Iſabella of Portugal, ducheſs of Burgundy, and the cardinal of Winchester had an interview, between Calais and Graveline; the reſult of which was, that the two kings ſhould appoint a proper place to treat of a peace, with the mediation of the dukes of Bretagne and Orleans, and ſhould ſend their plenipotentiaries thither; and, accordingly, the very place, where the ducheſs and cardinal were, was choſen, and ambaſſadors were nominated, on both ſides. They were all choſen out of the princes and principal lords of both kingdoms; but, before we enter upon the ſucceſs of this congreſs, it will be expedient to ſee, how the council of England ſtood diſpoſed, with reſpect to a peace. Now, this manifeſtly appears from the ambaſſadors inſtructions, extant in the Collection 1439. tion of the Publick Acts; and these will shew, which of the two parties is to blamed, for breaking off the conference, and rectify several mistakes of the historians.

I. The ambassadors had orders to demand, that the king's adversary should leave him in peaceable possession of the whole kingdom of France; and they were to support this demand with several reasons, mentioned in the instructions, but too long to be inserted here; besides, the reader is no stranger to the foundation of the pretensions of the kings of England.

II. If the French should expostulate against this demand, as unreasonable, the ambassadors, after a previous protestation, were to offer Charles the provinces, beyond the Loire, which were of the king's demesne, but on the condition of homage.

III. If the adversaries refused this proposal, the cardinal of Winchester, as a clergyman, was to enlarge on the considerations proper to persuade the two nations to peace; which being many and long, I shall only relate the substance of the three principal. The first was, that the war, undertaken for the title of king of France, claimed by each of the two monarchs, had destroyed more men, than were in both kingdoms; the second was, that the two kings ought seriously to consider, that God made not the people for the sovereign, but the sovereign for the people; that is, to govern them, with justice and peace, that the subjects may be the better enabled to serve him; and the third was, that France had not been always governed by a single monarch; but, before and after Charlemain, there were often two, sometimes three, nay, four kings, at the same time.

IV. This last consideration was in order to proceed, in the fourth place, to another offer, which the ambassadors were impowered to propose; viz. that Henry would resign to Charles all the provinces, beyond the Loire, in full sovereignty; yet he expressly reserved Guienne, Poictou, and whatever was possessed by his ancestors, in France, before the crown of England devolved to them.

V. If this was rejected, the ambassadors had power to offer, from the king, their master, that he would be contented with what his ancestors enjoyed, in France, by right of inheritance, on condition that Calais, Guisnes, and the adjacent marches were added; and the whole, in full sovereignty, without any dependence upon the crown of France, or any person whatever, but God alone.

VI. If the French insisted, that Normandy should be restored to Charles, in the state it was in, before it was conquered by Henry V, that is, notwithstanding the grants of several lordships to private persons, as well by the late as the present king, this article might be allowed, rather than break off the conference.

VII. If Charles was brought to be satisfied with this proposal, provided Henry would renounce the title of king of France, in that case, the instructions afforded the plenipotentiaries many reasons and arguments to be alledged against that condition; but, in a word, they were ordered to leave this matter to the cardinal of Winchester, to whom the king had made known his pleasure. 1439.

It is evident, that the council had resolved to submit to this, if the peace could not otherwise be concluded; for, if Henry had absolutely refused to quit the title of king of France, there was no secret to be kept, and the instructions would have contained an express order, to reject the proposal.

The VIIIth article related to the king's marriage with one of Charles's daughters.

IX. If the French rejected all these proposals, and made any offers, on their part, the ambassadors, without accepting or refusing them, were to answer, that they had no instructions to treat of a peace, upon those grounds, but would acquaint their master with them.

X. In the interim, they were to propose, by the duchess of Burgundy, or the duke of Orleans, a 50 years truce, with a free communication between the two nations; and they were also impowered to reduce the truce to 20, 30, or 40 years; and, rather than fail, they might limit it from three years to eight, provided it was without communication.

XI. If the truce was accepted, they were to represent, that, for the better observance thereof, it would be expedient to make an exchange of some places; and, with this view, they were ordered to offer Meaux, Creil, and St. Germain in Laye, which were in the hands of the English, when these instructions were drawn, for Dieppe, le Mont St. Michael, and Harfleur, which Talbot had not yet taken.

XII. Lastly, the king, in order to facilitate the exchange of these places, agreed to release the duke of Orleans, for a ransom of 100,000 marks, and to abate 50,000, on account of the proposed exchange.

These instructions were drawn, May the 21st, 1439; and, if we had likewise those of Charles's plenipotentiaries, perhaps, we should find, that the two kings were not at so great a distance from each other, as it seemed, in the conference; but, as, on such occasions, the managers are chiefly sollicitous to be upon their guard, lest their secret instructions should be discovered, it frequently happens, that the negotiation is broke off, before there is occasion to shew all their concessions; so apprehensive are they of giving their adversaries the least advantage. This was really the case, in the present treaty; for the English did not think proper, to go beyond the second article of their instructions, viz. that Charles should have the provinces, beyond the Loire, on the condition of homage to Henry; expecting that the French would give them room, by their offers, to make some farther advances. For the same reason, the French adhered to the proposals made, at the congress of Arras, namely, that their master, remaining sole king of France, would resign 1439. Guienne and Normandy to Henry, on the the condition of homage; and they laid great ſtreſs upon this offer, and on Charles's condeſcenſion, in ſtanding to what he had offered, at the congreſs of Arras, tho' he had ſince made great conqueſts, and was become maſter of Paris.

The conference breaks up. Hall.

It was next to impoſſible, for a peace to be concluded, on the terms propoſed by both parties; for each prince offered to reſign only what was out of his power, and, by vertue of this pretended ceſſion, expected that the other ſhould diveſt himſelf of his actual poſſeſſions. This was properly, to deſire to gain, with the daſh of a pen, what they could have no hopes of obtaining, without many ſucceſsful ſieges and battles; ſo that, after the ambaſſadors of the two kings had long tried to diſcover, how far their adverſaries inſtructions allowed them to advance, they parted, without coming to any concluſion.

The dukes of Burgundy and Orleans were the only gainers by this congreſs; the firſt of whom wanted, at any rate, to eaſe his ſubjects, in Flanders, Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, who were great ſufferers, by the interruption of their commerce with England; and, with this view, he employed his ducheſs, who, being a near relation to Henry, was not ſuſpected by the Engliſh. Under the pretence of acting, as a mediatrix between the two kings, ſhe had frequent interviews with the cardinal of Wincheſter, and negotiated a trading-truce, between England and the Low-Countries; which appears from ſeveral papers of the Collection of the Publick Acts; and, indeed, this truce was concluded, preſently after.

1440. The temper of Henry and his court.

But the late congreſs was moſt beneficial to the duke of Orleans, ſince it procured him his liberty, after a 25 years captivity. It has been often obſerved, that there were two parties, in the court of England, viz. the duke of Glouceſter's and the cardinal of Wincheſter's; and that the latter gradually prevailed, ſince the king began to take notice of his affairs. Henry, now 19 years old, had a very mean genius, very little like his father's; and he eaſily ſuffered himſelf to be governed by thoſe about him. Inſtead of having the preſumption very common to young princes, he was ever diffident of himſelf; and he choſe rather to follow the counſels of others, than his own. However, he had principles of honour, virtue, and religion; which, indeed, made him wiſh, that he could always act juſtly; but they frequently furniſhed his counſellors with a pretence and foundation, to draw him into many unjuſt proceedings. As he wanted penetration, he was deceived with appearances; and of this his miniſters knew, how to take advantage, being aſſured of his incapacity to diſcern their ſelf-intereſted counſels. During his youth, he had contracted a habit of blindly following the ſuggeſtions of the duke of Glouceſter, his uncle, who governed, in his name; but he was no ſooner of an advanced age, than the cardinal of Wincheſter and his party inſinuated to him, that his uncle had formed deſigns deſtructive of his quiet, and intended to keep him always in guardianſhip; which diſcourſes, being often repeated, at length, produced the expected effect. At laſt, the king ſo deteſted the duke, that he no longer regarded him; and it was made a ſort of rule of to mortify him, upon all occaſions. His moving any thing, in council, was ſufficient to have it vigorouſly oppoſed; and the king generally countenanced the cardinal's party, leſt he ſhould give room to the duke, to keep him in ſubjection. Such, for ſome time, had been the ſtate of the king and the court. 1440.

The duke of Glouceſter is againſt releaſing the duke of Orleans.

The duke of Glouceſter continually oppoſed the duke of Orleans's releaſe; for the late king his brother's will was, to him, an inviolable law. Moreover, he was convinced, that this duke's liberty would only increaſe the number of the enemies of England; but his oppoſition was of ſo little weight, that it rather ſerved to induce his enemies the more ſtrenuouſly to favour the duke of Orleans. We have ſeen this prince's offers, before the congreſs of Arras; which the duke of Bedford and the council accepted, becauſe they ſeemed very advantageous, their aim, not having been, as yet, diſcovered. After the treaty of Arras, he perceived it was no proper time, to ſollicit his enlargement; but, finding that they begun to talk of a peace, he renewed his inſtances, and offered to become joint mediator with the duke of Bretagne. He found the council, diſpoſed, as before; and, in ſpite of the duke of Glouceſter's oppoſition, it was reſolved to accept of his mediation, and to treat with him afterwards, concerning his liberty. He was permitted, therefore, to repair to the congreſs, where he ſeemed very zealous to procure a peace, between the two kings; and, by means of the ducheſs of Burgundy, he was reconciled with the duke, her husband. The cardinal, after his return into England, ſpoke extremely much to his advantage, and repreſented to the council, that, as it was not his fault, that the peace was not concluded, it was unreaſonable he ſhould ſuffer by the rupture; and his friends urged, on this occaſion, the two reaſons already alledged, to colour the favour deſigned for him. The firſt was, that the diſſenſion, between the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, might rekindle, and become exceedingly advantageous to the Engliſh; and the ſecond, that the captive prince might pay a large ranſom, which would help to carry on the war. In a word, they intimated, that, before his enlargement, he would be obliged to take the oath to the king, and ſo prevented from aſſiſting king Charles; wherefore, in ſpite of all the duke of Glouceſter's objections, it was reſolved to treat with him for his liberty.

The duke of Glouceſter proteſts againſt the reſolution of the council.

Upon this reſolution, the duke of Glouceſter believed himſelf bound, both in duty and for his own ſecurity, to proteſt againſt it, in form, to convince the publick, that he had oppoſed it, to the utmoſt of his power; and, tho' this proteſtation be of ſome length, it will be neceſſary to inſert the ſubſtance, becauſe it may 1440. may be of use, in clearing several facts; besides, it discovers the disposition of the members of the council, who, to mortify the duke, sacrificed the king's interest to their passion. This knowledge is the more requisite, because, as the sequel will inform us, the unhappy success of the war, in France, is to be ascribed to the fatal enmity between the duke and the cardinal. The sum of the duke's protestation was, as follows:

The protestation. Act. Pub.

"My first reason, for opposing the duke of "Orleans's release, is drawn from the known "incapacity of king Charles, and the dau- "phin, his son; wherefore, considering the "extreme subtlety, and cautelous disposition "of the duke of Orleans, with his extensive "knowledge, it may be presumed, that the "states of France will entrust him with the "administration of publick affairs; now, no- "thing can happen more prejudicial to Eng- "land, since that prince is thoroughly ac- "quainted with the strong and weak side of "the kingdom, during a 25 years residence.

"II. The dissension, between king Charles "and the dauphin, his son, being no secret, "there was reason to fear, that the duke of "Orleans, when in France, will be a pro- "per mediator, to procure their reconcilia- "tion.

"III. Normandy being the province which "contributes most, towards supporting the "war, it is to be feared, that the Normans, "seeing the succours, so often promised, both "by word of mouth and letter, not sent, and, "on the other hand, the duke of Orleans "released, will conclude they are designed to "be abandoned, as well as the rest of the "conquests; and, as to its being said, that "20,000 marks may be deducted out of the "duke of Orleans's ransom, for the defence "of that province, I leave it to be consider- "ed, whether such a sum is sufficient for "that purpose.

"IV. The king and council are very sen- "sible, that the duke of Orleans owns king "Charles, for his sovereign; and is it, there- "fore, to be imagined, that, having taken "two opposite oaths, the one to a prince "whom he regards, as a foreigner, the other "to him whom he believes to be his lawful "king, he will choose to keep the first, ra- "ther than the last; which is the more im- "probable, as he will always look upon the "first, as extorted, whilst he was actually a "prisoner; moreover, he cannot stand to this "engagement, without forfeiting his posses- "sions, in France.

"V. It would be expedient to see, what "security may be taken, if he violates his "oath, under the pretence of obeying the "absolute command of his sovereign.

"VI. The earl of Huntingdon, who com- "mands, in Guienne, will, probably, be ob- "liged to quit his government, because the "king does not perform what was promised "him, by agreement; and, that province "being thus abandoned, and the duke of "Orleans in alliance with the houses of Al- "bret and Armagnac, it should, at least, be "considered, how that antient inheritance of "the king will be defended, if the duke of "Orleans joins forces with those two houses. 1440.

"VII. The king has no ally, in all Eu- "rope, but only the king of Portugal; and, "if he would make alliances with other "princes, how shall they be brought to "hearken to his proposals, when they shall "find, that he could not preserve his father's "conquests, without releasing one of his mor- "tal enemies?

"VIII. The late reconciliation, between "the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, at Ca- "lais, ought to create a dread, of their join- "ing forces to expel the English out of "France, as they certainly may do, unless "God interposes, instead of expecting any "advantage by their dissension; and if the "oath to be taken by the duke of Orleans, "before he leaves England, is believed to be "of any consequence, let it be examined by "the civil laws, what stress is to be laid on "the oath of a prisoner.

"IX. If any of the princes or lords, serv- "ing the king, in France, chance to fall in- "to the enemies hands, as it may easily "happen, four or five might be exchanged, "for the duke of Orleans alone; but, if that "prince is released, the English princes and "lords cannot fight for the king, without be- "ing liable to utter ruin.

"X. If, as it is probable, the enlarge- "ment of the duke of Orleans occasions the "loss of Normandy, and the rest of the king's "possessions, in France, what will the king's "counsellors be able to offer, in their own "vindication? What murmurings will there "be among the people, when it shall be con- "sidered, that these conquests, purchased "with the lives of the late king, the duke "of Clarence, the duke of Bedford, and an "infinite number of princes, lords, and "gentlemen shall have been all lost, by this "fatal counsel?

"XI. Lastly, Every one knows, that the late "king, wisely weighing the danger which "would arise from the enlargement of the "duke of Orleans, ordered, upon his death- "bed, that he should not be enlarged, till a "peace was concluded.

"And, as possibly, after my decease, I "may be accused of consenting to this reso- "lution, I humbly intreat the king, that "this my protestation may be recorded, "and an authentick copy given me, under "the great seal, to serve for my justifica- "tion."

The duke of Gloucester's request was granted; but his protestation did not prevent the execution of the council's resolution. The 2d of July, the agreement for the duke of Orleans release was signed by the king and the duke, in two originals, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The council persists in their resolution. Act. Pub.

The terms, required of the duke, were much easier than those offered by himself, before the congress of Arras; for he was not obliged to acknowledge Henry, for king of France, or to swear to him, much less to give him 1440. him any towns, in hoſtage; only his word and oath were taken, for the payment of his ranſom, ſet at 120,000 crowns. Indeed, by this agreement, he engaged to give obligations from the dauphin, the duke of Bretagne, and ſome others, for 60,000 crowns, which he was not to pay, till after his releaſe; and likewiſe to procure the king's letters patents from king Charles, authoriſing the agreement, and promiſing not to hinder the execution, and to account the duke of Orleans baſe and infamous, if he violated the articles; and, finally, the duke proteſting, that, as for the half of his ranſom, which he was to pay, before he left England, it was impoſſible for him to make good his engagement, without going to France, leave was granted him, for a year.

The duke of Orleans is releaſed. Act. Pub.

The council was, then, compoſed of perſons, who blindly followed their paſſion, regardleſs of the intereſts of the king and ſtate; of this we ſhall, preſently, ſee very convincing proofs. The only thing, that gave them any uneaſineſs, was, that the releaſe of the duke of Orleans ſeemed directly contrary to the will of the late king; who had expreſly enjoined that the duke of Orleans ſhould be kept priſoner, till the king, his ſon, was of age, unleſs his enlargement ſhould be a means to procure a peace; but they contrived an expedient, to ſcreen themſelves from the murmurs of the people. The king declared, by a publick act, that, in releaſing the duke of Orleans, he did not intend to contradict his father's will, but only more ſpeedily to obtain a peace; and, to ſhew more plainly, that this was his intent, the duke was obliged, by freſh articles, to exert himſelf to procure a peace, between the two kings; and, if he proved ſucceſsful, his ranſom was to be forgiven, and what he ſhould have paid, to be reſtored; whereas, if his endeavours did not ſucceed, he was to return into England, and remain a priſoner, as before, but the money, advanced towards his ranſom, to be repaid. It is manifeſt, that theſe new articles were deviſed, purely to throw duſt in the people's eyes, ſince they were directly contrary to the others, and a condition was added, not in the duke's power; and this is ſtill more evident, in that, the peace not being concluded, the duke did not return into England, nor was ever called upon; but he punctually performed the firſt agreement.

Remarks upon a miſtake of the French hiſtorians. Act. Pub.

All the French authors have done the duke of Burgundy the honour to affirm, that he lent the duke of Orleans money, to pay his ranſom; but the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that he did no more, in favour of his newly reconciled enemy, than conſent, that his ducheſs ſhould promiſe, in her own name, to ſend the king the obligation for 30,000 crowns, which the dauphin was to give, or, in caſe of refuſal, to become reſponſible; but, as the dauphin did not ſcruple to give his obligation, the ducheſs of Burgundy's promiſe was rendered uſeleſs. Indeed, the duke of Burgundy magnificently received the duke of Orleans, at Graveline; where they confirmed their reconciliation. I have inſiſted the longer upon the duke of Orleans's releaſe, becauſe it diſcovers the diſpoſition of the court and council, on which depend all the future events of this reign. Let us return, now, to the general affairs. 1440.

Conventions between Henry and the duke of Bretagne.

The duke of Bretagne pretended, all along, to obſerve a neutrality; and yet the ſuccours, brought by the conſtable, his brother, from time to time, to king Charles, could neither be levied, in his country, nor led from thence, without his permiſſion, or connivance. If the Engliſh had been in a better condition, they would, doubtleſs, have ſhewn their reſentment; but, in their preſent circumſtances, they judged it no ſmall advantage, that the duke of Bretagne did not openly declare for their enemies. In the interim, as the Engliſh and the Bretons annoyed one another, at ſea, contrary to the intereſt of both nations, the king and the duke thought fit to conclude a treaty, mutually engaging, not to ſuffer any naval armaments to be made in their ports, to the detriment of each other's ſubjects.

The death of the earl of Warwick.

Richard de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, and regent of France, dying, in the beginning of the ſummer, the duke of York was reſtored to the regency; tho' he had been recalled, to give place to the earl of Warwick.

Quarrels in Charles's court.

If the Engliſh, in France, had been able to improve the preſent opportunity, a fairer had never offered, to repair their paſt loſſes. The dauphin and all the princes of the blood, the duke of Burgundy and the earl of Eu excepted, were joined in a confederacy againſt the king; and this league tended to no leſs than dethroning him, and placing the crown on the head of the prince, his ſon; but, fortunately for him, the confederates had engaged La Trimouille in their party, by which they entirely loſt the conſtable; for, as he had a mortal averſion to that lord, his hatred extended to the whole party, and induced them to bring the king a powerful aid, which enabled him to give law to the princes. This civil war was termed La Praguerie; but for what reaſon I know not; but the league was ſo ill managed by the confederates, that the king, at length, forced them to implore his mercy. In the mean while, the Engliſh, who very faintly carried on the war, made ſome incurſions, about Paris; but the baſtard of Orleans, who, from ſiding with the dauphin, was returned to the king, put a ſtop to their progreſs, which was inconſiderable, on account of their weakneſs.

Charles, having put an end to this dangerous war, approached Paris, and, in his way, became maſter of La Charite, by bribing the governor.

Act. Pub.

In the mean while, the ducheſs of Burgundy inceſſantly, endeavoured to renew the conferences for a peace, and, after ſhe had laboured, the whole year, prevailed on the two monarchs, to appoint plenipotentiaries to meet, at St Omer; and the duke of Orleans was choſen to be one of the mediators.

This new congreſs was as ineffectual, as the former; for the earl of Vendoſme, head of 1441. of the French ambaſſy, refuſed to treat with the Engliſh ambaſſadors, on pretence of their inferior quality; tho' they were peers of the realm, viz. the biſhop of Rocheſter and the lord Fanhope. In the reign of Henry V, the French did not ſtand upon ſuch punctilio's; who readily conferred with bare doctors in law, provided they were duly impowered. Indeed, the ambaſſadors for this congreſs were not of ſo high a character, as the former; but, as there was no probability, that the French would be more moderate in their demands, the council did not think fit to put the king, or the princes, or any of the principal lords, to a needleſs expence; yet Charles took occaſion, from thence, to revoke the powers given to his ambaſſadors. Thus, the congreſs broke off, without being ever pened; and the French pretended, that the court of England had, on purpoſe, choſen perſons of no birth or diſtinction, that they might not be treated with; but the truth is, both parties, for the moſt part, only amuſed each other by theſe conferences. They both gueſſed, what their adverſaries would demand, and as they were reſolved not to grant it, could expect very little benefit from theſe negotiations; tho' they conſented to them, as well to juſtify themſelves to the publick, as to flatter each other with the hopes of a peace.

Charles takes Creil. Monſtrelet.

Whilſt the ambaſſadors repaired to St. Omer, Charles aſſembled an army to make a powerful effort, and take advantage of the indolence of the Engliſh; and he was no ſooner ready, than he ordered admiral de Coitivy to inveſt Creil upon Oyſe, with a detachment of the army. The conſtable joining him, with the reſt of his troops, the ſiege was regularly formed; and the king came, about the end of April, to receive the town, by capitulation.

He lays ſiege to Pontoiſe. Monſtre. let.

This was only a preparative to a more important undertaking, namely, the ſiege of Pontoiſe, which Charles formed, the beginning of July, with an army of 12000 men; having with him the dauphin, his ſon, and all the noted generals and officers, in France. This ſiege was, at firſt, proſecuted with great vigour, but the beſieged made as brave a defence. Talbot, whom the moſt difficult enterprizes could not diſcourage, being commiſſioned by the duke of York, to introduce a convoy into the town, attacking one of the enemy's quarters, and forming it, ſent in his convoy; which ſeaſonable relief ſo animated the garriſon, that the ſiege proceeded but ſlowly; and, tho' the beſiegers were extremely vigilant, they could not hinder ſuch an experienced warrior from throwing ſuccours into the town, three ſeveral times. However, Charles obſtinately reſolved to continue the ſiege, undertaken at the inſtance of the Pariſians, who defrayed all the charges; but, at length, the duke of York's army, being increaſed to 12000 men, by a reinforcement from England, approached the town, and ſent a herald to the king, to offer him battle. Charles anſwered, he ſhould ſee what was to be done; and that he did not intend to regulate his time, by that of his enemies. He ſaw the Engliſh army, on the other ſide of the Oyſe, which they could paſs only by a bridge, guarded by a detachment of 1000 men; ſo that, withour any apprehenſion of a ſudden attack, he leiſurely continued the ſiege. In the interim, the duke of York, reſolving, at any rate, to relieve the place, found means to to paſs, in the night, 5 or 600 men, in boats of boiled skins; which detachment, on a ſudden, attacking the guard of the bridge, and cutting them in pieces, opened a paſſage for the duke, who, immediately, advanced, on the other ſide, with his whole army. Charles was ſo aſtoniſhed at this action, that he, inſtantly, raiſed the ſiege, and retired, under the canon of Poiſſi; but the duke of York purſued him, and offered him battle, in vain; and, at laſt, after braving him, for ſome time, and plundering, before his face, the abbey of Poiſſi, he retired, not judging it expedient to attack him, in that poſt.

Charles ſuffers in his reputation by it. Monſtre. let.

The ſpeedy retreat of king Charles, before an enemy much weaker than himſelf, was vaſtly injurious to his reputation; for all the French loudly murmured, but eſpecialy the Pariſians. The king's beſt friends openly diſcovered their fear, that ſuch a general diſcontent would prove fatal to him; and, in ſhort, thoſe neareſt his perſon, repreſenting to him, how he had expoſed his reputation, by ſo inglorious an action, he reſolved, at all adventures, to retrieve his credit; wherefore, when leaſt expected, he returned, before Pontoiſe, and carried it, by ſtorm. He ſo ſignalized himſelf, in the aſſault, that all the ill impreſſions, made by his former conduct, to his diſadvantage, were effaced; for he was ſeen, on the breach, ſword in hand, fighting with an undaunted bravery, and expoſing his perſon, like a common ſoldier. By this reſolute action, he evidently ſhewed, that, if he did not delight in war, it was not ſo much, for want of courage, as from an immoderate attachment to his pleaſures; and, ſome time after, the town of Evreux was taken from the Engliſh, by the help of a fiſherman, who found means to introduce the French.

The ducheſs of Glouceſter is accuſed of witchcraft and treaſon. Stow. Hall.

During theſe tranſactions, in France, a very ſurpriſing ſpectacle attracted the eyes and attention of the people of England. I have often obſerved, that the duke of Glouceſter's credit ſenſibly declined, or rather was entirely ſunk; and of this was ſeen a remarkable proof, in the courſe of the preſent year. This prince was blameleſs, in his conduct, with reſpect to the king; and, whatever ſpies were planted about him by his enemies, they could find no pretence to the leaſt charge againſt his perſon; but, at length, by narrowly inſpecting what paſſed, in his family, they learnt, that his ducheſs had frequent conferences with Sir Roger Bolinbroke, a prieſt, who was accounted a necromancer, and a certain woman*,

Conventions between Henry and the duke of Bretagne.

The duke of Bretagne pretended, all along, to obſerve a neutrality; and yet the ſuccours, brought by the conſtable, his brother, from time to time, to king Charles, could neither be levied, in his country, nor led from thence, without his permiſſion, or connivance. If the Engliſh had been in a better condition, they would, doubtleſs, have ſhewn their reſentment; but, in their preſent circumſtances, they judged it no ſmall advantage, that the duke of Bretagne did not openly declare for their enemies. In the interim, as the Engliſh and the Bretons annoyed one another, at ſea, contrary to the intereſt of both nations, the king and the duke thought fit to conclude a treaty, mutually engaging, not to ſuffer any naval armaments to be made in their ports, to the detriment of each other's ſubjects.

The death of the earl of Warwick.

Richard de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, and regent of France, dying, in the beginning of the ſummer, the duke of York was reſtored to the regency; tho' he had been recalled, to give place to the earl of Warwick.

Quarrels in Charles's court.

If the Engliſh, in France, had been able to improve the preſent opportunity, a fairer had never offered, to repair their paſt loſſes. The dauphin and all the princes of the blood, the duke of Burgundy and the earl of Eu excepted, were joined in a confederacy againſt the king; and this league tended to no leſs than dethroning him, and placing the crown on the head of the prince, his ſon; but, fortunately for him, the confederates had engaged La Trimouille in their party, by which they entirely loſt the conſtable; for, as he had a mortal averſion to that lord, his hatred extended to the whole party, and induced them to bring the king a powerful aid, which enabled him to give law to the princes. This civil war was termed La Praguerie; but for what reaſon I know not; but the league was ſo ill managed by the confederates, that the king, at length, forced them to implore his mercy. In the mean while, the Engliſh, who very faintly carried on the war, made ſome incurſions, about Paris; but the baſtard of Orleans, who, from ſiding with the dauphin, was returned to the king, put a ſtop to their progreſs, which was inconſiderable, on account of their weakneſs.

Charles, having put an end to this dangerous war, approached Paris, and, in his way, became maſter of La Charite, by bribing the governor.

Act. Pub.

In the mean while, the ducheſs of Burgundy inceſſantly, endeavoured to renew the conferences for a peace, and, after ſhe had laboured, the whole year, prevailed on the two monarchs, to appoint plenipotentiaries to meet, at St Omer; and the duke of Orleans was choſen to be one of the mediators.

This new congreſs was as ineffectual, as the former; for the earl of Vendoſme, head of

Charles anſwered, he ſhould ſee what was to be done; and that he did not intend to regulate his time, by that of his enemies. He ſaw the Engliſh army, on the other ſide of the Oyſe, which they could paſs only by a bridge, guarded by a detachment of 1000 men; ſo that, without any apprehenſion of a ſudden attack, he leiſurely continued the ſiege. By his reſolute action, he evidently ſhewed, that he did not delight [illegible] ſloth, for want of courage, but from an immoderate attachment to his pleaſures: and, ſome time after, the town of Lieux was taken from the Engliſh, by the help of a fiſherman, who found means to introduce the French.

The ducheſs of Glouceſter is accuſed of witchcraft and treaſon. Stow. Hall.

During theſe tranſactions in France, a very ſurpriſing ſpectacle attracted the eyes and attention of the people of England. I have often obſerved, that the duke of Glouceſter's credit ſenſibly declined, or rather was entirely ſunk; and of this was ſeen a remarkable proof, in the courſe of the preſent year. This prince was blameleſs, in his conduct, with reſpect to the king; and, whatever ſpies were planted about him by his enemies, they could find no pretence to the leaſt charge againſt his perſon; but, at length, by narrowly inſpecting what paſſed, in his family, they learnt, that his ducheſs had frequent conferences with Sir Roger Bolinbroke, a prieſt, who was accounted a necromancer, and a certain woman*,

*Margery Gurdemain of Eye, who was burnt, in Smithfield, the 27th of October; Thomas Southwell and Sir John Hume, prieſts, were alſo accuſed of being concerned with the ducheſs; and Bolingbroke was hanged and quartered. Hall.

1441. who was reputed a witch. This was ſufficient to found a charge of high-treaſon againſt her; for ſhe was accuſed of making, with theſe two perſons, the king's image, in wax; and of placing it, before a gentle fire, with an intent, that the king's ſtrength ſhould waſte inſenſibly, as the wax melted, and his life be at an end, when the image was all diſſolved. The deſign of this accuſation was to prove, that the ducheſs deſigned to deſtroy the king, that the crown might fall to the duke, her huſband; and, at the ſame time, ſuſpicions were inſtilled into the duke himſelf. When the parties accuſed were examined, the prieſt denied the whole; but the ducheſs confeſſed, that ſhe had deſired the woman to make her a love-potion for her ſpouſe, who ſometimes went aſtray. Tho' this confeſſion did not make her guilty of the crime charged upon her, the duke's enemies had ſo managed, that the prieſt was condemned to be hanged, and the woman to be burnt; but, as for the ducheſs, tho' ſhe would have been the moſt criminal, had the thing been well atteſted, out of a pretended regard to the duke, ſhe was only condemned to do publick penance, in St. Paul's church, and to be impriſoned for life. This was a horrible mortification to the firſt prince of the blood, who had been protector of the realm, and always ardently zealous for the king's intereſt and honour; but ſuch was the power of his enemies, that he was conſtrained to be ſilent, leſt he ſhould give them occaſion to fall directly upon his perſon.

Charles had ſcarce taken any repoſe, after the ſiege of Pontoiſe, before he was extremely embarraſſed; for all the princes of his houſe were engaged in a freſh confederacy againſt him, with the duke of Orleans at their head. This prince highly reſented the king's cold reception of him, after a 25 years captivity ſuffered for the intereſt of France, and even, during which, he had done him very ſignal ſervices; and, probably, this proceeding would have entirely ruined the king's affairs, if, by a fortunate advice, he had not gained the head, by conſiderable favours. The duke of Orleans's defection diſconcerting all the confederates meaſures, they were forced to implore the king's mercy; and, thus, ended the league, as all thoſe, of ſubjects againſt their ſovereigns uſually do, when the ſovereigns find means to content their leaders.

Beſides the rebellion of the princes, Charles had another cauſe for uneaſineſs; becauſe his honour, as well as intereſt, called upon him to relieve Tartas, a town of Guienne beſieged by the Engliſh. This was the moſt conſiderable place belonging to the houſe of Albret, which had long been ſerviceable to France, by their diverſions, in Guienne; and it was, therefore, of the laſt conſequence to the king to ſuccour this houſe; leſt all the lords of Guienne, of his party, ſhould leave him, and turn to the king of England. In the mean while, the league of the princes having hindered him, from thinking ſooner of relieving Tartas, he did not begin his march to Guienne, till November; yet the town ſtill defended itſelf, 1441. and it was even January, before the garriſon capitulated, upon a condition which afforded Charles more than ſufficient time, to prepare for their relief. According to the capitulation, the town was to be delivered to the lords Cognac and Saint Par, for the Engliſh, if, on the 24th of next June, there appeared not a French army able to give battle; but, if it was relieved on the day appointed, it was to be reſtored to the lord d' Albret.

1442. Charles advances towards Guienne. Monſtrelet.

Charles, having leiſure to prepare, ſpent the winter, in Poictou, where he aſſembled a conſiderable army, conſiſting of 400 lances 8000 croſs-bow-men, and as many archers; and, all the French lords repairing to him, he counted 160 banners in his army. In the interim, England made no effort, to defend Guienne, or give the enemy a diverſion, elſewhere; for the council, being no longer influenced by the duke of Glouceſter, ſeemed to be grown entirely thoughtleſs.

The death of La Hire. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel.

Charles, with the forces he had raiſed, in Poictou, humbled ſome tyrannical Poictevin lords, and from thence came to Limoges, where he made ſome ſtay; after which, he paſſed ſome time, at Montauban, where he loſt the valiant La Hire or Vignoles, one of his moſt able generals. The relief of Tartas was not the ſole motive of his journey; for his principal view was to become maſter of the earldom of Cominge, which he claimed, by vertue of a ſettlement in his favour; but, as this affair has ſome relation to thoſe of England, it will be neceſſary to relate the ground of his pretenſions.

Charles's claim to the earldom of Cominge. P. Daniel.

Margaret, heireſs of Cominge, had two daughters, by her firſt husband, John III, earl of Armagnac, who died, in 1391; as did alſo the two daughters, ſoon after. The counteſs was afterwards married to John d' Armagnac, earl of Fezenſaquet; but, by an outrage unheard of, in France, ſhe divorced her ſecond husband, whoſe grief occaſioned his death, in 1404. Then ſhe eſpouſed Matthew de Grailley, brother to John, earl of Foix, and by him had a daughter, but of ſo weak a conſtitution, that Matthew, her father, was apprehenſive, that the death of the mother and daughter would deprive him of the earldom of Cominge, of which he was in poſſeſſion; wherefore, he preſſed his counteſs, who was much older than himſelf, to make a will, and ſettle it upon him, after their daughter; but ſhe refuſed it. Margaret's obſtinacy cauſed ſuch a quarrel, between her and her husband, that he reſolved to diſpoſſeſs her, aſſiſted by the earl of Armagnac, who very readily joined in the project, on condition of going ſhares with him; upon which, the earl of Armagnac attacked, defeated, and took the counteſs priſoner, and, with her husband's conſent, confined her in a caſtle, where ſhe remained 22 years; but this rough uſage only inflamed the old counteſs's reſentment. At laſt, in 1435, ſhe found means in her confinment to make a will, wherein ſhe nominated her daughter, Jane, for her heir, and, after her, ſettled the earldom upon king Charles VII.

Jane

1442. Jane dying, ſome time after, Charles heard of this ſettlement; and, the counteſs being ſtill alive, he formed a deſign, to free her from her impriſonment, and cauſe her to confirm her will. Having made ſome ſtay, at Montauban, he came to Tholouſe, and ordered the earls of Armagnac and Cominge to be ſummoned, before the parliament of that city; and the two earls appeared, not daring to reſiſt a prince, who was in a condition to compel them; moreover, as the earl of Armagnac's anceſtors had voluntarily acknowledged the kings of France, for their ſovereigns, he could have no pretence to decline the juriſdiction of their parliaments. He was forced, therefore, to bring the old captive counteſs, now 80 years old, to Tholouſe, where the parliament decreed the ſettlement upon the king to be valid; and, accordingly, the king took poſſeſſion of the earldom of Cominge; but, for the ſake of Gaſton, earl of Foix, who had ſucceeded his father, John, in 1437, he was pleaſed to conſent, that Matthew, his uncle, ſhould enjoy his part of the earldom, during life. The earl of Armagnac was treated, in a more rigorous manner; for the king not only diſpoſſeſſed him of the part he had uſurped, but ſtripped him of the privilege of the regale in his territories, forbidding him alſo to ſtile himſelf, John by the Grace of God, Earl of Armagnac, as he had done, and his anceſtors before him.

The earl of Armagnac is highly offended.

The earl of Armagnac did not think he deſerved ſuch treatment, after all the ſervices his houſe had done the kings of France. If, to eſpouſe their intereſts, his anceſtors had not caſt off the dominion of the kings of England, he would not have been liable to appear, before the parliament of Tholouſe, nor have loſt the privileges, which the kings of England, dukes of Guienne, had never diſputed with his predeceſſors; and, therefore, he was, to the laſt degree, impatient to free himſelf from this yoke and be revenged; but, as he was ſenſible, that his forces alone were incapable of procuring him that ſatisfaction, he reſolved throw himſelf into the arms of the king of England. Shortly after, he ſent to deſire his protection, with an offer of one of his daughters in marriage; and, the propoſal being conſidered in the council, it was judged, that, in the preſent ſtate of the king's affairs, in France, the alliance, propoſed by the earl of Armagnac, could not but be very beneficial; ſo that, without loſs of time, ambaſſadors were diſpatched to the earl of Armagnac, to ſettle the marriage-articles, and affiance one of his daughters, in the name of the king.

Charles relieves Tartas, and takes ſeveral places, in Guienne. Hall.

In the mean time, Charles appearing, before Tartas, on the 24th of June, and no enemy offering to give him battle, the place was reſtored to the lord d'Albret, purſuant to the capitulation. The preparations of the French were not a ſecret to the Engliſh; and yet no meaſures were taken for the defence of Guienne. Charles, improving this negligence, became maſter of St. Sever; and then he beſieged Acs, one of the ſtrongeſt places, in thoſe parts, which held out, ſeven weeks. La Reole was carried, by ſtorm; and Marmande was alſo taken by the French. During the following winter, which was extremely ſharp, Acs and St. Sever opened their gates to the Engliſh; but the earl of Foix retook St. Sever; and Charles paſſed the whole winter, at Tholouſe. 1442.

Talbot is made earl of Shrewſbury, and the baſtard of Orleans earl of Dunois. Hall.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacted, at one one end of the kingdom, the Engliſh were preparing to make a diverſion, at the other; but they ſhould have thought of it ſooner, to prevent Charles's march into Guienne; and, thus, they would have infallibly preſerved the places lately loſt; however, orders being given to raiſe 5000 men, in England, the command was conferred on Talbot, whom the king had now created earl of Shrewsbury. Talbot, landing, in Normandy, ſoon obliged the baſtard of Orleans to quit the field; who had alſo a new title, being made earl of Dunois. He preſently beſieged the caſtle of Conches; and, to make a diverſion, the French general inveſted Galardon. Talbot having taken the caſtle, in a few days, the earl of Dunois did not think fit to expect his enemy, who was marching, directly, to give him battle; upon which, the earl of Shrewsbury advanced towards Dieppe, in Normandy; a place of great importance, ſtill poſſeſſed by the French; and ſuch was his expedition, that Eſtouteville, tho' he marched, with the utmoſt diligence, to throw in a ſupply of troops, could not arrive, in time. When he was before the place, he formed the ſiege; but his army was very unequal to ſuch an undertaking, and eſpecially in November. Indeed, he did not expect to be maſter of the town, during the winter, and without more forces; but his intent was to take the fort of Charles-Meſnil, ſituated on Mount Polet, which defended the paſſage to Dieppe. After that, he hoped to preſs it ſo cloſely, that it ſhould be conſtrained to ſurrender; and, having thus taken his meaſures, he attacked and carried the fort, which he ordered to be made larger and ſtronger; upon which, mounting his batteries, he left the management of the ſiege, or rather blockade, to his baſtard ſon, and returned into England, to ſollicit a ſupply.

The duke of Glouceſter accuſes the cardinal of Wincheſter. Hall.

This was an improper ſeaſon for the earl of Shrewsbury, to obtain from England the ſuccours he deſired, at leaſt, ſo ſoon as was neceſſary; for the duke of Glouceſter, perceiving that the king's affairs daily declined, brought, at this juncture, before the council, an accuſation of high-treaſon, againſt the cardinal of Wincheſter. Probably, his enmity to that prelate induced him to think, that he was the ſole occaſion of all the misfortunes, befallen the Engliſh; and, perhaps, he only intended to clear himſelf to the publick, by accuſing his enemy. Indeed, as he was well acquainted with the members of the council, he could not flatter himſelf, with the leaſt hopes of ſucceſs, in an affair of that nature; but, however that be, the charge conſiſted of 14 articles, the ſubſtance of which was, as follows:

Articles of accuſation. Hall.

I. That the biſhop of Wincheſter had accepted the dignity of cardinal, contrary to the late 1442. late king's orders, and in derogation to the metropolitan church of Canterbury.

II. That, by the ſtatute of Proviſors, having forfeited the ſee of Wincheſter, he had procured the pope's bull, to ſecure it, contrary to the laws of the kingdom, and particularly to the ſtatute of Præmunire.

III. That, jointly with John Kemp, archbiſhop of York, he had aſſumed the government of the king's perſon, without being authoriſed.

IV. That he had defrauded the king of his jewels.

" This article was founded upon the cardi-
" nal's lending the king money, upon
" pawn."

V. That, being chancellor of the kingdom, he had ſealed an order, for the enlargement of the king of Scotland; and another, to forgive that prince part of his ranſom, provided he married his niece.

VI. That he had defrauded the king of his revenues, by applying to his own uſe the cuſtoms of wooll, at the port of Southampton.

" Probably, the cardinal ſo ſtopped the mo" ney, he had lent the king."

VII. That he had the preſumption to ſummon people, before him, in derogation of the prerogatives of the crown, and the royal authority.

" He did this, probably, as legate; but " he could not do it legally, without the
" king's licenſe."

VIII. That he had procured from Rome an exemption, for his dioceſe, from paying tenths to the king; by which he gave a pernicious example to the reſt of the biſhops.

IX. That he had been inſtrumental, in reconciling the duke of Burgundy to king Charles and the duke of Orleans, to the great prejudice of England.

X. That, when he was the king's ambaſſador and plenipotentiary, to treat of a peace, he had ſent the archbiſhop of York to the king, to perſuade him to renounce the title of king of France, to the diſhonour of the king and his illuſtrious anceſtors.

XI. That the duke of Orleans's releaſe had been procured by his, and the duke of York's intrigues, contrary to the poſitive order of the late king.

XII. That, being chancellor, he had himſelf purchaſed crown-lands, inſtead of preventing ſuch alienations, according to the duty of his office.

XIII. That, by commiſſioning ſuch officers only in the army, as were his creatures, he had cauſed all the loſſes ſuſtained, in France.

XIV. That he had ſold captains commiſſions, and ſo introduced into the king's ſervice ſuch as were incapable of doing their duty.

Theſe accuſations were read, in council; but it, for ſome time, had conſiſted only of the cardinal's creatures, and the duke of Glouceſter's enemies; ſo that, under the pretence of being unwilling to meddle with the royal prerogative, the pardon, granted to the cardinal, in 1437, was urged. The duke of Glouceſter, perceiving it was impoſſible to procure the condemnation of his enemy, dropped the proſecution; and the king granted the cardinal a freſh pardon. 1442.

The duke of Glouceſter loſes ground daily.

Doubtleſs, the duke of Glouceſter was in a diſmal ſituation; who not only perceived that the miniſtry ſteered a courſe, directly contrary to that marked out by the glorious Henry V, his brother, but that there was alſo a ſettled deſign to mortify him, on all occaſions; for the king, his nephew, tho' ſo highly obliged to him, ſuffered himſelf to be miſ-led by the artifices of his enemies; being incapable of diſcerning, that they ſolely conſulted their own advantage. He was made to conſider his uncle, as a ſecret enemy, that would rejoice at his deſtruction, becauſe he was his next heir; nay, they repreſented him, as a counſellor, whoſe intereſt it was to engage him in wrong courſes, in order to render him contemptible and odious to his ſubjects, and ſo pave his own way to the crown. It is no wonder, that a young prince, of ſo mean a genius as Henry, ſhould be blinded by ſuch inſinuations; for he had none about his perſon, to undeceive him. The cardinal always took care not to admit any perſon to court, or in the council, that was not devoted to him; and this he made his principal buſineſs. He it was, that introduced to court the earl of Suffolk, for whom the king conceived ſo great an affection, that he ſaw nothing, but with his eyes, and did nothing, without his advice; and, as the new favourite was entirely indebted to the cardinal, for his fortune, he continually inſinuated to his maſter, that, of all his ſubjects, the cardinal was moſt ſafely to be truſted; by which means, he daily ſunk the duke of Glouceſter's credit, whoſe counſels were always directly oppoſite to thoſe of his enemy. John Kemp, archbiſhop of York and cardinal, was likewiſe a counſellor inviolably attached to the cardinal of Wincheſter, and his inſtrument, to confirm the king in his ſuſpicions of the duke of Glouceſter; and theſe three miniſters, being ſo ſtrictly united together, ſo managed, that the king daily gave his uncle ſome freſh mortification; whilſt, on the other hand, the haughty and impatient temper of the duke of Glouceſter, not permitting him to bear indignities, without complaining and threatening the authors, he promoted his own ruin, by the continual faults that were the reſult of his impatience.

The birth of prince Edward, ſon to the duke of York.

In September, this year, the ducheſs of York was delivered of a prince, whom we ſhall ſee hereafter aſcend the throne, by the name of Edward IV.

John V, duke of Bretagne, dying the 28th of Auguſt, Francis, his eldeſt ſon, was his ſucceſſor, in the ſovereignty of that duchy.

1443. A truce between England and Burgundy. Act. Pub.

The year 1443 began with a private negotiation, between the king and the duke of Burgundy; for the latter, finding the affairs of the two kings likely to be decided, either by war, or peace, judged it adviſable to ſecure himſelf, by a ſeparate truce with England. He was diſpleaſed with king Charles, for ſeveral reaſons, too tedious to be related; and, on the contrary, he had cauſe to fear, that 1443. that Charles was reconciled to him, only out of policy; wherefore, he reſolved, not to aſſiſt him any longer to finiſh a war, the proſperous iſſue whereof might render him too powerful. Theſe conſiderations induced him to give his ducheſs full power, to conclude with the king of England a general truce, for all their reſpective dominions; for the former concerned only the trade, between England and the Low-Countries; but this, ſigned, the 23d of April, included Burgundy, and all the duke's territories, and was to laſt, till one of the parties ſhould put an end to it; in which caſe, the other was to have three months notice.

Charles ſends the dauphin to relieve Dieppe.

The blockade of Dieppe was ſtill continued, in expectation of ſupplies from England; but Charles, perceiving that it would be in great danger, if not relieved, before the arrival of the Engliſh troops, determined, at laſt, tho' not without reluctance, to ſend the dauphin, his ſon, who ſo preſſed him to entruſt him with the care of this expedition, that he granted him this favour. He was not only afraid to venture out of his ſight this young prince, who had given ſo many proofs of a turbulent ſpirit, but likewiſe to afford him opportunities of acquiring glory; yet theſe reaſons gave way to the neceſſity of relieving Dieppe, which was reduced to extremity, by an eight months blockade. The dauphin departed from Guienne, with 4000 horſe, and marched towards Normandy; and, coming within ſight of Dieppe, he eaſily ſaw, that the fort of Charles-Meſnil, where the Engliſh had fortified themſelves, was impregnable, on the ſide next the country, and, therefore, reſolved to enter the town; and, in ſpite of the Engliſh, he, immediately, put his deſign in execution. He ſcarce entered, when, without giving them time to come to themſelves, he ſallied out, with all his troops, and ſtormed the fort, on the ſide next the town; and he was thrice repulſed, but, the fourth time, carried it, ſword in hand. The Engliſh, being unable to continue the blockade, after the loſs of their fort, raiſed it, and retired, in good order; but John, duke of Somerſet, arrived, five days after, with a reinforcement of 5000 men. Had he arrived ſooner, the dauphin would not, perhaps, have performed this enterprize, with ſo much honour; but, the blockade being raiſed, the duke could do nothing more than ravage part of the enemy's country, after retaking ſome caſtles, in Normandy.

After the dauphin's departure, Charles, at laſt, left Guienne, and came to Tours, where he diverted himſelf, after the fatigues of the war; but his pleaſures were ſomewhat interrupted, by the news of the earl of Armagnac's taking arms, and ſeizing that part of the earldom of Cominge, of which he had been lately diſpoſſeſſed; yet ſo fond was Charles of the voluptuous life he led, at Tours, that he waited, till the dauphin's return, and, as he had behaved bravely, in the affair of Dieppe, ſent him, immediately after his arrival, to chaſtiſe the earl of Armagnac. Upon the dauphin's approach, the earl found himſelf abandoned by all his friends, and unſupported by the Engliſh, tho' the king was affianced to his daughter; ſo that the dauphin eaſily became maſter of Rovergne, and of all, in general, that belonged to the earl, who was deprived of all, except the little town of Liſle en Jourdain, about 12 miles from Tholouſe. The dauphin held it long beſieged, to no purpoſe; but, at length, deſpairing of honourably compleating the ſiege, he artfully drew the earl to a conference, upon the promiſe of a ſafe conduct; and he no ſooner had him in his power, than he ſent him to the king, his father, who did not ſcruple to detain him; tho', two years after, he reſtored him his territories, at the requeſt of the kings of Caſtile and Navarre. 1243.

Upon the earl of Armagnac's misfortune, the king and council of England grew cold, with reſpect to the marriage, which was entirely dropped; for no ſcruple was made to put that affront upon an unhappy prince, who was unable to be revenged.

1444. The two kings are equally deſirous of a peace. Du Tillet.

Since the duke of Burgundy's ſeparate truce with Henry, the French were not ſo eager, to proſecute the war; and, indeed, they had no leſs need of repoſe than the Engliſh. France was utterly ruined, by this deſtructive war, which had laſted, 30 years, without interruption; and by the inteſtine troubles raiſed, ſeveral years before the violation of the truce, by the quarrel between the houſes of Orleans and Burgundy. The princes and great men were diſheartened at the fatigues and loſſes, they ſo long ſuſtained; for the country and towns were become deſolate; and France, tho' generally well peopled, could no longer find ſoldiers. Moreover, the duke of Orleans, who had engaged to do all that was poſſible, to procure a peace, willing to make good his engagement, inceſſantly, ſollicited king Charles about it; the duke of Burgundy preſſed him; and the whole kingdom, in general, ardently deſired to ſee a ceſſation of ſo many calamities. A peace was no leſs eagerly wiſhed for, in England; ſince all the money, levied there, was ſwallowed up, in France, as in a bottomleſs gulf, from whence it never returned. In a word, the king was not of a martial diſpoſition; and the moſt of his council were eccleſiaſticks, introduced by the cardinal of Wincheſter, to ſtrengthen his party. The council plainly foreſaw, that the continuance of the war would, by no means, recommend them to the people; and, as the war had, for ſome time, been prejudicial to England, it was natural to charge the blame, upon thoſe that ſat at the helm, rather than upon the king, who only approved of what was ſuggeſted by his miniſters. The duke of Glouceſter alone was of opinion, that freſh efforts ſhould be made, to improve king Charles's weakneſs, and the late truce with the duke of Burgundy; but this prince had loſt his credit, nor were his counſels regarded.

It is agreed to treat about a truce, at Tours. Act. Pub.

Theſe conſiderations, which were very weighty, on both ſides, prevailed, at length, on the two kings, to regard the inſtances of the duke of Burgundy, who urged them to conſent to a truce, in order more calmly to endea-

1444. vour a peace; and it was agreed, that the negotiation ſhould be, at Tours, where king Charles reſided, tho' this ſeemed to intimate, that the Engliſh were going to beg it, as a favour. At any other time, the bare mention of treating, at Tours, would have occaſioned a rupture; but Henry's council were for having a truce, at any rate, and nothing appeared diſhonourable, to attain that end. We ſhall even ſee, preſently, that almoſt every thing was ſecretly ſettled, before the ambaſſadors ſet out for Tours; and this truce, tho', in appearance, founded on the publick good, was properly deſigned, purely for the ſupport of the miniſters, who had nothing leſs in view, than the intereſt of the kingdom. Henry did not, in the leaſt, underſtand it; but he ſuffered himſelf to be guided, according to cuſtom, by his counſellors, who made him believe, that they had his advantage at heart, when, in reality, they were working only for themſelves.

The earl of Suffolk acts cautiouſly in the matter. Act. Pub.

William de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, was appointed head of this ambaſſy; who had more reaſons than one to deſire this office, as the ſequel will inform us. In the interim, as he was not ignorant, what a tickliſh ſtep he was about to take, and how liable to be ſtrictly inquired into, he preſented to the king a petition, which, probably, had been concerted with the principal members of the council; in which he ſhewed a great ſcruple, with reſpect to his inſtructions, pretending that they exceeded his capacity, tho', it is likely, he was himſelf the author of them. Then, he modeſtly begged to be eaſed of the burden of the negotiation; or, at leaſt, if the king would not grant him that favour, that he would be pleaſed to ſecure him againſt all imputation; upon which, the king, by the advice of his council, cauſed an authentick order to be drawn up, to execute fully whatever was contained in his inſtructions. This order, probably, was to be ſhewn, only in caſe of neceſſity; and, after the execution, the king ſaid in it, that the inſtructions concerned not only the general good of the kingdom, but alſo his own perſon and marriage; a convincing evidence, that the marriage, ſpoken of, preſently, was already reſolved.

A truce is concluded, at Tours.

The ambaſſadors of England, being come to Tours, entered, immediately, into a negotiation with king Charles's commiſſioners, concerning a peace; but, after ſome mutual and ineffectual propoſals, they were content with a truce, which was ſigned, the 28th of May; which was to commence, the 7th of July, this year, and end, the firſt of April, 1446.

Act. Pub.

At the ſame time, the truce, between England and Scotland, was prolonged, at Edinburgh, for ſeven years, to begin, the 1ſt of May, 1447, the day when the former was to expire.

Suffolk propoſes a marriage between the king and Margaret of Anjou.

The affair of the truce with France being over, the earl of Suffolk propoſed, or cauſed to be propoſed, the king's marriage with Margaret of Anjou, daughter to Rene of Anjou, who bore the title of king of Sicily, after the deceaſe of Lewis III, his elder brother; and the Engliſh charge the earl of Suffolk, with making this propoſal of himſelf, without any authority; but we have already ſeen the contrary. Indeed, in all probability, he was the firſt contriver; but he had taken care to procure the king's approbation. He was deſirous of keeping his preſent poſt; and nothing was more proper to ſupport him, than this marriage. He knew, that Henry was himſelf incapable of governing; and that, of courſe, his miniſters would be envied, and incur the blame of whatſoever was diſagreeable to the people. In this belief, he imagined, that the moſt effectual way, to ſecure himſelf, was, at once, to give the king a wife, and the kingdom a governeſs. With this view, it was neceſſary, that the princeſs, who was to aſcend the throne, ſhould be endowed with an underſtanding, proper to ſupply the defect of the king, her husband, and have a firm reſolution to protect the miniſtry; beſides, that ſhe ſhould be of a rank, not to diſparage the king, but, at the ſame time, to have no ground naturally to aſpire to ſuch a marriage, that, entirely owing her advancement to the managers, ſhe might be always ready to ſupport them; and the earl farther deſigned to be ſtrictly united with the queen, in order to compleat the ruin of the duke of Glouceſter, who was a perpetual obſtacle to the proceedings of the miniſtry. All theſe requiſites were found in Margaret of Anjou, daughter to Rene, king of Sicily, and niece to the queen of France, who was a princeſs of a briſk and enterpriſing ſpirit, of great penetration, uncommon reſolution, and not to be deterred by oppoſition, or difficulties; and, on the other hand, the marriage, propoſed by the earl of Suffolk, was ſo advantageous, that ſhe could not have expected it, without the concurrence of ſeveral circumſtances, in her favour. I do not ſpeak of her birth, which, doubtleſs, was ſufficiently illuſtrious, to give her a pretenſion to this honour; but ſhe wanted a dowry. On this account, the Engliſh miniſters extolled her noble qualities, which, they affirmed, were more valuable than all the money in the world; but they principally inſinuated to the people, that, as this princeſs was niece to the queen of France, and to king Charles's favourite, ſhe would be extremely ſerviceable, in procuring a peace; which was evidently ſhewing, how much this peace was wanted. Accordingly, the court of France, having a perfect intelligence of what paſſed, in England, made an advantage of it, by engaging the earl of Suffolk to promiſe, in the king's name, to reſign Mans, and the whole province of Maine, to the king of Sicily, on the condition of his preſenting them to Charles of Anjou, his brother; ſo that, inſtead of receiving Margaret's dower, Henry purchaſed her with the reſtitution of one of the ſtrongeſt places, in France, or rather, with the whole province of Maine.

The terms being, thus, ſettled, the earl of Suffolk returned to England, to propoſe them to 1444. to the king, and cauſe them to be approved; which was an eaſy task, ſince the chief counſellors, having been in the ſecret, had already given their conſent. The duke of Glouceſter, who had never heard of it before, vigorouſly oppoſed it, for two reaſons, which ſeemed unanſwerable; the firſt was, that, the king being already affianced to the earl of Armagnac's daughter, it would be very diſhonourable to violate his faith, without alledging the leaſt excuſe; and the ſecond was no leſs cogent, namely, that Maine, being, as it were, the bulwark of Normandy, could not be abandoned, without expoſing Normandy to manifeſt danger, as ſoon as the truce ſhould expire. However, theſe reaſons were diſregarded; and, by the advice of the council, the earl of Suffolk was impowered, to eſpouſe the princeſs Margaret, in the name of the king.

Divers new creations. Hall.

The king, for joy the marriage was concluded, created the earl, his ambaſſador, marqueſs of Suffolk, and John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, duke of Exeter; and, at the ſame time, he made Humphrey, earl of Stafford, duke of Buckingham, and Henry de Beauchamp, ſon to the late earl of Warwick, duke of Warwick.

The king's marriage is ſolemnized, at Tours. Hall.

The king's marriage was celebrated, by proxy, at Tours, in the preſence of king Charles and his whole court, in a magnificent manner, unſuitable to the preſent circumſtances of the two kings, and the indigence of the new queen.

1445. The queen's arrival.

Tho' the nuptials were ſolemnized, in November, the queen did not come into England, till the May following; and, on the 30th of that month, ſhe was ſolemnly crowned; but ſhe was no ſooner with the king, than, perceiving his weakneſs, ſhe ruled him, with an abſolute ſway. By this means, the marqueſs of Suffolk, the cardinal of Wincheſter, and the archbiſhop of York had the ſame credit, as before the king's marriage; and they ſtood in as much need of the queen, as ſhe did of them, ſince, as yet, ſhe had no creatures, but what they had procured her; on which account, a very ſtrict union was formed, between the queen and the miniſters, that muſt neceſſarily end, in the ruin of the duke of Glouceſter, whom they all conſidered, as their common enemy.

The truce is prolonged, at an interview of the two kings.

The truce being made only to pave the way for a peace, this whole year was ſpent, in ſeveral negotiations, about the time and place of a new congreſs; and it was alſo believed, that an interview of the two kings might promote the concluſion of a treaty; wherefore, the miniſters of both courts agreed, that the two monarchs ſhould meet, ſomewhere in France, and that Henry ſhould repair to Calais, in order to be near the place to be appointed for the interview; but, ſeveral difficulties occurring about the choice of the place, the truce was prolonged, till the 11th of November, 1446.

Henry Chicheley, having held the ſee of Canterbury, 30 years, died, this year, being ſucceeded by John Stafford, biſhop of Bath and Wells. 1445.

1446. The duke of York is made regent of France, for five years longer.

The duke of York, who had no farther buſineſs, in France, returned into England, where he was very civilly received, and thanked by the court, for his ſervices to the ſtate; and the king, to ſhew his gratitude, granted him a patent to be regent of France, another five years; but we ſhall ſee, hereafter, that his enemies would not ſuffer him to enjoy that dignity ſo long.

A ſubſidy is granted for the war: Cotton.

The parliament, which met, the beginning of the year 1446, granted the king a conſiderable ſubſidy, for a vigorous proſecution of the war, in France, upon the expiration of the truce; but this pretended deſign of carrying on the war was only a decoy, to draw money from the parliament. Inſtead of preparations for a war, negotiations for the interview of the two kings, and for a congreſs of ambaſſadors, to conclude a peace, were zealouſly continued; and, in the interim, the truce was farther prolonged to the 1ſt of April, 1447. This proves, that the council did not intend to proſecute the war, tho' the parliament was called, on that pretence; and we ſhall ſee, preſently, that the truce was again prolonged, and interrupted only by an unexpected accident, contrary to the intent of the Engliſh miniſtry.

The parliament gives the marqueſs of Suffolk thanks. Cotton.

The parliament might eaſily have diſcerned the devices made uſe of, to procure ſubſidies, if they had not voluntarily ſhut their own eyes; for this was one of thoſe parliaments that are managed, as it is but too often the caſe, by the intrigues of the court. This evidently appeared, in a reſolution to return the marqueſs of Suffolk publick thanks, for his great ſervice to the kingdom, in negotiating the king's marriage; tho' the advantages, accruing to the king, or ſtate, from an alliance with the family of the moſt mortal enemy to both, had not, hitherto, been perceived. They, moreover, addreſſed the king, beſeeching him to reward the marqueſs; and they even granted a ſubſidy, on purpoſe to ſatisfy him for the expences of his ambaſſy.

A project againſt the duke of Glouceſter. Hall.

The queen, the cardinal of Wincheſter, the marqueſs of Suffolk, and the reſt of that party, having nothing to fear from a parliament ſo much at their devotion, began to project the ruin of the duke of Glouceſter, who was ever their formidable enemy; for, not only the bulk of the people were in his intereſt, but, as he was, as yet, the preſumptive heir to the crown, they had reaſon to dread, that, if he ſhould, one day, aſcend the throne, he would call them to a ſtrict account. Their firſt ſtep was to remove him from the council; and, to varniſh over this injuſtice, perſons were ſuborned to accuſe him of various crimes; the principal whereof was, that, whilſt protector of the realm, he had put ſeveral to death, by his own authority, and aggravated the condemnation of many others. Upon theſe accuſations, which made a great noiſe, he was ſummoned, before the council; but he vindicated himſelf, with ſuch evidence,

1446. from all that was charged upon him, that the council, tho' entirely conſiſting of his enemies, thought fit to drop his proſecution. It is not in England, as in other countries, where the lives of the ſubjects depend, in ſome meaſure, on the will of the ſovereign, who appoints commiſſioners, at his pleaſure, to proſecute thoſe he is inclined to deſtroy; for, to take away the duke of Glouceſter's life, in a legal manner, he muſt have been tried by his peers; but his enemies were well aware, notwithſtanding their credit, that the body of the nobility was not ſo corrupted, as to expect to cauſe the firſt prince of the blood to be condemned, upon forged crimes. In the interim, this proceeding ſo moved the Londoners, that nothing was heard, but praiſes of the duke of Glouceſter, and curſes againſt thoſe who governed, in the name of the king; and theſe murmurs, which were plain indications of the people's affection for the duke, convinced his enemies, that there was no medium between his and their ruin; and, accordingly, without farther conſideration, they reſolved to diſpatch him. The queen, who was of a bold and enterpriſing genius, was the perſon that firſt encouraged this reſolution; which is, at leaſt, inſinuated by the hiſtorians, if not expreſly aſſerted; and, indeed, the miniſtry would never have ventured upon ſuch an action, without having her at their head.

1447. The parliament is ſummoned to St. Edmundsbury. Hall.

It was impoſſible, as was obſerved, to put this prince to death, by the uſual courſe of juſtice; and it would have been very dangerous, to murder him openly. His enemies were reſolved to deſtroy him, but would conceal the hand that gave the blow; and, to execute their deſign, with all imaginable ſecrecy, they deviſed a means, countenanced, if not contrived, by the queen; namely, to accuſe him of ſome crime, in order to have a pretence to impriſon him. To accompliſh this purpoſe, it was rumoured, that a very important affair required the ſpeedy meeting of a parliament; and, accordingly, one was called for the February following. In the interim, the queen and miniſtry affected to load the duke of Glouceſter, with honours and careſſes, not to inſpire him with confidence, but with ſuſpicions; and they would have been glad, at his abſenting himſelf, or taking ſome other courſe, that would have given them an advantage againſt him. They, therefore, in order to terrify him, employed ſecret emiſſaries, to warn him to take care of himſelf, and hint that every thing was prepared for his condemnation in parliament; which was purpoſely to be convened, at St Edmundsbury, as a place more proper for this deſign than London, where he was ſupported by the people. The ſole intent of all this was to induce him to withdraw, and ſo to give himſelf ſome appearance of truth to the calumnies, to be fixed upon him; but, as he was conſcious of his own innocence, he would not, by his abſence, give occaſion to the world, to believe him guilty; yet he could not, after all, avoid falling into the ſnares of his enemies.

1447. The duke is confined. Hall.

The firſt day of the ſeſſion, the duke was apprehended and cloſely confined, without being ſuffered to keep any of his domeſticks; and, to colour over this ſevere uſage, it was induſtriouſly publiſhed, that he was accuſed of conſpiring to kill the king, in order to ſeize the crown; and, with an armed force, to deliver his ducheſs out of Kenelworth-caſtle, where ſhe was impriſoned. The firſt of theſe accuſations was ſo far from being credited by the people, that there was, preſently, a commotion in the city, in his favour, but it was ſoon appeaſed. As the people were convinced of his innocence, they imagined, that he would clear himſelf from theſe, as he had from the former charges; but he was allowed neither time, nor opportunity, to make his defence; for, the very next day, he was found dead in his bed, without any marks of violence on his body. However, the people believed, that he was murdered; and ſome ſay, that he was ſmothered, between two feather-beds; but others, that he underwent the ſame fate with Edward II. To remove theſe ſuſpicions, his body was ſhown to both houſes of parliament, and expoſed, for ſome days, to publick view; but it would have been an inſtance of great boldneſs, for a man to charge this murder upon thoſe that were conſidered, as the authors; ſince they were no leſs than the preſent miniſtry, who, by ſacrificing the firſt prince of the blood, manifeſtly diſcovered, what treatment might be expected by enemies of an inferior condition.

He is found dead in his bed.

His domeſticks are condemned for high-treaſon. Act. Pub.

In the mean while, to juſtify, in ſome meaſure, the impeachment againſt the deceaſed, ſeveral of his domeſticks were apprehended, and accuſed of being in the plot to kill the king; upon which, they were all ſentenced to die, by judges commiſſioned by the king, of whom the marqueſs of Suffolk was chief; but, tho' their crime was the moſt heinous, the king pardoned them all, without exception. This act of grace was founded upon the conſideration of Good-Friday, and the Aſſumption of the Virgin, with the like pious and religious motives; which renders it probable, that theſe people were bribed to confeſs themſelves guilty, upon aſſurance of their pardon. However this be, no inquiry was made after the ſudden death of the duke of Glouceſter; nay, it was pretended, that he was notoriouſly guilty of the crime, for which his domeſticks were condemned, tho' they had never been confronted with him; but, as theſe domeſticks were not thoſe in whom he confided, nor even ſome of the principal, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he would have been ſo imprudent, as to employ ſuch inſtruments, or communicate to them ſuch a deſign, if he had really conceived it.

The hatred of the people againſt the queen and miniſtry.

The outrage exerciſed upon a prince of this character, ſo univerſally beloved and eſteemed by the people, drew upon the queen and the miniſters an almoſt univerſal hatred, which time could never efface; and the queen, particularly, was publickly charged with the murder; yet this is the very queen, whom the French load with exceſſive encomiums, probably,

1447. bably, becauſe ſhe was of the royal family of France; tho', indeed, they very ſlightly paſs over the duke of Glouceſter's death, without attempting her vindication. As for the king, in all probability, he was not conſulted, in this infamous action; but, whether he did not ſo much as ſuſpect the authors of the murder, or wanted reſolution, to puniſh them, he can, in ſome meaſure, be excuſed, only on account of his natural weakneſs. I cannot leave this ſubject, without remarking, how ſhort-ſighted human policy is; for the queen and the reſt of the duke of Glouceſter's enemies fancied, that his death had ſecured them, from all oppoſition; but, by the juſt judgment of God, this very event was the cauſe of the ruin of the king, queen, and all that were concerned. The duke of York, now, found himſelf at liberty to aſſert his claim to the crown; a claim which occaſioned the effuſion of torrents of Engliſh blood; and which, doubtleſs, he would never have aſſerted, if there had been ſuch a competitor, as the duke of Glouceſter *.

The truce is prolonged. Act. Pub.

When this tragedy was acting, in England, the negotiations for a peace were carrying on, in France; but, as great difficulties occurred, about the projected interview of the two kings, the truce was farther prolonged to the 1ſt of January, 1448.

The truce between Burgundy and England is prolonged. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the ducheſs of Burgundy, being impowered by the duke, her husband, prolonged the truce with England, till 1459, on condition that, which of the two monarchs ſhould be deſirous of breaking it, ſhould give the other a year's notice; and, after that, a new treaty was concluded, the 4th of May, purſuant to which the truce was not to be broke, within the firſt four years.

The death of the cardinal of Wincheſter. Hall. Sandford.

The cardinal of Wincheſter, one of the principal authors of the duke of Glouceſter's death, ſurvived, only one month, the fall of his enemy; who was a prelate much more proper for the world than the church. Accordingly, he remained, to his dying moment, attached to the former; and he is reported to die, in a ſort of a paſſion, that his riches could not exempt him from the common fate of all mankind, and to ſee himſelf, in this reſpect, upon a level with the moſt miſerable.

In the mean while, the people, perceiving that the time allotted, for procuring a peace, was ſpent, in vain, loudly murmured againſt the marqueſs of Suffolk; nay, it was openly ſaid, that he had betrayed the king and the ſtate; that his treaty with the French tended only to a truce deſtructive to England, as it gave the enemy leiſure, to fortify himſelf; and that he had engaged to reſign Maine to the French, in order to marry the king to a princeſs, who had given convincing proofs of the calamities the Engliſh might expect, under her government. Theſe murmurs being ſo publick, the marqueſs, in order to ſilence them, requeſted the king to hear his defence; upon which, the king ſet him a day, to vindicate his innocence, and heard him, in his own apartment, ſeveral lords being preſent; but none of them were there, with an intent to refute him. He related all his proceedings, in France, and could eaſily juſtify his conduct, ſince he had taken care to get the king's orders, before his departure; and, having ended his ſpeech, the king declared his ſatisfaction, and granted him letters patent, under the great ſeal, acquitting him from all imputations of guilt, and prohibiting all perſons, on pain of his diſpleaſure, to accuſe or revile him; but this was incapable of putting a ſtop to the people's murmurs. Notwithſtanding the marqueſs's pretended vindication; he was looked upon, with horror, as the principal author of the duke of Glouceſter's murder; moreover, the king's marriage, procured by him, was conſidered, as one of the greateſt calamities that could befal the nation. This was the general opinion of town and country; but the court, conſiſting entirely of the queen's creatures, ſtood otherwiſe affected. The miniſters had alſo adherents, in all parts of the kingdom, that found their account, in their attachment to the court, that is, whoever held any poſt, or office, under the miniſtry; and theſe employed their authority and endeavours, to ſtifle the complaints of the people, who could not bear to ſee the adminiſtration of the publick affairs in the hands of a foreigner. The truth is, the king, incapable of governing, only lent his name to the queen, who made uſe of it, at her pleaſure; whilſt he minded nothing but his devotions, wherein the queen took care to make him ſpend his whole time, in order to divert him entirely from the government. Some have made a ſaint of this prince; but he may be ſaid to be one of thoſe ſaints, that deſerve more commendation, for the vices they have not, than for the virtues they have, and to whom a great weakneſs of mind is inſtead of merit and real worth.

It was impoſſible for the queen and the marqueſs of Suffolk to rule the kingdom alone, without raiſing jealouſy; for it was very un-

* His body was carried to St. Albans, where a noble monument, erected to his memory, ſtill remains, in the Conventual Church; and the vault, wherein his body was laid, the exact place of which was, it ſeems, then unknown, was diſcovered, in the reign of the late queen Ann. He was ſtiled, The Good Duke of Glouceſter; and, being educated in Baliol-college, he became a great proficient in learning, and was a great patron of learned men; and he was the firſt founder of the famous library, at Oxford, ſince known by the name of Bodleian, from Sir Thomas Bodley, by whom it was wonderfully increaſed. Sir Thomas Moor gives the following inſtance of this duke's ſagacity: The king coming in progreſs to St. Albans, a beggar, born blind, as he ſaid, recovered his ſight, at the ſhrine of St. Alban. The duke, being there with the king, deſired to ſee him; and, the beggar being brought, he asked him, whether he was born blind? He anſwered, Yes, truly. And can you now ſee, ſays the duke? Yes, I thank God and St. Alban, replies the beggar. Tell me, then, ſays the duke, what colour is my gown? The beggar readily told him the colour. And what colour, ſays the duke, is ſuch a one's gown? The beggar told him; and ſo of ſeveral others. You counterfeit knave, ſays the duke, how came you that was born blind, and could not ſee, till now, ſo ſuddenly to know the difference of colours? And, upon this, inſtead of an alms, he ordered him to be ſet in the ſtocks.

1447. usual to see the queens take upon them the government; and, accordingly, this was perceived with uneasiness to usurp an arbitrary power, in the name of the king, who signed, without examination, the orders that were brought him. The queen's imperious carriage, her partiality in disposing of places, and, above all, the duke of Gloucester's murder, had drawn upon her the hatred of the nation, to such a degree, that she was every-where talked of, with very little respect; and her intimate union with the marquess of Suffolk furnished her enemies with a fresh occasion to spread dishonourable reports concerning her. The marquess was no less detested than the queen; who brought her into England, and, to accomplish the marriage, sacrificed the welfare of the kingdom. Nevertheless, the king's name was so reverenced, that, besides those who were, by interest, attached to the court, many others adhered to him, from a motive of duty; wherefore, it was extremely difficult, to wrest from the queen and the favourite their present authority.

They begin to talk of the duke of York's title to the crown.

The disposition of most people, with respect to the queen and the ministers, inspired the duke of York with hopes, that he should, one day, be able to assert his title to the crown; who was, by his mother, the only heir to the house of Mortimer or Marche, descended from Lionel, third son to Edward III, and elder brother to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, whose posterity was in possession of the throne; but, perhaps, he would never have formed such a design, if the duke of Gloucester had been alive, or the people well affected to the queen and the ministry. In the interim, he contented himself, with employing secret emissaries, who industriously spread among the people discourses, tending to turn their thoughts to his title to the crown; for it was whispered about, that the house of Lancaster had usurped the throne; that, indeed, this usurpation was tolerable, whilst the kings of that house were princes of distinguished merit, and consulted the happiness and honour of the nation; and that even the present king, during his minority, gave hopes of his treading in the steps of his ancestors, and his being a worthy follower of the king, his father; but that, since he became of age, nothing glorious was to be expected from him: That, therefore, it was unreasonable for the English, to support any longer the usurpation of the crown, for the sake of a queen; who, being descended from a most mortal enemy, governed the kingdom, with an arbitrary sway; that, in viewing the posterity of Edward III, it was manifest, that the house of Marche had been unjustly deprived of the crown; that, as the duke of York was the sole heir of that house, he ought to enjoy his due right; in fine, that his illustrious qualities, his known virtue, and his signal services to the nation very strongly supported his hereditary title. These discourses, artfully spread among the people, began to gain the duke of York a party; but he appeared not himself, all this being done, in private, by his friends.

In the mean while, the queen, the favourite, and all the house of Lancaster, did not fail to take notice of what was divulged, about the pretensions of the duke of York; for, tho' he might keep himself concealed from others, it was not easy to deceive such quick-sighted persons, who were so greatly concerned in the affair. As they did not doubt, that these discourses were spread abroad, with his approbation, they judged it requisite to lessen his credit, by giving him some mortification; and, John, duke of Somerset, dying, in the interim, Edmund, his brother, who succeeded him, was considered, as a very fit person to oppose the duke of York; so that, without the least pretence, the queen and the marquess of Suffolk caused the king to remove the duke of York from the regency of France, before his term was expired, and conferred it on the new duke of Somerset. The latter was of an exceeding haughty temper; and, as his brother had been engaged in great contests with the duke of York, he behaved to him, on this occasion, so as to render him his implacable enemy. On the contrary, the duke of York extremely resented this affront; but he dissembled his resentment, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity, to discover it.

1447. The court takes from the duke of York the regency of France, and gives it to the duke of Somerset. Hall.

In the beginning of the year 1448, the king, entirely swayed by the queen's suggestions, created the marquess of Suffolk, duke of Suffolk; and it seemed to be her intent to brave the people, by daily showering her favours upon a lord, to the last degree, odious to the whole nation; but, in this, she gave her own enemies a great advantage, who only wanted occasions to incense the people against her. It is a frequent error, for those at the helm, to despise the complaints of the people; being always surrounded with flatterers, or ignorant of what passes any where, but at court, or fancying that, having most of the great men in their interest, the rest of the people are to be accounted, as nothing; but it often happens, to their cost, that the great men, and even kings, have no more power than private persons, when abandoned by the people. This will, more particularly, appear, in the course of the present reign; but we must first return to the affairs of France, which will yet afford us matter for several years.

1448. The marquess is made duke of Suffolk. Dugdale. Stow.

In the negotiation relating to the king's marriage, it was agreed, that the city of Mans, and whatever the English possessed, in Maine, should be delivered to Charles of Anjou, the future queen's uncle; but the noise this article made, in England, and the duke of Gloucester's opposition, caused the restitution to be deferred, till the present year; and, in February, Charles of Anjou, at the head of some troops, appeared before Mans, in order to take possession. The French affirm, that he besieged the city; and that the duke of Exeter, the governor, surrendered, by capitulation; but it is certain, that the duke of Exeter was not then in the place, nor was there any appearance of a siege.

Mans is delivered up to Charles of Anjou. Monstrelet. Act. Pub.

The

1448. The reſtitution was made, purſuant to an agreement between the two courts; and Henry ſent to Mans two commiſſioners, to deliver the city to the prince of Anjou. As he was entering, the two commiſſioners met him, upon the bridge, and, before a publick notary, made a formal proteſtation, declaring that the king of England's ſole deſign, in reſtoring that place, was to procure a final peace between him and Charles, his uncle, and only during the truce; moreover, he reſerved to himſelf the ſovereignty of the city and province; and, in caſe of any attempt upon his right to this ſovereignty, a power to revoke the ceſſion, without injuring his honour. Charles of Anjou did not approve of this proteſtation; but he took poſſeſſion of the place.

The truce is prolonged. Act. Pub.

After the ſurrender of Mans to the French, the negotiations for a peace, and the interview of the two kings, were continued; but, on account of ſome difficulties, the truce was farther prolonged to the 1ſt of April, in 1449; but an unforeſeen accident put an end to it, ſooner than was expected.

Surienne ſurpriſes Fougeres.

About the middle of this year, Surienne, an Arragonian, who had ſerved the king of England, 20 years, and was a knight of the garter, and governor of lower Normandy, ſcaled, in the night, the town of Fougeres, belonging to the duke of Bretagne, and took a great booty; upon which, the duke of Bretagne ſent a herald to the duke of Somerſet, then at Roan, and demanded the reſtitution of the place, with all the plunder; and the regent anſwered, that he was exceedingly diſpleaſed with this action, and he would give him all the ſatisfaction he could reaſonably deſire.

In the mean while, as it would require ſome time, to be fully informed of this affair, and to notify it to the court of England, the duke of Bretagne complained to the king of France of the truce, in which Bretagne was expreſly included; who, his affairs being in a good ſituation, and thoſe of the Engliſh in great diſorder, took fire at this news, as if the injury had been done to himſelf; and yet, if we look back on the duke of Bretagne's conduct, during the whole former war, we ſhall find, that Charles had no great cauſe to be ſatisfied with that houſe. However, perceiving it to be a fair opportunity, to renew the war, whilſt the Engliſh were unprepared, he ſent a gentleman to the duke of Somerſet, and two ambaſſadors to London, to demand reparation for this inſult; but, at the ſame time, to render it impracticable, he inſiſted on the payment of 1600,000 crowns to the duke of Bretagne, for the damages ſuſtained by the taking of Fougeres; which ſum was ſo exorbitant, that it muſt not be thought ſurpriſing, if the court of England refuſed to pay it down; moreover, it was almoſt impoſſible, that, in ſo ſhort a time, a juſt eſtimate could be made of the damages done by the Engliſh. It was alſo very ſtrange, that Charles ſhould ſo eagerly eſpouſe the duke of Bretagne's quarrel, who was not included in the truce, as his ally, but rather as a neutral prince who had often been mediator between the two kings. However, the ambaſſadors were told, that the king would take care to indemnify the duke, as ſoon as it was known, what his loſs might amount to; and, if Charles would ſend ambaſſadors to Louviers, the king of England would do the like, to ſettle all things to the common ſatisfaction of the two kings and the duke of Bretagne. 1448.

The conference, at Louviers, Hall.

At this congreſs, at Louviers, the Engliſh repreſented, that the taking of Fougeres was, without orders, and unknown to the regent; and they alſo expoſtulated againſt the ſum demanded, as highly unreaſonable; but the French roundly replied, that unleſs the duke received the ſatisfaction their maſter demanded, he would conſider the refuſal of it, as a violation of the truce. This haughty and peremptory way of negotiating, on Charles's part, aſtoniſhed the Engliſh; but, the French perſiſting in their firſt propoſition, the conference borke up, without any effect.

Charles ſeeks occaſion to renew the war. Hall.

So intent was Charles upon renewing the war, during the indolence of the Engliſh, that, if the Engliſh ſhould reſolve to give the ſatisfaction required, he had another pretence for a rupture; pretending that they had violated the truce with Scotland, and he was obliged to undertake the cauſe of the Scots. Indeed, there had been a conflict between the Engliſh and Scots; wherein the Engliſh had been defeated; and Buchanan makes it a pitched battle, affirming that the Engliſh loſt 3000 men; yet this affair does not appear to have been of ſo great conſequence, ſince it was preſently ſuppreſſed. This year, the two nations renewed their truce, without fixing the time of its continuance; only it was agreed, that, which of the two kings ſhould deſire to break it, he ſhould give the other notice, ſo long beforehand; however, king James had not deſired Charles, to interpoſe in this quarrel, and, conſequently, it is manifeſt, that Charles ſought an occaſion of rupture.

1449. The imprudence of the council of England.

Whilſt Charles was preparing for a war, he amuſed the Engliſh with fruitleſs negotiations; and the court of England's imprudence, at this juncture, is very amazing; for they knew neither, how to preſerve the truce, nor make preparations for war. To avoid a rupture, they ſhould, at leaſt, have reſtored Fougeres to the duke of Bretagne, with the promiſe of a reparation of all damages; but they kept the place, without uſing any effectual endeavours, to appeaſe that incenſed prince. The council, who took more care to introduce the queen's and the duke of Suffolk's creatures, than perſons qualified to manage the publick affairs, ſeemed to be ſeized with a ſpirit of inconſideration; and one would have imagined, that the queen, being without iſſue, was in a plot with the king's enemies, to deprive him of all he ſtill poſſeſſed, in France. If ſhe, and her favourites and miniſters, or even the whole council, had ſuch a deſign, they were but too ſucceſsful; but, however that be, the faults they committed, on this occaſion, are only to be excuſed, from the conſideration of Charles's haughtineſs, who rendered an agreement impracticable; yet, at the ſame time, they ſhould have prepared for their defence.

As

1449. As ſoon as Charles was in a condition to renew the war, he cauſed the caſtle of Conches, and Pont de l' Arche, in Normandy, and alſo Gerberoy, in Beauvoiſis, Cognac and St. Maigrine in Guienne, to be ſurpriſed, in the name of the duke of Bretagne. The Engliſh complained, in their turn, of the violation of the truce; but they were told, that it was by way of reprizals for Fougeres. Thus, the war was rekindled, when it was diſadvantageous to the Engliſh; for, as they were unprepared, the duke of Somerſet, regent of France, wanted forces, when he had moſt occaſion for them. Charles had, therefore, free ſcope to puſh his conqueſts; which renders it improbable, that the ſurprize of Fougeres was unknown to the court of England. It muſt otherwiſe be thought, that either the miniſters had loſt their ſenſes, in not providing for the ſupport of their enterprize, or had among them traytors, who, by this means, intended to re-engage the Engliſh in war, before they were ready; doubtleſs, when it is conſidered, that the court was ſo remiſs to ſatisfy the duke of Bretagne, and to prepare for war, it is hard to know, what judgment to paſs on ſuch a conduct.

Charles ſurpriſes ſeveral places of the Engliſh. Monſtrelet.

Charles's principal deſign was to recover Normandy, and, with this view, he had prepared four armies; a plain demonſtration, that he did not deſire, that the affair of Fougeres ſhould end in an agreement. The firſt of theſe armies was headed by himſelf; the earl of Dunois, lately made earl of Longueville, and generaliſſimo of the kings forces, under the conſtable, commanded the ſecond; the duke of Alenſon had the command of the third; and the duke of Bretagne, of the fourth, entirely conſiſting of his own troops. All the towns of Normandy were ill ſupplied with men and ammunition; and moſt of the governors, depending upon the truce, were gone to England; ſo that the French armies eaſily recovered moſt of the towns. Several places ſurrendered, even without an attack; ſome, taking arms, expelled the Engliſh garriſons; and others were ſold by the commanding officers. Pont Audemer and Chateau-Galliard were the only places, that made a tolerable defence; and, in a word, without a needleſs detail of all the ſieges, whether real, or feigned, it is ſufficient to ſay, that, before the campaign was ended, Charles was able to beſiege Roan, where he had friends. Having aſſembled all his forces, making 50,000 men, he ordered the capital of Normandy to be inveſted, the 8th of October; but he would not form a regular ſiege, being well aſſured, that the duke of Somerſet and the earl of Shrewſbury, ſhut up there, with only 3000 men, were unable to defend themſelves againſt the inhabitants, who had promiſed to riſe, in his favour; and, indeed, within a few days, the earl of Dunois was going to be introduced, at St. Hilary's gate, with 300 men, if the earl of Shrewsbury had not come very ſeaſonably, and repulſed that detachment.

He acts againſt Normandy with four armies. Monſtrelet.

The inhabitants, in ſpite of this diſappointment, perſiſted in their reſolution; and, on the 19th of October, the whole city riſing in arms, all, that the duke of Somerſet could do, was to diſtribute his garriſon, in ſome of the moſt advantageous poſts; but the French quickly forced all theſe poſts, ſword in hand. There was only the palace left, where the duke of Somerſet and the earl of Shrewsbury were, with 800 men; who foreſeeing that they ſhould ſoon be in want of proviſions, the duke deſired an interview with the king, in order to capitulate; which being granted, he offered to retire, upon honourable terms. The king inſiſted upon his ſurrrendering, at diſcretion, unleſs he would treat, for the reſt of Normandy; but, as this point could not be adjuſted, the duke returned to the palace, and held out, 10 or 12 days longer; tho', at laſt, he was conſtrained to capitulate, on condition of leaving all his artillery, paying 50,000 crowns of gold, and delivering to the king Caudebec, Arques, Lillebonne, Tancarville, Montravilliers, and Harfleur. The earl of Shrewsbury was left, in hoſtage, for the performance of this engagement; and, the Engliſh garriſon marching out of Roan, Charles made his entry, on the 19th of November. The governor of Harfleur refuſing to comply with this capitulation, the earl of Longueville was detached by the king, to beſiege that place, which ſurrendered, the beginning of January; yet, tho' Charles might, in juſtice, have detained the earl of Shrewsbury, ſince the capitulation of Roan was not fully obſerved by the Engliſh, he releaſed him, as a mark of his eſteem, without a ranſom. In the interim, the earl of Foix, commander, in Guienne, for king Charles, took the caſtle of Mauleon, ſtanding upon an inacceſſible rock; and, thus, ended the firſt campaign, which proved ſo fatal to the Engliſh.

1449. The citizens of Roan open the gates to the French. Monſtrelet.

The court of England was not only concerned for the ill poſture of affairs, in France, but a rebellion, raiſed in Ireland, at the ſame time, increaſed their uneaſineſs; yet the queen and the duke of Suffolk reaped ſome advantage, by theſe commotions, as they afforded them a pretence, to remove the duke of York. This prince, being a trouble to them, was ſent into Ireland, under colour of being the moſt proper perſon, to ſuppreſs the rebellion; but with ſo few troops, that it was hoped, he would either periſh, in the attempt, or forfeit his reputation. The duke, perceiving their deſign, wiſely turned againſt themſelves the artifice they uſed for his ruin; and he ſo managed, that, by his mild and gentle behaviour, he won the Iriſh, and reſtored them to their duty, without compulſive methods; nay, thenceforward, they were always attached to the ſervice of himſelf and family, even in the midſt of his greateſt misfortunes.

A rebellion in Ireland.

The univerſal confuſion of the affairs of France, the negligence of the court, in that reſpect, and the loſs of almoſt all Normandy, in a ſingle campaign, the conqueſt whereof had coſt ſo much blood, began, at length, openly to provoke the impatient temper of the Engliſh; and the whole kingdom rung with complaints againſt the duke of Suffolk. It was publickly 1450. The complaints of the people againſt the duke of Suffolk and the queen.

1450. publickly ſaid, that he had betrayed the ſtate; and that Maine, the key of Normandy, was reſigned to the French, for the accompliſhment of a marriage, beneficial to none but himſelf; and he was accuſed of being the chief author of the duke of Glouceſter's death, leſt that diſcerning prince ſhould ſee through his treaſonable practices. It was complained, that there were few perſons of parts, and ſtill fewer of virtue, in the council; that, on the contrary, the board was filled with vicious counſellors, without principles of honour, or conſcience, that they might be entirely devoted to the will of the queen, and her miniſter; and that it was the ſame thing, with reſpect to thoſe in the publick poſts, in whom honeſty and capacity were not ſo much required, as an attachment to the miniſtry. It was likewiſe ſaid, that the queen governed, with inſupportable haughtineſs, a free nation, and which had never ſuffered a deſpotick power; and it was added, that the uſurpation of ſuch a power was intolerable, even in a king, much leſs in a foreign queen. It was farther obſerved, that, by degrees, ſhe had turned out of the council all thoſe that gave her any umbrage, in order to ſubſtitute ſuch as were at her devotion; being altogether regardleſs, whether they were qualified for ſo high an employment.

The parliament meets. Cotton.

Thus, were the people diſpoſed, when the parliament met, the beginning of the year 1450. The court wanted a ſubſidy, to enable them to reſtore the affairs of France; or elſe muſt entirely abandon them, and ſo give their enemies a farther advantage againſt them. The queen ſoon perceived, that a general diſcontent had ſeized the very members of parliament; and ſhe judged, that it would be more advantageous to remove the parliament to Leiceſter, where ſhe expected to have a greater ſway, than at London, of whoſe inhabitants ſhe was jealous; but ſhe was ſo vigorouſly oppoſed by the lords, that ſhe was obliged to deſiſt; and, in all probability, ſomething was feared like what had paſſed, at St. Edmund's-bury, with reſpect to the duke of Glouceſter.

Upon the meeting of the parliament, the commons preſented to the lords an indictment againſt the earl of Suffolk, containing the following articles:

Articles of impeachment againſt Suffolk. Cotton.

I. That the duke of Suffolk had treated with the baſtard of Orleans, and the other French ambaſſadors, to perſuade king Charles to invade England; that he might place his ſon on the throne, whom he deſigned to marry with Margaret, only daughter to John, duke of Somerſet.

II. That, bribed by the French, he had releaſed the duke of Orleans, againſt the expreſs orders of the late king.

III. That Normandy was invaded, by his means and advice.

IV. That, whilſt an ambaſſador, in France, he engaged to ſurrender Maine to the French, without the conſent of the other ambaſſadors, and drew the king and council to confirm his engagement.

V. That he had informed the enemies, of the weakneſs of the Engliſh towns, in France, and encouraged them to aſſault them. 1450.

VI. That he had betrayed the ſecrets of the council to the enemies of the ſtate.

VII. That he had hindered the concluſion of a peace, by diſcovering the weakneſs of England.

VIII. That he had boaſted, in the hearing of ſeveral lords, that his credit, at the French court, was no leſs, than at the Engliſh.

IX. That he had obſtructed the ſending of ſuccours to France, that the enemies might make the greater progreſs.

X. That he had included, in the treaty of truce, neither the king of Arragon, nor the duke of Bretagne; by which affected neglect, England had loſt their alliance.

The duke's defence.

The duke of Suffolk anſwered theſe accuſations, by a formal denial of the greateſt part, and required the proofs; but, as to the articles which he owned, he produced the king's expreſs orders; tho' that was not a ſufficient vindication, ſince his principal crime was the abuſe of his credit with the king, and his impoſing upon the council. Hiſtorians remark, that he cleared himſelf from all, except the laſt article, relating to the duke of Bretagne. Indeed, it is certain, in the firſt treaty of truce concluded, at Tours, and in ſeveral treaties to prolong it, the duke of Bretagne was included only by France; but this is a myſtery, that it is extremely difficult to unravel. The duke of Bedford obliged the duke of Bretagne to abandon Charles, and acknowledge Henry, for king of France; ſince that time, there had been no rupture between England and Bretagne; and yet Charles took care to comprize the duke of Bretagne in the treaty of truce, concluded at Tours, tho' he is not ſo much as mentioned by the Engliſh. Was it through negligence, forgetfulneſs, or with deſign? The laſt is the moſt probable. However, the duke of Suffolk had, in ſome degree, repaired this error, by including the duke of Bretagne, as an ally of England, in the prolongation of the truce, in 1447, as appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts; but that was not, enough, it ſeems, to ſatisfy enemies.

The queen, ſeeing the ill ſituation of the duke's affairs, ſo managed, that the king ſent him to the tower, not ſo much with an intent to puniſh him, as to give ſome appearance of ſatisfaction to the commons; and, in the interim, leſt they ſhould perſiſt in their proſecution, ſhe cauſed the parliament to be adjourned to Leiceſter. Preſently after, the duke came out of the tower, and reſumed his old poſt, at court; and the news of his enlargement raiſed a ſedition, in Kent, headed by a fuller; but, before the rebels could make any conſiderable attempt, the ring-leaders were apprehended and executed, and, by that means, the ſedition was ſtifled, in its birth.

The parliament being re-aſſembled, at Leiceſter, the king and queen appeared, attended by the duke of Suffolk, as their prime miniſter; but the commons were extremely 1250. offended, at this proceeding, which they conſidered, as a bravado; and they went, in a body, and petitioned the king, that the perſons concerned, in delivering Normandy to the French, might be puniſhed, according to their deſerts. This petition alarmed the queen; who perceived, that the commons were intent upon the duke of Suffolk's ruin, and that it was impoſſible to prevent it, without coming to an open rupture with the lower-houſe; wherefore, to ſave the miniſter a part of the puniſhment which, probably, was deſigned him, ſhe reſolved to prevent a formal ſentence, which could not but have been very ſevere, in the preſent juncture. A few days after, the king baniſhed the duke, for five years, and removed all his creatures; and the duke, apprehending this exile to be a proper means, to ſecure him from the fury of the people, ſpeedily embarqued for France; but he could not avoid his deſtiny. He was met, in his paſſage, by an Engliſh ſhip, called the Nicholas; and the captain, ſearching the duke's veſſel, and finding him there, ordered his head to be ſtruck off, without any farther ceremony. Thus, fell William de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, who, a few days before, was the greateſt and moſt potent perſon, in England. It is uncertain, whether he was guilty of all the crimes, the commons laid to his charge; but it cannot be denied, that the diſaſters, which, ſucceſſively, happened to the affairs of the Engliſh, in France, were the effects of his ill conduct; if it be true, that they are not to be conſidered, as the conſequences of a plot, formed to deprive the king of all his conqueſts, in France.

The duke of Suffolk is beheaded, in his paſſage to France. April. Hall.

By the duke of Suffolk's death, the duke of York was freed from a powerful enemy; who, being attached to the houſe of Lancaſter, would, queſtionleſs, have vigorouſly oppoſed the execution of his deſigns. Tho' this prince was, in Ireland, his friends effectually ſerved him, in England, by extolling his merit, and repreſenting to the people the king's incapacity, and the queen's male-adminiſtration; and theſe diſcourſes, together with the entire loſs of Normandy, which fell out, at the ſame time, daily augmented the number of the duke's adherents. He had perfect intelligence of what paſſed; but, unwilling to hazard himſelf, to no purpoſe, he deviſed an expedient, which he judged proper, in order to ſound the people's inclinations. By his inſtigation, Jack Cade, an Iriſhman, aſſumed the name of John Mortimer, of the houſe of Marche, executed in the beginning of this reign; and, under this fictitious name, he repaired into Kent, where the duke of York had a good intereſt, and drew together great numbers of malecontents, under the pretence of its being neceſſary to reform the government, and eaſe the people; but ſuch was the general diſaffection of the nation, with reſpect to the court, that, in a few days, Cade found himſelf in a condition to incamp on Black-Heath, near London.

The duke of York aſpires to the crown. Hall. Biondi.

Jack Cade's inſurrection in Kent. Hall.

The king, hearing of the approach of the rebels, ſent to know the reaſon of their appearing in arms. Cade anſwered for all, that they had no ill deſign againſt the king's perſon; that their intent was, to petition the parliament, that the evil miniſters might be puniſhed, and the people rendered more happy than of late; and, a few days after, they preſented to the parliament two petitions, ſetting forth the grievances of the nation. Among other things, they prayed, that the duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed, ſince he was the principal author of the loſs of Normandy; and that the king's council might be filled with the princes of the blood, and other prudent and penetrating perſons, and not with vicious and profligate men, of ill principles and manners, and incapable of managing the affairs of the ſtate. Theſe petitions being communicated to the king, the council condemned them, as ſeditious, and reſolved to ſuppreſs the rebellion, by force of arms; upon which, the the king, aſſembling a body of 15000 men, headed them himſelf, and marched againſt the rebels. Henry approaching, Cade, as if he was afraid, retired, and lay in ambuſh in a wood, near Sevenoak, not doubting but the king would purſue him; but Henry, fancying that the rebels were diſperſed, returned to London, being contented with ſending after them a detachment of his army, commanded by Sir Humphrey Stafford; which, falling into the ambuſh, were cut in pieces, and the commander himſelf loſt his life, in the fight. 1450.

He preſents two petitions to the parliament. Hall. Stow.

At the ſame time, Cade marched towards London, whilſt the king and the whole court haſtily retired to Kenelworth-caſtle, leaving a garriſon in the tower, under the command of the lord Scales; and his ſucceſs againſt Stafford increaſed his army with multitudes, who flocked from all parts, to join him. The city of London opened her gates to the rebels; and Cade entered, as it were, in triumph, at the head of his troops; but he prohibited, under rigorous penalties, the offering any injury to the inhabitants. Next day, hearing that the lord Say, high-treaſurer, was in the city, he ordered him to be apprehended, and beheaded; and towards the evening, he retired to Southwark, and continued, for ſome days, to enter the city, in the morning, and go out again, at night, on purpoſe to remove from the citizens all occaſion of fear.

Cade is let into London. Stow.

He beheads the high-treaſurer.

Cade's ſoldiers and the Londoners lived, at firſt, very friendly together; but at laſt, the former committing ſome riot in the city, when they would have entered, according to cuſtom, in the morning, they found the bridge-gate ſhut againſt them; upon which, a battle enſued, between them and the citizens, which laſted, all day, and ended, at the approach of night, by a ceſſation of arms, till the morrow. In the interim, the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the chancellor, who ſecured themſelves in the tower, obſerving, by their ſpies and the proceedings of the rebels, that they began to be diſpirited, inſtantly drew up a general pardon, put the great ſeal to it, and cauſed it to be proclaimed, in the night, in Southwark; which produced ſuch a ſudden and ſurpriſing effect, that, before day, Cade was 1450. was deſerted by his followers, and forced to fly, alone, and conceal himſelf, in the county of Suſſex, but the king promiſing, by proclamation, 5000 marks to any perſon that ſhould bring him dead, or alive, he was ſlain, in his retreat, by Alexander Iden, a gentleman of Kent, who brought his body to London. Notwithſtanding the pardon, under the great ſeal, many of his acomplices were executed; and, thus, ended this dangerous rebellion, which might have been attended with more fatal conſequences, had it been conducted by a more experienced leader.

Cade is deſerted, and ſlain Act. Pub.

In the mean while, the war was carried on, in Normendy, but ſtill to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh; but the queen, perceiving that the people's diſcontent partly proceeded from the ill ſucceſs of the affairs of France, had ſent 1500 men to the duke of Somerſet, under Sir Thomas Kiriel, who landed, at Cherburg. His intent was to lead his troops to Caen, where the duke of Somerſet then was; but, it being dangerous to march with ſo ſmall a body he was joined upon the road by ſeveral detachments of the Engliſh garriſons. The French authors affirm, that, by this junction, the Engliſh army amounted to 5000 men, but this is very improbable. However that be, the conſtable Richemont, being informed of Kiriel's deſign, ſpeedily drew together a body of 7000 men, and expected him, at Fourmigni, through which he was to paſs. The two armies engaging, the Engliſh, tho' leaſt numerous, long defended themſelves, with undaunted bravery; but, at length, they were put to rout, and their general taken priſoner. Upon comparing this battle, with a certain prediction of the Maid of Orleans, that the Engliſh ſhould be entirely expelled the kingdom, by a defeat, much greater than thoſe of Orleans and Patay, one is apt to conclude, ſhe was not perfectly inſpired; for in the battle of Fourmigni, the only one, ſince Joans death, the Engliſh, even according to their enemies, were, at moſt, but 5000, and loſt only 1500; tho' for the ſake of the prophecy, the French hiſtorians talk of the battle of Fourmigni, in very lofty terms, comparing it to the moſt memorable engagements

The continuation of the war in Normandy.

Kiriel's reinforcement being defeated, the duke of Somerſet could no longer withſtand the victorious arms of the French; but it is needleſs to give a particular account of the ſieges carried on by the French, in this ſecond campaign; ſince it is ſufficient to ſay, in a word, that, about the middle of Auguſt, Charles became maſter of all Normandy. The city of Caen was inveſted, the 4th of June; and, the 21ſt, the duke of Somerſet capitulated, contrary to the opinion of ſome of the officers, who maintained that he did it too ſoon. Falaiſe, Domfront, and Cherburg were beſieged, at once; and the campaign ended in Normandy, with the taking of Cherburg, which ſurrendered, the 12th of Auguſt. Thus, in two campaigns Charles reduced the whole province, not ſo much as a ſingle town remaining in the hands of the Engliſh.

Charles compleats the conqueſt of Normandy.

The parliament met, at Weſtminiſter, the 6th of November; and, about the ſame time, the duke of Somerſet, having nothing more to do, in France, returned into England. He was blamed, for the loſs of Normandy, and particularly of Caen, where he was accuſed of having failed in his duty. Theſe complaints were ſo publickly made, that the commons could not avoid taking notice of them; who petitioned the king, to ſend the duke of Somerſet to the tower, that his conduct might be examined. Henry, unwilling to diſoblige the commons, at ſuch a juncture, granted their requeſt; and the populace of London were ſo tranſported with joy, at the news of the duke's being in the tower, that they, immediately, roſe and plundered his palace. They would have proceeded farther, if the king had not ſpeedily iſſued out a proclamation to diſperſe them; nevertheleſs, ſome of the moſt audacious continued the tumult, till one of the moſt inſolent was beheaded. The parliament was no ſooner broke up, than the duke of Somerſet was releaſed; who aſſumed, at court, the poſt enjoyed by the duke of Suffolk. 1450.

If the Engliſh were unable to prevent the loſs of Normandy, they were ſtill leſs in a condition to defend Guienne, which was more remote; and king Charles, improving the preſent opportunity, had now ſent his troops into that province, where, this very year, his generals took Bergerac, Genſac, Montferrand, Chalais, and St. Foi, which made but a very faint reſiſtance; but the ſeaſon, being very far advanced, hindered them from purſuing their conqueſts.

Charles takes ſeveral places in Guienne. Monſtrelet.

During the winter, the earl of Orval, of the houſe of Albret, making inroads, to the very gates of Bourdeaux, the mayor ſallied out with 10,000 men, to attack him; but, how inferior ſoever Orval might be, in number of troops, he defeated this undiſciplin'd militia, ſlew a great part of them, and took many priſoners.

The earl of Orval beats the trained bands of Bourdeaux. Monſtrelet.

In April, 1451, the army of France, commanded by the baſtard of Orleans, earl of Dunois and Longueville, was 40,000 ſtrong; who ſoon became maſter of Montguion, in Xaintonge; and, May the 16th, he laid ſiege to Blaye, and carried it, the 21ſt. There was not only no Engliſh army in the field, but not even the leaſt appearance, that the court of England effectually thought of defending Guienne; and the French general, taking the advantage of this juncture, divided his army into four bodies, the moſt conſiderable of which he commanded himſelf. He gave the command of the other three to the earls of Foix, Pontievre, and Armagnac; and all theſe generals very eaſily made ſeveral conqueſts. Libourn, Caſtillon, Dacs, Rioure, and Bourg ſurrendered, in a ſhort time; and Fronſac, the ſtrongeſt place of the province, held out, only three days; however, the caſtle made a brave defence. 1451.

1451. The great progreſs of the French, in Guienne. Monſtrelet.

The inhabitants of Guienne finding themſelves, thus, abandoned by the king of England, thought it time to provide for their ſafety; and, the ſtates of the province, being aſſembled, Bourdeaux and the reſt of Guienne treat with Charles.

1451. aſſembled, at Bourdeaux, in June, reſolved voluntarily to ſubmit to king Charles, to avoid their utter deſtruction. Accordingly, they concluded, with the earl of Dunois, a treaty, promiſing to own the ſovereignty of the king of France, if, before the 24th of the ſame month, they were not relieved by an army, able to give battle. The French general ran no riſque, in granting this condition, being well aſſured, that no preparations were made, in England, for the aſſiſtance of Guienne; and, the army not appearing, all the towns of the duchy opened their gates to the French, except Bayonne, which refuſed to be included in the treaty. This place, the only one the Engliſh had left, was inveſted, the 6th of Auguſt; and, the breach being large enough, on the 19th, the beſiegers were preparing to ſtorm; but the inhabitants ſaved them the the trouble, by riſing in arms, and obliging the garriſon to come to a capitulation. The French hiſtorians affirm, that a white croſs was ſeen in the air, juſt over the town; an evident ſign of God's protection to France.

Whilſt the court of England careleſly ſuffered Guienne to be loſt, they grew extremely uneaſy, with reſpect to the duke of York; for, as, in the Kentiſh rebellion, Jack Cade aſſumed the name of Mortimer, it was evident, that his intent was to ſound the people's inclination to the houſe of Marche; and conſequently, that he was encouraged by the duke of York, the ſole heir of that family. Indeed, the thing was palpable; but there was no evidence, to convict the duke, becauſe Cade was ſlain; moreover, as the people were diſpoſed, with regard to the court, they would infallibly have joined with the duke of York, if, by being publickly attacked, he had been forced to ſtand upon his defence. In the interim, as he was ſuſpected of forming ſome plot, in Ireland, and of deſigning to bring an army of Iriſh into England, the king ſent orders to the ſheriffs of Wales, Shropſhire, and Cheſhire, to be in a readineſs to hinder his landing; which precaution produced ſeveral pernicious effects. Firſt of all, it demonſtrated, that the court was afraid of the duke of York, which it would have been prudent to conceal, leſt the people ſhould, from thence, take occaſion to inquire into the reaſon; and, in the next place, the duke found it was his buſineſs to be upon his guard; whereas, if the court had ſeemed ignorant of his deſigns, they might have drawn him into ſome ſnare, or given him room, to make ſome falſe ſtep, which would have given them an advantage. In fine, this furniſhed him with a pretence to complain, ſince he was ſo far from being convicted of any project againſt the king, that he had not taken any apparent ſtep, on which an accuſation could be grounded; and, accordingly, he wrote to the king, complaining of this ſuſpicion, which he repreſented, as extremely injurious, and as purely contrived to pave the way for his ruin. The king ſent him a very civil anſwer, giving him ſome ſort of ſatisfaction; but he did not revoke his orders.

Tho' Cade's enterprize had miſcarried, it anſwered the end the duke of York propoſed; 1451. for by it he diſcovered, how much the nation was diſpleaſed with the queen and the miniſtry; and that the memory of the rights of the houſe of Marche was not entirely aboliſhed. He judged, that, if the bare ſhadow of one of his family was capable of cauſing ſo great a multitude take up arms, much more would the people be attached to a prince of the blood-royal, the ſole heir of this houſe; but, in the interim, not to be too haſty, in the execution of a project of ſuch conſequence, he reſolved, before any thing was attempted, to conſult his friends. The time of his government of Ireland being expired, he embarqued for England; but, when he would have landed, in Wales, he found, at the port, the militia in arms ready to oppoſe him. He landed, however, at another place, which was not ſo ſtrongly guarded; and with the greater boldneſs, as he had only his own ſervants with him, and had, as yet, given his enemies no handle againſt him; after which, he repaired to London, from whence the court was gone, ſome time before, in progreſs to the weſtern counties.

He concerts meaſures with his friends. Biondi.

The duke of York was impatiently expected, at London; for his friends had often conferred together, in his abſence, but could not come to any reſolution, without him. His principal adherents were John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, Richard Nevil, earl of Salisbury, ſon-in-law to the general of that name, ſlain before Orleans, Richard Nevil, his ſon, who was, ſoon after, earl of Warwick, by his marriage with Ann Beauchamp, daughter to the earl of Warwick, who died, in France, Thomas Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, tho' brother-in-law to the duke of Somerſet, and Edward Brook, baron of Cobham; and with theſe lords the duke, immediately after his arrival, concerted meaſures, for the execution of his deſigns. The reſult of their conſultations was, that the duke ſhould retire into Wales, where the family of Marche had always had a great intereſt; that he ſhould privately be aſſured of ſeaſonably raiſing an army, by means of his friends; and that he ſhould then write to the king, to adverti ſe him of the people's diſlike of the miniſtry, and particularly of the duke of Somerſet.

He retires into Wales and writes to the king to reform the government. Stow.

Purſuant to this reſolution, the duke, repairing into Wales, having previouſly taken all proper ſteps, wrote to the king, "That "the whole nation was diſſatisfied, becauſe "traytors were ſcreened from juſtice; and "that he took the freedom to adviſe him, to "prevent the dangerous conſequences of ſuch "a general diſcontent: That the ſpeedieſt "means was to give orders for the trial of "the guilty, and particularly the duke of "Somerſet, who, tho' impeached by the "commons, was reſtored to favour, without "any examination; and, in fine, that, if he "would give the nation this ſatisfaction, he "offered to aſſiſt, in the accompliſhment of "ſo good a deſign." The miniſtry evidently perceived, that the duke of York ſought an occaſion of quarrel; but, as, in their preſent ſituation, 1451. situation, they durſt not act imperiouſly, it was judged adviſable for the king, to ſend the duke a civil anſwer, which would diſappoint him of the pretence he wanted. Accordingly, the king, in his letter, told him, that he had reſolved, ſome time ſince, to reform all abuſes in the government; and intended to appoint a certain number of virtuous and able counſellors, of whom he was deſigned to be one: That, as for the traytors mentioned, in his letter, he did not mean to let them paſs, with impunity; but the affair, being of very great conſequence, required mature deliberation; and that, as for the duke of Somerſet, in particular, he ſhould not be excuſed from anſwering the accuſations laid to his charge.

Tho' this anſwer deprived the duke of York of all pretence to take up arms; yet he imagined that the king's bare refuſal to remove, or puniſh, the miniſters complained of, was a ſufficient warrant. He did not expect ſo mild an anſwer; and, as he had raiſed an army, he determined, not to ſuffer himſelf to be decoyed by a moderation, which might be as well feigned as real; and, therefore, putting himſelf, at the head of his army, he marched towards London; but he found, that the queen had not been ſo remiſs, as he expected. Upon notice of the duke's retiring into Wales, ſhe had ordered troops to be levied, in the king's name, without diſcovering her intentions; ſo that the duke was no ſooner on his march, than he heard the king was advancing, to give him battle. Tho' he wanted neither valour, nor experience, he thought it imprudent to hazard a battle with the king, without a more plauſible pretence than he had, at preſent. His intent was to gain the people; but to fight the king, without a more ſpecious reaſon, was not the way to compaſs his ends, tho' he could even have been ſure of proving victorious. Beſides, conſidering the city of London, as able to incline the balance to his ſide, he believed, that, before all things, he ought to ſecure this metropolis; wherefore, when he found, that the king was coming againſt him, he, on a ſudden, altered his rout, and, by ſpeedy marches, got before him, and appeared before London, where he expected to be received with open arms; but he had the mortification to find the gates ſhut, the inhabitants not thinking it expedient to declare for him, whilſt the king was ſo cloſely purſuing him with a more powerful army. He was forced, therefore, to paſs the Thames, at Kingſton, and encamp, on Burnt-Heath, 12 miles from London; and the king, following him, marched over London-bridge, and encamped, about four miles from him.

The two armies being ſo near each other, that nothing could prevent an engagement, the king ſent two biſhops to the duke, to know the cauſe of his appearing in arms; and, as his hopes of gaining London were defeated, he ſhewed ſome regard for the court, leſt he ſhould ruin his affairs, by haſty reſolutions. He replied, that he never had entertained the leaſt thoughts of revolting from the king, but that his ſole intent was to remove from his perſon evil counſellors, of whom the duke of Somerſet was the chief; and that, if the king would impriſon him, till he ſhould, in parliament, anſwer to the accuſations againſt him, he would diſmiſs his troops. He did not expect, that his demand would be granted, ſince the king and queen were ſolely directed by the counſels of him, who was moſt concerned to have it rejected; hoping, by this means to, throw all the blame on the court, and demonſtrate to the people, that the miniſtry did not ſcruple to expoſe the kingdom to a civil war, for the ſake of a man whom the nation ſo extremely deteſted; but, for once, he was the dupe of his own policy. The king took him at his word, promiſed to ſend his enemy to the tower, and even ordered him to be, forthwith, arreſted; and the duke of York was ſurpriſed at his condeſcenſion. He could have heartily wiſhed to recede from his engagement; but, as this would lay himſelf too open, he believed, that he ſhould run ſome riſque, rather than hazard the loſs of the people's affection, which was the foundation of all his expectations; wherefore, he, immediately, disbanded his troops and came to court, not vouchſafing even to take any precaution for his ſafety. When he was in the king's preſence, he accuſed the duke of Somerſet, with great warmth, and attempted to perſuade the king, that he was a traytor, and had ſacrificed the welfare of the kingdom to his avarice and ambition. Upon theſe words, the duke of Somerſet, who was concealed, behind the hangings, ſuddenly appeared, to anſwer him, and accuſed him of conſpiring to dethrone the king; but the duke of York, ſeeing his enemy before him, and in the king's apartment, whom he imagined to be in ſafe cuſtody, found he was amuſed, and perceived his danger. Nevertheleſs, without diſcovering any concern, he modeſtly complained of the king's breach of promiſe, by the ſuggeſtions of the duke of Somerſet, on whom he charged the baſeneſs of this fraud; upon which, the king diſmiſſed the duke of York, and ordered him to be apprehended, as ſoon as he was out of his preſence.

The duke of York is apprehended.

If the duke of York's enemies had dared to gratify their reſentment, he would never have eſcaped from the ſnare, into which he had imprudently fallen; but ſuch was the poſture of affairs, and the diſpoſition of the people, that they durſt not proceed againſt him. Two other reaſons alſo contributed to preſerve him; for it was rumoured, at court, that the young earl of Marche, his ſon, attended by all the adherents of his family, was advancing, with a powerful body of troops, to deliver his father; which would, probably, be joined by the duke's army, that was lately disbanded; and, on the other hand, the Gaſcoigns had ſent deputies to the king, to offer to reduce Guienne to his obedience, if he would ſend them ſupplies. At ſuch a juncture, it was believed, that, as the duke of York's blood could not be ſpilt, without involving the kingdom in a civil war, it would be neceſſary to detain the 1452. troops designed for the recovery of Guienne. These considerations prevailed on the queen and the duke of Somerset to release the duke of York, tho' their own, the king's, and the whole house of Lancaster's interest, required, that he should be sacrificed to their safety; and, perhaps, all the calamities, England afterwards suffered, might, have been, prevented by his death. However, as the queen and ministers were willing, by all possible means, to secure themselves against his designs, they obliged him to take an oath to the king, by which he swore to remain his faithful subject, during his life, and never to take up arms against him. Upon this, the duke of York retired to his castle of Wigmore; and the duke of Somerset enjoyed, without a rival, his authority, at court.

Whilst Henry was employed, at home, in opposing the duke of York, Charles had a no less enemy to encounter, in his own kingdom; for the dauphin, his son, a prince of a turbulent disposition, gave him the greatest uneasiness. He had, for some time past, resided, in Dauphine, where he acted, as sovereign, regardless of the king his father's orders; and he had even the rashness, to demand of the duke of Savoy his daughter, Violante, in marriage; who complied with his request, neither of them vouchsafing to acquaint the king with the matter. Charles, provoked at this proceeding, put himself at the head of 30,000 men, and marched towards Lyons, intent upon chastising his son, and punishing the duke of Savoy's presumption; but the revolution, that fell out, at the same time, in Guienne, caused him to take other measures.

The Gascoigns, who had been, for 300 years, without interruption, under the dominion of the kings of England, had submitted to king Charles, solely because they were neglected by the English; and no sooner had the French army quitted Guienne, than the lords of the country, in concert with the inhabitants of Bourdeaux, resolved to return to their antient sovereigns. With this view, they deputed the lords of Candale and l' Esparre, to contrive the means, at London; but the troubles, excited by the duke of York, had, for some time, hindered the court from attending to this affair; yet, when they were appeased, the queen and council, after mature deliberation, judged, that nothing should be neglected, to accomplish the enterprize; for they expected, that the success would redeem their credit, and gain them an interest with the people, which they wanted, to support themselves against their enemies. Talbot, the valiant earl of Shrewsbury, being returned from a voyage into Italy, was chosen for this expedition; and, tho' he was 80 years old, he readily accepted an employment, which afforded him an opportunity, once more, before his death, to do his king and country a considerable service. As diligence was absolutely necessary, he embarqued what troops were ready, consisting of 700 men at arms, upon a promise that the rest, intended for him, should quickly follow; and, setting sail, the 18th of October, on the 21st, he landed, near Bourdeaux. On the morrow, he appeared, before the city; and, every thing being prepared to receive him, he was introduced, at a gate, of which the citizens had the guard. The French garrison, who had not heard of his arrival, surprised at this unexpected accident, would have retired at another gate, but were almost all taken. 1452.

He retakes several places, in Guienne. Monstrelet. Act. Pub.

The promised reinforcement arriving from England, a few days after, the earl of Shrewsbury took the field, at the head of 7000 men; and, with this little army, he reconquered some of the towns of Guienne, and, among others, Fronsac and Castillon, as rapidly as they were lost; and, if winter had not prevented him from pursuing his conquests, he would have rendered himself master of all Guienne.

1453. Charles, then at Lyons, upon this ill news, desisted from the execution of the design he had formed, the affair of Guienne appearing to him to be of greater importance; wherefore, he permitted the dauphin to marry the princess of Savoy, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to the young prince of Piedmont; and he resolved to send all his troops into Guienne, the following spring. In the interim, he dispatched before a body of 10,000 men, under the command of Chabanes, and the earl of Pontievre; and these generals, upon their arrival in Xaintonge, besieged Chalais and Castillon, whilst the earl of Clermont followed them, with the rest of the army designed for Guienne. Chabanes was taken up with the siege of Chalais, till June, after which, he joined Pontievre, before Castillon, which still made a vigorous defence; and the dread, inspired by the earl of Shrewsbury's valour add experience, made them use precaution seldom practised, in those days, of making lines, and defending the avenues of their camp with palisadoes.

The earl of Shrewsbury was, at Bourdeaux with 6 or 7000 men, in suspence, what course he should take, with respect to the siege; and he was desirous to relieve the place, but was afraid of encountering many difficulties, as well on account of the intrenchments, of the French, as of the superiority of their number. On the other hand, knowing that the earl of Clermont was advancing, with all expedition, he considered, that it must be done, before the arrival of these fresh troops, unless he would oppose all the forces of France; wherefore, leaving Bourdeaux, with his whole army, and approaching the French camp, he attacked them, with the same vigour, the English had shewn, at the battle of Azincourt, and on several other occasions; and he soon defeated 4000 men, commanded by Chabanes, without the intrenchments, drove them into the camp, and, in spite of the besiegers cannon, which swept away his men, by whole files, forced their lines, and entered with the flying troops. It is, thus, related by the English historians; but the French only say, that the lines were like to be forced, when the English were attacked, in the rear, by a body 1453. body of French horſe. This cooled their ardor, and obliged their general to diſcontinue the attack of the lines, and face thoſe that preſſed him behind; which motion gave the French an opportunity to draw all their troops out of the camp; ſo that the earl of Shrewſbury, who had not above 5000 men left, was reduced to the neceſſity of making two fronts, and withſtanding 10,000; and, at length, the Engliſh, being overpowered by numbers, began to give way. At the ſame time, the earl of Shrewsbury was wounded, in the thigh with a muſquet-ball, and his horſe killed under him; and, being unable to remount, by reaſon of his wound, he bid Sir John Talbot, his ſon, to retire, and ſave himſelf, for another occaſion, where he might be ſtill ſerviceable to his country; but Talbot, rather than baſely fly, choſe to die, by the earl, his father, who, preſently after, reſigned his laſt breath. The Engliſh loſt 2000 men; but their greateſt loſs was their general.

The end of the war, with France.

After this defeat, Caſtillon ſurrendered, the 16th of July; and, a few days after, the earl of Clermont being arrived, and the king come to the camp, the army was divided into four bodies, which, at once, beſieged Cadillac, Libourne, Fronſac, and Bourdeaux. Fronſac and Libourne reſiſted, only a few days; but the caſtle of Cadillac maintained a ſiege of two months. Upon the taking of this place, the whole army joined before Bourdeaux, which capitulated, the 17th of October; and the garriſon were permitted to return into England. Thus, of the many conqueſts made by the Engliſh, in France, ſince Edward III, there remained only Calais and Guiſnes; poor remains of ſo many provinces, ſeveral of which had belonged to their kings, by hereditary right; and the reſt were acquired by ſo many victories, and at the expence of ſo much blood!

Henry falls ſick. Act. Pub. The birth of Edward the king's ſon. Hall.

In the mean while, Henry was ſeized, at London, with a long and dangerous ſickneſs, inſomuch that his life was often deſpaired of; and the queen was delivered, on the 23d of October, of a prince, named Edward; who was inauſpiciouſly born, at the very time the Engliſh loſt all their poſſeſſions, in France. His birth occaſioned ſeveral reports, injurious to the queen's honour; for ſome even publickly ſaid, that he was not the king's ſon; and others maintained, that he was ſuppoſititious, becauſe the queen had never before been with child, tho' married nine years. In fine, ſome, without queſtioning the queen's honour, or honeſty, took occaſion, from this prince's birth, to hope well, for the future; and that becauſe the queen, having a ſon, would be more firmly attached to the intereſt of England, by this evidently intimating, what they thought of her former conduct.

Thomas Bourchier is archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Cardinal Kemp, tranſlated from the ſee of York to that of Canterbury, dying, this year, Thomas Bourchier, brother to the earl of Eſſex, was elected archbiſhop; who was a prelate of eminent merit, and was afterwards made chancellor, and then honoured with the dignity of cardinal.

1453. The civil war is renewed, in in England. Hall.

The war, in France, which had continued, 38 years, being over, the ſucceeding events of this reign conſiſt only of the quarrels, between the houſes of Lancaſter and York; the firſt of which had, for a device, a red, and the other a white, roſe; which devices, are famous, for the vaſt torrents of Engliſh blood, ſhed upon their account. The commotions, raiſed by the duke of York, ſeemed entirely ſuppreſſed, ſince his reconciliation with the king; but they were ſoon renewed, with ſo much greater fury, as the Engliſh were no longer diverted by a foreign war. I now proceed to give as brief an account, as poſſible, of the events occaſioned by the duke of York's pretenſions; which ended, at laſt, in the ruin of the king, and the whole houſe of Lancaſter.

The rights of the houſes of York and Lancaſter.

The duke of York had renewed his oath to the king; but it was only to free himſelf from the danger, in which his imprudence had involved him; for he was ſtill reſolutely bent to maintain his pretenſions, and take the advantage of the king's incapacity, and the people's diſaffection for the queen and her miniſters. If we conſider only the laws and cuſtoms of the realm, his title was indiſputable; for he was deſcended from the third ſon to Edward III, whereas Henry came only from the fourth ſon of the ſaid monarch. Indeed, it was by a daughter; but the Salick law did not take place, in England. On the contrary, in the reign of Richard II, Roger, earl of Marche, his grandfather, by the mother's ſide, was declared, by the parliament, the preſumptive heir to the crown, if Richard died, without iſſue; and, even ſince the houſe of Lancaſter was on the throne, the parliament, as was obſerved, in the reign of Henry IV, had confirmed, by a ſolemn act, the the right of the daughters and their deſcendants; and yet Henry VI. was not an uſurper. It was now above 50 years, ſince the houſe of Lancaſter had enjoyed the crown, by the authority of the parliament, who ſettled it on the family of Henry IV; ſo that the duke of York could only pretend to the crown, on the ſuppoſition, that the parliament had not power to alter the ſucceſſion. He could not, therefore, openly diſcover his intention, without directly attacking the privileges of the parliament, of which the Engliſh nation has ever been jealous; moreover, he ſtood in need of the parliament, to ſucceed in his deſign; but how could he hope to gain the parliament to his ſide, if he diſputed the validity of their acts? On the other hand, he was to break through a 50 years poſſeſſion, confirmed by the unanimous conſent of the people, and rendered ſtill more authentick by the glorious advantages, procured the nation by the late king Henry V.

His advantages.

Theſe obſtacles were ſufficient, to divert the duke of York from his enterprize, if the preſent conjunctures had not encouraged him to purſue it; for Henry was a prince unable, of himſelf, to oppoſe the duke's efforts againſt him; and, tho' he was not deteſted by the people, he was conſidered, as the ſhadow of a king, 1453. a king, who only lent his name to the queen and his miniſters. However, the ſole name of king would have kept the people in ſubjection to thoſe at the helm, had they not abuſed their power, as is too commonly the caſe of perſons, who are in the like ſtation. But the authority, uſurped by the queen and the duke of Somerſet, was not the only cauſe of the diſcontent of the Engliſh; for, when they reflected, that all the conqueſts of Henry V, and Guienne itſelf, which had been, for 300 years, under the dominion of England, were loſt, in a few years, they could not forbear throwing the blame upon thoſe, that governed, in the name of the king. Normandy was loſt, in two campaigns only, under the duke of Somerſet's regency, whilſt he was actually on the ſpot, to defend it; and he was alſo accuſed, of having been too haſty, in ſurrendering Caen. On the contrary, it was conſidered, that, during the regency of the duke of Glouceſter, the affairs of France were maintained, upon a tolerable footing; and yet, the queen, to gratify her paſſion, had diſpatched that prince, in a baſe and violent manner, which occaſioned all the ſubſequent loſſes. Thus, the king was looked upon, as a prince, incapable of retrieving the honour of the nation, and reſtoring the affairs of the kingdom; the queen as too well affected to France, and graſping at the ſole authority, in England; and the duke of Somerſet, as a rapacious miniſter, whoſe ſole ſtudy was to enrich himſelf, at the expence of the publick. It was farther, and loudly, complained, that, to maintain his authority, the duke filled the higheſt poſts with his creatures, without any regard to their merit and abilities; and this laſt article made a deep impreſſion on the minds of the people; who were incenſed, to ſee the council entirely conſiſt of vicious perſons, and all the places of the kingdom poſſeſſed by men of no principles; which gave occaſion to ſuſpect, that the queen's miniſtry intended to hinder religion, honour, virtue, and love of one's country, from inducing thoſe, that were in the publick poſts, to oppoſe the abuſes and diſorders, ſpread over the kingdom. This diſpoſition of the people, was ſo advantageous to the duke of York, that he judged it adviſable, not to act directly for himſelf, but, under the pretence of procuring the good of the people, to oblige the king to make uſe of other miniſters; for he was ſenſible, that if he could remove his enemies from the council, and introduce his creatures, it would be an eaſy matter to put his deſign in execution.

The earl of Salisbury and Warwick are the chief friends of the duke of York. Hall.

Such an undertaking could not be accompliſhed, without the aid of friends; and, therefore, he engaged ſeveral lords in his plot, ſome under colour of turning out the duke of Somerſet, who was generally hated and envied; and others, by diſcovering to them his moſt ſecret intentions. Among the latter, the two Nevils, father and ſon, were the chief; for the father, the earl of Salisbury, was remarkable for his virtues and conſummate prudence; and the earl of Warwick, his ſon, was univerſally eſteemed, for his valour, and adored by the people, for his engaging behaviour. He ſo well underſtood the art of behaving himſelf, that he ſeemed ſolely to conſult the welfare and glory of the nation; but, hitherto, he had affected, between both parties, a neutrality; which, by rendering him agreeable to the people, had deprived the miniſters, not only of all pretence to deſtroy him, but even of all occaſion of ſuſpecting him. Theſe two lords, with ſome others, conſulting with the duke of York, about the means to accompliſh his project, agreed, that it was too ſoon, as yet, to diſcover his intent; but that, on the contrary, his carriage to the king ſhould be very ſubmiſſive, in order to efface the ill impreſſions, his former conduct might have made in the people; and the frankneſs, with which he had disbanded his troops, and his new oath to the king, were extremely proper to inſtill a belief, that he had formed no evil deſign. 1453.

Advice is given the queen and duke of Somerſet, for their ruin.

The parliament had been ſummoned to Reading; but, on account of the king's relapſe, it was adjourned to Weſtminſter, for the 14th of February. In this interval, the duke of York's private adherents, who pretended to be of the court party, intimated to the queen and the duke of Somerſet, that, in the preſent diſpoſition of the people, it was to be feared, that the parliament would come to very diſagreeable reſolutions; that, whilſt the king was in health, they could act, in his name, becauſe all orders were ſuppoſed to iſſue from him; but that the caſe was different, during his ſickneſs; that, their authority being entirely founded upon the king's royal will, there was reaſon to apprehend, that, the royal will no longer appearing, the parliament would nominate other governors; and that, therefore, it was expedient to admit into the council the duke of York, the two Nevils, and ſome other of the moſt popular lords, to demonſtrate, that thoſe, who governed, did not deſire to ingroſs all the power. This advice was ſo ſpecious, that the queen and the favourite could not avoid falling into the ſnare; ſo that the duke of York, the two Nevils, and ſome others of their cabal, were called to the council, before the meeting of the parliament. They were no ſooner admitted, than they gained the ſuperiority; inſomuch that thoſe, who before managed all, had no longer any credit.

The firſt remarkable ſtep of theſe new counſellors was to arreſt the duke of Somerſet, in the queen's bed-chamber, and commit him to the tower; and, in the interim, the parliament was farther prorogued, to the 15th of March, to afford the duke of York and his friends leiſure to concert meaſures with the members. Two days before the parliament met, the council impowered the duke of York to hold it, in the king's name; and, in the beginning of the ſeſſion, the commons ſent to the houſe of lords an accuſation againſt the duke of Somerſet, for ſuffering Normandy to be loſt, and by his fault, during his regency. The 2d of April, the great ſeal was given to the earl of Salisbury; and, the following day, the 1454. The duke of York is made protector. Act. Pub.

1454. the parliament appointed the duke of York, protector of the kingdom, defender of the church, and firſt counſellor of the king; till the young prince Edward, the king's ſon, was of age, to exerciſe that exalted office. Hence it appears, firſt, that it was believed, the king's indiſpoſition would laſt, to the day of his death, and that it affected his underſtanding, more than his body; in the next place, by reſerving this office for a child, only ſix months old, the parliament ſhewed, that they were reſolved to preſerve entire the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter, tho' the duke of York was declared protector. Too much, or too little, is generally done, on theſe occaſions; which gives riſe to civil wars. If the parliament had publickly declared againſt the houſe of Lancaſter, in all probability, at ſuch a juncture, it would have found but few friends; and, on the other hand, if, inſtead of placing the duke of York ſo near the throne, care had been taken to curb his ambition, which was only too manifeſt, doubtleſs, he would have loſt many of his adherents, and, perhaps, the civil war, which laid waſte the kingdom, been avoided; but it is extremely difficult for a parliament, at ſuch junctures, to act, with freedom, and according to reaſon and equity.

The duke of York is made governor of Calais. Act. Pub.

The duke of York, having all the power in his own hands, removed the duke of Somerſet, who was ſtill in the tower, from being governor of Calais, and, by the king's letters patent, placed himſelf, in his room; and it was univerſally believed, that the accuſation, againſt the impriſoned duke, would be vigorouſly proſecuted; yet this affair was ſuffered to lie dormant, and ſeemingly unregarded, all the reſt of the year; probably, becauſe the evidences againſt him appeared inſufficient.

1455. The king reſumes his authority. Stow.

In the beginning of 1455, the king being ſomewhat recovered from his long illneſs, the duke of York's authority ceaſed, of courſe; ſince it was wholly founded on the king's inability, by reaſon of his indiſpoſition, to govern the kingdom himſelf; and the duke of York's matters were not ſo ripe, as to enable him to diſpute with the king the right of reſuming his authority, tho' it was, in effect, only to replace it in the hands of the queen. The firſt effect of this change was the duke of Somerſet's enlargement; for, on the 5th of February, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Wiltſhire, and two knights, offering to be his pledges, their offer was accepted, and the governor of the tower was ordered to releaſe the priſoner. A month after, theſe lords were diſcharged from their ſureties, without any ſentence intervening; for, as the duke was apprehended, by order of the council, it was ſuppoſed, that they might be enlarged, by the ſame authority; but much might be alledged againſt this ſuppoſition. The impeachment of the houſe of commons being made, ſince his confinement, it could not be pretended, that the king had power to relea e him, before he was legally acquitted; yet the court overlooked this conſideration. After the king reſumed the government, the duke of York and his party had no longer any credit in the council, where the queen and the duke of Somerſet bore an abſolute ſway; ſo prevalent was the bare name of the king to give a new turn to affairs. 1455.

The duke of York and Somerſet put things to arbitration. Act. Pub.

In the mean time, ſome of the moſt prudent lords, dreading the ill effects of the quarrel, between the two dukes, laboured to reconcile them; and it was the intereſt of both toſhew, that they did not act from ambitious motives; for their view was to gain the people. They therefore, both conſented to chuſe arbitrators, and ſubmit to their deciſion, under the penalty, for him that refuſed, of paying to the other 20,000 marks; but it was on condition, that the ſentence of the arbitrators ſhould be pronounced, before the 20th of June.

Whilſt people were in expectation of this ſentence, the duke of Somerſet repreſented to the king, that he was removed from the government of Calais, upon a bare accuſation, that was never determined; and that it was unjuſt, that his adverſary ſhould remain cloathed with his ſpoils, ſince their difference was not yet decided. Upon this remonſtrance, the king deprived the duke of York of the government, he had conferred on him, for ſeven years; and then, under the pretence of obſerving a perfect neutrality between the two rivals, he declared himſelf governor of Calais. In the act, by which the duke of York was removed, it was ſaid to be done, at the duke's own requeſt; but the duke, conſidering it, as a heinous affront, withdrew from court, where he found his affairs began to be in an ill ſituation. Act. Pub.

He retires into Wales and raiſes an army. Hall.

He retired into Wales, not only to ſcreen himſelf from the attempts of his enemies, but with an intent to levy an army, in order to attack them; for he knew, that the queen and the duke of Somerſet, being abſolute maſters of the king's perſon, had an advantage, of which nothing but force could deprive them. The court's proceedings, in releaſing the duke of Somerſet, without giving the nation any ſatisfaction, induced him to hope, that he ſhould be ſtrongly ſupported, when he came to uſe that pretence; and he was not deceived in his expectations; for he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a numerous army, and in a condition to make head againſt the king, who had alſo prepared himſelf, and was marching directly towards him, to give him battle. The two armies meeting, near St. Albans, on a level ground, where nothing hindered their engaging, the duke of York, to demonſtrate, that he had taken up arms, ſolely for the good of the publick, ſent and offered the king to diſmiſs his troops, provided the duke of Somerſet was delivered to juſtice, to be condemned, if guilty, or acquitted, if innocent; but the court, knowing that this was no more than a vain pretence, and that, one time or other, the quarrel muſt be decided, by arms, rejected the propoſal, and the battle was fought, the 31ſt of May.

1455. attacked the king's army, whilſt the court was waiting for new offers from the male-contents; and this attack, as vigorous as it was ſudden, put the royal army into ſuch a diſorder, that it was not in the duke of Somerſet's power to repair it. The duke of York alſo advanced from his quarter, not to give the enemies time to recover themſelves; and he preſſed them ſo briskly, that the royal army was defeated, in a few moments, with the loſs of 5000 men, without making any conſiderable reſiſtance. The duke of Somerſet was killed, on the ſpot, with the earl of Northumberland, the earl of Stafford, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Buckingham, the lord Clifford, and ſeveral other lords and officers of diſtinction, all firmly attached to the houſe of Lancaſter; and the duke of Buckingham, receiving a wound, retired out of the battle, and, by his retreat, compleated the diſorder among the kings troops.

The king falls into the hands of the duke of York, who treats him with reſpect.

In the interim, the king, who was wounded in the neck with an arrow, finding himſelf deſerted, in the rout of his army, retired to a little houſe, which was preſently inveſted; but the duke of York, having intelligence of it, poſted thither, with the earl of Salisbury; and, preſenting themſelves before him, on their knees, they told him, that, ſince the publick enemy was dead, all the perſons he ſaw were ready to obey him, in whatever he ſhould pleaſe to command them. The king, upon theſe words, recovering a little from his conſternation, cauſed by the duke's approach, intreated him, for God's ſake, to put a ſtop to the ſlaughter, aſſuring him, that he would give him all the ſatisfaction he could reaſonably deſire. Upon this, the duke ordered a retreat to be ſounded, and a proclamation to be made, that no more blood ſhould be ſhed; and then he conducted the king to St. Albans, from whence they returned to London.

Soon after, Henry called a parliament, which met, in July; and, the king being then relapſed, the duke of York was commiſſioned to hold it, in his name. The parliament, which, at ſuch a juncture, could ſcarce conſiſt of any but the duke of York's adherents, made the following declaration: "That the government "had deen miſmanaged by the queen and "the duke of Somerſet, who had abuſed the "king's goodneſs and confidence; that the "late duke of Glouceſter had been unjuſtly "accuſed; that all the alienations of the "crown-lands, made ſince the firſt year of "the preſent reign, ſhould be revoked; that "the duke of York, the earls of Salisbury and "Warwick, or any who had liſted under their "banners, did not incur the guilt of rebellion, "in taking arms againſt the king, ſince it "was neceſſary to free his perſon from captivi-"ty; but that the whole blame was to be laid "on the duke of Somerſet and his adherents, "who concealed from the king the duke of "York's letter, which might have prevented "theſe diſorders." After this, the parliament intreated the king to nominate a protector, becauſe of his indiſpoſition; and this requeſt was repeated, ſeveral times, without the king's returning any anſwer; not that he had reſolved to reject it; for he was no more at liberty to follow his own counſels, than when he was under the guardianſhip of the queen and the duke of Somerſet; but the duke of York was deſirous, that this nomination ſhould not ſeem conſtrained. At length, the parliament being prorogued to the 12th of November, on that very day, the king ſigned a patent wherein he ſaid, that, having been often petitioned by his parliament to nominate a protector, he appointed the duke of York, till he ſhould be removed by the parliament, or the young prince of Wales was capable of exerciſing that important employ; and then, after a month's ſeſſion, the parliament was prorogued to the 14th of January. 1455.

1456. A project againſt the duke of York. Hall.

In the interim, the queen, who was no ſtranger to the duke of York's deſigns, was too much concerned, as well for her own, as the king's and her ſon's ſake, not to try to diſappoint them; Henry, duke of Somerſet, ſon to him ſlain, at St. Albans, and the duke of Buckingham were alſo equally deſirous of revenging, the one his ſon's, and the other his father's death; and, in fine, all the princes and lords, allied to the houſe of Lancaſter, or attached to its intereſt, perceiving the duke of York to take large ſteps towards the throne, were prepared to do all that was poſſible, to ſtop his progreſs; whilſt the duke of York lived in a ſecurity, that even aſtoniſhed his enemies. He was ſenſible, that it would be very dangerous, openly to aſpire to a crown, which had been, 56 years, in the houſe of Lancaſter; wherefore, he choſe to wait, till time ſhould afford him a favourable opportunity, to proſecute his pretenſions. Above all things, he wanted to gain the people's affection, without which he was convinced, that all his endeavours would prove abortive, and to demonſtrate, that he was not ſwayed by paſſion, or intereſt, he left the king and queen at full liberty. He thought, that it was not in their power to deprive him of the protectorſhip, which, according to the patent, he was to enjoy, till removed by the parliament; but he was concerned with an able and enterpriſing princeſs, who was not diſcouraged, at the obſtacles ſhe met in her way.

The king being recovered, the duke of York's enemies reſolved to improve this juncture, to diveſt him of his high office of protector, which rendered him ſo powerful; and it would have been eaſy for him to foreſee, that the pretence of the king's recovery might be uſed, as it was, once before, if he had not been blinded by the clauſe in his patent; but this clauſe, on which he relied, was a weak defence againſt the attempts of his enemies. The parliament being re-aſſembled, the king went, in perſon, and declared, that, being by God's grace in good health, and able to reſume the reins of the government, the kingdom had no farther occaſion for a protector; and then he deſired the parliament to conſent, that the duke of York might be diſmiſſed from that office. Whether the parliament judged the king's demand reaſonable, or the members had been gained, unknown to the duke, it was, immediately, 1456. diately, reſolved, to comply with the king's requeſt; and the ſame day, the king ſent the duke an order, to reſign the office of protector.

The duke of York withdraws from court.

The duke of York and his party, amazed at this proceeding, eaſily apprehended, that the combination was too ſtrong to be broken; and, therefore, making, as it is ſaid, a virtue of neceſſity, they pretended patiently to ſubmit to the king's and the parliament's orders. However, under colour of having no farther buſineſs, at court, they retired into the country; but the duke of York, and the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, kept within diſtance of each other, in Yorkſhire.

Soon after this, there was a ſedition, at London, cauſed by a ſudden quarrel between two merchants, the one an Engliſhman, and the other an Italian; but, the mob riſing in the behalf of the Engliſhman, the king impowered the dukes of Exeter and Buckingham to bring the guilty to a trial; but the populace would not ſuffer them to execute their commiſſion. The queen, ſuſpecting that this tumult was raiſed by the duke of York's adherents, and not thinking the king ſafe, at London, carried him to Coventry, under the pretence of taking the air; but her principal motive to this was, to inſnare, at once, the duke of York and the two earls, his friends, who were retired into the north. She received intelligence, that, tho' they were ſeparated, in appearance, they had, under various pretences, frequent conferences together, at which ſeveral other lords of their party were preſent; and, as ſhe could not doubt, that it was to concert meaſures againſt the king, ſhe expected to have them in her power, by drawing them to Coventry, where they would not find the ſame protection, as at London; and, with this view, ſhe ſent them letters, under the king's own hand, requiring their preſence, at court, where their advice was wanted, in an affair of the utmoſt importance.

The duke of York, as yet, had done nothing openly, which ſhewed that he aſpired to the crown; for this was a ſecret between him and his particular friends. Indeed, the court was perſuaded of it, but it was impoſſible to convict him; for, hitherto, he had varniſhed his actions with the good of the publick, and, for that very reaſon, was formidable to the court; but, tho' it was difficult to condemn him legally, he could not be ignorant, that there were ſpeedier and more effectual ways to diſpatch him, and that his enemies were not over-ſcrupulous; moreover, tho' he had artfully concealed his deſigns from the people, the queen was too much concerned, not to diſcover them. The three lords, notwithſtanding theſe reaſons to the contrary, upon the receipt of the king's letters, determined to repair to the king; flattering themſelves, that Henry, at length, convinced of the miſmanagement of the queen and the miniſtry, required their aſſiſtance, in making ſome alterations, at court; but, whilſt they were on the road to Coventry, their private emiſſaries undeceived them, by warning them of their danger. Upon this advice, they altered their meaſures; for the duke of York withdrew to his caſtle of Wigmore, in the Marches of Wales; the earl of Salisbury to his ſeat, at Middleham, in Yorkſhire; and the earl of Warwick went, directly, to Calais, of which he was made governor, after the battle of St. Albans. The queen was extremely mortified, at this diſappointment; but it was ſome ſatisfaction to her, that ſhe had ſeparated theſe lords, and ſo rendered them leſs formidable to her. 1456.

1457. The French invade the coaſts of England. Hall.

The fears and jealouſies of both parties were ſomewhat interrupted, during the year 1457, by foreign affairs; for, as the Engliſh had formerly improved the diſſenſions, in France, to conquer that kingdom, Charles VII. believed, that he ſhould not neglect the advantages, ariſing from the quarrels of the Engliſh court; wherefore, he prepared two fleets, in order to invade England, in two different quarters. The firſt, ſailing to the Downs, plundered the town of Sandwich; and the other treated, in the ſame manner, Foy, a little town of Cornwall; but this was all they did worthy to be related. Probably, they were not in a condition to venture upon more important attempts; ſo that it was properly but a ſort of bravado, to inſult the Engliſh, in their own country, after their expulſion out of France.

The Scots invade the northern parts. Act. Pub.

About the ſame time, the Scots alſo made an inroad into the northern counties, and carried off ſome booty. Indeed, a truce was concluded, in 1453, between England and Scotland, till the 21ſt of May, this year, on condition, that, upon the expiration of this term, which ever of the two kings deſigned to renew the war, he ſhould give the other 180 days notice; but ſo many outrages had been committed, on both ſides, that neither party thought themſelves obliged to obſerve the treaty. The very preceding year, the two kings had ſent each other abuſive letters, abounding with haughtineſs and contempt; yet, whether the Scots intended only to revenge ſome particular injury, or for ſome other reaſon, the truce was renewed, from the 6th of July, this year, to that day twelvemonth, 1459, and afterwards prolonged, to the 6th of July, 1463.

1458. The two parties are outwardly reconciled.

The affairs with the foreign enemies being ended, domeſtick quarrels were about to be renewed, if ſome peaceful perſons had not actively interpoſed, to prevent the deſtructive conſequences of theſe diviſions; for it was obvious, that the two parties, in deciding their quarrel, by arms, muſt, of courſe, ruin the kingdom, and occaſion, at laſt, ſome fatal revolution. Neither party was ſo ſuperior, as to promiſe themſelves certain victory; ſucceſs depended on the events of the war, too doubtful for either to found upon them any raiſed expectations; and the duke of York was ſenſible, that it was no eaſy matter to diſpoſſeſs, by force, a king that had been on the throne, 35 years. The truth is, Henry was deſpiſed by his ſubjects, on account of his incapacity; but he gained their affection by his innocent life, and good intentions, tho' ill-ſupported by his ſlender abilities. On the other hand, the queen, and the new duke of Somerſet, who 1458. who held the late duke his father's poſt, the reſt of the miniſtry, and the whole houſe of Lancaſter were in a very tottering ſituation; for the French and Scots improved theſe quarrels, to invade the kingdom, and all the miſcarriages were charged upon thoſe who governed, in the name of the king. The court evidently perceived, that the duke of York uſed this pretence, to excite the people againſt them; and tho', hitherto, he had not all the ſucceſs he could have wiſhed, he ſaw himſelf, however, very ſoon, in a condition to make a much more conſiderable progreſs. Theſe reaſons, together with the king's inſtances to adjuſt theſe differences, at length, moved the queen and the duke of Somerſet, to ſend the duke of York an offer of a ſincere reconciliation; after which, the king deſired the duke of York and his friends to repair to London, a place they did not ſuſpect, in order to endeavour an agreement; and he wrote them a letter, with his own hand, promiſing, upon his ſalvation, that he would do them no injury, and that he was ſincere in his intention.

Such an invitation could not be rejected, without openly declaring himſelf, which the duke of York was willing to avoid; wherefore, the lords of his party reſolved to accept it; yet they were jealous of the queen, who, on her part, had as little confidence in them: Perhaps, they were both equally in the right; for, in all probability, each party hoped to reap ſome advantage from this proceeding, without intending to alter their firſt projects. In the interim, to remove all fears, it was agreed, that both parties might be attended with a certain number of armed followers; nay, the king permitted the earl of Warwick, who was to come from Calais, to bring with him 24 foreigners, beſides Engliſh.

Every thing being, thus, ſettled, the lords of both parties came to London, in January; but the earl of Warwick did not arrive, till February; and they were lodged, in two different quarters, to avoid the diſorders that might be occaſioned, by their being together. The mayor of London rode, every night, round the city, with his train-bands, to the number of 10,000; and the king and queen entered the city, the 27th of March, and lodged in the biſhop's palace, at an equal diſtance from both the parties.

Mediators being unanimouſly choſen, on the 3d of April, a reconciliation was made, to the common ſatisfaction of the king, the queen, the parties concerned, and the whole kingdom; and the ſubſtance of the agreement was, that, all animoſity being laid aſide, the lords ſhould live together in peace and amity, and in perfect obedience to the king's commands. But, to avoid all occaſion of complaint, it was likewiſe agreed, that the duke of York, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, with ſome others of that party, ſhould be admitted into the council; and the 5th of April was appointed for a publick thankſgiving-day, for this reconciliation, by a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's church. The king and queen, and all the lords were preſent, and walked, two and two, one of each party, in token of a perfect union; and the duke of York led the queen, by the hand, who gave him publick proofs of confidence and eſteem. 1458.

However, it, ſoon after, appeared, that this confidence, of which there was ſo great a ſhow made, on both ſides, was far from being reſtored. The duke of York and his two principal friends, continually apprehenſive of ſome treachery from their reconciled enemies, withdrew from court, under various pretences; the duke and the earl of Salisbury went to York; and the earl of Warwick to his government of Calais. The Engliſh hiſtorians affirm, that this earl, being admiral of the channel, equipped 14 ſhips, to give chace to ſome Spaniſh corſairs, who infeſted the narrow ſeas, and, meeting them, ſunk ſeveral, and brought ſix to Calais; but, probably, they were miſtaken, ſince the Collection of the Publick Acts repreſents this affair, in a quite different light. Indeed, we find there complaints from the republicks of Genoa and Lubeck to the king, againſt the earl of Warwick; and that the king appointed commiſſioners, to take informations; but, in this commiſſion, there is not the leaſt mention of Spaniſh ſhips. It is even evident, that this engagement was occaſioned by an accidental quarrel, between the ſhips of Genoa and Lubeck and thoſe which conveighed the earl of Warwick, with his retinue, to Calais; but this does not prove, that they were pyrates, or that the earl of Warwick deſignedly attacked them; yet, however that be, upon this complaint, he was obliged to return to England, to anſwer for himſelf, where he ſtaid, ſix or ſeven weeks.

The earl of Warwick ſeizes upon ſome foreign ſhips.

During the earl's ſtay, at London, it fell out, one day, whilſt he was preſent at the council, that one of his people quarrelled with a ſervant of the king's, and wounded him; upon which, the reſt of the king's domeſticks, arming themſelves, ſome with ſwords, others with clubs, or other weapons, ran to revenge their comrade; but, not finding the aggreſſor, they fell upon the reſt of the earl of Warwick's retinue. In a word, they even aſſaulted his perſon, as he was coming out of the council to go to his barge, which waited for him, on the Thames; and with ſo much violence, that he very narrowly eſcaped to his barge, after ſeeing ſeveral of his people killed, on the ſpot He did not doubt, that this was a contrivance of the queen to diſpatch him, without ſeeming to be concerned; and he was confirmed in his opinion, when he heard, that the king had ordered him to be arreſted and ſent to the tower; but he had ſuch timely notice, that he diſappointed thoſe who were ſent to arreſt him. It is extremely difficult to decide, whether the queen contrived this quarrel, to diſpatch him, or whether it happened, by accident; but, however that be, the order to apprehend him, tho' he himſelf had reaſon to complain, convinced him, that he ſhould never be ſecured from the plots of his enemies, unleſs he attacked them, with open force;

1458. force; and, with a mind full of reſentment at this affront, he repaired to the earl of Saliſbury, his father; and, without delay, they went together to the duke of York, to conſult what was to be done, in this juncture. From the late proceedings, they concluded, that the reconciliation, at London, was only a ſnare to ſurpriſe them the more eaſily, and deſtroy them, one after another; perhaps, they were glad to have this excuſe, to juſtify their reſolution of acting, in a publick manner; and, purſuant to this project, the earl of Warwick ſpeedily returned to Calais, to ſecure that place, not doubting that there was a deſign to take it from him.

1459. In the interim, the duke of York and the earl of Salisbury concerted meaſures, to accompliſh their deſign; and they agreed, that, whilſt the duke was levying an army, in Wales, the earl ſhould advance towards London, at the head of 5 or 6000 men, and openly demand ſatisfaction, for the injury done to his ſon. As this could not be effected, unknown to the queen, the lord Audley was commiſſioned to raiſe troops, and oppoſe the earl of Salisbury; and Audley, in a very ſhort time, was at the head of 10,000 men, and in a condition to march towards Lancaſhire, thro' which the earl of Salisbury was to paſs; but he found, that the earl was already advanced, as far as Shropſhire. The two armies meeting there, the earl of Salisbury, tho' but half as ſtrong as the enemy, reſolved to make uſe of a ſtratagem, to obtain a victory, which otherwiſe he could not expect; and, Audley being encamped, on Blore-Heath, near a little river, Salisbury poſted himſelf, on the other ſide, as if he intended to guard the paſs, and hinder his being attacked; after which, on a ſudden, feigning a fear, he retired, in the night, marching ſo, as that, at break of day, his enemies could ſtill ſee the rear of his army. This ſeemingly precipitant retreat invigorating the royaliſts, they began to paſs the river, in diſorder, fancying they had nothing to do, but to purſue the flying enemy; but, in the mean time, ſome being over the river, others in the water, and others ready to paſs, the earl of Saliſbury returned, and fell upon the troops already over, who had ſcarce leiſure to draw up. The fight, however, laſted, four or five hours, becauſe the king's troops were ſupported by thoſe that were continually paſſing; but, as this could not be done, without confuſion, the royal army was, at length, put to rout, with the loſs of 2400 men; and Audley himſelf was ſlain, with all the principal officers.

The battle of Blore-Heath.

The earl of Salisbury, having, thus, opened a paſſage, joined the duke of York, who was raiſing troops, in Wales; for it would have been too dangerous to proceed on his march towards London, becauſe the court had now aſſembled a great force, at Coventry. The queen, who ſtill commanded, in the king's name, exerted her utmoſt endeavours, to have a numerous army; being ſenſible, that nothing could be done, without a great ſuperiority. On the other hand, the duke of York and the earl of Salisbury were no leſs ſollicitous to procure all poſſible aſſiſtance, in order to withſtand the forces that were preparing againſt them; and they ſent word to the earl of Warwick, that it would be very neceſſary for him to come and join them, and try to bring them ſome troops; upon which, Warwick left Calais, under the government of William Nevil, lord Falconbridge, his uncle, and took with him part of the garriſon, giving the command to Sir Andrew Trollop, who had ſignaliſed himſelf, in the wars of France. 1459.

The king marches towards the male-contents, Hall.

It was ſeven months after the battle of Blore-Heath, before the two parties had drawn all their forces together; but, at length, the king departed from Coventry, where he had aſſembled his troops, and marched towards Wales, in queſt of the male-contents, who were encamped, about Ludlow; and, when he came to Glouceſter, he made a halt, and ſent an offer of pardon to the rebels, provided they would lay down their arms; who anſwered, that they could no longer rely on ſuch promiſes, that were ſolely intended to ſurpriſe them, as was manifeſt in what befel, at London, the earl of Warwick; but that, nevertheleſs, they were ready to ſubmit to the king, if an expedient could be found for their ſafety. Upon this anſwer, the king ordered his army to advance; and, at the ſame time, he gave the duke of Somerſet a patent to be governor of Calais, in the room of the earl of Warwick; but it was eaſier to give the duke this government, in parchment, than to put him in poſſeſſion.

A letter of the male-contents to the king. Stow.

The king, having advanced, with an intent to give battle, the Yorkiſts ſent him a very ſubmiſſive letter, beſeeching him to conſider, that they had taken arms, only in their own defence, againſt the attempts of their enemies; that this was evident from their continuing in a corner of the kingdom, without undertaking any thing, being determined not to fight, unleſs forced; that their ſole deſire was to redreſs the grievances introduced into the government, to the great oppreſſion of the people, by the miſmanagement of the miniſtry; and, laſtly, they prayed the king, to conſider them, as loyal ſubjects, who had formed no deſign againſt his perſon, and to reſtore them to favour.

They are deſerted by their troops. Hollingſh.

This letter did not anſwer the end propoſed by the rebels; for their enemies, not doubting but it was the reſult of their fear, advanced, within half a mile of them, reſolving to give them battle, next day; and, at the ſame time, they found means to diſperſe, in their camp, the king's proclamation, offering pardon to all the Yorkiſts, on condition they would lay down their arms. This proclamation had a ſurpriſing effect; for the duke of York's troops, fancying that the king's offer of pardon proceeded from the ſuperiority of his forces, and that it might be of dangerous conſequence to delay taking the benefit of it, immediately, began to diſband themſelves. Sir Andrew Trollop, the commander of the 1459. detachment of the garriſon of Calais, put the whole army in diſorder, by flying, in the night, to the king's camp, with the troops under his command; and this deſertion, increaſing, every moment, ſo terrified the leaders, who were apprehenſive of being delivered to the king, as ſoon as day ſhould appear, that they choſe to ſave themſelves, by flight. The duke of York, with the earl of Rutland, his ſecond ſon, embarqued for Ireland; the earl of Warwick fled towards Calais; and the earl of Salisbury quickly followed him, with the earl of Marche, eldeſt ſon to the duke of York, who was then 19 years old; but, the generals being retired, the reſt of the officers and ſoldiers, thus, abandoned, were reduced to the king's mercy, who was pleaſed to pardon all, except a few that were executed, for an example.

The duke of York and his adherents are attainted.

The parliament, that met, in December, declared the duke of York and his adherents guilty of high-treaſon; and they confiſcated their eſtates, pronouncing them and their poſterity incapable of inheriting, to the fourth generation. This is a remarkable inſtance of the variableneſs of the parliament, according to the alteration of the poſture of affairs; but I ſhall have frequent occaſion, hereafter, to make the like remarks.

The duke of Somerſet is repulſed, at Calais. Hollingſh.

Upon the breaking up of the parliament, the duke of Somerſet ſet ſail, with a body of troops, in order to take poſſeſſion of his government of Calais; but, the garriſon firing upon him, he was forced to land, elſewhere, and retire to Guiſnes, from whence he made ſeveral incurſions, about Calais; but thoſe little ſallies were inſufficient to render him maſter of ſo ſtrong a place.

1460. The queen ſends him ſupplies. Act. Pub.

The queen, perceiving the earl of Warwick would not be deprived of his government, equipped a fleet, to tranſport ſuccours to the duke of Somerſet; which, being well provided with all neceſſaries, lay at Sandwich, in expectation of a fair wind; but the earl of Warwick, having intelligence of it, ſent a body of troops privately from Calais, under the command of Sir John Dinham, who arriving, at Sandwich, about break of day, ſurpriſed moſt of the officers, in their beds; and he no ſooner had them in his power, than he found means to gain the ſoldiers and mariners, and carried the king's ſhips to Calais.

Warwick conſults with York.

The earl of Warwick made uſe of theſe ſhips, to convoy him into Ireland, where he went, to concert meaſures with the duke of York; and, after he had been, about a month, on this voyage, he met, in return, the duke of Exeter, admiral of England, who waited, to take him in his paſſage; but the royal fleet were ſo little inclined to fight againſt him, that the duke of Exeter, fearing to receive ſome diſgrace, judged it improper to attack him.

The court reſolves to be rid of the Yorkiſts. Act. Pub.

The queen and the miniſters being perſuaded, that the interview of the duke of York and the earl of Warwick would produce a freſh rebellion, at a council held, on that occaſion, it was reſolved, that a ſtrict ſearch ſhould be made, in all the counties and towns of the kingdom, after the adherents of the duke of York; and that ſuch ſhould ſuppreſſed, as were moſt in his intereſt, and beſt able to ſerve him; 1460. for it was not queſtioned, that this method would put an effectual ſtop to his ambitious purſuits. Accordingly, James Butler, earl of Wiltſhire, and the lord Scales were impowered, to inquire out thoſe that carried arms for the male-contents, in the late rebellion, and to puniſh them, as the law directed; and theſe two lords began to execute their commiſſion, in ſome of the towns that had moſt openly declared for the duke of York, and condemned ſeveral perſons to death; but no county, in England, had more reaſon to dread the court's reſentment than that of Kent. This county, upon all occaſions, had diſcovered a very ſtrong attachment to the duke of York; and what was done there, in favour of Cade, was not yet forgotten; ſo that the inhabitants of Kent, perceiving, from what was practiſed, in other places, that their ruin was unavoidable, began early to think of means to prevent it. With this view, they acquainted the lords, at Calais, that, if they would invade their country, they ſhould be received, with open arms; and that the inhabitants were ready to hazard their lives and fortunes with them.

This overture was extremely agreeable to the lords; yet, not to embarque raſhly, in this affair, they ſent the lord Falconbridge, to be aſſured of their ſincerity; who, meeting, at ſea, with Sir Simon Montfort, appointed to guard the coaſts, attacked him; and, taking him priſoner, with many other officers, he ſent them all to Calais. Upon their arrival, the earl of Marche ordered Montfort, with 12 of his captains, to be beheaded, in retaliation for his father's adherents, who had been executed, in England; which are almoſt unavoidable cruelties, in ſuch civil wars.

Falconbridge, arriving at Sandwich, found the inhabitans of that place, and of the whole county, ſo well affected to the lords, that he wrote to Calais, that there was occaſion for the utmoſt expedition; that the county of Kent was on the point of being ruined, if not ſpeedily relieved; and that, in the terror people were under, it was not to be queſtioned, that ſeveral other counties, as well as Kent, would riſe againſt the court, if they could hope to be ſupported. This juncture ſeeming very favourable, the lords, at Calais, determined to improve it, and took care to inform the duke of York, who was ſtill, in Ireland; and, before they ſailed, a manifeſto was diſperſed, in Kent and the neighbouring parts, declaring that the ſole motive of their taking up arms was to free the poor people from their inſupportable oppreſſions, and ſecure their privileges. It was added, that they were ſure all honeſt Engliſhmen would aſſiſt, in the execution of ſo good a deſign; and this manifeſto had ſuch an effect, that the lords, arriving at Sandwich, with only 1500 men, found there a body of 4000 armed men conducted by the lord Cobham. With this reinforcement, they began their march towards London, knowing the citizens were ready to receive them; and, indeed, the gates being opened to them, they entered the city, at the head of 40,000 men, their 1460. their army increaſing to that number, in ſo ſhort a march; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of London, Lincoln, Ely, and Exeter declared for them.

The queen tries, in vain, to prevent them.

In the interim, the queen, at Coventry, who was not idle, endeavoured to hinder the entrance of the male-contents into London, by ſending the lord Scales, with an able body of troops; but the mayor refuſed him admittance, even before the arrival of the lords. Scales, being, thus, repulſed, threw himſelf into the tower, from whence he threatened to demoliſh the city, with his cannon, if the rebels were received; but his menaces were ineffectual. In the mean while, the king and queen were aſſembling their forces, at Coventry, with all poſſible expedition; and, the army being ready to march, they gave the command to the duke of Somerſet, lately returned from Guiſnes, and the duke of Buckingham; but this was only, for form's ſake, the queen herſelf being, in reality, general, ſince nothing was done, without her orders, even tho' the king was preſent, in perſon. The young earl of Marche, hearing that the queen was marching to London, departed thence, with 25000 men, to give her battle, before ſhe ſhould augment her forces, leaving, at London, the earl of Salisbury, with a conſiderable part of his troops; and he took with him the earl of Warwick and the lord Cobham, who ſerved, as his lieutenants. At his departure from London, the lord Scales ordered the tower-cannon to fire upon the city, and did ſome damage; but, by the earl of Salisbury's care, to prevent his having any proviſions, he was himſelf reduced to great neceſſities.

She paſſes a river to fight them.

The queen, advancing towards the rebels incamped on a plain, near Northampton, with a ſmall river behind her, which ſhe had haſtily paſſed, leſt the enemies ſhould make uſe of it, to avoid fighting; ſo deſirous was ſhe to decide the quarrel, by a battle; but this precaution was not only uſeleſs to her, but, as will be ſeen, preſently, extremely prejudicial. The earls of Marche and Warwick, alſo advancing, incamped, the 17th of July, between Touceſter and Northampton; and, the ſame day, they ſent the biſhop of Salisbury to the king, beſeeching him to ſuſpend his indignation, and conſider with them about an agreement, without blood-ſhed; but the court, apprehending it to be only a general propoſal, purely deſigned to ſalve the appearances, would, by no means, liſten to it; ſo that both ſides prepared for battle.

On the 19th of July, the Yorkiſts advanced towards the king's army; the earl of Warwick commanding the right wing, the lord Cobham the left, and the earl of Marche in the center; and the dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham were at the head of the royaliſts, whilſt the queen kept at ſome diſtance, to obſerve what ſhould paſs, and give orders, accordingly. The king remained in his tent, waiting the iſſue of a battle, which, probably, would ſecure or deprive, him of the crown, for ever; and the fight did not begin, till two in the afternoon, the lords having firſt publiſhed in their army a ſtrict charge, not to hurt the king's perſon, to ſpare the common ſoldiers, and to fall upon the officers only. The battle laſted two, ſome ſay five, hours, with great fierceneſs and obſtinacy, on both ſides, till, at length, the lord Grey of Ruthin, who commanded a numerous body of the king's army, ſuddenly went over to the male-contents; which unexpected defection entirely diſpirited the royaliſts; who, being apprehenſive that other bodies would follow this example, began, by degrees, to give way, and, at laſt, were routed, with the loſs of 10,000 men. The river, in their rear, cauſed the ſlaughter to be greater than it would have been, if the vanquiſhed could have more eaſily taken to flight; and, beſides, many were drowned, in endeavouring to repaſs it. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, ſon to the renowned Talbot, the lord Beaumont, and ſeveral other lords and officers of diſtinction were ſlain, on the ſpot; and the queen, with the young prince of Wales and the duke of Somerſet, fled, without reſting, into the biſhoprick of Durham; ſuch was their dread of being delivered to their enemies. The unfortunate king, who remained in his tent, fell once more into the hands of the victorious lords, who paid him, however, all the reſpect he could have demanded of them, in his greateſt proſperity. This deference was ſome comfort to him, in his preſent condition; which would have been more worthy of pity, had not his natural imbecillity rendered him inſenſible of good and bad fortune. Immediately after the battle, he was honourably conducted to Northampton, where he reſided, ſome time; after which, on the 16th of Auguſt, he came to London, ſurrounded with a crowd of lords, who, a few days before, were in arms againſt him. In the interim, the queen, believing herſelf not ſafe, in Durham, privately retired, with eight perſons only, into Wales, where ſhe would never have been ſought; but, ſhortly after, ſhe left that retreat, and, with the prince, her ſon, fled into Scotland.

Upon the king's arrival, at London, he called a parliament, for the 2d of October; for they, who governed him, wanted this delay, in order to ſend for the duke of York, who was ſtill, in Ireland; and, acquainting him with what had paſſed, they intreated him to repair to London, with all poſſible ſpeed, that he might be there, at the opening of the parliament, or ſooner, if the wind would permit. In this interval, they acted, in the king's name, and obliged him to ſign what orders they pleaſed; for, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, there is a patent, confirming to the earl of Warwick the government of Calais; and an order to the duke of Somerſet, to reſign him that of Guiſnes; moreover, the king's declaration, acknowledging the duke of York and his adherents, for good and faithful ſubjects, as having given undoubted proofs of their loyalty.

Whilſt the kingdom was in this combuſtion, James II, king of Scotland, tho' the preceding year, he had concluded a four years truce with England, 1460. England, prepared to invade it; for the duke of York, after his retreat into Ireland, had, by ſome beneficial offers, engaged him to break with Henry, in expectation of reaping ſome advantage himſelf from this diverſion. Indeed, James alledged ſeveral reaſons, to varniſh his invaſion; but the circumſtances of England was the ſole and real motive of his preparations. However this be, a few days after the battle of Northampton, he entered England, at the head of an army, and beſieged Roxborough; but he had not time, to make any remarkable progreſs. One of his own cannon happening to burſt, he was killed, with a ſplinter, on the 4th of Auguſt; being ſucceeded by James III, his eldeſt ſon, then but ſeven years old; but the queen, his widow, who was in the army, carried on the ſiege, till the town was ſurrendered.

Charles VII. dies, and is ſucceeded by Lewis XI.

The death of James II. had been preceded, ſome days, by that of Charles VII, king of France; and it is pretended, that he ſtarved himſelf, to prevent his being poiſoned by the dauphin, his ſon, who aſended the throne of France after him, by the name of Lewis XI.

The duke of York arrives, goes to the parliament, and expects in vain to be asked to ſeat himſelf on the throne. Hall.

The duke of York could not reach London, till two days after the opening of the parliament; who rode directly to Weſtminſter, and, alighting from his horſe, went to the houſe of lords, where he ſtood, ſome time, under the canopy of ſtate, with his hand on the throne, expecting, as it were, to be deſired to ſeat himſelf thereon; but the ſilence of the houſe was an evident indication, that his intention was not univerſally approved. At the ſame time, to increaſe his confuſion, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, approaching him, asked him, whether he would not go and pay his reſpects to the king; but, how cautiouſly ſoever the duke had, hitherto, beheaved, he changed countenance at this queſtion, and told the archbiſhop, that he knew no perſon, to whom he owed that honour. Upon theſe words, he, immediately, withdrew to his own houſe; and, plainly perceivlng that he, in vain, expected to be intreated to accept of the crown, without concealing his ſentiments any longer, he ſent, next morning, a writing to the parliament, containing the grounds of his pretenſions. As they have been often mentioned, it will be ſufficient to ſay, in a word, that he claimed the crown, as heir to the houſe of Marche; and this affair was very warmly debated, in parliament, according to the knowledge and inclinations of the members. To relate all the arguments advanced, pro and con, would be exceſſively tedious; but, as this is a matter of great importance, it will be expedient to give the ſubſtance of the objections to the duke of York's claim, and the replies of his friends; and I muſt not forget to remark, that both ſides referred to the deciſion of the parliament, which they equally acknowledged, for the ſole judge of the affair in diſpute.

Arguments pro and con.

I. It was alledged, that, when Henry IV, grandfather to the preſent king, took poſſeſſion of the throne, no perſon oppoſed him.

The duke of York's friends replied that, 1460. ſince Edmund, earl of Marche, who was then living, could not diſpute it, without manifeſt danger, his ſilence could not be interpreted, for conſent.

II. It was ſaid, in behalf of the king, that Henry IV, his grandfather, received the crown, by the parliament's authority.

It was anſwered, that the duke of York did not pretend to aſcend the throne, without the ſame authority, as appeared in his memorial directed to both houſes; but, as the parliament had weighty reaſons, to proceed, contrary to cuſtom, in favour of the houſe of Lancaſter; ſo they had, at preſent, no leſs powerful conſiderations, to do the duke of York juſtice. The duke's friends took care not to diſpute the parliament's authority, at a time, when they intended to make uſe of it, to place him on the throne; but, probably, they did not ſpeak, upon this ſubject, all their thoughts.

III. The reſignation of Richard II. was pleaded, in behalf of the houſe of Lancaſter.

Anſwer was made, by denying that Richard's reſignation concerned that houſe, in particular, or even the perſon of Henry IV; but, ſuppoſing it did, it was not in the power of a captive king, juſt going to be depoſed, to appoint a ſucceſſor.

IV. It was objected againſt the duke of York, that, as the earl of Cambridge, his father, was executed, for high-treaſon, his poſterity were rendered incapable of any inheritance.

It was anſwered, that he had been reſtored to his honours, and all his hereditary rights, and owned, for duke of York and earl of Marche, by the king himſelf, and the whole kingdom.

V. It was farther urged, that the houſe of Lancaſter had enjoyed the crown, above 60 years.

It was replied, that preſcription was no plea againſt the right of ſucceſſion to the crown, which was natural, and not to be deſtroyed by a poſitive law.

VI. Laſtly, it was repreſented, that Henry, having now reigned, 38 years, and, all along, led an innocent life, without giving any perſon cauſe of complaint, it would be an inſtance of great cruelty to deprive him of the crown.

This objection ſeemed very weighty; but the duke of York's friends replied, that, Henry, being incapable of governing, by himſelf, to leave him in poſſeſſion of the crown was acting rather for the queen and the miniſters, who abuſed his name and authority, than for him; moreover, the whole kingdom was not to be ruined, for his ſake, or an injuſtice to be committed, from a motive of charity.

It may eaſily be imagined, that theſe and ſeveral other reaſons, alledged by both parties, were enlarged and diſplayed, to the beſt advantage, eſpecially in the parliament, where there are generally many perſons of extenſive abilities; for this was a very proper ſubject to exerciſe the ingenious, intricate in itſelf, and ſtill more ſo, by the preſent poſture of affairs. At length, after a debate of ſeveral days, it

1460. was reſolved, that Henry ſhould enjoy the crown, during his life, and the duke of York be declared his ſucceſſor; which reſolve was paſſed into an act of parliament, declaring, that, notwithſtanding the duke of York's unexceptionable title to the crown, he had freely conſented, that Henry ſhould poſſeſs it, for his life, and promiſed to ſwear allegiance to him, as his lawful ſovereign; but, if the king ſhould, any way, violate this agreement, then the crown ſhould, immediately, devolve to the duke of York, or his lawful heirs.

The duke of York conſents to the decree. Hall.

In all probability, this agreement did not fully anſwer the duke of York's expectations; yet he was contented, becauſe he perceived, that it would be extremely difficult to obtain more, without compulſive methods. It muſt be confeſs'd, that he behaved with a moderation very unuſual, in ſuch caſes; for, in his preſent circumſtances, and according to the rule generally obſerved, by parliaments, to declare for the ſtrongeſt, he might, with the greateſt eaſe, cauſe the crown, forthwith, to be adjudged to him. He had, at his command, a victorious, and, at that time, an irreſiſtible army; moreover, moſt of the members of parliament were in his intereſt, and, probably, after acknowledging his title to be indiſputable, with very little ſollicitation, they would have placed him on the throne; whence it is manifeſt, that, if the parliament ſhewed any regard for Henry, it was, becauſe they believed themſelves at liberty to uſe this equity, notwithſtanding the victorious army which might have offered them violence, if the duke would have taken this advantage. It muſt be farther remarked, that the duke of York was older than the king, and, therefore, naturally could not expect to ſurvive him; and yet thoſe, who have related theſe troubles, put an ill conſtruction upon all they ſay, concerning this prince. The reaſon is obvious; for, the houſe of York enjoying the throne, only 24 years, we have no hiſtorian, during that interval; all we have being later, and written ſince the reſtoration of the houſe of Lancaſter, in the perſon of Henry VII. This muſt be always remembered, in reading the hiſtory of theſe civil wars.

A proceſſion, at St. Paul's. Hall.

The day after paſſing the foreſaid act, a proceſſion was made, at St. Paul's, where the king was preſent, with his crown on his head, attended by the duke of York.

The duke is abſolute maſter of the government.

After this agreement, the king continued the ſame; and, tho' he could not but perceive, how very prejudicial the late ſettlement was to his family, and particularly to the prince of Wales, his ſon, he patiently bore his ſervitude; for, reſting ſatisfied with the duke of York's ſuggeſtions, he entirely gave himſelf up to devotion, and left the management of publick affairs to thoſe that governed, in his name. The duke, being, thus, abſolute maſter of the government and perſon of the king, cauſed him to ſign an order, enjoining the queen to repair to him; tho' he was not inſenſible, that it would prove ineffectual; but his view was, to render her criminal, by her refuſing to obey the king, and ſo to juſtify his intended proceedings againſt her. He imagined, that ſhe was without refuge; and that he only wanted a pretence, to lay an inſuperable obſtacle to her return, in order to be freed from ſuch a dangerous enemy; but he relied too far on his own good fortune, and the queen's weakneſs. Inſtead of being diſheartened, at the ill ſituation of the king's and his family's affairs, ſhe was now returned into England, with the prince of Wales, her ſon, and had drawn together, in the north, an army of 18000 men; and, the better to engage the people of thoſe parts to her intereſt, ſhe ordered it to be reported, that they were allowed to plunder the country, on the ſouth of the Trent; which, probably, was moſt conducive to her aſſembling ſo great a number of troops. 1460.

The duke of York had heard of the queen's endeavours, to levy an army; but he did not know ſhe had made ſo great a progreſs; yet he thought he could not be too ſpeedy, to prevent the execution of her deſigns. He departed, therefore, from London, with only 4 or 5000 men, leaving orders with the earl of Marche, his ſon, to lead the reſt of the army into Wales, to refreſh them, and then come and join him; but, as he proceeded towards the north, he received the mortifying news of the queen's great ſucceſs, in the levying of troops; and, at length, arriving near Wakefield, in the county of York, he was informed, that the queen was advancing towards him, at the head of 18000 men. Upon this, he reſolved to retire to his caſtle of Sandal, till the arrival of the earl of Marche; for he knew, that the queen, who had no artillery, could not force him, in that caſtle, which was well fortified, and he did not doubt but the earl, his ſon, would ſpeedily come to his relief.

The queen provokes him to fight.

The queen was extremely mortified to ſee her enemy, thus, ſecured from all attack; for, as ſhe was then much ſuperior, in number of troops, if the duke would have engaged, ſhe might have promiſed herſelf a compleat victory; but it was not certain, that, after the earl of Marche's arrival, ſhe ſhould remain in the ſame ſituation. On this account, ſhe did all that was poſſible, to provoke her enemy to come out of his retreat; and, as ſhe did not deſpair of ſucceſs, ſhe placed a body of troops in ambuſh, behind a hill; upon which, ſhe appeared, before the walls of Sandal, not only threatening, and ſending him defiances, but even upbraiding him, that a man, who aſpired to the crown, ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be, thus, ſhut up by a woman.

The duke of York, had, hitherto, acted, with great prudence and conduct; and, during the wars of France, where he was often commander in chief, he had diſcovered no leſs wiſdom, than true valour; but, on the preſent occaſion, his courage unfortunately prevailed, contrary to the opinion of his friends, who adviſed him to deſpiſe thoſe vain reproaches: Perhaps, his hatred to the queen induced him, as it were, againſt his will, to commit an unpardonable fault, in ſuch a re-

1460. nowned general. Theſe, at leaſt, were the motives aſcribed to him by the hiſtorians; but, for my part, if I may be allowed to give my opinion, I rather believe, that the want of proviſions forced him to a battle, in order to avoid the danger to which he was expoſed; ſo that, if he committed a fault, it was in ſhutting himſelf up, in a caſtle, inſtead of returning, or meeting his ſon, who could eaſily join him. However this be, he marched out of Sandal, and drew up his men, on Wakefield-green, imagining that his courage and experience would ſupply the defects of his army; but he was no ſooner drawn up, than he ſaw himſelf attacked by the queen's troops, which, being more numerous than his, had a great advantage over him. Whilſt he was preſſed, in the front, by his powerful enemies, the ambuſhes roſe, and attacked him, in the rear; which unexpected aſſault cauſed ſuch confuſion among his troops, that, within half an hour, they were routed, and himſelf ſlain, valiantly fighting. The young earl of Rutland, his ſecond ſon, not above 12 years of age, flying with his governor, was overtaken by the lord Clifford, who plunged his dagger into his breaſt, in ſpite of the preſſing intreaties of the governor, to ſpare the young prince's life *; and, afterwards, the ſaid lord, finding the duke of York's body, cut off the head, and, crowning it with a paper crown, fixed it, on the end of his lance, and preſented it to the queen, who ordered it to be placed on the walls of York.

The battle of Wakefield, wherein the duke of York is ſlain.

A remark on the partiality of the hiſtorians to the houſe of Lancaſter.

Thus, fell the duke of York, about 50 years old. It may be ſaid, that no prince was ever ſo near throne, and not in it; and that he might have taken poſſeſſion, had he been willing to uſe the power he had in his hands. I ſhall not undertake either to condemn, or juſtify his pretenſions; leaving the reader to form his own judgment, upon the grounds already explained, in ſeveral places of this Hiſtory. Unhappily for this prince, the Engliſh hiſtorians that wrote, when the reſtoration of the houſe of Lancaſter was ſtill freſh, I mean, in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII, have put an ill conſtruction on all his actions; and thoſe, that came after them, not contented with taking the facts, as they found them related, have alſo copied the reflections, and even the very invectives; by which they have all unanimouſly given the cauſe, for the houſe of Lancaſter, notwithſtanding its being ſo intricate and perplexing; and, ſhould the ſame thing happen again, the deciſion of it would be no leſs difficult, than it was formerly. The earl of Salisbury, being taken priſoner, in the battle, was carried, notwithſtanding his wounds, to Pontefract, where he loſt his head on the ſcaffold; and the queen ordered it to be ſet on a pole, near that of the duke of York.

The earl of Marche reſolves to maintain the quarrel.

Such was the ſucceſs of this battle, fought, on the laſt day of December, near Wakefield; which ſeemed firmly to have reſtored the affairs of the king and queen; and yet it only haſtened their deſtruction, and ſooner advanced the houſe of York to the throne. The earl of Marche, hearing of the defeat and death of the duke, his father, reſolved, at all hazards, to maintain the quarrel; and, indeed, as the caſe ſtood, at preſent, one of the two houſes muſt neceſſarily be eſtabliſhed, upon the ruins of the other. This prince was then, in Wales, ready to march to the aſſiſtance of his father; and his army was 23000 ſtrong, beſides what was left, at London, under the command of the earl of Warwick, for the defence of the metropolis; ſo that, finding himſelf in a condition to go, in queſt of the queen, he wiſhed for nothing more ardently, than an opportunity to revenge his father's death. 1460. 1461.

In the mean while, the queen advanced towards London, with an intent to ſecure that great city, which alone could influence the fortune of either party; but, having intelligence, upon the road, that the earl of Marche began to move, ſhe detached Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, to oppoſe this new enemy, whom ſhe did not imagine to be ſo ſtrong as herſelf. The earl of Marche, being informed that the queen advanced towards London, altering his courſe, inſtead of going to meet her, took alſo the road to London, in order to prevent her; but, having advice of the detachment ſent againſt him, he judged it improper to come between the two armies of his enemies, which muſt have happened, had he continued his rout; and, coming to a ſudden reſolution, he returned, to meet the earl of Pembroke. He met him, near Mortimer's croſs, in Herefordſhire; and, being much ſuperior, in number of troops, he eaſily defeated him, and ſlew 3800 of his men. The earl of Pembroke had the good fortune to eſcape; but Owen Tudor, his father, according to ſome, or, more probably, his younger brother, being taken priſoner, was beheaded, with ſeveral others, in revenge for the earl of Salisbury.

Pembroke is defeated.

The news of this defeat reaching the queen, on the road, did not prevent her from proceeding on her march towards London; who believed, that, appearing, at the gates of the city, with a victorious army, ſhe ſhould ſo aſtoniſh the citizens, that they would, of their own accord, expel the earl of Warwick. Indeed, the earl himſelf ſeems to have been of the ſame opinion, who choſe rather to go and fight the queen, than remain in London; which, doubtleſs, he would not have done, had he been ſecure of the city. The queen, being arrived, at St. Albans, received certain intelligence, that the earl of Warwick advanced towards her, with his army, reinforced with a body of Londoners, and bringing the king with him; and her army conſiſted of northern troops, who committed ſuch monſtrous ra-

The earl of Warwick goes out to fight the queen.

* It is reported, that he ſlew, that day, ſo many, with his own hand, that he was, thenceforward called the Butcher; and Grafton affirms, that, his father, Thomas, lord Clifford, having been killed, in the battle of St. Albans, by the duke of York, this lord Clifford ſwore, "He would not leave one branch of the line of York ſtanding." vages,

He is defeated, at Bernard's Heath. Feb. 17. Stow.

The two armies, meeting, near St. Albans, on Bernard's Heath, began a fight, which, at firſt, was very vigorous, on both ſides; but, Lovelace, who commanded one of the wings of Warwick's army, either through treachery, or for ſome other reaſon, not engaging, in time, the victory declared for the queen, and the vanquiſhed loſt 2800 men; and ſhe likewiſe had the ſatisfaction to free the king, whom the earl of Warwick durſt not venture to leave, at London. She uſed her victory, with the barbarity too common, in civil wars, beheading ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, particularly the lord Bonvile and Sir Thomas Kiriel, tho' the king had granted them their lives; and, as her troops had voluntarily liſted in her ſervice, and ſhe was unable to pay them, ſhe could not hinder them from plundering the town of St. Albans. Theſe northern ſoldiers declared, that they had taken up arms, purely upon the promiſe of having the plunder of the country, lying ſouth of the Trent; which declaration inſpired the inhabitants of London, and the neighbouring country, with a terror extremely prejudicial to the queen. Proviſions being grown very ſcarce, in her army, on account of the great licentiouſneſs of her troops, ſhe ſent to the mayor of London, for a ſupply; who, not daring to deny her, at ſuch a juncture, ordered ſeveral carts to be loaded; but, as they were going out of the gate, the mob ſtopped them, and told the mayor, that they would not ſuffer proviſions to be ſent to an army, which was come, on purpoſe, to plunder the country; and the mayor not having it in his power to prevent this diſorder, made an excuſe to the queen, and gave her hopes of being received into the city, as ſoon as the people were appeaſed.

The earl of Marche approaches London. Hall.

Whilſt the queen, at St. Albans, was treating with the mayor of London, the earl of Marche marched, with all poſſible expedition, to inſpire the Londoners with a reſolution to keep their gates ſhut againſt the queen, by reaſon of the approaching aſſiſtance; and, indeed, the news of his march greatly contributed to prolong the negotiation, between the queen and the mayor, which ruined her affairs. She no ſooner heard, that the earl of Marche was approaching, and had augmented his army, with the remains of the earl of Warwick's, than ſhe choſe to retire into the north; for ſhe was not only inferior to her enemy, but alſo juſtly apprehenſive of not being received, in London, if ſhe advanced, that way, and of being forced to join battle, at the gates of the city, too well inclined to favour her enemy.

The earl of Marche, overjoyed that the queen volutarily gave him up the metropolis, entered, as it were, in triumph, the beginning of March; and he was received with the acclamations of the inhabitants, who, ſeveral years before, had very near declared againſt the court; but the late duke of York's caution had been ſo much to his prejudice, that his ſon's friends judged it abſolutely neceſſary to place him, at once, on the throne. After ſeveral conſultations, inſtead of being expoſed to the delays of a parliament, they reſolved to proceed to an extraordinary election, firſt by the people, and then by the nobles; and they believed, that this method might be juſtified by the act of parliament, confirming the agreement between the king and the duke of York, and that it was unneceſſary to ſtay for a freſh confirmation. 1461.

An extraordinary election of the earl of Marche.

Accordingly, the earl of Warwick drew up his army, in St. John's fields, in the midſt of throngs of people; whom ordering to be caſt into a ring round him, he read aloud the agreement between the king and the duke of York, with the act of parliament, by which it was confirmed; and then he told the people, that Henry had notoriouſly violated this agreement, and ſo forfeited his right to the crown; but, after all, I do not ſee, how he could charge the king with the queen's proceedings, ſince he was, all the while, as a priſoner, at London; nor was he any more his own maſter, after he was with the queen. However, this be, the earl of Warwick, raiſing his voice, asked the people, who ſtood round him, Whether they would have Henry of Lancaſter, for their king? The whole multitude crying out, no, no, he farther asked, Whether, according to that ſettlement, they would have Edward, ſon to the late duke of York, to reign over them? To which, all the people anſwered with acclamations, expreſſing their conſent.

An aſſembly of the chief men who adjudged him the crown. Hall.

Upon this, the people's mind being, as was pretended, ſufficiently known, a great council was called of all the biſhops, lords, gentlemen, and the magiſtrates, in and about London; and Edward, in this aſſembly, ſet forth his title to the crown, as well by birth, as by the foreſaid agreement, and deſired, that it might be adjudged to him. It would have been great boldneſs, to diſpute his pretenſion, at ſuch a juncture; wherefore, the aſſembly unanimouſly declared, that, Henry of Lancaſter, having forfeited his right of enjoying the crown, during life, by the violation of the ſolemn agreement made with the duke of York, and ratified by the parliament, it was devolved to Edward, eldeſt ſon to the duke of York. Upon this declaration, the crown was offered to the duke, who accepted it, modeſtly confeſſing his inſufficiency; adding, that, tho' his youth and want of experience made him apprehenſive of undertaking ſuch a weighty charge, he would, however, with God's aſſiſtance, do all that was poſſible, to promote the happineſs of his people. On the morrow, he went in proceſſion to St. Paul's, from whence, he was conducted, in great ſtate, to Weſtminſter-hall, where he ſat in the king's ſeat, with the ſcepter of St. Edward in his hand; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury having asked the people, whether they would have Edward earl of Marche, for their king; the people anſwered, with loud acclamations. Then the king took the homage

1461. of the lords that were preſent; and the ceremony concluding with ſinging Te Deum, Edward was conducted, with great ſolemnity, to the biſhop's palace, where Henry uſually lodged, when he was within the walls of the city; and, next day, being the 5th of March, he was proclaimed, in London, and the neighbouring towns, by the name of Edward IV.

Thus, ended the reign of Henry VI, which had laſted, 38 years and a half, without his ever intermeddling with the adminiſtration of the publick affairs; nay, we do not find, that he was, on any occaſion, much moved with events, tho' they were, for the moſt part, ſuch as would affect a prince of a different character. He was fitter for a private life, than a crown; and his great and only defect was a natural imbecillity, which rendered him incapable of holding, of himſelf, the reins of the government. As he was ever ruled by thoſe, who governed, in his name, his capacity did not reach to ſee the conſequences of the counſels given him, which he apprehended to be always good; but, in this, he widely differed from the king, his father, whoſe genius was always ſuperior to that of his miniſters. As to the reſt, he was chaſte, temperate, extremely religious, and abhorred injuſtice and cruelty; and theſe virtues have ſerved for a foundation to the encomiums beſtowed on him by ſeveral hiſtorians, and wſtich have led ſome to conſider him, as a real ſaint. Indeed, theſe virtues would have rendered him an accompliſhed prince, had they been attended with the qualifications of a ſovereign; but, being alone, they only made him an honeſt man, and, at the ſame time, to ſay no worſe, a very indifferent king. His incapacity drew upon him the contempt of his ſubjects; but the innocence of his life never ſuffered it to turn into hatred.

Henry's character.

During the firſt years of his reign, his affairs were in a proſperous ſituation, being managed by the dukes of Bedford and Glouceſter, his uncles, princes of great abilities, and ſincerely attached to his intereſt; and, if, even in their life-time, his affairs began to decline, it was not ſo much owing to their fault, as to ſome unforeſeen accidents, which all the prudence in the world could not have prevented. After the deceaſe of the duke of Bedford, Henry was entirely ſwayed by the cardinal of Wincheſter and the duke of Suffolk; who, regarding only their own advantage, compleated his ruin. Afterwards, queen Margaret, by her uncommon capacity, might have reſtored his affairs; but, altogether regardleſs of the king's glory, or the good of the nation, her ſole view was to graſp all the power, and uſe the king's name, to authoriſe her paſſions; and the miniſters, ſhe employed, were all of the ſame character. It is not, therefore, ſurpriſing, that the king's affairs ſhould run ſo ſwiftly into confuſion. The death of the duke of Glouceſter will be an indelible ſtain, in Margaret's reputation; and unfortunately, this crime reflected but too much upon the king himſelf, ſince he had not the reſolution to oppoſe it, or puniſh the authors. Accordingly, it manifeſtly appeared, that Heaven took publick vengeance of this murder, by the civil wars which enſued, that occaſioned the ruin of the king, the queen, the prince, their ſon, and the whole houſe of Lancaſter.

1461. The cauſes of the decay of the Engliſh affairs, in Henry VI's reign.

Henry VI. was 39 years and about a quarter old, when he was deprived of the crown, which he had enjoyed, almoſt from his very birth; tho' he ſtill lived long enough to be the ſport of fortune, as will be ſeen, in the ſucceeding reign; and Edward, his ſon, prince of Wales, was in his 19th year, at the time of this fatal revolution.

A DISSERTATION on the MAID of ORLEANS.

THE actions of JOAN of ARC, commonly called the Maid of Orleans, made formerly a very great noiſe in the world; and they are diſperſed, in the hiſtories of France and England, with circumſtances that all ſavour of prodigy. Moſt of the writers, upon this ſubject, have ſcarce left their readers the liberty of reaſoning and judging; having expreſly decided, ſome, that Joan of Arc was inſpired by God, others, that ſhe was an inſtrument of the devil; yet they all agree to inſinuate, that what ſhe did could not be performed, without a ſupernatural aſſiſtance. However, impartial and unprejudiced readers find inſuperable difficulties, in both theſe opinions; for, as they do not apprehend, wherein religion can be concerned, in Joan's actions, they think it equally incredible, that God ſhould either ſupernaturally raiſe this Maid, in favour of Charles VII, or give the devil an extraordinary power, to make her his inſtrument, to ruin the affairs of the Engliſh, in France. Hence ſeveral have been led to embrace a third opinion; viz. that the pretended inſpiration of Joan of Arc was no more than a contrivance, to produce the effect that, indeed, attended it. This diverſity of opinions, together with the marvellous viſible, in the actions of a country girl, very naturally raiſes a curioſity, to have a juſt account of this affair; wherefore, I am perſuaded, that it will not be unacceptable fairly to examine this matter, with the ſole view of diſcovering, as far as poſſible, the truth. As I propoſe to be as brief, as the nature of the ſubject will allow, omitting the learning it is capable of, I ſhall only relate the facts and teſtimonies, which may illuſtrate this affair, and afterwards make ſome remarks, upon the whole; and they, who are impatient to purſue the Hiſtory of England, may diſpenſe with peruſing this Diſſertation, without endangering the loſs of any thing abſolutely neceſſary to be known.

It muſt, firſt, be obſerved, that we have only only a ſingle contemporary author, who gives an account of the Maid of Orleans; for all the later writers have made additions to his relation, in order to embelliſh their Hiſtory. Monſtrelet is the author I mean; who was one of the retinue of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, and had himſelf ſeen this girl; but he is extremely reſerved, in what he relates. He never mentions his own opinion; and the reaſon is obvious; for Joan, making her appearance, when the duke of Bnrgundy was in alliance with England, Monſtrelet, with all of that party, did not believe her inſpired; but, as he did not write his Chronicle, till after the duke's reconciliation to king Charles, he judged it improper to combat, in his writings, the received opinion of the French, who were then his maſter's friends. On the contrary, as, probably, in changing his party, he had not altered his ſentiments of Joan, he took care to ſay nothing, to make it believed, that he was under the ſame prejudice with the reſt of the French; and, therefore, Monſtrelet ſeems to be a faithful guide, who, whatevever his own opinion was, has ſaid nothing, to render him ſuſpected. The truth is, he never ſays, either that Joan was, or was not inſpired.

The ſame author has inſerted, in his Chronicle, a letter written, in the name of Henry VI, to the duke of Burgundy, to inform him of what paſſed, at the trial and condemnation of the Maid of Orleans; which might be juſtly ſuſpected of partiality, if the facts it contains did not, for the moſt part, agree with the records of the trial mentioned, hereafter; ſo that this letter is a farther means, to enable us to diſcover the truth.

We have a third means, the ampleſt and moſt conſiderable, viz. Joan's examination and anſwers, of which the famous Stephen Paſquier has related the particulars; who affirms, that he had Joan's original trial, four whole years, in his hands, and what he has ſaid, concerning her, was faithfully extracted; but we muſt carefully diſtinguiſh what Paſquier aſſerts, as of himſelf, from the records of the trial; for he was ſo prejudiced, in favour of Joan, that he could not avoid being angry with thoſe of his countrymen, who did not believe her inſpired. He ſays, they were worſe than the Engliſh, and extremely injurious to the honour of France; ſo that, conſidering only his private opinion, he has juſtly rendered himſelf ſuſpected to one of the parties; but the trial itſelf is an original piece, beyond all ſuſpicion, ſince we find there, verbatim, Joan's own anſwers to the articles upon which ſhe was examined.

Monſtrelet's Chronicle, the king of England's letter to the duke of Burgundy, and the trial of the Maid are the three evidences, which muſt be examined, in order to paſs a juſt judgment, upon this affair; for, as to the facts diſperſed, in the Hiſtories of France and England, which are not drawn from theſe three fountains, in my opinion, they deſerve very little regard; ſince it is manifeſt, that the hiſtorians have copied, without any previous examination, thoſe that wrote before them; and that ſeveral have induſtriouſly embelliſhed their ſubject, by multiplying the wonders. If ſome are to be credited, Joan worked miracles, foretold future events, knew ſecrets, unknown to all but the king, her heart was found whole and entire, amongſt the aſhes of her funeral pile, and, out of the flames that conſumed her body, was ſeen to fly a white dove, the emblem of her chaſtity. They farther relate, that Joan commanded the convoy which entered Orleans, and led the beſieged to the aſſault of the Engliſh forts; that, by her ſole advice, the battle of Patay was fought, and to her bravery the French were indebted, for their victory. In a word, they pretend, that Joan did all, and leave king Charles's generals only the honour, of fighting under her banner; but, in all this, they, doubtleſs, exceed the truth. The moſt certain way is to keep to the three foreſaid authorities, which it will be neceſſary to examine; but I ſhall begin with Monſtrelet, and cite ſome paſſages of his Chronicle, eſſential to the point under conſideration; for it would be tedious to copy all he has ſaid, concerning the Maid.

" Now, in the year abovementioned, came " to the king, at Chinon, where he reſided, " a young damſel, about 20 years old *, called " Joan, clothed and dreſſed, like a man; who " was born in the parts, between Lorrain and " Burgundy, at Droimy †, a place not far " from Vaucouleur. This Joan was long a " ſervant, at an inn, and had the courage to " ride the horſes to water, and alſo to perform " other feats, not uſually done by young girls; " and, being turned away, ſhe was ſent to the " king by Sir Robert de Baudricourt, captain, under the king, of Vaucouleur, who " furniſhed her with horſes, and four or five " attendants. She ſtiled herſelf Pucelle, or " Maid, inſpired with divine grace, and ſaid " ſhe was ſent to the king, to put him in " poſſeſſion of his kingdom, of which he was " unjuſtly deprived. She was in a very mean " condition; and ſhe was, about two months, " in the king's palace, whom ſhe, ſeveral " times, admoniſhed to ſupply her with men " and aid, and ſhe would repulſe his enemies, " and exalt his dominion. In the interim, " the king and his council gave no credit to " whatever ſhe ſaid, but took her for a mad-" woman, and diſordered in her ſenſes; for, " to ſo great princes and other noblemen, ſuch, " or the like, words are very doubtful and " dangerous, as well becauſe of the wrath of " the Lord chiefly, as of the ſlander from the " talk of the world. All her words were, in " the name of God; and, therefore, many of " thoſe, that ſaw and heard her ſpeak, were " ſtrongly perſuaded, that ſhe was, as ſhe af-

* She was then 27 years old; for, in her examination, in 1431, ſhe declared, that ſhe was 29 years of age; and, conſequently, when ſhe came to the king, in 1429, ſhe was 27 years old. Rapin.

† It ſhould be read Dompre. Rapin.

" firmed, inſpired by God. She was, ſeveral " times, examined by notable clerks and other " learned men of great authority, that her in- " tention might be more fully diſcovered; " but ſhe always kept to her point, ſaying, if " the king would believe her, ſhe would re- " ſtore him to his dominions.—When ſhe " came before the king, there were preſent " the duke of Alenſon, the king's marſhal, " and ſeveral generals; for the king had held " a council, about the ſiege of Orleans, and " from thence went to Poictiers, and this " Maid with him. Soon after, the marſhal " was ordered to carry proviſions and other " neceſſaries to Orleans; Joan would attend " him, and requeſted, that ſhe might have a " ſuit of armour and men's cloaths, with which " ſhe was furniſhed; and, preſently after, ſhe " ſet up her ſtandard and went to Blois, the " place of rendezvous, and from thence to " Orleans, with the reſt. She was always " completely armed; in this expedition, many " came and liſted under her; and, when ſhe " arrived, at Orleans, ſhe was made very wel- " come, and many people were overjoyed, at " her coming."

This is all that Monſtrelet ſays of the Maid, to her entry into Orleans; and it may be remarked, that ſhe did not command the convoy, but only attended the marſhal, with ſome who had liſted under her. As to the ſtorming of the forts, it ſeems, at firſt, from his account of it, that Joan commanded, in all the ſallies; but, afterwards, he ſays: " And tho', in " theſe three aſſaults, Joan is reported by " common fame to have had the chief com- " mand; yet all, or moſt part, of the noble " knights and captains were in them, who, " during the ſiege, were in the city of Or- " leans, and behaved, each for his part, va- " liantly, as warriors ought to do, on ſuch " occaſions." However, he highly applauds her valour, in ſeveral places. For inſtance, ſpeaking of the march of the French army, after the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, he ſays: " Joan was always in the front, before " her ſtandard; and, in all the marches, her " her fame was ſpread, as if there had been " no other warrior but her herſelf."

After his deſcription of the battle of Patay, he adds, " and eſpecially Joan acquired, on " ſuch occaſions, ſo great praiſe and reputa- " tion, that it was univerſally imagined, that " the king's enemies would be no longer able " to reſiſt her; and that ſhortly, by her means, " the king would be reſtored to his whole " kingdom."

In fine, not to cite too many paſſages of this author, it is ſufficient to obſerve, in a word, that, when he mentions the inſpiration of the Maid, he never gives his own opinion, but only ſays, that ſhe called herſelf inſpired. He is ſo very cautious, that, in ſpeaking of what the duke of Burgundy ſaid to her, when he went to ſee her, after ſhe was taken, he pretends not to remember it, tho' he was himſelf an ear-witneſs. His words are, as follows: " The duke went to ſee her, at the place " where ſhe was lodged, and ſpoke to her " ſome words, which I have forgot, tho' I " was preſent." It is obvious, that the duke's words were reproaches, for ſeducing the people, and menaces, on that account; but Monſtrelet chuſes rather to be ſilent, than to ſay any thing, pro or con.

He likewiſe affirms, that, a few days before Joan threw herſelf into Compiegne, ſhe had fought a captain of the duke of Burgundy's, called Franquet d' Arras, and, having taken him priſoner, cut off his head; but he does not tell us, whether juſtly, or not, contenting himſelf with barely relating the fact.

When he comes, at laſt, to her condemnation, he does not diſcover his own ſentiments; for he only tranſcribes the king of England's letter to the duke of Burgundy, on that occaſion; but, as this letter is an original which may help to diſcover the truth, it will be proper to inſert it, at length.

Moſt dear and well-beloved Uncle,

" THE fervent affection, which we are ſen- " ſible you have, as a true catholick, for " our holy mother, the church, and for the " advancement of our faith, juſtly exhorts " and admoniſhes us to notify to you, in wri- " ting, what, to the honour of our ſaid holy " mother, the church, to the confirmation of " our faith, and to the extirpation of petti- " lent errors, has been lately in this our city " of Roan ſolemnly tranſacted.

" It is now notorious, almoſt every-where " by common fame, how the woman, who cal- " led herſelf Joan the Maid, had, for above " theſe two years, contrary to the divine law, " and the condition of her ſex, wandered a- " bout in men's clothes, a thing abominable " to God, and was in ſuch a dreſs brought " to our and your mortal enemy; and to " whom and to thoſe of his party, church- " men, nobles, and commons, ſhe often inti- " mated, that ſhe was ſent from God; pre- " ſumptuouſly boaſting to have, perſonally and " viſibly, converſed with St. Michael, and " great numbers of angels and ſaints of pa- " radiſe, as St. Catharine and St. Margaret; " by which falſe intimation, and the promiſe " of future victories, ſhe turned the hearts of " many men and women from the truth, to " fables and lyes. She alſo wore arms appoint- " ed for knights and eſquires, and ſet up a " ſtandard; moreover, ſhe demanded, with " great boldneſs, pride, and preſumption, to " bear the moſt excellent arms of France, " which ſhe partly obtained, and bore, in " ſeveral incurſions and aſſaults, as did like- " wiſe her brothers, according to report; " namely, Azure, two Flower-de-Luces, Or, " and a Sword, the point upwards, fermed " with a Crown. In this ſtate, ſhe took the " field, and led men at arms and archers, in " bands and great companies, to commit and " exerciſe inhuman cruelties, by ſhedding " human blood, by exciting ſeditions and " commotions among the people, leading " them into perjury, rebellion, ſuperſtition, " and erroneous opinions; by interrupting all " true peace, and renewing mortal wars; by " ſuffering herſelf to be honoured and reve-

" renced of many, as a ſaint; and by work" ing other damnable deeds, too tedious to
" be related, which, however, were notorious,
" in ſeveral places, at which almoſt all Chri-
" ſtendom was offended. But God, taking " pity on his faithful people, and not ſuffer-
" ing them to remain long in danger, nor to " continue in vain, deſtructive, and novel o" pinions, which they had raſhly embraced,
" has permitted, through his great goodneſs
" and mercy, that this woman ſhould be ta" ken in your army, at the ſiege you was " carrying on, at Compiegne, and, by your " good means, put into our power. And,
" becauſe we were, immediately, required by
" the biſhop of the dioceſe, where ſhe was " apprehended, to deliver over to him, as
" her ordinary eccleſiaſtical judge, the ſaid
" Joan, charged with the crime of high-trea-
" ſon againſt the Divine Majeſty; we, as " well out of reverence to our holy mother,
" the church, whoſe ordinances we juſtly pre" fer to our own will and pleaſure, as for the " honour and exaltation of our holy faith, de" livered her to him to be brought to her trial,
" without ſuffering our ſecular judges to take
" vengeance upon her, as we might lawfully
" have done, conſidering the great damages
" and miſchiefs, the horrible murders, and
" execrable cruelties, with innumerable crimes,
" ſhe had committed againſt us and our duti-
" ful loyal people. The biſhop joined with " him the vicar of the inquiſitor of errors and " hereſies; and, calling in with them a great
" and notable number of ſolemn maſters, and
" doctors in divinity and canon-law, they
" commenced, with great ſolemnity and due
" gravity, the proceſs of this Joan. After
" he and the inquiſitor, judges in the cauſe,
" had, for ſeveral days, examined her, they
" ordered her confeſſions and aſſertions to be
" maturely weighed by the maſters and doc" tors, and, in general, by all the faculties of " our moſt dearly beloved daughter, the uni-
" verſity of Paris, before whom the confeſſions
" and aſſertions were laid. Purſuant to their " opinion and determination, the judges
" found Joan guilty of ſuperſtition, witchcraft,
" blaſphemy againſt God and his ſaints,
" ſchiſm, and of greatly erring in the faith of
" Jeſus Chriſt; and, in order to reſtore her
" to the union and communion of our holy
" mother, the church, to cleanſe her from her
" horrible and deſtructive crimes and wicked-
" neſs, and to preſerve her ſoul from eternal
" damnation, ſhe was, often and long, very
" charitably and calmly admoniſhed, to reject
" and renounce all her errors; and humbly
" return to the way and paths of truth, or
" otherwiſe ſhe would greatly endanger both
" ſoul and body.

" But the moſt pernicious and ſchiſmatical
" ſpirit of pride and outrageous preſumption,
" which is always endeavouring to deſtroy
" the union and ſafety of Chriſtians, ſo ſtrong-
" ly poſſeſſed the ſaid Joan, that, notwith-
" ſtanding all the holy doctrine or counſel, or " other mild exhortations, adminiſtered to her,
" her hardened and obſtinate heart would not
" be humbled or mollified. She ſtill boaſted,
" that all ſhe had done was performed, by
" the command of God and the holy Virgin,
" who had viſibly appeared to her. And what " is worſe, ſhe would acknowledge no judge
" on earth, except God alone, and the ſaints
" in paradiſe; rejecting the judgment of our " holy father, the pope, and of a general
" council, and the univerſal church militant.
" Upon which, her eccleſiaſtical judges, ſee-
" ing her perſevere ſo long, and ſo obſtinately,
" in her reſolution and purpoſe, ordered her
" to be conducted to the church, before the " clergy and people, there aſſembled in great
" multitudes; in the preſence of whom her
" wicked purpoſes were diſplayed, expoſed, and
" declared, ſolemnly and publickly, by a no-
" table doctor in divinity; to the exaltation
" of our faith, the extirpation of errors, and
" the edification and amendment of chriſtian
" people. After that, ſhe was charitably ad-
" moniſhed to return to the union of the holy
" church, and reform her faults and errors,
" wherein ſhe was hardened; and, therefore,
" the judges proceeded to denounce upon
" her the uſual and cuſtomary ſentence, in
" ſuch caſes: But, before the ſentence was " fully declared, ſhe, in appearance, began to " relent, crying out, ſhe would return to the " holy church. This was readily and gladly
" heard by the judges and clergy, who kind-
" ly received her, hoping, by that means, her
" ſoul and body would be ſaved from perdi-
" tion and torment. Then ſhe ſubmitted to
" the ordinance of the holy church, abjured,
" with her own mouth, her errors and abo-
" minable crimes, and made a publick recan-
" tation, ſigning the inſtrument, with her
" own hand: And, thus, our compaſſionate
" mother, the holy church, rejoicing over this
" penitent ſinner, glad to find and reſtore
" this ſtrayed and loſt ſheep, to the reſt of the " fold, condemned her to do penance, in pri-
" ſon. But ſhe was ſcarce there, before the " fire of her pride, which ſeemed to be ex-
" tinguiſhed, rekindled into peſtiferous flames,
" by the ſuggeſtions of the enemy: And,
" preſently, the unfortunate Joan relapſed into " her former errors and follies, lately abjured
" and recanted.

" Wherefore, according to the decrees and " orders of the holy church, ſhe was again
" publickly preached, that ſhe might not,
" hereafter, infect the reſt of the members of " Chriſt: And, as ſhe relapſed into her " former deteſtable crimes and faults, ſhe was " delivered over to the ſecular arm, and con" demned to be burnt. Perceiving her end
" to approach, ſhe plainly owned and confeſ-
" ſed, that the ſpirits which, ſhe ſaid, ap" peared to her, ſeveral times, were evil and
" lying ſpirits; and that their frequent pro-
" miſes, to free her, were falſe. Thus, ſhe

Before

Before we proceed to her trial, it will not be improper to ſee a letter, ſaid to be ſent by her, to the king of England and his generals, before the ſiege of Orleans was raiſed; which you have, as follows, in the words of John de Serres, a French hiſtorian.

King of ENGLAND,

"Do juſtice to the King of heaven, in his "royal blood. Reſtore to the Virgin the "keys of all the good cities you have forced. "She is come from God, to demand the "blood royal, and is ready to make peace, if "you are willing to do juſtice, and reſtore what "you have taken away. King of England, "if you will not do, thus, I am chief of the "war. In what place ſoever I find your men, "in France, I will make them depart, whe-"ther they will, or no. If they will ſubmit, "I will take them to mercy. The Virgin "comes from the King of heaven, to drive "you out of France. If you will not obey, "ſhe will make ſuch a havock, as has not "been known in France, this 1000 years. "And be aſſured, the King of heaven will "ſend to her, and her good men at arms, "greater ſtrength than you can have. Go, "in God's name, into your own country. "Perſiſt not obſtinately in your opinion; for "you ſhall not hold France of the King of "heaven, ſon of the holy Mary. But king "Charles, the right heir, ſhall poſſeſs it, to "whom God has given it, and he ſhall enter "Paris, with a noble train. You, William "Poullet, earl of Suffolk, John, lord Talbot, "Thomas, lord Scales, lieutenants of the "duke of Bethford, and you, duke of Beth-"ford, ſtiling yourſelf regent of France, ſpare "innocent blood. Leave Orleans at liberty. "If you do not juſtice to thoſe you have in-"jured, the French will perform the nobleſt "exploit that ever was done, in Chriſten-"dom. Hear this advice from God and the "Virgin."

This letter written, in a prophetick ſtile, by a girl who pretended to be ſent from God, and ſeems ſo certain of the future, ought to contain nothing, but what was afterwards exactly verified; and yet there are predictions in it, which were never accompliſhed. For inſtance, it is not true, that ſhe expelled a ſingle Engliſhman out of France. She farther affirms, that ſhe will make ſo great a havock, as had not been known, this 1000 years, in France; which words can only relate to the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, and the battle of Patay: But the firſt of theſe actions has nothing, in itſelf, extraordinary; for that a garriſon ſhould make a ſalley, and drive the beſiegers from their poſts, is a thing too common to be accounted a miracle. As to the battle of Patay, if Joan had commanded the French army, which ſhe did not, can it, with any juſtice or propriety, be ſaid, that action deſerved to be expreſſed, in her terms? The Engliſh had only 6000 men, and loſt 2500; but this defeat hardly bears any proportion to thoſe of the French, at Crecy, Poictiers, and Azincourt; the firſt of which was but a 100, and the laſt only 13 or 14 years, before Joan's time.

It is farther remarkable, that, in her letter, ſhe ſpeaks, as if ſhe was actually at the head of the armies of France, ſince ſhe ſummoned the king of England, to return her the keys of all the towns, in his poſſeſſion; and yet the letter muſt have been written, whilſt ſhe was only upon the march, with the convoy intended for Orleans; which, inſtead of commanding, ſhe obtained, ſays Monſtrelet, as a ſort of favour, leave to attend. I paſs over her ſpeaking to the king of England, as if then an adult perſon, tho' he was but nine years old, exhorting him not to perſiſt in his opinion; nor of her admoniſhing him to depart out of France, tho' he was then, in England. Theſe things may be overlooked, as being in a prophetick ſtile, and conſidered, as ſo many figures of ſpeech; but ſhe ſhould, at leaſt, have known the names of thoſe ſhe addreſſed, and not have called the earl of Suffolk, Poullet, when his name was de la Pole. To miſtake the names of foreigners may be eaſily excuſed, in common perſons; but I cannot conceive, how it is pardonable, in one that pretended to ſpeak, in the name, and by the authority of God. Theſe and ſeveral other reaſons, which it would be too tedious to recite, induce me to believe, that this letter was compoſed, after the event, by ſome perſon, that knew the Maid had really written to the king of England, or the duke of Bedford, as will appear from the ſequel.

Let us proceed now to the proceſs of Joan of Arc, as we find it, in Paſquier; I ſay to the proceſs, and not to the ſentiment of that author, who lived too long after her, for his teſtimony to be of any great weight; for it is ſufficient to ſay, with reſpect to him, that he every-where ſpeaks of her, with large encomiums, and believed ſhe was really inſpired, and ſent from God, to ſave France. Her examinations and anſwers, which I ſhall abridge, as much as poſſible, without obſcuring the ſenſe, are, as follows.

In the firſt place, being charged to ſpeak the truth, ſhe anſwered, ſhe would relate what concerned her father and mother, but not diſcloſe the revelations ſhe had told king Charles, tho', in eight days, ſhe ſhould know, whether ſhe might, or no.

To the ſecond queſtion, about her name and family, ſhe replied, ſhe was of the village of Dompre, and was called, in her own country, Joan Jeanette, but, in France, Joan of Arc; that her father's name was James of Arc, and her mother's Iſabella, &c.

That ſhe was then about 29 years of age.

That ſhe was, by trade, a ſeamſtreſs and ſpinſter, and not a ſhepherdeſs.

That ſhe went, every year, to confeſſion.

That ſhe often heard a voice from heaven, and, in the place where ſhe heard it, likewiſe ſaw a light, which ſhe took for an angel; that the voice had frequently warned her to go into France, and raiſe the ſiege of Orleans; and that ſhe ſhould go to Robert de Baudricourt,

court, captain of Vaucouleurs, who would give her a guard, to conduct her, which ſhe did, accordingly.

She added, ſhe knew God loved the duke of Orleans; and ſhe had received more revelations, concerning him, than any perſon living, except the king.

She alſo confeſſed, that ſhe engaged in a skirmiſh, before Paris, on a holy-day; and being asked, whether that was right, ſhe anſwered, Proceed.

Being asked, when ſhe heard the voice laſt, ſhe replied, yeſterday, three times, in the morning, at the time of Veſpers, and when the Ave Maria bell rung, in the evening.

Being examined, whether ſhe had ever ſeen any fairies, ſhe anſwered, no; but that one of her god-mothers pretended to have ſeen ſome, at the fairy-tree, near the village of Dompre.

Being asked, who they were that ſpoke to her, ſhe replied, St. Catharine, and St. Margaret; and that ſhe had often ſeen and touched them, ſince her confinement, and kiſſed the ground, on which they trod; moreover, that ſhe conſulted them, about her anſwers.

She farther affirmed, that ſhe had put on men's clothes, by the expreſs command of God, and was wounded in the neck, before Orleans.

Item. That, within ſeven years, the Engliſh ſhould leave a greater pledge, than that, before Orleans, and loſe all their poſſeſſions, in France.

That they ſhould ſuſtain, in France, a much greater loſs, than they had, hitherto, done, by means of a ſignal victory, which the French ſhould gain over them.

Being asked, whether ſhe bore any coat of arms, ſhe anſwered, No, but only her ſtandard; but that, indeed, the king had given her brothers a coat of arms; viz. in a field Azure, two Flower-de-luces, Or, and a crown in the middle.

She added, that her father dreamt ſhe would go with the ſoldiers, and, on that account, kept her ſhort, and ſaid, he had rather ſee her drowned.

Then ſhe was charged with throwing herſelf headlong from the tower, in order to kill herſelf, whilſt ſhe was priſoner, at Beaurevoir. She confeſſed the fact, but ſaid, that her intent was not to kill herſelf, but to make her eſcape.

During her proceſs, ſhe deſired leave to hear maſs, and communicate, at Eaſter; which was granted her, provided ſhe would put on women's clothes; but ſhe choſe rather not to communicate, than do it, on that condition.

She was charged with ſuffering herſelf to be worſhipped; but ſhe replied, that, if ſome had kiſſed her hand, or clothes, it was without her conſent.

After theſe anſwers, come ſeveral others, which give occaſion to believe, that they were made to as many interrogations, ſuppreſſed by Paſquier; which are, as follow:

That ſhe had talked with St. Catharine and St. Margaret, at the fairy-tree, and not with the fairies, as ſhe had been accuſed; that ſhe began, at 13 years of age, to converſe with theſe ſaints.

That, being 20 years old, ſhe hired herſelf, at Neufchatel, in Lorrain, to a woman that kept an inn, called La Rouſſe; where ſhe led the beaſts to graſs, and watered the horſes, and ſo learned to ride.

That, whilſt ſhe was there, ſhe had a lawſuit, concerning a marriage, before the official of Thoul, and carried her cauſe.

That, having ſerved, five years, ſhe returned to her father, and, againſt his will, went to Baudricourt, who made no account of her, for the two firſt months; but, in the third, he gave her a guard of 20 knights, an eſquire, and four ſervants, to conduct her to the king, at Chinon.

The judges preſſingly requeſting her to put on women's apparel: She anſwered, ſhe deſired to have none of her ſex's clothes, but a ſhift, after her death.

Upon this, ſhe was told, ſhe ſhould be received to communion, only in women's clothes; but ſhe refuſed to comply with that condition. However, ſhe conſented, at laſt, to take a woman's habit, to hear maſs, provided ſhe ſhould be allowed to put on men's clothes again; but, that favour being refuſed her, ſhe declared, that ſhe would rather die than be dreſſed, like a woman, contrary to God's expreſs command.

She alſo ſaid, ſhe had promiſed the king, to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, and cauſe him to be crowned.

She was accuſed of being always againſt a peace; which ſhe owned, affirming, that no peace could be concluded, unleſs the Engliſh would leave France.

The proctor charging her with cauſing a ſword to be concealed, in St. Catharine's church, at Fierbois, and ſending for the ſame, after ſhe had diſcourſed with the king, ſhe denied ſhe had ever uſed any frauds; but ſhe acknowledged, that ſhe had heard three maſſes, in that church.

Being charged with ſaying, ſhe was ſent from God, to wage war, which was directly contrary to the will of God; ſhe replied, that, in the letter ſent by her to the king of England and the princes of the blood, ſhe had firſt offered them peace. Paſquier tells us, that the letter is copied in the trial; but, as he has not tranſcribed it himſelf, we cannot be ſure it is the ſame inſerted by de Serres, in his Hiſtory.

To the charge of putting to death Franquet d'Arras, her priſoner, ſhe anſwered, that he was a notorious robber, and condemned to die by the bailiff of Senlis.

As to the accuſation of her having, ſeveral times, communicated, in men's clothes, and kneeled to the voice which ſpoke to her, ſhe confeſſed the whole.

The proctor likewiſe accuſed her of having ſeduced many people, to ſuch a degree, that they reverenced her, as a ſaint, cauſed prayers to be ſaid, in the church, to her honour, maintained that, except the holy Virgin, ſhe was the greateſt of ſaints, and wore about them her image, in lead, or other metal. To this charge ſhe anſwered, that God ſhould be judge.

Being charged with uſurping dominion over men, by making herſelf chief of the war, ſhe replied, that ſhe had done it, to vanquiſh the Engliſh; adding, that her ſtandard was of linnen or fuſtian, bordered with velvet, with a field ſeeme of fleur-de-lis, and in the middle, the image of God holding the world, ſupported by two angels in white, and underneath, Jeſus Maria.

Upon this, her judges upbraided her, for aſcribing to God ſuch vanities, contrary to the reverence due to himſelf, and asked her, whether ſhe put her confidence in her ſtandard; to which ſhe anſwered, ſhe placed her confidence only in him whoſe image it bore.

She was afterwards asked, why ſhe alone held her ſtandard, at the coronation of king Charles. She replied, it was but juſt, that he, who had been in trouble, ſhould be alſo in glory.

She was farther told, that, being wounded before Paris, ſhe cauſed her armour to be hung up, in the church of St. Denis, out of oſtentation: She anſwered, ſhe did it, from a motive of piety, according to the cuſtom of thoſe that were wounded, in war.

Laſtly, ſhe was asked, if ſhe would ſubmit to the judgment of the church militant. She replied, ſhe would, provided the church did not enjoin her what was impracticable; that ſhe could not, in any wiſe, revoke what ſhe had ſaid, about her viſions and revelations; and that, if the church affirmed they were illuſions, ſhe would not refer it to the judgment of men, but to God alone.

The examination being ended, the judges drew up the following ſummary of her confeſſions.

I. That, being 13 years old, ſhe ſaw St. Michael, St. Catharine, St. Margaret, and a great company of angels.

II. That theſe ſaints adviſed her to go to king Charles, and to wear men's clothes.

III. That ſhe choſe rather not to hear maſs, and communicate, than to put on women's apparel.

IV. That ſhe refuſed to ſubmit to the judgment of the church militant.

V. That ſhe pretended to foretel future contingencies.

VI. That ſhe knew ſaints, by their voices, whom ſhe had never ſeen, or heard, before.

VII. That ſhe was expreſly commanded by God, to wear men's clothes.

VIII. That ſhe caſt herſelf headlong from a tower, chuſing rather to die, than remain in the power of her enemies.

IX. That ſhe not only ſaw and heard, but alſo touched bodily St. Catharine and St. Margaret, and kiſſed the ground on which they trod.

The proctor having taken his concluſions, upon theſe articles, the judges ſaid, that what Joan of Arc had done was all an impoſture, and the invention of the devil, to delude the poor people: That ſhe was guilty of diſobedience to her parents, and of idolatry, to the diſhonour of the church; particularly in chuſing rather to deprive herſelf of the body of our Lord, than lay aſide men's clothes. At this ſentence were preſent the biſhops of Coutance and Liſieux, the chapter of the cathedral of Roan, 16 doctors, ſix licentiates, or batchellors in divinity, and 11 advocates of Roan.

This ſentence, being ſent to the univerſity of Paris, was confirmed by the faculties of divinity and the decrees, and Joan pronounced a heretick and ſchiſmatick; and then the univerſity wrote to the king and the biſhop of Bayeux, to deſire that ſhe might be put to death. Paſquier does not inform us, to what puniſhment ſhe was condemned, by this firſt ſentence; all that can be ſaid is, ſhe was, at leaſt, excommunicated. However that be, Joan, being carried into the church, and placed on a ſcaffold, was publickly preached, as it was termed, in thoſe days; and, being greatly terrified by all theſe preparations, ſhe cried out aloud, ſhe would ſubmit to the judgment of God and the pope. But, finding what ſhe ſaid was inſufficient to revoke her ſentence, or prevent the publication, ſhe declared, ſhe would ſtand to the church's determination: That, ſince ſo many wiſe and learned men affirmed, that her viſions did not come from God, ſhe was willing to believe ſo too, which ſhe repeated, ſeveral times; and then ſhe made a publick abjuration, inſerted in the trial; but Paſquier judged it improper to relate the contents.

Upon this abjuration, another ſentence intervened, abſolving her from the bond of excommunication, and condemning her to perpetual impriſonment, by way of penance; after which, ſhe put on women's apparel; but, as ſhe had, all along, been very obſtinate, as to men's clothes, which ſhe wore, as ſhe pretended, by God's expreſs command, it was thought expedient to try, whether her abjuration was ſincere, by leaving a man's habit with her, in priſon. This expedient, to her misfortune, proved but too ſucceſsful; ſince ſhe was no ſooner alone, than ſhe reſumed that habit. On the morrow, being found in that dreſs. She was asked the reaſon ſhe replied, ſhe had put on her former habit, by the expreſs order of St. Catharine and St. Margaret, and choſe rather to obey God than man. Upon this, an information being entered againſt her, in the eccleſiaſtical court, ſhe was declared an heretick relapſe, and delivered over to the ſecular arm. Paſquier is altogether ſilent, as to her confeſſion, according to the king of England's letter, that ſhe was ſeduced by lying ſpirits, who had promiſed to releaſe her; and, indeed, this confeſſion is directly contrary to the inferenes Paſquier would draw from the records of the trial, viz. that Joan was inſpired by God. He only ſays, ſhe was ſentenced to be burnt, May the 31ſt, 1431; but, as all the reſt of the facts, contained in the king's letter, exactly agree with the the records of the proceſs, I cannot ſee, why Paſquier's ſilence ſhould cauſe this to be ſuſpected.

One might make numberleſs reflections, upon the examination, anſwers, and behaviour of the Maid; but, not to tire the reader's patience, I ſhall content my ſelf with the following remarks.

1. It is evident, that Paſquier's view, in his account of this trial, was, to prove Joan's inſpiration; and, therefore, being prejudiced, he did not ſcruple to curtail, in ſeveral places, the queſtions and anſwers. This is manifeſt, in that ſeveral of the anſwers have no connexion with the queſtions, nor with one another; for example, what ſhe ſays, in her anſwer to the ſecond queſtion, about the duke of Orleans, neceſſarily ſuppoſes ſome other queſtion, which Paſquier was pleaſed to omit.

2. It appears, that he has paſſed over in ſilence ſome of the anſwers; for inſtance, it is ſaid, in the ſummary of Joan's confeſſion, that ſhe had boaſted of ſeeing St. Michael, and yet it is not mentioned in the examination.

3. Paſquier would not tranſcribe Joan's letter to the king of England, nor her abjuration; tho' they are papers of no leſs importance than all he has produced; and he was much more unwilling to mention her confeſſion, before her death, that ſhe was ſeduced or deceived. From theſe omiſſions it may be preſumed, that Paſquier ſought, in Joan's trial, not ſo much what might be ſerviceable to diſcover the truth, as what he judged conducive to prove his opinion; and, indeed, he multiplies words, to draw from Joan's anſwers conſequences favourable to his ſentiments, and to ſhew, that her predictions were accompliſhed, and all her aſſertions true; but he labours chiefly to prove, by very weak arguments, that the duke of Orleans was, as the Maid affirmed, greatly beloved of God. Among other reaſons he alledges, that God had bleſſed that prince with two illuſtrious ſons; the one legitimate, afterwards king of France, by the name of Lewis XII, and the other natural, viz. the renowned general, known firſt by the name of the baſtard of Orleans, and afterwards by that of earl of Dunois and Longueville; but it is notorious, that the latter was natural brother, and not ſon to the duke of Orleans, mentioned by Joan. It is ſurpriſing, that a man, ſo verſed, as Paſquier, in the Hiſtory of France, ſhould be guilty of ſo groſs a miſtake.

Having related ſuch facts, concerning the Maid, as are undeniable, ſince they are ſupported by inconteſtable teſtimonies, nothing more remains, but to examine the three opinions, upon this affair, in order to embrace the moſt probable.

Moſt of the French writers maintain, that Joan was really inſpired, and ſent by God; and they found their opinion upon theſe four principal reaſons. The firſt is the poſſibility of Gods working ſuch miracles; but, admitting this point, they cannot draw any inference from the poſſibility, for the truth of the fact.

The ſecond is Joan's own evidence, grounded upon her viſions of ſaints and angels; but this is the very thing in diſpute, and conſequently cannot be urged, as a proof.

The third reaſon is taken from her knowing king Charles, in diſguiſe, among his courtiers. This does not deſerve an anſwer; for, ſuppoſing, as a great many believe, that Joan was perſuaded to act this part, it is eaſy to conceive, that ſhe might be very well inſtructed to know the king, tho' ſhe had never ſeen him before.

The fourth is drawn from the accompliſhment of her predictions, of the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans and the king's coronation, at a time when theſe events were extremely improbable. This reaſon, added to her ſurpriſing valour, on all occaſions, is, doubtleſs, the ſtrongeſt that can be alledged, for this opinion; yet the objections, to which this argument is liable, very much weaken, if not wholly deſtroy it.

Firſt, it may be objected, it is only ſhe herſelf, who ſaid, in her examination, and after the event, that ſhe had foretold to the king the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, and his coronation. We have obſerved, that Monſtrelet only makes her ſay to the king, in general terms, "That ſhe would exalt his "dominion, and drive his enemies out of "the kingdom;" which, however, ſhe did not perform, ſince the Engliſh were not expelled out of France, till above 20 years after her death.

Moreover, Joan ſays, in her examination, that theſe two things were revealed to her by St. Catharine and St. Margaret. I do not propoſe to conſider, here, all the objections that may be made to this circumſtance. I am willing to ſuppoſe, that God reveals ſometimes to the glorified ſaints, what is to happen, upon earth; that he commands them to aſſume a human ſhape, to inform certain perſons of future events; and that Catharine and Margaret were of the number of thoſe glorified ſaints, tho' it cannot be affirmed, with certainty: But it muſt be owned, at leaſt, that God very rarely makes uſe of ſuch means; and, when he does, it is always for his own glory, or the good of his church, or in behalf of ſome perſons, very eminent for their holineſs. Now, in the war, then waging, in France, neither the glory of God, nor the honour of religion, nor the good of the church were directly concerned; and Charles VII, in whoſe favour, it is ſuppoſed, God did ſo great things, was far from being famous, for holineſs of life. The diſpute, between the two kings, was purely about temporal concerns; for they both profeſſed the ſame religion, and could not charge each other, either with ſchiſm, or hereſy; ſo that it does not appear, how it could be for the glory of God, or the advantage of religion or the church, that the kingdom of France ſhould be governed by a prince of the houſe of Valois, rather than by a king of England, deſcended, by a daughter, from the blood royal of France. A man may affirm, as confidently, as he pleaſes, that that the uſurpation of the Engliſh was ſo heinous and manifeſt, that God's honour was concerned, to make them an example of his juſtice; for this is ſuppoſing the thing in diſpute. We need only review what has been ſaid, upon this point, in the reign of Edward III, to be ſatisfied, that this ſuppoſition, inſtead of being ſo manifeſt, as is pretended, is liable to great difficulties; but, tho' it is undeniable, that the Engliſh were real uſurpers; can it be affirmed, that God's honour is concerned, to puniſh, in an exemplary and ſupernatural manner, the heinous injuſtices committed in the world? How many uſurpations of provinces and kingdoms occur, in hiſtory, without the intervention of a miracle, to puniſh the uſurpers? In fine, neither Charles VII, nor his ſucceſſors, appear to have done religion any ſervice, ro render it probable, that God had it in view, in what he did, by Joan's means; and the French, in thoſe days, were no better chriſtians, nor honeſter men, than the Engliſh. As for the perſon of king Charles VII, for whoſe ſake, it is pretended, God miraculouſly raiſed up the Maid, it was univerſally known, that he was very immoral; and, to ſay nothing of the duke of Burgundy's murder, committed by his order, and in his preſence, contrary to the faith of a treaty ratified with an oath, is it not certain, that, at the very time Joan came to him, at Chinon, he lived in open adultery with Agnes Sorrel, before the eyes of his whole court? Are theſe princes of this character, whom God uſually honours with particular favours? If to all theſe reaſons we add Joan's confeſſion, before her death, that ſhe was deceived, it will convincingly appear, that ſhe was not really inſpired; but I inſiſt not on this confeſſion, becauſe it is a diſputable point, being ſupported only by the teſtimony of her adverſaries.

I come now to the opinion of the Engliſh, who obſtinately maintain, that Joan of Arc was a witch, and acted purely by the inſtigations of the devil. I ſhall only briefly obſerve, that this opinion is liable to the very ſame objections, as the former; ſince it is no leſs difficult to conceive, why, on this occaſion, God ſhould have given ſuch power to the devil; ſo that whatever has been ſaid, concerning her inſpiration, may be applied to her witchcraft, and retorted upon the Engliſh.

But there is a third opinion, which is not liable to ſo many difficulties. If it is ſuppoſed, that, in king Charles's extremity, himſelf, his queen, Agnes Sorrel, or one of his miniſters, invented this contrivance; nothing is more eaſy than to reconcile the events with ſuch a ſuppoſition. The buſineſs was to revive the courage of the French, diſheartened by ſo many loſſes; and, perhaps, of the king himſelf, who had thoughts of retiring into Dauphine. Is it any wonder, that ſuch an artifice ſhould be uſed, with that view. This is, at leaſt, as poſſible, as the apparitions of of ſaints, or as witchcraft. A country girl of good ſenſe, as there are many ſuch, of an undaunted reſolution, and, who knew how to ride, may have been choſen; and taken from out of the kingdom, that ſhe might be the leſs known, and impertinent neighbours not obſtruct, by diſcovering her, the execution of the project. This being ſuppoſed, it will be eaſy to account for moſt of the things, which ſeem extraordinary, in the Maid; and all the king ſays of her, and the ſecrets ſhe diſcloſes, will be only a conſequence of the fraud; for thoſe, that are in the plot, will not fail to extol her, and the reſt will be carried away by their authority.

However, it muſt be confeſſed, that ſtrong objections, may be made to this third opinion, which it will be proper to anſwer.

The firſt is, that it is only a conjecture. I own it; but it is a very natural conjecture, in a thing where it is ſo difficult to diſcover the truth. The French affirm, that ſhe was inſpired by God; but this notion is demonſtrated to be full of difficulties, and highly improbable. The Engliſh maintain, that ſhe was a witch, and acted by the inſtigation of the devil; which opinion is no leſs incredible; and yet it is however certain, that ſhe performed ſurpriſing actions. What remains, then, in order to explain the cauſe of the revolution, in France, but to have recourſe to natural means, ſince the ſupernatural are ſo doubtful, to ſay no worſe? In my judgment, this is a caſe, wherein, if ever, conjecture is to be regarded.

The ſecond objection is drawn from Joan's uncommon valour, which is repreſented, as ſupernatural; to which it may be replied, that much more was certainly aſcribed to her than ſhe deſerved, as appears from the teſtimony of Monſtrelet, a contemporary writer; and a man muſt be very ignorant of the way of the world, not to know, how apt we are, on ſuch occaſions, to run into exceſſes, and how capable ſuch a ſubject is of embelliſhment. It cannot be juſtly inferred from what Monſtrelet ſays, that Joan ever commanded in chief; for, if he ſeems to ſay it, in one place, he unſays it, in another, as may be ſeen, in the paſſages I have cited. Indeed, the generals carried her with them, and placed her, at their head, to confirm the ſoldiers prepoſſeſſion; but ſhe had occaſion for no more reſolution, than to keep always near them, and ſuch a reſolution cannot be accounted miraculous; and, if the glory of all the happy ſucceſſes was aſcribed to her, where is the wonder, ſince it was for the advantage of the king and all his adherents.

The third objection is the ſtrongeſt, founded upon the accompliſhment of Joan's predictions. She told the king, that ſhe would cauſe the ſiege of Orleans to be raiſed, and himſelf to be crowned; which fell out, accordingly. On ſuppoſition, therefore, that the whole was a contrivance, it muſt be alſo ſuppoſed, that ſhe had the gift of prophecy.

To this objection, it may be anſwered, in the firſt place, that the confidence, with which the French hiſtorians have advanced, that theſe predictions were, before the event, is what gives it the moſt ſtrength; but it muſt be obſerved, ſerved, that, of the two articles, viz. the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, and the king's coronation, at Rheims, the firſt only is atteſted by Joan herſelf, in her examination, without the leaſt mention of the coronation; beſides, this very atteſtation comes after the event; nor can it be well proved, that, when ſhe waited on the king, ſhe gave him any aſſurance of raiſing the ſiege of Orleans. Charles does not ſeem to have relied on her promiſes, when he undertook to ſend a convoy to Orleans; for Monſtrelet only ſays, that he reſolved to ſend a convoy to that city, and that Joan deſired to accompany it, which was granted her; and, doubtleſs, if that deſign had been formed, ſolely upon her promiſes, ſhe would have had no occaſion to deſire to be preſent, at the execution, ſince, in that caſe, ſhe would have been the principal actreſs.

But, ſecondly, tho' Joan had foretold what is aſcribed to her, I do not know, whether even that will be a convincing proof; for, upon ſuppoſition that ſhe was perſuaded to act this part, and had previous inſtructions about it, nothing was more natural than to make her tell the king, that ſhe was commiſſioned to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans. This ſiege was then the cauſe of uneaſineſs to the king and the whole court; for they were entirely at a loſs, how to ſave that important place; and, conſequently, to give hopes of raiſing the ſiege was requiſite, in order to create a belief of Joan's coming from God. In this, nothing was hazarded but the reputation of a country girl, which would not have been regarded, had the affair proved unſucceſsful; and, as to the king's coronation, the hopes of that was alſo neceſſary to be inſtilled, ſince the raiſing the ſiege was only a means to attain the principal end, namely, to eſtabliſh the king on the throne of his anceſtors.

In the third place, another very perplexing objection may be made to Joan's predictions. If ſhe was inſpired by God, to foretel future events, how came ſhe to be miſtaken? She ſaid, ſhe would drive the Engliſh out of the kingdom; and yet they were not expelled, till above 20 years after her death. She foretold, that they would be expelled by a great victory, gained over them by the French. Does not this raiſe the idea of a bloody battle, and an extraordinary victory? But where is ſuch a one to be found, after Joan's deceaſe? There is only that of Fourmigni, which fell out, 20 years after, and was, as I obſerved, very inconſiderable. She alſo foretold, in her examination, that, within ſeven years, the Engliſh ſhould leave a greater pledge than that before Orleans. I do not underſtand this expreſſion, unleſs it means the loſs of ſome battle; but there was no battle, within that term. Let us, however, give the words the moſt favourable ſenſe we can, and apply them, if you pleaſe, to the loſs of Paris; yet this event happened, five years after the prediction. Is it uſual for the Holy Ghoſt to mark, thus, the ſpace of ſeven years, inſtead of five? Was it more difficult for him to foreſee, that this event would happen in five, than in ſeven, years?

Thus, all things conſidered, let the difficulties of the third opinion be compared with thoſe ariſing from the apparitions of ſaints and witchcraft; and I imagine, they will be found to be leſs in this, than in the two other opinions.

Moreover, the inſpiration of the Maid was not ſo generally owned, even by the French, but that ſeveral called it in queſtion. The conſtable Richemont being on his march, to join the king, before Baugenci, the king, prepoſſeſſed that he was coming, with ſome evil deſign, at firſt, reſolved to go and fight him; but, altering his mind, he ſent Joan, to meet and receive him. She no ſooner ſaw him, than ſhe alighted, and embraced his knee; upon which the conſtable ſaid theſe words to her, that evidently ſhew his ſentiments, concerning her: "Joan, I am told, that you intend to "fight me. I neither know, who you are, "nor from whom you are ſent, whether from "God, or the devil. If you come from God, "I have no reaſon to fear you; for he knows "my intention, as well as yours. If you are "from the devil, I have leſs reaſon to fear; "and, therefore, do your beſt, or your worſt."

The lord of Langey, in his treatiſe of Military Inſtitution, affirms, that Joan's inſpiration was like Numa's pretended converſations with the nymph Egeria.

Others have aſſerted, that ſhe was perſuaded to act this part by the lords of the court; and Du Haillan was of this opinion, who even relates ſeveral circumſtances, and then adds, "Some have been offended at my ſaying this, "and putting the French out of conceipt with "ſo holy and miraculous a thing, by attempting now to turn it into fable; but I was willing to ſay it, becauſe time, which diſcovers "all things, has diſcovered this to be an impoſture; beſides, it is not an affair of ſuch "moment, as to be received for an article of "faith."

Pope Pius II, under the name of Gobelin, his ſecretary, having related the ſtory of Joan and her exploits, adds, "It is extremely difficult to affirm, whether this was the work "of God, or the invention of man. Some "think, that the great men, at court, contending for the command, one more wiſe "than the reſt invented this contrivance, and "perſuaded Joan to ſay, that ſhe was ſent "from God, that none might ſcruple to ſerve "under her."

In fine, ſome French writers have defamed Joan of Arc, and ſaid, that ſhe was corrupted by Baudricourt; or, according to others, by the baſtard of Orleans, or by Xaintrailles; and that theſe three lords, with the duke of Alenſon, contrived the whole plot. Polydore Virgil affirms, that Joan, finding ſhe was condemned, pretended to be with child; and that, on this account, her execution was delayed, for ſome months. In a word, among all the hiſtorians, both antient and modern, who have ſpoken of the Maid, there are no two to be found, that agree in the facts, concerning her.

But, ſuppoſing Joan's inſpiration to be a human invention, it is not eaſy to determine, whether the king was in the ſecret, or was impoſed upon himſelf; perhaps, Joan herſelf was deceived, by certain means but too often practiſed. For my part, I think this opinion very plauſible, conſidering the firmneſs with which ſhe anſwered her judges, when ſhe muſt have perceived her great danger; but, after all, this is only conjecture.

I conclude this inquiry, that Joan's pretended inſpiration may juſtly be thought a contrivance, to revive the courage of the terrified French. Indeed, the project ſucceeded, doubtleſs, beyond the expectation of the authors; but it is not very ſtrange, that the courage of the French troops ſhould be revived, when they believed they fought under the particular direction of Heaven. This is not the firſt time that ſuch inventions have produced the like effects; for we meet with inſtances, in the hiſtories of the Heathen nations. Queſtionleſs, the feigned apparitions of the Pagan gods and goddeſſes were not the immediate works of the power of God; and yet, upon ſome occaſions, they produced ſurpriſing effects.

Before I conclude this ſubject, I cannot help reflecting on the barbarity exerciſed upon Joan; for it is impoſſible to give any colour to this injuſtice. As Joan was not a native of France, Henry could not pretend, that ſhe was his ſubject, and conſequently could treat her only, as a priſoner of war; and, upon this ſuppoſition, he could much leſs puniſh her, for a ſchiſmatick, heretick, or witch, even tho' ſhe had been convicted; and, if the rule, which the Engliſh would then have eſtabliſhed, was once received, every priſoner of war would be in danger of being condemned by his enemies, for forged crimes, and ſacrificed to their malice. Charles VII. cauſed the ſentence to be reverſed by other judges, and Joan's honour to be retrieved, which by ſeveral is alledged, as a proof of her innocence; but this is a weak argument, becauſe, without ſtrong prejudice, the laſt ſentence can be no more depended upon than the firſt. This was paſſed by her enemies, whoſe intereſt it was to defame her; and the other by her friends, who found their glory and advantage, in proving her innocent.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XIII.

The Reigns of the three Kings of the Houſe of York, EDWARD IV, EDWARD V, and RICHARD III: Containing the ſpace of 24 years and a half.

16. EDWARD IV.

1461. Edward goes to fight the queen. Hall.

EDWARD was proclaimed, the 5th of March, and, on the 12th or 13th, he was obliged to appear at the head of his army. Before his departure from London, a tradeſman was executed, for ſaying that he would make his ſon heir of the crown; probably, he added ſome virulent reflections upon the new king, and expreſſed too much zeal for the houſe of Lancaſter. However that be, ſome have conſidered this man's execution, in the beginning of the preſent reign, as a preſage of the blood which was yet to be ſhed, in the quarrel of the two contending houſes.

The queen's army is much increaſed.

Queen Margaret had acted wiſely, in not venturing to fight, at the gates of London, and in retiring among the northern people, who had, hitherto, diſcovered a firm attachment to the houſe of Lancaſter; and they even gave her, upon this occaſion, a convincing proof of their affection, by reinforcing her army, with recruits, nay, whole bodies of freſh troops; which was done, with ſuch expedition, that, in a few days, the queen, being at the head of 60,000 men, was in a condition to expect her enemy, or even to march againſt him.

Edward reſolves to fight the queen.

Tho' Edward had been proclaimed, at London, he very well knew, that ceremony made no great addition to his right, conſidering how irregularly it was performed; for the lords of his party, and the people of London, were not inveſted with power to give the kingdom a ſovereign; and, therefore, he could not depend upon that extraordinary election, unleſs it was ſupported by compulſive methods. Henry VI. had reigned, 38 years, and was owned, for lawful king, by all the Engliſh; and yet this right, tho' it ſeemed ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, had not been able to maintain itſelf, againſt a ſuperior ſtrength; wherefore, it was eaſy to perceive, that Edward's right, not having greater advantages, would ſubſiſt no longer than crowned with ſucceſs. Matters ſtanding, thus, the two parties were, once more, to try the way of arms; and happy both, if a ſingle battle could have decided this bloody quarrel! Edward, being young and lively, truſted to his valour and fortune; and he was alſo excited to hazard all, by the great men of his party, who, having ſhewn ſo little regard for Henry, ſaw no ſafety but in victory. He departed, therefore, from London, a few days after his proclamation; and, heading his army, he marched towards the north, reſolving to go in queſt of queen Margaret. 1461.

He ſecures a paſs.

He no ſooner reached Pontefract, than he detached the lord Fitz-Walter, to ſecure the paſſage of Ferri-bridge, upon the river Are, which 1461. which was neceſſarily to be paſſed, in order to join his enemies; and Fitz-Walter, ſucceeding, according to the king's deſires, poſted himſelf, on the other ſide of the river with his detachment. In the interim, Henry and his queen, who were at York, hearing that Edward was advancing, with all ſpeed, readily concluded, that it was to give them battle; which was what they themſelves eagerly wiſhed, the gaining of a victory being the only means left for their reſtoration; and they, therefore, having made the duke of Somerſet general of their army, waited, at York, for the iſſue of a battle, which was to determine their fate.

His men are beat from thence.

The duke of Somerſet, hearing that Edward had ſecured the paſſage of Ferri-bridge, to oblige him to fight, with diſadvantage, reſolved to diſlodge Fitz-Walter, in order to have the river between him and his enemies; and, accordingly, the lord Clifford was detached, to recover that poſt; but, whether Fitz-Walter was guilty of any neglect, or not timely ſupported, he could not withſtand Clifford's attack, who drove his troops over the river, with a great ſlaughter; and Fitz-Walter and the baſtard of Salisbury were ſlain, in the action.

The earl of Warwick is alarmed at it. Hall.

The earl of Warwick, whom I have frequently mentioned, towards the end of the late reign, was conſidered, as the ſoul of Edward's army; for the king was looked upon, as a valiant young prince, without experience, and the earl of Warwick, as the real general; and all eyes were fixed upon him, to ſee, by his countenance, whether there was reaſon to hope, or fear. The earl, being informed of Fitz-Walter's defeat, ſeemed to be under great conſternation, dreading that this firſt cheque would diſcourage the army; and he, immediately, poſted, to carry the news to the king, with an emotion, that evidently diſcovered, how apprehenſive he was of the conſequences; but, at the ſame time, to ſhew, that his fears were not perſonal, he ſtabbed his horſe, and, kiſſing the hilt of his ſword, made like a croſs, ſwore, that, tho' the whole army ſhould take to flight, he would alone defend Edward's cauſe.

The king's ſteadineſs. Hollingſh.

Edward, perceiving the earl's concern, judged it neceſſary to prevent the ill effects it might produce, among the troops; wherefore, inſtead of being alarmed at the news, he made proclamation, that all, who deſired it, might depart; that he would reward thoſe, that ſhould do their duty; but that no favour was to be expected for thoſe that ſhould fly, during the battle. He likewiſe detached William Nevil, lord Falconbridge, to paſs the Are, at Caſtleford, about three miles from Ferri-bridge, with orders to attack thoſe who guarded the poſt lately loſt; who executed his orders, with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, that he paſſed the river, at Caſtleford, before the enemies had the leaſt intelligence; and, then marching along the river, he met Clifford, at the head of a body of horſe, ſuddenly attacked him, and put him to rout. Clifford was ſlain, with an arrow, in the beginning of the fight; too light a puniſhment for his inhumanity to the young earl of Rutland, brother to Edward, at the battle of Wakefield. With him was alſo killed the earl of Weſtmoreland's brother; and, the poſt of Ferri-bridge being ſo fortunately recovered, Edward, who was in readineſs, paſſed his army over the river, and directly marched in queſt of his enemies. 1461.

The battle of Towton. Hollingſh.

The two armies met, on Palm-Sunday, between Saxton and Towton. Henry's army was 60,000 ſtrong, and Edward's about 40,000; the air being darkened by the ſnow, which fell very thick, was blown by the wind, in the faces of the Lancaſtrians; who began the fight, with a volley of arrows, which, being diſcharged too far off, did no great execution. Falconbridge, who commanded the van of Edward's army, diſdaining to fight, at ſuch a diſtance, ordered his men to lay aſide their bows and take to their ſwords; upon which, the armies approaching each other, a furious fight commenced, wherein both ſides appeared equally brave and reſolute, to exert their utmoſt, to gain the victory. It would be extremely difficult to deſcribe this terrible battle, at large; for moſt of thoſe, that have related it, not underſtanding the art of war, have, inſtead of repreſenting the ſeveral circumſtances, given only a confuſed idea of it; moreover, the two armies are to be conſidered, as truſting more to their courage, than the experience of their generals. It is ſufficient to obſerve, that the battle laſted, from morning to night; from whence we may paſs a judgment, how obſtinately it was fought, on both ſides. Edward ſignaliſed himſelf, by an uncommon valour, which exceedingly contributed to ſupport his troops, in their reſolution of conquering, or dying, for his ſake; and, at length, towards the evening, the Lancaſtrians began to give way, not flying, but retreating, as they fought, and making a ſtand, now and then, ſo that their enemies could not be entirely ſure of the victory. However, this advantage animating Edward's ſoldiers, they ſo preſſed their enemies, that, at laſt, they compelled them to fly; and then it was, that a horrible ſlaughter enſued; for Edward had, before the battle, made proclamation, in his army, that no quarter ſhould be given, being ſenſible that the taking of priſoners would only weaken his army. The flying troops ſteered their courſe towards Tadcaſter-bridge; but, deſpairing to reach it, being ſo cloſely purſued by their enemies, they turned aſide, in order to paſs the Cock, which runs into the Wherf; which was done, with ſuch confuſion and hurry, that the river was, immediately, filled with thoſe that were drowned, and who, in their misfortune, ſerved for a bridge to their companions. The ſlaughter is reported to have been ſo great, in this place, that the waters of the Wherf were all dyed with blood; and, indeed, it is not to be thought ſurpriſing, ſince the hiſtorians affirm, that no leſs than 36776 were killed, in the battle. Among the dead, were found the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, the lords Dacres and Wells, Sir John Nevil, and Andrew Trollop; but the 1461. the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter had the good fortune to eſcape. Thomas Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, was taken; who was, at firſt, ſpared, notwithſtanding the king's orders; but it was only to put him to a more inglorious death, on the ſcaffold.

An Italian author, who wrote the Hiſtory of theſe civil wars, remarks, on the battle of Towton, that if France, or Scotland, had then invaded England, it would, doubtleſs, have been ſubdued, in its weak condition, after ſuch a violent bleeding. Indeed, this might have been the caſe; and France, which, in much the ſame circumſtances, was almoſt entirely conquered by Henry V, gives weight to this reflection; yet the battles, fought, before the deciſion of the quarrel, between the two houſes demonſtrate, that there remained ſtill much Engliſh blood to be ſhed, before it was poſſible to give England a mortal wound.

Edward takes down his father's head from the walls of York.

After this ſignal victory, Edward marched, directly, to York; perhaps, in expectation of finding Henry and Margaret; but diſpairing of ſafety, at York, after the battle, they retired to Berwick, and from thence fled for refuge to Edinburgh. Edward, upon his arrival at York, ordered the heads of the duke, his father, and the earl of Salisbury to be taken down, and thoſe of the earl of Devonſhire and ſome others, beheaded, at Pontefract, to be ſet up, in their room; and he ſtaid, ſome time, at York, to concert meaſures, for the defence of the borders, in caſe the Scots ſhould make an incurſion; but, perceiving, tho' they had ſuch a deſign, that they were not yet, ready to put it in execution, he believed there would be no great danger, in returning to London, where he arrived, the 8th of June.

All ſeeming quiet, in England, ſince the victory of Towton, Edward would no longer defer his coronation, which was fixed to the 20th of June; and, during the preparations for that ſolemnity, he conſidered, how to guard againſt Scotland, from whence he foreſaw the fugitive king and queen might have aſſiſtance. With this view, he ſought means to find the Scots employment, that ſhould hinder them from meddling with their neighbours affairs; to which he was alſo induced by the ſollicitations of the earl of Douglaſs, who had, ſeveral years ſince, taken refuge, in England; but, for the better underſtanding the caſe, between England and Scotland, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate the then ſituation of that kingdom.

He guards againſt Scotland

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Scotland had been, for ſome time, rent with dangerous factions, which began with the reign of James II; and, as that prince was not above ſeven years old, when the king, his father, was murdered, Archibald Douglaſs pretended to the regency; but the ſtates, judging it improper to truſt ſo powerful a perſon with the adminiſtration of affairs, made Alexander Levingſton regent, and William Creighton chancellor. Theſe two barons, forthwith, formed two parties, which would have divided all Scotland, if the earl of Douglaſs had not had a third, which balanced the two former, but, the earl dying, about two years after, William, his ſon, ſucceeded him, who, ſtill more haughty and imperious than his father, raiſed great commotions, in the kingdom; and, being an avowed enemy to the regent and chancellor, he ſhewed, in all his proceedings, that he was labouring the deſtruction of both, in order to eſtabliſh himſelf upon their ruins. This obliged them, for their intereſt, to unite againſt their common enemy; and, ſome time after, they drew him to the aſſembly of the ſtates, upon the aſſurance of a ſafe-conduct; notwithſtanding which, they cauſed him to be beheaded. Beatrix, his daughter, inherited his eſtate, and James, his brother, his title; but James died, two years after, leaving William, his ſon, head of that powerful family. 1461.

William was no leſs proud and ambitious than his predeceſſors; and he ſo well gained the young king's confidence, who began to inſpect into his affairs, that he became his prime miniſter and favourite; but, when he found his credit ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, he attacked the two heads of the oppoſite factions, and forced Levingſton to retire from court. He met with ſtronger oppoſition from Creighton; but he ſo abuſed his power, and acted, in ſuch an arbitrary manner, that he put people to death, not only by his own authority, but even contrary to the king's will; and, in a word, James II, blinded by his affection for the earl, not only forgave all his exceſſes, but alſo made him his lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom. Probably this high promotion put the earl of Douglaſs upon the two following projects, to gratify his ambition; for, unknown to the king, he went into England, where it was no ſecret, that he privately conferred with the miniſters of Henry VI. This ſtep furniſhed his enemies with, what they had long ſought, an opportunity, to ruin his intereſt in the king. They infuſed into him ſo many fears and ſuſpitions, that, to prevent the earl, he removed him from all his poſts, not daring, perhaps, to puniſh him with greater rigour; and he likewiſe gave the adminiſtration of affairs to the earl of the Orcades, a mortal enemy, to Douglaſs, and reſtored the ſeals to William Creighton.

The earl, incenſed to ſee his enemies triumph, formed a confederacy againſt them, and brought the kingdom to the very brink of deſtruction; and, in ſhort, he committed ſo many outrages, that the king, juſtly provoked with him, reſolved to be freed from a ſubject, who created him ſo much uneaſineſs; but, being ſenſible that he could not openly execute this deſign, having recourſe to policy, by means of ſome of his friends, he put him in hopes of being reſtored to favour, upon the ſame footing as before. Then, ſending for him to court, upon a ſafe-conduct ſigned, with his own hand, he carried him alone

* Sir Francis Biondi, of the bed-chamber to king Charles I, wrote a Hiſtory of theſe civil wars (in two volumes Folio, London, 1641, 1646) which was tranſlated into Engliſh by the earl of Monmouth; but it is taken, almoſt verbatim, from Holingſhead and Stow; and it abounds with faults, eſpecially, in the names of perſons and places.

1461. into his cloſet, and ſtabbed him, with a dagger; which deed, tho' violent and irregular, was approved by the ſtates, who, at the ſame time, declared James, brother and heir to the deceaſed, with the reſt of his brothers, enemies to their country.

James, the new earl of Douglaſs, whoſe ſole ſtudy was to revenge his brother's death, and ſupport the credit of his family, raiſed a civil war, in the kingdom; during which, the king beſieging one of his places, Douglaſs was preparing to relieve it; but he was, on a ſudden, abandoned by all his friends, and forced to fly for refuge into England. Some time after, he entered the county of Anandale, with ſome troops; but, being defeated, he was, once more, compelled to fly his country; and George, earl of Ormond, one of his brothers, was taken and beheaded.

Theſe misfortunes being incapable of diſ-
Act. Pub. couraging the rebellious earl, he gained the earl of Roſs, lord of the iſles, Donald, his brother, and the reſt of that family, and perſuaded them to take up arms againſt the king; and, entering together the county of Merch, they ravaged it, from one end to the other; but, whilſt Douglaſs was preparing to purſue his progreſs, the earl of Roſs, repenting of his fault, deſerted him, and threw himſelf upon the mercy of the king, who gave him hopes of a pardon, provided he would merit it by his ſervices; yet Douglaſs, unwilling to follow this example, once more, retired into England.

Theſe diſturbances being appeaſed by the earl of Roſs's ſubmiſſion, and Douglaſs's retreat, James II, at the duke of York's ſollicitation, beſieged Roxborough; and the earl of Roſs, deſirous of meriting the king's pardon, came and offered him his ſervice, with a body of choſen troops; but James, as was already obſerved, being unfortunately killed, at this ſiege, was ſucceeded by James III, his ſon, about ſeven years old.

The death of James II, and the minority of the new king, revived the earl of Douglaſs's hopes; but, by reaſon of the civil war, which then raged, in England, he was obliged to wait, till affairs were in another ſituation. He believed, that the favourable juncture, he expected, was, at length, come, after Edward's victory, at Towton; wherefore, applying himſelf to that prince, who ſeemed firmly ſettled on the throne, he repreſented to him, that, by means of his friends, in Scotland, it would be very eaſy for the Engliſh to conquer that kingdom. Edward was not, in the leaſt, inclined, in his preſent circumſtances, to undertake ſuch a difficult task; yet, to find the Scots employment, and prevent them from aſſiſting Henry, he embraced the opportunity offered him by the earl of Douglaſs, in hopes of kindling a civil war, in Scotland; and, Douglaſs aſſuring him, that the earl of Roſs, Donald, his brother, and Donald's ſon were diſpoſed to riſe againſt the king of Scotland, he gave him a full power to treat with them.

Edward, notwithſtanding queen Margaret's abſence abroad, was juſtly apprehenſive, that the ſuccours of the Scots would enable her to make a freſh attempt upon his crown; and, therefore, he propoſed a truce to the regents of Scotland, in order to obſtruct her deſigns. That kingdom was then divided into two parties, on the account of the regency; Mary de Gelders, the king's mother, being at the head of the firſt, and the earl of Angus, of the ſecond. They both claimed the regency; but the ſtates, to diſoblige neither, nominated two regents of each party, and petitioned the queen, to remain ſatisfied with the care of her children's education. Thus, the two factions ſtill ſubſiſted, becauſe it was impoſſible to give ſatisfaction to both; and, Scotland being in this ſituation, when Edward propoſed the truce, the regents reſolved to accept his propoſal, and even ſent ambaſſadors to treat with him; but queen Margaret, then at Edinburgh, perceiving how prejudicial this truce would be to her, found means to diſconcert Edward's meaſures, by ſurrendering Berwick to the Scots, and concluding a marriage between prince Edward, her ſon, and Margaret, ſiſter to king James. Edward propoſes a truce with Scotland.

Whilſt Margaret was taken up, in gaining the Scots to her intereſt, Edward called a parliament, at Weſtminſter, to confirm the revolution, which had placed him on the throne; and it may naturally be ſuppoſed, that, at ſuch a juncture, the parliament did not want much ſollicitation, to confirm whatever had been done, in favour of Edward. How irregular ſoever his election might be, he was victorious; and that was ſufficient to hinder any perſon, from preſuming to diſpute his right. Several preceding inſtances demonſtrate, that the parliaments of England never attempted to ſwerve from that wholſome principle, of declaring for the ſtrongeſt; and what we ſhall ſee, in the ſequel of this very reign, will ſtill farther confirm it. Purſuant to this maxim, the parliament approved of Edward's coronation, ratified his title, and repeated all the acts made, in the late reign, againſt the houſe of York; and Henry VI, after a 38 years reign, was declared an uſurper, and all he had done, whilſt on the throne, annulled, as wanting a lawful authority, and as being of no force, till confirmed by the new parliament. Thus the people's credulity was abuſed; and they were made to believe, that what had been juſt, for 60 years, was rendered unjuſt, by a contingent event, viz. Edward's victory, at Towton. The parliament confirms Edward's election. Cotton.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, the king created George, his eldeſt brother, duke of Clarence, and Richard, his younger brother, duke of Glouceſter; the lord Falconbridge was made earl of Kent, Henry Bourchier, the king's uncle, by the mother's ſide, earl of Eſſex, and John Nevil, the earl of Warwick's brother, lord Montague. Edward creates ſeveral peers. Act. Pub.

Tho' the earl of Devonſhire, and ſome others, had been beheaded, at York, theſe victims

1461. victims did not ſeem ſufficient, to atone for the blood of the Yorkiſts, ſhed by the queen, on the ſcaffold; but to the king's policy, fear, or reſentment were alſo to be ſacrificed John de Vere, earl of Oxford, and Aubery, his eldeſt ſon, who were publickly beheaded.

The diſpoſition of foreign princes, with regard to England.

Edward, having, thus, ſettled his domeſtick, ſeriouſly thought of the foreign affairs; for England was actually in war with France, Scotland, Bretagne, and the Low-Countries; and there was equal danger, from all theſe quarters. If theſe ſtates had all united againſt him, it would have been extremely difficult for Edward to withſtand their forces, conſidering his preſent ſituation, and the little ſtreſs he could lay upon the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects; but, fortunately for him, France had a new king. Lewis XI. was wholly intent upon the project of rendering himſelf abſolute, in his own kingdom, and humbling the great men, among whom the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the chief. Indeed, his deſigns had not yet been diſcloſed; but what, at preſent, engroſſed all his thoughts was more than ſufficient to hinder, him from renewing the war with the Engliſh. The duke of Bretagne took care not to ſtir alone, in a war againſt Edward, which could not but be, in all repects, very prejudicial to him; and, as for the duke of Burgundy, the ſame reaſons, that made him deſirous of a truce with England, ſtill ſubſiſted; moreover, he plainly perceived, that it was againſt his intereſt to join with France and Bretagne, in order to weaken England, and much more to maintain alone a war, which muſt be very deſtructive to the trade of his ſubjects. It is true, his inclination led him to ſupport the houſe of Lancaſter, rather than that of York, by reaſon of his marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, a near relation to Henry VI; but motives, drawn from the inclinations of princes, do not always prevail, above thoſe of politicks. The duke of Burgundy was thoroughly acquainted with the character of Lewis XI, and conſequently ſaw, that he ought to guard againſt him, inſtead of attempting to render him more powerful, by the weakening of England; and, therefore, contenting himſelf with wiſhing well to the houſe of Lancaſter, he judged it adviſable to live in a good underſtanding with Edward IV, whom he found to be firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne. With this view, he ſent ambaſſadors to congratulate him, upon his acceſſion to the crown, and, at the ſame time, to demand ſatisfaction, for certain outrages committed by the Engliſh, contrary to the truce; and Edward, gladly anſwering the duke of Burgundy's advances, immediately, appointed commiſſioners, to examine the violations of the truce complained of by that prince; for his affairs would not allow him to be haughty to any of the princes, his neighbours, and ſtill leſs to the duke of Burgundy, who was very potent, and allied to the houſe of Lancaſter.

The diſpoſition of Scotland.

There was only Scotland left, which could create the king any uneaſineſs. He knew, that Margaret had ſurrendered Berwick to the Scots, and contracted the prince, her ſon, to king James's ſiſter; and he could not, therefore, doubt, that ſhe expected the aſſiſtance of that kingdom. In the interim, the queen, having ſettled her affairs, in Scotland, leaving there the king, her husband, with the prince, her ſon, went to France, in order to deſire aid of Lewis IX; but he was not of a character to engage in an enterprize, which he did not apprehend to be very beneficial. However, he gave the fugitive princeſs, as ſhe was his near relation, hopes of aſſiſtance; but, being unwilling to break entirely with Edward, he was ſatisfied with making proclamation, that all the friends of the houſe of Lancaſter ſhould be well received, in his dominions, and the adherents of the houſe of York not admitted. 1461.

1462. Edward's treaty with the earl of Roſs.

As Margaret had made a voyage to France, and eſpecially, as ſhe had lately entered into an alliance with the king of Scotland, Edward was fully convinced, that ſhe would contrive ſome new enterprize; but, believing that it would be in vain to try, to diſconcert her meaſures, by a truce with Scotland, to which the Scots daily raiſed freſh obſtacles, he reſolved to renew his negotiation with the earl of Roſs. In all probability, the earl of Douglaſs had already perſuaded that lord to take up arms; for the terms only were to be ſettled; and, to conclude this affair, Edward impowered the biſhop of Durham, the earl of Worceſter, and others, to make, in his name, a treaty with the earl of Roſs, the ſubſtance of which was,

That John, earl of Roſs, lord of the iſles, Donald Balagh, his brother, and John of the iſles, Donald's ſon, ſhould do homage to king Edward.

That they ſhould never own any other king of England, but Edward, or his ſucceſſors, deſcended from Lionel, duke of Clarence.

That they ſhould be always ready to ſerve him, in all his wars with Scotland, or with the Scots, in Ireland.

That, in time of peace, the earl of Roſs ſhould have an annual penſion of 100 marks ſterling, Donald one of 20 l. and John, his ſon, one of 10 l. and that theſe penſions ſhould be doubled, in time of war, during actual ſervice.

That, provided Scotland ſhould be conquered, by the arms of Edward, and with their aid, the king ſhould inveſt them with all the iſles, beyond the ſea of Scotland, to be equally divided among them.

That James, earl of Douglaſs, ſhould alſo be inveſted with all the lands formerly held by him, in Scotland, from the north ſea to England.

Laſtly, That Edward ſhould make neither a peace, nor truce, with the king of Scotland, without including them, if they deſired it.

As no Engliſh hiſtorian takes notice of this treaty, probably, it lay concealed among the records of England, till it was inſerted, in the Collection of the Publick Acts; and, indeed, it was of little importance, ſince it was never executed.

1462. executed. Edward was employed about too many affairs, to think of the conqueſt of Scotland; his ſole view was to make uſe of the earls of Douglaſs and Roſs, to raiſe commotions, in that kingdom; but it is likely, that the earl of Douglaſs's meaſures were not very juſt, becauſe the Hiſtory of Scotland mentions no inſurrection, at this time.

The reſt of the year 1462 was quiet enough, the gathering ſtorm not being yet ready to break.

Pius II. congratulates Edward. Act. Pub.

Pope Pius II, believing Edward ſufficiently eſtabliſhed on the throne, wrote him a congratulatory letter, upon his acceſſion to the crown, in anſwer to one ſent him by the king, to notify him of it; but it appeared from the pope's expreſſions, that he reſerved the liberty of retracting, if there was occaſion; ſince his approbation was founded only upon the proofs Edward himſelf had given him of his title, by which he made it conditional.

Exeter's lands are given to his ducheſs the king's ſiſter.

The duke of Exeter, who had eſpouſed Edward's ſiſter, having followed Henry into Scotland, the king gave the confiſcation of his eſtate to his ducheſs, who choſe rather to remain with the king, her brother, than follow the fortune of her husband.

The lord Falconbridge, a zealous friend to the houſe of York, who was created, in parliament, earl of Kent, was made high-admiral of England, about the end of this year.

The duke of Somerſet ſubmits. Hall.

The king enjoying tranquillity, and there being no appearance of any freſh attempt againſt Edward, the duke of Somerſet, and Ralph Piercy, the earl of Northumberland's brother, came and threw themſelves upon the king's mercy, who generouſly granted them a pardon.

Hiſtorians affirm, that, in this year, the Engliſh fleet made an expedition into Bretagne and the iſle of Ree, tho' it is related neither by the French, nor the Bretons; and, indeed, it is difficult to conceive, what could induce Edward wantonly to renew the war, at a juncture when he ſhould have thought it a very great happineſs, to be left unmoleſted; nay, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was not without fear of an inſurrection of the Lancaſtrians. At leaſt, in all likelihood, to this only can be aſcribed his care to gain the clergy to his intereſts, by a favour that none of his predeceſſors had ever willingly granted; viz. that, henceforward, all eccleſiaſticks, indicted for any crime, ſhould be tried, in the eccleſiaſtical court, without the interpoſition of the king's judges, upon any pretence whatſoever; by which patent, he ſcreened the clergy from the penalties of the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, paſſed, in the 16th year of Richard II. He pretended, that he made this conceſſion, from his ardent zeal for religion, his dread of the excommunications decreed by the holy canons, and his belief, that all the calamities, with which England had been, for ſome time, afflicted, were the juſt judgments of God, for diſregarding his miniſters; but, very probably, he was induced by a quite different motive, to break ſo many ſtatutes, which the parliaments had judged neceſſary, to cheque the growth of the power of the clergy. 1462.

About the end of this year, the truce of commerce, between England and the duke of Burgundy's dominions, was prolonged, for ſome time.

1463. Edward calls upon the earl of Roſs to perform his promiſe.

In the interim, Edward, hearing that preparations were ſecretly making, in Scotland, and, in appearance, againſt him, called upon the earl of Roſs to perform his promiſe; and, with that view, he appointed commiſſioners, who were ordered to receive his oath; but the earl, who had his ſpies, in England, not perceiving that Edward was really preparing to ſupport him, did not think fit to begin, for fear of being deſerted.

Queen Margaret arrives in the north of England.

It was not without reaſon, that Edward dreaded a ſtorm from the north; for, preſently after, queen Margaret, having obtained of the king of France an aid of 500 men, with the promiſe of a greater, embarqued, to invade England; and, as ſhe hoped, that the inhabitants of the northern counties would take arms, in her favour, ſhe landed, at the mouth of the Tine; but ſhe found there a body of Engliſh troops, who forced her to re-embarque, with precipitation. A few hours after, her ſhip being ſeparated from the reſt of the fleet, by a ſtorm, it was with extreme difficulty that, having entered the Tweed, ſhe, at laſt, landed, at Berwick; and the reſt of the ſhips were driven, towards Bamburgh, where the French would have landed; but the baſtard Ogle, having hindered their deſcent, they retired to the little iſle of Lindisfarn; for the weather would not permit them to put to ſea. Ogle followed them thither, and, attacking them, ſlew a part, and took 400 priſoners; and their leader was the only perſon, that found means to eſcape, in a fiſher-boat, to Berwick.

Edward, upon the receipt of this news, eaſily ſaw, that Margaret was ſecure of the aſſiſtance of the Scots, and would ſoon march into England; upon which, ſeriouſly attending to his affairs, he diſpatched the lord Montague, with the troops that were ready, whilſt himſelf haſtened a great armament, he was preparing, by ſea and land, to oppoſe his enemy.

Henry and Margaret re-enter England. Hall.

Montague, having begun his march, heard, upon the road, that the queen was in Northumberland, at the head of an army, which daily increaſed, on account of the great licenſe allowed to the ſoldiers; yet he advanced, as far as Durham, where he ſtaid, ſome days, expecting a reinforcement, ſent by the king. Theſe ſupplies being arrived, he proceeded on his march; and, meeting a detachment of the enemies, commanded by the lords Hungerford and Roſs, he attacked and put them to rout. Ralph Piercy, who ſerved Henry, tho' he had taken the oath to Edward, was ſlain, in this action; and the duke of Somerſet, making no more ſcruple, than Piercy, of violating his oath, alſo joined the queen.

Montague, animated with this ſucceſs, marched, immediately, to Hexham, where Henry 1463. Henry lay intrenched; and, attacking him in his lines, without giving him time to recover himſelf, he obtained a compleat victory. The duke of Somerſet and the lords Roſs and Hungerford were taken priſoners; but Henry, Margaret, and the prince, their ſon, fled into Scotland. Some days after, the duke of Somerſet was beheaded, at Hexham, Roſs and Hungerford, elſewhere, and 20 officers of diſtinction, at York; and many others, that were concealed, in ſeveral pleaces, being diſcovered, or delivered up to the conqueror, were likewiſe ſacrificed to his vengeance.

Henry eſcapes, and Somerſet is beheaded.

Edward returns to London, and leaves the earl of Warwick, in the north.

After this victory, Edward, being advanced to Durham, ſent the earl of Warwick farther northwards, to recover ſome places taken by the queen; and then he returned to London. The earl of Warwick, upon his brother's victory, divided his army into three bodies, and beſieged, at once, Bamburgh, Dunſtanburgh, and Alnwick; the two firſt of which places were eaſily taken, and the commanding officers puniſhed; but Alnwick, where a Frenchman commanded, with ſome forces of his nation, held out till, the earl of Angus came to his relief, with a body of Scotch troops. However, the earl could do no more than draw out the garriſon; probably, by a treaty with the beſiegers, though Buchanan affirms the contrary.

Montague is created marqueſs, and Herbert earl of Pembroke.

Edward, upon his arrival at London, ordered two patents to be drawn up, under the great ſeal, to reward the lord Montague and Sir William Herbert; the firſt of whom had been extremely ſerviceable to him, in his two late victories; and the other had, all along, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, by an extraordinary zeal for the houſe of York. He created the former earl of Northumberland, and the latter earl of Pembroke, Henry Piercy and Jaſper Tudor, who bore theſe titles, having forfeited them by adhering to king Henry; but, Piercy afterwards ſubmitting to Edward, and obtaining his pardon, Montague readily reſigned him the earldom of Northumberland, for the marquiſate of Montague. As for the title of earl of Pembroke, care muſt be taken not to confound the two lords that bore it; viz. Jaſper Tudor, half-brother to Henry VI, and William Herbert, who was in Edward's ſervice.

Edward, during the tranquillity procured by his late victory, received advice, that preparations were making, in France, to ſupport the intereſts of Henry and Margaret; upon which, he reſolved to ſend for the earl of Warwick, and leave the marqueſs of Montague in the north, as governor of the northern Marches, impowering him alſo to levy what troops he thought neceſſary; for he did not doubt, that his enemies had reſolved to make their greateſt efforts, from that quarter, on account of the neighbourhood of Scotland. Theſe precautions, with his late victory, probably, cooled the ardor of the French and the Scots; for, ſoon after, the Scots demanded a ſafe-conduct for ambaſſadors, they deſigned to ſend to his court; and, at the ſame time, Lewis XI, negotiated a truce with him, by the duke of Burgundy's mediation. This truce was actually concluded, at St. Omer, to the 1ſt of October, 1464, on the condition, that neither of the two monarchs ſhould aid the enemies of the other; and the duke of Burgundy alſo agreed to renew for one year, the truce of commerce between England and the Low-Countries. 1463.

A truce with the French,

Edward, having, thus, ſecured himſelf againſt France, concluded with Scotland a truce, for a year, negotiated by the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, at London, in the name of the regents; ſo that, being in no danger from his neighbours, at leaſt, for one year, he was at leiſure, to ſtrengthen himſelf on the throne, in caſe of another attack.

and Scotland. Act. Pub.

Henry and Margaret are in great perplexity.

In the interim, the unfortunate Henry, abandoned by the kings of France and Scotland, and the duke of Burgundy, who alone were able to aſſiſt him, remained ſtill, at Edinburgh, but not without uneaſineſs; for the late truce, beween the Engliſh and the Scots, did not only prevent the latter from giving him any aſſiſtance; but it was farther highly probable, that Edward, in concluding the truce with Scotland, had ſtipulated, that his enemy ſhould not be ſuffered to continue any longer, in that kingdom; and it even appears, in the Collection of Publick Acts, that, before the truce was ſigned, the two kings of England and Scotland agreed upon certain ſecret articles, which could only concern the fugitive king. However this be, Henry, entirely at a loſs where to retire, prepoſterouſly imagined, that he might be concealed, in England; perhaps, he flattered himſelf, that the inhabitants of the northern counties would riſe, in his favour; but unhappy princes ſeldom meet with faithful friends. At leaſt, it may be preſumed, that, dreading to be delivered up by the Scots, and having no conveniency to eſcape, by ſea, he hoped to find a ſafe retreat with ſome friends, in England, till an opportunity offered of paſſing into France; but whatever his intent was, he had no ſooner arrived, in England, than he was diſcovered, ſeized, ignominiouſly conducted to London, and confined, in the tower. Some affirm, that he was taken, the preceding year, at the battle of Hexham, or, at leaſt, a few days after; but ſome Publick Acts ſhew, that, in October, that year, he was not yet in Edward's power; wherefore, it is more likely, that he was taken, as I ſaid, in endeavouring, after ſome ſtay, in Scotland, to conceal himſelf, in England. An adventure, which happened to Margaret, and is related by Monſtrelet, renders it probable, that ſhe had alſo reſolved to hide herſelf, in England, in hopes of an opportunity to embarque, not daring to truſt the Scots any longer; and that, with this view, ſhe had parted from the king, her husband. Monſtrelet ſays, that, Margaret being, in England, with the prince, her ſon, attended with La Verenne, a French lord, fell into the hands of robbers, who would have killed her, if, by means of a quarrel amongſt them, ſhe had not eſcaped into a wood, with 1463. prince; and that afterwards ſhe ſet ſail for Sluice, in Flanders, where the duke of Burgundy gave her an honourable reception. If this adventure be true, it muſt have fallen out, at the time I am now ſpeaking of; but, however that be, after her departure from Scotland, ſhe retired to Rene of Anjou, her father, with the prince, her ſon. Edmund, the new duke of Somerſet, brother to him beheaded, at Hexham, with the duke of Exeter, fled for refuge into the Low-Countries; yet they durſt not make themſelves known, leſt they ſhould be delivered up to Edward; and they endured, in Flanders, all that a wretched exile, attended with the moſt preſſing want, was capable of bringing upon perſons, of their character. Philip de Commines tells us, that he ſaw the duke of Exeter, before he was known, following, barefoot, the duke of Burgundy's equipage, and ſerving, probably, as a footman, for his ſubſiſtence; but, theſe two lords being, at length, known, the duke allowed them an inconſiderable penſion, afraid of offending Edward, by enlarging his generoſity. Theſe are ſtrange viciſſitudes, for a king who had ſat, 38 years, on a throne; for a queen, who had, for many years, governed England, with an abſolute ſway; for a prince, deſtined by his birth to wear a crown; and for lords related, or allied, to the royal family, who had always enjoyed the higheſt offices. Such ſurpriſing turns of fortune ſeldom make much impreſſion, at the time they are ſeen, becauſe thoſe, who are concerned, generally aſcribe their misfortunes to the malice of their enemies; but is it poſſible for thoſe, that read them impartially, in hiſtory, to help obſerving, and owning, the direction of Providence?

1464. Edward gives his friends the eſtates of the rebels. Hall. Hollingſh.

Edward having king Henry in his power, and queen Margaret being retired to the duke, her father, no perſon was more capable of raiſing commotions, in the kingdom; and then it was, that, after offering, in vain, a pardon to all the Lancaſtrians, that would ſubmit and ſwear allegiance, within a limited time, he confiſcated their eſtates, and liberally beſtowed them upon thoſe that had ſerved him; and, to gain the hearts of his ſubjects, after giving them convincing proofs of his ſeverity, he made himſelf extremely popular, inſomuch that the Italian author, before-mentioned, charges him with running into exceſs, on that account.

He demands in marriage Bona of Savoy, Lewis's ſiſter. Hall. Hollingſh.

During this ſeemingly ſolid tranquility, the king's chief counſellors preſſed him to think of marriage, in order to leave the crown to his poſterity; and, Edward falling in with their advice, three matches were propoſed. The firſt was Margaret, ſiſter to the king of Scotland; but, beſides that this princeſs was already contracted to Henry's ſon, ſhe was ſo young, that the marriage could have been conſummated, for many years. The ſecond was Iſabella of Caſtile, afterwards married to Ferdinand of Arragon; who, according to the Engliſh writers, was rejected, by reaſon of her being too young; and yet it is certain, that ſhe was then 13 years old. Bona of Savoy, ſiſter to the queen of France, was the third; upon whom Edward reſolved, and, ſhortly after, ſet the earl of Warwick, to demand her in marriage; who was then at the court of France, with the queen, her ſiſter. It is time, now, to relate the affairs of France, on account of their connection with thoſe of England; otherwiſe the reader will have but an imperfect idea of what paſſed, in England, in the reign of Edward IV. 1464.

The ſtate of affairs, in France. Mezerai.

Lewis XI, a prince of a turbulent diſpoſition, no ſooner was in poſſeſſion of the crown of France, than he formed the deſign of making himſelf abſolute; which ſome flatterers have called rendering himſelf free; but, according to a famous hiſtorian, it ought rather to be termed running mad. To execute this grand project, the overgrown power of the peers was firſt to be humbled, among whom the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the principal; for they not only upheld one another, but were likewiſe a ſupport to the reſt.

Conteſts between the kings of France and the dukes of Bretagne, Argentre.

The firſt held Burgundy and Flanders, the only two antient lay-peerdoms, that ſtill remained to be united to the crown; but this prince, who was alſo ſovereign of almoſt all the Low-Countries, was ſo potent, that to attack him, firſt, would have been very imprudent. It was, therefore, with the duke of Bretagne, that Lewis reſolved to begin the execution of his deſigns, and an old quarrel, about homage, afforded him a pretence; for, ever ſince Peter, ſirnamed Mauclerc, had done homage to St Lewis, the nature of homage had been a continual ſubject of diſputes, between the kings of France and the dukes of Bretagne. The former maintained, that it was a liege homage; but the latter alledged the contrary; and this was a very important queſtion, by reaſon of the wide difference between bare and liege homage. Bare homage was paid by thoſe, who, tho' they were not naturally dependent on a prince, did him homage, for his protection, aſſiſtance, or even for a penſion; and the Collection of the Publick Acts contains ſundry homage, of this kind, paid to the kings of England by ſovereign princes of Germany and the Low-Countries, and by the earls of Savoy; but liege homage was paid by thoſe, that held lands diſmembered from the dominions of the prince, to whom it was paid; and ſuch were the dukedoms and peerdoms of France. As theſe two ſorts of homage were of a different nature, they were alſo performed, in a different manner; for the perſon, that did liege homage, was uncovered, on his knees, ungirded, and without a ſword, or ſpurs; moreover, he held his hands joined within thoſe of the ſoverign, and ſwore fealty to him; but ſimple homage was paid ſtanding, with the ſword and ſpurs on, and without an oath. Thus, liege homage was for lands diſmembered from a ſtate, and denoted their being liable to confiſcation, and re-union; but ſimple homage was perſonal, upon certain conditions beneficial to the vaſſal; ſo that the default of homage deprived him only of the benefit of theſe conditions. The obliging, therefore, the 1464. the duke of Bretagne to do liege homage, would have laid him under a neceſſity to own his dukedom liable to confiſcation, and to be re-annexed to the crown of France; but, to avoid this inconvenience, the dukes of Bretagne had contrived the expedient of doing their homage, like their predeceſſors, in general terms; and, whether the right of the kings of France, with reſpect to the nature of the homage, could not be evidently proved, or the circumſtances of affairs conſtrained them to manage the dukes of Bretagne, it is certain they long received their homage, in that manner. Indeed, after homage done, the chancellor, or high-chamberlain, ſaid aloud, that the homage was liege, to which the duke anſwered, in the negative; and, thus, the pretenſions of each remained entire. Charles V. plainly ſhewed, that he ſuppoſed the homage to be liege, ſince he cauſed the dukedom of Bretagne to be confiſcated and annexed to his crown, by a decree of the court of peers; and, a peace being concluded, between France and Bretagne, in the beginning of the reign of Charles VI, the duke of Bretagne was reſtored to his dukedom; and, as nothing was ſettled, about the nature of the homage, the pretenſions of both parties ſtill ſubſiſted. Arthur III, who had been conſtable of France, upon his becoming duke of Bretagne, ſolemnly declared, in doing his homage to Charles VII, that he did not intend to do liege homage, and was allowed to pay it, in general terms, like his predeceſſors. Francis II, his ſucceſſor, made the ſame declaration; and Charles VII. received his homage, tho' he did not approve his proteſtation.

Lewis XI. attacks the duke of Bretagne, who forms a league againſt him. P. Daniel.

This was the ſtate of the affairs, between France and Bretagne, when Lewis XI. came to the crown; and, probably, this prince would have been as eaſily ſatisfied, as Charles, his father, with reſpect to the duke of Bretagne's homage, had he not, as I obſerved, reſolved to begin with him his grand project of humbling all that could hinder his arriving at arbitrary power. He had projected this deſign, the moment he was placed on the throne, and, perhaps, before the death of the king, his father; but it was not till 1464, that he began to put it in execution. With this view, having firſt ordered ſome troops into Anjou, he ſent the chancellor de Morvilliers to the duke of Bretagne, to prohibit him, in his name, to aſſume any right of ſovereignty, in his dukedom; but Francis II, being unprepared for his defence, had recourſe to artifice, and demanded a three months delay, to conſult his ſtates; and, this term being granted him, he made uſe of it, to cabal, in France, among the great men, and to form againſt Lewis a powerful league, called the great League of the Publick Good, which will be, preſently, mentioned.

Negotiations between Edward and Lewis XI. Hall.

At the time Lewis thought of attacking the duke of Bretagne, Edward diſpatched the earl of Warwick, to demand Bona of Savoy, his ſiſter-in-law, in marriage; which propoſal could not but be very agreeable to him, ſince he was deſirous of nothing more, than to make an alliance with the king of England, in order to prevent his interpoſing, in his future quarrels, with the great men of his kingdom; but, to be ſure of reaping this benefit by it, he cauſed the affair of the marriage to be a little prolonged, whilſt he negotiated, at London, and with the earl of Warwick, at Paris, a treaty of perſonal amity between him and Edward. There are, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral papers, concerning this negotiation; and we ſee there, that a full power was given by Edward to the earl of Warwick, to treat of a final peace, an alliance, or a truce with Lewis XI; and another to conclude a treaty of friendſhip between the two kings. Lewis's views were ſtill more extenſive; and, in order to deprive the duke of Bretagne of all protection, he would have drawn the duke of Burgundy into his projected alliance with England, and, for that purpoſe, agreed with Edward and Philip, upon a congreſs of ambaſſadors, at Heſdin, which was afterwards removed to St. Omer. He managed his affairs, at London, by the lord Launoy, governor of Amiens, ſent thither, towards the end of the preceding year; but the reſult of all theſe negotiations was only the concluſion of a ſea-truce, to laſt, as long as that before made for the land.

Edward makes a truce with Scotland. Act. Pub.

During theſe tranſactions, Edward concluded with Scotland a 15 years truce; and John Kennedy, a lord of great abilities, and ardently zealous for his king and country, thought he could not, whilſt regent, do a greater ſervice to both, than to maintain a good underſtanding with the Engliſh; otherwiſe it was next to impoſſible to preſerve tranquillity, in Scotland, becauſe, during the war, the malecontents always relied upon the protection of England.

He grants a pardon to Henry's friends. Act. Pub.

This affair being over, Edward offered to all, that had taken arms againſt him, an abſolute pardon, except Ralph Grey and Humphrey Nevil; the former of whom, having been taken, in Banborough, where he commanded for Henry, had been degraded; and, probably, he had done ſomething ſince, which occaſioned his excluſion from the pardon granted to the reſt. Shortly after, the king publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all his ſubjects, from 16 to 60 years of age, to take up arms; but the hiſtorians do not mention this armament, nor the occaſion of it.

He concludes a peace with Bretagne.

In Auguſt, this year, ambaſſadors came to Edward from the duke of Bretagne, to negotiate a truce; for the duke, finding himſelf preſſed by the king of France, and labouring to form the league of the publick good, was glad to ſecure himſelf againſt England; and he obtained from Edward a truce, for one year, to begin, the firſt of October.

About the ſame time, the ſee of York becoming vacant, George Nevil, brother to the earl of Warwick, was promoted to it, by the recommendation of the king.

1465. In the interim, the earl of Warwick, who was ſtill at the court of France, having preſſed Lewis, upon the chief occaſion of his ambaſſy, Edward's marriage, with Bona of Savoy, was,

1465. at length, concluded; and, preſently after, Lewis ſent the earl of Dammartin, as his ambaſſador to Edward, to ſettle with him what yet remained to be done, in the affair; but all theſe deſigns were defeated by love. What I am about to relate is not a romance, but a true ſtory; which ſhews, how far that paſſion is ſometimes concerned, in the moſt important revolutions; for this affair was attended with remarkable effects.

Edward falls in love with Eliſabeth Woodville.

Whilſt the earl of Warwick was forwarding, in France, with all his power, the concluſion of his negotiation, Edward, by a mere accident, rendered it abortive, in England. This prince, being in Northamptonſhire, near the manor of Grafton, made a viſit to Jacquelina of Luxemburgh, ducheſs of Bedford, who had married Sir Richard Woodville; by whom ſhe had, among other children, a daughter, named Eliſabeth, who had been wife to Sir John Grey of Groby, and, upon his death, retired to her father. She had the misfortune to ſee her husband's eſtate confiſcated, becauſe of his attachment to the houſe of Lancaſter, in whoſe ſervice he had loſt his life; and, the king's viſit ſeeming to be a fair opportunity, ſhe came and threw herſelf at his feet, imploring the reſtitution of her deceaſed husband's lands, and his compaſſion upon her children. Edward, being young and extremely amorous, no ſooner ſaw the charming widow at his feet, than he was deſperately enamoured with her; and he, forthwith, gave her hopes, as he raiſed her from the ground, that he would grant her requeſt, and even intimated, that it was not in his power, to deny any thing ſhe was pleaſed to demand; but, afterwards, in his private converſations with her, he would fain have perſuaded her, to purchaſe the favour, at the expence of her honour. All the hiſtorians agree, that he was the handſomeſt man, in England, and the moſt proper to make conqueſts on the female ſex; and, being ſenſible of this, he did not doubt to gain this lady's heart, with the ſame eaſe he had done many others; but ſhe expreſly told him, that, tho' ſhe judged herſelf unworthy to be a queen, ſhe was above being a concubine; which declaration made ſuch an impreſſion on the king, that, deſpairing to accompliſh his ends, any other way, he offered her marriage. It was ſcarce poſſible to refuſe a heart, like Edward's, with a crown. The young lady, agreeably ſurpriſed at ſuch a beneficial offer, immediately, accepted it; and in ſo reſpectful and obliging a manner, as compleated the conqueſt of the monarch's heart; yet, unwilling to diſoblige the ducheſs of York, his mother, before he proceeded any farther, he acquainted her with his intention. The ducheſs, aſtoniſhed at this ſudden reſolution, laboured, with all her might, to diſſuade him from it; repreſenting to him the injury he would do the earl of Warwick, to whom he was under ſo many obligations, and who, it was to be feared, would highly reſent it; that, by the affront he was going to put upon the king of France, he would render him his mortal enemy, and a peace impracticable; that the Engliſh nobility would behold, with envy, the Woodville family, exalted ſo high above them, and their diſcontent might prove very deſtructive; and, in a word, that he was about to marry a woman with nothing, his ſubject, and who had children by another husband. Edward briefly replied, that it was not certain, that the earl of Warwick would conſider his change, as an injury; but, as for him, he was ſure of his affection; that the king of France was like to be employed about affairs, that would, probably, divert him from all thoughts of revenge; that his marrying a ſubject, inſtead of offending the great men, would rather be agreeable to them, ſince, for the future, all the noble families might aſpire to the ſame honour; laſtly, that a dowry ought not to be regarded, in a king's marriage; and whatever elſe, he could expect, would be amply ſupplied by his love and her virtue, whom he choſe, for his wife. The ducheſs, finding her arguments ineffectual, added another, and, in her opinion, a much ſtronger reaſon; namely, that he was contracted to the lady Eliſabeth Lucy, and could not, in conſcience, marry another. Edward poſitively denied, that he was engaged to that lady; yet, for his mother's ſatisfaction, or leſt this pretended engagement might, one day, furniſh a pretence to diſpute the validity of his marriage, he conſented, that Eliſabeth Lucy ſhould be examined by ſome biſhops. Upon her examination, ſhe confeſſed, that the king had not given her a poſitive promiſe; nevertheleſs, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe ſhould never have yielded to his deſires, had ſhe not been perſuaded of his intention to marry her; but, this anſwer ſhewing, that there was no abſolute promiſe, on the king's part, the prelates affirmed, that the king might, with a ſafe conſcience, marry another. Accordingly, Edward eſpouſed Eliſabeth Woodville, in the preſence of a few perſons; ſo that his marriage was divulged only by his orders, to prepare for the new queen's coronation.

He marries her. Hall.

The nobles are jealous of the Woodvilles.

The nobles and people were extremely ſurpriſed, to ſee the king married to one of his ſubjects, whilſt he was negotiating his marriage, at the court of France, with the princeſs of Savoy; nay, when this marriage was already concluded. Sir Richard Woodville, the queen's father, was, immediately, created earl of Rivers, and his ſon, Anthony Woodville, married to the only daughter of the lord Scales, the greateſt heireſs of the kingdom. This raiſed great envy in the lords, particularly, in the duke of Clarence, who was highly incenſed, becauſe the king, his brother, did not procure him ſo rich a match; but this was nothing, in compariſon of the earl of Warwick's indignation, for being, thus, mocked, who expected that the king ſhould have treated him, in a more reſpectful and honourable manner. In this belief, he diſcovered his anger to the king of France, who did all that was poſſible, to inflame it; for Lewis himſelf could not but look upon Edward's proceedings, as a mortal affront; but, his affairs not permitting him to demand immediate ſatisfaction, he, for the preſent, concealed his reſentment

1465. ſentment. As for the earl of Warwick, he left the court of France, and returned into England, with a heart full of hatred and revenge againſt Edward, whoſe ingratitude he deteſted; yet he took care to diſſemble his ſentiments, till a proper ſeaſon offered for the diſcovery of them; but this very diſſimulation convinced the king, that he was extremely diſguſted; wherefore, Edward himſelf began to conſider him, as a ſecret enemy, tho' he ſtill gave him ſome ſlight marks of his confidence. Thus, amidſt the diſguiſes of the king and the earl, a mutual averſion was nouriſhed, which induced the king to mortify him, on ſeveral occaſions, as well to gratify his paſſion, as to leſſen that lord's credit with the people. As he could not believe, that he, who had, by his intereſt, fixed him on the throne, might have it in his power to dethrone him, he did not ſhew him the leaſt regard; but Warwick evidently perceived the king's view, tho' he prudently diſguiſed his ſentiments, leſt an unſeaſonable reſentment might oblige Edward, to diſable him to be revenged. All the hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that, preſently after his return from France, he retired into the country, under the pretence of
Act. Pub. his health; but it appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, during the years 1465 and 1466, he was, at court, and even employed, in negotiations of importance, with ambaſſadors of foreign princes; ſo that it was not, till two years after his return, that he withdrew, when he could no longer bear to be entirely removed from affairs, whilſt the new earl of Rivers had all the king's confidence.

The reſt of the year 1465 was ſpent, in ſundry negotiations, with the king of France, the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Charolois, and the duke of Bretagne; but, as they all concerned the affairs of France, and as upon theſe the knowledge of the Hiſtory of England, in a great meaſure, depends, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate their ſituation, at that time.

The affairs of France. P. Daniel. Lewis XI. was one of the ſubtleſt and leaſt ſcrupulous princes, then in Europe; whoſe deſign was, as I ſaid, to ruin the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne; the former by artifice, and the latter by force. With reſpect to the duke of Bretagne, he had, as I obſerved, begun to execute his project, by aſſembling an army, in Anjou, ready to fall upon Bretagne; and which only waited, till the expiration of the delay granted to the duke. As for the duke of Burgundy, Lewis had not judged it proper to proceed ſo haughtily with him; for he was too powerful a prince, to hope to ſucceed, by attacking him openly; but he made uſe of a ſecret expedient, which partly procured him what would have been, with extreme difficulty, obtained, by way of arms. He bribed the lords of Croy and Chimay, brothers, prime miniſters, and confidents of the duke, who prevailed on their maſter to reſign to the crown of France the towns on the Somme, for 400,000 crowns, purſuant to the treaty of Arras; but Charles, earl of Charolois, only ſon to the duke of Burgundy, conſidered this reſtitution, as a mortal wound to him and his houſe; who believed, that the duke, his father, ſhould, at any rate, have kept thoſe places, which rendered him more formidable to France than all the reſt of his dominions. He was ſo inraged againſt the miniſters, that he, one day, openly threatened to puniſh them, for their pernicious advice to his father; which affair created, between the father and ſon, a quarrel, that the favourites took care to foment; ſo that the earl, at laſt, in great diſcontent, retired into Holland. He pretended, that it was dangerous for him to remain any longer, at court; and that the favourites had counſelled his father to apprehend him, and even bribed people to poiſon him. 1465.

Whilſt the earl of Charolois was in Holland, Lewis XI. ſent thither ſecretly the baſtard of Rubempre, in a veſſel fitted out, at Dieppe, Commin. with ſome choſen ſoldiers, who, without knowing where they were going, had orders to obey Rubempre's commands; and the baſtard, landing with four of theſe ſoldiers, was known and diſcovered to the earl of Charolois, who, immediately, cauſed him to be ſeized; and ſome affirm, that there was found upon him an order, under the king's own hand, to apprehend the earl, and bring him away dead, or alive. In the interim, Lewis was upon the Somme, with a numerous army; and he had appointed the duke of Burgundy to meet him, on purpoſe, as it was afterwards reported to ſeize his perſon, as ſoon as he ſhould hear of the ſucceſs of Rubempre's plot; but, the earl of Charolois ſending ſpeedy intelligence to his father of what he had diſcovered, the duke, directly, rode away from Heſdin, where he was now arrived; and, thus, if it be true, that Lewis deſigned to ſeize, at once, the father and ſon, his project miſcarried. This attempt, whether it was real, or only ſuſpected, greatly increaſed the earl of Charolois's hatred to Lewis; who every-where proclaimed, that the king of France intended to aſſaſſinate, or carry him away, by force; and the report, immediately, flew all over Flanders.

Lewis eaſily perceived, that his honour could not but be concerned, in this affair, eſpecially if the baſtard of Rubempre, whoſe trial was preparing, in Holland, ſhould be convicted of the fact charged upon him; and, therefore, to prevent this trial, he diſpatched the chancellor de Morvilliers, with ſome other ambaſſadors, to the duke of Burgundy, to require him to deliver the priſoners into his hands. The earl of Charolois being preſent, at the audience, the chancellor ſpoke to the duke, in a very haughty manner, and even dropped ſome offenſive expreſſions againſt the earl, his ſon, who would have frequently replied; but the chancellor ſtill interrupted him, with ſaying that he was ſent to his father, and not to him. The duke of Burgundy's anſwer was, that, being ſovereign, in Holland, without the leaſt dependence on France, he would order the priſoner to be tried, and either puniſhed, or acquitted, according as he was found 1465. guilty, or innocent; and, when the French ambaſſadors took their leave of the duke, the earl of Charolois, taking one of them aſide, ſaid, "The king, your maſter, has been very ſevere upon me, by his chancellor; but "he ſhall repent it, before a year is com- "pleated:" And, indeed, he was as good as his word.

The war of the Publick Good againſt Lewis XI.

This paſſed, in the year 1464, whilſt the duke of Bretagne, for his own defence againſt Lewis, was labouring to form the league of the Publick Good above-mentioned; and the earl of Charolois was one of the firſt that entered into it, having obtained his father's permiſſion to raiſe troops and join the duke of Bretagne, with almoſt all the great men of France, who were to be near Paris, in June, 1465. When the duke of Bretagne found himſelf ſecure of a powerful aid, he ſent ambaſſadors to the king, under the pretence of deſiring a longer delay, but in reality to corrupt the duke of Berry, his brother; and they were ſo ſucceſsful, that they brought the duke with them into Bretagne. He was no ſooner out of the king's power, than the confederates declared him head of the league, and they all went and prepared to be, at the rendezvous; but the duke of Bourbon was the firſt, that ventured to take up arms, with an intent to draw the king into his country, at a diſtance from Paris. Lewis, who had, as yet, received no news of the league, forthwith, marched towards Bourbonnois; but, quickly after, he heard, that the earl of Charolois, at the head of a numerous army, was approaching Paris; and that the duke of Bretagne, with the reſt of the confederates, was preparing to join him. Upon this information, he ſpeedily left Bourbonnois, to ſave his metropolis; and, in the mean while, the earl of Charolois attempted to become maſter of it; but, as he had no proſpect of ſucceſs, he went and encamped, at Montlhery, expecting the dukes of Berry and Bretagne. In the mean time, the king, who advanced with great marches, approaching Montlhery, the two armies met and joined battle; the ſucceſs whereof was ſo doubtful, that both ſides claimed the advantage; but the king, decamping, in the night, to throw himſelf into Paris, gave occaſion to his enemies to ſay, that he owned his defeat. Some days after, the dukes of Berry and Bretagne joined the Burgundians; but the king had now ſo effectually provided, for the defence of his capital, that it was impoſſible for it to be taken by the confederates; and, at length, the war ended, in a treaty ſigned, at Conflans, the 30th of October. Lewis reſtored to the duke of Burgundy the towns upon the Somme, for which he had paid 400,000 crowns; and he gave Normandy, in appenage, to the duke of Berry, his brother. Upon the ſigning of the treaty, the earl of Charolois retired into the Low-Countries; and the duke of Berry, accompanied with the duke of Bretagne, went and took poſſeſſion of Normandy; but, a few days after, the duke of Bretagne, falling out with the duke of Berry, returned into his own dominions. Lewis, improving this diſſenſion, immediately, marched into Normandy, expelled his brother, and conſtrained him, once more, to take refuge, in Bretagne; where, notwithſtanding their former quarrel, the duke gave him a civil reception. Theſe are all the moſt remarkable tranſactions, in France, in 1465. 1465.

Monſtrelet. Commin.

Whilſt the French princes were making preparations, for the war of the Publick Good they had not neglected the king of England; for the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that, from March to their taking the field, the duke of Bretagne and the earl of Charolois had their ambaſſadors, at London; and the earl offered to make with Edward a treaty of alliance. Lewis XI. himſelf, tho' ſo highly incenſed againſt him, did not fail to court him; but Edward, willing, doubtleſs, to be better informed of his affairs, avoided, under various pretences, to come to any agreement.

The negotiations of the duke of Bretagne and the earl of Charolois, with Edward. Act. Pub.

He acted otherwiſe, with reſpect to the king of Scotland, with whom, after a long negotiation, he concluded, at Newcaſtle, a treaty, by which the late truce was prolonged, for 40 years, till 1519.

The truce with Scotland is prolonged.

In the beginning of the year 1466, the queen was delivered of a princeſs, named Eliſabeth, who afterwards became the happy inſtrument to reſtore peace to England, after a long civil war. 1466. The birth of the princeſs Eliſabeth. Hall.

Edward, having highly affronted Lewis XI, conſidered him, as a ſecret enemy; who only wanted an opportunity to be revenged; yet he behaved, with extreme caution, during the war of the Publick Good, leſt he ſhould afford him a freſh cauſe to ſupport the houſe of Lancaſter, in caſe he ſubdued the confederate princes. For the ſame reaſon, he hearkened to the propoſals of the dukes of Berry and Bretagne; but he had taken care to conclude nothing, either with them, or the king of France. Afterwards, the treaty of Conflans might have cauſed Edward to pay Lewis leſs regard, had not the revolution, immediately after, in Normandy, induced him to proceed, with deliberation; and, in the mean while, he was equally preſſed, on both ſides. The king of France, pretending to forget the affront he had received, urged him to enter into a treaty with him, for a final peace between the two crowns, or, at leaſt, for a long truce; whilſt the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Charolois, and the duke of Bretagne repreſented to him, that, if he ſuffered the French princes to be oppreſſed, the king of France would become ſo potent, as could not but prove fatal to England; but he ſo managed, as to give equal hopes to both the parties. Indeed, it was, by no means, his intereſt to engage, in their quarrels, and create new enemies, when the Lancaſtrian party, tho' humbled, were ſtill very numerous, in England; and this is the real motive of his cautious conduct; and, to keep affairs, upon the ſame footing, till farther diſcoveries could be made, he concluded a ſhort truce with France, and another with the duke of Bretagne. Edward, in managing the king of France, alſo expected to haſten the concluſion of the match propoſed, between Margaret, Edward keeps fair with the king of France, and with his enemies.

1466. Margaret, his ſiſter, and the earl of Charolois; for he was ſenſible, that, the leſs inclined he ſeemed to break with Lewis XI, the duke of Burgundy and his ſon would be the more deſirous of forwarding the marriage; and, indeed, his policy fully anſwered his expectation. He no ſooner found them, thus, diſpoſed, than, he was ready to enter into engagements with them; for he had an averſion to Lewis, as knowing that he was not beloved by him; moreover, he conſidered, that the king of France's proceedings were inſincere, and that, at one time or other, he would ſhew his reſentment. Beſides, it was againſt the intereſt of England, to ſuffer the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne to be ruined, which manifeſtly appeared to be Lewis's grand deſign; wherefore, October the 23d, he ſigned a treaty of perſonal alliance, amity, and friendſhip with the earl of Charolois; and, a few days after, he ſent a ſafe-conduct to Lewis of Bruges, lord of Gruthuyſe, appointed by the duke of Burgundy, to treat with him about a perpetual peace, and ſettle the articles of the marriage of the earl of Charolois, with the princeſs Margaret.

The duke of Bretagne is hard preſſed. Commin.

All this, in appearance, tended to a league, between Edward and the duke of Burgundy, for the duke of Bretagne's defence, who was vigorouſly preſſed; for, ſince the duke of Berry's expulſion out of Normandy, the duke of Bretagne had undertaken to ſupport him, and cauſe the treaty of Conflans to be put in execution. This was projected by him and the earl of Charolois, who engaged to make a powerful diverſion, in Picardy; but, unfortunately for the duke of Bretagne, the duke of Burgundy was employed in a war with the Liegeois, which hindered the earl of Charolois from performing his promiſe. In the interim, Lewis XI. extremely preſſed the duke of Bretagne, who, being unable to withſtand him alone, encouraged him to hope, that he would comply with his will; but this was only to gain time, till he ſhould he ſhould be reinforced by the duke of Burgundy. At length, the war with Liege being ſuſpended by a truce, the earl of Charolois prepared to march into Picardy; but, when leaſt expected, Lewis, by his ſecret practices, cauſed the Liegeois to take up arms again. Thus, the duke of Bretagne was ſtill greatly diſtreſſed; yet he did all that was poſſible, to defend himſelf, in expectation of ſpeedy aſſiſtance.

Edward's alliance with Caſtile and Denmark. Act. Pub.

In the mean while, Edward concluded a treaty of perpetual alliance, with the king of Caſtile; but he had done the ſame, with the king of Denmark, the beginning of this year; which alliances, tho' they were inconſiderable, with reſpect to his principal affairs, procured him reputation, and rendered him more formidable to his enemies.

1467. The negotiations with Lewis and the duke of Burgundy.

The firſt part of 1467 was entirely ſpent, in negotiations with France and the duke of Burgundy; the latter of whom only waited the end of the war with Liege, to give all his forces to his ſon, to prevent the duke of Bretagne's ruin; who, having already loſt his towns, in Lower-Normandy, found himſelf upon the point of being attacked, in his own country. On the other hand, Lewis, ſparing no coſt, to have good ſpies, was informed of what paſſed, between Edward and the duke of Burgundy, and evidently perceived, that their union tended to the duke of Bretagne's defence; and, as he ſtill deſigned to ruin that prince, he exerted himſelf, to divert Edward from any engagements with his enemies. With this view, in February, 1467, he ſent the baſtard of Bourbon into England; and, in June, the archbiſhop of Narbonne. Edward, pretending to be entirely diſengaged, forthwith, appointed commiſſioners, to treat with theſe ambaſſadors; but, as it is eaſy to gain time, in ſuch negotiations, nothing was concluded; and, in the interim, Lewis was afraid to diſtreſs the duke of Bretagne, leſt he ſhould oblige Edward to delare for him. 1467.

The death of the duke of Burgundy.

This was the ſtate of affairs, between thoſe two princes, when the duke of Burgundy died, the 15th of June, in the 72d year of his age; and Charles, earl of Charolois, his only ſon, whom, henceforward, I ſhall call duke of Burgundy, ſucceeded him, in all his dominions; who would have, directly, poſted to aſſiſt the duke of Bretagne, had he not been detained by the war with Liege. In the mean while, Lewis ſent and offered the new duke of Burgundy, to abandon the Liegeois, whom he had, hitherto, aided, provided he would, in return, deſert the duke of Bretagne; and, if Charles had accepted this propoſal, the duke of Bretagne would have been irrecoverably loſt, ſince there was now a French army of 30,000 men, in the heart of his country; but he bravely rejected it, declaring that, at all hazards, he would aſſiſt the duke of Bretagne, to the utmoſt of his power. He reſolved, as ſoon as the war with Liege was over, to throw himſelf into Picardy; and he did not doubt, that Edward would declare againſt France, when he found himſelf ſecure of being ſo ſtrongly ſupported. The very day of his father's death, he ratified his alliance with Edward; and the new bond, by which they were going to be farther united, viz. his marriage, then upon the point of concluſion, ſeemed to promiſe him, that he ſhould never want the aſſiſtance of England; whilſt the duke of Bretagne, fearing to be oppreſſed, before the arrival of the ſuccours, put Lewis in hopes of all the ſatisfaction he deſired, and ſo obtained a truce that gave him ſome reſpite.

The queen's relations are in great credit, at court. Biondi. Habington.

During theſe tranſactions, in France, conſiderable alterations were made, in the court of England, which, at laſt, occaſioned great commotions; for the queen's relations daily increaſed, in favour with the king; and the earl of Warwick with his brothers, who had been ſo potent, were little regarded. The archbiſhop of York was ſtill chancellor; but he, at length, was removed, to make way for the biſhop of Bath and Wells, one of the queen's moſt zealous adherents. The earl of Warwick was no longer employed, as before, in affairs of importance; for, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, his name is not found, after the middle of this year; but, as for the marqueſs 1467. queſs of Montague, his brother, governor of the northern counties, ſince there was no danger from Scotland, he was continued in that poſt; moreover, Edward had leſs inclination to diſpleaſe him, becauſe, in the decline of his family's credit, he behaved with more circumſpection than his brothers. On the other hand, the earl of Rivers, the queen's father, was promoted to the office of lord treaſurer; and he was alſo made high-conſtable, upon the voluntary, or forced, reſignation of the earl of Worceſter, whom the king requited, by making him lieutenant, in Ireland, under the duke of Clarence. Thus, the earl of Rivers held, at once, two of the greateſt offices of the crown; beſides, his ſon, Anthony Woodville, had a grant of the reverſion of the high-conſtableſhip; and, probably, it was about this time that the earl of Warwick retired from court, and the archbiſhop of York went and reſided upon his dioceſe.

The earl of Warwick withdraws from court.

It was extremely difficult for a man of the earl of Warwick's character, to ſuffer ſuch a diſgrace, without reſentment; who was the proudeſt lord that had ever been, in England; and his natural pride was ſtill increaſed by the ſignal ſervices he had done the king. The king, by marrying, in England, without his knowledge, at the very time he employed him, at Paris, to negotiate another marriage, which too was concluded, had highly incenſed him; and the contempt that Edward ſhewed him, at his return from France, in not making him ſome civil excuſe, had exceedingly inflamed his diſguſt. To this was added an extreme indignation, to ſee his credit entirely ſunk; and, in fine, the favours, heaped upon the queen's relations, racked him with envy, and puſhed him upon the moſt violent reſolutions. If we may believe certain hiſtorians, he had yet a ſtronger reaſon, to deteſt Edward; viz. becauſe Edward attempted the chaſtity of one of his daughters; and this prince's character, who was not very ſcrupulous, in that reſpect, renders it probable; but, however this be, the earl mortally hated Edward, tho' he concealed his averſion, in order to ſhew it effectually. It is certain, that the king, who was no ſtranger to his temper, committed, a great error, in not giving him ſome ſatisfaction, or in not ruining him entirely; for policy requires, that one of theſe courſes ſhould be taken, with perſons of ſuch a diſpoſition. The continuator of Monſtrelet affirms, that, in June, 1467, the earl of Warwick met Lewis XI, at Roan, and ſtaid with him, 12 days; and, if ſo, it may be preſumed, that, being ſent into France, upon the king's affairs, he took that opportunity, to ſecure Lewis's protection, and concert meaſures with him, about the execution of his project, to dethrone the king.

He goes and makes Lewis his friend.

1468. In the interim, the negotiation of the marriage of Edward's ſiſter with the duke of Burgundy ſtill continued, whilſt Edward kept Lewis in hopes of concluding a perpetual peace with him; but it was only to amuſe him, and haſten, at the ſame time, the marriage of the princeſs, his ſiſter. However, leſt his ambaſſy to Paris might give ſome ſuſpicion to the duke of Burgundy, he iſſued out a proclamation, expreſly ordering the coaſts to be well-guarded, as ſoon as the truce with France, that was to end, in March, ſhould be expired; and, ſoon after, the marriage was, at laſt, concluded, and Margaret ſent to Bruges, with a ſplendid retinue, being attended by the ducheſſes of Exeter and Suffolk. There the nuptials were ſolemnized, in a very magnificent manner; and, the ſame day, the truce of commerce, between England and the duke of Burgundy's dominions, was prolonged, for 30 years.

1468. The duke of Burgundy's marriage is ſolemnized.

The reſt of the winter was ſpent, in negotiating an alliance, between Edward and the duke of Bretagne; which was ſtrongly ſollicited by the duke of Burgundy, becauſe he was ſo incumbered with the war of Liege, that it was impoſſible for him to aſſiſt his ally; but this affair was clogged with difficulties, ſince it was to paſs from a long war, between England and Bretagne, to a ſtrict alliance. All that could be done, at firſt, was to prolong the truce, till July; after which, Edward and the duke of Bretagne ſent each other letters patent, promiſing mutual aſſiſtance, to the utmoſt of their power; and the duke of Burgundy ſent the like to the king, to induce him, the ſooner, to declare againſt France. Indeed, it was of the greateſt conſequence to him to prevent the duke of Bretagne's ruin, and procure the duke of Berry a ſettlement, which might enable him to keep the king, his brother, in awe; for he was almoſt certain, that, after Lewis had diſabled theſe two princes from hurting him, he would not fail to attack him, with all his forces. On the other hand, Edward ſaw but too plainly, how prejudicial Lewis's growth of power might be to him; and, therefore, by his orders, his commiſſioners ſigned, the 2d of July, a treaty of commerce with Bretagne; and, the next day, a levy of troops was ordered, for the aſſiſtance of that duchy. In the beginning of Auguſt, he ſent ambaſſadors to France, under the pretence of treating with Lewis, of a perpetual peace; and yet, two days after, he ſigned a treaty, by which he engaged to ſend the duke of Bretagne an aid of 3000 archers. As the duke was preſſed by the king of France, it was neceſſary to forward that affair, as well on his own, as on the part of Edward, without ſtanding too much upon terms; and, the fleet and troops, intended for Bretagne, being ready, in the beginning of October, the king gave the command to Anthony Woodville, lord Scales, his brother-in-law.

Negotiations with the duke of Bretagne. Act. Pub.

Whilſt theſe affairs were negotiating, at London, the dukes of Berry and Bretagne were extremely embarraſſed; for, the truce granted them by Lewis being about to expire, the duke of Burgundy was too remote, and too buſy, elſewhere, for them to hope to be delivered, by his means; and, as for the ſuccours expected from England, they were neither ſpeedy, nor ſufficient, to free them from their danger. In the interim, the duke of Burgundy made all poſſible haſte, to end the war with the Liegeois; at laſt, he found means 1468. means to force his enemies to a battle, wherein he obtained a compleat victory, that obliged them to ſue for peace; and, no ſooner was the treaty ſigned, than he marched for Picardy. Being arrived upon the Somme, ready to enter upon action, he heard, that the dukes of Berry and Bretagne had made a peace with the king of France; and that after renouncing all foreign alliance, the duke of Berry was contented with an appenage of 6000 livres a year, in land, and an annual penſion of 60,000, in lieu of Normandy, granted him by the treaty of Conflans. This news, which Lewis ſent him, by an expreſs, was the moſt unwelcome; yet, without being diſcouraged with this unexpected accident, he reſolved to remain encamped, where he was; hoping that, as the duke of Bretagne had been forced to a peace, he would repent of what he had done, when he found himſelf ſupported, and eaſily find an excuſe to break it; and this he, in ſo many words, told thoſe who adviſed him, to ſue to the king of France, for peace.

Lewis, upon the duke of Burgundy's reſolution, was afraid, that the dukes of Berry and Bretagne would recede, when they ſaw aſſiſtance ſo near; in which caſe, he might expect to deal with the king of England, the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, and many of the moſt powerful lords of the kingdom, who were diſſatisfied with him. In this uneaſineſs, he departed from Paris, into Picardy, to treat with the duke of Burgundy; and he had all the ſucceſs he deſired; for the duke, uncertain what ſteps the duke of Bretagne might take, agreed to retire, for 400,000 crowns, which Lewis gave him, to defray his expences. Hitherto, Lewis had reaſon to be ſatisfied, having diſperſed the league made againſt him, and reduced the duke, his brother, to a moderate appenage; yet he ſtill reſolved to ruin the duke of Bretagne, that he might, afterwards, more ſafely attack the other peers, and even the duke of Burgundy; and his ardent deſire, to execute this firſt project, led him to be guilty of the groſſeſt fault, that could poſſibly be committed by ſuch a politick prince. After ſigning the treaty with the duke of Burgundy, he would go and have an interview with him; fancying that he ſhould be able to perſuade that prince, to relinquiſh the intereſts of the duke of Bretagne; at leaſt, he hoped to ſow jealouſies between them, from which he could not fail to reap great advantages. With this view, he demanded of the duke a ſafe-conduct to meet him, at Peronne; and, as ſoon as he received it, he repaired to that town, with a ſlender retinue, the more effectually to gain the duke, by that extraordinary confidence; but, before his departure, he had not recalled the ambaſſadors ſent to the Liegeois, to perſuade them to break the peace with the duke of Burgundy, upon his aſſurance of a powerful aid. This was ſufficient to excite the people to take up arms again; and the duke was informed of it, at Peronne, the ſame, or the next day, after the king's arrival. A proceeding, ſo contrary to good faith, convincing the duke, that Lewis's ſole ſtudy was to deceive him, he even impriſoned him, in the caſtle of Peronne, where he was lodged, and detained him ſeveral days, at a loſs what to reſolve; and Lewis, judging of his enemy by himſelf, was in mortal agonies. As he had no proſpect of eſcaping, he was obliged to ſubmit to the duke's terms; but that prince treated him, in a more generous manner, than he could have expected. After a very ſhort negotiation, it was agreed, that the king ſhould give Champagne and Brie to his brother, inſtead of Normandy, which was granted him by the treaty of Conflans, and ſhould accompany the duke, in the war with Liege; and, a few days after, they departed towards the territories of Liege; where Lewis had the mortification to be a witneſs of the deſtruction of the capital, which he had prepoſterouſly thrown into that misfortune; but, at laſt, he eſcaped out of the duke of Burgundy's hands, after having been under continual apprehenſions, either of loſing his life, or undergoing a grievous captivity, to the day of his death. In the interim, he had no inclination really to execute the treaty made, at Peronne; and he, afterwards, found means to evade it.

1468. Lewis being made priſoner, ſubmits to hard terms. Commin.

Lewis puts himſelf imprudently in the power of the duke of Burgundy.

It is time, now, to leave the foreign affairs, to reſume thoſe of England, where a more affecting ſcene will preſent itſelf to the reader's view; and the variety of the events renders this part of Edward's reign extremely remarkable. The 20th of October, Edward renewed the antient alliance, between England and Arragon; which treaty the Engliſh hiſtorians place, in 1466; tho', in the Collection of the Publick Acts, it is dated, October 20, 1468; but, probably, they have confounded the aliiance with Caſtile, in 1466, with that which was renewed, two years after, with Arragon. It is ſaid, that Edward, upon this occaſion, ſent the king of Arragon a preſent of ſome ewes and rams; which ſo multiplied, in Spain, that it proved very detrimental to the wool-trade of England.

Edward's alliance with Arragon. Act. Pub.

About the end of the year 1468, or the beginning of 1469, the earl of Warwick believed himſelf in a condition to execute his project againſt Edward; who, ſince he left the court, was forgotten, unleſs it was neceſſary to ſend him orders, concerning his government of Calais. If he went to France, the preceding year, as Monſtrelet's continuator affirms, it is, to the laſt degree, probable, that he communicated his deſigns to Lewis XI, and concerted meaſures with him accordingly; but, ſuppoſing he had ſtaid, in England, it was eaſy to treat with that prince, by ſecret emiſſaries. However this be, the earl, paſſionately deſiring to ſhew, that he was not to be offended, with impunity, judged it expedient to begin, with gaining his two brothers, the archbiſhop of York and the marqueſs of Montague; and he repreſented to them the ſervices they had all three done the king, and the king's ingratitude, ſince their rewards bore no proportion to their deſerts; that, not ſatisfied with being ungrateful to all their family, he had highly affronted him, in particular, in the affair of his marriage; and that he had likewiſe attempted to 1469. disgrace their family, in a manner insupportable to men of honour. In fine, after many other considerations, to demonstrate the king's ingratitude, he told them, that he was resolved to do all that was possible, to convince him, that he, who had raised him to the throne was able to pull him down; and, for the execution of this design, he desired their advice and assistance. The archbishop of York was very easily induced to follow his brother's passion; but the marquess of Montague alledged arguments and objections against it, which the earl of Warwick answered, with great vehemence; and, tho', at last, he was prevailed with, the marquess intimated, that it was more out of complaisance to his brother than inclination.

He engages the duke of Clarence in the same design. Hall.

Upon this first step, the earl of Warwick addressed himself to the duke of Clarence, the eldest of the king's brothers; being sensible that the duke was dissatisfied, that the king, his brother, had done nothing for him, except the giving him an empty title which he did not want; and that, besides, he had seen, with extreme jealousy, the lord Scales, the queen's brother, married to the richest heiress in the kingdom, without the least thought of procuring him such a beneficial match. The earl of Warwick, concluding from these considerations, that the duke would gladly embrace an opportunity of being revenged, imparted to him his design; and the duke, impatiently desirous of being revenged, for the little affection shewn to him by the king, readily entered into the plot; but, the, better to confirm him in this resolution, the earl of Warwick promised him his eldest daughter in marriage, with a very considerable fortune. All the historians agree, that, presently after this conference, they went together to Calais, where the nuptials were solemnized; but they do not say, whether it was privately, or with the king's consent. What they add, that the duke and the earl continued, at Calais, till the insurrection, mentioned hereafter, must necessarily be false; because it appears from several papers, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that they were, in England, most part of this year, before the insurrection, and even in the king's favour, who had no suspicion of their plot; nay, he seems to have repented of his great neglect of the earl of Warwick, since, on the 17th of August, he made him justiciary of South-Wales, and, some time after, seneschal of the whole country.

An insurrection is raised, in Yorkshire, by Warwick's friends. Hall. Hollingsh.

In spite of these favours, the earl of Warwick's projects began to be put in execution; for, in the beginning of October, there was a sedition, in Yorkshire, which all the historians unanimously ascribe to the secret practices of the marquess of Montague and his brother, the archbishop of York. There was, at York, an hospital, to the maintenance of which the whole county had always contributed; yet without being obliged. In time, these voluntary contributions were changed into a kind of right, entirely founded upon custom, and for which collectors were appointed; but they, who had been bribed, to excite the people, industriously spread a report, that the contributions were misapplied, and served only to inrich the directors of the hospital; and that, the hospital being sufficiently endowed, these collections were unnecessary; upon which, the country people took fire, as if it had been an affair of the utmost importance. They assembled, to the number of 15000; and, killing some of the collectors, they marched towards York, under the command of Robert Huldern. The marquess of Montague, who resided, at York, no sooner heard of it, than, assembling a body of the citizens, he sallied out upon the rebels, slew a great many, and, taking their leader, ordered him to be beheaded; which conduct would give occasion to presume, that the sedition was not raised by himself, had not his after proceedings been less ambigous. 1469.

Pembroke is ordered to raise an army, in Wales.

The first rumour of this commotion alarmed the king, tho' indeed, the cause was not very important; but, knowing how numerous the Lancastrian party still were, he was confident, that it was raised by some lord, attached to that house. However, he was very far from suspecting his brother and the earl of Warwick to be the principal authors; yet, whatever the event might be, he dispatched orders to the earl of Pembroke, governor of Wales, to draw together all the forces of those parts, and keep himself in a readiness to march. In the interim, the Yorkshire malecontents, rather animated than dispirited, at the ill success of their first attempt, took up arms again, and set at their head Henry, son to the lord Fitz-Hugh, and Henry Neville, son to the lord Latimer. These two young leaders had very little experience; but they were directed by Sir John Conyers, a person of great courage and conduct, and thoroughly versed in the art of war. Their first project was, to make themselves masters of York; but, suddenly altering their resolution and rout, they marched towards London, not, in the least, doubting, that their army would increase, by the way, as it really happened. Then it appeared, that the affair of York hospital was only made use of, as a handle to stir up the people; for the hospital afforded the seditious no manner of pretence to take the rout to London.

The earl of Pembroke goes out to meet them, and is joined by the lord Stafford. Hall. Habington

In the mean while, the earl of Pembroke, having drawn together about 10,000 men, began his march, in quest of the male-contents; and he was joined, on the road, by the lord Stafford, with 800 archers. The two armies approaching each other, the earl of Pembroke sent Sir Richard Herbert, his brother, with a detachment, to take as near a view of the enemy, as possible; who, being a very able officer, executed his orders, with great conduct, without exposing himself to be attacked, However, his men, who wanted his experience, preposterously fancying, that he would lose a fair opportunity, to defeat the enemies, against his will, fell upon their rear; but Conyers, having foreseen it, was so well prepared, that the detachment, with a great loss, was entirely routed.

Edward,

1469. Edward, hearing this news, wrote to the earl of Pembroke, not to be diſcouraged, for ſuch an inconſiderable loſs, aſſuring him, that he would come, in perſon, and join him, or ſend a ſtrong reinforcement; whilſt the ſeditious, perceiving they had near them an army, which might daily increaſe, and fearing to meet the king, in the way, determined to retire to Warwick, where, in all probability, the leaders knew, that they ſhould be received; but the earl of Pembroke, impatient to be revenged, marched, directly, towards them, and obliged them to halt, near Banbury, where the two armies incamped, at a ſmall diſtance one from another. In the interim, the earl of Pembroke and the lord Stafford quarrelling, about an inn, Stafford withdrew, in the night, with his 800 archers; and, on the morrow, at break of day, the male-contents marched, in good order, to attack the king's army. They had heard by deſerters of the lord Stafford's retreat, and were reſolved to improve it; but Henry Neville, one of their generals, advancing with an intent to engage, leſt the royaliſts ſhould retire, was fiercely repulſed, made priſoner, and ſlain, in cold blood. This barbarity inſpiring the northern men with a ſort of fury, they ruſhed upon their enemies; and, notwithſtanding the bravery of Sir Richard Herbert, who performed, that day, actions extolled by all the hiſtorians, the king's army was routed. The earl of Pembroke and his brothers fell into the power of the conquerors, who, carrying them to Banbury, ordered their heads to be ſtruck off, in revenge for the death of Sir Henry Neville, after which, the male-contents proceeded on their march to Warwick. Hitherto, the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence had not declared themſelves; and, perhaps, they were gone, ſome time before, to Calais, to avoid the ſuſpicion of being concerned in the inſurrection, if it miſcarried, and to improve it, in caſe of ſucceſs.

The king's army defeated, and the earl of Pembroke beheaded.

Biondi.

A few days after the battle of Banbury, the people of Northamptonſhire, imitating the example of the Yorkſhire men, aſſembled, in great numbers, under Robert of Riddiſdale; and this multitude, which daily increaſed, tumultuouſly aſſaulting Grafton, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Rivers, the queen's father, ſeized the earl, and conducted him to Northampton, where he was beheaded, without any form of law.

The Northamptonſhire mutineers behead the earl of Rivers. Hollingſh.

On the contrary, the king, juſtly incenſed with the lord Stafford, for abandoning the earl of Pembroke, upon a frivolous quarrel, and thereby occaſioning the loſs of the battle of Banbury, commanded him to be publickly beheaded.

The lord Stafford is beheaded. Hall.

The death of the earl of Rivers ſhould, one would imagine, have convinced the king, that the earl of Warwick, tho' abſent, was the real author of theſe commotions; if the march of the male-contents, towards London, and the battle of Banbury had not been ſufficient to make him ſuſpect it. Warwick was an avowed enemy to the earl of Rivers, and was angry with the king; and the male-contents had been received into Warwick, without the leaſt oppoſition. In a word, theſe people had no reaſon to take up arms againſt Edward, on account of York-hoſpital, if they had not been ſecretly encouraged by ſome powerful enemy of the king, who could be no other than the earl of Warwick; for there was not, then, in England, any prince of the houſe of Lancaſter, or any lord of that party, to cauſe theſe inſurrections. As Edward, therefore, could not be ignorant of the diſcontent and great credit of the earl of Warwick and his brothers, he ought to have naturally concluded, that they were the ſecret authors; and yet, tho' the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that the earl of Rivers was put to death, before the 16th of November, the king did not clearly diſcern, till the following March, that he had to deal with the earl of Warwick! Strange and inconceivable blindneſs!

Act. Pub.

The ſeverity of the ſeaſon interrupted, for ſome time, the civil war lately kindled; moreover, the king wanted leiſure to make preparations; and, on the other hand, the male-contents, having yet no declared head, continued quiet, in expectation of more particular directions.

1470. The war ceaſes, during the winter.

During the winter, Lewis XI. ſent ambaſſadors into England, under the pretence of renewing the truce; but, probably, his ſole view was to be perfectly informed of the ſtate of affairs, in that kingdom; and, at the ſame time, Edward, in order to ſtrengthen his alliance with the duke of Burgundy, ſent him the order of the Garter, which that prince received, at Bruges, the 4th of February, with great ſolemnity.

An ambaſſy from France. Act. Pub.

If the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick were, at Calais, during the late troubles, in all likelihood, they did not return to England, till about February, 1470; for they are not mentioned, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſince Auguſt, the preceding year. Edward was ſo far from ſuſpecting them, after their return, that, on the 7th of March, he ſent them, jointly, a commiſſion to levy troops againſt the rebels, in the north; and, ſeven days after, he promoted the earl of Worceſter to the office of high-conſtable, vacant by the death of the earl of Rivers.

But it was not long, before the king's eyes were fully opened, with reſpect to the duke, his brother, and the earl of Warwick; who levied troops, by vertue of his commiſſion, but not for his ſervice; and the rebels did not ſcruple to own them, for their heads. Thus, both ſides were preparing, more than ever, to renew the war. In the interim, Edward was ſo prepoſſeſſed, that his brother and the earl of Warwick durſt not appear before him, that he believed their deſign was to retire into Ireland, of which the duke of Clarence was lieutenant; and, in this belief, he publiſhed a proclamation, dated, March the 23d, prohibiting the Iriſh to obey the duke, his brother, and commanding them to apprehend him, as well as the earl of Warwick, if they came there; moreover, he promiſed any perſon, 1470. ſon, that ſhould take them, either a penſion of 1000 l. ſterling, or 10,000 l. in money. By the ſame proclamation, he conferred the government of Ireland upon the earl of Worceſter; and, three days after, he iſſued out orders to levy troops, in all the counties under his obedience, which was very punctually performed.

The duke and earl levy troops, and join.

But the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick were ſo far from having any thoughts of retiring into Ireland, that they were very intent upon raiſing troops, each in different quarters; and, at laſt, hearing the king was preparing to march againſt them, they judged it proper to join, leſt, by remaining ſeparate, they ſhould give him too great an advantage; ſo that Edward, when he marched, to attack them, found them ready to expect him, and reſolved to decide the quarrel, by a battle. However, the uncertainty of the event keeping both ſides equally in ſuſpence, ſome of the moſt prudent lords interpoſed, to negotiate an agreement, before it came to a deciſion, by arms; and the king paſſionately deſired it, being ſenſible that he ſhould hazard his crown, by the loſs of a battle, whereas the victory could procure him no great advantage. On the other hand, he flattered himſelf, that the earl of Warwick, perceiving him to be in ſo good a poſture, would be glad to get clear of his preſent ill ſituation, by an honourable compoſition; and, therefore, imagining that the negotiation would infallibly prove ſucceſsful, he did not take the uſual precautions, for the defence of his camp, contrary to the moſt conſtant maxim of war, that a man ſhould never act, with more circumſpection, than whilſt he is in treaty.

The earl of Warwick attacks the king unawares, and takes him priſoner. Hall.

In the interim, the earl of Warwick, being informed of the king's negligence, after uſing all poſſible care, to prevent his deſign from being diſcovered, marched, in the night, directly into the king's camp, and, ſuddenly attacking it, put it in the utmoſt confuſion; and Edward, ſurpriſed, like all the reſt of his army, found himſelf in the hands of his enemies, before he could take any meaſures, for his defence, or eſcape. The earl no ſooner had him in his power, than he cauſed him to be conducted to Warwick; and he, afterwards, ordered him to be removed to Middleham caſtle, under the cuſtody of his brother, the archbiſhop of York, who was no leſs concerned, than he, carefully to guard ſuch a priſoner.

This accident ſeemed to have compleated the war; and, indeed, Edward being a captive, in all appearance, nothing could oppoſe the two victorious lords; wherefore, entirely relying on their good fortune, they disbanded moſt of their troops, as having no occaſion for them, after this deciſion. It only remained to reſolve, how the government ſhould be ſettled: for we do not find, that they had any inclination to reſtore Henry to the throne; but an unexpected event, no leſs aſtoniſhing than what had juſt happened, diſconcerted all their meaſures. Edward being confined, in Middleham caſtle, under the cuſtody of the archbiſhop of York, by his obliging behaviour to that prelate, obtained leave, with a ſmall guard, to hunt, now and then, in the park; and, this point being gained, he prevailed with one of his guards, to deliver a letter to two gentlemen of the neighbourhood, in which he pointed out to them, how they might free him from his preſent captivity. The gentlemen, overjoyed at an opportunity to do the king ſo great ſervice, privately aſſembled their friends, and, lying in ambuſh near the park, eaſily carried him off; and, Edward, being at liberty, contrary to all expectation, immediately, repaired to York; but he ſoon left that city, whether he ſuſpected the inhabitants, or thought it more convenient to be nearer London. However this be, he made haſte into Lancaſhire, where he found the lord Haſtings, his chamberlain, who had aſſembled ſome troops; and then, taking a compaſs, to deceive the vigilance of the earl of Warwick, he went directly to London, where he was received, without any reſiſtance; for the earl of Warwick ſo little expected ſuch a ſudden turn, that he had neglected to ſecure the metropolis. 1470.

He makes his eſcape, and comes to London.

We may eaſily conceive the earl of Warwick's ſurprize, when he received this fatal news; ſuch was the imprudence of his brother, the archbiſhop, that he could not help ſuſpecting him of bribery; but, as it was not, then, proper to examine his conduct, he thought only of re-aſſembling his ſcattered troops, which could not be done, in a few days. Edward alſo was in no leſs confuſion, being without an army; ſo that, how deſirous ſoever both were to decide their quarrel, by a battle, they were obliged to wait, till their forces were aſſembled. In the mean while, ſome peaceable lords propoſed to renew the negotiation begun, before the king's impriſonment; and, the propoſal being accepted, the mediators judged, that an interview, between the king and the two chiefs of the oppoſite party, might be conducive to a peace. In this belief, they ſo managed, that the latter came to Weſtminſter, upon the king's ſafe conduct; but the conference proved ineffectual, being wholly ſpent in mutual reproaches.

A conference at Weſtminſter, of no effect. Hall.

Preſently after this interview, both parties prepared for war. The earl of Warwick commiſſioned Sir Robert Wells, ſon to the lord Wells, to levy troops, in Lincolnſhire, which he performed, without any difficulty, by reaſon of his family's intereſt in thoſe parts; but Edward, having intelligence of it, ſent an expreſs order to the lord Wells, to come immediately to court; deſigning to oblige him to uſe his authority, to perſuade his ſon to abandon the rebels. The lord Wells, upon his arrival at London, hearing how much the king was incenſed againſt his ſon, and dreading to feel himſelf the effects of his reſentment, took ſanctuary, in Weſtminſter-abbey; but, the king ſending him a ſafe-conduct, he, forthwith, came to court. He even wrote to his ſon, enjoining him to forſake the earl of Warwick's party, and diſmiſs his troops; but the ſon refuſed to obey. Edward, enraged at this diſappointment,

The lord Wells's ſon raiſes troops for Warwick. Hall.

1470. disappointment, ordered the lord Wells to be beheaded, with Sir Thomas Dymock, his brother-in-law, who had accompanied him; and, probably, he believed them guilty of connivance.

The king defeats young Wells, and beheads him.

This violent action was very injurious to Edward's reputation; and it inspired young Wells with a desire of revenge, which occasioned his own ruin, and was extremely prejudicial to the earl of Warwick's affairs. The king, finding that Wells's troops visibly increased, determined to fight him, before he was joined by the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick, who were raising men, in other counties; and Wells was encamped, near Stamford, where he might easily have retired; but he was so impatient, to revenge his father's death, that he resolved to expect the king. He fought with an undaunted valour, as long as he was supported by his troops; and, at last, perceiving that victory declared for the king, he would have provoked his enemies to kill him; but they refused him that favour, and spared his life, only to make him lose it, a few days after, on the scaffold. In this battle, Edward gained a compleat victory over his enemies, of whom 10,000 were slain *.

Clarence and Warwick retire into France.

Sir Robert Wells's defeat broke all the measures of the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick, who were not yet ready; tho' the king was now marching, to attack them. In this extremity, having no other remedy, they embarqued, in order to screen themselves from the impending danger. The earl of Warwick took his two daughters with him, the eldest of whom, wife to the duke of Clarence, was ready to lye-in; and he intended to retire to his government of Calais, where he had left, for his lieutenant, Vauclair, a Gascoign captain, in whose fidelity he entirely confided; but, how great was his astonishment, when, approaching Calais, he saw the canon fired at him! He attempted to move Vauclair by the consideration of the duchess of Clarence's case, who was just delivered, in the ship, of a prince, named Edward; but all he could obtain was a present of two bottles of wine, for the duchess. In the interim, Vauclair took care to send this small present, by a trusty messenger, who told the earl of Warwick from him, that he was still attached to him, tho' he was constrained to behave, in this manner, the better to serve him, because, if he entered the town, he would not be safe; but he might depend upon his fidelity. Edward, ignorant of the motive of Vauclair's proceedings, was so pleased with his conduct, that he gave him the government of Calais, to which the duke of Burgundy voluntarily added an annual pension of 1000 crowns.

Warwick, being, thus, repulsed, steered his course to Dieppe, where he safely landed, with the duke of Clarence and his two daughters; and, a few days after, they departed, to wait upon the king of France, then at Amboise, by whom they were very civilly received. Lewis, as I, before, observed, would not concern himself with the affairs of England, when Edward and Henry contended for the crown; but, seeing the strict alliance, between Edward and the duke of Burgundy, he found it equally his interest to labour the ruin of both; and to this reason of state was added the desire of revenging the affront, put upon him by Edward, on account of his marriage. In a word, the aid, which Edward would have given the duke of Bretagne, evidently shewed, that, whilst he was on the throne, the French princes would always find in him a protector. All these reasons together determined Lewis, not only to receive the fugitive English, but also to promise them a powerful aid; for nothing could be more agreeable to him, and, at the same time, more advantageous, than to see the civil war rekindled, in England. Nay, it is highly probable, that he had already taken private measures, with the earl of Warwick; and that the earl would never have ventured to declare against Edward, had he not been secure of this assistance; but, however this be, an opportunity naturally offering, to create Edward, in his own country, troubles, that would prevent his interposing, in the affairs of his neighbours, he sent for queen Margaret to court, who, some years since, was retired to the king of Sicily, her father. The earl of Warwick had been author of all that princess's misfortunes; and he, on his part, considered her, as his mortal enemy; and yet Lewis very easily reconciled them; for their common interest required them to stifle their animosity. At present, they could hardly proceed, without each other; for Warwick wanted a pretence, to dethrone the king, and could find none more plausible than Henry's restoration, which he could not effect, without being united with the queen; who, on the other hand, perceived this to be the only way, to restore the king, her husband, or rather herself, to the throne; and, beholding a ray of hope, from that quarter, she readily received her old enemy, for protector. Their reconciliation, therefore, was made, by the king of France's mediation, upon the following terms: That the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick should labour to restore Henry to the throne; that the queen should engage with an oath, to leave the government of the kingdom in their hands, during the king's life, and the prince his son's minority, if he should succeed to the crown, before he was of age; and, lastly, that, to strengthen their union, the prince of Wales should marry the earl of Warwick's youngest daughter. The last article was, immediately, executed; and, thus, the brother of king Edward became brother-in-law to the young prince of Lancaster, and the earl of Warwick was equally allied to both houses.

ſpies, at the court of France, hearing of theſe tranſactions, gave Edward warning; but this prince could never believe, that the earl of Warwick, who was forced to leave the kingdom, for want of ſupport, would be able, in his abſence, to cauſe the people to riſe, in his favour. As for the preparations, in France, he was altogether unconcerned at them, being ſenſible how difficult it is for a foreign nation to conquer England, if the people themſelves do not aſſiſt in the conqueſt. Thus, reaſoning upon very doubtful grounds, viz. the people's affection, and the earl of Warwick's little credit, he neglected his principal affair, to abandon himſelf to voluptuouſneſs and ſenſuality, to which he was extremely inclined.

Edward gains the duke of Clarence.

His greateſt uneaſineſs was to ſee the duke of Clarence, his brother, ſtrictly united with his enemies; which union had, already, been prejudicial, and might, in time, produce more fatal effects. In order, therefore, to gain his brother to his intereſt, he bribed one of the ducheſs of Clarence's women; and, inſtructing her, in the part ſhe was to act, granted her a paſſport, to go to her miſtreſs. This woman, departing for Paris, paſſed through Calais; where ſhe ſaw the governor, without telling him the ſecret. It was very fortunate for Edward, that Vauclair, who was devoted to the earl of Warwick, was not acquainted with the affair; for he would have fully diſcovered all. The woman, having acceſs to her miſtreſs, very artfully and ſucceſsfully diſcharged her commiſſion; who repreſented to the duke of Clarence, from the king, his brother, "That the courſe, he was taking, muſt "end in his own ruin; that, if the deſigns "he had formed, with the earl of Warwick, "ſhould ſucceed, to his wiſh, he could not "expect, that the houſe of Lancaſter would "place any confidence, in a prince of the "houſe of York, when there was no farther "occaſion for him; that his very life would "be in danger; that, inſtead of depending "on the queen's oath, he ought rather to "regard it, as a ſnare to ſurpriſe him; that "the earl of Warwick would be the firſt, to "oppreſs him, as well to free himſelf from a "collegue, in the government, as to be rid of "a prince, who might, one day, be in a "condition to revenge the injuries done to "his houſe: That, on the contrary, the "king, his brother, having only a young "daughter, whom death might eaſily ſnatch "out of the world, he was next heir to the "crown; but, upon the reſtoration of the "houſe of Lancaſter, he would loſe all hopes "of aſcending the throne, ſince Henry's ſon, "very poſſibly, would have a numerous iſſue." To theſe reaſons, which were very weighty, ſhe added motives drawn from the ties of blood, ſome excuſes from the king, and a poſitive promiſe, to conſider him, for the future, as his real brother, and the chief ſupport of their family. A man muſt have wanted common ſenſe, not to yield to ſuch convincing arguments; and the duke of Clarence perceiving, at laſt, his true intereſts, charged the woman to aſſure his brother, that he would declare for him, as ſoon as he could do it, with ſafety, and a probability of doing him conſiderable ſervice. Edward, being told how the duke of Clarence ſtood affected, grew perfectly eaſy, believing that the earl of Warwick's future attempts would prove abortive, when no longer ſeconded by the duke, his ſon-in-law. It muſt be confeſſed, that the earl of Warwick's policy was very extraordinary, in making the duke of Clarence an inſtrument, to ruin the king, his brother; for he muſt have ſuppoſed, that the duke would openly act againſt his own intereſt, which could not be expected from the moſt ſtupid of men; and, indeed, he found, when it was too late, that he had taken falſe meaſures.

The earl of Warwick comes into England.

Whilſt Edward lived in a deceitful ſecurity, the earl of Warwick prepared to return into England; being certain of finding a powerful party, joined by all the friends of the houſe of Lancaſter, whom he had taken care to acquaint with his deſign. Lewis XI. ſupplied him, tho' ſparingly, with money and troops; and, as far as can be judged, that monarch's ſole view was to foment diſcord among the Engliſh, to prevent their interpoſing in his affairs; for, ſtill perſiſting in his reſolution of ſubduing the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, he thought he could not ſucceed, ſo long as theſe two princes might expect the protection of England. In the interim, to facilitate the earl of Warwick's deſcent, he ordered the baſtard of Bourbon to convoy him, with ſome ſhips of war; but it was extremely difficult to paſs into England. The duke of Burgundy's fleet, much ſuperior to that of France, waited, in the mouth of the Seine, to engage the French, if they ſailed; and it was unlikely, that the baſtard of Bourbon would venture upon ſo unequal a fight. However, the earl of Warwick repaired to Havre de Grace, to be ready to embrace the firſt opportunity that ſhould offer; and this precaution was not in vain; for, ſome days after his arrival, a violent tempeſt ſo diſperſed the Flemiſh ſhips, that, not being able to keep the ſea, they were forced to retire to their ports. The ſtorm being over, the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick embarqued, and arrived, at Dartmouth; from whence they had paſſed into France, four or five months before.

Comming

The news of their arrival was ſo far from alarming Edward, that he rejoiced at it; for, being full of the notion, that it was impoſſible for the earl of Warwick to accompliſh his deſigns, he imagined that he could wiſh for nothing more beneficial, than to ſee his enemy come and ſurrender himſelf into his hands. He, therefore, deſired the duke of Burgundy to continue his fleet, at ſea, to hinder the earl of Warwick's eſcape; but the duke had quite different thoughts of this expedition. He could not believe, that a perſon of the earl of Warwick's penetration would have, thus, ventured, if he had not been ſure of a party, in England, capable of ſupporting him; and, indeed, Warwick had no ſooner landed his men, 1470. men, than he ſaw himſelf at the head of an army, which, in a few days, increaſed to 60,000. He, immediately, cauſed Henry VI. to be proclaimed; and he publiſhed an order, in his name, for all his ſubjects, from 16 to 60, to take up arms and expel the tyrant and uſurper.

Such an unexpected event opened Edward's eyes, and ſhewed him the folly of his expectations; and, in the mean while, he gave orders to levy troops, and appointed the rendezvous, about Nottingham. Some affirm, that his army was more numerous than the earl of Warwick's; but others ſay, that it was much inferior. Indeed, the latter is moſt probable; for, if Edward had been ſuperior, in number of troops, he would, doubtleſs, have marched to his enemies; whereas, upon their approach, he retired towards the ſea. The news he received, that the marqueſs of Montague, who commanded, in the north, had declared againſt him, gave him extreme uneaſineſs; for he was apprehenſive, that this defection would be followed by many others. He wanted to avoid a battle; but he knew not where to retire, being ignorant who were his real friends. At length, he encamped, near Lynn, a ſmall maritime town, in Lincolnſhire, and lodged, in the caſtle; which precaution, tho', perhaps, taken, without deſign, proved of remarkable ſervice. The earl of Warwick, coming, within three miles of his army, cauſed the cry of King Henry! King Henry! to be every-where reſounded; and the ſame cry, by ſome unknown practices, began alſo to be heard, in Edward's camp. Upon this, he commanded the caſtle-gates to be ſhut, and the bridge to be ſtrongly guarded, whilſt a council was held, to conſult about what was proper to be done; but the ſhoutings, which grew louder, in his army, not allowing him time to deliberate, he embarqued, with 4 or 500 of the moſt truſty men, on board three ſmall veſſels, that had ſerved, to bring proviſions for his army. The lord Haſtings placed himſelf in the rear, to withſtand the efforts of the ſoldiers, if they ſhould attempt to oppoſe the king's flight; and, when all were embarqued, he went himſelf on board one of the ſhips.

Edward embarques for Holland.

He is in danger of being taken by pyrates.

Edward, being reduced to this extremity, ordered his ſhips to ſteer for Holland, not knowing where to retire, except into the dominions of the duke of Burgundy, his brother-in-law; but, whilſt he was at ſea, his ſhips were deſcryed by eight corſairs of the Low-Countries or Germany, whom the Engliſh called Eaſterlings, becauſe their country lay eaſtward of England. Theſe corſairs, immediately, chaced the three ſhips; but as theſe were the lighteſt, they had time to get into Alcmar-road, at low-water, which prevented the corſairs from purſuing them any farther, not daring to come ſo near the ſhore; yet they anchored, in ſight, intending to attack them, at high-water. Edward had, now, no other refuge than to make ſignals, to implore the protection of the country; and, fortunately for him, the lord Gruthuyſe, whom I have mentioned, before, then governor of Holland, chanced to be, at Alcmar; and, being told, that theſe ſhips deſired aſſiſtance, he ſent a ſloop, to know what they were; but he no ſooner heard, that the king of England was there, than he ordered the corſairs, not to approach, on pain of incurring the duke his maſter's indignation. Theſe people, tho' ſo near their prey, durſt not diſobey; who too often wanted the governor's protection; and Gruthuyſe went himſelf, in a ſloop, to wait on the king, and paid him all the reſpect due to his quality. Edward, having no money, to reward the maſter of the veſſel that brought him over, made him a preſent of a rich robe lined with ſables; after which, he was conducted to the Hague, where Gruthuyſe bore his expences, till he had received the duke of Burgundy's orders. 1470.

In the interim, the queen, who was at London, hearing of the king's flight, took ſanctuary, in Weſtminſter-abbey, being followed by a great number of Yorkiſts; and there ſhe was delivered of a prince, named Edward, born heir to a noble kingdom, at the very time it was loſt by his father. Whilſt Edward's adherents were in the utmoſt conſternation, the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick, victorious, without drawing their ſwords, were marching to London, where they entered, in triumph, the beginning of October; and, on the 6th of that month, the earl of Warwick, attended by ſeveral lords and a great crowd of people, went to the tower, and releaſed king Henry, after a ſix years impriſonment.

Clarence and Warwick come to London, and free king Henry.

In the mean while, the populace of Kent, flocking together, marched directly to London, deſigning to inrich themſelves with the plunder of the city; but the earl of Warwick meeting them, with a part of his troops, eaſily repulſed this multitude, and ordered the moſt mutinous to be executed; yet he could not hinder their plundering Southwark, parted from the city by the Thames.

Henry is reſtored to the throne.

This tumult being appeaſed, Henry was ſolemnly proclaimed, as re-aſcending the throne; and, the next day, there was a proceſſion, at which the new king aſſiſted, with his crown on his head, being followed by an innumerable crowd of people, who, by their acclamations, ſhewed their approbation of the late revolution. Thus, the earl of Warwick had the honour of reſtoring Henry to the throne, whom he had formerly depoſed, and of dethroning Edward, who had been entirely raiſed, by his means; wherefore, he was commonly called, The King-maker.

The

The Reſtoration of HENRY VI.

1470. THE new king, or rather the earl of Warwick, who governed, in his name, firſt of all, took care to reſtore the marqueſs of Montague to the government of the northern counties, which Edward, having deprived him of it, had given to the duke of Glouceſter, his brother; and then a parliament was ſummoned, for the 26th of November, to confirm the late revolution. This was a neceſſary formality, to ſatisfy the people; tho' the parliament's confirmation was of no great weight, in an affair tranſacted, without it, and in which it could make no alteration. The ſame thing happened, when Edward was placed on the throne; and the contrary reſolutions of the parliaments, with reſpect to the quarrel, between the houſes of Lancaſter and York, evidently demonſtrate, that theſe aſſemblies were ſwayed by the events, which fell out, before their deliberations. It is in vain, therefore, to urge the authority of the parliaments, in ſupport of the rights of either of the houſes, ſince they had not the freedom to judge, according to their underſtandings; unleſs it is ſaid, that their underſtandings, on all occaſions, directed them to ſide with the ſtrongeſt.

A remark upon the parliaments.

Edward is declared a traytor and uſurper.

However this be, the parliament voted Edward a traytor and uſurper of the crown, confiſcated all his paternal eſtate, and annulled all the ſtatutes made, in his reign, as wanting a lawful authority.

An extraordinary act, to ſettle the ſucceſſion. Hall.

By another act, the crown was ſettled upon Henry VI, and his male heirs; but, in default of ſuch heirs, the crown was to deſcend to the houſe of York; namely, to the duke of Clarence and his heirs, Edward, eldeſt ſon to the late duke of York, being excluded, for his rebellion. This affords a large field, to expatiate upon the unlimited authority of the parliaments, if this ſtatute had been freely made, and after mature deliberation; but it is eaſy to perceive, how little freedom there was, in this parliament, if it be conſidered, that this act was only a bare confirmation of the earl of Warwick's engagements; and, beſides, purely out of condeſcenſion to the earl, or rather by his direction, and contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of England, it was not ſcrupled to deprive the daughters of the houſe of Lancaſter, of a right enjoyed by the princeſſes of the royal family, ever ſince the Norman conqueſt. Thus, by a raſh reſolution, was eſtabliſhed, in England, a ſort of Salick law, which the Engliſh had ſo greatly cenſured and derided, when Edward III. and Philip de Valois were competitors, for the crown of France; and the ſame parliament reſtored to all their honours and rights Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, half-brother to Henry, and John, earl of Oxford, who were attainted, under Edward.

Moreover, purſuant to queen Margaret's engagements, at Amboiſe, the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick were appointed governors of the kingdom; by which, the parliament manifeſtly ſuppoſed Henry's inability, who, indeed, was conſidered, only as the ſhadow of a king. A pardon was alſo granted to the marqueſs of Montague, for his crime in ſerving Edward, ſince, by deſerting him, at ſuch a critical juncture, he was the principal cauſe of his flight; and, to give the earl of Warwick a ſpecious pretence, to be revenged on his private enemies, all that had carried arms, in defence of Edward's pretended right, were declared traytors and rebels; by vertue of which act, John Tiptoft, earl of Worceſter, governor of Ireland, and high-conſtable of England, having been found hid, in a hollow tree, was brought to London and beheaded. By theſe acts of private revenge, the lords of the contrary party were, in a manner, forced to ſeek for ſafety, in arms; and, perhaps, this is one of the chief cauſes of ſeveral revolutions, which had, already, and that, afterwards, happened.

1470. The duke and earl are declared governors of the kingdom. Hollingſh.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, the earl of Pembroke went for Henry, earl of Richmond, his nephew, who had concealed himſelf, in Wales, and brought him to the king; and it is ſaid, that Henry, ſtedfaſtly fixing his eyes upon that young prince, foretold, that he ſhould, one day, aſcend the throne, and put an end to the quarrel of the two houſes; but, tho' this fact is poſitively affirmed by ſome hiſtorians, there ſeems to be reaſon to preſume, that it was invented, in the reign of Henry VII, whilſt the canonization of Henry VI. was ſolliciting, at Rome; which was oppoſed by the pope, principally becauſe, tho' he was willing to own Henry VI, for a good man, he could not ſee, in his life, any proof of an eminent ſanctity; whereas, if this pretended prophecy had been atteſted, it would have been very proper to remove the objection.

Henry's pretended prophecy. Hall.

The earl of Warwick, who forgave the archbiſhop of York, his brother, for ſuffering Edward to eſcape, procured him a grant of Woodſtock-park and many other manors, with the confiſcated eſtates of ſeveral perſons condemned, for rebellion; namely, for being in Edward's ſervice.

A grant to the archbiſhop of York. Act. Pub.

I left Edward, at the Hague, in a very melancholy condition, deprived of his kingdom, and living at the expence of the lord Gruthuyſe, till the duke of Burgundy heard of his caſe; to whom the news of the king his brother-in-law's arrival, in his dominions, was, by no means, agreeable; and Philip de Commines affirms, that he would have been leſs uneaſy to hear of his death. If Edward had been dead, he would have had but one courſe to take, viz. to approve of Henry's reſtoration; but, that

The duke of Burgundy's tronble about Edward.

1470. that prince, being alive and in Holland, neceſſarily threw him into great perplexity. He had entered into an alliance with him, not out affection, but ſolely for reaſons of ſtate; and he had ſacrificed to his intereſt his averſion for the houſe of York; an averſion in which he had been educated by his mother, daughter to a princeſs of the houſe of Lancaſter. In the interim, he was reduced to the ſad neceſſity either of abandoning his brother-in-law, who was come for refuge into his dominions; or of expoſing himſelf, in protecting him, to the danger of drawing upon him the united forces of France and England. On the other hand, the dukes of Exeter and Somerſet, who made a different figure, at his court, from what they did, before this revolution, ſtrenuouſly preſſed him to deſert Edward, and threatened him, if he refuſed, with the indignation of England; moreover, the earl of Warwick had now ſent to Calais a body of troops, that only waited for orders to join the French, and invade ſome province of the Low-Countries; and Vauclair had not only received theſe troops into the town, but, by many other ſteps, ſhewn, that he was inviolably faithful to the earl of Warwick. Philip de Commines relates, that, the duke, his maſter, having ſent him to Calais, for a confirmation of the truce of commerce, between that place and the Low-Countries, he found the governor, garriſon, and inhabitants entirely for Henry; adding, that he ſaw no other way, to ſucceed in his negotiation, than to tell the townſmen of Calais, that, the truce being made with England, and not with Edward's perſon, the change of king was not a ſufficient motive to break it; by which, he intimated, that his maſter did not diſlike the revolution.

The poſture of the duke of Burgundy's affairs.

Doubtleſs, it highly concerned that prince to keep fair with the Engliſh; but, for the better underſtanding his embarraſſment, cauſed by Edward's retreat into his dominions, it will be neceſſary to know the ſituation of his affairs. Lewis XI, by the treaty he ſigned, at Peronne, promiſed to give, in appenage, to the duke of Berry, his brother, Champagne and Brie, in lieu of Normandy, which he had taken from him; and he was extremely embarraſſed by this engagement. He evidently perceived, that the duke of Burgundy's deſign was to have prince Charles for his neighbour, to be able, by his means, to excite commotions, in France, whenever he pleaſed; but, for this very reaſon, Lewis was deſirous of keeping his brother, at a diſtance from the duke. With this view, he tried to perſuade the duke of Berry, to accept of Guienne and Rochelle, inſtead of Champagne; and, to ſucceed in this project, he bribed all that had any influence over him. The duke of Burgundy, hearing of this project, oppoſed it, to the utmoſt of his power, by repreſenting to the duke of Berry, how much that exchange would be to his prejudice; but, theſe reaſons proving ineffectual, he inſinuated to him, by ſecret emiſſaries, that, if he demanded his only daughter in marriage, he would infallibly obtain her, and might, to prevent his brother's oppoſition, retire into England, till the marriage was concluded. This negotiation was carried ſo far, that Edward, at the duke of Burgundy's inſtance, had ordered a ſafe-conduct to be diſpatched for that prince; but theſe meaſures were diſconcerted; for the duke of Berry, perſuaded by his treacherous counſellors, determined, at laſt, to accept of the exchange offered by the king, his brother. 1470.

Upon this, the duke of Burgundy diſregarded the propoſal of the marriage, which could no longer be ſubſervient to his deſigns; and, in the mean while, the duke of Bretagne and the conſtable de St. Pol, being deeply concerned in the negotiation, were exceedingly deſirous of its ſucceſs. As they did not love the king, they conſidered, that this marriage would be an infallible means, to keep up, between the two brothers, a diſſenſion, from which they expected to reap great advantages. There was nothing wanting, except the duke of Burgundy's conſent; and they undertook to obtain it, by an extraordinary method. They pretended to be diſcontented with the duke, and adviſed the king of France to make war upon him, promiſing to do all that was poſſible to aſſiſt him; intending to offer the duke, when he ſhould come to be preſſed, to eſpouſe his quarrel, provided he would give his daughter to the duke of Guienne. Lewis XI. deſired nothing more, than to ſee the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne at variance; moreover, he moſt paſſionately wiſhed to recover from the duke of Burgundy the towns upon the Somme, delivered to him, by the treaty of Conflans. However, he had not, hitherto, attempted to make war upon him, leſt he ſhould create diſturbances, in the kingdom, whilſt he was, elſewhere, employed; but, finding himſelf ſafe from that quarter, he, immediately, reſolved upon the war, as having no advice of their plot. Before he declared himſelf, he diſpatched private emiſſaries to the foreſaid towns, to gain the principal burghers to his intereſt; and it muſt be obſerved, that the duke of Burgundy kept but ſlender garriſons, in his towns, having, upon the peace, disbanded his troops, to eaſe his ſubjects.

Lewis XI. declares war againſt Burgundy. Mezerai.

Lewis, having formed all his plots, aſſembled the eſtates, at Tours, in March, 1470; where, upon frivolous complaints, brought by the earl of Eu, againſt the duke of Burgundy, he was cited before the court of peers; and the citation was ſent by a ſummoner of the parliament. The duke not appearing, war was proclaimed againſt him, and St. Quentin taken, where the conſtable de St. Pol entered without the leaſt oppoſition; Amiens alſo opened her gates to the king; and the duke was upon the point of loſing Abbeville.

The duke is afraid of incenſing the earl of Warwick.

Such was the ſtate of the duke of Burgundy's affairs, when Edward arrived, in his country. He was, unexpectedly, attacked by the king of France; and, preſently after, the earl of Warwick ſent 4000 men to Calais, to join the French, or make a diverſion; ſo that the duke could do nothing more prejudicial to his intereſt, than exaſperate the earl of 1470. Warwick, by protecting Edward. It is not, therefore, ſurpriſing, if Edward endured ſome mortifications, during his retreat, ſince it was neceſſary for the duke of Burgundy, that it ſhould be believed, in England, that he was ſorry to ſee him, and had no inclination to protect him; but, in private, he promiſed to give him aſſiſtance, as ſoon as he could do it with ſafety.

Edward's diſcourſe with the duke of Burgundy.

This policy did not anſwer Edward's purpoſe; who could have wiſhed, that the duke of Burgundy would openly declare for him, fancying that ſuch a declaration would have greatly conduced to the ſupport of his party, in England; and, at laſt, perceiving that the duke perſiſted in his reſolution, and his ducheſs's ſollicitations made no impreſſion upon him, he demanded a private audience. As the duke could not refuſe it, he repreſented to him, "That a longer delay was, to the laſt degree, "prejudicial to him; that he loſt his friends "and adherents, in England, whilſt the earl "of Warwick daily ſtrengthened himſelf, in "his uſurped power; and that, therefore, "there was no medium, between aſſiſting him "ſpeedily and abandoning him to his miſ-"fortunes. Then he imparted to him his "brother the duke of Clarence's promiſes; "adding, that expedition was abſolutely ne-"ceſſary, leſt that prince, who was naturally "fickle, ſhould alter his mind, or the earl "of Warwick, diſcovering his deſign, pre-"vent the execution of it, by removing him "from the government. To theſe reaſons, "which concerned him, in particular, he "joined the conſideration of their mutual "oath, to give each other proofs of a ſin-"cere friendſhip, in caſes of neceſſity; more-"over, he intreated him to reflect, that, "in acting for him, he would promote the "intereſt of his own family, which might, one "day, ſtand in need of aſſiſtance; not to rec-"kon the honour which would redound to "him, by reſtoring a king, his brother-in-"law, to the throne. Finally, he expreſly "promiſed to enter into a ſtrict alliance with "him, againſt France, the moment he was "reſtored; and he added, that ſuch a league "was the only way, to reſiſt their common "enemy. He concluded with repreſenting, "that diſſimulation would never produce the "the effect he deſigned; ſince it would not "hinder Lewis and the earl of Warwick from "jointly endeavouring his ruin.

The duke of Burgundy reſolves to aſſiſt Edward. Commin.

The duke of Burgundy, affected with this diſcourſe, perceived, that, in effect, there was no medium in the alternative propoſed to him by Edward; above all, he ſeriouſly conſidered what that prince had ſaid, in the laſt place, that he could not expect to repulſe the attacks of Lewis, without the aſſiſtance of England, which could be obtained only by Edward's reſtoration; and that, by deſerting him, he ſhould run the riſque of being expoſed to the forces of France and England, united againſt him. On the other hand, he conſidered, that, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, he could give Edward but an inconſiderable aid; and that, if his attempt ſhould miſcarry, he would furniſh the earl of Warwick with a plauſible pretence to attack him. In this perplexity, he contrived an expedient, by which he imagined, that he could, at once, ſalve the appearances with Warwick, and afford ſome little aſſiſtance to the fugitive king. He equipped four large ſhips, at Vere, a free port, in Zealand, in other perſons names, who were ſupplied with money; and he likewiſe privately hired 14 ſhips of the Eaſterlings, to convoy the king into England, and to keep upon the coaſt, a fortnight after his landing, to conduct him back, in caſe of neceſſity. Then giving Edward a conſiderable ſum of money, he left him, in Holland, and went himſelf into Flanders; and all theſe ſhips being ready, Edward diſappearing, notice was ſent to the duke, who, immediately, ordered proclamation to be made, that none of his ſubjects ſhould aſſiſt him, directly or indirectly, upon pain of death; but it is probable, that, if Edward's attempt had miſcarried, the earl of Warwick would not have been deceived, by this contrivance. 1470.

Warwick has ſome intimations of Edward's deſign. Act. Pub.

Whatever care was taken by Edward and the duke of Burgundy, to conceal their deſigns, the earl of Warwick had received ſome intimations of them; for it too much concerned him to have good ſpies, in Holland, to neglect ſuch a neceſſary precaution. It appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, on the 21ſt of December, the marqueſs of Montague had orders to levy troops, in the north, under the pretence of a rebellion, not mentioned by the hiſtorians; and, probably, it was only a farther precaution taken by the earl of Warwick, upon ſome general advices of a plot forming, in Holland.

1471. He is made high-admiral.

The 2d of January, 1471, the earl of Warwick was made high-admiral; doubtleſs, he durſt not entruſt others with the care of equipping a fleet, which he foreſaw would be neceſſary, if the duke of Burgundy attempted to aſſiſt Edward, with open force; and, the advices from Holland being ſomewhat more certain, than hitherto, the duke of Clarence, who was not, in the leaſt, ſuſpected of holding intelligence with his brother, was commiſſioned to raiſe an army, to oppoſe his deſigns, if he ſhould return into the kingdom.

A truce between England and France. Act. Pub.

Theſe meaſures being concerted, the earl of Warwick made haſte to conclude with Lewis XI. an alliance, projected, ſome time before; but as it was difficult to make an alliance with a prince actually in war with England; and as a peace could not be concluded, on account of Henry's pretenſions to the crown of France, a long truce was reſolved upon, almoſt equivalent to a peace. In the treaty, on this occaſion, it was agreed, that the truce ſhould continue, till one of the parties deſired to break it, in which caſe, he was to give the other five years notice; and the truce was not to be revocable, for 10 years. It was farther agreed, that a place ſhould be appointed to treat of a final peace; and Lewis XI. was pleaſed, tho' I am ignorant of the reaſon, that the duke of Guienne, his brother, ſhould be particularly included in the truce.

The

1471. The very day the treaty was ſigned, the grand prior of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem embarqued for France, to bring home queen Margaret and the prince of Wales.

Grants to the duke of Clarence, &c. Act Pub.

Soon after, the earl of Warwick, out of affection to the duke of Clarence, his ſon-in-law, or to attach that prince the more firmly to the king, reſtored him the government of Ireland, with ſeveral manors, in England forfeted by Edward's adherents; and the marqueſs of Montague and Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke had alſo a ſhare in Henry's favours.

Edward ſets ſail, lands at Ravenſpur, and is coldly received.

In the interim, Edward, having finiſhed all his preparations, ſailed from the port of Vere, about the middle of March; and he brought with him 2000 men. He diſembarqued, at Ravenſpur, where Henry IV. had formerly landed, when he came to wreſt the crown from Richard II; and he expected to be received with acclamations; whereas he found the inhabitants of thoſe parts extremely diſpleaſed with his coming. Some were well affected to the houſe of Lancaſter; others ſeeing Edward ſo meanly attended, were afraid to venture openly to eſpouſe his cauſe; but, as there were no regular troops, he met with no reſiſtance. However, this was not all he deſired; for he would have been glad to be met by the people, and to ſee his army increaſe; but, this diſappointment obliging him to march, with circumſpection, he cauſed it to be rumoured, that he came only, as duke of York, to claim the private inheritance of his family. Henry IV. had formerly uſed the ſame artifice; yet with more juſtice, ſince he was baniſhed, without a legal cauſe; but, if Edward had no right to the crown, as he ſeemed to acknowledge, he muſt have been an uſurper, and conſequently could not juſtly complain, that his eſtate was confiſcated. The reaſon, why he did not, carry his pretenſions any farther, upon his arrival in England, appears to be this; becauſe he was ſtrongly perſuaded, that the people, in general, were much more inclined to him than to his rival, but that the magiſtrates were againſt him; and, indeed, the earl of Warwick no ſooner had the government in his hands, after Henry's reſtoration, than he took care to fill all the offices with his creatures. It was, therefore, expedient, that Edward ſhould furniſh the people with a pretence to favour him, how ſlight ſoever, in order to oppoſe the authority of the magiſtrates, who would have had too great an advantage, if they could have ſaid, that he came, in arms, to dethrone the reigning king; whilſt, by demanding only his private patrimony, he moved the people's compaſſion, and encouraged them to hope, that the quarrel between the two houſes, might, at length, be ended, by reſtoring his inheritance; but, however this be, Edward, tho' the people's coldneſs was very diſagreeable to him, marched towards York, giving Henry, every-where, the title of king, and ſtiling himſelf only duke of York.

The news of Edward's landing having reached the court, the duke of Clarence and earl of Warwick departed from London, to levy troops; and the magiſtrates of the town were ordered to ſhut their gates upon the enemy, and the marqueſs of Montague, who remained, at Pontefract, with a body of troops, had orders to fight Edward, before his arrival at York; but, for ſome unknown reaſon, he kept his poſt, without making any motion to hinder his march. Some aſcribe this conduct to his ignorance of Edward's forces; but is it to be ſuppoſed, that he could want good intelligence, upon ſo important an occaſion? Others charge him with cowardice; but he was one of the moſt valiant lords of the kingdom. Some believe, that he ſecretly carried on a fair underſtanding with Edward; but the ſequel ſhewed the contrary. Thoſe, that reaſon, with moſt probability, affirm, that Montague, believing Edward would not return into England, without a well-grounded proſpect of being reſtored, intended to reſerve himſelf, this way, in order to make his peace with him; and, tho' his attempt ſhould miſcarry, Montague did not deſpair of appeaſing the earl, his brother. 1471.

Edward, upon his approach to York, is deſired to take another rout; and he anſwers with great moderation. Hall. Hollingſh.

In the interim, Edward approaching York, two of the aldermen intreated him, in the name of the magiſtrates, to march, another way; repreſenting that they could not receive into their city a prince, that came to take the crown from their lawful king; but, Edward, purſuant to the plan he had formed, replied, "That it was not his intent to deprive the "king of the crown; that, ſince the people "had declared for Henry, he owned him, "for his ſovereign, and had no deſign to do "him any prejudice; that his ſole view was "to requeſt the king, for the reſtitution of "his eſtate, not with an army to uſe force, "but only with a few followers, to ſecure him "from the malice of his enemies; that the "parliament ſhould be the judge of his cauſe, "and he only deſired to have means, to paſs "his days quietly, in the allegiance becoming a loyal ſubject: That, however, the "inhabitants of York ſhould, of all others, "be the laſt, to refuſe him admittance, ſince "his lands, in the county, as well as his "title of duke of York, rendered him their "countryman; and, in fine, he prayed them "to remember the favours, which, on ſeveral "occaſions, the city had received from his "family."

The people oblige the magiſtrates to admit him. Hall. Hollingſh.

The aldermen returned with this anſwer, which was inſufficient to ſatisfy the magiſtrates, who were entirely devoted to the earl of Warwick; but, Edward's friends, in the city, perſuading the people, that it would be extremely cruel not to open the gates to a prince, who, ſubmitting himſelf to the king and parliament, came only to demand his inheritance, there was ſuch a commotion, that the magiſtrates were unable to appeaſe it; and all they could obtain of the people was, that deputies ſhould be ſent to Edward, to make terms with him, in order to preſerve, as much as poſſible, the rights of the king, and ſave the city from plunder. The deputies found Edward ready to promiſe whatever they demanded; and he proteſted, that he was ſincere, and would do no damage to the city, but always remain 1471. remain the king's faithful ſubject; upon which, the gates were opened to him; and, entering the city, he went to the cathedral, and confirmed his engagements with a ſolemn oath. Every thing, being, thus, tranſacted, on his part, with great lenity and moderation, he borrowed ſome money of the citizens; and, leaving a garriſon, he departed for London. During his ſhort ſtay, at York, his army was greatly augmented; and he would never have ventured to march towards London, had he not expected, that it would continue to increaſe, in his rout, and the duke of Clarence perform his promiſe.

Clarence and Warwick command each an army. Act. Pub.

In the mean while, the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick were parted, in order to aſſemble their forces; deſigning, afterwards, to join their troops into one body, and ſet at their head the prince of Wales, ſon to Henry, who was expected from France; and the earl of Warwick thought he had time enough to prepare, and join the duke of Clarence, becauſe he did not doubt, that his brother, Montague, would be in a condition to ſtop Edward; but, unexpectedly, he heard, that Montague had ſuffered him to paſs, without oppoſition; and that his army continually increaſed, upon his rout, with great numbers of officers and ſoldiers, that repaired to him, from all parts of the kingdom. He was extremely ſurpriſed at this news, and at a loſs what to think of Montague, who behaved ſo negligently, in an affair of ſuch importance; yet he concealed his ſentiments, and, after ſending him expreſs orders, to come and join him, and deſiring the duke of Clarence to advance, with all poſſible expedition, reſolved to encamp, near Coventry, and there expect Edward; deſigning to follow him, if he had the boldneſs to come between him and the duke of Clarence, or amuſe him, in thoſe parts, till his two other bodies were arrived. Indeed, Montague began his march, to join his brother; and the duke of Clarence alſo, advancing, kept within diſtance, as if he had the ſame thing in view.

The duke of Clarence join Edward. Hall.

In the interim, Edward, who was now about Coventry, approached the earl of Warwick's intrenchments, with a ſhow of attacking them; and the earl, being weak, ſent frequent expreſſes to the duke of Clarence, to deſire him to advance, with all poſſible ſpeed; but the duke ſtill found ſome excuſe, to defer the junction. Whilſt the two armies were, thus, in ſight, and ready, in all appearance, to engage, the duke of Glouceſter, with a ſmall train, rode forth from the camp of Edward, his brother, and, without requiring a ſafe-conduct, went directly to the duke of Clarence; and, at their firſt meeting, the two brothers tenderly embraced each other. After a ſhort interview, the duke of Clarence, having gained the principal officers, cauſed Edward to be proclaimed, in his army; and, the ſame day, Edward headed his own troops, and joined the duke of Clarence, with all the marks of mutual friendſhip.

This unexpected blow was extremely mortifying to the earl of Warwick; yet, in ſpite of this misfortune, which would have diſcouraged any other perſon, he could not reſolve to hearken to any overtures of agreement, tho' the duke of Clarence offered him his mediation; but a mediator, who had ſo publickly betrayed him, could not but be ſuſpected by the earl. As his army would be ſoon reinforced by Montague's troops, and he was ſtrongly intrenched, he did not judge it adviſable, too haſtily to treat of an accommodation, which muſt have been very diſadvantageous to him; moreover, he hoped, that London, where he had left the duke of Somerſet and archbiſhop of York, would deny entrance to Edward, if he appeared before the city. In this caſe, he determined to follow him, immediately after Montague's arrival, and compel him either to retire, elſewhere; or join battle, at the gates of the capital, with a manifeſt diſadvantage; but theſe meaſures proved abortive.

1471. The duke offers his mediation to the earl, who rejects it. Hall.

Preſently after the junction of the two brothers, it was debated, whether they ſhould attack the earl of Warwick, in his intrenchments, or march directly to London; and the laſt was eſteemed moſt convenient: Firſt, becauſe, Edward having many adherents, in the city, it was probable, that, ſeeing him approach with a numerous army, they would exert themſelves, to procure him admittance, and the earl of Warwick's diſtance would greatly facilitate their attempt. Secondly, nothing could be more for Edward's advantage, than to have London on his ſide. He wanted money, and could not eaſily be ſupplied, elſewhere; and, beſides, he could not abſolutely rely upon his reſtoration, until he was maſter of the metropolis. Laſtly, it was of the laſt importance to have Henry in his power. He began, therefore, his march to London, leaving the earl of Warwick behind him, not without danger of being reduced to great extremity, if the Londoners refuſed to receive him.

Edward marches towards London. Hall.

The news reaching London, that the two brothers were joined, and approaching the city, the earl of Warwick was given over for loſt; and this belief inſpired the people with a terror, which Edward's friends induſtriouſly cheriſhed, by aggravating the city's danger, of being expoſed to Edward's indignation, unleſs it was averted by a ſpeedy ſubmiſſion; and, at this juncture, they, that, after Edward's flight, had taken ſanctuary, in Weſtminſter-abbey, came out and ſupported that prince's intereſt. On the other hand, his enemies durſt hardly open their mouths, leſt their endeavours ſhould prove deſtructive to them; ſo that, without waiting the reſolution of the magiſtrates, the people were ready to open the gates to Edward, and run out to meet him. In vain, did the duke of Somerſet and the archbiſhop of York oppoſe this reſolution; for they were not regarded. They, to no purpoſe, promiſed the people, that the earl of Warwick would come to their relief, in three days; for Edward's army, now at the gates of the city, wrought a contrary effect. In fine, Edward's party prevailing, the Edward enters the city. Hall.

Edward entered London, the 11th of April, and, immediately, thanked the inhabitants, for their affection, promiſing to have it in everlaſting remembrance; and he ſeconded this promiſe, with ſeveral acts of clemency, that entirely attached the citizens to his intereſt. In the interim, Henry, who had not found means to eſcape, nor, perhaps, ſo much as projected it, was again impriſoned, in the tower; from whence he had been taken, ſeven months before, to be replaced on the throne. 1471.

The Continuation of the Reign of EDWARD IV.

EDWARD, hearing that the earl of Warwick was advanced to St. Albans, two days after his arrival, at London, departed, to put himſelf at the head of his army; and, doubtleſs, the earl was extremely embarraſſed, in the preſent poſture of his affairs. He had decamped from Coventry, and marched, with all expedition, expecting that the Londoners would keep Edward, at leaſt, a few days, before the walls of their city, and that the news of his approach would prevent them from receiving him; but he ſaw the metropolis loſt, king Henry in priſon, and the whole kingdom, in a manner, ready to declare for his enemy. In this extremity, his only refuge was to fight and vanquiſh Edward; for it was impoſſible, without a victory, to reſtore his affairs; but, on the contrary, tho' he had a numerous army, it was far from being equal to Edward's, which too daily increaſed, ſince his being maſter of London; and, beſides, he was greatly perplexed, about the myſterious conduct of the marqueſs of Montague, his brother. He remembered, that he entered, with reluctance, into the project of dethroning Edward, and had lately twice neglected to fight him, upon the moſt preſſing occaſions; and, tho' he was come to join him, this only ſerved to heighten his ſuſpicions; for the duke of Clarence his ſon-in-law's example made him apprehenſive, that his own brother was corrupted. In this ſtate of fear and uncertainty, he would willingly have diſmiſſed him, if he had not been afraid of diſcouraging his army; and, in a word, after many reflections upon the poſture of his affairs, flight being difficult and diſhonourable, and the ſucceſs of the battle yet uncertain, he concluded, that his only way was to hazard a battle, and die honourably, if victory declared for his enemy; but, at the ſame time, he reſolved ſo to manage, that the marqueſs, his brother, ſhould run the ſame riſque with him, ſince it was the event only that could aſſure him of his fidelity. In this reſolution, he marched from St. Albans; and, at Barnet, which is but 10 miles from London, he met Edward, who was alſo advancing to engage. There, on the 14th of April, being Eaſter-day, a terrible battle was fought, which decided the fate of the two competitors; and Edward had brought Henry with him, not daring to commit him to any one's cuſtody. Thus, that wretched prince ſeemed born only to be the ſport of fortune; tho' he was happy, in being, by his natural weakneſs of mind, leſs ſenſible, than any other would have been, of his misfortunes.

He marches towards London. Hall.

The battle of Barnet, Warwick and Montague are defeated and ſlain.

The battle began, early in the morning, and continued, till noon; and never, perhaps, had two armies been ſeen to fight, with more bravery and reſolution; for, every one conſidering himſelf, as a rebel, if the enemy proved victorious, no favour was expected. The barbarity, uſually practiſed, in civil wars, was well known; and more eſpecially in this, where ſeveral revolutions, in behalf of both parties, had, to the laſt degree, inflamed their mutual animoſity; which, probably, was the true cauſe of the continuance of the battle. The earl of Warwick's troops, tho' inferior, in number, fought deſperately, being reſolved, after the example of their general, either to conquer, or die; and they had even reaſon to hope, for ſome time, that victory would declare in their favour. Some ſquadrons, detached by the earl of Warwick, from the third line, ſo far gained ground upon their enemies, that ſeveral poſted to London, with the news of their defeat; but Edward, not loſing the preſence of mind ſo neceſſary to a general, on ſuch critical occaſions, ordered a body of reſerve to advance, who, attacking the victorious enemies, in the flank, put them in extreme diſorder. The ſmall number of the earl of Warwick's troops did not ſuffer him to make a detachment, to oppoſe that body; and the earl of Oxford, who had beat back Edward's troops, having left the line, where he was poſted, too much expoſed, wheeled about, to return to his poſt; but this precaution, tho' prudent, occaſioned the earl of Warwick's defeat. The earl of Oxford's badge, upon his arms and colours, was a ſtar with ſtreams, and Edward's device was a ſun; and, a ſmall miſt, that aroſe, during the battle, hindering the earl of Warwick's troops from diſcerning the difference, they furiouſly charged theſe ſquadrons, as they were returning to their poſt, and routed them, before the earl of Oxford had time to remove their miſtake. This cauſed an extreme confuſion, in the army; for ſome, fancying that they were betrayed, becauſe attacked by their own men, 1471. deſerted to the enemies; and others, ſeeing them fly, that way, believed they were attacked, in the rear, and were at a loſs, what courſe to take. In the interim, Edward, improving this miſtake, cut in pieces the troops that were flying towards him; and the earl of Warwick, perceiving the diſorder, did his utmoſt to repair it, but to no purpoſe. At laſt, in order to animate his troops, by his example, he ruſhed, tho' on foot, among the thickeſt of his enemies, where he ſoon fell, covered with wounds; and the marqueſs of Montague, his brother, deſirous to reſcue him, a few moments after, periſhed, in the attempt. Thus, ended the battle, about noon, by the entire defeat of Warwick's army, 10,000 whereof were ſlain, on the ſpot; and it is ſaid, that Edward, who, in all the former battles, uſually publiſhed, before the fight, that the common ſoldiers ſhould be ſpared, and the officers put to the ſword, had now, ordered, that no quarter ſhould be given. The earl of Oxford and the duke of Somerſet fled into Wales, to the earl of Pembroke, who was levying troops, for the earl of Warwick; and the duke of Exeter was left, for dead, among the ſlain; but, reviving again, he crawled to the next houſe, from whence he was carried to London, where he took ſanctuary, in Weſtminſter-abbey.

Hall.

Commin.

Such was the ſucceſs of this bloody day, and ſuch the fate of the famous earl of Warwick, who, ſince the beginning of the rupture, between the houſes of Lancaſter and York, had made, in England, the greateſt figure any ſubject had ever done, before him; for, in a word, he had made and unmade kings, at his pleaſure. Nothing more glorious could be ſaid of any private man, if true glory conſiſted in exceſs of power.

Edward, having gained ſo compleat a victory, which ſeemed to ſecure him the crown, returned to London, where he was triumphantly received; for the citizens could not ſufficiently expreſs their joy, to find themſelves freed from the danger, to which they would have been expoſed, had the earl of Warwick proved victorious. The king's firſt care was to return God thanks, for the victory, at St. Paul's church; after which, he ordered the unfortunate Henry to be again impriſoned, in the tower. A few days after, he granted a pardon to the archbiſhop of York; probably, leſt he ſhould incenſe the clergy, by the puniſhment of one of their principal members; moreover, he remembered the great ſervice that prelate had done him, tho', perhaps, more out of negligence than affection, in ſuffering him to eſcape from his confinement, at Middleham.

Queen Margaret arrives with the prince. Hall.

In the mean while, queen Margaret juſt arrived from France, in Dorſetſhire, was in a truly deplorable condition; for ſhe had ſcarce time to refreſh herſelf, two days, when ſhe received the fatal news of the defeat and death of the earl of Warwick. Tho' ſhe had, hitherto, bravely withſtood all the attacks of fortune, this freſh diſgrace threw her into a ſwoon, out of which ſhe recovered, with extreme difficulty; for, evidently foreſeeing all the conſequences, and perceiving no refuge, ſhe indulged her grief, and loſt, on this occaſion, that amazing firmneſs, by which ſhe had ever been ſo glorioufly diſtinguiſhed. Thus, yielding to her unhappy lot, and thinking only of ſaving the prince, her ſon, ſhe took ſanctuary, in the abbey of Beaulieu, in Hampſhire; but, being ſtill in theſe mortal agonies, ſhe ſaw arrive the duke of Somerſet, John Beaufort, his brother, the earls of Pembroke and Devonſhire, and the lord Wenlock. The two laſt had been for Edward, and, unfortunately for themſelves, had deſerted him; and the queen had alſo with her the grand prior of St. John's, ſent into France, to conduct her to England. All theſe lords, with ſeveral other officers of diſtinction, in order to comfort her and revive her hopes, repreſented to her, "That ſhe had no reaſon yet to de- "ſpair; that, tho' Edward was victorious, "he might be vanquiſhed again; that, as the "kingdom ſtill abounded with friends to king "Henry, it was more eaſy, than ſhe imagin- "ed, to raiſe a new army capable of ſtopping "the uſurper's progreſs; that, as the gaining "of one battle had reſtored him to the "throne, the loſs of another might dethrone "him; that the various revolutions, for and "againſt the two houſes, ſince the quarrel "began, ought to teach her, that there was "ſtill room for hope, if ſhe would not, by an "unſeaſonable fear, relinquiſh her own in- "tereſts with thoſe of the king, her husband, "and the prince, her ſon; that her armies "had often conquered, under her conduct, "and it was, by no means, impoſſible, "that victory ſhould, once more, declare in "her favour; and, laſtly, that all the world "conſidered the prince of Wales, as the "undoubted heir to the crown, and, by "placing him at the head of the army, ſhe "might ſtill expect a happy revolution."

If Margaret was afraid of expoſing herſelf, once more, to the viciſſitude of fortune, it was not upon her own account; for the prince, her ſon, was the cauſe of all her uneaſineſs. She was very ſenſible, that, in attempting to recover the crown of his anceſtors, he would hazard his own life; and ſuch was her tenderneſs for him, that this conſideration prevented her from coming to any reſolution. In this perplexity, ſhe propoſed ſending the prince into France, that, if the enterprize ſucceeded, he might reap the advantage; and, even if it miſcarried, he might, at leaſt, be in ſafety: But the duke of Somerſet replied, that it was principally upon the preſence of the prince that her hopes could be founded, which alone would draw multitudes into his ſervice, and encourage the troops to fight valiantly for him; and, at length, the queen, after enduring a violent conflict in her ſoul, between the fear of loſing her ſon and the deſire of procuring him a crown, which ſhe believed to be his lawful right, conſented to follow the advice of her friends.

Upon this reſolution, it was agreed, that the queen and prince ſhould retire to Bath; and 1471. and that the reſt ſhould aſſemble their friends, with the remains of the earl of Warwick's army. The earl of Pembroke undertook to levy an army, in Wales, where he had great intereſt, and, immediately, departed; only deſiring the duke of Somerſet, who was to command in chief, under the prince of Wales, to run no hazard, till he was joined by the Welch. The ſuddenneſs, with which all th eſe lords raiſed their troops, would be extremely ſurpriſing, were it not, in the firſt place, for the aſtoniſhing effects uſually produced by hatred and revenge, eſpecially in civil wars; ſecondly, the remains of the earl of Warwick's army, who diſperſed themſelves, after the battle of Barnet, wanted only a leader to head them; and, laſtly, as it was only a few days, ſince the battle, it was not yet known, how the conqueror would treat the vanquiſhed; wherefore, moſt having greater reaſon to expect ſeverity than mercy, choſe rather to hazard again their lives, in a battle, than run the riſque of dying, on the gibbet and ſcaffold. However this be, it appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, the 27th of April, 13 days after the battle of Barnet, the Lancaſtrian lords had re-aſſembled an army.

The ſpeed wherewith the Lancaſtrians levy a freſh army.

A proclamation againſt the queen. Act. Pub.

Upon the ſame day, as the date ſhews, Edward iſſued out a proclamation, repreſenting that his title to the crown was unqueſtionable; and firſt, by reaſon; ſecondly, by authority of parliament; thirdly, by his victories, and particularly the laſt, wherein the marqueſs of Montague and the earl of Warwick were ſlain; that, notwithſtanding theſe three moſt ſolid foundations, ſeveral perſons had taken arms againſt him: But, to avoid the effuſion of more blood, he had judged it expedient, to give his people a liſt of the names of thoſe perſons, who were pronounced traytors and rebels, that their encouragers might not complain, if any miſchief befel them. The perſons proſcribed were Margaret, ſtiling herſelf queen of England, Edward, her ſon, the duke of Exeter, the duke of Somerſet, John, earl of Oxford, John Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, William, viſcount de Beaumont, John Beaufort, brother to the duke of Somerſet, Hugh Courtney, and 11 others.

Edward marches againſt her,

In the interim, Edward's troops being ready to march, he immediately, put himſelf at their head, to give his enemies battle, before the earl of Pembroke joined them with the Welch; and, how diligent ſoever the lords, in league with the queen, had been, they were far from being in ſo good poſture, as the king, on account of their want of arms and ammunition; wherefore, knowing that Edward was marching in queſt of them, they reſolved to retire into Wales, where, by reaſon of the ſituation of the country, they might avoid fighting, as long as they pleaſed. Beſides, they expected to be, very ſpeedily, joined by the earl of Pembroke, and to be then in a condition to give battle; but the point was to paſs the Severn, before the king overtook them; and, with this view, they marched to Glouceſter. However, that city refuſing her gates, and having no proſpect of taking it, at the firſt aſſault, much leſs of beſieging it, in form, they determined to paſs the Severn, at Tewkſbury; but Edward ſo cloſely purſued them, that, upon their arrival at Tewksbury, they conſulted, whether they ſhould venture to paſs the river, at the peril of ſeeing their rear routed, or intrench themſelves in a park adjoining to the town, till the earl of Pembroke arrived. The queen, ſolely intent upon ſaving the prince, was for paſſing; and ſome others, more out of complaiſance to her than for any ſubſtantial reaſon, ſeconded her opinion: But the duke of Somerſet, ſtrenuouſly oppoſing it, anſwered, that the enemy was ſo near, that, before all the army had paſſed, he would certainly have it in his power to attack them, and cut in pieces thoſe who ſhould have the misfortune to be left behind; that ſuch an accident, which ſeemed unavoidable, muſt, of courſe, prove very fatal, and diſcourage ſuch as ſtill adhered to the houſe of Lancaſter; and, in fine, that, tho' their army was inferior, in number, to that of the enemy, this diſadvantage might be repaired, by intrenching in the park, and drawing lines which would balance the ſuperiority of Edward's troops. After mature deliberation, this opinion was thought moſt adviſable, in the preſent circumſtances of time and place; tho' hiſtorians, of whom few underſtand the art of war, have charged the duke of Somerſet, with raſhneſs, purely becauſe they conſidered not the difficulty of paſſing a river, like the Severn, with the enemy in the rear. If this general had been guilty of no other fault, perhaps, the queen's affairs would have taken a quite different turn; at leaſt, ſhe might have waited the earl of Pembroke's arrival, and, by fighting upon equal terms, have cauſed her enemy to ſhare in the peril, as will appear from the ſequel.

and overtakes her, at Tewkſbury.

The duke of Somerſet intrenches himſelf by Tewkſbury, and Edward reſolves to attack him.

The confederate lords reſolving to wait for Edward, the whole night was ſpent, in making intrenchments, round the park, which were finiſhed, before day; and Edward, taking a view of them, believed it abſolutely neceſſary to attack them, before they were made more impenetrable, and the earl of Pembroke arrived, who was hourly expected. He, therefore, directly, drew up his army, in two lines; and, giving the command of the firſt to the duke of Glouceſter, his younger brother, he headed the ſecond himſelf, with the duke of Clarence. The duke of Somerſet ranged his army, behind the intrenchments, in three bodies, and commanded the firſt himſelf, in order to ſuſtain the firſt ſhock; Wenlock conducted the ſecond, under prince Edward, who was conſidered, as the commander in chief; and the earl of Devonſhire was placed at the head of the third. Edward, upon a cloſer view of the intrenchments, perceived that an opening was left, to go out, upon occaſion; which induced him to conclude, that the duke of Somerſet intended to repel the firſt charge, and, if he obſerved any diſorder, among the aſſailants, had reſolved to ſally out, and improve the advantage. The

1471. more eaſily to draw him out his lines, he ordered the duke of Glouceſter, who was to begin the fight, to retreat, with ſome precipitation, if he met with too vigorous a reſiſtance; and, if he was purſued, to face about, and briskly attack his purſuers, aſſuring him of his being ſupported by all the reſt of his army; which order was founded upon Edward's knowledge of the duke of Somerſet's natural boldneſs and intrepidity.

The battle of Tewkſbury. Hall.

Accordingly, the duke of Glouceſter, who began the attack, with great vigour, finding that the enemies bravely withſtood him, and ſeemed every-where ready to ſuſtain his aſſaults, retreated towards the ſecond line, and ſo haſtily, that the duke of Somerſet imagined, that the whole body was entirely diſpirited; who, being unable to curb the impetuoſity of his courage, ſallied out of his intrenchments, to preſs the enemy's army, and, at the ſame time, he ſent Wenlock word to come, immediately, to his aſſiſtance. In the interim, the duke of Glouceſter, who was again drawn up, at a conſiderable diſtance from the intrenchments, ſeeing the duke of Somerſet advancing towards him, in good order, ſaved him ſome part of the way; and, as he was ſure of being ſupported by the king, his brother, who was at hand, he furiouſly fell upon the troops that marched againſt him, and, by this fierce and unexpected attack, ſo aſtoniſhed them, that they fled in diſorder to their camp. The duke of Somerſet was, to the laſt degree, enraged, to find himſelf unſupported who had depended upon Wenlock's oppoſing the duke of Glouceſter, with the ſecond line; but he ſaw him motionleſs, in the very place where he firſt drew up his men; and, not being able, at this ſight, to bridle his rage, he furiouſly rode up to him, and, with a battle-axe, clove his skull.

The duke of Glouceſter enters the enemy's camp. Hall. Hollingſh.

In the mean while, the duke of Glouceſter entering the enemy's camp, together with the run-a-ways, made a terrible ſlaughter. Wenlock being dead, the young prince was at a loſs, how to act; and the duke of Somerſet, tranſported with paſſion, could neither give orders, nor make himſelf obeyed; ſo that, confuſion, inſtantly, ſpreading in the army, and the king, who cloſely followed the duke, his brother, alſo entering the camp, the queen's troops thought only of ſaving themſelves, by flight, without making any farther reſiſtance. It is ſaid, that the queen was found in a chariot, half-dead with grief, at the ſight of her forlorn affairs, ignorant what was become of the prince, her ſon, and was brought, in that condition, to king Edward; tho' an hiſtorian affirms, that it was not, till a day or two after the battle, that ſhe was taken out of a nunnery, where ſhe had fled for refuge, and conducted to the king at Worceſter. In this battle, which entirely ſecured the crown to Edward, there fell, on the queen's ſide, only 3000, becauſe the two laſt lines ran away, without fighting; and the earl of Devonſhire and Sir John Beaufort, brother to the duke of Somerſet, were found, among the ſlain. The prince of Wales, the duke of Somerſet, and the grand prior of St. John's were made priſoners; but it would have been more fortunate for them to have died, in the battle, ſince their lives were ſpared, only to loſe them, in a more ignominious manner. The young prince, being brought into the king's preſence, having an undaunted countenance, did not debaſe himſelf, by ſubmiſſions unbecoming his birth; at which Edward was aſtoniſhed, and ſtill more, when, asking him, how he came to be ſo raſh, thus, to enter his kingdom, in arms, the prince replied, "That he came to "recover his own inheritance, which had "been unjuſtly uſurped." Edward, to the laſt degree, enraged at this boldneſs, ſtruck him, on the mouth, with his gantlet, and turned from him; which was, as it were, the ſignal to take away the life of that unhappy prince; and it is ſaid, that, immediately upon the king's withdrawing, the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, his brothers, the earl of Dorſet, and the lord Haſtings fell, like wild beaſts, upon the young prince, and ſtabbed him, with their daggers. It is certain, he was murdered, that inſtant; and, probably, the king had previouſly given orders, for that barbarous execution; but I do not know, whether the hiſtorians are to be believed, who affirm, that theſe four lords killed him, with their own hands. This might proceed from the prejudice of thoſe that wrote the hiſtory, after the reſtoration of the houſe of Lancaſter, ſince it is manifeſt, that they have forgot nothing, to render the houſe of York odious; yet it is not improbable, that the murder was committed, in the preſence of the foreſaid lords. Some relate, that, the prince eſcaping out of the battle, the king offered a penſion of 500l. ſterling, to any one that ſhould bring him, dead, or alive, promiſing, if he was alive, not to put him to death; and that, upon this, Sir Richard Crofts, in whoſe hands he was fallen, brought him to the king, who did not perform his engagement. This prince loſt his life, at 18 years of age; and, the next day, the duke of Somerſet and the grand prior of St. John's were beheaded. Queen Margaret was confined, in the tower, where ſhe continued a priſoner, till 1475, when Lewis XI. ranſomed her, for 50,000 crowns. Such was the fatal cataſtrophe of this princeſs, who, for attempting to rule England, with a deſpotick ſway, cauſed a great effuſion of Engliſh blood, and occaſioned her own, as well as the ruin of the king, her ſpouſe, the prince, her ſon, and the whole houſe of Lancaſter, of which there remained only a ſingle branch, in the perſon of the earl of Richmond. There was, it ſeems, a ſort of fatality, with reſpect to the kings of England, who married the daughters of France; for Edward II, Richard II, Henry VI, and Charles I. were all the kings that eſpouſed French princeſſes; and they all underwent the ſame fate, and three of them by the fault of their queens.

The baſtard of Falconbridge riſes againſt the king. Hall. Hollingſh.

Whilſt Edward was employed in purſuit of the queen, a freſh enemy aroſe againſt him. Thomas Nevil, called the baſtard of Falconbridge, becauſe he was natural ſon to the lord of that name, had been made vice-admiral of the channel, during the earl of Warwick's adminiſtration, to whom he adhered; but, upon the earl's death, and king Edward's reſtoration, the baſtard was removed from his place; and, being a man of ill morals, and without means, he turned pyrate, for his ſubſiſtence. Whilſt the king was in the weſt, in purſuit of the queen, he aſſembled ſome ſhips, and many of deſperate fortunes, with whom he came upon the coaſt of Kent, not imagining that the war, newly kindled, would ſo ſoon be ended; and his intent was to ſurpriſe London, and enrich himſelf with the plunder of that city. Accordingly he began his march towards London, giving out, that he only deſigned to free king Henry from captivity; and, under this pretence, drawing in many adherents of the houſe of Lancaſter, he formed an army of 17000 men. He quickly became maſter of Southwark; and, at the ſame time, he ordered part of his troops to paſs the Thames, and aſſault two of the city-gates, whilſt himſelf made an attempt to force the bridge; but the citizens, having heard of his march, were upon their guard, and, on all ſides, repulſed him. In the interim, the baſtard being informed of the ſucceſs of the battle of Tewksbury, and knowing that the king was diligently marching to London, retired, in good order, to Sandwich, where he fortified himſelf; but Edward, upon his arrival at London, paſſed through the city, without ſtaying, and marched to Canterbury; where the baſtard ſent him word, that he was ready to ſubmit, upon certain terms that were, immediately, granted. The king even knighted him, and made him vice-admiral of the channel, as before? However, ſhortly after, he was beheaded, either for new, or his former, crimes.

Edward arriving, at London, the 21ſt of May, after two victories, in leſs than three weeks, granted an abſolute pardon to William Wainfleet, biſhop of Wincheſter, a zeaous Lancaſtrian; but he was not ſo generous to king Henry, head of that houſe; tho' the innocent life of that unfortunate prince ſeemed to ſcreen him from the cruelty of his victorious enemy. It was, doubtleſs, for this very reaſon, that Edward had, twice before, ſpared his life; nay, it is highly probable, that he would have ſuffered him to die a natural death, had he thought it conſiſtent with his ſafety; but he was apprehenſive, that he ſhould never enjoy a ſettled repoſe, whilſt that prince was alive, and, therefore, reſolved to diſpatch him. It was properly queen Margaret, that haſtened her husband's death, by her laſt attempt to reſtore him; and, if ſhe had won the battle of Tewksbury, and taken Edward priſoner, it is hardly to be queſtioned that ſhe would have put him to death, on the ſcaffold; ſo that ſhe ought not to wonder, that the ill ſucceſs of her enterprize fell upon the heads of her husband and ſon. In all probability, ſhe was herſelf indebted to her ſex, for her own life; but, however this be, Edward, reſolving to ſacrifice Henry to his ſafety, ordered the duke of Glouceſter, whom all the hiſtorians unanimouſly repreſent, as a brutiſh and inhuman prince, to put him to death in priſon. It is pretended, that this prince would be the father's, as he had been the ſon's executioner, and that, entering his room, he ſtabbed him to the heart; but, as I obſerved, we ſhould read, with ſome caution, what the hiſtorians ſay of the princes of the houſe of York. 1471.

The death of Henry VI.

Thus, died Henry VI, in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of 38 years, before he was dethroned, and of ſeven months only after his reſtoration; and no prince ever had occaſioned, tho' innocently, more bloody tragedies, or cauſed a greater effuſion of blood, in his quarrel. Tho' his natural weakneſs rendered him incapable of governing his kingdom, and he, therefore, always gave himſelf up to the direction of others, he had ſome good qualities; which, after his death, were extolled, for virtues of the firſt claſs, in order to ſet, in a more deteſtable light, the perſon that deprived him of his crown and life; but all, that can be juſtly affirmed of this prince, is, that, conſidering him, in his private capacity, his life was innocent, or, at leaſt, not chargeable with the crimes but too common in the world; yet, if he is conſidered, as a ſovereign, he will appear to have acted neither good nor bad, through the whole courſe of his life. He founded Eaton-college near Windſor, and King's College, in Cambridge, for the benefit of Eaton-Scholars; which fundations are ſtill in being; and, after his death, his body was brought to St. Paul's, where it was, ſome time, expoſed to publick view, and afterwards interred, without any pomp, in a village near London. His character.

His foundations. Act. Pub.

The 12 battles, fought, ſince 1455, and the conſequent barbarous executions, had reduced the houſe of Lancaſter to two perſons only, viz. Margaret, daughter to John, duke of Somerſet, wife to Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, half-brother to Henry VI, and Henry, earl of Richmond, her ſon. Margaret had two other husbands, Henry, earl of Stafford, and Thomas Stanley, but had iſſue by neither; for I ſhall take no notice of Charles Somerſet, from whom the earls of Worceſter were derived, becauſe, being only natural ſon of the Beaufort-Somerſet family, he could have no pretenſions to the crown. The remains of the houſe of Lancaſter.

Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the young earl of Richmond, not having been expeditious enough to be preſent at the battle of Tewksbury, was extremely embarraſſed; and finding himſelf unable to ſupport alone the intereſts of the houſe of Lancaſter, he diſmiſſed his troops, and continued with the earl of Richmond, his nephew, in Wales, where he had many friends and great credit. Theſe being the only lords, that could give Edward any diſturbance, he paſſionately deſired to have them in his power; but, to execute this 1471. design, it was, by no means, proper to march his troops againſt them; for as this would warn them to leave the kingdom, ſo it was difficult even to ſeize their perſons, in a country where they had as many adherents, as there were inhabitants; wherefore, preferring policy to force, he ſent into thoſe parts Roger Vaughan, with orders to try all poſſible means to ſeize, or to diſpatch them. Vaughan not having been ſo ſecret, as was neceſſary, the earl of Pembroke, who had intelligence of his intent, pretending to fall into the villain's ſnare, ſlew him, and retired to Pembroke-caſtle, from whence he departed with Henry, his nephew, and embarqued in a veſſel for France; but, the winds driving them upon the coaſt of Bretagne, they were obliged to put into a port of that country. They intended to go to Paris; but, as they could not be excuſed from waiting on the duke of Bretagne, when they would have taken their leave, they were told they were not at liberty to purſue their voyage. The duke, believing that theſe two lords might be of ſome advantage to him, aſſigned them the town of Vannes, for their habitation, with an honourable allowance; yet, tho' they outwardly received all the reſpect due to their birth and quality, they were, in the interim, very narrowly watched.

Edward gets the lords to take the oath to his ſon. Act. Pub.

Edward, being perfectly reſtored, without any appearance of being again diſturbed, in the poſſeſſion of a crown, acquired with ſo much pains, aſſembled the lords ſpiritual and temporal, at Weſtminſter; and in a ſtudied ſpeech, in which he attempted to diſplay the title of the houſe of York to the crown, and did not forget his victories, he deſired that they would ſwear allegiance to prince Edward, his ſon, as to his apparent ſucceſſor, to which they were all inclined. The two archbiſhops, eight biſhops, five dukes, with all the earls and lords there preſent, took this oath, on the 3d of July; tho' many former examples had demonſtrated the little uſe of ſuch a precaution; and, without proceeding any farther, Edward might have remembered his father's oath to Henry VI, as well as his own, at York. However, he was perſuaded that people would be more ſcrupulous to him; but, after his deceaſe, his childeren unhappily experienced, that no ſtreſs is to be laid on ſuch aſſurances.

A pardon is granted to ſeven biſhops. Act. Pub.

Soon after, Edward granted a pardon to ſeven biſhops, who had declared againſt him, in the late revolution; and, from the beginning of his reign to the end, he continually endeavoured to carry it fair with the clergy. The reſt of the year was ſpent, in ſundry negotiations, which I ſhall briefly mention.

Negotiations with the king of Scotland. Act. Pub.

The firſt was with the king of Scotland; for, during the commotions, in England, the truce, between the Engliſh and Scots, had been often violated, contrary to the intention of the two monarchs. After Edward's reſtoration, the king of Scotland ſending ambaſſadors to him, it was agreed, to hold a congreſs, at Alnwick, the 24th of September, for a mutual reparation of the outrages committed by the two nations upon one another. The two kings were equally deſirous to preſerve the truce, and even to conclude a final peace; but this negotiation was not finiſhed, till 1473. It appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Edward impowered his ambaſſadors to propoſe a marriage, between the king of Scotland and an Engliſh princeſs; and I ſhall ſpeak, elſewhere, of the ſequel of this negotiation. 1471.

The truce with Bretagne is ratified. Act. Pub.

On the 20th of September, the 30 years truce with Bretagne was confirmed; which confirmation was neceſſary, as the truce had been frequently violated, during the earl of Warwick's adminiſtration.

A truce of eight months with France.

Lewis XI. was very ſenſible, that Edward had no reaſon to be pleaſed with him; yet he offered him a truce, that with Henry VI. being inſignificant, ſince Edward was reſtored. In the preſent poſture of the Engliſh affairs, it was, by no means, proper for Edward to renew the war with France; for his kingdom was too much exhauſted, to think ſo early of ſuch an undertaking; ſo that, without much intreaty, he agreed to prolong the truce, from the 1ſt of September, this year, to the 1ſt of May following; and this was only, whilſt he prepared to be revenged on Lewis, for aſſiſting queen Margaret.

The year 1472 did not abound with remarkable events, as the preceding; for it was almoſt entirely ſpent in ſeveral negotiations, tending to ſecure the tranquillity of the king and his ſubjects, by truces or alliances with foreign princes.

The negotiation with Scotland was ſtill carried on, tho' ſlowly, on account of the obſtacles that occurred, in the reparations demanded by each of the kings.

The differences between the Engliſh and Flemings.

It is evident from ſeveral papers of the Collection of the Publick Acts, that a diſpute aroſe, about the truce of commerce, for 30 years, between England and the duke of Burgundy's dominions; for, probably, during the earl of Warwick's miniſtry, the Engliſh had injured the duke's trading ſubjects; and the latter demanded reparation, for ſundry damages, affirming, that the truce was to be conſidered, as made with England, and not with the perſon of the reigning king. As for Edward, he did not think himſelf obliged to repair the damages done to the Flemings, during the earl of Warwick's adminiſtration; for, as theſe differences properly concerned only the merchants of both nations, it was the intereſt of the two princes, to live in a good underſtanding; wherefore, in treating of the outrages committed againſt the truce, they did not fail to negotiate a final peace.

Negotiations with the Hanſe-towns.

Another affair, of much the ſame nature with the Hanſe-towns *, created the king ſome 1472. ſome uneaſineſs; for theſe towns, of which Lubeck, Hamburgh, and Dantzick were the three principal, had obtained of the kings of England ſeveral privileges, for their merchants, becauſe their commerce was very beneficial to the Engliſh; but, under the frequent revolutions, during the civil wars, the Engliſh had injured the merchants of theſe towns, and in ſeveral reſpects violated their privileges. Upon this, the latter had procured from their magiſtrates letters of mart, which had turned theſe differences into an open war, deſtructive to both parties; and, at length, the troubles, in England, being over, the Hanſe-towns ſent ambaſſadors to the king, to demand a reparation of their loſſes, and to propoſe a renewal of alliance, to ſecure their privileges, and the trade and navigation of the Engliſh, in the northern ſeas. Edward gave the ambaſſadors a very civil reception, and appointed commiſſioners, who, after ſeveral conferences, agreed, that a congreſs ſhould be held, at Utrecht, to ſettle all things, to the ſatisfaction of both ſides; but this affair ſo abounded with difficulties, that it could not be ended, till 1474.

Some time after, Edward, by his letters patent, confirmed the antient alliance, between Richard II. and John, king of Portugal, for them and their ſucceſſors; and Alphonſo, king of that country, ſent him the like letters, dated, the 30th of Auguſt.

The earl of Oxford is taken and impriſoned, at Hammes,

During theſe tranſactions, the return of the earl of Oxford into England was a freſh cauſe of vexation to Edward; for the earl, a zealous adherent of the houſe of Lancaſter, had retired into France, after the battle of Tewksbury; but, as he was not very favourably received by Lewis XI, he returned into England, with 75 men, and took, by ſurprize, St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall. Edward, continually apprehenſive that the leaſt ſpark might rekindle the flames ſo happily extinguiſhed, immediately, ſent ſome troops into the weſt, with orders to inveſt the earl of Oxford, in the mount; but, the earl having had no time to provide againſt a ſiege, ſurrendered, before he was reduced to extremity. All he could obtain was only his life; for he loſt his liberty, and his eſtate was all confiſcated, without any allowance to his counteſs, ſiſter to the earl of Warwick, for her ſubſiſtence; and from St. Michael's Mount, he was conducted to the caſtle of Hammes, near Calais, where he remained a priſoner, 12 years.

and the archbiſhop of York, at Guiſnes.

The archbiſhop of York had much the ſame fate, tho' the king had pardoned him, and received his oath, at London, the day before the battle of Barnet; for he was the earl of Warwick's brother, and that was ſufficient, to render him ſuſpected; ſo that, notwithſtanding the pardon, he was confined, in the caſtle of Guiſnes, where he died, ſoon after.

The king had no conſiderable enemy left in the kingdom, except Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, who had taken ſanctuary, at Weſtminſter, after the battle of Barnet; who, growing weary of his confinement, employed his wife, Edward's ſiſter, to procure his pardon. They had lived ſeparate, ever ſince the beginning of the civil wars, becauſe the duke, whoſe grandmother was ſiſter to Henry IV, adhered to the Lancaſtrians, and his ducheſs had remained with the king, her brother; but this princeſs, inſtead of ſuing for her husband's pardon, deſired, on the contrary, to be legally divorced, and, tho' ſhe had no lawful cauſe, obtained her deſire; and, probably, by the king's ſollicitations. Thus, the duke of Exeter was conſtrained to continue in his ſanctuary, without any proſpect of a pardon, or any thing for his ſubſiſtence, but what was privately ſent him by his friends; but, at laſt, tired of living ſo immured, he quitted the place, tho' it does not appear, how, or when; for it is only known, that, in 1474, he was found dead upon the ſea-ſhore, in the county of Kent.

1472. The death of the duke of Exeter. Stow.

Edward, having nothing more to fear, after the death, impriſonment, or exile of all the principal adherents of the houſe of Lancaſter, gave too great a looſe to his revenge, upon perſons of an inferior condition; ſome of whom were put to death, and others fined immoderately, as a puniſhment for taking up arms againſt him; but what, moſt of all, troubled him was the eſcape of the earls of Pembroke and Richmond; for he ſeemed to foreſee the evil that was to befal his family, from that quarter. The earl of Richmond was, as I obſerved, the only ſurviving branch of the houſe of Lancaſter, or rather the only perſon that could pretend to diſpute the crown with Edward, ſince he was ſon to a princeſs of that houſe; and he was accompanied by the earl of Pembroke, his uncle, a lord of great merit, who was very capable of directing him. Tho' they were both abſent, and as priſoners, in Bretagne, they gave extreme uneaſineſs to the king, who wiſhed to ſee the quarrel between the two houſes entirely ended, by the death of the young earl, to whom all the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter were fallen; and, with this view, he ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Bretagne, intreating him to deliver the two Engliſh lords he had in his power; but the duke very civilly deſired to be excuſed. He promiſed, however, to watch them ſo narrowly, that they ſhould never be able to hurt him; and, upon this account, Edward paid him, yearly, a large penſion, under the pretence of a maintenance for the two priſoners.

Edward perſecutes the Lancaſtrians.

In the mean while, the negotiation with Scotland was carried on; and, as great difficulties occurred, it was agreed, between the plenipotentiaries of the two kings, that the truce ſhould ſubſiſt, till July, 1473.

A truce with Scotland. Act. Pub.

the chief trading-places, in Europe, to the number of 72, entered into the confederacy. In the flouriſhing times of their alliance, theſe Hanſe-towns had four general ſtaples, viz. London, Bruges, in Flanders, Bergen in Norway, and Novogrod, in Ruſſia; but, at preſent, the Hanſe-towns are, in a manner, reduced to theſe ſix, Lubeck, Hamburgh, Bremen, Roſtock, Dantzick, and Cologne.

Edward

1472. Edward, having ſettled his affairs, to his ſatisfaction, remembered the honourable and hearty reception he had met with, in Holland, from Lewis de Bruges, lord of Gruthuyſe; and, in return, after he had ſo managed, that the parliament petitioned him to create that foreign lord a peer of England, he made him earl of Wincheſter, and afterwards, by letters patent, allowed him to beat the arms of England, in his ſcutcheon.

Gruthuyſe is made earl of Wincheſter.

Before I conclude the events of this year, I ſhall briefly mention the ſtate of affairs, between Lewis XI. and the duke of Burgundy; for the knowledge of their diſputes is very requiſite, for the underſtanding of the Hiſtory of England. Lewis, as I ſaid, at the inſtance of the duke of Bretagne and the conſtable de St. Pol, who ſtudied only to deceive him, had begun the war with the duke of Burgundy, and taken from him Amiens and St. Quentin; but, by the means of good ſpies, he diſcovered, at length, that he was engaged in that war, purely for the accompliſhment of the projected marriage, between the duke of Guienne, his brother, and the duke of Burgundy's daughter; and, therefore, to free himſelf, at once, from the troubles intended to be raiſed by his brother, he ordered a poiſon to be given him, that was to operate ſlowly, that his death might be aſcribed to a common diſtemper. In the interim, leſt the duke of Burgundy, being too much preſſed, ſhould take new meaſures with the duke of Bretagne and the conſtable, he ſent to offer him a truce; and the duke could wiſh for nothing more advantageous, in his preſent circumſtances; but, as he had reaſon to fear, that the propoſal was deſigned only to amuſe him, Lewis fully impowered the duke of Bretagne to conclude the truce, in his name. As the latter could not refuſe to undertake this affair, without diſcovering himſelf, he ſent the biſhop of Leon, as a mediator, to Cambray, where the treaty was to be negotiated; and both parties were ſo willing to agree, that it was impoſſible for the biſhop to prevent the ſigning of a truce, for 13 months, from the firſt of April, 1472, to the firſt of May, 1473; but, about ſix weeks after the concluſion of the truce, the duke of Guienne died, and Lewis took poſſeſſion of that dutchy, without oppoſition.

The ſtate of affairs between Lewis and the duke of Burgundy. Commin.

The duke of Burgundy, now, perceived, that Lewis had granted him a truce, only to have leiſure to ſecure Guienne, and that, on all occaſions, he ſhould be that prince's dupe, as ſoon as their affairs ſhould be determined, by way of negotiation; ſo that, being highly provoked to ſee himſelf, thus, amuſed, and finding that, with ſuch enemies, the moſt effectual method was to act, with open force, and make them, at leaſt, run an equal ſhare of the danger, he entered France, and deſtroyed whatever he met in his way, with fire and ſword. The duke of Bretagne, ſeeing his projects vaniſhing, by the death of the duke of Guienne, ſeriouſly reſolved to join with the duke of Burgundy, being perſuaded that the preſervation of both depended upon their being ſtrictly united; and, in the interim, Lewis, foreſeeing that the duke of Bretagne would certainly take that courſe, had already ſent troops into Anjou, to keep him in awe. 1472.

Whilſt Lewis was ſtill employed, in Guienne, the duke of Burgundy, making ſome progreſs, in Picardy, took Neſle and Roye; but he ſpent two whole months, before Beauvais, to no purpoſe. This accident was the cauſe, that Lewis, not perceiving himſelf much preſſed, left his troops, in Anjou; ſo that, the duke of Bretagne, not daring to ſtir from his country, was hindered from joining his ally, according to agreement; but, at length, the duke of Burgundy, raiſing the ſiege of Beauvais, came into Normandy, in expectation of the duke of Bretagne. In the interim, Lewis was ſomewhat embarraſſed; for, by leaving his troops, in Anjou, he expoſed Picardy and Normandy to the duke of Burgundy's attacks; and, if he marched to the aſſiſtance of theſe two provinces, he left the duke of Bretagne at liberty to make a powerful diverſion, in his neighbourhood; but he ſoon freed himſelf from this perplexity. By the help of the duke of Bretagne's miniſters, whom he brought over to his intereſt, he found means to make a truce with that prince, and perſuade him to renounce the duke of Burgundy's alliance; which unexpected defection obliged the duke of Burgundy to accept of a truce offered him by Lewis, and that was often prolonged. Commin.

Before we enter upon the events of 1473, it muſt be obſerved, that all the Engliſh hiſtorians are miſtaken, in a whole year, placing, in this, what happened in the following year. Biondi owns, that the French place, in 1475, what the Engliſh fix to 1474; and he adds, that he chuſes to follow the Engliſh, by which he is guilty of their miſtake. This appears ſo manifeſtly from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that there is no room to queſtion it; and, indeed, the year 1473 was ſo barren of events, that it is not very ſurpriſing, if it was confounded or joined with the next; but the affairs, which ought to be aſſigned to 1473, tho' they are of no importance, in themſelves, ſerve to diſtinguiſh theſe two years, and rectify the chronology. 1473. The miſtakes of the Engliſh hiſtorians.

The king of Portugal demanding the reſtitution of ſome Portugueſe veſſels taken by the Engliſh, inquiry was made, which diſcovered that theſe ſhips were plundered by the baſtard of Falconbridge, during his revolt againſt Edward; wherefore, the king of Portugal deſiſted from his demand. An agreement with Portugal. Act. Pub.

Edward was taken up, a conſiderable part of this year, with the affairs of Scotland; and, at laſt, by a treaty concluded, at Alnwick, the 28th of September, it was agreed, that the truce of Newcaſtle ſhould be inviolably obſerved by both nations. The confirmation of the truce with Scotland.

Edward's differences with the Hanſe-towns were likewiſe decided, at the congreſs of Utrecht, the 19th of September.

There were alſo ſome negotiations, about the 30 years truce of commerce, between England and the duke of Burgundy's dominions; but we do not find, that any thing was Negotiations with the duke of Burgundy.

1473. was concluded, in the affair; which, probably, was only a pretence for more ſecret and important negotiations, as will be ſeen, hereafter.

An alliance with Denmark. Act. Pub.

The alliance, between England and Denmark, being frequently violated, during the civil wars, in England, the two monarchs were equally deſirous to renew it; and, with this view, they agreed, that, without inquiring into the mutual damages, the Engliſh and Danes had done one another, the alliance ſhould remain upon the ſame footing, as before the violation.

This is all worth notice, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, for 1473; let us now proceed to the following year, which will afford us more plenty of matter.

1474. The deſigns of the duke of Burgundy. Commin.

The duke of Burgundy, as I obſerved, obtained a truce, which was afterwards prolonged, twice or thrice, till 1475; and, during this truce, he was employed, in conquering the duchy of Gueldres. Arnold, duke of that name, diſpleaſed with Adolphus, his ſon, who had, for ſome time, kept him in priſon, made a grant of his duchy to the duke of Burgundy; upon which pretence, entering Gueldres, he defeated Adolphus, and, taking him priſoner, ſeized upon the duchy.

Mezerai. Commin.

This acquiſition exciting him to new conqueſts, he conſidered, how to enlarge his dominions, on the ſide of Germany, and formed projects too vaſt, and too difficult to be put in execution. Mezerai affirms, that he promiſed his daughter in marriage to Maximilian, ſon to the emperor Frederick, upon condition that his dominions ſhould be erected into a kingdom; and he adds, that this affair miſcarried, becauſe the duke would have the condition performed, before the marriage, in order to ſign the contract, as king; but the emperor would, firſt, have the marriage conſummated. However this be, the duke, deſigning to extend his dominions, in Germany, embraced the firſt opportunity, to carry his arms into that country; and a diſpute, about the archbiſhop of Cologn, ariſing between Robert of Bavaria and the brother of the Landgrave of Heſſe, furniſhed him with the deſired pretence. He, immediately, took the prince of Bavaria's part, and beſieged Nuz, a ſtrong town in the archbiſhoprick of Cologn; believing that the taking of that place would promote the execution of his other deſigns.

The truce with the king of France being to laſt, till June, 1475, the duke of Burgundy expected to be maſter of Nuz, before it was expired; but Lewis threw ſuch obſtacles in his way, that he could not accompliſh his deſigns, ſo ſoon as he imagined. Lewis ſo managed, that the emperor Frederick drew together a numerous army, to oblige the duke to raiſe the ſiege; and the dukes of Lorrain and Auſtria, and the Switzers, entered into a league againſt him; ſo that, finding himſelf extremely embarraſſed, to reſiſt ſo many enemies, he continued, 10 months before Nuz, without being able to take the place. Whilſt he was employed in the ſiege, he perceived no other way, to free himſelf from the perſecutions of his enemy, than to engage the king of England, to make a powerful diverſion, in France; and, therefore, he ſent ambaſſadors to Edward, to perſuade him to make war upon their common enemy. The more effectually to gain his end, he promiſed to join Edward, with all his forces, the moment he landed, in Picardy; and he alſo induced him to hope, that the conſtable de St. Pol would deliver him St. Quentin, the duke of Bretagne league with them, and, by the means of that prince's adherents, in France, he would put the kingdom in ſuch confuſion, that the conqueſt of it would be rendered much eaſier, than in the reign of Charles VI.

1474. He engages Edward to league with him againſt France.

This was preciſely the opportunity, that Edward impatiently expected, to be revenged on Lewis XI. Every thing ſeemed to conſpire to the ruin of that turbulent prince, ſince he was about to be attacked by three formidable powers, beſides his danger from his own ſubjects; and, indeed, if all his enemies had acted, with the ſame ardor, as Edward, he would, doubtleſs, have run the hazard of ſeeing his affairs, in great diſorder; but, in all probability, the duke of Burgundy had no other view, than to engage Edward to make a diverſion, in France, in order to prevent Lewis from diſturbing him, in Germany. However this be, acting as if he really intended to undertake the conqueſt of France, jointly with the king of England, he gave very ample powers to his ambaſſadors, to treat with him, upon that point; and the plenipotentiaries of the two princes, having ſettled all the articles, ſigned, about the end of July, ſeveral treaties relating to this important undertaking.

Several treaties between Edward and the duke of Burgundy.

The firſt was a treaty of amity, alliance, and confederacy, between the king of England and duke of Burgundy, who mutually promiſed to aſſiſt each other, to the utmoſt of their power.

The ſecond contained certain private conventions, about the war they were to carry into France, compriſed in the eight following articles:

I. That Edward ſhould paſs into France, at the head of 10,000 men, at leaſt, all well armed and well appointed, before the firſt of July, 1475, to recover the duchies of Guienne and Normandy, and the whole kingdom of France.

II. That the duke of Burgundy ſhould aſſiſt him, in perſon, with all his forces.

III. That the king ſhould not accept any propoſal of peace, or truce, without the duke's conſent.

IV. The duke of Burgundy alſo engaged in the ſame manner.

V. That the two princes ſhould cauſe the war to be proclaimed, each in his dominions, againſt Lewis, as their common enemy.

VI. That, directly after the war was begun, or proclaimed, the two allies ſhould attack the common enemy, in the moſt proper places; yet ſo as to be within diſtance to aſſiſt one another.

1474. VII. That, if one of the two princes ſhould beſiege a town, or be forced to give battle, the other ſhould join him, with all his forces, and at his own charges, that both might run the ſame hazard; and that their lieutenants ſhould be obliged to do the ſame.

VIII. That, upon the commencement of the war, neither ſhould deſiſt, whilſt the other ſhould deſire to continue it; and that, if one was abſent, his lieutenant ſhould obey the other, in whatever concerned the common good of both allies.

The third treaty contained an explication of one of the articles of the firſt; namely, that each of the two allies ſhould aſſiſt the other, with all his forces; and, as this expreſſion was too general, they agreed upon the number and pay of the troops, they were to ſupply.

The fourth was a grant, from Edward to the duke of Burgundy, of ſeveral provinces of France, in conſideration of the future ſervices of that prince, in aſſiſting him to recover that kingdom; which grant included the duchy of Bar, the earldoms of Champagne, Nevers, Retel, Eu, Guiſe, the barony of Douſy, and all the towns, on both ſides of the Somme; and, laſtly, all the lands poſſeſſed by the earl of St. Pol and held of Guienne, Normandy, or the crown of France. He likewiſe renounced the homage of all theſe provinces, as well as of Burgundy, the earldoms of Charolois and Macon, of Flanders, Artois, and, in general, of all the territories the duke actually enjoyed, or acquired by this grant; and, in fine, he added, his intent was, that this conveyance ſhould be as firm, as if ratified by the eſtates, promiſing to procure their confirmation of the whole, as ſoon as he ſhould be in poſſeſſion of the crown of France.

The fifth was an agreement, by which the duke of Burgundy engaged to furniſh, for the war, an army of between 10 and 20,000 men. Edward promiſed, on his part, to aſſign him, yearly, the pay of theſe troops, upon the provinces included in the foreſaid grant, provided they were conquered; and, if not, upon other demeſnes of the crown, in proportion to what ſhould be wanted; but, if the aſſignment of the pay was not made, before the end of every year, he agreed, that the duke ſhould not be obliged to find any troops, the following year.

The ſixth and laſt article was, in the form of letters patent, by which the duke of Burgundy agreed, that Edward and his ſucceſſors, kings of France, ſhould have free liberty to enter Rheims, in order to be crowned, and depart, without any impediment; and this act was neceſſary, Champagne being included in the grant.

The king's and duke's motives, in this treaty.

This was, in reality, ſelling the bear's skin, before he was killed; yet it is not very difficult to diſcover the motives of the conduct of both theſe princes, ſince it is certain that they deſigned to deceive each other. They were both too wiſe, to expect to conquer France, with the ſtipulated forces; but the duke of Burgundy's intent was to engage Edward to make a powerful diverſion, in that kingdom, by perſuading him, that he might eaſily become maſter of it; whilſt Edward feigned, on his part, to be allured with this proſpect, the better to engage the duke of Burgundy to lend him a ſufficient ſupply, to recover Guienne and Normandy; and this is neither the firſt nor the laſt time, that princes have diſſembled, in their treaties. 1474.

Edward, having ſigned all theſe treaties, ſet about preparations for the intended war; and, firſt of all, he aſſembled a parliament, which readily allowed him a ſubſidy; for, ſince the reign of Edward III, the parliaments ſeldom wanted much ſollicitation to grant money, for a war with France. Edward no ſooner found himſelf ſupported by his parliament, than he iſſued out commiſſions, to levy a much greater number of troops, than he had promiſed, in his treaty with Burgundy; and, indeed, as the war was upon his account, it was requiſite to exert himſelf, in proportion to the greatneſs of the undertaking. In the mean while, he ſent ambaſſadors to divers courts, as well to make alliances with ſeveral princes, as to prevent their union with his enemy; for it appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he ſent to the emperor Frederick, Ferdinand, king of Sicily, the king of Hungary, and ſome others, to perſuade them to enter into the league. Edward prepares for the war.

He concludes the marriage of Cecily, his daughter, with the prince of Scotland.

At the ſame time, he ſecured himſelf againſt any diverſions from the Scots, by a match between Cecily, his ſecond daughter, and the king of Scotland's eldeſt ſon; and this marriage, the firſt overture of which was made, in the beginning of the year, was, at length, concluded, the 30th of July, and, October the 18th, the young prince and princeſs were contracted, by proxies. Some days after, the truce of Newcaſtle, which was to laſt, till 1519, was again ratified, at Edinburgh; but, the affianced couple being yet too young, it was agreed, that they ſhould be married, as ſoon as they were both of fit age; and that, in the interim, Edward ſhould pay, at ſeveral times, his daughter's dowry, conſiſting of 20,000 marks ſterling.

1475. He raiſes money, by way of benevolence. Hall. Habington.

Edward, having, thus, guarded againſt the Scots, carried on his preparations, with great hopes that his deſigns would prove ſucceſsful; and, the parliamentary ſubſidy ſeeming inſufficient, or part of it, perhaps, being applied to other uſes, he borrowed money of all his wealthy ſubjects. Some contributed chearfully; others were gained by the king's flatteries; and ſome dreaded his diſpleaſure, and, perhaps, ſome violence, in caſe of a refuſal. In general, few dared to diſobey; and this ſort of aid was called by the new name of benevolence, to intimate that private perſons had granted it, freely and of their own accord. In the mean time, theſe loans, raiſed without the authority of parliament, had a very dangerous tendency; yet no murmurs were heard, ſince it was to make war with France. It is reported, that Edward himſelf asking a rich widow, what ſhe would lend him, ſhe replied, "She could not refuſe 20l. ſterling to a "prince

1475. "prince who borrowed, with ſo good a "grace;" and the king, as much pleaſed with the lady's politeneſs as her preſent, very courteouſly gave her a kiſs, which ſhe looked upon, as ſuch an honour, that ſhe doubled the ſum ſhe had promiſed.

He deſigns 3000 men for Bretagne. Act. Pub.

Amongſt the new-raiſed troops, 3000 men were deſigned for the duke of Bretagne, purſuant to a ſecret treaty between him and Edward; yet that prince had lately changed the truce with Lewis into a perpetual peace. However, being informed of the league, between Edward and the duke of Burgundy, he deſired to be included, but ſecretly, leſt he ſhould be oppreſſed, before his allies were ready; and the lords Audley and Duras were to command the ſuccours intended for Bretagne.

He paſſes over to Calais:

The army being in a readineſs to depart, Edward embarqued, at Sandwich, the 20th of June, having appointed the prince of Wales, his ſon, only five years old, guardian of the realm, in his abſence; and, according to a certain hiſtorian, he found, at Dover, 500 tranſports ſent by the duke of Burgundy, which is improbable; and Mezerai, on the contrary, tells us, that the Engliſh troops ſpent three weeks, in paſſing to Calais; which ſhews, that there were but few veſſels, or elſe a very great number of troops. Philip de Commines aſſures us, that no king of England ever led into France ſuch a powerful army; but this is an hyperbolical ſpeech, or not exactly true; ſince it is evident that this army was far from being ſo numerous, as that led by Edward III. into France, a little before the treaty of Bretigny. However, it is not eaſy to know the preciſe number of the troops, ſince the hiſtorians only relate that of the horſe, without any mention of the foot; but, if we judge by the uſual proportion, in thoſe days, when the cavalry was much more relied on than the infantry, this army was not ſo great, as it is pretended, ſince there were only 1500 men at arms, and 15000 archers, on horſeback; moreover, by Edward's treaty with the duke of Burgundy, he was to find no more than 10,000 men. In fine, it will appear from the ſequel, that he made peace with Lewis, without opening the campaign, when he perceived that he could not depend upon the duke of Burgundy's aid; which, doubtleſs, he would not have done, before he had rendered himſelf formidable by ſome exploit, had he been ſo ſuperior, as he is repreſented.

He proclaims war by a herald. Lewis's anſwer,

Edward, arriving at Calais, ſent a herald to Lewis, to ſummon him to reſtore the whole kingdom of France, and, in caſe of refuſal, to proclaim war againſt him; but Lewis, hearing the herald, in private, told him he had received certain advice, that Edward was not come, of his own accord, to make war, but by the inſtigation of the duke of Burgundy and the conſtable de St Pol, who, he might aſſure his maſter, would both deceive him; and then, after asking him ſome queſtions, which led the herald to ſay, that, when he made any offers of peace, he ſhould apply to the lords Howard and Stanley, he preſented him with and preſent to the herald.

300 crowns, and 30 yards of velvet, to make him a robe. He did not, doubtleſs, expect to reap great advantages from the herald, by this liberality, ſince the man was a ſtranger to his maſter's inward reſolution; but his intent was to ſhew Edward's courtiers, what they might expect from him, for more important ſervices; and the herald took care to magnify his preſent, and relate to the lord Howard, who was the king's chief favourite, what paſſed between Lewis and him. 1475.

Edward hears no news of the duke of Burgundy, Hall,

In the mean time, Edward, advancing into Picardy, in hopes of meeting the duke of Burgundy, found not ſo much as a ſingle man from him; and, ſurpriſed at ſo ſeemingly ſtrange a proceeding, he ſent to the duke, who was ſtill before Nuz, to know the reaſon; but it will be neceſſary briefly to mention, here, the ſtate of the duke of Burgundy's affairs.

The ſtate of the duke of Burgundy's affairs; Mezerai. Commin.

The duke was intent upon the ſiege of Nuz, hoping to take it, and Cologne too, before Edward's arrival in France; but, the emperor approaching with an army four times as ſtrong as the duke's, tho' without offering him battle, the beſiegers were ſo harraſſed, that the ſiege was retarded; and yet the duke obſtinately continued it to ſhew, that the emperor, with all his forces, was unable to raiſe it. Nothing could be more advantageous to the king of France, or more detrimental to the duke's affairs, than this vain-glorious obſtinacy; for, firſt of all, it prevented his joining the king of England. In the interim, Sigiſmund, duke of Auſtria, diſpoſſeſs'd him of the earldom of Ferette; and the duke of Lorraine ravaged Luxemburgh. Upon the expiration of his truce with France, Lewis made himſelf maſter of Roye, Corbie, and Montdidier; and, in fine, when it was too late, and he was within eight days of taking of the place, preſſed by Edward's inſtances, he agreed, that it ſhould be delivered to a legate, to be diſpoſed of, at the pope's pleaſure. After the raiſing of the ſiege, the duke's army was ſo unfit for a march, that, inſtead of ſpeedily joining the Engliſh, it was put into ſummer quarters; and then he went himſelf, with a very ſmall train, to excuſe himſelf to Edward; but it was not eaſy for the king to digeſt his negligence, in ſuch an important affair. He began, from that time, to perceive, that he was engaged in the war, for the intereſt of others, whereas he had, hitherto, imagined the contrary; and the duke of Burgundy's precaution, to admit but a few Engliſh, at once, into Peronne, confirmed the king's ſuſpicions. At laſt, he was entirely undeceived by the behaviour of the conſtable de St. Pol, commander in St. Quentin; who, being one of the chief promoters of the war, becauſe he ſolely founded his greatneſs upon the diſſenſion, between the king of France and the duke of Burgundy, had poſitively promiſed, to deliver St. Quentin to the king of England. Upon this aſſurance, the duke of Burgundy would have conducted Edward into the place, to induce him to be patient, upon the receipt of ſo good a pledge; but, upon their approach, they were fired upon from the town; and, at the ſame time, a body of horſe, ſallying out, killed ſome Engliſh ſoldiers, who were moſt eager to enter,

1475. an eaſy admittance. In all probability, the duke of Burgundy himſelf was deceived, upon this occaſion, by the conſtable; for it is unlikely, that he ſhould, on purpoſe, cauſe ſuch an affront to be put upon a prince, whom he ſtill wanted, and who had him in his power. However, he did all that was poſſible, to excuſe the conſtable, and feed the king's hopes; but, finding that Edward, inſtead of giving credit to his words, bitterly reproached him, he left him, next day, under the pretence of haſtening his troops; and, perhaps, he was apprehenſive, that Edward might purſue his reſentment.

Edward, being, thus, deſerted by the duke of Burgundy and the conſtable, and not hearing that the duke of Bretagne made any motion, or that there was the appearance of any inſurrections, in France, in his favour, was extremely embarraſſed; and, in the interim, a French priſoner, the only one taken, ſince the arrival of the Engliſh army, being releaſed, by the king's order, the lords Howard and Stanley charged him, to preſent their reſpects to the king, his maſter. The priſoner diſcharging his commiſſion, Lewis was inclined to believe, that this compliment was made him, deſignedly, calling to mind what the Engliſh herald told him about theſe lords; for he perceived, that the court of England deſired to enter into a treaty, but would not make the firſt advances; and, for his part, not being ſo ſcrupulous, he reſolved to improve this ſort of overture. Philip de Commines affirms, that he cauſed a perſon of no note, but of good ſenſe, to be dreſſed, like a herald, and, having fully inſtructed him, ſent him to the Engliſh army, to demand a ſafe-conduct for ambaſſadors, and addreſs himſelf, with that view, to the lords Howard and Stanley; which pretended herald, being admitted into the king's preſence, repreſented to him, "That "he was ordered by the king, his maſter, to "tell him, that the war, between their two "kingdoms, muſt neceſſarily prove deſtruc-"tive to both; and that the mutual trade of "the two nations was, on the contrary, a "manifeſt advantage, which ought to be che-"riſhed. Then he excuſed the king his "maſter's countenancing the earl of Warwick, "aſſuring him, that it did not proceed from "ill-will to Edward, but to the duke of Bur-"gundy, his implacable enemy. He added, "that the duke of Burgundy's and the con-"ſtable's inſincerity was ſo glaring, that it "was needleſs to mention it, ſince he was "no ſtranger to the effects; that he was "come in arms into a country, where he had "neither caſtles, nor friends, and he referred "it to his judgment, whether the conqueſt "of France was ſo eaſy, as he had been made "to believe; that, however, the king, his maſ-"ter, being ſenſible, that ſo great an arma-"ment could not be made, without a vaſt ex-"pence, was very willing ſo to give him ſatiſ-"faction, as that he ſhould have reaſon to "be contented; and that, therefore, he de-"manded a ſafe-conduct for ambaſſadors, with "a train of 100 horſe, that they might treat "in a proper place, with thoſe of England, 1475. "about a firm and laſting peace, between the "two kings and their ſubjects.

Lewis offers a peace. Commin.

This propoſal being very agreeable to Edward, in his preſent circumſtances, the herald was diſmiſſed, with a preſent and the deſired ſafe-conduct; and, the ſame day, or the next, Edward called a council, at which were preſent all the lords of the army, to the number of 18; wherein it was reſolved, almoſt unanimouſly, that the lord Howard and three others ſhould confer with the king of France's ambaſſadors; and they were fully impowered to conclude a peace, upon theſe terms, That Lewis ſhould pay the king, within a fortnight, 75000 crowns, and, thenceforward, 50,000, yearly, at two payments, during the lives of the two kings. 2. That the king of France ſhould marry the dauphin, his ſon, to the king's eldeſt, or ſecond, daughter, and allow his daughter-in-law 60,000 livres a year. Upon theſe conditions, the ambaſſadors were to promiſe, in the king's name, that he would return into England, with his troops, directly after the receipt of the 75000 crowns; to conclude a treaty of amity and alliance, between the two kings, with a promiſe of mutual aſſiſtance againſt their rebellious ſubjects; and, laſtly, to ſign a truce, for ſeven years.

The conditons offered to the king of France.

The plenipotentiaries of the two monarchs meeting, near Amiens, at almoſt an equal diſtance from the two armies, the treaty was concluded, the 28th, or 29th, of Auguſt, as Edward deſired, without any material alteration; and, every thing being, thus, ſettled, ſeparate writings were drawn up, on each particular article of the treaty.

The treaty of Amiens or Pequigny. Act. Pub.

By the firſt, the two kings engaged to decide all their differences by arbitrators, viz. the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the duke of Clarence, for the king of England, and, for the king of France, the archbiſhop of Lyons and the earl of Dunois; moreover, Edward promiſed to quit the French territories, upon the receipt of the 75000 crowns, without doing any damage, and to leave hoſtages, for the performance of his word.

The ſecond related to the ſeven years truce, in which were included all the allies of both the kings, and expreſly the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, if they deſired the ſame.

The third contained a mutual engagement of brotherly friendſhip, between the two kings, and expreſs articles, about the dauphin's marriage with Eliſabeth, daughter to Edward.

The fourth was, in the form of letters patent, by which Lewis promiſed to pay, annually, to Edward, during their lives, 50,000 crowns; which the Engliſh authors call a tribute, tho' the letters patent do not ſpecify, under what title this yearly penſion was to be paid. Some affirm, that it was limited to nine years; but we do not find any other limitation, than the lives of the two kings.

Laſtly, Edward engaged to releaſe queen Margaret, for 50,000 crowns, which the king of France was to pay, within five years; and it appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Margaret was enlarged, the beginning 1475. ginning of November, this year, Lewis XI. having punctually paid her ranſom.

The duke of Burgundy falls out with Edward.

The duke of Burgundy, hearing that the two kings had begun to treat, immediately, left his army, to which he was returned, and made all poſſible haſte, in hopes of preventing the blow; but, finding the truce was already ſigned, he fell upon Edward, with bitter reproaches; to which Edward gave a ſuitable anſwer, at the ſame time, telling him, that he had taken care to include him in the truce. However, the duke fiercely replied, that he had no occaſion for his mediation, and valued it ſo little, that, if he treated for himſelf, it ſhould not be, till three months after his arrival in England. Thus, parting extremely incenſed againſt each other, the duke retired into his country; and the conſtable de St Pol did all that was poſſible, to perſuade Edward to violate the truce, offering to deliver up St. Quentin, and lend him 50,000 crowns; but Edward was far from renewing the war, for his ſake, and confiding in his promiſes, after having been ſo manifeſtly deceived.

Commin.

Commin. Before Edward's departure for England, it was judged proper, that the two kings ſhould have an interview, upon Pequigny-bridge, with a bar, or grate, between them; and Lewis came firſt to the place, attended with the cardinal of Bourbon, and five other lords. Edward alſo arrived, afterwards, with a few attendants; and having both ſwore to obſerve the late treaty, Lewis, inviting Edward to Paris, told him, that he would procure him agreeable diverſions with the fair ladies of that city; and if he treſpaſſed upon his chaſtity, the cardinal of Bourbon ſhould be his confeſſor, who would eaſily abſolve him. After ſome other railleries; Lewis made a ſign to the lords that were with him, to retire; and the Engliſh alſo did the ſame. The two kings, being alone, talked, a conſiderable while, together; and it was afterwards known, that the conſtable and the duke of Burgundy were the ſubjects of their diſcourſe. As for the conſtable, Edward would not be concerned for him; and, as to Burgundy, Lewis asking him, how he ſhould act, if that prince refuſed to be included in the truce, Edward replied, that he might do, as he pleaſed, if the duke ſhould reject another offer; but, as for the duke of Bretagne, he aſſured him, that he would aſſiſt him, if attacked, to the utmoſt of his power. Lewis thought it expedient to drop that ſubject; and, in fine, they parted very good friends.

The conference of the two kings, at Pequigny.

Lewis civilly refuſes Edward's viſit. Commin.

This interview being over, Lewis went to Amiens, where the lord Howard followed him, as an hoſtage; and, whilſt Lewis was waſhing his hands, before ſupper, Howard whiſpered him in his ear, that he would undertake to perſuade the king, his maſter, to take a journey to Paris; to which Lewis returned no anſwer. Howard often gave hints, to the ſame purpoſe, at table, without the king's ſeeming to take any notice; yet he cauſed him to be afterwards told, that the war, he was about to wage with the duke of Burgundy, not permitting him to go to Paris, he was extremely ſorry, that he could not enjoy the honour deſigned him by the king. Philip de Commines remarks, on this occaſion, that Lewis dreaded nothing more, than to ſee Edward reliſh France, nor deſired any thing, more paſſionately, than his return into England. He was ſo apprehenſive, that Edward would repent of the truce, that he privately beſtowed penſions upon his principal counſellors, to induce them to keep him in the reſolution to obſerve it; and Commines could relate theſe things, with certainty, ſince he was, then, in Lewis's ſervice and confidence. He likewiſe adds, that the duke of Glouceſter, who was againſt the truce, waiting upon the king of France, was received with extraordinary reſpect; and that the king omitted nothing, to gain ſuch of Edward's courtiers, as were in any credit, to his intereſt. The Engliſh army approaching Amiens, Lewis ordered the gates to be kept open, and that the publick inns ſhould entertain, at free coſt, all the Engliſh that came there; moreover, he ſent to the king of England a preſent of 300 waggon-loads of wine, for the uſe of his army; ſo deſirous was he to gain the hearts of the Engliſh, leſt ſome one of them ſhould make Edward ſenſible of his error. This preſent occaſioned it to be ſaid, that he ſent home the Engliſh, with cart-loads of wine; and, at length, all Lewis's fears vaniſhed, with the departure of the Engliſh, who went away, as an Engliſh hiſtorian obſerves, extremely well pleaſed with the French gold and wine; adding, that the penſions, aſſigned to Edward's principal courtiers, amounted, yearly, to 16000 crowns.

Lewis gives penſions to the Engliſh. Commin.

The duke of Burgundy, unwilling to deſire to be included in the truce, made by Edward, without his privity, ſtood out, for ſome time, and, at laſt, accepted of a ſeparate truce, offered him by Lewis; but, as for the conſtable, who had deceived the three princes, and been the chief author of their diviſion, he was, at length, abandoned by all, and obliged to retire into the duke of Burgundy's dominions, upon the faith of a ſafe-conduct; however, in ſpite of that ſecurity, he was delivered by the duke to the king of France, who commanded him to be beheaded; a neceſſary leſſon for thoſe that labour to ſow diſcord among princes!

The conſtable is beheaded. Commin.

Lewis would have been glad, that the duke of Bretagne had been, thus, ſacrificed to him; but that prince had in his hands a pledge, that enſured Edward's protection, or elſe that monarch would have regarded him no more than the duke of Burgundy; namely, the earl of Richmond, who, tho' abſent, gave the king of England the greateſt uneaſineſs. If the duke of Bretagne had permitted that prince and the earl of Pembroke, his uncle, to eſcape, they might, in time, have revived the Lancaſtrian party, and, perhaps, have forced Edward to hazard a 13th battle, to ſupport himſelf on the throne; and, it was, indeed, on this account, that he told Lewis, who ſtrenuouſly preſſed him, ſeveral times, to deſert

The reaſon of Edward's ſtanding by the duke of Bretagne.

1475. the duke of Bretagne, that, on the contrary, he would defend him, to the utmoſt of his power.

1476. Edward demands the earl of Richmond of the duke of Bretagne.

This open demonſtration of friendſhip, for the duke of Bretagne, leading Edward to conclude, that the duke would rejoice at an opportunity, to ſhew his acknowledgment, he ſent ambaſſadors to him, under the pretence of renewing their truce; and very few difficulties occurred in this negotiation. The duke very readily agreed to confirm the truce, tho' often violated by the Engliſh; and he even deſiſted from his demand of 50,000 crowns, for the damages ſuſtained by his ſubjects. The king, on his part, dropped his demands upon him, for the armament made in his favour; and, every thing being, thus, upon the terms of a perfect good underſtanding, between the two princes, the ambaſſadors, acquainting the duke with the main buſineſs of their ambaſſy, repreſented to him, that the king, their maſter, was ardently deſirous, entirely to extinguiſh the flames of the two factions, which had been ſo long kindled, in England; that, as the earl of Richmond, now in Bretagne, was the only ſurviving perſon of the houſe of Lancaſter, he deſigned to marry him to one of his daughters, in order to unite the two houſes; and that, therefore, he requeſted him to ſend him the earl, that he might give him marks of his favour, and ſo manifeſt to all his ſubjects his earneſt deſire of procuring them a ſolid tranquillity.

The duke gives up the earl, and repents of it.

The duke of Bretagne, being a good prince, judging of others by himſelf, did not imagine, that Edward concealed evil deſigns, under theſe appearances of moderation; wherefore, he ordered the earl of Richmond to be put into the hands of the ambaſſadors, to be conducted to England; tho' ſome affirm, that a large ſum of money, preſented to the duke by theſe ambaſſadors, rendered their inſtances more effectual. However this be, they departed, with their prey, to embarque at St. Malo's; but, whilſt they were on the road, one of the duke's counſellors intimated to him, that, by this proceeding, he would become eternally infamous; that, beſides, he could not, in conſcience, deliver up a prince, who believed himſelf ſafe, under his protection, to his moſt avowed enemy, whoſe ſole, intent, in demanding him, was to deſtroy him, under the pretence of an honourable ſettlement; that he would be accountable to God, for this action, whatever gloſs he might put upon it, in the eyes of men; and he conjured him to conſider, what honour, juſtice, and religion required of him, on the preſent occaſion. Whether this remonſtrance convinced the duke of what he had not, hitherto, fully known, or ſtung him with remorſe, for what he had done, he, forthwith, diſpatched Peter Landais, his favourite, to St. Malo's, to recover the earl of Richmond from the ambaſſadors, if they were not, as yet, embarqued; who, arriving, juſt as they were going on board the veſſel that was to carry them to England, immediately, gave private orders, to aſſiſt the two priſoners to make their eſcape, whilſt himſelf conferred with the ambaſſadors; and, the conference being over, the two earls were found to have taken ſanctuary, in a church, from whence Landais pretended, that they could not be removed. The ambaſſadors complained of this fraud; but, after ſome frivolous excuſes, he expreſly told them, that the duke, his maſter, upon ſecond thoughts, apprehended that he could not deliver up the earl to the king, without fixing an indelible ſtain on his honour; yet that he would promiſe to guard him ſo carefully, that Edward ſhould never receive any damage. The ambaſſadors, being the weakeſt, were forced to be ſatisfied with this promiſe; which, in ſome degree, alleviated their vexation, at this diſappointment; and thus, by a ſort of miracle, the earl of Richmond eſcaped the danger to which he was expoſed, Providence having preſerved him, in order to place him, hereafter, on the throne of England. 1476.

Edward's alliance with Denmark. Act. Pub.

The reſt of the year 1476 affords us nothing remarkable, with reſpect to the affairs of England, except a negotiation to renew the alliance with Denmark, the death of the archbiſhop of York, at Guiſnes, where he was confined, and ſome other inconſiderable events; but it will be neceſſary to relate thoſe of the duke of Burgundy, which became of great conſequence, both to England and France.

The affairs of the duke of Burgundy. Commin.

The duke had accepted of the truce offered by Lewis, not ſo much becauſe he was afraid of his arms, as from a deſire to carry war into Germany; for he wanted to be revenged on the duke of Lorrain, the Swiſs, and the duke of Auſtria; but this would have been impracticable, if the war with France had continued. In October, 1475, preſently after ſigning the truce with Lewis XI, he attacked the duke of Lorrain, and conquered his whole duchy, without much reſiſtance, except at Nanci, which held out a ſiege of two months; and, upon the conqueſt of Lorrain, he projected to humble the Swiſs, who had declared againſt him, whilſt he was employed in the ſiege of Nuz. He uſed, for a pretence, the injury they had done to James of Savoy, earl of Romont, in ſeizing his territories; but the Swiſs, who, as yet, had made no great figure, in Europe, perceiving the impending ſtorm, humbly ſued for a peace. However, the duke, being inexorable, leaving Lorrain, in March, 1476, paſſed through Burgundy, and threw himſelf into the country of Vaux, where he took three or four towns; and then he beſieged Granſon, in which were 7 or 800 Swiſs, reſolved upon making a gallant defence; but, the town, at length, capitulating, the duke broke the articles, and put the garriſon to the ſword. In the interim, a body of Swiſs advanced, to relieve the beſieged, but came too late; yet the duke, contrary to the opinion of his council, determined to meet this body, which was ſtill in the narrow paſſages of the mountains; and, with this view, he detached 100 archers, to ſeize a certain paſs, and, preſently after, marched himſelf, to ſupport them. Theſe archers, meeting the Swiſs coming out of the mountains, 1476. mountains, ſpeedily retreated towards the body, which was marching after them; upon which, the duke's army, concluding that the horſemen were repulſed by the enemy, being ſeized with a panick, took to flight, nor could they be rallied by the duke, who loſt only ſeven men at arms; but all his baggage became a prey to the enemy.

His defeat, at Morat. Commin.

This ill ſucceſs not diſheartening the duke, he aſſembled his ſcattered troops, and ſoon rendered them fit for action; for, about 15 days after, he took the field, and laid ſiege to Morat, a ſmall town not far from Bern; but the Swiſs, receiving ſupplies from ſome neighbouring princes, marched, to the number of 30,000 men, to fight him; and the battle was fought, three weeks after the rout of Granſon, wherein the duke was entirely defeated, with the loſs of 8000 men.

His concern at it.

The duke was ſo extremely concerned at this terrible misfortune, that he ſickened, with grief; and, according to Philip de Commines, he was even ſomewhat diſordered in mind. He continued, ſix weeks, at la Riviere, in which town he kept himſelf, as it were, concealed; and none durſt venture to ſpeak to him, to mitigate his ſorrow. In the mean while, ſeveral of the princes, who before were his friends, declared againſt him; and the duke of Lorrain, appearing before Nanci, took the place, upon terms, without the duke of Burgundy's ſtirring to its relief. At length, when it was too late, and the town ſurrendered, the duke of Burgundy approached; and, his enemy being retired, he undertook the ſiege, where he met with difficulties which made him loſe a great deal of time, and paved the way for his ruin.

1477. His defeat and death, at Nanci. Commin.

In the interim, the duke of Lorrain drew together forces, from all quarters, Lewis XI. finding him money, for their ſubſiſtence; and he no ſooner thought himſelf ſufficiently ſtrong, than he approached Nanci, and encamped, at St. Nicholas, expecting the effect of his correſpondence, in the enemy's army, with Campobache, a Neapolitan captain, in whom the duke of Burgundy entirely confided. This city being now reduced to extremity, the duke of Lorrain advanced, to join battle; when Campobache, on a ſudden, deſerted his maſter, with about 200 lances, and went over to his enemy; and he left in the army 14 men, whom he had bribed, to alarm the troops, during the engagement, and kill the duke of Burgundy, if they had an opportunity. The battle being fought, on the 5th of January, 1477, the duke of Burgundy's army was routed, and himſelf ſlain, in the 46th year of his age; after he had reigned, nine years and a half, amidſt continual troubles, employed, one while, in defending himſelf againſt the open or ſecret attacks of Lewis XI, and, at another, in executing impracticable projects, which argued more ambition and raſhneſs, than prudence and counſel.

The duke of Burgundy's death cauſed a great alteration, not only in the affairs of the Low-Countries, but alſo in thoſe of the neighbouring princes; nay, it may be ſaid to be the firſt and principal ſource of moſt of the wars, that have, ever ſince, infeſted Europe. The duke of Burgundy left only one daughter, named Maria, who was heireſs to his large dominions, and whom he had, in ſome meaſure, promiſed to Maximilian of Auſtria, ſon to the emperor Frederick. This princeſs, about 19 years of age, found herſelf not only abandoned by all the late duke her father's friends, but alſo expoſed a prey to Lewis XI. who, directly, deprived her of Burgundy, with the towns on the Somme, and even projected to diſpoſſeſs her of all the reſt of her dominions. In this preſſing extremity, her only refuge was the aſſiſtance of the king of England, whoſe intereſt it was to oppoſe the growth of Lewis's power; but, Edward's whole council being bribed and corrupted by the king of France, Maria could procure, from that quarter, only empty wiſhes, for her proſperity, and inſignificant compliments; and, to compleat her misfortune, the young princeſs was likewiſe expoſed to the tyranny of the Gantois, who, ſeizing her perſon, removed all her counſellors, beheaded two, and gave her a new council entirely compoſed of their creatures.

1477. Alterations cauſed by the death of the duke of Burgundy.

Several matches are propoſed for Maria. Commin.

In the interim, ſeveral matches were propoſed for this princeſs; and all, except herſelf, were conſulted, about the choice of a husband. Some were for her eſpouſing the dauphin of France; but Lewis, being already under engagements to Edward, durſt not diſoblige him, at this juncture. Others would have had her married to the duke of Gueldres; and ſome to a German prince. In the mean time, Lewis enlarged his conqueſts; and, in May, 1477, the emperor Frederick, ſending an ambaſſy to Gant, to renew the treaty about the marriage of his ſon, Maximilian, with Maria, ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, mother-in-law of the princeſs, ſhe deſired her brother, Edward, to ſend ambaſſadors into Flanders, to aſſiſt her in that affair; and Edward conſented; but he would not engage to aid Maria againſt the king of France, tho' he was ſtrongly preſſed by the Flemings and the duke of Bretagne. On the contrary, he conſented to prolong the ſeven years truce concluded, at Amiens, till a year after the death of one of the two kings; and, thus, Edward acted, in direct contradiction to the intereſt of England, in ſuffering the advancement of France, and the ruin of the houſe of Burgundy. He ſtudiouſly avoided a rupture with France, chiefly becauſe, firſt, being grown corpulent and heavy, he was no longer able to bear the hardſhips of war; ſecondly, his principal counſellors were penſioners to France; and, thirdly, having promiſed his daughter, Eliſabeth, to the dauphin, he was unwilling, to obſtruct the marriage. Lewis, on the other hand, was extremely careful to keep him in this diſpoſition, by punctually paying him the penſion of 50,000 crowns, and 10,000, yearly, for queen Margaret's ranſom.

Thus,

1477. Thus, Maria of Burgundy, being forſaken by all, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport her, had no other refuge than to marry prince Maximilian, tho' ſhe could expect no great aſſiſtance from him; and, the marriage being ſolemnized, in July, Lewis XI, out of regard to the emperor, granted the new duke of Burgundy a truce, for a year, and reſtored him ſome towns, in Haynault, which he had ſeized. Soon after, he received ambaſſadors from England, who came to ſettle the arbitration agreed on, concerning the differences between the two crowns; but he was, then, ſo intent upon other affairs, that he was obliged to defer this to a more proper opportunity.

Maria eſpouſes Maximilian of Auſtria. Mezerai.

1478. The beginning of the year 1478 was very quiet, with reſpect to the general affairs I have mentioned; but, at the ſame time, there fell out, at the court of England, an event which entirely engroſſed the attention of the publick; namely, the tragical death of the duke of Clarence. This prince was proud and ambitious, of ungovernable paſſions, of a fickle temper, taking no care to conceal his ſentiments; and, in a word, of a very mean genius. Whilſt the king, his brother, remained unmarried, he entertained hopes of ſitting, hereafter, on the throne, tho' it was very improbable, that Edward would always continue in a ſtate of celibacy; but, the king's marriage deſtroying this proſpect, he was diſpleaſed with the king himſelf, and eſpecially with the queen and her family. The duke, by imprudently diſcovering his diſcontent, drew on himſelf the averſion of the queen, and her creatures, who did not fail to do him ill offices; ſo that Edward began, by degrees, to neglect him, and took no care to procure him advantages, which may eaſily be done by a king for his brothers. The duke ſo reſented this contempt, that he did not ſcruple to join with the earl of Warwick, to dethrone his own brother; tho' he repented of it, afterwards, and this repentance, as hath been obſerved, proved Edward's preſervation. He expected, that a reward would quickly follow ſuch a ſignal ſervice, reflecting only upon what he had acted, in the behalf of the king, without conſidering the danger to which he had expoſed him; but Edward, prejudiced againſt him, on the contrary, believed, that the bare pardon of the injury was a ſufficient recompence for his ſervice. Theſe ſentiments were inſtilled into him by his queen, who, having loſt the earl of Rivers, her father, during the rebellion, could not help conſidering the authors of it, as the objects of her vengeance; and the duke of Glouceſter did all that was poſſible, ſecretly, to ſow diſſenſion between his brothers; who was a prince of greater ambition than the duke of Clarence, but he purſued his ends by deep and artful contrivances, which rendered his ways imperceptible; for he always thought, before he ſpoke, whereas the duke of Clarence ruined himſelf, by too freely ſpeaking his mind. It was difficult for two brothers, of ſuch oppoſite tempers, to love one another; but, in their diſcord, the duke of Clarence uſed no ceremony, whilſt Glouceſter took care never to give him publickly any advantage; yet he gave him ſecret ſtabs, the more unavoidable, as they were given by an unſuſpected hand. All the hiſtorians agree, that, from this time, the duke of Glouceſter projected to ſecure the crown, after the king's deceaſe; yet this undertaking ſeemed to be extremely difficult, ſince his two elder brothers had children; but his ambition led him to think it not impracticable, if he proceeded, by degrees. The firſt ſtep was to diſpatch the duke of Clarence; and, with this view, he endeavoured to render him odious to the king, by repreſenting him, as a ſecret enemy, who privately laboured to ſupplant his children. The duke of Clarence's raſh expreſſions were greatly ſubſervient to his deſign; and, on the other hand, the queen, who had a great influence over the king, did not fail to confirm his ſuſpicions. 1478.

The death of the duke of Clarence.

Matters ſtanding, thus, the king, as he was hunting in a park belonging to Thomas Burdet, a confident of the duke of Clarence, chanced to kill a white buck, in which that gentleman exceedingly delighted; and ſuch was his concern, for the death of his favourite buck, that, in the firſt tranſports of his paſſion, he ſwore, that he wiſhed the horns in the belly of him that killed it; upon which, he was accuſed of high-treaſon, condemned, and executed, within the ſpace of two days. Some affirm, that his imprecation related only to the perſon that adviſed the king to hunt in his park; but, however this be, doubtleſs, the deſign of thoſe, who ſo hotly proſecuted that unfortunate gentleman, was, to induce the duke of Clarence to expoſe himſelf, by ſome raſh proceeding; of which his inconſiderate, violent, and haughty temper afforded great aſſurance. Accordingly, the duke, then in Ireland, upon his return to court, talked very boldly to the king, of his friend's death, and bitterly complained of his diſregard for a brother, who reſtored him to the throne; and, in fine, he was ſo far tranſported with rage, that he threatened to be revenged; moreover, after leaving the king, he dropped ſome other no leſs imprudent expreſſions, intimating that his brother was a baſtard, and conſequently had no right to the crown. As nothing could be more agreeable to his enemies, than to ſee him, thus, run into their ſnare, they ſo exaſperated the king againſt him, that he reſolved upon his deſtruction; and, with this view, he held a council, entirely conſiſting of the duke of Clarence's enemies, wherein it was agreed to apprehend him, accuſe him of high-treaſon, and bring the accuſation before the parliament, then aſſembled. All this was, immediately, executed, that the duke might not have time to repent, and beg the king's pardon; for, otherwiſe, he would have come to himſelf, and implored the king's mercy; and his unguarded expreſſions muſt have been conſidered, only as the effect of a ſudden paſſion, which did not deſerve ſuch a rigorous puniſhment. His affair being brought before the parliament, he was accuſed of ſeveral crimes, under the eight following articles. I. By his ſeditious diſcourſes, he had attempted to draw upon the king the hatred

Stow. Habington.

1478. hatred of his ſubjects, by charging him with unjuſtly putting Burdet to death. II. He had bribed ſome of his domeſticks, and others, to ſpread this report. III. He had alledged, that the king practiſed necromancy, to know future events. IV. He had taxed the king with poiſoning innocent perſons, whom he could not legally deſtroy. V. He had ſaid, that the king was not ſon to the duke of York, but of an adulterer, whom the ducheſs, their mother, admitted to her bed. VI. By inferring from hence, that the crown was fallen to him, he had diſcovered his deſign to ſeize it, by requiring many perſons to ſwear fealty to him and his heirs, without any exception of their allegiance to the king. VII. He had accuſed the king of uſing magick, to take away his life, by cauſing him to conſume away, like a taper. VIII. He had openly ſhewn his intent to dethrone the king, in procuring an authentick copy of an act of parliament paſſed, during the earl of Warwick's uſurpation, by which the crown was adjudged to him, upon the deceaſe of Henry VI, and his iſſue male.

All the hiſtorians own, that it would have been extremely difficult to prove all theſe articles of impeachment, had not the king declared himſelf a party, and the queen and the duke of Glouceſter made uſe of ſecret practices, to have him found guilty; but, however this be, he was condemned to die; and it is extremely remarkable, that, as one of the principal reaſons of his condemnation was his affirming, that the king was not the duke of York's ſon, that very circumſtance, afterwards, ſerved for a foundation to the duke of Glouceſter's aſcending the throne, to the prejudice of Edward's children. In this, we muſt admire the blindneſs of men, and the juſtice of God; for Edward makes uſe of a falſe accuſation to put his brother to death, and thereby occaſions ſuſpicions, which, hereafter, prove the ruin of his own children. The duke of Clarence being condemned, all the favour he could obtain, of the king his brother, was, to chuſe the manner of his death; who, to avoid appearing, on a ſcaffold, deſired to be drowned, in a butt of malmſey *. He left one ſon, called Edward, who inherited, from his grandfather by the mother's ſide, the title of earl of Warwick, and a daughter, named Margaret, who was counteſs of Salisbury. As the death of the duke of Clarence raiſed, among the people, a general indignation, and murmurs againſt the king, his body was expoſed, in St. Paul's church; and it was given out, that he died of immoderate grief; but this artifice was incapable of amuſing the people, who too manifeſtly ſaw, in the condemnation of that prince, the terrible effects of his enemy's malice.

Edward creates his eldeſt ſon prince of Wales, and the youngeſt duke of York. Sandf.

About three months before, the king had created Edward, his eldeſt ſon, prince of Wales, and his ſecond ſon, Richard, duke of York; but the rejoicings at court, on this occaſion, did not ſo much expreſs the joy of the favourites, for the promotion of the two princes, as their ſatisfaction to ſee the project of the duke of Clarence's ruin ſo near accompliſhed. Edward did not foreſee, that his unjuſt plot againſt his brother was the firſt ſtep towards the ruin of his own ſons; for, had the duke of Clarence been alive, the duke of Glouceſter would never have thought of ſacrificing them, as he, afterwards, did, to his ambition. 1478.

Shortly after the death of the duke of Clarence, the term agreed to by Lewis XI. and Edward, to decide their differences, by arbitration, was farther prolonged; and Edward appointed the duke of Glouceſter one of the arbitrators, in the room of the duke of Clarence. Act. Pub.

An ambaſſy from Lewis XI. to Edward. Act. Pub.

During theſe tranſactions, in England, the truce between Lewis and Maximilian being expired, Maximilian entered Burgundy, and very eaſily took ſeveral places, becauſe of the people's affection to the houſe of Burgundy; and, probably, he would, then, have taken poſſeſſion of the two Burgundies, if he had received from the emperor, his father, a ſupply ſuitable to his occaſions. This Lewis exceedingly feared; and, as he knew it to be Edward's intereſt to join Maximilian, he did all that was poſſible, to divert him. In July, this year, he ſent a full power to prolong the truce, till 100 years after the death of the two kings, and oblige him to the payment of the annual penſion of 50,000 crowns, whilſt the truce continued; and alſo to prolong, for three years, the term agreed upon, to decide the differences, by arbitrators, and to promiſe, for Lewis and his ſucceſſors, to prolong it, every third year, till all things were ſettled. Upon the ambaſſador's arrival, at London, Edward appointed commiſſioners to treat with him; and, at length, the treaty was concluded, as propoſed by Lewis, tho' not till the 15th of February, 1479.

This negotiation was, in ſome meaſure, retarded, by Edward's deſire to ſecure, firſt, his daughter Eliſabeth's marriage with the dauphin; and, with this view, he diſpatched two ambaſſadors into France, to perform the ceremony of betrothing; but Lewis, in all probability, found ſome excuſe to defer it; who, in the interim, made the ſecond payment of 10,000 crowns, for queen Margaret's ranſom.

Lewis's offer to Edward. Hall.

Thus, Edward, contrary to his own, and the nation's intereſts, ſuffered himſelf to be managed by the king of France, or rather by his own miniſters, bribed by that prince; but Lewis, not ſatisfied with diverting him from aſſiſting the ducheſs of Burgundy, ſent him alſo a propoſal to divide between them that princeſs's dominions, offering him, for his part, Flanders and Brabant. Edward accepted the propoſal, but upon this condition, that, in exchange for the towns conquered, in Flanders, Lewis ſhould give him others, in Picardy, and particularly Boulogne; but Lewis was too jealous of the neighbourhood of the Engliſh, to conſent to that condition; for, if he propoſed to him the conqueſt of Flanders, it was only

* It is ſaid, that, afterwards, when any perſon ſued for a pardon of a condemned malefactor, he would break out into theſe words: "Oh, unfortunate brother, for whoſe life not one creature would make interceſſion!". Hall.

1478. only to engage him in a war with Maximilian and Maria, leſt he ſhould, one time or other, repent his deſerting them.

1479. Edward gives himſelf up to pleaſures.

However, Edward, inſtead of projecting war, entirely abandoned himſelf to his pleaſures, deſigning to paſs the reſidue of his days, in effeminate ſloth, tho' the pleaſures, which he ſo eagerly purſued, were more expenſive to him than the moſt burdenſome war; and, therefore, his coffers being empty, he uſed ſeveral illegal means, to extort money from his ſubjects. The moſt dreadful method was that of cauſing the rich to be accuſed of high-treaſon, in order to confiſcate their eſtates, or exact large ſums, for their pardon; and, in the mean while, he carried on, with ſeveral princes, negotiations, tending to ſecure him the continuance of that repoſe he ſo ardently deſired.

A negotiation with Denmark. Act. Pub.

The firſt of theſe negotiations was with the king of Denmark, their alliance not having been well obſerved, on either ſide; but, at laſt, that prince ſending ambaſſadors to London, it was was confirmed and renewed, and a congreſs appointed, at Hamburgh, to decide all their differences; and one of the conditions of the treaty was, that the Engliſh ſhould not be admitted into Iſeland, without a paſsport from the king of Denmark.

A treaty between Lewis and Edward. Act. Pub.

Two days after the concluſion of this treaty, the French ambaſſador and the king's commiſſioners ſigned that before-mentioned, by which Lewis XI. engaged, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, to pay to the king of England 50,000 crowns, yearly, as well during the lives of the two kings, as 100 years after, to commence, at the death of the ſurvivor; and, next day, was likewiſe ſigned another treaty, prolonging the truce, amity, and good underſtanding between the two kings, during their lives, and between their ſucceſſors, for 100 years, with a promiſe of mutual aſſiſtance againſt their rebellious ſubjects. The other articles were, that if one of the two princes was expelled his kingdom, the other ſhould receive him, and aſſiſt him, with all his forces; that they ſhould enter into no alliance, without a mutual conſent; that the king of France ſhould ratify this treaty, and cauſe it to be confirmed by the ſtates; and that Edward ſhould alſo procure the approbation of the parliament; laſtly, that the dauphin's marriage, with the princeſs Eliſabeth, ſhould be accompliſhed, purſuant to the agreement at Amiens, and this new treaty not be derogatory to the former. We do not find, that Lewis XI. ever ratified this treaty, which, probably, was made only to amuſe Edward; for Lewis knew, that he was obliged to nothing, without a formal ratification; which, doubtleſs, he was reſolved to refuſe, tho' the treaty contained only ſuch articles as were propoſed by himſelf. This was one of Lewis's artifices; and, as it is extremely difficult to guard againſt ſuch, it is moſt adviſable never to enter into any negotiations, with princes of his character.

As Lewis amuſed Edward, with the marriage of Eliſabeth to the dauphin, Maximilian acted, in the ſame manner, to gain him to his intereſts; for, tho' Philip, his ſon, was only a year old, he made an offer to Edward, to marry him to Ann, his third daughter, which he accepted; and, whilſt the marriage-articles were ſettling, the two princes ſent each other letters patent, promiſing not to marry their children, without mutual conſent, during the ſpace of three years.

1479. A project of a marriage between the Philip of Auſtria and Ann, Edward's daughter, and of his daughter Catharine, with the infante of Spain. Act. Pub.

About the ſame time, Edward had thoughts of eſpouſing Catharine, his fourth daughter, to John, infante of Caſtile and Arragon, ſon to king Ferdinand, and Iſabella of Caſtile; nay, the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that ambaſſadors were ſent into Spain, to haſten the treaty, tho' to no purpoſe.

Lewis duly pays the penſion.

In the interim, Lewis duly paid the penſion of 50,000 crowns, as appears from ſeveral acquittances, in the Collection of the Publick Acts; and we alſo find, that, in March, 1480, he compleated the payment of Margaret's ranſom.

He amuſes Edward,

Lewis readily performed all the articles of the treaty of Amiens, except the dauphin's marriage; for which he ſtill found ſome freſh excuſe, tho' he perſiſted in his promiſe to make good that engagement; but Edward, ſurpriſed at all theſe delays, called an extraordinary council, wherein it was reſolved to ſend ambaſſadors to Lewis, peremptorily to demand the performance of his promiſe, and the ratification of the late treaty at London. The lord Howard and Thomas Langton, treaſurer of the church of Exeter, were appointed for this ambaſſy; but the former of theſe, one of Edward's confidents, was, very probably, the chief of thoſe that were corrupted by the king of France's favours.

who ſends him ambaſſadors. Act. Pub.

Lewis continues to amuſe him. Hall.

In the mean while, Lewis was greatly embarraſſed; for he had paſſed his word for the marriage, and even obliged himſelf by a treaty, tho' he did not, in the leaſt, intend to accompliſh it; and, on the other hand, his ambaſſadors, at London, had ſigned another treaty, upon the footing propoſed by himſelf, tho' he was reſolved not to ratify the ſame. His ſole view had been to amuſe Edward, leſt he ſhould join with the archduke; and, to free himſelf from theſe difficulties, he determined to diſſemble, and continue to promiſe the compleating of the marriage, whilſt, by ambaſſadors ſent into Scotland, he tried to perſuade James III. to violate the truce with England. This negotiation fully anſwered his expectation; for king James ſuffered himſelf to be governed by three favourites, raiſed from the duſt, without adviſing with any lord of his kingdom. It was very eaſy, for the king of France, to bribe thoſe mercenary wretches, who engaged to induce their maſter to break the truce with the Engliſh; and, indeed, preſently after, James made preparations, which evidently diſcovered his deſign. Edward, aſtoniſhed at the impending rupture, between the king of Scotland and himſelf, eaſily gueſſed at the author; yet, concealing his reſentment, he only ordered an army to be raiſed, the command of which he reſolved to give to his brother, the duke of Glouceſter. He, now, began, to open his eyes, and perceive 1479. ceive Lewis's insincerity, who, ever since Burgundy's death, had amused him with delusive promises; and, tho' he had lost all the favourable opportunities, he applied his thoughts, when too late, to revenge; which is evident from several pieces in the Collection of the 1480. Publick Acts, all dated, in 1480, before the Scots had actually violated the truce.

An ambassy to Castile. Act. Pub.

First, he sent ambassadors to Castile, to repair certain outrages committed by the English, during the earl of Warwick's ministry, contrary to the alliance between Castile and England; but when a prince, of his own accord, offers to make reparation for the damages, his subjects have done to another nation, it may be fairly presumed, that it is with a view to some other design; and Edward's aim was to engage the king of Castile to make war upon France, or, at least, to prevent his assisting Lewis.

A treaty with Denmark.

Secondly, he confirmed the treaty concluded at Hamburgh, with the king of Denmark.

Edward promises to aid Maximilian. Act. Pub.

Thirdly, he ratified his treaty of alliance with the late duke of Burgundy, and engaged to send Maximilian and Maria an aid of 6000 men, pursuant to the treaty; and the archduke promised, on his part, to pay him 50,000 crowns, yearly, if the king of France discontinued his pension, and a war ensued, on that account.

He concludes the marriage of his daughter with Philip. Act. Pub.

Lastly, the marriage of Philip, earl of Charolois, son to Maximilian and Maria, with Ann, daughter to Edward, was concluded, with a promise, on both sides, to cause it to be consummated, as soon as the parties were of age; and, by this treaty, Edward gave with his daughter 100,000 crowns; but, by a subsequent treaty, the dowry was set against the annual pension of 50,000 crowns, to be paid by the archduke, instead of the king of France, and they mutually forgave one another.

He promises to declare against Lewis, if he is not made umpire. Act. Pub.

By another treaty, Edward promised to endeavour to procure Maximilian a truce with Lewis; to offer to be arbitrator himself between them; to try to be received, as such; and, if Lewis refused, he engaged to declare against him. This proceeding was not very fair; but, probably, he thought he might act insincerely, as well as the king of France.

An ambassy to France. Act. Pub.

Edward, having, thus, settled his affairs with Maximilian and Maria, sent again ambassadors to France, to press the marriage of his daughter, Elisabeth, with the dauphin; and, if Lewis had complied, in all probability, he would not have scrupled to desert the archduke; but, Lewis, according to custom, advancing some ill excuse, he equipped a fleet, and gave the command to John Middleton, to go to the assistance of his new allies.

1481. The king of Scotland prepares for war. Hall. Holingsh. The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

In the interim, the king of Scotland continued his preparations, with an intent to break with England; but, before I relate the success of this war so little expected by Edward, it will be expedient briefly to mention the then state of the affairs of that kingdom.

James III, who succeeded to the crown, at seven years of age, being out of his minority, was so corrupted by flatterers, that he made his will the sole rule of his actions; but, without entering into a needless detail of the outrages he committed upon his subjects, it will be sufficient to say, in a word, that he was reputed a real tyrant. He had three ministers, or favourites, men of mean extraction, that governed him entirely; and whose only study was to render him independent of the laws, that they themselves might rule, in his name, with an arbitrary sway. The king had two brothers, viz. Alexander, duke of Albany, and John; the last of whom, speaking too boldly of the king his brother's conduct, was thrown into prison, and there put to death, by having his veins opened; and the favourites, being apprehensive that Alexander would revenge his death, prevailed on the king to confine him, in a castle. 1481.

At this juncture, James, detested by his people, and especially by the nobility, undertook, without the least pretence, to violate the truce with the English; and Edward was mortified to see the approaches of a rupture, that would divert him from the war with France; yet, not to omit any necessary precautions, he gave orders for the defence of the borders, and, at the same time, commissioned certain persons of Ireland, to make an alliance, in his name, with the earl of Ross, lord of the Isles, to give his enemy a diversion, from that quarter.

James enters England, and carries off some booty.

In June, 1481, the Scots made an irruption into the borders, before Edward's army was prepared; and they carried off some booty, which was the whole result of their mighty preparations. Edward was not very expeditious, in sending an army against Scotland; for he still hoped amicably to put an end to this affair; and, besides, he was sensible that king James could not do him much prejudice, in his present condition. His grand design was to be revenged on Lewis XI; for, tho' that prince, with his usual dissimulation, still amused him, that he would perform his promise, with respect to the marriage, and punctually paid 25000 crowns, every six months, Edward evidently perceived, that he designed to recall his word, with regard to the first article, and that a rupture was unavoidable.

A project of marriage between the prince of Wales and Ann of Bretagne.

On this account, he renewed his alliance with the duke of Bretagne, and concluded the marriage of the prince of Wales, his son, with Ann, eldest daughter to that duke; or, if she died, before consummation, with Isabella, her youngest sister, on the following conditions: That, if there should be several sons, the second, or next heir to the crown of England, should be duke of Bretagne, and reside in that country; that, if the duke should, hereafter, have a legitimate son, he should espouse one of Edward's daughters, that was most suitable to his age; that, if Edward had no daughter to give him, the duke should not marry his son, without his consent; lastly, it was agreed between them, that, if the king of France made war upon the duke of Bretagne, Edward should send the duke 3000 men, at his own charge; and the duke engaged the like, in case of a war between England and France.

1482. In the beginning of 1482, Edward renewed his alliance with Portugal; and, soon after, he dispatched 1482. diſpatched ambaſſadors to Caſtile, to conclude the marriage of his daughter, Catharine, with the infante; tho' that affair did not prove ſucceſsful; but all theſe treaties, renewals of alliances, and projects of marriages ſhew, that Edward intended to carry war into France.

The duke of Albany eſcapes into England. Buchanan.

Whilſt Edward did all that was poſſible, to promote his undertaking, Alexander, duke of Albany, brother to the king of Scotland, eſcaped out of priſon, and came, by ſea, into England, to implore the king's protection; and, beſides the reaſons, which the Scots, in general, had to complain of their ſovereign, the death of the duke, his brother, and his own impriſonment, ſtrongly inclined him to revenge, and, doubtleſs, ambition did not a little contribute to inflame his reſentment. The Engliſh and Scotch hiſtorians limit his deſire of revenge; to ſome general views of reclaiming the king, his brother, and procuring the reſtitution of his own eſtate; but the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, by authentick proofs, that Alexander's view was to be poſſeſſed of the throne. We find there his treaty with Edward, in which he aſſumes the title of king of Scotland, and engages to do homage, for that kingdom, to the crown of England; and he promiſes to diſſolve the antient alliance of France with Scotland, and make one with Edward againſt Lewis XI; to ſurrender Berwick to England, and marry Cecily, Edward's daughter, affianced to prince James, his nephew, provided, by the judgment of the church, he could be divorced from his wife; and, if this could not be done, to eſpouſe his ſon only to a princeſs of England. Edward, on the other hand, obliges himſelf; to aſſiſt him, with all his power, to take poſſeſſion of the throne of Scotland; and, upon the ſigning of this treaty, which was, in all appearance, a ſecret known to a few perſons, Edward ſent an army againſt Scotland, under the duke of Glouceſter, his brother, whom the duke of Albany would accompany, but without taking the title of king. Edward alſo gave the command of a fleet to Robert Ratcliffe, to act againſt Scotland; and the duke of Glouceſter, advancing to the borders of the two kingdoms, took the town of Berwick; but, unwilling to loſe time, in beſieging the caſtle, leaving it inveſted, he marched directly to Edinburgh.

The duke of Glouceſter marches into Scotland. Act. Pub.

The troubles in Scotland.

Whilſt the duke of Glouceſter was advancing, at the head of his army, king James, who had neglected to concert meaſures, to proſecute, with vigour, the war he had undertaken, was extremely embarraſſed; and the only means he had, to reſiſt the Engliſh, was to aſſemble the nobility; but he durſt not attempt it, knowing how much they were diſguſted with him and his miniſters. He was conſtrained, however, to reſolve upon it, or throw himſelf upon the mercy of the Engliſh; and, the lords, being ſummoned, came, with their troops, to Lauther, where they were expected by the king; but, to whatever extremity that prince was reduced, he did not alter his conduct. His three favourites were his ſole council; and ſcarce any durſt approach him, but themſelves, or their creatures. The nobles, to the laſt degree, incenſed, on this occaſion, determined to embrace ſo fair an opportunity to be rid of thoſe, who were, thus, maſters of the king's perſon; and, having previouſly conſulted together, ſome of them, well attended, came to the king's apartment, and, ſeizing the three favourites, who had there ſheltered themſelves, brought them to the army, where they cauſed them to be, immediately, hanged. James, exceedingly terrified, dreading alſo an attempt upon his life, promiſed to reform his conduct, for the future; but, a few days after, he retired to the caſtle of Edinburgh; upon which, the army, being without a leader, diſbanded themſelves, and the lords returned to their reſpective habitations. 1482.

The duke of Glouceſter, apprized of this diſorder, haſtened his march to Edinburgh, and entered the city, without oppoſition; and he would have conferred with the king, but it was not even poſſible to acquaint him with his deſire; which obſtinacy, to hearken to nothing, obliged the duke of Glouceſter to publiſh, by ſound of trumpet, in all the quarters of Edinburgh, that, if, before September, the king of Scotland did not obſerve his treaties with the king of England, he would deſtroy the whole kingdom, with fire and ſword. King James had engaged chiefly to keep the truce, and return the money received, for the dowry of the princeſs, Cecily, affianced to the prince, his ſon; to which the duke of Glouceſter added, that he ſhould recall the duke of Albany, and reſtore him to his eſtate and honours. James, who was unable either to reſiſt his enemies, or to perform his engagements, made no anſwer; but the nobles, being aſſembled, at Hadington, ſent deputies to the duke of Glouceſter, to inform him, that they ardently deſired the conſummation of the intended marriage; and that neither they, nor the ſtates, were to be blamed, for the violation of the truce. The duke of Glouceſter replied, that, the marriage was purely projected, to maintain a good underſtanding between the two nations; and, king James, having wantonly broke it, without the leaſt provocation, he did not know, whether the king, his brother, would have the marriage conſummated; however, that he had orders to receive the ſums paid, in part of the princeſs's dowry; and that, as to the truce, it would be punctually obſerved by England, provided the caſtle of Berwick was delivered to the king, his brother, or, at leaſt, the Scots would promiſe not to aſſiſt the beſieged.

The duke of Glouceſter becomes maſter of Edinburgh.

Matters being in this ſituation, the duke of Albany demanded of the Scotch lords a ſafe-conduct; and, obtaining it, he went and conferred with them. In this conference it was agreed, that the duke of Albany ſhould be made regent of Scotland; that the citizens of Edinburgh ſhould pay the king of England the money received by James, if the projected marriage did not ſucceed; and, laſtly, that the caſtle of Berwick ſhould be ſurrendered to the duke of Glouceſter. On the other hand, the duke promiſed to own the king, his brother, for his lawful ſovereign, and to ſwear allegiance to him; which renders it probable, that his treaty with Edward was known, in Scotland, or that the duke judged it proper to diſcover it, that this clauſe might be included in the pardon. Upon this agreement, the duke of Albany, either out of pure generoſity, or becauſe he foreſaw that he ſhould meet with inſuperable obſtacles, dropped his project of placing himſelf on the throne; and the duke of Glouceſter ſpent ſome time, at Newcaſtle, till the king, his brother, ſhould acquaint him withhis pleaſure, with reſpect to his daughter's marriage.

The duke of Albany, being, thus, maſter of the kingdom, reſtored the king, his brother, to his former dignity; reſerving to himſelf only his own eſtate, and the glory of his generoſity. James pleaſed, as it may be preſumed, that his fear was his only puniſhment, ſeemed, at firſt, to alter his conduct; and, preſently after, he reſolved to go to Amiens, to viſit the reliques of St. John, or, perhaps, to concert new meaſures with Lewis XI; but it does not appear, whether he executed this deſign, tho' we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a ſafe-conduct for him and 1000 attendants. However this be, he ſoon reſumed his former courſe of life, as well as his enmity to his brother, being reſolutely bent to diſpatch him. This deſign was kept ſo ſecret, that, when the duke heard of it, he had but juſt time to throw himſelf into a fiſhing-boat, and eſcape to the caſtle of Dunbar, with a few of his friends; from whence he ſent into England the 1483. earl of Angus and ſome others, to renew with Edward the treaty made, the preceding year, that was ſet aſide by the intervening agreement. This treaty was ratified, February 11, 1483, with additional articles; but Edward's death, falling out, preſently after, prevented the execution. In the mean while, the duke of Albany, having, now, purſuant to the treaty, delivered the fortreſs of Dunbar to the Engliſh, ſeeing no proſpect of being relieved, withdrew into France; where he was unfortunately, killed, with the ſplinter of a lance, at a tournament, by the duke of Orleans, who was afterwards king of France, by the name of Lewis XII.

Edward's affairs are in an ill poſture, upon the death of the duchеſs of Burgundy. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

The war with Scotland being over, Edward applied all his thoughts to the war he intended to carry into France; but he was far from being in ſo good a condition to be revenged on Lewis XI, as before the rupture with Scotland. Maria, ducheſs of Burgundy, loſing her life, by a fall from her horſe, in March, 1481, the archduke, her ſpouſe, had ſo little authority among the Flemings, that he was conſtrained to ſuffer his children, by that princeſs, to remain in the hands of the Gantois; and then Lewis XI, to inſpire the Flemings with a dread of the houſe of Auſtria's power, ſo dex- 1483.
trouſly managed with the Gantois, that he obtained their conſent to give the dauphin, his ſon, Margaret, daughter to their deceaſed ducheſs, with the earldoms of Artois, Burgundy, Maconnois, Auxerre, and Charolois. This treaty was made, unknown to Edward; ſo that Lewis ſtill amuſed the Engliſh ambaſſadors, even after it was ended to his ſatisfaction. The firſt news they had of it was the arrival of the young dauphineſs, two years old, who was brought to Paris, in April, 1482; and the nuptials were ſolemnized, in July. This was an extreme mortification, and moſt outrageous affront to Edward, who cauſed the princeſs, his daughter, to be ſtiled Madam the Dauphineſs, but he had, perhaps, forgot, how he himſelf affronted Lewis, with reſpect to his own marriage, or imagined that love would excuſe it; yet Lewis believed himſelf no leſs excuſable by politicks, and what kings call reaſons of ſtate. However this be, Edward, full of indignation and rage, was reſolutely bent to revenge; but it was too late, the opportunities he had neglected being irrecoverably loſt; for he could no longer rely upon the aſſiſtance of the Flemings, who had ſo openly diſcovered their attachment to the intereſts of France. The duke of Bretagne was ſeized with a melancholy, that rendered him incapable of any important undertaking; the king of Scotland had no reaſon to be pleaſed; and all, that Edward could expect from his alliance with the kings of Spain and Portugal, was, that they would not aſſiſt Lewis; ſo that, to be revenged, Edward muſt, like Henry V, attack France, with the forces of England alone; tho' that kingdom was very far from being in the ſame circumſtances, as when Henry V. began the war. Nevertheleſs, Edward was reſolved upon it; and, with this view, he aſſembled all the lords that were at court, or near London, and, in a very pathetick ſpeech, repreſented to them, how great cauſe the Engliſh nation, and himſelf in particular, had, to reſent the intolerable affronts put upon them by the king of France. He took care to diſplay the title of the kings of England to the crown of France; the principal topick, to affect the hearts of the Engliſh; and, in a word, he exerted himſelf to perſuade them, not only of the neceſſity of a war with France, but alſo of the great probability of a happy ſucceſs. There was no occaſion for much eloquence, to induce the Engliſh to wage war with France; all the lords unanimouſly declared, that the war was juſt and neceſſary, and aſſured the king, that they were ready to ſerve him, with their lives and fortunes; and, the report of this reſolution being ſpread in the kingdom, an extraordinary joy appeared in the faces of the people, as if they had received the news of ſome ſignal victory.

The death of Edward IV.

But, whilſt preparations were making for this important war, Edward was ſeized with a mortal diſtemper, that convinced him of the vanity of all his projects; and, when he found himſelf paſt all hopes of recovery, he beheld, with another eye than before, whatever had 1483. ingroſſed him, during the courſe of his life; and it is pretended, that he ſhewed marks of a ſincere repentance; but, in the laſt moments, the great Searcher of Hearts alone can perfectly judge of the ſentiments expreſſed by the tongue. Edward died, the 9th of April, in the 42d year of his age, after a reign of 22 years and one month; and the cauſe of his death is variouſly reported. Some affirm, that he was poiſoned by the duke of Glouceſter; but this accuſation is groundleſs. Philip de Commines pretends, that Edward died with grief, to find himſelf baffled and deceived by Lewis XI; but what he ſays is to be regarded, as no more than a bare conjecture; and the rather, as Edward, two years before, perceived Lewis's inſincerity. The moſt probable opinion is, that he died of a ſurfeit; for he uſually diverted his cares, with exceſſive eating and drinking.

The character of Edward IV. Moore. Habington.

I have, hitherto, ſpoken only of Edward the IV's moſt ſhining actions, on account of their connexion with the publick affairs; but it will be neceſſary, now, to deſcribe his perſon, and the good and bad qualities of his body and mind. However, before I proceed, I cannot forbear, once more, to remark, that a man muſt be upon his guard, with reſpect to the hiſtorians that ſpeak of this prince, as well as of his brother, Richard III; for the moſt of them wrote, when the throne was filled with the princes of the houſe of Lancaſter, who were extremely jealous of their rights, and would not willingly have ſuffered them to be blemiſhed, or the kings of the houſe of York to be praiſed. The ſucceeding writers, when the civil wars were forgotten, tranſcribed what they found in theſe firſt hiſtorians, and often aſſerted, for fact, what was only the effect of their prejudice, or policy; but, for my part, who have no intereſt to blacken this prince's reputation, I have endeavoured to avoid that exceſs, yet without concealing his vices, or even his failings.

When Edward aſcended the throne, he was one of the handſomeſt men, in England, and, perhaps, in Europe; which is univerſally acknowledged; and his majeſtick mien, free and eaſy air, and affable carriage prepoſſeſſed all that ſaw him, in his favour. Theſe qualities, joined to an undaunted valour, gained him, among the people, an eſteem and affection, extremely ſerviceable to him, in many circumſtances of his life; and, according to Philip de Commines, he owed his reſtoration, to his intereſt in the inclinations of the principal London-ladies; but that would have been inconſiderable, had he not alſo procured the hearts of their husbands, and, in general, of the greateſt part of the Engliſh; and, if he had not depended upon the love of the people, he would never have attempted to recover the throne, with the help of 2000 men, who were moſtly foreigners. For ſome time, he was extremely liberal; but, at laſt, he became covetous, not ſo much from his natural temper, as from a neceſſity to ſupply the extravagant expences, into which he was thrown by his pleaſures; and, tho' he was a prince of a bright genius, and great penetration, he committed ſeveral egregious errors. The firſt was, in ſuffering himſelf to be ſurpriſed by the earl of Warwick; but that miſtake, was, in a great meaſure, repaired, by the dexterity and readineſs with which he freed himſelf from the archbiſhop of York. The ſecond was, to confide in perſons that betrayed him, and were ſold to France; and the third, in being ſo long deceived by Lewis XI, whoſe diſſimulation and ill faith were ſo notorious. Moſt hiſtorians have exceedingly aggravated the laſt error; being ignorant that, from the year 1480, he began to take meaſures, to make war upon Lewis, as appears in what has been quoted from the Collection of the Publick Acts. Two other errors are alſo charged upon him; but theſe may be more eaſily excuſed. The firſt is, his breaking off the war with France, for an inconſiderable ſum, at a time when he might have flattered himſelf with the hopes of ſucceſs; but, if the circumſtances of this affair be thoroughly examined, it will be manifeſt, that, being abandoned by the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, his allies, it would have been very imprudent to purſue, with his own forces alone, the execution of ſuch an important undertaking, which, in all probability, would have proved unſucceſsful. Another error aſcribed to Edward is, his not joining with the heireſs of Burgundy, to ſtop Lewis's progreſs. I own, that this was a real fault; yet it may be conſiderably leſſened, by the examples of ſeveral princes eminent for their abilities, who obſerved the ſame conduct, on the like occaſions. Princes, tho' uncertain of the events, frequently imagine, that they ſhall be great gainers, by ſetting their neighbours at variance; but the ſucceſs does not always anſwer their expectations. Doubtleſs, if Maria of Burgundy, and afterwards the archduke, her husband, had more vigorouſly reſiſted the attacks of Lewis XI, nothing could have a greater tendency to render Edward the umpire of Europe, than the mutual weakening of theſe two powers; and, by means of this conduct, he was courted by the king of France, and the duke of Burgundy, becauſe he was ever in a condition to make the balance incline to one ſide. Perhaps, he expected, that the caſe would be continually the ſame; but he had to deal with a more politick prince than himſelf.

Faults aſcribed to Edward.

Inſtances of his cruelty.

Theſe are properly political faults; which are often conſidered, as ſuch, purely becauſe of the events that are not in the power of man; but the crimes, of which Edward is more juſtly accuſed, are his cruelty, perjury, and incontinence. The firſt is evident from the great number of princes and lords, whom, after taking them priſoners, he put to death, on the ſcaffold; for, if ever there was room for mercy, in caſe of rebellion, it was at that fatal juncture, when it was almoſt impoſſible to ſtand neuter, and ſo difficult to chuſe the juſteſt ſide, between the two houſes that contended for the crown; and yet we do not find, that Edward had ever any regard to that conſideration. The death of the prince of Wales, ſon to Henry 1483. Henry VI, murdered, almoſt in his preſence, and that of Henry himſelf, in ſpite of his innocence, may, perhaps, be juſtified, in ſome meaſure, by thoſe who judge nothing unlawful, when a throne is in diſpute; but they can never be excuſed by thoſe who have the leaſt tincture of religion; and, as for the death of the duke of Clarence, I do not know, whether it is poſſible to find the leaſt ſoftening, if it be true, as it is highly probable, that he was innocent. 1483.

His breach of faith. Edward's breach of faith was viſible, in the unjuſt puniſhment of the lord Wells and his brother-in-law, after he had drawn them out of a ſanctuary, by a ſafe-conduct; in that of the baſtard of Falconbridge, whoſe crime he had pardoned; and, laſtly, in his oath, at York, which he took, even with an intent to break it. All theſe actions are only to be excuſed by reaſons of ſtate; a ſorry excuſe, in matters where honour and religion are concerned!

His incontinence. As for Edward's incontinency, his whole life may be affirmed to be a continued ſcene of luſt. He had many concubines, but three in particular, of whom he ſaid, "One "was the merrieſt *; the other the wittieſt; "and the third the holieſt in the world, for "ſhe was always in a church, except when "he ſent for her." He had, however, only two natural children, both by Eliſabeth Lucy, to whom he is reported to have been contracted, before his marriage; viz. Arthur ſirnamed Plantagenet, created viſcount L'Iſle by Henry VIII †, and Eliſabeth, wife to Sir Thomas Lumley: But I ſhall be altogether ſilent, as to Edward's religion, ſince hiſtorians never mention it, unleſs in relating his death-bed diſcourſes.

His good fortune. What is moſt ſurpriſing, in the life of this prince, is his good fortune, which ſeems to be almoſt miraculous; for he was raiſed to the throne, after the loſs of two battles; the firſt by the duke, his father, and the other by the earl of Warwick, then attached to the houſe of York; and the head of the father was ſtill upon the walls of York, when the ſon was proclaimed, at London. Edward eſcaped, as it were, by a miracle, from his confinement, at Middleham; he was reſtored to the throne, or, at leaſt, received into London, at his return from Holland, whilſt his fortune yet depended upon the deciſion of a battle, which the earl of Warwick was ready to give him; and, in a word, he was never preſent at any battle, in which he did not prove victorious.

He had, by Eliſabeth, his queen, a numerous iſſue; namely, three princes and eight princeſſes, of whom a ſon and two daughters died, in their infancy; and we ſhall ſee, preſently, the fate of his eldeſt ſon, Edward, his ſucceſſor, and of his brother, Richard, duke of York.

His iſſue. Eliſabeth, the eldeſt of his daughters, was promiſed in marriage to the dauphin, ſon to Lewis XI, afterwards king of France, by the name of Charles VIII. but, in proceſs of time, ſhe was married to Henry VII, king of England.

Cecily, who was contracted to the prince of Scotland, eſpouſed the lord viſcount Wells, and, after his deceaſe, another whoſe name I am ignorant of; and ſhe died, without iſſue.

Ann was affianced to Philip, ſon to Maximilian of Auſtria and Maria of Burgundy; but, that marriage not ſucceeding, ſhe married Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, by whom ſhe had two ſons, who died, without iſſue.

Bridget was a nun, at Dartford.

Mary, who was promiſed to the king of Denmark, died, at Greenwich, before the celebration of her nuptials.

Catharine, whom the king, her father, would have given to the infante of Spain, was eſpouſed to William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire; by whom ſhe had a ſon, created marqueſs of Exeter, in the reign of Henry VIII.

It muſt be obſerved, that, in the Engliſh hiſtories, there is a continual anachroniſm of a year, and ſometimes of two, from 1474, to the end of this reign ‡.

17. EDWARD V.

Edward V. is proclaimed, April 9. AFTER the death of Edward IV, the prince, his eldeſt ſon, between 12 and 13 years of age, was proclaimed king, by the name of Edward V; but his reign was ſhort and unfortunate, if the two months and 12 days that he bore the regal title, and which were entirely ſpent in depriving him of the crown, even before he had ſolemnly received it, are not rather to be accounted an interregnum; yet, as during that interval, he was generally owned, for ſovereign of England, hiſtorians have not ſcrupled to place him among the kings. The ſubject of this reign entirely conſiſts of the duke of Glouceſter's means, to diſpoſſeſs the young king, his nephew, and advance himſelf to the throne; but, before I enter upon the relation of theſe abominable practices, it will be neceſſary to

* Jane Shore.

† From Frances Plantagenet, his ſecond daughter, eſpouſed to Thomas Monk, Eſq; was lineally deſcended the late George Monk, duke of Albemarle. Sandf.

‡ In this reign, flouriſhed ſeveral eminent perſons, particularly Thomas Littleton, judge of the Common Pleas, and John Forteſcue, judge and chancellor of England. In 1485, was born the noted Thomas Parr, a Shropſhireman, who lived to the year 1635, being then brought up to London by the earl of Arundel, as a ſingular rarity, where he died, after having lived, in the reigns of 10 kings and queens, aged 152 years.

1483. The ſtate of the court before Edward's death.

ſhew the ſtate of the court of England, before the deceaſe of Edward IV.

Eliſabeth Woodville, who, from a ſubject, became a queen, by being married to Edward, held the precedency, at court, as well by the privileges common to all queens, as her great credit; for, from the time of her marriage, ſhe had acquired an influence over the king, which ſhe preſerved, to the day of his death. Her birth, by her father's ſide, was not very conſiderable; but her mother, who had been wife to the renowned duke of Bedford, was of the houſe of Luxemburgh, illuſtrious for the princes, kings, and even emperors it had given to Europe; ſo that it is not at all ſurpriſing, that ſhe ſhould have a great ſoul, and think herſelf as worthy to command, as the nobleſt lords of England. In the interim, tho', by being queen, ſhe acquired no right, to interpoſe in the publick affairs, ſhe artfully aſſumed it, by her aſcendant over the king; who, notwithſtanding Edward's falſeneſs to her, never diſcovered any ſigns of uneaſineſs; and the king, charmed to find himſelf at liberty to gratify his inclinations, repaid this moderation, with all ſorts of condeſcenſion, which the queen knew how to improve. The advancement of Sir Richard Woodville, her father, to be earl of Rivers, and the marriage of her brother with the richeſt heireſs of the kingdom, were the firſt proofs ſhe gave of her power; but, afterwards, Edward loaded this family with riches and honours, and even deſired to marry his brother-in-law, Anthony, to the king of Scotland's ſiſter, as appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts. When the prince of Wales was of age to have a governor, this ſame lord, then earl of Rivers, was entruſted with that exalted office; and the queen did not forget her own children, by her former husband, Sir John Grey of Groby; for Thomas Grey, her eldeſt ſon, was made marqueſs of Dorſet, governor of the tower, and keeper of the king's treaſures; and Richard Grey, his brother, was created a baron, and had a conſiderable poſt, about the prince of Wales.

Two parties at court, the old and the new nobility.

If the queen had limited her favours to her ſons, her father, and her brother, it could not be thought very ſtrange; but it muſt be confeſſed, that ſhe abuſed her power, by cauſing many perſons to be created peers, who would have had no pretenſion to that honour, if they had not been ſupported by her favour. This occaſioned the diſtinction, in thoſe days, between the antient and the new nobility; but, if this diſtinction did not redound to the honour of the latter, that diſadvantage was amply repaired, by the honourable and profitable places procured them by the queen; who, by degrees, had, in a manner, baniſhed the antient nobility from the court, where ſcarce any appeared, except lords of the new creation, all attached to her intereſt. The caſe was much the ſame, in all the reſt of the kingdom, where the moſt important poſts were filled by the queen's creatures; for her view was to preſerve her power, during the king's life, and, if ſhe ſurvived him, to ſecure the government of the kingdom, in her ſon's name, when he ſhould ſucceed to the crown; but, by a fatality incident to the beſt contrived projects, this very thing paved the way, for her own and her family's ruin. 1483.

The king protects the new nobility.

As the queen ſo openly declared againſt the antient families, it is natural to conceive, that ſhe was not beloved; and, accordingly, ſhe took all poſſible care to prevent the lords, whom ſhe diſliked, from having acceſs to the king. However, it was not in her power, to expel the court three lords of the antient nobility, becauſe they had done the king ſignal ſervices; viz. Henry Stafford, duke of Buckingham, William Haſtings, and Thomas Stanley.

The firſt, of a very antient family, had likewiſe the advantage of deſcending from a daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, ſeventh ſon to Edward III, and enjoyed the office of high conſtable.

The lord Haſtings was high-chamberlain; and the king had a ſingular affection for him, by reaſon of his inviolable loyalty, of which he had given proofs, in his adverſity; particularly, when he was obliged to fly into Holland. This lord was extremely devoted to the king's perſon, but deteſted the queen; and, if he paid her any reſpect, it was with reluctance, and purely out of complaiſance to the king, his maſter.

The lord Stanley, of an antient family, was alſo firmly attached to the king, without making much court to the queen.

Jane Shore, king Edward's miſtreſs.

The king's concubines likewiſe made a conſiderable figure, at court, on account of their influence over him; and there were three, eſpecially, of whom Jane Shore alone was concerned in the events of this new reign; who was wife to a citizen of London, whom Edward had debauched, and taken from her husband. She was extremely beautiful, and, at the ſame time, of a generoſity very uncommon, in perſons of her character. The king was no leſs charmed with her temper than her beauty; for he never heard her ſpeak ill of any perſon, nor ever perceived her to try to prejudice him againſt any man whatever. If ſhe importuned him, ſometimes, it was in behalf of the unfortunate; and, when ſhe had done a good office, ſhe ſcorned to take a reward, leſt ſhe ſhould give occaſion to think, that ſhe acted from a motive of intereſt; wherefore, ſhe had amaſſed but few riches, in compariſon of other concubines, whoſe avarice is inſatiable.

The diſſimulation of the duke of Glouceſter.

The duke of Glouceſter was embarraſſed, between the two parties formed, at court, and in the kingdom; and the only way, to pleaſe the king, his brother, was to make court to the queen; but the duke, perceiving that the queen's deſign was to ingroſs the government, in caſe of the king's death, could not be attached to her, without forfeiting the affection of the antient nobility, whoſe aſſiſtance he might ſtand in need of, hereafter. As he was naturally a great diſſembler, he determined, publickly, to make his court to the queen; but, in private, he joined with the duke

Edward IV. ſends his eldeſt ſon into Wales. Moore.

It is unneceſſary to ſay much of the two young princes, the king's ſons, the eldeſt of whom was only 12, and the duke of York, his brother, no more than nine years old, when the king, their father, died; for it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that, before Edward IV. was ſeized with the diſtemper, that laid him in his grave, he had ſent the prince his eldeſt ſon, with the earl of Rivers, his governor, into Wales, to appeaſe ſome commotion; and the duke of York remained, at court, with the queen, his mother.

The reconciliation of the two parties, before Edward's death. Moore.

Edward was concerned to ſee the two parties that were formed in his court; but, his affection for the queen not permitting him to hold the balance even, he neglected to prevent the dangerous effects. Whilſt he enjoyed his health, he imagined, that, during his life, he ſhould be maſter of both, and, by ſtrengthening the new nobility, render the old incapable of prejudicing the queen and her children, after his deceaſe; but, on his death-bed, he beheld this diviſion, in another light. He conſidered, that he left, for the ſupport of his houſe only new families, which had not had time to eſtabliſh themſelves, and entirely owed all their authority and influence to his favour, of which they would be ſhortly deprived; wherefore, he was ſollicitous to repair this error; but he could find no better way, than to perſuade the two parties to be reconciled, for his ſake; a weak expedient, to produce the deſired effect! The regard for a dying king, never beloved by the antient nobility, was far from being ſufficient to extinguiſh their hatred and envy of the queen's relations, which, unfortunately, had been but too much fomented; yet, before he expired, Edward had, at leaſt, the ſatisfaction to ſee an external reconciliation, which he thought ſincere, becauſe of the ſeeming readineſs and alacrity, with which both parties conſented to his requeſt. The earl of Rivers being abſent, the queen, his ſiſter, paſſed her word for him; and the marqueſs of Dorſet, her eldeſt ſon, repreſenting the family of Grey, embraced the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings, the heads of the oppoſite party. The duke of Glouceſter, being then at York, upon the king's affairs, could not obſtruct this reconciliation; tho' to him indeed, it would have been extremely prejudicial had it been real and unfeigned.

The meaſures of both parties, to ſeize the government.

Edward's eyes were no ſooner cloſed than the two parties, forgetting their late mutual proteſtations of friendſhip, made it their ſole ſtudy, how to gain the advantage one of another; tho', in the interim, they unanimouſly agreed to proclaim the deceaſed king's eldeſt ſon, by the name of Eward V. but, after this, each of them took ſuch meaſures, as were judged moſt proper to attain their different ends. The principal point was to become maſter of the king's perſon, in order to govern, in his name; and the queen hoped to preſerve and even to increaſe her authority, during the king her ſon's minority; but the contrary party foreſaw, that they ſhould be irrecoverably loſt, if the young prince was once in the hands of his mother. However, hitherto, the advantage was entirely on the queen's ſide; who, immediately after the death of the king, her huſband, diſpatched a courier to the earl of Rivers, her brother, with the news; and ſhe likewiſe informed him, in the letter, that ſhe believed it abſolutely neceſſary for him to raiſe forces, in Wales, and the neighbouring counties, to enable him to conduct the new king ſafely to London, in order to his coronation. 1483.

Bucking-ham and Haſtings ſtir up Glouceſter to ſeize the king's perſon.

On the other hand, the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings ſent an expreſs to the duke of Glouceſter, acquainting him with the king's death, and the queen's meaſures; and they alſo repreſented to him, that, as he was the king's uncle, by the father's ſide, the government of the kingdom belonged to him, during the minority; but, if he did not now prevent the queen, it would be in vain to expect another opportunity; and in fine, they, at all hazards offered him 1000 men well armed, and ready to march, at the word of command.

It is not eaſy to determine, whether, before the deceaſe of Edward IV, the duke of Glouceſter had projected to aſcend the throne, to the prejudice of his nephews; but it is ſcarce to be queſtioned, that he formed this deſign, the very moment he heard of his brother's death; for all his after proceedings too manifeſtly appear to be conſequences of a ſcheme laid, to compaſs that end. As for the lord Haſtings, it is certain, that his ſole view was, to take the government out of the hands of the queen and her relations; for his inflexible attachment to Edward IV. would never have ſuffered him to be concerned in a plot, to dethrone his ſon. As for the duke of Buckingham, his conduct is more ambiguous; for he not only deteſted the queen and her family, but had always a particular reſpect for the duke of Glouceſter; which gives occaſion to ſuſpect, that he joined with him, at firſt, in the deſign to place him on the throne. Nevertheleſs, the hiſtorians only aſcribe to him at leaſt, in the beginning of thi reign, the ſame intention with the lord Haſtings; namely to remove the queen from the government of the king's perſon, and of the kingdom; but, however this be, the duke of Glouceſter, upon the news of the king's death, ſent back the expreſs, with orders to deſire the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings, to come and confer with him, at Northampton.

A conference at Northampton.

The duke of Glouceſter's ſpeech to his friends.

Theſe lords, with ſome others, repairing to the place appointed, the duke of Glouceſter, in a long ſpeech, ſhewed them the great and impending danger, if the queen ſhould be poſſeſſed of the government. He told them, "They would be expoſed to the "mercy of an imperious woman, and of the "two families of Rivers and Grey, lately "raiſed by the king, his brother, who, for "their own ſecurity, would infallibly deſtroy "thoſe whom they conſidered, as their ri" vals and enemies; that the late king had " reſtrained them, by his authority, within " ſome bounds; but, when they ſhould at- " tain the ſupreme power, in the name of " the young king, nothing would be able to " curb their inſolence. He added, that no per- " ſon had a better right, or was more concern- " ed than himſelf, to take care of the affairs " of the kingdom, during the minority of the " king, his nephew; that his conſtant attach- " ment to the king, his brother, was univerſa- " ly known; and, therefore, his tender af- " fection for his children would not ſuffer " him to leave them to the mercy of thoſe, " who, on all occaſions, ſolely conſulted their " own advancement: That, for theſe reaſons, " he was reſolved to do all that was poſſible, " to promote the good of the nation, and the " honour of his nephew, principally by giv- " ing him an education, that ſhould render " him capable of treading in the ſteps of his " illuſtrious anceſtors; but that he could not " expect to execute ſuch an undertaking, " without the aſſiſtance of all honeſt men, " and eſpecially of thoſe to whom he was ſpeak- " ing, who, doubtleſs, had, like him, no " other view, than the nation's welfare and " glory; and that he had aſſembled them, " to concert with them proper meaſures, in " the preſent emergency, being fully deter- " mined not to proceed, without their advice."

The reſult of the conference. Moore.

This ſpeech meeting with applauſe, all the lords entered upon a ſerious debate, about the means to be uſed, to become maſter of the king's perſon. To ſucceed, by force, was extremely difficult; for the earl of Rivers had not only drawn together a numerous body of troops, but might eaſily conduct the king to London, before they were in a condition to prevent it. Beſides, they would have given him too great an advantage, if, without any apparent neceſſity, they ſhould ſo ſoon take up arms; for ſuch a ſtep would infallibly cauſe the people to join with their enemies, ſince it would be looked upon, as tending to obſtruct the king's coronation. Theſe conſiderations induced the lords to reſolve to uſe policy; and they agreed, that they ſhould continue to ſhew a great zeal for the king, to deprive the queen of any pretence to raiſe forces, or keep thoſe on foot that were aſſembled by the earl of Rivers; that the duke of Glouceſter ſhould endeavour to perſuade her to diſmiſs theſe troops, as uſeleſs; and that, if he ſucceeded, it ſhould be attempted to become maſter of the king, before his arrival at London; but if, on the contrary, the queen was bent to keep theſe forces, ſhe was to be amuſed with negotiation, till they could openly oppoſe her deſigns.

The duke of Glouceſter's letter to the queen. Moore.

The conference being over, the lord Haſtings poſted to London, where his preſence was neceſſary, on account of his great intereſt in the city; and, preſently after, the duke of Glouceſter ſent the queen a letter of condolence, upon the king's death, expreſſing the greateſt affection for the young prince, his ſucceſſor, and an extraordinary reſpect for her. After this, he told her, " He be- " held, with extreme joy, all hearts united " in the ſame ſentiments; which inſpired " him with hopes, that the king, his ne- " phew, would paſs his minority, in a per- " fect tranquillity: That, for his part, he " would labour, with all his might, to keep " the people in the obedience due to their " ſovereign, by giving them himſelf an ex- " ample of unlimited ſubmiſſion; that he did " not doubt, that ſhe would alſo contribute " to cauſe all the king's ſubjects, to enjoy the " peace and quiet they had reaſon to expect; " that, therefore, he took the freedom to ad- " viſe her, to exert herſelf to diſpel the old " jealouſies among the nobility, and confirm, " by her prudence, the reconciliation lately " made, before the king her husband's de- " ceaſe; that his advice was, that, without " prejudice or partiality, merit ſhould be " rewarded, wherever it was found, that no " one might juſtly complain of being neglect- " ed, for mere party concerns; that this was " chiefly to be done, leſt, by acting otherwiſe, " diviſions, which ought to be buried in eter- " nal oblivion, were renewed; that, therefore, " he could not forbear telling her, that he was " ſurpriſed to hear the earl of Rivers was rai- " ſing forces, to conduct the king to London, " ſince they ſeemed to be entirely needleſs; " that he was fully convinced of the goodneſs " of her intention, but it was to be feared, " that this proceeding would be conſidered, in " a quite different light; that troops, aſſem- " bled upon the frivolous pretence of provi- " ding for the king's ſafety, when none ap- " peared to give him any diſturbance, muſt " neceſſarily create ſuſpicions in the oppoſite " party ſo lately reconciled; that the precau- " tions ſeveral lords would, undoubtedly, take, " to ſcreen themſelves from the impending " miſchiefs, were the natural and infallible " fruits of theſe ſuſpicions; that, therefore, " this unneceſſary proceeding, to avoid a " groundleſs peril, would endanger the peace " of the whole kingdom; that, if once theſe " ſuſpicions ſhould prevail, and two armies be " on foot in the kingdom, God alone knew " the iſſue; and that, for theſe reaſons, of " which, doubtleſs, ſhe perceived the ſtrength, " he adviſed her to diſmiſs her troops, that all " the nobility of the realm might come, with- " out fear or jealouſy, to pay their reſpects to " their young ſovereign, and contribute, each " according to his ability, to the preſervation " of peace and union in the ſtate."

The queen falls into the ſnare. Moore.

The queen very imprudently fell in with this advice, not diſcerning the venom; and ſhe more readily complied with it, as it came from a brother-in-law, who had always been firmly attached to the intereſts of the late king, and ſtill ſhewed himſelf extremely zealous, for her and her children. During Edward IV's life, the duke of Glouceſter had been very reſpectful to the queen; moreover, there was not in his letter a ſingle word, to induce her to believe, that he deſigned to diſpute the government with her; and, in fine, ſhe conſidered, that the duke could not aſpire to the crown, without ſupplanting two nephews, 1483. phews, and five nieces, who were not in his power. This alone might have removed her ſuſpicions, if ſhe could have entertained any; wherefore, ſhe wrote to the earl of Rivers, her brother, that ſhe judged it proper, that he ſhould diſmiſs his troops, to prevent groundleſs jealouſies; and the earl, immediately, obeying her orders, and retaining only the king's domeſticks, began his journey, to conduct him to London.

The duke of Gloucester and his friends go and meet the king. Moore.

The young king approaching Northampton, the dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, who had brought into the town 900 armed men, went to meet him, and ſaluted him with great reſpect; and, in diſcourſing with the earl of Rivers, they told him, that Northampton was ſo full of ſtrangers, and ill provided with proviſions and other accommodations, that it would be inconvenient for the king's, and their retinue, to lodge in that place. Then, they adviſed him to carry the king to Stony-Stratford, which is only 12 miles farther, in the road to London; and they added, that they would return to Northampton, and wait upon the king, in the morning. Upon parting, one of of them propoſed to the earl, in a free and eaſy manner, as if it had been a ſudden thought, to go and paſs the night with them, at Northampton, whilſt the king reſted, at Stony-Stratford; and the earl, not ſuſpecting their deſign, accepted this kind invitation; nay, he was even glad of an occaſion, to cement their mutual reconciliation, by this mark of confidence.

The three lords, arriving at Northampton, ſpent the evening together, in perfect harmony, with mutual proteſtations of friendſhip and offers of ſervice; and, at bed-time, the earl of Rivers withdrew to his lodgings. The other two paſſed the reſt of the night, in conſulting about proper meaſures, ſince the earl of Rivers had indiſcreetly put himſelf into their hands; and, their conſultation being ended, they ſecured the keys of the inn where they lodged, under the pretence that they would be the firſt that ſhould attend the king, in the morning. For the greater precaution, they ſent a conſiderable number of men, to line the way, and ſuffer no perſon whatever to enter Stony-Stratford; and, at break of day, they were ready to mount, whilſt the earl of Rivers was ſtill in bed; but, in the interim, one of his people waking him, and telling him, that the dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham were ready to depart, and that no perſon was ſuffered to go out of the inn, he, directly, put on his clothes, to know the reaſon of this proceeding. However, he found them in a very different diſpoſition from that wherein he had left them, ſome hours before; for, upon his approach, they began to quarrel with him, charging him with alienating the king's affection from his moſt faithful ſubjects; adding, that they ſhould take care to prevent the like practices, for the future. The earl would have returned a calm anſwer to this accuſation; but, refuſing to hear him, they committed him to the cuſtody of ſome of their ſervants, and, mounting their horſes, rode away to the king.

They found the young prince ready to depart; and, paying him their reſpects, they remounted, in order to attend him. Before they were out of the town, they quarrelled with the lord Grey, the king's half-brother, and accuſed him, of having, jointly with the marqueſs of Dorſet, his brother, and the earl of Rivers, his uncle, formed a project to become maſter of the king's perſon; and they likewiſe taxed the marqueſs of Dorſet, with taking out of the tower the treaſure, committed to his cuſtody by the late king. Upon this, the king told them, that, as to what concerned the marqueſs of Dorſet, he could ſay nothing, but would anſwer for the conduct of the earl of Rivers and the lord Grey, who had been continually with him; to which the duke of Buckingham replied, that they had induſtriouſly concealed their plots from his highneſs; and, at the ſame time, he ordered his people to arreſt the lord Grey, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawſe, and, inſtead of proceeding to London, conducted the king back to Northampton. The ſame, or next day, the priſoners were carried to Pontefract-caſtle, the governor whereof was the duke of Glouceſter's creature; and the king ſeemed to be extremely troubled, for the diſgrace of his brother and uncle, as well as for the violence to his own perſon; but he had no way, to free himſelf from his new governors, except his tears, which were little regarded; yet, in the mean while, they paid him all the reverence uſually paid to a ſovereign, to blind the eyes of the people by theſe outward marks of reſpect and ſubmiſſion.

They ſeize upon the king.

The news reaching the queen, ſhe perceived her error, in relying on the duke of Glouceſter, and, immediately, ſuſpected, that he had formed deſigns ſtill more deſtructive to the royal family; but, being deprived of the aſſiſtance of her brother and ſons, as well as of their counſels, ſhe had no other refuge, than with the duke of York, her ſon, and the reſt of her family, to take ſanctuary in Weſtminſter.

The queen takes ſanctuary in Weſtminſter. Moore.

The lord Haſtings, then at London, as I obſerved, deteſted the queen, but loved the king and all the family of Edward IV; and, tho' he engaged in Glouceſter's and Buckingham's plot, it was becauſe he believed, that it only tended to prevent the queen from aſſuming the government, which he thought juſt and reaſonable. Having intelligence, in the night, of what had paſſed at Northampton, he, forthwith, ſent the news to Dr. Rotherham, archbiſhop of York and lord chancellor, aſſuring him, at the ſame time, that he had no reaſon to be alarmed; that the king's perſon was in no danger, and what had happened would, very ſoon, turn to the welfare of the kingdom. The archbiſhop, riſing that moment, repaired to the queen, carrying the great ſeal along with him; and he found her in a diſconſolate condition, ſitting upon the ground, lamenting her own and her children's fate, whilſt her domeſticks were buſy, in removing ſuch goods as were neceſſary into the ſanctuary. He endeavoured to comfort

Then the prelate, to inſpire her with hope, told her, that the king's perſon was ſafe, ſince the duke of York, his brother, was not in the power of thoſe whom ſhe conſidered, as her enemies; and he likewiſe aſſured her, that, if they ſhould preſume to put the king to death, or give the crown to another, he would, immediately, crown the duke of York. In fine, to give her all poſſible proofs of his fidelity, he left the great ſeal with her; but, reflecting afterwards upon his error, in reſigning ſuch a precious pledge, committed to him by the late king, he ſent for it again, as ſoon as he came home.

A tumult at London is appeaſed by Haſtings. Moore.

In the interim, there was a great commotion in the city of London; for ſeveral of the Londoners, alarmed at the news they had juſt received, which, probably, was exceedingly aggravated, had taken up arms. But the lord Haſtings, being ſenſible that an inſurrection, at London, might diſconſert the meaſures of his friends, at Northampton, inſtantly, coming to the city, where his credit was great, aſſured the citizens, that the king was in no danger; that, indeed, the earl of Rivers, the lord Grey and ſome others were arreſted, for conſpiring againſt the dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, but would be brought to a legal trial; yet this was no juſt reaſon for them to take up arms, and they might be called to an account, for the tumult, if they did not, at once, lay down their arms. The citizens, ſuppoſing the lord Haſtings, who was of the duke of Buckingham's party, to have a thorough knowledge of this affair, immediately, retired to their own habitations.

The king is brought to London. Moore.

Shortly after, the dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham conducted the king to London, paying him all the reſpect due to his dignity; and, whilſt they were on the road, they cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the earl of Rivers and the reſt of the priſoners, at Pontefract, had formed a deſign to kill them; and their ſervants ſhewed the people barrels of arms, which, they ſaid, were found among the baggage of the conſpirators. The news of the extraordinary reſpect paid to the king flying to London, before his arrival, greatly contributed to reſtore quiet, to the city, becauſe, in all appearance, there had been no attempt upon the king's perſon, or dignity; and, at his approach, the people went out, in crowds, to receive him. The young king entered the city, attended by a great number of lords, and particularly by the duke of Glouceſter, who followed him, bare-headed; and he was lodged in the biſhop's palace, to ſhew what confidence they placed in the citizens, and that they only conſulted his ſafety; which management entirely diſpelled the ſuſpitions of the duke of Glouceſter, raiſed by the Northampton affair.

The duke of Glouceſter calls a grand council Moore.

The rejoicings for the king's ſafe arrival being over, it was neceſſary to ſettle the government, during his minority, which was to laſt, ſeven years; and the moſt natural way would have been to call a parliament, as was practiſed, upon the deceaſe of Henry V; but as, during a parliament, all other authority would have ceaſed, till the government was regulated, the duke of Glouceſter was unwilling to part with the power he had acquired, by ſeizing the king's perſon. Indeed, he might have expected, that the parliament would have made him protector of the realm, ſince he was the only prince of the blood capable of holding the reins of the government; but the care of the young king's perſon and education would, doubtleſs, have been committed to others; for it is a conſtant and very reaſonable rule, not to truſt a minor king to thoſe that may be gainers by his ruin. This was what gave the duke of Glouceſter the greateſt anxiety and uneaſineſs; for he reſolved to continue maſter of the king's perſon, without which it would have been extremely difficult to accompliſh his deſigns; and, therefore, he judged it to be more agreeable to his intereſts to call a great council, and not ſummon a parliament, till he had ſecured the crown. This council chiefly conſiſting of the antient nobility and the duke of Glouceſter's friends, declared him protector of the king and kingdom, uſurping a privilege peculiarly belonging to the parliament; but, as I have often obſerved, it is eaſier to induce the parliament to confirm what is done, than cauſe it to do what is deſired.

He is declared protector.

The doubtful behaviour of the protector.

The ſeizing of the king's perſon, and the procuring himſelf to be declared protector, were the two firſt ſteps by which the duke of Glouceſter intended to aſcend the throne; and each of theſe had its fair and foul ſide. In the firſt place, after the death of Edward IV, as the queen and her relations had no right to ſeize the government of the realm, it could not be thought ſurpriſing, that the duke of Glouceſter ſhould aſſume, near the king, the dignity to which he was intitled by his birth; but his fraud and violence to the queen's relations gave occaſion to ſuſpect, that he had formed deeper deſigns. In the next place, nothing was more natural than to ſee the king's uncle protector of the kingdom; but, at the ſame time, his affecting to obtain that dignity, without vouchſafing to call a parliament, and his cauſing to be annexed to the office of protector of the realm that of protector of the king, were extraordinary proceedings, that might have raiſed juſt ſuſpicions; and yet the conſequence was not perceived, till it was too late to prevent it; however, leſt theſe irregularities ſhould open the eyes of the people, the duke induſtriouſly concealed himſelf, under the vail of an extraordinary zeal for the king his nephew's intereſts, and an extreme reſpect for his perſon.

Alterations at court. Moore.

The duke was no ſooner declared protector, than he took the great ſeal from archbiſhop Rotherham, who had given him a very plauſible pretence, and delivered it to the biſhop of Lincoln; but the duk of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings were confirmed in their places; tho' great alterations were made, in all the reſt of the poſts, the new protector

1483. protector putting in his own creatures, in the room of the queen's, who filled them before. The lord Haſtings was not, as yet, truſted, with the ſecret of his principal deſign; but he did not deſpair of gaining him, when his affairs were more advanced. As Haſtings was an avowed enemy to the queen and her family, and had a great intereſt in London, this was, at preſent, ſufficient for the protector's purpoſe; for, without knowing it, he could be ſerviceable to him, in the execution of his projects, which it was not yet proper to diſcover.

The protector moves in council to take the duke of York from the queen. Moore.

To proceed, with any probability of ſucceſs in his deſign, it was neceſſary for the duke of Glouceſter to have the young duke of York in his power, as well as the king, his brother; for to dethrone, or murder, the king, would have been altogether inſignificant, whilſt the duke of York was out of his reach. He, therefore, moved, in the council, whether it would not be requiſite to get the duke of York out of the queen's hands, and place him with the king, his brother; and he made, on this occaſion, a very long ſpeech, wherein, after profeſſing an extraordinary zeal for the royal family, and confirming what he ſaid, with a ſolemn oath, he diſplayed the reaſons, that required the young prince's removal from the queen. The firſt was, "That the queen's retiring to a "ſanctuary, without any apparent danger "to herſelf, or family, muſt neceſſarily be "conſidered, as an affront to the govern-"ment; and, ſecondly, her ſole view muſt "have been to raiſe diſturbances, by mak-"ing the people believe, that the king was "in danger, ſince no other conſequence "could be inferred from her conduct; that, "therefore, it was neceſſary to undeceive "the people, by procuring the duke of York, "and cauſing him to be educated, according "to his quality; and that, the more viſibly "the queen's malice appeared, the more vi-"gorouſly it ſhould be endeavoured to pre-"vent its effects: That it was manifeſt, "that ſhe was labouring to form, in the "kingdom, a party capable of placing her "at the head of affairs, as in the late reign; "and that it was with difficulty, and by an "amazing chance, that they were freed from "the imperious rule of that princeſs and her "family; but, if the king ſhould happen to "die, the realm would be again plunged in-"to the ſame calamities, ſince ſhe had the "lawful heir in her power. On the other "hand, it was neceſſary to conſider what re-"flections foreigners would make, when they "heard, that, whilſt one of Edward's ſons "was crowned, the other was forced to keep in "a ſanctuary; that it would be diſhonourable "to the government, to ſuffer themſelves to "be, thus, braved by a woman, who had "attempted to cauſe the king's council to be "looked upon, as enemies to the royal fa-"mily; moreover, that the king, being young "and wanting ſome diverſion, could not have "a more agreeable companion than his own "brother, and there was no reaſon to keep "them aſunder. In fine, it would be inde-"cent to proceed to the coronation, in the "abſence of the duke of York, the ſecond "perſon in the ſtate, who, having an un-"queſtionable right to be preſent, could "not be debarred of it, without injuſtice. "Upon all theſe accounts, he concluded, that "deputies ſhould be ſent to the queen, to "deſire her to deliver the duke of York to "the king, his brother; and he added, that "he thought the cardinal archbiſhop of Can-"terbury to be the fitteſt perſon for this de-"putation; and that, if, in ſpite of all the "archbiſhop's arguments, ſhe ſhould obſti-"nately keep the young prince with her, "and perſiſt in her groundleſs ſuſpicions, it "was his opinion, that the council ſhould "take him away, by force. Theſe were his "ſentiments; and he deſired every member "of the council freely to ſpeak his own.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury is ſent to the queen; and he is againſt the violating the ſanctuary. Moore.

The cardinal readily undertook to go and acquaint the queen with the council's pleaſure; but, he, by no means, approved the motion of violating the privileges of a ſanctuary. He obſerved, that the church of Weſtminſter was conſecrated, 500 years ſince, by St. Peter himſelf, who deſcended from heaven, attended by multitudes of angels; that no king of England had ever preſumed to violate that ſanctuary; and that ſuch an attempt would infallibly draw down the juſt vengeance of God upon the whole kingdom.

Buckingham's reaſons for it.

The duke of Buckingham replied, with great warmth, to this part of the cardinal's ſpeech; and he ſhewed, that ſanctuaries were deſigned only to protect ſuch, as had reaſon to fear oppreſſion and violence, and not to countenance frivolous and malicious ſuſpicions, detrimental to the king and kingdom. After many ſharp invectives againſt the queen, he enlarged upon the abuſes of ſanctuaries; particularly, as they afforded thoſe, who fled thither, means to eſcape. He added, that tho' the duke of York was neither guilty, nor oppreſſed, there was cauſe to fear, that the the queen, his mother, would carry him out of the kingdom, which might, hereafter, give the queen an opportunity to invade England, by the help of ſome foreign prince, upon frivolous pretences, which would never be wanting; and, in fine, after alledging ſeveral other reaſons, he agreed with the protector to take the duke of York, by force, out of the ſanctuary, if the queen refuſed to deliver him; and, this matter being debated, the opinion of the protector and the duke of Buckingham prevailed, tho' it was oppoſed by moſt of the eccleſiaſticks there preſent.

A conference between the queen and the archbiſhop. Moore.

The cardinal, coming to the queen, advanced all poſſible arguments, to prevail with her to comply; aſſuring her, that neither the king, herſelf, nor the duke of York were in danger. He ſpoke, with greater confidence, as he believed what he ſaid, not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting the duke of Glouceſter of having formed evil deſigns; for, as to the violence uſed to the queen's relations, being ignorant, whether they were innocent, he did not think it any 1483. great injuſtice to detain them, ſome time, in priſon, to prevent their diſturbing the kingdom, by their immoderate ambition; but all his eloquence was incapable of convincing the queen, who evidently perceived, in the duke of Glouceſter's conduct, too much reaſon to ſtrengthen her fears. At laſt, the cardinal, finding that his arguments were ineffectual, repreſented to her, that the council, apprehenſive of her carrying the prince, her ſon, out of the kingdom, had reſolved to take him, by force, out of his ſanctuary, if ſhe would not voluntarily deliver him; and the queen, hearing theſe menaces, inſiſted on the privileges of ſanctuaries, which was entirely needleſs, ſince ſhe ſpoke to a prelate, who had, ſo lately, been a zealous advocate for the ſame; but, at length, ſeeing herſelf preſſed to obey the council's order, ſhe freely declared to the cardinal the real grounds of her fears. She told him, that ſhe could not help ſuſpecting the duke of Glouceſter, of having deſigns deſtructive to the royal family, which he could not accompliſh, without having both the brothers in his power; and that the only means, to preſerve the king, was to keep the duke of York out of their uncle's reach. The cardinal, upon this diſcourſe, warmly replied, that, ſince ſhe obſtinately terrified herſelf with vain and imaginary ſuſpicions, he would ſay no more, on that head; that, being only the council's deputy, and the affair not concerning him, in particular, he would urge her no farther, leſt he ſhould give her occaſion to think him in the plot ſhe apprehended: That, however, he obſerved, with grief, her ill opinion of the members of the council; that ſhe muſt believe them to be either void of underſtanding, not to perceive what ſhe fancied ſhe ſaw ſo plainly, or elſe ſo wicked as to lend their aſſiſtance to the duke of Glouceſter; that, for his part, he could confidently affirm, that the duke had never entertained ſuch a thought; and that the council would be exceedingly ſorry to find themſelves charged with treachery, or extreme imprudence. The good cardinal, to diſpel the queen's fears, affirmed nothing but what he really believed, becauſe he was not in the protector's confidence; and, accordingly, the queen felt herſelf not a little ſhaken by the aſſurances of a perſon of his character. It was apparent, that, if the council deſigned to deceive her, they would not have made him their inſtrument; and yet ſhe could not lay aſide her jealous apprehenſions. In the interim, ſhe ſaw the cardinal ready to return, and herſelf on the point of being expoſed to the violence of her enemies, and obliged to do, by force, what was civilly deſired; and, therefore, coming to a ſudden reſolution to give up the young prince, ſhe caught him in her arms, tenderly took her leave of him, and, with a ſhower of tears, delivered him to the cardinal, who brought him to the protector. He no ſooner ſaw his young nephew, than he ran to him, with open arms, to embrace him and give him marks of a feigned affection, aſſuring him, that he would always be to him, inſtead of a father; and then he carried him to the king, who, without knowing how he came there, was overjoyed at his company. A few days after, the protector found ſome pretence to conveigh them both to the tower; tho', before, they lodged, at the biſhop's palace, in the heart of the city. 1483.

The duke of Glouceſter imparts his deſigns to the duke of Buckingham. Moore.

It is generally ſuppoſed, that the duke of Glouceſter did not communicate his moſt ſecret thoughts to the duke of Buckingham, till he had the two princes in his power; for tho' Buckingham mortally deteſted the queen and her family, becauſe, through their means, the late king refuſed to put him in poſſeſſion of certain lands, in Herefordſhire, which he claimed, and his hatred had even extended to the king's perſon, tho' he had not dared to diſcover it; and he had joined with the duke of Glouceſter, to deprive the queen and her relations of the government of the kingdom, during the king's minority; yet it is not believed, that, at firſt, his views had any farther extent; for, as he wanted only to ſecure, or increaſe his credit, a minority ſeems to have been more proper for his purpoſe, than the government of an adult prince, ſuch as the duke of Glouceſter. Nevertheleſs, as he was a man of vicious principles, it was eaſy for the protector to engage him in his plot, by the hopes of a reward; and it is ſaid, he not only promiſed to procure him the lands he deſired, but alſo to give him a part of the late king's wardrobe, to furniſh his houſe in a magnificent manner, and enſure to his heirs the office of high-conſtable, of which he was poſſeſſed; but, however this be, it is certain, that, from this time, he appeared no leſs eager, than the protector himſelf, to place him on the throne; and the only queſtion, that now remained, was, how to put this project in execution.

The reſult of their projects.

After this, the conferences, between the duke of Glouceſter and his truſty friends, became more frequent, than before; and they debated the principal difficulties, that might occur in the purſuit of the deſign, and the means to ſurmount, or prevent them. In a word, they came to the following reſolutions, which were conſidered, as the plan of their future proceedings. Firſt, as the greateſt oppoſition was, probably, to be expected from the queen, it was reſolved to diſpatch the priſoners, at Pontefract, in order to deprive the royal family of their main ſupport; to which the lord Haſtings readily conſented, tho' he was ignorant of the protector's real motive, in putting theſe lords to death. 2. It was agreed to engage in the plot the fitteſt perſons to accompliſh it; that is, in other words, villains capable of any undertaking, without the leaſt regard to honour, juſtice, or conſcience. 3. It was judged neceſſary to find ſome foundation to ſupport the duke of Glouceſter's pretenſions, in order to amuſe the people. 4. As ſecrecy was no leſs requiſite, till matters were ripe for execution, it was determined ſtill to ſhew publickly a ſettled deſign to cauſe the king to be crowned. 5. Laſtly, It was agreed, that the lord Haſtings ſhould either be gained, or diſpatched out of the 1483. the way; one of which ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary, by reaſon of his great intereſt in the city of London.

Orders to behead the priſoners at Pontefract.

This plan being laid, the protector wrote to Sir Richard Ratcliffe, governor of Pontefract and his creature, to behead, on a day appointed, the four lords that were under his cuſtody.

The protector gains Shaw and Catesby. Moore.

He afterwards applied himſelf particularly to gain Sir Edmund Shaw, then mayor of London, and proved ſucceſsful; and the mayor engaged in the plot his brother, John Shaw, a celebrated preacher, and one Pinker, monk and provincial of the Auguſtine friars, who were greatly eſteemed by the people; to whom the protector joined Catesby, an intimate friend and confident of the lord Haſtings.

A report is ſpread againſt the legitimacy of Edward IV. and V. Moore.

Theſe were the inſtruments the protector's ſecret council reſolved to employ, to ſpread among the people the reaſons that might ſtrengthen his pretenſions; and this appeared to be extremely difficult, ſince there were three princeſſes and ſix princes before him, viz. the king, the duke of York, his brother, Edward IV's five daughters, the earl of Warwick, ſon to the late duke of Clarence, and Margaret, his ſiſter. A ſingle expedient ſeemed ſufficient to deſtroy the rights of theſe princes and princeſſes; namely, to intimate that Edward IV's children were all baſtards, and Edward himſelf and the duke of Clarence, his brother, not ſons to the late duke of York. To exclude Edward's children, it was determined to alledge the validity of his pretended marriage-contract with Eliſabeth Lucy, before he married Eliſabeth Woodville, from whence it followed, that the children, by the latter marriage, were illegitimate; and this pretenſion was to be proved by the ducheſs of York's teſtimony, who had advanced that argument, to hinder the king, her ſon, from eſpouſing Sir Richard Woodville's daughter. If we may believe Philip de Commines, the biſhop of Bath and Wells then affirmed, that he married Edward IV. to a lady, named Eleanor Talbot, before he eſpouſed the queen; that it was done, without a witneſs, and the king had ſtrictly enjoined him, never to diſcover it to any perſon whatever: But we do not find, in the Engliſh hiſtorians, that the duke of Glouceſter, at the time we are ſpeaking of, made uſe of this reaſon, tho' it would have been more plauſible than that drawn from Edward's marriage with Eliſabeth Lucy; for Edward had taken precautions, with reſpect to the laſt, as was obſerved, in the hiſtory of his reign, whereas the firſt would have been unanſwerable, being ſupported by the evidence of the very prelate that pretended to perform the ceremony. It is, therefore, improbable, that the duke of Glouceſter ſhould overlook ſo great an advantage; but it is very poſſible, that Philip de Commines might be miſinformed, or, at leaſt, miſtaken in the name of Edward's miſtreſs.

In the interim, as it was not eaſy to prove Edward's pretended marriage with Eliſabeth Lucy; and as, on the contrary, the biſhops had declared, that there was no mutual contract, the protector's council judged, that the other point ſhould be principally urged, viz. that Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence were not ſons to the late duke of York; by which were, at once, excluded the poſterity of theſe two princes, and then the duke of Glouceſter was next heir to the crown. To ſupport this aſſertion, it was reſolved to plead the duke of Clarence's own teſtimony, who, as was pretended, maintained, that Edward IV. was illegitimate; and ſome of the late duke of York's ſervants were already ſuborned, who induſtriouſly ſpread various reports, to confirm what was intended to be intimated to the people. They gave out, that the ducheſs of York had admitted to her bed certain perſons perfectly reſembling Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence; and that the duke of Glouceſter alone was ſon to the duke of York.

1483. The protector's emiſſaries ſpread reports againſt Edward IV. Moore.

A pretence to exclude the duke of Clarence's heirs. Moore.

To exclude the earl of Warwick and his ſiſter, it was reſolved to inſiſt on the attainder of the duke of Clarence, their father; which, it was alledged, rendered them incapable of any inheritance. Thus, the duke of Glouceſter did not ſcruple to accuſe his own mother of adultery; but this was one of the leaſt of the crimes, which paved his way to the throne, ſo extremely was he blinded by his ambition.

Two councils are erected. Moore.

Having, thus, prepared all matters, the protector pretended to haſten the king's coronation; and, with this view, he appointed a particular council, which met, every day, to regulate the preparations. This council was compoſed of ſuch lords as were moſt attached to Edward IV's family, among whom the two archbiſhops, the biſhop of Ely, the lord Haſtings, and the lord Stanley were the chief; and he had likewiſe another council conſiſting of his creatures, which alſo met regularly; but the deſign of their conſultations was only, how to defer the coronation, and place the protector on the throne.

Moore.

The lords, appointed to haſten the preparations for the coronation, ſoon perceived, that all their orders were retarded by obſtacles from another quarter; and, on the other hand, they were ſomewhat ſurpriſed, that the protector ſeldom ſuffered the king to be ſeen; that the young prince had but very few attendants, whilſt the protector's houſe was filled with unneceſſary people, and a crowd of courtiers, who were always kindly received and careſſed; which things, joined to the affected delays of the coronation, began to create ſuſpicion in thoſe who were ſincerely devoted to the perſon of the king. The lord Stanley, a man of great penetration, was the firſt that diſcovered his fears of the protector's evil deſigns; and he freely ſpoke his mind to his fellow-counſellors, declaring, that he did not approve of the duke of Glouceſter's proceedings; that the other council which ſo often met, and whoſe reſolves were ſo carefully concealed, was to him very ſuſpicious; and that, therefore, they ought to think, betimes, of means to prevent the impending 1483. pending danger. This advice was prudent; but the lord Haſtings, ſtill prepoſſeſſed that the protector deſigned only to humble the queen's party, removed all theſe ſuſpicions. He affirmed, that he would pawn his life, that, if any thing was tranſacted, in the other council, detrimental to the king and the ſtate, he ſhould be, immediately, informed of it by one of the members; he meant Catesby, his friend and confident *; but he was a ſtranger to Catesby's treachery, who was, therefore, truſted by the duke of Glouceſter. Thus, Stanley and the other lords of his party, preferring the lord Haſtings's aſſurances to their own judgment, took no meaſures, to ſtop the protector's progreſs; which they might eaſily have done, had they attempted it, in time.

The protector ſounds Haſtings, and ſends him to the king. Moore.

In the mean while, the duke of Glouceſter, being ſenſible that the lord Haſtings was firmly attached to the king, reſolved to engage him in the plot, or deſtroy him; and, therefore, he ordered Catesby to ſound him, but with all imaginable caution, leſt he ſhould diſcover the deſign. Catesby, leading the lord Haſtings to diſcourſe, about ſtate-affairs, repreſented to him, that people talked very much of the duke of Glouceſter's right to the crown, in preference to Edward IV's children, and many were perſuaded, that his title was juſt; that it was publickly ſaid, it could be wiſhed, that the reaſons alledged, in his favour, were valid, becauſe it would be more beneficial to the nation to be governed by a man, than by a child; but that, for his part, he had not yet examined the matter, and ſhould be glad firſt to know his opinion. Haſtings, not ſuſpecting his friend, fully communicated his ſentiments, and imparted to him the lord Stanley's ſuſpicions of the duke of Glouceſter; adding, that he would rather ſee the deſtruction of the protector and the duke of Buckingham, than the late king's children deprived of their right; and that, if he perceived any plot, in behalf of the duke of Glouceſter, he would employ his credit, his eſtate, and even his life, to defeat it; which reply was, directly, carried to the protector, by the perfidious Catesby, with many aggravations, to haſten the lord Haſtings's ruin, leſt he ſhould, hereafter, diſcover his treachery.

Haſtings's death is reſolved. Moore.

The duke, having, thus, ſounded the lord Haſtings, was extremely embarraſſed; for he ardently deſired to gain that lord, knowing how much it was in his power to ſerve him; and, for that very reaſon, he could not help fearing him, if he perſiſted in his attachment to the king. To free himſelf from this uneaſineſs, he ordered Catesby to ſound him, once more; who, ſpeaking a little too plainly, in his ſecond converſation with Haſtings, and not doubting that his treachery was known, aſſured the protector, that he had not only nothing to hope from that quarter, but might alſo expect to find, in Haſtings, an avowed enemy; upon which, the protector determined to diſpatch him, conſidering him, now, as his real adverſary. 1483.

The means to bring it about. Moore.

This reſolution being taken, he called a council, at the tower, under the pretence of finiſhing the affairs of the king's coronation; and he came himſelf, at nine o' clock in the morning, with a chearful countenance, courteouſly ſaluting all the lords; after which, he went out, and deſired the lords of the council to continue their deliberations.

About an hour after, he returned with an angry aſpect, knitting his brows, biting his lips, and diſcovering all poſſible ſigns of the perturbation of his mind; and, remaining, ſome time, without ſpeaking, he broke ſilence with the following words: "My lords, "what puniſhment do they deſerve, who "have conſpired againſt my life?" The lords, not, immediately, replying, the lord Haſtings anſwered, "Whoſoever committed ſuch a "crime ought to be puniſhed, as a traytor." The duke made anſwer, "It was that ſorce-"reſs, my ſiſter-in-law, with her accomplices." Theſe words aſtoniſhed many of the council, who were in the intereſt of the queen, being afraid, that this accuſation concerned them; but the lord Haſtings was far from any ſuch apprehenſions; for it was univerſally known, that he was a mortal enemy to the queen; moreover, he had lately approved of the order ſent to Pontefract, to behead the impriſoned lords, who were to be executed, that very day. After a ſhort pauſe, the protector, unbuttoning his left ſleeve, ſhewed the council his arm, dried and withered, and ſaid, with extreme emotion, "See, what that ſor-"cereſs and Shore's wife have done, by their "witchcrafts; they have reduced my arm to "this condition, as they would alſo ſoon have "done my whole body, if, by God's mercy, "their accurſed plot had not been diſcovered." Theſe words cauſed a greater ſurprize than the former, becauſe the whole council knew, that the duke's arm had long been in that condition; and, beſides, if the queen had formed ſuch a project, Jane Shore would have been the laſt perſon to whom ſhe would have imparted it, ſince, of all women, ſhe moſt deteſted her. The lord Haſtings, who, ſince Edward's deceaſe, had kept Jane Shore, finding that ſhe was involved in the accuſation, could not forbear ſhewing, how much he doubted her being guilty, by ſaying, "If they had "committed ſuch a crime, they deſerved to "bepuniſhed." Upon this, the protector, raiſing his voice, ſaid, "What, doſt thou anſwer me, "with ifs and ands, as if I forged this accu-"ſation? I tell thee they have plotted my "death; and thou thyſelf art acceſſary to the "crime." He no ſooner ſpoke theſe words, than he ſtruck the table twice, with his fiſt; and, immediately, the room was filled with armed men. The protector, inſtantly, turning to the lord Haſtings, ſaid, "I arreſt thee "for high-treaſon. Who, me, my lord, re-"plied Haſtings? Yes, thee, traytor, an-

During the buſtle, one of the ſoldiers would have cloven the lord Stanley's ſkull, with a battle-ax; but he avoided part of the blow, by ſinking under the table; yet he was dangerouſly wounded. Probably, the ſoldier had orders to kill him, as it were by chance, under the pretence that he would have defended the lord Haſtings; and it is eaſy to gueſs, why the protector deſired to diſpatch him. However this be, having miſſed his aim, Stanley was arreſted, with the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Ely, whom he knew to be zealouſly affected to the young king, and, as to the lord Haſtings, he would ſcarce allow him time to make a ſhort confeſſion to the firſt prieſt that came, ſwearing, "He would not dine, "till he was beheaded." Accordingly, his "head was ſtruck off, upon a log that was found on the green, before the tower-chapel, the time limited by the protector being too ſhort to erect a ſcaffold. Hiſtorians enlarge upon ſeveral preſages he had of his death, but, tho' ſuch remarks may have their uſe, when the facts are unqueſtionable, I ſhall paſs them over in ſilence *, and only obſerve, that the lord Haſtings died, the ſame day and hour that the Pontefract-priſoners were executed, to whoſe death he greatly contributed.

Stanley is wounded, and arreſted, with the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Ely. Moore.

The lord Haſtings being dead, the protector judged it neceſſary to palliate ſuch a raſh and illegal execution, leſt the Londoners ſhould take fire, upon hearing it, and, with this view, he ſent for the lord mayor and aldermen. In the interim, he and the duke of Buckingham put on two old ruſty coats of armour; and, the mayor coming to the tower, the protector told him, that the lord Haſtings and ſome others had conſpired againſt his life, and he had no intelligence of the plot, till 10 o' clock that morning; that, the fact being fully proved, the king and council judged it neceſſary to execute him, immediately, becauſe they were informed, that a great number of people were in readineſs to riſe, in his favour; that this conſpiracy had put his perſon in extreme danger, and obliged him to harneſs himſelf, in old ruſty armour, for his defence; and that he had ſent for him, to give him a true account of this ſudden execution, that he might, when he acquainted the Londoners with it, take care to appeaſe, or prevent the commotions, which diſaffected people might raiſe in the city. The mayor and aldermen plainly perceived, that the protector did not inform them of the whole truth; but, not daring to expreſs their doubts, they withdrew, aſſuring him, that his orders ſhould be obeyed.

The protector tries to juſtify what was done to the mayor of London. Moore.

The ſole intent of what the protector had ſaid to the mayor and aldermen was, to prepare the people to receive a proclamation, publiſhed in the city, two hours after the death of the lord Haſtings; and the king, in whoſe name it was iſſued out, was made to ſay in it, "That the lord Haſtings had con- "ſpired to ſeize his perſon, in order to go- "vern the kingdom, at his pleaſure, and "to kill the protector and the duke of Buck- "ingham; that, to prevent this deſign, he "was conſtrained, by the advice of his coun- "cil, to cauſe the criminal to be, forthwith, "puniſhed, and that no man ever more de- "ſerved to die; that it was he, who perſuad- "ed the late king to do ſo many things, con- "trary to the rights and privileges of the peo- "ple; that he had attempted to debauch "him, by his perſuaſions and example, and "had lain, the night before, with Shore's "wife, the accomplice of all his crimes, and "eſpecially of that for which he was behead- "ed." There were ſeveral other particulars in the proclamation, tending to leſſen the people's affection and compaſſion for the lord Haſtings, and to ſhew, that his death was a judgment upon him; yet it was obſerved, that the proclamation was compoſed in an elegant ſtile, and fairly written on parchment, tho' publiſhed, ſo very ſoon after that lord's deceaſe. This occaſioned a ſuſpicion, that it was previouſly prepared, in order to be publiſhed, immediately after the execution; and, accordingly, it produced but little effect.

A proclamation upon that ſubject.

As Jane Shore was accuſed of being an accomplice of the lord Haſtings, the protector was obliged to proceed againſt her, wherefore, giving orders to arreſt her, he commanded her to be conducted to the tower, where ſhe was examined before the council. The Duke of Glouceſter charged her himſelf, with deſigning, by her ſorceries, to waſte his fleſh, by degrees, and conſpiring with the lord Haſtings to aſſaſſinate him; but he could alledge nothing, to ſupport theſe accuſations; and, beſides, ſhe made ſo good a defence, that the council could ſee no reaſon to condemn her. However, as the protector was unwilling, that ſhe ſhould eſcape, with impunity, ſhe was ſued for incontinency, as being guilty of leaving her husband, and living with other men; and theſe were undeniable facts, ſince it was notorious, that ſhe had been kept by the late king, and afterwards by the lord Haſtings; upon which, ſhe was delivered over to the biſhop of London, and condemned by the eccleſiaſtiaſtical court to do open penance, in St. Paul's church, in a white ſheet, with a wax-taper in her hand, before all the people †.

Moore.

The late executions, at London and Pontefract, without a legal proceſs, with the impriſonment of the archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Ely, and the lord Stanley, ſufficiently diſcovered the duke of Glouceſter's deſign; for, hitherto, he had varniſhed his conduct; but,

The protector haſtens the execution of his deſign.

1483. after these violent proceedings, it was impossible to conceal his intentions. Every one said to himself, that these unjust doings must necessarily end in the king's destruction; yet they durst not express their thoughts to one another, such a terror was spread, in all parts of the kingdom. They, who could have opposed the protector, were dead, or in prison; and, if any survived capable of giving him uneasiness, the example of those, who had been treated with so great barbarity, was sufficient to cause them to act, with precaution; for they plainly saw the imminent danger, if they did but seem to perceive what was projected.

The great men being, thus, seized with terror and consternation, the protector and the duke of Buckingham judged, that it was time to discover their designs; and there remained but one difficulty, viz. to persuade the Londoners to approve of the intended change. This was not an easy task; for, tho' private persons may be corrupted, and, if any are too obstinate, which was the case of the lord Hastings dispatched, it is much harder to prevail on a whole nation, to approve of manifest acts of injustice, wherein they themselves are not concerned; and there are only two ways to succeed. The first is to compel them, through fear, to pretend to believe what is contrary to their own judgment; and the other, to gain those in whom they put any confidence, that they may, by degrees, be brought to what is desired. After several consultations, the protector and the duke of Buckingham resolved to make use of both these means, the first of which had already proved so successful; and, as for the second, they agreed, that it should be continued, more than ever, to be spread, by emissaries, among the people, that Edward IV's children were illegitimate, and their father himself and the duke of Clarence, his brother, were not sons to the duke of York; and that these rumours should be supported by a sermon of Dr. Shaw, whose eloquence was applauded by the whole city.

He employs Dr. Shaw, a famous preacher. Moore.

Shaw's sermon.

These measures being concerted, the doctor mounted the pulpit, one Sunday morning, at Paul's cross; and he preached upon these these words, "Bastard slips shall take no "deep root." He began with shewing the blessings God commonly bestowed on the fruits of the marriage-bed, and the calamities which, on the contrary, befel illegitimate children; and he did not want examples of both, as well in sacred as prophane history. He afterwards enlarged on the noble qualities of the duke of York, slain in the battle of Wakefield, and represented, how great happiness the English might expect from a sovereign, descended from that renowned prince. From hence he took occasion to observe, that it was to be feared, the reign of Edward V. would be fatal to England, since he was born out of wedlock; and, besides, that neither Edward IV. nor the late duke of Clarence were sons to the great duke of York, as was evidently proved by officers of his household, witnesses of the adulterous life of the duchess, their mother: That she had admitted to her bed, in the view of all her servants, men whom the two brothers perfectly resembled; but that the duke of Gloucester alone could justly be called the duke of York's son. Moreover, that Edward IV. was not lawfully married to his queen, since he had before plighted his faith to the lady Elisabeth Lucy, as could be made appear from substantial evidences; and that, of course, his issue must be spurious: That, therefore, the duke of York's real posterity was not to be sought for, in the children either of Edward, or of the duke of Clarence; but that their race would infallibly perish, because "Bastard "plants shall take no deep root." But, raising his voice, he added, my lord protector, that noble prince, the pattern of all virtue, discovers, in his features, air, carriage, and soul, the perfect image of his illustrious father; at which words, it was designed, that the duke of Gloucester should shew himself, in hopes that the people, captivated by the preacher's eloquence, would salute him, as king; but, the duke staying, a little too long, the doctor had proceeded to another subject, when he saw him enter; yet, leaving it, he repeated the foresaid words, whilst the duke was pressing through the crowd, to come to his place. However, instead of hearing the cry of, "Long "live king Richard!" as he expected, he found that the whole audience kept a sullen silence, detesting the baseness of the preacher, instead of applauding his eloquent language; and, the sermon being ended, the doctor went and absconded, for shame, nor durst he ever shew his face again in the world; for it is said, that he died, presently after, with grief at his ill success, and for losing the esteem of his audience.

Wisdom of Solomon, chap. iv.

Shaw's sermon not answering the end proposed, other means were necessary; for the protector had proceeded too far to recede; wherefore, the duke of Buckingham, being a fine speaker, undertook to harangue the people, fancying that a polite speech would be more successful than Shaw's methodical sermon. Accordingly, the lord mayor had orders to assemble the aldermen, common-council, and principal citizens, in Guild-Hall; and the duke of Buckingham, coming to the assembly, and taking his place, near the mayor, told the people, that he came from the council, to acquaint them with a matter of the last importance to the whole kingdom, but especially to the citizens of London. He, at first, insisted on the calamities endured by the English, in the late reign; and he highly aggravated the cruelty, avarice, and incontinency of Edward IV, labouring, with all his might, to render him odious. Then, he reminded his audience, that, the Sunday before, that excellent man, Dr. Shaw, had fully proved to them, that Edward was not lawfully married to his queen, and consequently their children were spurious: That neither Edward himself nor the duke of Clarence, his brother, were sons to the duke of York; and to the proofs, alledged by the doctor, he himself could add many more, did not his respect for the protector restrain him from dwelling upon the duchess 1483. ducheſs his mother's ſcandalous life: That, for theſe reaſons, the lords of the council, and the commons of the realm, particularly of the northern counties, had declared, that a baſtard ſhould not ſucceed to the crown of England, and petitioned, that it ſhould be adjudged to the duke of Glouceſter, only ſon to the late duke of York; that, indeed, there was cauſe to fear, that the magnanimous duke would refuſe the offer; but yet it was to be hoped, that, all the people, and eſpecially the Londoners, uniting with one accord, he would be prevailed on to take upon him the burden of the government, too weighty for a child; and that, upon all theſe accounts, he required them in his own, and the name of the lords of the council, to declare their intention. Here he ſtopped, expecting to hear the people cry, "Long live king Richard;" but every one ſtood ſpeechleſs, ſo great was their aſtoniſhment, to hear ſo unjuſt a propoſal; and the duke, ſurpriſed, in his turn, at this unexpected ſilence, inquired of the mayor the reaſon of it, who anſwered, that, perhaps, they did not well underſtand him. If that be the caſe, replied the duke, I will make myſelf better underſtood; and then, raiſing his voice, he repeated the ſubſtance of what he had ſaid, in other words, with a gracefulneſs and eloquence worthy a nobler ſubject; but the people ſtill kept a profound ſilence. The duke, confounded to find his rhetoric ineffectual, talked, ſome time, in a low voice with the mayor, to conſult with him, on the preſent occaſion; and, at length, the mayor told him, that, perhaps, the people were ſilent, becauſe they were uſually harangued only by the recorder, who was the mouth of the city. Upon this, he commanded the recorder to ſpeak to the people, which he did, with great reluctance; yet he ſo artfully managed his ſpeech, that, without any additions of his own, he repeated to the people the ſenſe of the duke's harangue. He concluded, with requiring the people to give a poſitive anſwer, whether they would have the duke of Glouceſter, for king, or not? At theſe words, there was a confuſed murmur in the aſſembly; but, as it was, hitherto, uncertain, whether the people anſwered Yes, or No, ſome of the duke of Buckingham's ſervants, who had ſlipped in amongſt the crowd, fell to crying, "Long live "king Richard!" Some of the citizens, being bribed, tho' they would not venture to begin, ſeconded the cry; and the apprentices, with the rabble that ſtood near the door, followed their example, who, throwing up their hats, in token of joy, cried out, "King Ri- "chard! King Richard!" The duke of Buckingham evidently perceived, that the cry came from the rabble without, and not from the principal citizens in the hall; however, improving this advantage, he commanded ſilence, and, reſuming his ſpeech, declared, that he was tranſported with joy, to ſee this propoſal meet with ſuch a general and unanimous approbation, adding, "I, therefore, "my good friends, deſire you to meet me "here to-morrow, about this time, that we "may all, in a body, preſent our humble pe- 1483.

"tition to his highneſs, and intreat him to "condeſcend to our requeſt." Then, the mayor diſmiſſing the people, the citizens returned to their habitations, with tears in their eyes, and ſorrow in their hearts; yet they durſt not diſcover it, leſt they ſhould offend thoſe whoſe intereſt it was to have it concealed.

He repeats his ſpeech. Moore.

He orders the recorder to ſpeak to the people.

On the morrow, the duke of Buckingham, with the mayor, aldermen, and many other perſons of the cabal, coming to the protector's palace, ſent a meſſage to him, that the magiſtrates of London deſired an audience of him; and the protector ſcrupled to appear, pretending to fear, that ſuch numbers were not aſſembled, with a good deſign; upon which, the duke of Buckingham obſerved to the mayor, and thoſe about him, that his highneſs was not conſcious of their intent, intimating, that he was not concerned in the tranſactions of the preceding day. At length, upon the repeated deſire, that his highneſs would vouchſafe to grant an audience, he came forth, with ſigns of great diffidence, and as not daring to approach ſuch multitudes, for fear of ſome miſchief; and then the duke of Buckingham, not giving the mayor time to ſpeak, briefly repreſented the grievances of the nation, in the late reign. After this, he told the protector, that the people had found no better way, to free themſelves from their evils, than to beſeech his highneſs to aſſume the regal authority, to which he had an unexceptionable title; adding, that the mayor and aldermen of London, there preſent, were come to petition him, in the name of all the people, who were united in the ſame intention.

He waits upon the protector with the mayor, and offers him the crown. Moore.

The protector refuſes it, at firſt. Moore.

The duke of Buckingham threatens to give the crown to another.

The protector accepts of it.

The duke of Glouceſter, ſeeming ſurpriſed at this propoſal, replied, "He was convinced, that "all he had heard was true; but ſuch was his "veneration for the memory of the late king, "his brother, and his affection for his chil- "dren, as outweighed all the crowns in the "world; and, therefore, he could not con- "ſent to their requeſt. However, he readily "pardoned their petition, and thanked them, "for their affection; but he adviſed them to "be loyal to the ſovereign, under whoſe do- "minion they lived; aſſuring them, that, for "his part, he would continue, to the utmoſt "of his power, to give the king, his nephew, "ſuch advice, as he ſhould judge moſt condu- "cive to render his kingdom flouriſhing, and "his people happy, as he believed he had, hither- "to, done, to the ſatisfaction of all the world."

The duke of Buckingham, appearing to be diſſatisfied with this anſwer, murmured ſome words to himſelf, expreſſing his diſcontent, and, at length, deſired leave to ſpeak, once more; and, having obtained it, he expreſly told the protector, "That all people were unanimouſ- "ly reſolved not to own, for king, any of "Edward IV's children: That they had pro- "ceeded too far to recede; and, therefore, "if he would not receive the crown, the peo- "ple would be obliged to offer it to one who "would not refuſe it." At theſe words, the protector began to be a little more compliant, and, at laſt, ſpoke to the people, as follows:

"Since

" Since I perceive the whole kingdom is re-
" ſolved to exclude Edward's children from
" the crown, for which I am extremely con" cerned, I am fully convinced, that it can,
" of right, belong only to me, who am the " undoubted ſon of the late duke of York, my " father; and to this title is, now, joined the " free election of the lords and commons of
" the realm, which, of all others, I ſhall con-
" ſider, as the principal and moſt effectual.
" From theſe conſiderations, I graciouſly re" ceive your petition, and, directly, enter upon
" the government of the two kingdoms of Eng" land and France; to rule and defend the " former, and to ſubdue the latter by God's
" help, and my people's aſſiſtance." At the concluſion of this ſpeech, was heard a great ſhout of, " Long live king Richard III. " And, the comedy being over, the people retired to their habitations, making, upon this occaſion, ſuch reflections as were ſuggeſted by their reſpective underſtandings, intereſts, or paſſions. 1483.

18. RICHARD III. ſirnamed Crook-back.

Richard III. is proclaimed. Moore. Hall.

THE duke of Glouceſter, having, by ſuch extraordinary means, ſurmounted all the obſtacles that oppoſed his ambition, was proclaimed, the 22d of June, by the name of Richard III. and he might have been crowned, the next day, the preparations for Edward V's coronation being finiſhed; but he deferred the ceremony, till the 6th of July, expecting 5000 men, which he ſent for out of the north, becauſe he did not entirely confide in the citizens of London.

The biſhop of Lincoln is made chancellor, Act. Pub. and John Howard, duke of Norfolk.

During this interval, he gave the great ſeal to the biſhop of Lincoln, one of his favourites; and, on the 28th of June, he made the lord John Howard earl-marſhal, and, the next day, duke of Norfolk. The day following, he commiſſioned him to exerciſe the office of high-ſteward, during the coronation; and, a few days after, he created Thomas Howard, his ſon, earl of Surrey, William Berkeley earl of Nottingham, and the lord Lovel viſcount of the ſame name, who was one of his confidents.

The archbiſhop of York and Stanley are releaſed. Moore.

Thomas Rotherham, archbiſhop of York, and the lord Thomas Stanley, who were confined, the day the lord Haſtings was beheaded, were releaſed; and, at the ſame time, Richard made the lord Stanley, lord ſteward of the houſhold; not from a motive of friendſhip, or affection, but leſt the lord Strange, his ſon, who was beginning to levy forces, in Lincolnſhire, ſhould raiſe commotions in the kingdom.

The biſhop of Ely is committed to the cuſtody of Buckingham. Moore.

As for Dr. Morton, biſhop of Ely, who was arreſted, the ſame day, the king did not intend to ſet him at liberty; but, the univerſity of Oxford, of which that prelate was a member, having preſented a petition, in his behalf, he thought it imprudent wholly to reject it, at a juncture when he wanted to gain the hearts of his new ſubjects. However, as he mortally deteſted that biſhop, he could not reſolve to releaſe him entirely; and, therefore, tho' he took him out of his confinement, in the tower, he committed him to the cuſtody of the duke of Buckingham, who ſent him to the caſtle of Brecknock, in Wales. He was a perſon of mean extraction; but, having ſtudied, at Oxford, where he had taken his doctor's degree, he became ſo eminent, for his learning and parts, that he was removed from thence, and made a privy-counſellor by Henry VI. The revolution, in favour of Edward IV. occaſioned no change, in his fortune; for that monarch, probably, pleaſed with his complaiſance, continued him in the ſame poſt, and promoted him to the ſee of Ely. Thenceforward, he was entirely attached to that prince, which drew on him Richard's averſion; who impriſoned him, the ſame day the lord Haſtings was executed, leſt his attachment to the late king's family ſhould induce him to oppoſe his deſigns.

The king and queen are crowned. Moore. Hall.

The coronation of the king and queen was performed, the 6th of July, with great ſolemnity; at which the peers of the realm were preſent, for fear of being ſuſpected by the new king, whoſe jealous temper was notorious; and Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, wife to the lord Stanley, and mother to the earl of Richmond, detained in Bretagne, held up the queen's train.

Richard enjoyed, only two years and two months, the crown he had ſo paſſionately deſired; and he ſpent his whole reign, in projecting means to ſupport himſelf, on the throne, which having aſcended, by bloodſhed and other crimes, he endeavoured to keep poſſeſſion by the ſame methods; but Divine Providence was pleaſed to blaſt all his meaſures, entirely founded upon injuſtice, violence, and the ſubverſion of the laws. However, at preſent, his affairs ſeemed to be in a very good ſituation; for the Lancaſtrian family was quite extinct, in England, and Henry, earl of Richmond, the only branch of that houſe, was in the power of the duke of Bretagne, who had promiſed Edward IV. to prevent him from leaving his dominions. Margaret, his mother, diſcovered no inclination to proſecute her rights; who was ſubject to a husband, whom Richard had brought over to his intereſt, by one of the moſt conſiderable poſts, at court. As to the princes and princeſſes of Portugal and Caſtile, deſcendants from Philippa and Catharine of Lancaſter, daughters to John of Gaunt, they were too remote to give Richard any diſturbance; and, in fine, there was not a lord, in the kingdom, that appeared to have ſufficient credit, to excite inſurrections, the civil 1483. vil war having ſwept away great numbers, and wholly deſtroyed many antient families. As to thoſe that were ſtill left, Richard hoped to gain them by favours, as he had already done the dukes of Buckingham and Norfolk, the lord Stanley, and ſome others; and, as for the Yorkiſts attached to the family of Edward IV. viz. the Woodvilles, Greys, and others of the new nobility, he had diſpatched ſome, in the laſt reign, and the reſt were fled. The queen dowager was ſtill with her five daughters in the ſanctuary, from whence ſhe durſt not ſtir, and was in no condition to hurt him; the marqueſs of Dorſet, her ſon, had alſo taken ſanctuary, and Sir Richard Woodville had abſconded; and, in a word, Edward V. and the duke of York, his brother, were in the tower, where, ſince the 27th of June, Richard had taken care to place, as governor, Sir Robert Brackenbury, his creature; ſo that, in all appearance, nothing could ſhake the new monarch's throne.

Circumſtances favourable to Richard.

Richard's meaſures for his ſafety.

In the interim, he deſigned to ſecure Caſtile and Portugal, the archduke Maximilian, who governed the Low-Countries, in the name of Philip, his ſon, France, and Bretagne, from whence, he was apprehenſive, that his enemies might procure ſome aſſiſtance; and, in fine, to diſconcert all the meaſures that the friends of Edward IV's family might take againſt him, he reſolved to murder his nephews, king Edward V. and the duke of York, his brother. Theſe were Richard's firſt projects, to preſerve his crown; which created him no leſs trouble, after poſſeſſion, than whilſt he was labouring to obtain it.

Ambaſſies to Caſtile, Bretagne, and France. Act. Pub.

To accompliſh all theſe reſolutions, the 12th of July, he appointed, for his ambaſſadors to Caſtile, Bernard de la Force, with orders to renew the antient alliance with queen Iſabella and Ferdinand, king of Arragon, her husband; and, the next day, he commiſſioned Thomas Hutton, to treat of the prolongation of the truce with Francis II, duke of Bretagne; who, in all probability, had ſecret inſtructions, to endeavour to procure the earl of Richmond, or, at leaſt, to renew the treaty, upon that ſubject, between Edward IV. and the duke; and, three days after, he appointed commiſſioners to treat with France, about ſome violations of the truce, in order to have occaſion to confirm it.

He reſolves to put his nephews to death. Moore. Hall.

Theſe meaſures being taken, nothing remained but to execute the chief article, the murder of his two nephews; and, with this view, he reſolved to remove from London, that, their death falling out, in his abſence, he might be the leſs ſuſpected. He departed from London, to viſit ſeveral counties, under the pretence of reforming certain abuſes, introduced to the great prejudice of the people; and his progreſs into the north was particularly neceſſary, to reſtrain the inſolence of the northern troops, who, after their return, had committed great outrages; but, before he proceeded to York, he made ſome ſtay, at Glouceſter, that he might not to be too far from London, before the execution of his orders concerning his nephews.

The duke of Buckingham, his intimate friend and confident, attended him to Glouceſter; whom he had loaded with eſtates and honours, both whilſt he was protector, and after he was king. However, the duke ſtill expected another favour, of which he had received a poſitive promiſe; namely, the moiety of the lands of the houſe of Herefordſhire, to which he thought he had a very juſt pretenſion. The foundation of his claim will manifeſtly appear from the following genealogy.

The duke of Buckingham's claim to the lands of Herefordſhire.

HUMPHREY BOHUN,
Earl of Hereford and Northampton.

MARY BOHUN, Wife to Henry IV.	ANN, THOMAS of Woodſtock, Earl of Glouceſter, Son of Edward III.
HENRY V.	ANN, Edmund, Earl of Stafford.
HENRY VI.	HUMPHREY, Duke of Buckingham,
EDWARD, Prince of Wales.	HENRY, Duke of Buckingham.

This genealogy evidently ſhews, that the duke of Buckingham had a right to one half of the earl of Hereford's lands, becauſe he was deſcended from one of his daughters; but there are other reaſons, which rendered his title diſputable. When Richard II. put to death his uncle, the duke of Glouceſter, at Calais, having cauſed his eſtate to be confiſcated by the parliament, he gave what that prince held, in right of Ann, his wife, to the earl of Derby, who had married the eldeſt of the ſiſters, and likewiſe created him duke of Hereford; upon which, the earl of Derby took poſſeſſion of the whole inheritance of the earl of Hereford, his father-in-law; and, afterwards, aſcending the throne, by the name of Henry IV, all his lands were annexed to the crown, which continued in poſſeſſion of the whole eſtate of the Hereford-family, till Richard III's acceſſion to the throne. However, when Richard was protector, to engage the duke of Buckingham to ſerve him, in his project to uſurp the crown, he promiſed to reſtore him the moiety of the inheritance confiſcated upon the duke of Glouceſter, his great grandfather; but, upon his being king, he altered his mind, whether he believed, that he had amply rewarded him, in other reſpects, or was afraid of making him too powerful, and ſo giving him occaſion to aſpire to the throne, as deſcending from Edward III. However this be, the duke, during this journey, reminding him of his promiſe, received ſuch an anſwer, as led him to deſpair of that juſtice, or favour; but the duke, being very high-ſpirited, was ſo offended at the king's refuſal, that he deſired leave to go and take care of his own private affairs; and Richard, not ſuſpecting that this denial had made ſo deep an impreſſion upon the duke, or, perhaps, not fearing the effects of his reſentment, granted him the leave 1483. he desired; and, parting from him, at Gloucester, he pursued his journey to York.

Whilst the king was at Gloucester, he sent an express order to Brackenbury, governor of the tower of London, to murder Edward V. and the duke of York, his brother; but Brackenbury, more conscientious than his master, returning a very submissive answer, told him, that he should never be able to execute his commands. Richard, mortified to be deceived in his opinion of that officer, sent him by James Tyrrel a written order, to deliver to him the keys and government of the tower, for a single night. Brackenbury obeyed; and Tyrrel brought in his agents, to put in execution the king's orders. That very night, while all were asleep, he went into the two princes apartment; and, smothering them, in their bed, caused them to be buried, under a little stair-case; which Tyrrel himself afterwards confessed, who was executed, in the reign of Henry VII. In 1674, whilst some alterations were making, in that part of the tower, bones were found, supposed to be those of Edward V. and the duke of York; wherefore, Charles II, who then reigned, ordered them to be put into a marble urn, and removed to Westminster, among the tombs of the kings. As the two princes were never heard of, after the day that Tyrrel went into the tower; and, as their servants, were dismissed, the publick did not doubt, that they were sacrificed to their uncle's safety.

The king is crowned again, at York. Hall. Hist. Croyl.

Richard, receiving the news of the death of his two nephews, continued his journey into the north, and arrived, at York, about the end of August; but, as the pretence of his journey was to cause justice to be impartially administer'd to the people, he could not help executing some of the northern soldiers, who, in their march from London, had committed great outrages; and then he caused himself to be crowned, a second time, at the cathedral of York, the beginning of September, and, the same day, created Edward, his son, 10 years of age, prince of Wales, with the usual formalities.

The alliance with Castile is renewed. Act. Pub.

A few days after his coronation, he had the agreeable intelligence, that Ferdinand and Isabella had prevented him, by desiring the confirmation of the league, between England and Castile, by an ambassador sent, on purpose, and who was then come to York; and the renewing of that alliance, which he ratified himself, the 31st of August, pleased him extremely. He found, that Ferdinand and Isabella, owning him, for king, entertained no thoughts of restoring to the throne the house of Lancaster, from which queen Isabella was descended, being grand-daughter to Catharine of Lancaster, daughter to John of Gaunt; and he conferred the honour of knighthood * upon Geoffrey de Sasiola, ambassador of Castile, who brought him the pleasing news, and sent letters full of esteem, affection, and acknowledgment, to the king and queen of Spain, to the cardinal de Mendosa, and to the earl of Leryn, their ministers.

The death of Lewis XI. P. Daniel.

Lewis XI, king of France, died, August the 29th, in the present year; and Charles VIII, his only son, being a minor, succeeded him, under the guardianship of his sister, Ann, wife to Philip de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu, pursuant to the late king's will; but Lewis, duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, disputed the regency with her; and this contest raised, in the court of France, disturbances, that prevented the ministers from attending to the renewal or confirmation of the truce with England, which Richard strenuously sollicited.

The duke of Buckingham conspires against the king. Moore.

Whilst the king flattered himself, that he had taken all necessary measures, to support himself on the throne, a conspiracy was forming against him, that ended in his destruction, after proving the ruin of its author. I left the duke of Buckingham dissatisfied, and parting from the king, in order to retire; who was a person of a lively and penetrating genius, extremely proud, ambitious, revengeful, and dissolute, in his morals. During Edward IV's life, he could never bring himself to submit to the queen, tho' she had a great ascendant over the king, her husband; and he was even considered, as head of the party of the antient nobility against the new, which entirely consisted of the queen's relations and creatures. It was principally from his aversion to the queen, that, after Edward IV's decease, he was so devoted to the duke of Gloucester, for whom, as has been said, he procured the protectorship, and, at last, the crown itself; and, in return, for so signal a service, Richard had liberally bestowed his favours upon him. Particularly, he made him, in a manner, master of Wales, and the neighbouring counties, by the posts and governments given him, in those parts; but all these favours were forgotten, when he refused him a moiety of the lands of Hereford. The duke perceived the king's policy, in giving him posts, from which he could remove him, at pleasure; whereas, in restoring the lands he demanded, he could not resume them, without compulsive methods. This proceeding convinced him, that the king would continually keep him in dependence; and, being thoroughly acquainted with that prince's character, he plainly foresaw, that the least disgust would occasion the forfeiture of all his enjoyments. Besides, he thought it a palpable injustice, to refuse him what he believed to be his lawful right; and that he violated his promise, and shewed himself extremely ungrateful, in making so ill a return for the services he had received from him; all which made him apprehensive, that he designed to ruin him, in process of time.

The duke and bishop of Ely consult together, how to dethrone the king.

In this disposition, he retired to his castle of Brecknock, where Dr. Morton, bishop of Ely, was prisoner, under his custody; and, in his frequent conversations with that prelate, he could not avoid discovering his resentment against

1483. againſt the king. The biſhop, who was a man of ſenſe, ſoon found, that the duke was diſſatisfied, which encouraged him freely to ſpeak his mind; and he obſerved, that the duke took a pleaſure in hearing him, and would have, perhaps, ſpoken himſelf with more freedom, had he dared to truſt him entirely; and, therefore, to inſpire him with greater confidence, he affected to talk of the king in a manner, which gave him to underſtand, that he ſhould find in him a perſon ready to ſecond him, in his deſigns. At length, after mutually ſounding each other, for ſome time, they diſcovered their ſentiments to one another, and lamented together the miſerable ſtate of the kingdom, under ſuch a king; and the late death of Edward V. and the duke, his brother, furniſhed them with freſh matter to exclaim againſt Richard. They concluded, that, ſince he ſacrificed his own nephews, no lord in the land could be ſure of his life; and, at length, the duke requeſted the biſhop, to tell him ingenuouſly, whether it was poſſible to prevent the miſchiefs they had reaſon to fear; promiſing, with an oath, to keep the ſecret, with the utmoſt fidelity. Morton, being emboldened by this oath, told him, in plain terms, "In his opinion, the only remedy was to dethrone Richard, and ſet up another king. He owned, that, tho' he could have wiſhed the crown had continued in the family of Henry VI, he could not help following the ſtream, when almoſt all England declared for Edward IV; that, Henry VI. and the prince, his ſon, being dead, he had inviolably adhered to Edward; that, upon Edward's deceaſe, he was no leſs zealous, in the ſervice of his young ſon, whom he believed his lawful ſucceſſor; that, afterwards, he perceived with grief the duke of Glouceſter aſpiring to the throne, and, having the honour to be of the council, thought it his duty to oppoſe his deſign; tho', inſtead of ſucceeding, he had only incurred the hatred and indignation of that prince, who had impriſoned him, ſolely for adhering to the family of Edward IV: That this unjuſt violence had increaſed his averſion for the uſurper, which was, to the laſt degree, inflamed by the tragical death of the two young princes; that being in theſe circumſtances, he had conſidered with himſelf, what prince would be fitteſt to be placed on the throne, in the room of the tyrant, and had found no other than the duke of Buckingham, deſcended from a ſon of Edward III: That, the whole line of Lancaſter being extinct, at leaſt, in England, there remained of the houſe of York only the tyrant and his ſon, with the young earl of Warwick, ſon to the duke of Clarence; but as, for the laſt, he could not claim the crown, his father's attainder having debarred his heirs of the right to any inheritance: That the preſent king had, by his crimes, rendered himſelf unworthy; and to preſerve the ſon's right, after deſtroying the father, would be acting imperfectly; wherefore, once more, he ſaw only the duke of Buckingham capable of lawfully laying claim to the crown."

The biſhop propoſes to the duke to make himſelf king. Moore. Hall.

The duke liſtened very attentively to this diſcourſe; but he deferred his anſwer till the following day; which threw the biſhop into great perplexity, as it left him ſtill uncertain, whether the duke was ſincere, or only intended to enſnare him. By the way, the biſhop does not ſeem to have been very ſcrupulous, ſince, tho' he could not be a ſtranger to the duke's character, he readily offered his ſervice to place him on the throne; which ſhews, that he acted more, from a motive of revenge againſt Richard, than with a view to the good of the publick; for the king and the duke too much reſembled each other, to expect a great advantage by ſuch a change.

The duke rejects the propoſal, and names the earl of Richmond.

The next day, the duke, after a long apology, for all his former actions, ingenuouſly confeſſed to the prelate, "He once intended to aſpire to the crown; but, upon mature deliberation, he had entirely dropped that deſign. He conſidered, that, in acting for himſelf, he ſhould excite againſt him all the friends of the two houſes of York and Lancaſter; and that there was a prince, nearer than he, whom the houſe of Lancaſter regarded, as their head, on whom he had fixed his eyes, to raiſe to the throne; namely, Henry, earl of Richmond, then in Bretagne: That the project, to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne, would draw one half of the nation to that prince's intereſt; and he had contrived a happy expedient, to gain him the other, viz. his marriage with Eliſabeth, eldeſt daughter to Edward IV. which would procure him the friendſhip of all the Yorkiſts; and that the nation would receive great advantage from thence, as it would deſtroy all the ſeeds of the civil wars, by the union of the two contending houſes: That, even thoſe, who were indifferent for either party, would by this means, be conſtrained to promote the common good of their country; and Richard's few adherents would be unable to balance ſo great a power; whereas, if he pretended to place himſelf on the throne, the whole nation would be united againſt him, ſince there was not the leaſt colour to exclude from the crown two houſes, that had been poſſeſſed of it, for above 80 years. In fine, he added, that, in his way to Brecknock, meeting the counteſs of Richmond, he ſounded her, upon this topick; and he was ſatisfied, that ſhe would be eaſily perſuaded to promote the advancement of her ſon."

The biſhop likes the propoſal. Hall.

The biſhop approved of this expedient, as more conformable to juſtice and equity, as well as more adapted to the good of the kingdom; eſpecially as the author of it was the only perſon, who would have had reaſon to oppoſe it, had it been propoſed by another.

The rights of the earl of Richmond.

Henry, earl of Richmond, as I already obſerved, was of Welch extraction; but his mother, Margaret, was daughter to John de Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, grandſon of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter. Margaret's 1483. tet's father dying, without iſſue male, Edmund, his younger brother, inherited his title; but, he and all his poſterity being deſtroyed, in the civil wars, Margaret and her ſon were the only remains of that houſe, who, in appearance, had an inconteſtable claim to all the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter; yet their title was liable to great objections.

Whilſt John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, lived with Conſtantia of Caſtile, his ſecond wife, he kept, as his miſtreſs, Catharine Roet, widow to Sir Otho de Swinford, by whom he had ſeveral children; and, upon Conſtantia's death, marrying his concubine, he had ſufficient intereſt, to cauſe her children, born before marriage, to be legitimated by an act of parliament, and by Richard II's ſubſequent letters patent. However, the king and parliament, to make a diſtinction, between theſe natural children and the others born in wedlock, did not give them the name of Lancaſter or Plantagenet, but that of Beaufort; and tho', in the act of parliament, and in the king's letters patent, they were allowed to hold principalities, dukedoms, earldoms, &c. and to tranſmit them to their heirs, there was not the leaſt mention of the crown. During the lives of Henry IV. and Henry V, the princes of this branch did not dare to aſſume the name of Lancaſter; and it was not, till about Henry VI's reign, that Edmund, duke of Somerſet, being prime miniſter, and extremely zealous for the king, againſt the attempts of the duke of York, began, by degrees, to aſſert his deſcent from John of Gaunt, and his affinity to the king, as being of the houſe of Lancaſter. It was diſputable, therefore, whether the princes of this branch could ſucceed to the crown, in their turn; and, ſuppoſing they could, when their turn was to be, and whether the heirs of John of Gaunt's daughters, born in wedlock, were not to have the preference to the poſterity of a ſon only legitimated, and born before marriage; and, if ſo, there were no leſs than 10 or 12 princes and princeſſes, in Portugal, Caſtile, and Germany, who would have excluded the earl of Richmond: But, on the contrary, Edward IV, by his endeavours to have the earl of Richmond in his power, had, in effect, owned him capable of inheriting all the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter. This was a queſtion, that might have been debated, in thoſe days; but, having been decided, above 200 years ſince, it requires no farther examination, unleſs thoſe, that are verſed in theſe matters, are willing to exerciſe their wits, out of mere curioſity.

In all probability, if the duke of Buckingham had thought it practicable to place himſelf on the throne, he would not have failed to alledge, againſt the earl of Richmond's title, the foreſaid objections; but, as he had himſelf obſerved, in his diſcourſe with the biſhop of Ely, he could not aſpire to the crown, without oppoſing the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, that is, the whole kingdom, which was divided between both theſe factions. The pretence, therefore, to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter, and put an end to the civil wars, by the union of the two contending houſes, was by far the more natural way, to be revenged on Richard; I ſay to be revenged, for it is ſcarce credible, that a man of his character ſhould act, on this occaſion, from a nobler motive. 1483.

However this be, the duke and the biſhop, having conſulted, how to bring about their deſigns, came to this concluſion: That all hopes of ſucceſs were founded on the marriage of the earl of Richmond with the princeſs Eliſabeth; that, therefore, before all things, this point was to be ſecured; and, accordingly, they agreed, that they ſhould, without loſs of time, communicate their project to the counteſs of Richmond, that ſhe might acquaint her ſon with it, and perſuade the queen dowager, mother of the princeſs, to conſent to the marriage.

But, as conferring with Margaret would have been very dangerous for the duke of Buckingham, by reaſon of the king's extreme jealouſy of the houſe of Somerſet, the biſhop informed him, that he had an old friend, in the counteſs's ſervice, named Reginald Bray, who might ſafely be truſted with the ſecret; upon which, Bray was privately ſent for to Brecknock, and, the project being imparted to him, the propoſing of it to his miſtreſs was committed to his care; and he was particularly charged to tell her, that the marriage of the earl, her ſon, was the very foundation on which the whole project reſted.

The biſhop of Ely flies into Flanders.

Bray no ſooner departed, to execute his commiſſion, than the biſhop of Ely deſired the duke's leave, to retire to his ſee; for he was juſtly afraid of his life, if the plot ſhould be diſcovered; and, perhaps, he did not entirely depend upon the duke's ſincerity; but the duke gave him two invincible reaſons, why he could not comply with his requeſt. The firſt was, that he ſhould be guilty of letting his priſoner eſcape, which alone would inſpire the king with ſuſpicions; and the ſecond, that, in an enterprize of this nature, he could not proceed, without his advice. The biſhop ſeemed to yield to theſe reaſons; but he had ſtill ſtronger, to free himſelf from the impending danger, if the affair was diſcovered; and, therefore, not being ſo narrowly watched by his keepers, ſince his frequent converſations with the duke, he made his eſcape, and retired to Ely; from whence he fled into Flanders. Upon his arrival, he wrote to the duke, to excuſe his eſcape, and alſo endeavoured to convince him, that he could, now, much more promote the execution of their deſign, than whilſt he was priſoner; and, having likewiſe conjured him to perſiſt in his reſolution, he ſhewed him, how he might carry on a private correſpondence with him.

The counteſs of Richmond enters into the plot.

In the interim, the counteſs of Richmond, being informed of what was projected, in favour of the earl, her ſon, ſent back her ſervant to the duke of Buckingham, to return him her thanks; and, at the ſame time, ſhe gave him to underſtand, that ſhe was endeavouring to procure the queen dowager's

She acquaints the queen dowager with it. Hall.

Eliſabeth Woodville, widow to Edward IV, ſtill continued, in her ſanctuary, at Weſtminſter, with her five daughters; where ſhe lamented the fate of her two ſons, and reproached herſelf, for being ſo eaſily perſuaded to deliver the duke of York to his uncle. There never had been any intimate friendſhip, between that queen and the counteſs of Richmond; for the one had been wife to a king of the houſe of York, and the other was of the family of Somerſet, avowed enemies of the Yorkiſts; wherefore, the counteſs could not viſit the queen, in her ſanctuary, without creating great ſuſpicion. To avoid this inconvenience, ſhe employed one Lewis, her phyſician; and, having informed him of the whole, ſhe ordered him to go to London, and ſo to manage, as to have acceſs to the queen, and communicate to her what was projecting; above all, ſhe charged him to tell her, that all hopes of ſucceſs depended upon the union of the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, by the marriage of the princeſs Eliſabeth with the earl of Richmond.

Lewis, arriving at London, without much difficulty, as a phyſician, got admittance to the queen; to whom he imparted what he had in commiſſion, intimating that it would be in her own power to be revenged on her mortal enemy, the murderer of her children, and dethrone the uſurper, if ſhe would only conſent to the marriage propoſed. The queen gladly liſtened to the overture; and ſhe charged the doctor to tell his miſtreſs, that ſhe approved of the project, and would ſo order it, that all the king her husband's adherents ſhould join with the earl of Richmond; but ſhe added, that ſhe could wiſh the earl would ſwear to marry Eliſabeth, or, in caſe of her death, Cecily, her younger ſiſter.

Upon this agreement, between the queen dowager, the counteſs of Richmond, and the duke of Buckingham, they laboured to engage in the plot their moſt truſty friends, who drew in others; and the Engliſh were as favourably diſpoſed, as could be deſired, from three principal motives. Firſt, becauſe of the people's univerſal averſion to the king, who had rendered himſelf extremely odious, as well by his proceedings, during his protectorſhip, as by his late crime, in murdering his nephews, after robbing them of the crown; by which he loſt moſt of the friends of the houſe of York, who only wanted an opportunity, to revenge the family of Edward IV. Secondly, all the Lancaſtrians ſaw, with pleaſure, a project tending to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne. Laſtly, thoſe that, regardleſs of the intereſts of the two factions, conſulted only the good of their country, could not but conſider, as a great happineſs, the ſucceſs of an undertaking, that, by uniting the two contending houſes, would put an end to the civil war, with which the kingdom had been afflicted, 30 years; ſo that the Lancaſtrians, Yorkiſts, and even thoſe that ſtood neuter, were equally diſpoſed to concur, to dethrone the uſurper.

The duke of Buckingham engages ſeveral of his friends in the plot.

The duke of Buckingham being the author and head of the enterprize, it was his buſineſs to conduct it to a happy iſſue; and, with this view, he, firſt of all, ſecured ſome friends, in Wales, where his credit was great, who ſecretly undertook to liſt ſoldiers, to enable him to bring, ſuddenly and ſeaſonably, an army into the field; after which, he ſettled a correſpondence with ſome gentlemen of Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, and Cornwall, who engaged to raiſe forces, and receive the earl of Richmond, at his arrival. He deſigned to join them himſelf, with his Welchmen, that Richard might be leſs able to oppoſe the earl's landing; and ſeveral lords and gentlemen were to riſe, at the ſame time, in other counties, that the king might be at a loſs, where to march firſt; and the marqueſs of Dorſet, who had lately quitted his ſanctuary, Sir Richard Woodville, his brother, the biſhop of Exeter, Sir Edward Courtney, his brother, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction engaged in the plot.

The counteſs of Richmond ſends two expreſſes to the earl, her ſon.

Theſe meaſures being concerted, the counteſs of Richmond ſent two expreſſes to the earl, her ſon, by different ways, to inform him of the project, in his favour, and how far it was advanced; which expreſſes, arriving almoſt together, gave him a particular account of the plot, and intreated him to repair into England, with all expedition, aſſuring him, that all things were prepared for his reception; and they alſo told him, that Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, or Cornwall were the moſt convenient places to land in, on account of the ſteps taken with the people of thoſe counties.

He reſolves to impart the matter to the duke of Bretagne. Hall. Stow.

The earl of Richmond was then, at Vannes, in Bretagne, where he had been, ſeveral years, really a priſoner, by reaſon of the duke of Bretagne's engagements with Edward IV; but, the duke contenting himſelf with narrowly watching him, to prevent his eſcape, if he ſhould attempt it, in other reſpects, he enjoyed an honourable freedom. He heard with extreme joy, that he was not forgotten, in England; but, when he conſidered his preſent condition, and how little it was in his power to return into his own country, ſo as to procure a welcome reception, he found it would be next to impoſſible, to ſucceed in his enterprize, without the aſſiſtance of the duke of Bretagne; for, unleſs that prince ſupplied him with money, troops, and ſhips, it was impracticable to take proper meaſures, to accompliſh his deſigns; moreover, the duke might cloſely confine him, and ſo entirely defeat all attempts, in his favour. Finding, therefore, that he could not proceed, without him, he reſolved to tell him the ſecret, and engage him, if poſſible, to aſſiſt him; and he found him more ready, than he could have expected. The duke was not under any engagements to Richard, as he had been to Edward, his brother; and, beſides, his unjuſt and violent proceedings had rendered him odious to all the princes of Europe, and eſpecially to the duke of Bretagne. He 1483. had alſo pretenſions to the earldom of Richmond, in England, formerly poſſeſſed by his anceſtors, and imagined, that the earl would readily promiſe to reſtore it, if, by his means, he arrived to the crown; and it is pretended, that this was the chief article of their agreement, for which the duke very freely engaged to ſupply him with men and ſhips. The earl, being aſſured of the duke of Bretagne's aid, ſent expreſſes to the counteſs, his mother, and the duke of Buckingham, to acquaint them, that he hoped to be in readineſs, by the beginning of October, deſiring them to prepare all things againſt that time; and, this agreeable news ſoon putting all the conſpirators in motion, every one repaired to the poſt aſſigned him, as well to raiſe forces, as excite inſurrections; for, a conſiderable part of September being already paſt, there was occaſion for all poſſible expedition.

How careful ſoever the conſpirators had been to conceal themſelves, all theſe ſteps could not be taken, and Richard have no intelligence, that ſome plot was forming againſt him; but none could inform him, what it was, or who were the authors. He was then at York, thinking of very different matters, ſo ſecure was he, in his own opinion; but theſe advices obliged him to approach the center of the kingdom; and, at the ſame time, he ordered his troops, which were diſperſed, in ſeveral parts, to be ready to march, at a moment's warning. However, he was very ſlow, in his preparations, not ſuſpecting the danger to be ſo near; but, the intelligence, he had received, making him uneaſy, he ran over in his mind all the lords of the kingdom, who could be diſſatisfied, or had ſufficient credit, to excite inſurrections againſt him; and he found none, except the duke of Buckingham. He had diſguſted him by diſappointing him, with reſpect to the lands of Hereford; and, knowing him thoroughly, he could not doubt, that he was capable of any undertaking, to gratify his revenge. Moreover, he was ſenſible, that he alone was in a condition, by his parts, wealth, and intereſt, to form and execute great projects; and his own experience would not ſuffer him to queſtion it. The biſhop of Ely's eſcape ſtrengthened this ſuſpicion; for, as the duke could not be ignorant, how much he deteſted that prelate, his careleſneſs, in guarding ſuch a priſoner, could not but be conſidered, as a colluſion and conſequence of ſome evil deſign. On theſe accounts, Richard reſolved to ſend for him to court; but the duke deſired to be excuſed, under the pretence of ſome indiſpoſition. This refuſal confirmed the king, in his belief of what he had ſuſpected; yet, for his farther ſatisfaction, he ſent him poſitive orders to come to him, without alledging any excuſe; but the duke, perceiving that diſſimulation would be to no purpoſe, ſent him word, that he would not expoſe his perſon to his avowed enemy, whom he neither loved, nor would ſerve.

Richard ſuſpects the duke of Buckingham.

The duke takes up arms.

This was ſufficient to convince the king, that the duke of Buckingham was the prime mover of the plot, which, for ſome time, gave him uneaſineſs; and, on the other hand, the duke, having made ſuch a declaration, without any farther ceremony, drew together the troops he and his friends had raiſed, in Wales, and marched towards the weſtern counties, where the earl of Richmond deſigned to land; and there he was to be joined by thoſe that went before, to prepare all things againſt the earl's arrival. 1483.

Richard was extremely ſurpriſed to hear, that the duke was ſo ready; yet, having taken ſome precautions to aſſemble his forces, in caſe of neceſſity, he appointed the rendezvous, at Leiceſter; whither he repaired himſelf, in order to give his enemies battle, before their number was augmented; but he would have found it almoſt impoſſible to prevent them, if an extraordinary and very ſudden accident had not hindered the duke from joining his friends, who were all in readineſs to riſe in arms, in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The duke, advancing by long marches to Glouceſter, intended to paſs the Severn; but the river was ſo ſwoln, as, on both ſides, to overflow the country; and great damage was done by the waters. This was the moſt dreadful inundation that ever was heard of, in thoſe parts; for it laſted, ſix whole days, during which, the duke's army could neither paſs the river, nor ſubſiſt, on the other ſide, where was nothing but deſolation; and, in fine, the Welch ſoldiers, tired with being expoſed to hunger, rains, and innumerable hardſhips, returned to their habitations, in ſpite of all the duke's intreaties to the contrary. The deſertion was ſo univerſal, that there remained with the duke only a ſingle ſervant; and, in this extremity, he perceived no other remedy than to conceal himſelf, till he ſhould take new meaſures; but, unfortunately for him, he choſe, for his retreat, the houſe of one Baniſter, who had been his ſervant, and whom his father and himſelf had extremely obliged.

The king, upon the news of the diſperſion of the duke of Buckingham's troops, publiſhed a proclamation againſt him and the marqueſs of Dorſet, with ſome other of his adherents, or whom he ſuppoſed to be in confederacy with him; but, as the marqueſs had not yet appeared in arms, and, therefore, could not be ſtiled a rebel, he made uſe of another pretence, to involve him in the ſentence. He pretended, that, having ſwore, at his coronation, to puniſh vice and immorality, he was obliged to puniſh the marqueſs of Dorſet, notorious for his debaucheries, who had ſeduced and raviſhed ſeveral virgins, committed adulteries, and publickly kept Shore's wife, as his miſtreſs. Then he promiſed a reward of 1000 l. ſterling, or 100 l. per annum to any perſon, that ſhould bring the duke to juſtice; a 1000 marks, or 100 marks a year, for the marqueſs, and ſo in proportion, for the reſt named in the proclamation; and the villain Baniſter, unable to reſiſt ſo ſtrong a temptation, betrayed his maſter to the ſheriff of Shropſhire, who, ſurrounding the houſe, with a company of armed

Some affirm, that he deſigned to kill him, with a dagger that was found upon him, after his death; but this is no more than a conjecture. However it be, he was beheaded, at Shrewsbury, without a legal proceſs, by the king's bare order; and, thus, this lord, who had contributed to take away the lord Haſtings, the earl of Rivers, and the other priſoners at Pontefract, by an arbitrary ſentence, loſt his life in the ſame manner, by the abſolute command of him whom he had placed on the throne; but, on the other hand, it will appear, preſently, that this very conſpiracy, projected by the duke of Buckingham, the accomplice of all the king's crimes, whilſt he was only protector, occaſioned that monarch's ruin. Is it poſſible not to diſcern the direction of Providence, in ſuch amazing events!

The conſpirators diſperſe.

Upon the firſt news of the diſperſion of the Welch army, the duke's adherents, who expected him, in the weſt, ready to take up arms, the moment they ſhould hear of his paſſing the Severn, alſo diſperſed themſelves; ſome retired among their friends, whilſt others fled to ſanctuaries; but the greateſt part, among whom was the marqueſs of Dorſet, fled to Bretagne to the earl of Richmond, finding that they could not be ſafe in the kingdom.

The earl of Richmond comes upon the coaſt of Cornwall. Hall.

During theſe tranſactions, in England, the earl of Richmond, fancying that all things there ſucceeded to his wiſh, ſailed from St. Malo's, the 12th of October, with 5000 men and 40 ſhips, ſupplied by the duke of Bretagne; but, the fleet being ſcattered by a ſtorm, ſome of the ſhips were driven on the coaſt of France, and others returned into Bretagne. The ſhip, in which was the earl of Richmond, reſiſting the ſeas better than the reſt, arrived, after the tempeſt, upon the coaſt of Cornwall, where he ſaw the ſhore crowded with troops, who made him a ſignal to approach; but he had the good fortune, to reſolve not to land, till his fleet had rejoined him, expecting that they would ſoon be at the rendezvous; and, in the interim, he diſpatched one to inquire, whether the troops he ſaw were friends, or enemies. The commander replied, that he was poſted there by the duke of Buckingham, to wait for the earl of Richmond, and favour his landing; but the perſon, whom the earl ſent, evidently perceiving the contrary, informed his maſter of it; who, finding that his deſign was diſcovered, put to ſea, and arrived at a port, in Normandy. The truth is, the troops he ſaw, on the coaſt of Cornwall, were the militia of the county, poſted there by Richard; by which artifice, he intended to ſurpriſe his enemy.

He returns to Bretagne.

In Normandy, the earl of Richmond heard of the duke of Buckingham's misfortune; and, having, after this, no proſpect of purſuing his enterprize, without taking new meaſures, he returned to Bretagne; where he found the marqueſs of Dorſet, with the reſt that had made their eſcapes out of England. Tho' his deſign appeared to be entirely blaſted; yet he did not deſpair of better ſucceſs, hereafter. The fugitives told him, that Richard was extremely deteſted, in England, which he took for an auſpicious omen; and the duke of Bretagne promiſed him to continue his aſſiſtance; wherefore, reſolving to make a freſh attempt, he ſolemnly ſwore, on Chriſtmas-day, in the cathedral of Rennes, that he would marry the princeſs Eliſabeth, daughter to Edward IV, or, in caſe of her death, Cecily, her younger ſiſter. Upon this, all the Engliſh, there preſent, ſwore allegiance to him, conſidering him, as king of England, by right, tho' he was not ſo, in fact; and, thenceforward, the ſtrict inquiry made, in England, after thoſe that were concerned in the plot, obliging great numbers to retire into Bretagne, the reſort of the Engliſh was very great, for ſome time. 1483.

Richard puts ſeveral of the conſpirators to death. Hall.

In the mean while, Richard, having freed himſelf from this danger, more fortunately than he had reaſon to expect, ordered ſeveral perſons to be ſeized, ſome of whom were, immediately, ſacrificed to his vengeance; and of this number was Sir Thomas St. Leger, who eſpouſed his ſiſter, Ann, widow to the duke of Exeter. For the greater diſpatch, and to avoid the uſual formalities of the courts of juſtice, he commiſſioned Sir Ralph Aſhton to exerciſe the office of vice-conſtable; and with ſuch an extenſive power, that he could condemn and execute, upon the ſpot, all perſons whatſoever, guilty, or only ſuſpected of the the crime of high-treaſon, without regarding any appeal.

By vertue of this commiſſion, Aſhton, who was, in all probability, a man after the king's own heart, came into the weſtern counties; where he ſignalized his zeal, by the bloody executions of ſuch as were found guilty, or only ſuſpected of being concerned in the conſpiracy. Thus, were ſpent the firſt ſix months of the reign of Richard III; for this ambitious prince no ſooner aſcended the throne, than he had occaſion to perceive, that it would be extremely difficult for him to preſerve a crown ſo paſſionately deſired, and procured by ſo many unlawful proceedings.

1484. The parliament meets.

In January, 1484, the king ſummoned his firſt parliament, at a very ſeaſonable juncture; for, upon the duke of Buckingham's death, and the flight of the earl of Richmond, there was not any perſon, in the kingdom, in a condition to lift up his head; ſo that the parliament, compoſed, doubtleſs, of repreſentatives attached to the king, declared Edward IV's iſſue illegitimate, and confirmed Richard's irregular election, with his pretended right to the crown. This act was abſolutely neceſſary, for the king's ſecurity; moreover, the parliament, by this proceeding, avoided the trouble of inquiring after the fate of Edward V, whom all England, for ſome months, had owned, for king.

Then an act of attainder was paſſed againſt Henry, earl of Richmond, and all his adherents, by vertue of which, all their eſtates were forfeited to the king; and, as it declared all thoſe rebels and traytors, that engaged in 1484. in the duke of Buckingham's and the earl of Richmond's conſpiracy, it, in ſome meaſure, juſtified all the late executions, becauſe ſuch, as had ſuffered, were conſidered, as guilty of the crime condemned by this act; but, by good fortune, none of them diſcovered, that the counteſs of Richmond was concerned in the plot, whether ſhe had truſted only few perſons, or her confidents had eſcaped into Bretagne. However, Richard, believing it ſcarce poſſible for the earl of Richmond to form an enterprize, without his mother's privity, ordered the lord Stanley, her husband, to keep her confined, to prevent her from any future attempts. He had, now, an entire confidence in the lord Stanley, whom he had made high-conſtable, after Aſhton, as vice-conſtable, had ſerved his turn; and, probably, he did not think the lord Stanley a fit perſon to exerciſe the ſeverities, for which he had commiſſioned Aſhton; which, doubtleſs, was the reaſon why he did not make him high-conſtable, till every thing, relating to that commiſſion, was compleated.

The king receives freſh advices of the conſpiracy.

Richard had grounds to conclude, that, after his rigorous treatment of the parties concerned, the conſpiracy was entirely ſtifled *; but Thomas Hutton, upon his return from his ambaſſy to Bretagne, told him, that the ſame plot ſtill ſubſiſted; and that the duke of Bretagne had promiſed the earl of Richmond to continue his aſſiſtance. He gave him the names of the conſpirators, who were with the earl; and informed him, that they had frequent conferences together, and were very buſy; from whence it was natural to infer, that the earl of Richmond had not loſt all hopes, and had ſtill, in England, correſpondences, on which he founded the execution of his deſigns: And yet, ſince the death of the duke of Buckingham, the retreat of the marqueſs of Dorſet, and the execution of ſeveral of that party, Richard ſaw no one, in the kingdom, that appeared to be able to withſtand him; wherefore, apprehending that the danger muſt come from abroad, he reſolved to take all poſſible precautions, to hinder his enemies from being aſſiſted by foreign princes.

He ſecures Caſtile and Portugal; Act. Pub.

The preceding year, he ratified the alliance of England with Caſtile; and, in June, this year, he did the ſame, with reſpect to Portugal; for, in all appearance, the whole ſtorm was to come from thoſe two quarters, ſince the king of Portugal and the queen of Caſtile were both deſcended from Philippa and Catharine, daughters to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, and conſequently might have claimed the crown of England; but the readineſs, with which they had renewed their alliance with England, did not ſuffer Richard to ſuſpect them of having any ſuch deſign.

Maximilian, archduke of Auſtria, who governed the Low-Countries, in the name of his ſon, Philip, being ſon to Leonora of Portugal, grand-daughter to Philippa of Lancaſter, might have alſo pretended to the crown of England, or aſſiſted the earl of Richmond; wherefore, the king reſolved to ſend him ambaſſadors, under the pretence of renewing the truce of commerce between England and the Low-Countries; but it is probable, that the ambaſſadors had inſtructions to ſound, whether there was any project, at that court, with reſpect to England. 1484.

and tries to gain the duke of Bretagne.

There remained only Bretagne and Scotland, that could give him the leaſt uneaſineſs; for, as for the duke of Bretagne, he did not doubt, that he had aſſiſted, and was ſtill inclined to aſſiſt, the earl of Richmond; wherefore, he reſolved to do all that was poſſible, to gain that prince to his intereſt.

The affairs of Bretagne.

Francis II, duke of Bretagne, being old and infirm, was entirely ſwayed by Peter Landais, his treaſurer, to whom he committed the ſole management of his affairs; but this inſolent favourite, who was the ſon of a taylor, ſo abuſed his power, that he drew upon himſelf the hatred of all the Bretons. This very year, 1484, the great men, combining together againſt him, would have ſeized him, in the duke's palace; but, being diſappointed, they found themſelves expoſed to his vengeance, who cauſed them to be declared guilty of high-treaſon. In the interim, the whole country being his enemies, he judged it proper to ſupport himſelf by ſome foreign aid; and, with this view, he ſent, in his maſter's name, ambaſſadors to Richard, under colour of making a truce with him; which was, accordingly, concluded, in June, at Pontefract, where the king then was, and which was to continue, till the 24th of April following.

Secret negotiations between Richard and the duke, or Landais his favourite. Act. Pub.

However, this was not the ſole intent of that ambaſſy; for it appears from two records, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Richard had promiſed to ſend the duke of Bretagne an aid of 1000 archers; which could only be for the foreſaid occaſion, ſince the duke of Bretagne had then no war upon his hands; and, as that prince did nothing, of himſelf, very probably, to procure this aid, Landais engaged to deliver up the earl of Richmond. Indeed, the ſequel evidently ſhewed, that he had entered into ſome ſuch engagement; for Richard thought himſelf ſo ſecure from Bretagne, that, inſtead of fearing that the duke would aſſiſt the earl of Richmond, he flattered himſelf, that he ſhould, very ſoon, have his enemy in his power.

The death of the prince of Wales. Hiſt. Croyl.

Having taken theſe precautions, he ſeemed to be ſcreened from all danger; yet, to deprive the earl of Richmond of all hopes of ſucceeding in his deſigns, the prince of Wales, his ſon, dying, in April, this year, he declared his nephew, the earl of Lincoln, his preſumptive heir, deſigning to have this declaration ratified by the parliament; which earl was ſon to Eliſabeth, his ſiſter, and brother to Ann, who was to be married to the prince of Scotland.

Moreover, unwilling to neglect any meaſures, that might give his enemies an advantage, he ſent an ambaſſador of obedience to pope Innocent VIII, lately elected to the papal throne; tho' he had omitted this compliment to Sixtus IV, Innocents's predeceſſor, as is evident from the Collection of the Publick Acts; but, leſt he ſhould incenſe his holineſs, and furniſh ſome pretence to the male-contents in the kingdom, and eſpecially the clergy, he diſpatched his ambaſſadors to Rome.

An ambaſſy from France. Act. Pub.

Soon after, he had the pleaſure to find, that Charles VIII, king of France, deſired a ſafe-conduct for ambaſſadors to be ſent to his court; ſo that every thing ſeemed to be happily diſpoſed, in his favour; yet, as the earl of Richmond was ſtill full of life, and out of his power, he could not think himſelf thoroughly fixed on the throne; and this was the principal, or rather the ſole cauſe of all his perplexity.

Richard treats with Landais, about delivering up the earl of Richmond.

As the truce with Bretagne was to expire, the 24th of April, 1485, Richard ſent ambaſſadors to the duke, under the pretence of prolonging the truce; but they had alſo inſtructions, to negotiate another and more important matter, with Landais, now abſolute maſter of the duke, who, by a ſort of lethargy, was rendered incapable of managing publick affairs; namely, to perſuade this miniſter to deliver up the earl of Richmond.

Landais had no occaſion for the foreſaid 1000 archers; wherefore, it was neceſſary, to obtain what the king deſired, to make a new treaty ſo beneficial to the duke and the favourite, as to remove all their ſcruples, upon that ſubject; and, as to the former, Argentre affirms, that he ſaw, among the records of Bretagne, Richard III's letters patent, by which he gave to duke Francis the earldom of Richmond, with all its dependences, as enjoyed by his anceſtors, with the ſole reſervation of its return to the crown, provided the duke died, without iſſue. As for Landais, as the negotiation was more ſecret, it is not certainly known what reward he expected, for his intended ſervice; yet it is evident, that Richard made him very advantageous offers; but, his avarice not permitting him to be ſatisfied with bare promiſes, there was often occaſion to ſend expreſſes to the king. Theſe delays, which, as Argentre expreſly ſays, were, upon the miniſter's account, proved the earl of Richmond's ſecurity; who, tho' he was then in Bretagne, was entirely ignorant of what paſſed, at that court; but the biſhop of Ely, notwithſtanding his abſence, having vigilant ſpies about Richard, had advice, that the biſhop of Leon, ambaſſador of Bretagne, was treating very ſecretly with the king; and he warned the earl of Richmond, that he was not ſafe in the dominions of the duke of Bretagne. This warning, coming from ſo good a hand, put the earl upon ſeriouſly thinking, to free himſelf from the impending danger; and, knowing that Landais was capable of committing the vileſt actions, he reſolved to retire into France; wherefore, he ſent privately to king Charles, for a paſſport, which was readily granted. However, as he did not doubt, that Landais had ordered him to be narrowly watched; ſo it was extremely difficult to make his eſcape; eſpecially, as he was ſurrounded with a great number of Engliſh, in reſpect of whom it was very hard to conceal the ſecret, and very dangerous to diſcover it. To remedy this inconvenience, the duke of Bretagne being juſt recovered of his indiſpoſition, the earl ſent the principal lords of his retinue, to congratulate him, on that occaſion, ordering them to take with them all their ſervants, under colour of doing him the more honour; for his view was not only to be more alone, at Vannes, but chiefly to remove from his keepers all ſuſpicion of his deſigning to eſcape, whilſt he had ſo many hoſtages, at the court of Bretagne. This artifice fully anſwering his expectation, two days after, he departed from Vannes, in diſguiſe, attended only by five perſons; and, as ſoon as he was out of the town, leaving the high road, and riding croſs the fields and through by-ways, without ſtopping any where, he ſafely arrived, at Angers, the capital of Anjou. This expedition was abſolutely neceſſary; for his keepers, hearing of his eſcape, purſued him ſo cloſely, that they came upon the borders of Bretagne, but one hour after him. In a few days, the duke, being told that the earl was retired, under an apprehenſion of ill treatment, ſeemed highly diſpleaſed with Landais, for giving him cauſe to fear, ignorant, doubtleſs, of what his favourite was negotiating with the king of England; and then he granted all the Engliſh in his dominions leave to repair to the earl, with his compliments and offers of ſervice. The earl of Richmond received theſe civilities, with ſigns of the utmoſt gratitude; and he deſired the duke's meſſenger to aſſure him, that he would have all his favours in everlaſting remembrance. Thus, the earl of Richmond eſcaped, almoſt miraculouſly, out of Richard's ſnares; and this was the ſecond time, he had been ſo fortunately delivered. The Engliſh, belonging to his retinue, thought themſelves no leſs happy than he, to be freed, by the duke's generoſity,

Charles VIII. receives the earl of Richmond honourably. Hall.

The earl of Richmond, not continuing long, at Angers, went to Charles VIII, then at Langeais, and met with a very civil reception; but, as the court of France was not yet free from troubles, it was an improper juncture for the earl to procure the aſſiſtance he could no longer expect from the duke of Bretagne; however, as the young king ſeemed well inclined to him, he did not deſpair to obtain ſome aid of that prince, when the commotions, at his court, were appeaſed.

The earl of Oxford eſcapes out of Hammes, and goes to the earl of Richmond.

Whilſt his affairs were in this ſtate of uncertainty, the earl of Oxford arrived, whom Edward IV. had impriſoned, in the caſtle of Hammes, in Picardy; which lord, who had been one of the chief friends of the houſe of Lancaſter, hearing that the earl of Richmond pretended to the crown, had ſo much influence over the governor of Hammes, that he perſuaded him to releaſe him, and declare for the earl; and he even brought him along with him, to ſalute that prince, and offer him his ſervice. It was no ſmall advantage to the earl of Richmond, to have the earl of Oxford in his party, who had great intereſt, in England; and ſeveral other lords privately ſent him word, that he might depend upon their aſſiſtance, as ſoon as they ſhould ſee a proper opportunity to declare againſt Richard.

Richard obliges the lord Stanley to leave his ſon in hoſtage. Hall. Stow.

In the interim, the king had daily intelligence, that ſomething was plotting againſt him, in favour of the earl of Richmond; but he could not diſcover the authors of the plot, notwithſtanding the ſtricteſt inquiries. Beſides, he knew no Engliſh lord that, in his opinion, was in a condition to contrive, or execute ſuch an enterprize; and the lord Stanley was the only one that he could ſuſpect, becauſe he was husband to the counteſs of Richmond; but he had not any proof againſt him. However, to ſecure himſelf from that quarter, Stanley deſiring leave to retire upon his own eſtate, he required him to leave his ſon, at court, as a ſort of hoſtage; and, indeed, his ſuſpicions were but too well grounded, ſince that very lord proved, afterwards, the principal inſtrument of his ruin.

He diſcovers the project of the marriage of the earl of Richmond with Eliſabeth. Hall. Stow.

Richard knew, that he was deteſted, in England; and, on the other hand, he heard, that there were certain motions among the people, which, tho' ſecret, were of dangerous conſequence; yet he could not prevent the miſchief he dreaded, without knowing the nature of the plot, and the principal authors. Upon this, therefore, he took all poſſible pains; and, at length, by planting ſpies in the country, he diſcovered, that the projects, in behalf of the earl of Richmond, were founded upon his promiſe to marry the princeſs Eliſabeth, eldeſt daughter to Edward IV. This diſcovery convinced him, that the Yorkiſts were not far from an union with the Lancaſtrians, ſince they conſented to this marriage; and he manifeſtly perceived, that ſuch an agreement would neceſſarily occaſion his ruin, ſince, in that caſe, he would have only a few friends of his houſe to rely on, all the reſt declaring for his brother's family. Finding, therefore, that the plot reſted upon a more ſolid foundation, than he had imagined, he made it his whole ſtudy, to diſconcert the earl of Richmond's meaſures, by preventing this fatal marriage; and he could apprehend no better way, to accompliſh his ends, than to marry himſelf the princeſs intended for his enemy; but this was clogged with ſeveral difficulties, which to a prince leſs ſcrupulous, than himſelf, would have appeared inſuperable. In the firſt place, he had a wife already, whoſe conſtitution afforded no ſymptoms of her leaving this world; but he did not deſpair to ſurmount that obſtacle, either by a divorce, or ſome other more unlawful means. The ſecond difficulty was, to draw Eliſabeth out of the ſanctuary, at Weſtminſter, where ſhe was with the queen, her mother; for it ſeemed to be next to impoſſible to perſuade the queen dowager, to deliver up her daughter to the murderer of her ſons. Laſtly, the pope's diſpenſation, to marry his niece, muſt be procured; but this obſtacle appeared inconſiderable, in compariſon of the others, being very ſenſible that it was not impracticable to adjuſt that affair with the court of Rome. 1484.

The queen dowager gives up her daughters.

To begin the execution of this ſurpriſing project, he ſent ſeveral perſons to the queen dowager to inſinuate to her, that he deſired to live in amity with her, and to ſhew her proofs of his friendſhip: That he acknowledged, he had treated her with exceſſive rigour; but to repair, in ſome meaſure, the injury he had done her, he deſigned to allow her an honourable penſion, and give her two brothers ſuch poſts, as they ſhould have reaſon to be contented; moreover, he would take care of her daughters, and help them to marriages ſuitable to their quality. But, as it would be extremely difficult to perſuade the queen to credit his promiſes, whom he had ſo cruelly deceived, the perſons he employed intimated to her, that this alteration proceeded from the death of the prince of Wales; that, as the king was now childleſs, and had no proſpect of having any iſſue, his intereſts were no longer diſtinct from thoſe of his brother's family; and, therefore, he could do nothing more beneficial to himſelf and his houſe, than to marry his nieces into the principal families, in England. In fine, it was repreſented to her, that the king's intent was, that, after his deceaſe, the princeſs Eliſabeth ſhould ſucceed to the crown; what he had done, in behalf of the earl of Lincoln, his nephew, being eaſily revocable, ſince it had not, as yet, paſſed into an act of parliament.

These laſt inſinuations made deep impreſſions on the queen's mind; for her intereſt led her to imagine, that they were highly probable; and, on the other hand, ſhe was heartily tired of her ſanctuary, which was, in reality, a priſon, ſince ſhe could not ſtir, without expoſing herſelf to greater miſchiefs. Beſides, ſhe had an extreme affection for her brothers, of which ſhe had given manifeſt proofs, in the life-time of the king, her husband, and was, therefore, agreeably flattered with the hopes of 1484. of their advancement; and, in fine, ſhe conſidered, that the project, in favour of the earl Richmond, having miſcarried, by the duke of Buckingham's death, ſhe could only expect, for herſelf and daughters, a ſtill more rigorous fate, if, by her refuſal, ſhe farther incenſed the king. Theſe conſiderations inducing her to overlook the barbarous outrages received from that prince, ſhe was ſo ſtrangely infatuated, as to put her five daughters into his hands; nay, ſhe wrote to the marqueſs of Dorſet, her brother, to adviſe him to relinquiſh the earl of Richmond, and throw himſelf into Richard's arms. The marqueſs, no leſs inconſiderate and ambitious than the queen, his ſiſter, amuſed with the hopes of honours and preferments, ſecretly withdrew from Paris, in order to paſs into England; but the earl of Richmond cauſed him to be purſued, with ſuch expedition, that he was brought back to Paris, and, by weighty reaſons, prevailed on to ſtay with the earl.

The death of Richard's queen.

Richard no ſooner had his nieces in his power, than he projected means, to execute another part of his deſign; namely, to be rid of his queen, that he might marry his niece; and the hiſtorians, that ſpeak moſt favourably of his conduct, affirm, that he occaſioned the queen's death by diſcovering an averſion for her, which ſhe did not deſerve, and by grievouſly mortifying her, every day; but others ſpeak plainer, ſaying; that he haſtened her death, by poiſon. Some add, that he privately acquainted the archbiſhop of York with certain ſecret infirmities of the queen, which rendered her very diſagreeable to him; and on purpoſe that this prelate might tell her again, which he believed would cauſe her to ſhorten her days. It is farther ſaid, that the archbiſhop, after hearing the king's diſcourſe, told ſome of his friends, that the queen had not long to live; and, indeed, ſhe died, preſently after; but her fate would have been more worthy of compaſſion, if it had not been obſerved to be a manifeſt judgment upon her, for eſpouſing the murderer of the prince of Wales, her firſt husband, ſon to Henry VI. Richard ſhewed an extraordinary ſorrow, for his loſs, and made a pompous funeral, for his deceaſed queen; but this pretended grief was incapable of undeceiving the people, who openly accuſed him of murdering his queen, as he had done his nephews.

The princeſs Eliſabeth refuſes to marry the king, her uncle.

Notwithſtanding the extreme concern he expreſſed, in publick, the queen was no ſooner interred, than he had the aſſurance to make his addreſſes to the princeſs Eliſabeth, and offer her marriage; but her anſwer demonſtrated her abhorrence of ſuch a match; and ſhe deſired him, never to mention it more. Richard, being ſenſible that it was an improper ſeaſon to uſe violence, was ſatisfied, for the preſent, with this firſt overture, till he ſhould meet with a favourable juncture, to preſs the execution of his project; but, in the interim, as he daily become more odious, many lords and gentlemen went over, and offered their ſervice to the earl of Richmond. Others followed their example, to avoid the perſecutions of that bloody prince, if he ſhould unfortunately chance to ſuſpect them; and thoſe, that remained in the kingdom, were no better affected, waiting only for a fair opportunity to declare againſt him. 1484.

Several lords go over to the earl of Richmond. Hall.

The ſiege and taking of Hammes. Hall.

Richard, finding that the earl of Oxford and the governor of Hammes were gone to the earl of Richmond, diſpatched orders to the governor of Calais, to beſiege that caſtle, and reduce it to his obedience; which were ſo ſpeedily executed, that the earl of Oxford, advancing to relieve the place, did not arrive, in the neighbourhood, till after the capitulation; yet he reaped this advantage by it, that he brought away the garriſon, for the earl of Richmond.

1485. Richard lays up his fleet. Hall.

After the earl of Richmond's attempt, Richard had equipped a ſquadron of ſhips, to oppoſe his paſſage, if he ſhould endeavour to make another deſcent; but, in the beginning of the year 1485, the truce with Bretagne being prolonged, for ſeven years, and France ſeeming not very forward to aſſiſt his enemy, he thought he might ſave the charge of a fleet, which he now conſidered, as uſeleſs; and, accordingly, the ſhips were unrigged and laid up, in the ſpring.

The court of France reſolves to aid the earl of Richmond.

The earl of Richmond, encouraged by this proceeding, ſtrenuouſly ſollicited the aſſiſtance of the court of France; and king Charles's miniſters, at length, ſeriouſly conſidering his requeſt, apprehended, that it muſt, of courſe, be advantageous to France, to foment the troubles, in England; and it was ſolely with this view, that they promiſed the earl an aid of 2000 men, with ſhips to tranſport them, and ſupplied him with a ſum of money. Philip de Commines affirms, that he never ſaw ſuch ſorry troops as thoſe intended for this expedition; which clearly ſhews, with what intent the court of France granted the earl this inconſiderable ſupply; moreover, he was required to leave hoſtages, in France, that ſatisfaction ſhould be made, for what was expended by that court. The earl, having reaſon to ſuſpect the marqueſs of Dorſet, left him in hoſtage, at Paris, with Sir Thomas Bourchier; and then he repaired to Roan, where the troops that were lent him were ordered to aſſemble.

When he came to Roan, he received the mortifying news of the queen's death, and of Richard's intent to marry the princeſs Eliſabeth, his niece, and to give Cecily, her younger ſiſter, to one of his favourites; and, his meaſures being diſconcerted by this marriage, which was repreſented to him, as ready to be accompliſhed, he conſulted, upon this occaſion, with the lords that attended him. The reſult of their conſultation was, that, ſince he could have no proſpect of eſpouſing one of Edward IV's marriageable daughters, he ought to think of ſome other; wherefore, he was adviſed to gain to his intereſt Sir Walter Herbert, a perſon of great credit, in Wales, by an offer of marrying his younger ſiſter, the eldeſt being already eſpouſed to the earl of Northumberland. Upon this reſolution, he diſpatched an expreſs to Sir Walter Herbert to make the propoſal; but, fortunately for the earl, 1485. earl, the meſſenger found the roads ſo narrowly watched, that he durſt not venture to purſue his journey to Herbert; and it is highly probable, that, if this affair had ſucceeded, the earl of Richmond would have been abandoned by all the friends of Edward IV's family, who were very numerous; that had engaged in his party, purely from the hopes of his uniting the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, by his marriage with the princeſs Eliſabeth.

He is invited into England.

A few days after, he received letters from England, informing him, that, if he would make haſte and land, in Wales, he could never have a fairer opportunity; that all the nobility of the country eſpouſed his cauſe; and that he would find the people ready to take up arms, in his favour, and a conſiderable ſum of money, which had been privately collected to ſupply his occaſions: That, in the reſt of the kingdom, every one was diſpleaſed with the king, who daily rendered himſelf more odious; and, in fine, that it was a moſt favourable juncture, as it did not appear, that Richard imagined him ſo ready to depart, ſince he had not made any extraordinary preparations.

He lands at Milford-Haven,

This agreeable news obliged the earl to haſten his departure, without waiting for Sir Walter Herbert's anſwer; wherefore, coming to Harfleur, where his ſhips expected him, he embarqued his troops, and ſailed, the laſt day of July; and he arrived, the 6th of Auguſt, at Milford-Haven, in South-Wales, and, next day, came to Haverford, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants.

and marches to paſs the Severn. Hall.

From this place, he ſent an expreſs to the counteſs, his mother, to acquaint her of his arrival, and deſign to march towards London, deſiring her, alſo to draw together all his friends, that they might join him, upon his rout, with as many troops as poſſible; which rout was neceſſarily to be very long, ſince, having no town upon the Severn, at his command, he was obliged to croſs almoſt all Wales, to reach Shrewsbury, at the head of that river, where he was told, he ſhould be received; and, therefore, making but a ſhort ſtay, at Haverford, he marched towards North-Wales, in order to arrive at Shrewsbury, before the king was in a condition to diſpute his paſſage.

The king orders Herbert to oppoſe the earl's march. Hall.

Richard, hearing that the earl of Richmond was landed, at Milford-Haven, with ſo few troops, did not imagine, that he could make any remarkable progreſs; yet he ſent orders to Sir Walter Herbert, to raiſe the militia of the county, believing that Herbert might eaſily ſtop him, till he was himſelf ready to march; but Herbert, being ſecretly gained by the earl's adherents, ſuffered him to paſs, without the leaſt interruption.

The earl is joined by Sir Rice ap Thomas. Hollingſh.

Some days after, Sir Rice ap Thomas, a man of great intereſt, in Wales, met the earl, upon his rout, and offered his ſervice, which was joyfully accepted; and he had with him an able body of Welchmen; but it is not ſurpriſing, that all Wales ſhould declare for the earl, ſince he was of Welch extraction, and of one of the moſt antient families of the country.

The earl of Richmond's army being greatly augmented by the junction of Sir Rice ap Thomas, and ſeveral Welch gentlemen, and the whole country ſupplying him, in his march, with all neceſſaries, he came, in a few days, to Shrewsbury, where he was received, without oppoſition. 1485.

The lord Stanley and his brother raiſe forces.

The king had very juſtly ſuſpected the lord Stanley, of being a ſecret friend to his ſon-in-law; who had, indeed, aſſured the earl of Richmond, that he would favour him, to the utmoſt of his power; but, as he was conſtrained to leave his ſon in hoſtage with the king, he could not openly eſpouſe his cauſe, without endangering the life of his ſon. On this account, he pretended to take Richard's part, and, having levied about 5000 men, poſted himſelf, at Lichfield, as if he deſigned to oppoſe the earl of Richmond's march; and Sir William Stanley, his brother, alſo aſſembled a body of 2000 men, inſinuating that it was with the ſame deſign.

The king determines to fight Richmond. Hall.

The king was then at Nottingham, where, at the firſt news of his enemy's landing, he had given orders, to muſter his forces together; and he, at firſt, conſidered the earl of Richmond's attempt, as a ſort of bravado, which he hoped to make him very ſoon repent; but, finding that Sir Walter Herbert had let him paſs, without reſiſtance, that Sir Rice ap Thomas had joined him, that all Wales was for him, and that he was marching to Shrewsbury, he perceived, that the affair would become more important; and, therefore, without loſs of time, he reſolved to give him battle, before he had made a greater progreſs, and his army was reinforced; wiſely judging, that, if, on this occaſion, he diſcovered the leaſt faint-heartedneſs, it would infallibly cauſe the whole kingdom to declare againſt him; and that his firmneſs would contribute to keep in awe ſuch, as were inclined to ſide with his enemy. In the interim, he had, every day, the mortification to hear, that his officers and ſoldiers deſerted to the earl; yet he ſtill hoped, that the lord Stanley and his brother would join him, with their troops, tho' the little correſpondence, they held with him, gave him but too much reaſon to ſuſpect them of treachery; but, however this be, having received certain advice, that the earl of Richmond intended to march towards London, he reſolved to expect him, upon his rout, between Leiceſter and Coventry, in order to put a ſpeedy end to their quarrel, by a battle.

The earl advances to Lichfield.

Tho' the earl of Richmond's army was not very numerous, he was no leſs deſirous to engage, expecting that the lord Stanley and his brother would not fail him, in his neceſſity; and, with theſe hopes, he advanced to Lichfield, from whence, upon his approach, the lord Stanley retired to Atherſton; but, whilſt his army was upon the march, coming privately to Stafford, he had an interview with Sir William Stanley, in which were concerted the meaſures, the effects whereof will, preſently, appear.

The

1485. The earl, arriving at Lichfield, heard, that the king was at Leiceſter; and, finding that he could not poſſibly proceed to London, without fighting, he reſolved to march directly to his enemy; but, whilſt he was on the road to Tamworth, he chanced to be behind his company, and, attentively muſing upon his affairs, miſtook his way, loſing the track of his army. He roved about, till night, not daring to ask the road to Tamworth, leſt he ſhould apply to ſome one of Richard's party; and, at laſt, not being able to find the way, he was forced to paſs the night, at a village, without knowing where he was, or daring to inquire. However, next morning, he got to Tamworth, where his army was in great uneaſineſs for him, being ignorant of what had befallen him; but, to excuſe ſuch a blunder, which, had it been known, muſt have done him extreme injury, he pretended that he had been to confer with ſome ſecret friends; and, that very day, he went, with a few attendants, to Atherſton, where he had a long conference with the lord Stanley. On the morrow, having advice that Richard was gone from Leiceſter, to meet him, he advanced, to ſave him ſome part of the way; and the two armies met, at Boſworth, ſo near one another, that it was impoſſible to avoid a battle, if either of the two leaders had deſired it; but they were both very far from ſuch a deſign. The 22d of Auguſt was the day famous for the battle, which decided the quarrel of the two contending houſes.

A dangerous adventure happens to the earl in his march. Hall.

The two armies meet, at Boſworth, and draw up. Richard, perceiving his enemy to advance, drew up his army, conſiſting of between 12 or 13000 men; and he gave the command of the vanguard to the duke of Norfolk, leading the main body himſelf, with his crown on his head, either to be better known, or to remind his troops, that they were fighting for their king. The earl of Richmond, who had only 5000 men, alſo drew up his army into two lines, of which the earl of Oxford commanded the firſt, and himſelf the ſecond; and an hiſtorian has related the ſpeeches of the two leaders to the ſoldiers, before the fight; but, as it is doubtful, whether they were really ſpoken, and as they contain nothing very remarkable, I ſhall paſs them over in ſilence. Hall.

The conduct of Stanley and his brother. Whilſt the two armies were preparing for battle, the lord Stanley, who, till then, had remained at Atherſton, poſted himſelf with his troops, oppoſite to the ſpace between the two armies; and his brother, who was come from Stafford, took his ſtation, on the other ſide, overagainſt him. Richard had, hitherto, doubted, whether the lord Stanley was for, or againſt him, becauſe he had not yet made any publick demonſtration, in behalf of the earl of Richmond; but, when he ſaw him in that poſt, he was eaſily convinced, that he did not place himſelf there to aſſiſt him, ſince he had not given him notice of his deſign. However, willing to know for certain, what he had to fear, or hope, he ſent him orders to come and join his army; to which Stanley replied, that he would come, when it was convenient. This anſwer not ſatisfying the king, he commanded his ſon to be, immediately, put to death; but his generals repreſented to him, that, tho' the lord Stanley's behaviour was very ambiguous, and even gave cauſe to ſuſpect him, he had not declared for the earl of Richmond; that, probably, he was meditating ſome great action, in favour of his ſovereign, or, perhaps, intended to ſtand neuter, during the fight, in order to join the conqueror; that, in both theſe caſes, it was more adviſable to defer examining his conduct, till after the event, than to provoke him, by putting his ſon to death, to give the earl of Richmond an aid, capable of making victory incline to his ſide; and that, after all, in the king's preſent condition, the death of the young lord Strange could procure him no advantage. Theſe arguments ſeemed ſufficient to the king, to cauſe him to revoke his orders; but he was guilty of an unpardonable error, in remaining doubtful, as to the two brothers, who evidently diſcovered their intentions; for, as his army was ſtill ſuperior to the united forces of the earl of Richmond and the two brothers, he ſhould have oppoſed to the latter two bodies equal to theirs, with orders to attack them, the moment they offered to ſtir; by which means, he would have deprived them of the advantage of taking their time to declare, as afterwards happened; and ſuch an overſight, in ſo politick a prince as Richard, muſt neceſſarily be conſidered, as proceeding from a particular direction of the providence of God, who had determined his deſtruction. 1485.

The two armies approaching each other, the battle began, with a ſhower of arrows diſcharged from both ſides; upon which, the royal army advanced, to come to a cloſe engagement. The lord Stanley, who, hitherto, had been only a ſpectator, perceiving that the duke of Norfolk widened his line, to the left, in order to ſurround the earl of Richmond's troops, on a ſudden, poſted himſelf, on the right of the earl's, to receive the front of the king's firſt line; and, this motion cauſing the duke of Norfolk to halt, to recloſe his line, which was too much extended, to the left, the fight ceaſed, for ſome moments; but, preſently after, both ſides, being more upon an equality, by the lord Stanley's joining the earl, fought with great reſolution.

In the interim, Richard, impatient to know what paſſed, at the firſt line, ſpurred his horſe, towards the place where they were engaged; and, at the ſame time, the earl of Richmond, quitting his ſecond line, where he had poſted himſelf, advanced, as far as the foremoſt ranks of the firſt, to animate his troops by his preſence, being convinced that the ſucceſs of the day would, in a great meaſure, be determined by the fight of the two firſt lines. Richard, perceiving him, inſtantly rode to attack him; and he ſlew Sir William Brandon, the earl's ſtandard-bearer, who had interpoſed in his way. Sir John Cheney, taking Brandon's place, to reſiſt the king's furious efforts, was overthrown to the ground; and the earl of Richmond did not avoid the combat; yet, if we may judge, by the manner wherein the hi-

1485. ſtorians relate theſe particulars, he did not ſeem deſirous to join his enemy, contenting himſelf with ſtanding in a poſture of defence; for he willingly ſuffered his people to come between them, and prevent them from too cloſely approaching each other.

Sir William Stanley flanks the troops, who are put to rout. Hall.

At the very juncture that Richard was ſingling out the earl of Richmond, to decide, at once, their important quarrel, it was decided, extremely to his diſadvantage, from another quarter; for Sir William Stanley, imitating the example of the lord Stanley, his brother, no ſooner obſerved, that the left of the earl of Richmond's firſt line began to give ground, than he openly declared againſt the king, by attacking his troops, in the flank, who were employed in fighting their enemies, in the front, and vigorouſly repulſing them; which ſeaſonable attack, at ſo critical a moment, putting to very great diſorder the right of the king's firſt line, they, ſuddenly, retreated towards the main body, and were ſoon followed by the left. This precipitant retreat ſtruck ſuch a terror into the main body, that they almoſt all took to flight, without expecting the enemy; and the earl of Northumberland alone, who commanded one of the wings, ſtood motionleſs, having firſt ordered his troops to lay down their arms, to ſhew the enemies, that they had nothing to fear from him; but, Richard finding that the day was loſt, not being able to think of flying, or running the hazard of falling into the hands of the earl of Richmond, ruſhed into the midſt of his enemies, where he ſoon met with the death he deſired. Thus, fell the uſurper, in a more glorious manner than his crimes ſeemed to deſerve; after he had only wore, two years and two months, the crown he had purchaſed, by ſo many unlawful proceedings.

The battle continued, about two hours, including the time ſpent, in the purſuit of the run-aways; but, as moſt part of the king's army fled, without fighting, there were not ſlain, on the ſpot, above 2000 men, of his party; and the earl of Richmond loſt only 100, of whom Sir William Brandon was the only perſon of diſtinction; who was father to Charles Brandon, afterwards duke of Suffolk. On the king's ſide, the duke of Norfolk loſt his life, valiantly fighting for him who had created him a duke; but he would, doubtleſs, have gained greater reputation and glory, had he employed his valour for a prince more deſerving, than Richard, that a man ſhould hazard his life, for his ſake. The earl of Northumberland was admitted into the conqueror's favour, who, perhaps, held an underſtanding with him, before the battle; as appears, not only from what he did, in the beginning of the rout, but from certain verſes found, that very morning, by the duke of Norfolk, on his tent-door, intimating, that the king was ſold. The earl of Surrey, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, was taken priſoner, and ſent, at firſt, to the tower of London; but he, ſoon after, obtained his pardon and liberty. Some of Richard's adherents were treated with the ſame lenity; and others had the good fortune to eſcape; but Catesby, Richard's miniſter and confident, who had ſo baſely betrayed the lord Haſtings, was executed, two days after, at Leiceſter, with ſome others of that ſtamp, who had been the uſurper's inſtruments.

The duke of Norfolk is ſlain.

1485. Catesby is executed.

Richard's crown, being found by a ſoldier, was brought to the lord Stanley, who, directly, went and placed it on the earl of Richmond's head, congratulating him upon his victory, and ſaluting him, as king; from which time, Henry retained the regal title, and acted always, as ſovereign, as if that bare ceremony had given him an undoubted right. Richard's body was found, among the ſlain, ſtark-naked, covered with blood and dirt, and ſo thrown croſs a horſe, with the head hanging on one ſide, and the legs on the other, and carried to Leiceſter; and the body, after it had lain, two whole days, expoſed to publick view, was interred, without any ceremony, in one of the churches of that city; but, in proceſs of time, Henry VII, his enemy and ſucceſſor, ordered a more honourable monument to be erected for him, becauſe of Eliſabeth, his queen, who was of the houſe of York.

The lord Stanley ſets the crown on the earl of Richmond's head.

Richard III. was ſirnamed Crook-back'd, becauſe he was ſo, in reality; beſides, one of his arms was almoſt withered, receiving but little or no nouriſhment; and, as to the defects of his mind, according to the hiſtorians, they were ſo great and numerous, that it would be difficult to find, in hiſtory, a prince of ſo vile a character. It is certain, that he had a boundleſs ambition, which often prompted him to commit actions unbecoming a chriſtian prince; and to this paſſion alone muſt be aſcribed his treachery and cruelty, ſince he was only treacherous and cruel, to procure, or preſerve the crown. He was not the ſole prince, whom ambition has led into the like exceſſes; but the hiſtorians who wrote, in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII, have ſo aggravated his actions, that one cannot help obſerving, in their writings, an ardent deſire to pleaſe the monarchs then on the throne. Nay, in all probability, they have charged him with ſome actions, upon a weak foundation; for example, his murdering, with his own hand, Henry VI. and the prince of Wales; and their deſire to blacken this prince made them overlook his good qualities, which ought to have been related. However this be, without either vindicating his crimes, or, with ſome writers, condemning all his proceedings, I ſhall only blame what was really criminal, and, at the ſame time, acknowledge what deſerved commendation. The crimes he committed, to acquire, or ſecure the crown, are, as I obſerved, effects of his immoderate ambition; but their being produced by that paſſion does not, in the leaſt, extenuate their guilt; yet, after all, it muſt be confeſſed, that he had a great deal of ſenſe, and a very penetrating judgment, qualities that might have been an honour to him, had they been employed to better purpoſes. We may judge of his ſenſe and penetration, by his precautions to guard againſt the aſſaults of his enemies; for they were admirably well adapted to the ends he propoſed by them, if the Almighty had not been pleaſed to defeat them, as he ſometimes does the moſt

1485. wiſely concerted deſigns. On ſeveral occaſions, he diſcovered an extraordinary valour, and particularly in the battle wherein he was ſlain; and he expreſſed an extreme deſire, that juſtice ſhould be impartially adminiſtered to all his ſubjects, in all caſes where the preſervation of his crown was not concerned; for, in that reſpect, he did not ſcruple to trample upon all the rules of right and equity. This natural inclination to juſtice, tho' combated by his ambition, affords juſt cauſe to preſume, that he would, perhaps, have proved a good king, had he ſo firmly fixed himſelf on the throne, as to have feared no revolution; for the emperor Auguſtus, who was guilty of ſo many cruelties, to arrive at the empire, is a memorable and notorious inſtance of ſuch a change, and it is not impoſſible to find other examples; but, as Richard died, before he had given proofs of any amendment, his ill actions abſorbed all his laudable qualities. However, there is one hiſtorian who has attempted to vindicate this monarch; but, as he has preſcribed no bounds to this vindication, and laboured to render him entirely innocent, he has not acquired much reputation, eſpecially as he was frequently obliged, to attain his ends, to advance facts not ſtrictly true; nevertheleſs, he is allowed a place, in the Collection of the Engliſh Hiſtorians, tho' no modern author has thought fit to take him for a guide.

Bucks.

Richard left only one natural ſon, who was yet a minor; and, ſome months before his death, he had made him governor of Calais, Guiſnes, and of all the Marches of Picardy, belonging to the crown of England. Richard III. was the laſt of the Angevin kings, ſirnamed Plantagenets; who, ſince Henry II, the firſt of this line, had poſſeſſed the crown of England, from father to ſon, 330 years. Richard, tho' he was the laſt king of this houſe, was not the laſt male, as ſome have affirmed, ſince the earl of Warwick, his nephew, ſon to the duke of Clarence, his brother, was ſtill alive; and this young prince was the ſole branch of the male iſſue of Edward III, which had been ſo numerous; but it was almoſt entirely extirpated by the late civil war. This war, commenced 30 years before, was, at length, ended by the battle of Boſworth, after it had deſtroyed above 100,000 Engliſhmen, and a great number of princes of the two contending houſes. Philip de Commines mounts the number to 80; but it is a miſtake or exaggeration of that author, as evidently appears from the genealogical table of the poſterity of Edward III.

The end of the reign of the Plantagenets,

Let us conclude the hiſtory of the Plantagenets, with a brief recapitulation of the moſt remarkable accidents that befel the kings of this race, whilſt on the throne of England; from which abſtract of the 14 preceding reigns, it will appear, and, perhaps, not without aſtoniſhment, that the happineſs and glory, enjoyed by this houſe, for above 300 years, were very inconſiderable, in compariſon of their misfortunes.

HENRY II, the firſt king of this race, was the greateſt of all the Engliſh monarchs, in extent of dominion; for, beſides the kingdom of England, he poſſeſſed, in France, Guienne, Poictou, Xaintonge, Auvergne, Limouſin, Perigord, Angouleſmois, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, and Normandy, to which he likewiſe annexed Bretagne, by the marriage of one of his ſons with the heireſs of that duchy; and, laſtly, he crowned all, with the conqueſt of Ireland; but, notwithſtanding all his grandeur, he was ever unhappy; for his conteſt with Becket, the vexatious perſecutions from pope Alexander III, the rebellion of his queen and ſons, and the unfortunate ſucceſs of his laſt war with France, did not ſuffer him to enjoy a moment's repoſe. 1485.

RICHARD I. rendered his name glorious, in the eaſt, by the conqueſt of the iſle of Cyprus, the taking of Acra, and a ſignal victory over the Saracens; yet the fame, he acquired in that expedition, was a dear purchaſe to Chriſtendom, and eſpecially to England, by the prodigious quantity of men and money, exported from thence, without procuring for the chriſtians of Paleſtine any conſiderable advantages. Richard himſelf, at his return into Europe, underwent a grievous and long impriſonment; and he was not, at laſt, releaſed, without an exorbitant ranſom, which quite exhauſted his kingdom; in a word, after a ſeveral years ſtruggle with Philip Auguſtus, to little or no purpoſe, he unhappily periſhed by an arrow, at the ſiege of Chaluz, undertaken from his greedy deſire of money.

JOHN Lack-land did not enjoy a moment's happineſs, during the courſe of his reign; for, being perſecuted by the king of France, then by pope Innocent III, and, laſtly, by his own ſubjects, it was a continued ſeries of misfortunes. He loſt, firſt, all the provinces held by his anceſtors, in France; after which, Innocent III. deprived him of his crown, and reſtored it to him, upon diſhonourable terms; and, in fine, he had the extreme mortification to ſee his barons in arms againſt him, and to die, at a juncture when all England paid allegiance to a foreign prince.

HENRY III, a prince of a very mean ſpirit, continually remained in a ſtate of ſubjection, tho' ſeated on a throne; ſometimes a ſlave to his favourites and miniſters, and, at other times, to the imperious will of the popes. At length, ſtripped of all his authority by his own ſubjects, he continued, ſome time, captive to his greateſt enemies; and he was entirely indebted to a victory fortunately gained by the prince, his ſon, for his reſtoration, and the tranquillity he enjoyed, the two laſt years of his life.

EDWARD I. acquired great glory, by the conqueſt of Scotland; but, after ſhedding torrents of blood, in that unjuſt quarrel, he loſt that acquiſition, and ended his days, before he had recovered it; but his conqueſt of Wales was the moſt real advantage procured for the kingdom, by any of his predeceſſors.

The reign of EDWARD II. is remarkable, only for that prince's ill conduct and misfortunes; who is the firſt inſtance of an Engliſh monarch depoſed, by authority of parliament. It would have been happy for him, if this had been the laſt effect of the fury of his enemies; but, with an unparalleled inhumanity, they made him ſuffer the moſt cruel death that could poſſibly be deviſed, and which vaſtly outweighed all his indiſcretions.

EDWARD III. was one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of England, not only for his perſonal qualities, but for his victories, in France, and the famous treaty of Bretigny, which reſtored to him, with intereſt, the provinces loſt by the imprudence of John Lack-land; but his reign, tho' glorious, was not free from misfortunes. His minority was ſullied by the tragical death of Edward II, his father, and of the earl of Kent, his uncle; and, to puniſh theſe horrible outrages, he was forced to keep his own mother in confinement, to the day of her death. Towards the end of his days, he had the mortification to be deprived of all he had reconquered upon France, without hopes of recovery; and, in a word, he, in a manner, ruined his own reputation, and died, at a time when he began to loſe the former eſteem of his ſubjects.

It is manifeſt, that, hitherto, the race of the Plantagenets had enjoyed no great ſhare of happineſs; but their misfortunes, being intermixed with ſome proſperities, were very inconſiderable, in compariſon of what afterwards befel that race; for, when a man takes a view of what happened to the poſterity of Edward III, he ſees nothing but diſaſters, tragical or untimely deaths, hatred, animoſity, revenge, civil wars, and unheard of cruelties, among princes ſprung from the ſame original. England had never ſeen ſuch a dreadful deſtruction of her inhabitants, nor had the ſcaffold been ever dyed with ſo much noble and royal blood, as during the 100 years between the death of Edward III. and that of Richard III; but let us briefly runover the ſeveral branches of Edward III's family, in order to ſee their calamities.

EDWARD the Black Prince, one of the moſt accompliſhed princes that ever was born, died, in the 46th year of his age, having firſt buried his eldeſt ſon, Edward, only ſeven years old.

RICHARD II, his other ſon, who aſcended the throne, after his grandfather, was depoſed, impriſoned, and barbarouſly murdered.

LIONEL, duke of Clarence, third ſon to Edward III, died in a foreign country, in the flower of his age; and he left but one daughter, whoſe marriage into the houſe of Marche occaſioned all the calamities England was afflicted with, for 30 years together.

The poſterity of John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth ſon, were far from being happy; for HENRY IV, who ſucceeded Richard II, during his whole reign, was continually apprehenſive of loſing a crown acquired by extraordinary methods, and preſerved by the violent death of Richard II, whom he cauſed to be murdered, in priſon.

HENRY V, one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of England, after ſo great a progreſs, in France, as to be declared regent and heir of that kingdom, enjoyed that important advantage only two years, or rather, had but a foretaſte of what he had ſo paſſionately deſired; for he died, in the flower of his age, leaving a ſon nine months old, who afterwards proved very incapable of compleating the work, his illuſtrious father had ſo glorioufly begun.

The dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Glouceſter, died, without iſſue; and Glouceſter was long expoſed to the fury of his enemies, and, at laſt, ſacrificed to their vengeance.

HENRY VI, ſon of Henry V, loſt all that the king, his father, had acquired, in France; after which, he was deprived of his royalty, impriſoned, reſtored, for a ſhort ſpace, and, at laſt, murdered by a prince ſprung from the ſame ſtock with himſelf.

EDWARD, his ſon, prince of Wales, was put to death, after the ſame manner, and by the ſame hand.

In ſurveying the other branch of the houſe of Lancaſter, viz. that of Beaufort-Somerſet, we ſhall ſcarce find a ſingle perſon that did not loſe his life, in a battle, or on the ſcaffold.

The houſe of York, of whom Edmund de Langley, fifth ſon of Edward III, was head, was ſtill leſs favoured; and ſome unfortunate ſtars ſeemed to be continually ſhedding their malignant influences upon that family; for, except Edmund de Langley himſelf, firſt duke of York, all the princes, his deſcendants, died a violent or untimely death.

EDWARD, duke of York, his eldeſt ſon, periſhed, in the battle of Azincourt.

RICHARD, earl of Cambridge, loſt his head, on a ſcaffold.

RICHARD, third duke of York, and his ſon, EDMUND, earl of Rutland, were ſlain, at the battle of Wakefield.

GEORGE, duke of Clarence, was afterwards condemned to die, in a butt of malmſey.

EDWARD IV, having enjoyed the crown of England, ſome years, to which he had a better title than the houſe of Lancaſter, died, indeed, a natural death, but in the 42d year of his age.

EDWARD V. and RICHARD, his brother, were ſmothered, in their bed.

EDWARD, prince of Wales, ſon to Richard III, was taken out of the world, in the 11th year of his age.

RICHARD III. was killed, at the battle of Boſworth.

In fine, it will appear from the ſequel of this Hiſtory, that EDWARD, earl of Warwick, ſon to the unfortunate duke of Clarence, and the only ſurviving male of the houſe of York, ended his days, by the hand of the executioner.

Nothing now remains, to compleat the account of the calamities that befel the poſterity of Edward III, but to remark, that THOMAS of Woodſtock, earl of Glouceſter, ſeventh ſon of that monarch, died a violent death, in priſon, at Calais.

Were not all theſe misfortunes, which happened to Edward III's poſterity, the effects of the divine vengeance extended to the fourth generation, for the barbarous murder committed on the perſon of Edward II? At leaſt, it is eaſy to ſee, in theſe events, the tragical death of Edward II. revenged upon Richard II; that of Richard upon Henry VI; that of Henry upon Edward V; and that of Edward upon Richard III.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XIV.

The Reign of HENRY VII; with the State of the Church, from the beginning of the Reign of HENRY IV, 1399, to the end of the Reign of HENRY VII, 1509.

19. HENRY VII.

1485. HENRY VII. is proclaimed king by his army. Bacon.

THE battle of Boſworth being ended, as was obſerved, by the flight of the royal army, and death of king Richard, Henry ordered Te Deum to be ſung, upon the ſpot; and all the troops fell on their knees, to return God thanks, for his victory. Preſently after, the whole army, as it were by inſpiration, made the air reſound with the cry of, "Long live king Henry!" which was not diſagreeable to him; ſince it was a ſort of military election, that might have ſerved him for a foundation to claim the crown, tho' he had no other pretenſion. In the interim, he was embarraſſed, whether he ſhould inſiſt on this election, or build his title upon a more ſolid foundation; however, he was obliged to determine, without loſs of time, either to reject the title given him by his army, till the parliament ſhould confirm it, or accept it, and aſſert his right, independently of the conſent of the eſtates.

He is in ſuſpence about taking the title of king. Bacon.

The reaſons of it.

He had three foundations, on which he might ground his right to the crown; the firſt was his deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter, by Margaret, his mother, daughter to a duke of Somerſet. The houſe of Lancaſter had enjoyed the crown, above 60 years, and this poſſeſſion had been confirmed by many acts of parliament; but, on the contrary, ſeveral parliaments had, afterwards, condemned this poſſeſſion, as a continual uſurpation, and adjudged the crown to the houſe of York, as deſcending from Lionel, third ſon to Edward III. This queſtion, conſidered originally, and abſtractly from the circumſtances that moved the parliaments to come to ſuch oppoſite determinations, could not have been decided, in favour of the houſe of Lancaſter, if the laws and cuſtoms of the realm had been obſerved; but, if, ſetting aſide the uſual practice, it ſhould be conſidered, with reſpect to the acts of parliament, it could not but be doubtful, ſince the Pro and Con were equally ſupported by the ſame authority. It might alſo be objected to Henry, that, tho' ſeveral parliaments had decided the point, in favour of the houſe of Lancaſter, it did not follow, that the houſe of Somerſet could receive any advantage from this deciſion; for the Somerſets were only deſcended from the houſe of Lancaſter, by a baſtard branch, which could have no pretenſion to the crown, but by vertue of their legitimation; and it was a queſtion not yet decided, whether the act of legitimation, and Richard II's ſubſequent letters patent, gave to that branch, derived from a baſtard born in adultery, a right to ſucceed to the crown, tho' mentioned neither in the act of parliament, nor in king Richard's letters. Beſides, even upon the ſuppoſition of this right, another query ſtill aroſe, viz. whether the poſterity of this legitimated baſtard could have the preference to the deſcendants of the daughters born in wedlock, of whom there were ſeveral, in Caſtile, Portu- 1485.

1485. gal, and Germany; and, therefore, Henry apprehended it to be dangerous, to ſubmit theſe points to the examination of the parliament. On the other hand, he was ſenſible that, in the deciſion of the diſputes between the houſes of Lancaſter and York, the parliaments had not ſo much regarded the arguments of the reſpective parties, as the circumſtances of time and things; and that he could never have a more favourable juncture than the preſent, ſince he had juſt delivered England from a tyrant univerſally deteſted; for Henry IV, his predeceſſor, had not done more for the Engliſh, when, to reward him, the crown was adjudged to that prince, in prejudice of the houſe of Marche.

Henry's ſecond title was his intended marriage with Eliſabeth, eldeſt daughter to Edward IV, which he had ſworn to perform; but, if he relied upon this title, he muſt reſolve either to reign, only in right of his wife, or to confound together the titles of both houſes. In the former caſe, he would have given up his own, to leave to the houſe of York a title, which had, all along, been diſputed, and have owned that houſe's right, for the ſole foundation of his aſcending the throne; moreover, he conſidered, that, if Eliſabeth ſhould die, without iſſue, all her rights would, of courſe, devolve to her next ſiſter, and he, by this means, be excluded from the throne, upon the deceaſe of his queen; and that, tho' the parliament ſhould adjudge him the crown, during life, he ſhould only have a perſonal right, which would not deſcend to his children, by a ſecond marriage.

In the latter caſe, on ſuppoſition of the confuſion of the titles of both houſes, by the projected match, purſuant to the intention of thoſe who had called him into England, it might, indeed, be advantageous to the children born of this marriage; but, if unfortunately there ſhould be none, and his death happen before Eliſabeth's, he would leave the poſſeſſion of the crown to the houſe of York, which his averſion to that houſe would not ſuffer him to behold, even at a diſtance, without the greateſt uneaſineſs; and, if Eliſabeth ſhould die before him, he foreſaw that it would renew the troubles of the kingdom, becauſe, as ſhe reigned, in her own right, her ſiſter, or neareſt relations, might pretend to ſucceed her.

Henry's third title was that of the ſword or conqueſt, which his late victory ſeemed to give him; but he conſidered, that this victory was entirely owing to the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, and, therefore, gave him, at moſt, only a right of conqueſt over the vanquiſhed party. Beſides, as he could ſupport himſelf only by the ſame aſſiſtance, he was juſtly apprehenſive, that, in reſting upon this pretended title, he ſhould loſe his beſt friends; and he knew, that William the Conqueror had wiſely rejected the title of the ſword, till he ſaw himſelf firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne.

Theſe difficulties were ſo important, as to require Henry's mature deliberation; and yet, on the other hand, he was obliged, immediately, to come to a reſolution. He was neceſſarily either to accept the title given him by the army, and ſo engage to proſecute his rights, independently of the parliament's approbation, or, by rejecting it, ſhew, that he doubted his own right, and be expoſed to a troubleſome examination; but, after weighing the reaſons, on both ſides, as far as the time would permit, he reſolved, at laſt, to reſt upon the title of the houſe of Lancaſter; and, taking it for granted, that the army, in ſaluting him, as king, had only done their duty, he determined to aſſert the Lancaſtrian claim, without any mixture of that of York, and without ſubmitting it even to the examination of the parliament. Purſuant to this reſolution, he determined to be crowned, before he called the parliament, and to defer his marriage, till he had procured an act to adjudge him the crown, as his own by inheritance; reſolving to aſſume the regal title, and iſſue out orders, as king, as if he ſucceeded to the crown by hereditary right, tho' Margaret, his mother, was ſtill alive, and ought to precede him; and, notwithſtanding all the objections that might be made againſt his title, he believed that there were arguments ſufficient to ſupport it, eſpecially at a juncture when his victory was capable of deciding all the queſtions, in his favour; which reſolution was the fountain of all the troubles of his reign. 1485.

Henry is afraid of the houſe of York.

In the mean while, tho' he affected to be convinced of the validity of his title, he doubted it, in his own mind; being ſenſible that, if it came to be conteſted, the reaſons, on which he ſhould found it, were of no great weight, unleſs ſupported by force of arms. In this ſtate of uncertainty, he continued, almoſt all his days; for, tho' he was always unconcerned, in appearance, he was inwardly terrified, dreading that every little accident would be of dangerous conſequence. The houſe of York was a perpetual terror to him; for he knew, that they, who invited him into England, were not enemies to that family, but only to the perſon of Richard III; and, the rights of the two houſes remaining ſtill doubtful, as having been decided only by the ſword, he was fully convinced that his could only be maintained by the ſame means, or by wiſe precautions, to prevent all future deciſions.

He ſends the earl of Warwick to the tower.

On this very account, the next day after the battle, he ſent a detachment of horſe, under Sir Robert Willoughby, to the caſtle of Sheriff-Hutton, to remove from thence the earl of Warwick, and conduct him to the tower of London; who was ſon and heir to George, duke of Clarence, that was ſtifled in a butt of malmſey. After the death of the duke, his father, Edward IV, his uncle, cauſed him to be carefully educated, and created him earl of Warwick; a title enjoyed by his mother's father; for he was unwilling to make him duke of Clarence, leſt that title ſhould preſerve the memory of an unfortunate brother, whom he had ſacrificed to his jealouſy. Richard, aſcending the throne, confined

The princeſs Eliſabeth comes to London. Hall.

The princeſs Eliſabeth, whom Henry was to marry, was kept in the ſame caſtle, by the late king's order, who judged it improper to leave her at liberty to chooſe a huſband, deſigning to marry her himſelf; and Henry, reſolving to repair to London, with all poſſible expedition, did not think it adviſable to leave the princeſs, at ſo great a diſtance, leſt ſhe ſhould be told, that ſhe had no occaſion to mix her rights with thoſe of others. For this reaſon, ſhe was deſired to come and continue with the queen, her mother, at London; for his intent was to ſhew, that he intended to eſpouſe her, very ſoon, tho' he was determined to delay his marriage, till after the ſeſſion of the parliament.

Henry is well received at London.

A few days after, Henry proceeded, by eaſy journies, to London; and he ſtudiouſly avoided all appearance of uſing the right of conqueſt. He was received, in all places, with loud acclamations, the people conſidering him, as their deliverer, and expecting that, by his marriage, he would put an end to all the calamities occaſioned by the civil wars; and he made his entry into London, in a very pompous manner; yet the people had not the ſatisfaction to ſee him, as he paſſed through the city, becauſe he was carried, all the way, in a cloſe chariot, till he came to St. Paul's. His hiſtorian aſcribes this conduct to a motive of grandeur and ſecurity, as if, having been proſcribed, in the reign of Richard III, he diſdained to fawn upon the people, leſt they ſhould imagine he expected all from them; but I cannot tell, whether this is better grounded than what the ſame author adds, that Henry ordered Richard's ſtandards, taken at Boſworth, to be brought into St. Paul's church, that the Londoners might not forget, that he had juſt gained a victory, and was entering the city, as a conqueror; for, when a prince has acquired a reputation, for politicks, ſomething myſterious, ſuitable to the idea formed of him, is diſcovered in his moſt indifferent actions.

He ratifies his oath to marry Eliſabeth.

On the morrow, Henry convened a council of all the perſons of diſtinction, in the court and city, before whom he ſolemnly renewed his oath to marry the princeſs Eliſabeth; which declaration was abſolutely neceſſary, on account of a rumour that he was contracted to Ann, eldeſt daughter to the duke of Bretagne, and had acted inſincerely, when he promiſed to marry the eldeſt daughter of Edward IV; moreover, tho' he did not deſign to derive his right from this marriage, it was expedient, that the people ſhould think ſo, till he had obtained his deſire of the parliament, leſt meaſures ſhould be previouſly taken, to prevent it. Indeed, he was reſolved to perform his promiſe; but yet he did not intend to conſummate his marriage, before his coronation, leſt his queen ſhould be crowned with him, and her title ſupported by that junction; nay, he had cauſe to fear, that, if his nuptials were celebrated, before the parliament met, ſome clauſe, in behalf of the houſe of York, might be inſerted in the act to ſettle the ſucceſſion. 1485.

The ſweating-ſickneſs.

About the middle of September, the city of London was afflicted with a diſeaſe, then unknown; which threw the patients into ſo prodigious a ſweat, as carried them off, in 24 hours; but thoſe, that did not die, within that ſpace, were almoſt ſure of recovering. It happily laſted no longer, than till the end of October; but it ſwept away multitudes of people, before proper remedies were diſcovered. The method of cure was to keep the patient neither too hot, nor too cold, with temperate cordials; which, without too much increaſing the heat, aſſiſted nature to expel the humours that cauſed theſe violent ſweatings.

The earl of Oxford is made governor of the tower. Act. Pub.

About this time, Henry made the earl of Oxford conſtable of the tower, who had ever been devoted to the houſe of Lancaſter, and, after his eſcape out of the caſtle of Hammes, joined him, at Paris; and he had ſince done him ſignal ſervices, particularly at the battle of Boſworth.

A truce with France: Act. Pub.

Some time after, the king iſſued out a proclamation, to notify that he had concluded a truce, for a year, with the king of France, from the laſt day of September; and it was to no ſmall advantage to ſhew the people, that Charles VIII. owned him, for king, even before he was declared ſo by the parliament.

The office of high-ſteward is exerciſed by commiſſioners. Act. Pub.

The coronation-day approaching, it was requiſite to ſettle the places and claims of thoſe, who were to officiate at this ceremony; and, with this view, it was neceſſary to create a lord high-ſteward; but, as this office, for ſome time, had been enjoyed only by princes of the blood, and there were none then in the kingdom, the king, leſt he ſhould create jealouſies among the great men, cauſed it to be executed by commiſſioners.

Creations.

In the interim, he would no longer delay to demonſtrate his gratitude to three lords, who had faithfully and effectually ſerved him, in his greateſt extremities; and theſe were Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, his father's brother, Thomas, lord Stanley, his father-in-law, and Sir Edward Courtney. The firſt had been a father to him, in his youth, and preſerved him from the ſnares of Edward IV, when he was concealed, in Wales; and he, afterwards, was his conſtant companion, in Bretagne, and had helped him to ſurmount all the difficulties that occurred in his undertakings. In return for his ſervices, Henry made him duke of Bedford; which title was vacant, ever ſince the 1485. the death of the famous duke of Bedford, brother to Henry V. The lord Stanley, who had been extremely ſerviceable to the king, at the battle of Boſworth, was created earl of Derby; and Sir Edward Courtney, who had ventured to engage in his party, and countenance, in the weſtern counties, the duke of Buckingham's plot, was honoured with the title of earl of Devonſhire; but Henry declined to diſpenſe his favours to others, being willing, according to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, to reſerve his creations, till the ſitting of the parliament.

The king's coronation.

The coronation had been fixed to the 30th of October; but the parliament was not to meet, till the 7th of November; from whence it appears, that Henry did not intend to lave to the parliament's care any more than to confirm his coronation, without ſuffering the foundations of his title to be examined; for the examples of Edward IV. and Richard III. had inſtructed him, that the beſt way, to obtain the parliament's approbation, was to take poſſeſſion. Indeed, there is a remarkable difference between debating, whether a prince, who claims a crown, has a right to pretend to it, or whether he is to be dethroned, when in actual poſſeſſion; for the former of theſe may be done by reaſons, arguments, and ſtudied ſpeeches; but the latter requires an army ready to enforce the reaſons; ſo that Henry may be ſaid to place the crown on his own head, ſince he alone diſpoſed of his right, without the authority of parliament, who would have had much to object, if they had examined, or been allowed to examine, by what title Henry aſcended the throne. The ceremony of the coronation was performed by cardinal Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury; who, ſuppoſing Henry's right to be inconteſtable, judged it improper to inquire into the validity of his title; and, the ſame day, Henry inſtituted a guard of 50 archers *, to attend him and his ſucceſſors, for ever; varniſhing, with a pretence of grandeur and majeſty, a precaution which he believed apparently neceſſary, in the preſent juncture.

The parliament meets. Hall. Bacon.

The parliament met, eight days after the coronation; and Henry's ends, in calling it, were principally four. The firſt was to be declared king, de Jure, as he was already king, de Facto, and, by an expreſs act, to ſecure the crown to his poſterity; the ſecond, to reverſe the attainders of all his party; the third, to attaint thoſe who had been moſt active againſt him, and moſt zealous for the late king; and the fourth and laſt was to ſhew, that, tho' he had, by his ſole authority, aſcended the throne, to prevent his title from being diſputed, he deſigned, however, to govern the kingdom, like his predeceſſors, by way of parliaments, and not aſſume an arbitrary power; which ſtep was abſolutely neceſſary for a prince, whoſe title was ſo dubious, and who came to the crown, without being called to it, in the uſual manner.

1485. The difficulties about ſettling the ſucceſſion. Bacon.

It was neceſſary, for the people's ſatisfaction, and the king's ſecurity, that the parliament ſhould ſettle the crown upon him, by an act, in form; or elſe obedience to him might be thought diſpenſable; and, tho' he had been able to cauſe his authority to be owned, without ſuch an act, his heirs were not certain to be always in ſuch a favourable ſituation. In the interim, it was difficult to pen this act; for Henry would not hold the crown, either by the people's election, by the parliament, or by the princeſs Eliſabeth, his intended ſpouſe; for it was not even his intent, that ſhe ſhould ſhare in the royalty, otherwiſe than any other foreign queen. Nevertheleſs, in the beginning of his reign, it was expedient, that the people ſhould have ſome cauſe to believe, that the king reſted upon all theſe titles; and that becauſe the Engliſh were extremely jealous of the authority of their parliaments, and, generally, much better affected to the houſe of York, than to that of Lancaſter. The king, therefore, finding the parliament diſpoſed to comply with whatever he could deſire, intimated, or dictated himſelf the words of the act, viz. "That the crown ſhould reſt, remain, and "continue in the king, and the heirs of his "body, perpetually ſo to endure, and in no "other;" which ambiguous words left it undetermined, whether he had a prior right, which was doubtful, or was only king, in fact, which could not be denied. As for the limitation of the entail, he was contented with extending it no farther, than to himſelf, and the heirs of his body, leaving the reſt to be decided by the law, if his line ſhould fail; and, thus, by not mentioning the houſe of York, the act left it undecided, whether that houſe was entirely excluded, or might inherit, after the heirs of the new king. In this obſcure manner, the parliament drew up, and paſſed the act, which was afterwards ratified by the papal bull; in which, however, Henry took care to have all his titles inſerted; namely, his deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter, his marriage with Edward IV's eldeſt daughter, his victory at Boſworth, and the act of parliament. To theſe might be likewiſe added the pope's bull of confirmation; and all of them, joined together, evidently prove his uncertainty, with reſpect to his right, and his uneaſineſs on that account. Hall. Bacon.

Queſtions in parliament, decided by the judges. Bacon.

The act of ſettlement and ſucceſſion being paſſed, it was moved for another, to reverſe the attainders of the king's adherents, whilſt only earl of Richmond; but ſeveral of theſe were actually members of the houſe of commons, elected by the intereſt they had in the people, ſince the revolution; and there were alſo ſome attainted perſons, in the houſe of lords. It was, therefore, repreſented, as incongruous, that they ſhould give their votes, in an affair that particularly concerned them, and be judges in their own cauſe; but the king was troubled, that the acts, paſſed in the late reign, ſhould be accounted valid, and his friends

1485. friends wanted to be purged of the crime of eſpouſing his quarrel. However, he concealed his concern, and only inſinuated, that he wiſhed the judges might be conſulted, on this occaſion; who, being met, gave it, as their opinion, that the members, attainted by courſe of law, ſhould abſent themſelves, till their attainders were reverſed.

But, during their debates upon this queſtion, another was ſtarted, with reſpect to the king himſelf, who was among the attainted, having been declared a traytor and rebel, by an act of parliament; which queſtion was much more perplexing than the other; for the king could not be disjoined from the parliament, without a diſſolution, nor was it probable, that he would ſubmit to a parliamentary examination. In this intricate caſe, the judges unanimouſly reſolved, "That the crown re- "moves all defects and ſtops in blood; and "that, from the time the king aſcended the "throne, the fountain was cleared, and all at- "tainders and corruption of blood diſcharg- "ed." This deciſion, more conſiſtent with politicks than the laws of the land, eſtabliſhed a principle, that might be attended with dreadful conſequences.

This affair being determined, the parliament paſſed an act of attainder againſt the late king, by the name of the duke of Glouceſter, and againſt his principal adherents; among whom were the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surrey, the lords Lovel, Ferrers, Zouch, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir William Catesby, all miniſters or favourites of Richard III; of which ſome were killed, at Boſworth-field, and others executed, ſince the battle. If the plots, afterwards formed againſt Henry himſelf, had ſucceeded, he would, doubtleſs, have been treated in the ſame manner, with all his adherents; ſo dangerous is exceſſive ſeverity, in caſes of this nature; and, accordingly, the ſequel will ſhew, that Henry, perceiving the conſequences, cauſed an act to be paſſed, to prevent the abuſe of ſuch a precedent. The intent of the preſent act was to ſatisfy the king's vengeance, and procure him the forfeited eſtates of the attainted; which confiſcations brought him in immenſe ſums, ſo that he had no occaſion to demand a ſubſidy, in this firſt parliament, eſpecially as the nation was in peace, or truce, with all the neighbouring princes.

A general pardon.

The king, having revenged himſelf on his enemies, and filled his coffers, iſſued out a royal proclamation, offering pardon to all that had been concerned in any plot againſt him, before his acceſſion to the crown, or borne arms for the late king, provided they ſubmitted themſelves, within a limited time; and his firſt deſign was to procure this general pardon to be paſſed, in parliament; but, conſidering that it was an act of grace, he choſe rather that it ſhould entirely flow from himſelf. Many, apprehenſive of being proſecuted, voluntarily came and took the oath of allegiance, in order to enjoy the benefit of the pardon; but others choſe to continue in ſanctuary, till the character of the new king was more known; and the latter courſe was taken by the lord Lovel, who had been a favourite of Richard III. 1485.

A creation of peers.

Before the breaking up of the parliament, Henry rewarded ſome of the companions of his exile, by creating them peers of the realm. The lord Chandos of Bretagne received the title of earl of Bath; Sir Giles D' Aubeney was made baron of D' Aubeney, and Sir Robert Willoughby lord Brooke. At the ſame time, he reſtored Edward Stafford to the dignity of duke of Buckingham, forfeited by his father's attainder, and to all the poſſeſſions belonging to his family, confiſcated in the late reign; which was a piece of juſtice he owed to the ſon of a lord, who had loſt his life, in his ſervice, and been the firſt author of his advancement to the throne.

The king redeems the pledges from France. Act. Pub.

The parliament being diſſolved, about the end of November, Henry ſent into France Oliver King, archdeacon of Oxford, with money to repay king Charles what he had lent him, and his expences, in fitting out the fleet which brought him to England; upon which, the marqueſs of Dorſet and Sir John Bourchier, left as pledges at Paris, were permitted to return home; and Henry alſo impowered his envoy to prolong the truce with France, if he found king Charles's council inclined.

He borrows money of the city. Stow.

In all probability, his want of ready money, to pay the king of France, occaſioned his ſending to the city of London, to borrow 6000 marks; but his demand met, at firſt, with great difficulties, becauſe he was, as yet, not thoroughly known. However, he obtained, at laſt, 2000 l. which he thankfully received, and punctually repaid; and he frequently borrowed money, in this manner, in the courſe of his reign, and always paid, at the very day; for his view was to eſtabliſh his credit, in that powerful city, that he might uſe it, upon any preſſing emergency.

Morton and Fox are made privy-counſellors. Bacon.

About the end of this year, he called to his privy-council John Morton, biſhop of Ely, lately returned from Flanders, and Richard Fox; for he lay under great obligations to the former, particularly for his intelligence of the plot againſt him, in Bretagne; and he had an extreme value for the latter, knowing him to be a perſon capable of doing him ſignal ſervice, and of a temper very like his own. In proceſs of time, Morton was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord chancellor, prime miniſter, and, at laſt, cardinal; and, as to Fox, the king made him firſt lord keeper of the privy ſeal, and then biſhop of Exeter; after which he tranſlated him to Bath and Wells, from thence to Durham, and, laſtly, to Wincheſter, the richeſt biſhoprick, in England. Theſe two prelates, with Urſwick, the king's chaplain, were generally employed in the moſt important commiſſions, ambaſſies, and negotiations; for Henry loved to employ eccleſiaſticks, becauſe he had always church-preferments ready to reward them; but he took care to promote them, by degrees, from ſmaller to more conſiderable ſees. In this, he found his own advantage; for, by tranſ-

1485. lating biſhops from one ſee to another, he made the more vacancies, and conſequently the firſt-fruits, accruing to the king, were exceedingly multiplied. No prince ever more induſtriouſly ſought occaſions, to accumulate riches; for avarice, his predominant paſſion, influenced even his meaner actions, and prompted him to take many falſe ſteps, as the ſequel will inform us.

The events of this reign have ſuch a connexion with thoſe of ſome other ſtates, that it is abſolutely neceſſary briefly to relate the ſituation of the affairs of ſeveral princes; for, otherwiſe, the motives of Henry VII's conduct would not be perfectly known, who made, in his time, a very great figure, in Europe, tho' not ſo much by his arms as policy; and I ſhall begin with Bretagne.

The affairs of Bretagne. Argentre.

I have, elſewhere, obſerved, that Peter Landais entirely governed the duke of Bretagne, who was old and infirm, and greatly impaired, in his underſtanding; and that ſeveral lords of Bretagne had entered into a league againſt that miniſter, and deſigned to ſeize him; but, being diſappointed, they were expoſed to the vengeance of that favourite, who had cauſed them all to be condemned to die. In the beginning of 1485, Landais, in the name of the duke, his maſter, raiſed an army, to execute the ſentence; and the lords, on their part, took up arms, in their defence. Whilſt Bretagne was, thus, divided, and the two parties in readineſs to come to a battle, the condemned lords cauſed it to be repreſented to thoſe who ſerved Landais, that, in the preſent caſe, the intereſt not of their common maſter, the duke, but only of his worthleſs miniſter, was concerned; that it was unjuſt to ſhed the blood of their countrymen, in the quarrel of a man, who had notoriouſly abuſed his maſter's confidence: And that, therefore, to appeaſe, at once, the commotions of Bretagne, there was a much more natural and ready way than that of arms; viz. to diſpatch that miniſter, after which, not a man would refuſe to render due obedience to the duke. The lords of the duke's party, approving of this expedient, were of opinion, that, in effect, it was both for the intereſt of the country and the duke, that Landais, the ſole cauſe of the troubles, ſhould be ſacrificed to the good of the publick; but Landais, hearing that the lords of the two armies were forming ſome plot againſt him, cauſed a declaration to be drawn, in which the duke ordered, that all perſons of his own army, who held an underſtanding with the proſcribed lords, ſhould be accounted traytors and rebels; yet this only ſerved to haſten his deſtruction. The chancelior, who was in the confederacy againſt him, refuſed to ſeal the declaration, and informed the lords of it, who reſolved to have no farther regard for the favourite; and, going, in a body, to the palace, they ſeized Landais, in the duke's own apartment, who was forced to deliver him, on condition they would ſpare his life; but, on the contrary, they brought him to a ſpeedy trial, and, convicting him of 1000 crimes, made him atone for them, on the gallows, before the duke even heard of the ſentence. How much ſoever the duke was concerned, at the death of his favourite, he was obliged to grant the lords of the two armies letters of pardon; and, thus, Bretagne would have been reſtored to her former tranquillity, had not the duke indiſcreetly interfered in the commotions of the court of France, which proved the ruin of himſelf and his dukedom; which muſt, now, be ſhewn, ſince it occaſioned the war between Charles VIII. and the duke of Bretagne, and in which Henry VII. was concerned. 1485.

The affairs of France. Mezerai.

Lewis XI, king of France, dying in 1483, appointed Ann, wife to Peter de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu, governeſs to the perſon of Charles VIII, his ſon and ſucceſſor, who was 14 years old, and conſequently of age, purſuant to the ordinance of Charles V; but, as he had not been well educated, the king, his father did not think him capable of holding the reins of government. Lewis XI. was no ſooner in his grave, than Lewis, duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, refuſed to own Ann of Beaujeu, for the king's governeſs; affirming, that a woman had no right to meddle with the affairs of the kingdom. The ſtates, aſſembled at Tours, in January, 1484, decided the diſpute by their authority; for they confirmed the late king's will, and ordered, that the duke of Orleans ſhould be preſident of the council, in the abſence of the king.

During the convention of the ſtates of France, the lords of Bretagne made their firſt attempt upon Landais, which proved unſucceſsful; and the ſentence, that was given againſt them, creating a dread of the favourite's revenge, they applied to Ann of Beaujeu, to obtain the king her brother's protection. On the other hand, Landais, finding that his enemies had recourſe to the lady Ann, thought it adviſable to rely upon the aſſiſtance of the duke of Orleans; and, with this view, he intreated him to come to the court of Bretagne, inſpiring him with hopes, that the duke would give him in marriage Ann, his eldeſt daughter, and heir apparent to his dominions. The duke of Orleans had married, againſt his will, Joanna, daughter to Lewis XI; but he had made againſt this forced marriage a ſecret proteſtation, which he intended to uſe, in order to annul it, at a more favourable juncture. Being, therefore, pleaſed with the proſpect Landais had given him, he came to Bretagne, where he was extremely careſſed; but he made no long ſtay, being obliged to aſſiſt at the king's coronation, which was performed, in June; yet, in all probability, whilſt he was in Bretagne, he concerted, with the duke and his favourite, meaſures to diſturb the government of Ann of Beaujeu, who was become abſolute miſtreſs of the king her brother's perſon and affairs.

Shortly after, the duke of Orleans, forming a league againſt the court, and retiring to Boiſgency, demanded, that the ſtates of France might be aſſembled; deſigning to annul the regulation, with reſpect to the government of the king's perſon; but Ann of Beaujeu cauſed the 1485. the king ſo ſpeedily march againſt him, that he was conſtrained to accept of ſuch terms as were granted him, his friends not being, as yet, ready to aſſiſt him; and, by this agreement, the earl of Dunois and Longueville, who was conſidered, as his principal adviſer, was baniſhed to Aſt, in Piedmont, a town belonging to the duke of Orleans, with orders not to ſtir from thence, without the king's expreſs licenſe.

The duke of Orleans, being forced to diſmiſs his troops, cauſed the greateſt part to liſt, in the duke of Bretagne's army, againſt the condemned lords; whilſt, on the contrary, Ann of Beaujeu ſent to the barons part of the king's forces; and Landais's death, which fell out, ſoon after, was incapable of making the duke of Orleance deſiſt from his projects. He had occaſion for the duke of Bretagne, to ſupport him againſt the court, and even expected to marry his daughter; and the duke of Bretagne, on his part, having been greatly perſecuted by Lewis XI, and being ſenſible, that Ann of Beaujeu followed the ſame maxims, reſolved to reſt upon the aſſiſtance of the duke of Orleans. After ſeveral negotiations, theſe two princes formed a league, into which entered John de Chalon, prince of Orange, nephew to the duke of Bretagne, the duke of Bourbon, the earl of Dunois, the duke of Lorrain, with ſeveral other princes and lords; and, ſome time after, the earl of Dunois, returning into France, without leave, retired to his ſeat, at Partenay, in Poictou. The king was, hitherto, ignorant of the duke of Orleans's deſigns; but, the earl of Dunois's return convincing him, that ſome plot was projecting, in favour of that prince, who was now at Blois, he ſent him a poſitive order, to repair to court. The duke obeyed, upon a ſecond ſummons; but, next day, hearing that he was in ſome danger, at court, he, pretending to go a hunting, withdrew into Bretagne, where he was preſently followed by the prince of Orange and the earl of Dunois. This was in the beginning of 1486; but we muſt, now, take a view of what paſſed, in the Low-Countries.

The affairs of the Low-Countries.

Since the death of Maria of Burgundy, Maximilian of Auſtria, her husband, had been involved in troubles, becauſe of the guardianſhip of Philip, her ſon, become ſovereign of the Low-Countries, upon the deceaſe of the ducheſs, his mother; for Brabant, Holland, and Zealand had voluntarily received him, for guardian; but Flanders and Hainault diſowned his authority.

The obſtinacy of the Flemings obliged Maximilian to conclude a peace with Lewis XI, upon theſe terms: That the dauphin Charles, ſon to Lewis, ſhould marry Margaret, daughter to Maximilian, as ſoon as they arrived at ſuch an age; that Margaret ſhould have, for her dowry, Artois, Franche-Comte, Macon, and Auxerre, and be educated, at the court of France; and, by vertue of this treaty, Lewis kept theſe provinces which he had already ſeized, and took Margaret home, till the conſummation of the marriage.

In 1483, Maximilian ſucceſsfully made war upon the Liegeois; and, the ſame year, Hainault acknowledged him, as guardian of Philip, his ſon. 1485.

In 1484, the Flemings, ſtill refuſing to own Maximilian, for guardian, appointed governors for Philip, of whom Adolphus de Cleves, lord of Ravenſtein, was the chief; but their obſtinate refuſal cauſed between them and Maximilian a war, in which Charles VIII. aſſiſted the Flemings.

This war was ended, in January, 1485, by a treaty, importing, that the Flemings ſhould own Maximilian, for guardian of his ſon, upon the expreſs condition that he ſhould not remove him from Flanders, till of age; and, this treaty being ſigned, Maximilian made his entry into Gaunt; where, a few days after, was a ſedition, but which was happily appeaſed. During the remainder of the year, the Low-Countries enjoying tranquillity, Maximilian took a journey into Germany, to be elected king of the Romans; but let us proceed to relate the Spaniſh affairs.

Henry IV, ſirnamed the Impotent, king of Caſtile, dying, in 1474, left only a daughter, called Joanna, who was univerſally believed to be ſuppoſititious; wherefore, Iſabella, ſiſter to Henry, and Ferdinand, prince of Arragon, her husband, aſcended the throne of Caſtile; but they had a fierce war to maintain againſt Alphonſo, king of Portugal, who, being contracted to Joanna, ſuppoſed daughter of Henry IV, laid claim to the crown of that kingdom. This war ended, in 1479, to the advantage of Ferdinand and Iſabella, who forced Alphonſo to deſiſt from his pretenſions; and, by the treaty, on this occaſion, it was agreed, that Alphonſo, grandſon to the king of Portugal, ſhould eſpouſe Iſabella, daughter of Ferdinand, when the parties were of age to conſummate the marriage.

John, king of Arragon, died, this year, leaving to his ſon, Ferdinand, the kingdom of Arragon, with a war to carry on againſt France; for John had mortgaged to Lewis XI. Rouſillon and Cerdagne, for 300,000 crowns; but, afterwards, the inhabitants of Perpignan revolted from the French, being diſpleaſed with their dominion. Upon this news, John, coming to Perpignan, endeavoured to perſuade them to remain in ſubjection to the French, till he could redeem Rouſſillon, by the payment of the mortgage; but, in the interim, Lewis XI. cauſed Perpignan to be beſieged, and John himſelf was ſhut up in the place. The ſiege laſted, four months; but, at laſt, Ferdinand, John's ſon, relieving him, obliged the French to retire. Shortly after, John leaving Perpignan, Lewis ordered the place to be re-inveſted, and, after a long ſiege, became maſter of it; from which time, the king of Arragon pretended, that the king of France ought to reſtore Rouſſillon, without receiving the money lent, either on account of his expence, in protecting his ſubjects, or becauſe the French had levied large ſums upon the mortgaged countries; but Lewis did 1485. did not think himſelf obliged to this reſtitution, without the repayment of 300,000 crowns.

In 1485, Charles VIII. ſent an ambaſſador to Ferdinand, who refuſed to receive him, unleſs he was expreſly impowered to reſign Rouſſillon and Cerdagne.

About the latter end of this year, was born Catharine, daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, who, in proceſs of time, became queen of England, and will have a great ſhare in the Hiſtory of that kingdom; but Ferdinand and Iſabella had ſeveral other children, viz. Iſabella, affianced to the prince of Portugal, John born, in 1477, and Joanna born, in 1479.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

I ſhall conclude this digreſſion, with the affairs of Scotland; where James III. continued to rule, with oppreſſion and violence, regardleſs of the affection of his ſubjects. I have already obſerved, that the duke of Albany, his brother, delivered up Dunbar to the Engliſh, and, after the death of Edward IV, retired into France, where he loſt his life, at a tournament; and, thenceforward, the Engliſh kept poſſeſſion of that place, tho' Richard III. promiſed to reſtore it; but, this promiſe not being performed, when Henry VII. aſcended the throne of England, James reſolved to recover Dunbar, by force of arms. With that view, about the end of this year, or, perhaps, the beginning of the next, he beſieged and took the town; for the ſeaſon, and the important affairs which then employed Henry's thoughts, did not permit him to prepare for its relief.

Such was the condition of the ſtates, with whom Henry VII. had any concerns, during the courſe of his reign; but it is now time to return to our Hiſtory.

1486. The king's marriage. Jan. 18.

How great an averſion ſoever the king might have in his mind to the houſe of York, he had too ſolemnly promiſed to marry the princeſs Eliſabeth, not to make good his engagement; moreover, this marriage was neceſſary to amuſe the Engliſh, who ſtill flattered themſelves, that the king intended to confound his rights with thoſe of the houſe of York, tho' he had taken ſuch particular care to prevent her being mentioned, in the act of ſettlement. The nuptials were ſolemnized, the 18th of January, with far greater demonſtrations of joy, on the people's part, than on that of the king; for much leſs ſatisfaction was expreſſed, on the days either of the king's entry, or coronation. This was an evident proof of the people's affection for the houſe of York, and eſpecially for the family of Edward IV; but this was not to be conſidered, as extremely ſurpriſing. The houſe of Lancaſter, of which there remained no branch, except what was deſcended from the daughters, had been forgotten, during the reigns of the kings of the houſe of York; and, tho' Henry reſted upon his deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter, he was known to be grandſon to a Welch gentleman, and his mother to be ſprung only from a baſtard of that houſe, whom the credit of his father, and the circumſtances of the times, had cauſed to be legitimated; and, as to the princes and princeſſes, the poſterity of the lawful daughters of John of Gaunt, as they happened to be in Portugal, Caſtile, and Arragon, and were unknown in England, it was no wonder, that there was no great inclination for them. Henry diſliked the people's joy for his marriage; for he perceived, that Eliſabeth had a greater ſhare in it than himſelf; and that, of courſe, he was thought really king, only in right of his queen. This conſideration inſpired him with ſuch a coldneſs for her, that he inceſſantly gave her proofs of it, to the day of her death; and he deferred her coronation, two whole years, and, doubtleſs, would have done ſo, for ever, if he had not believed it would be prejudicial to him, to perſiſt in refuſing her that honour; nay, perhaps, he would have treated her, as Edward the Confeſſor had formerly done his queen, daughter to earl Goodwin, had not the deſire of children induced him to overcome his averſion. He had conceived ſuch a mortal hatred to the whole houſe of York, that, on all occaſions, he humbled the Yorkiſts, behaving always towards them, not as a juſt king, but as the head of a party; and, in the courſe of his Hiſtory, will be ſeen ſeveral inſtances of his averſion to that family. 1486.

The king's coldneſs for the queen.

A three years truce with France. Act. Pub.

The day before the king's marriage was celebrated, at London, his envoy, at Paris, had concluded with the court of France a three years truce, till the 17th of January, 1488-9; to which Charles VIII, who began to form projects againſt Bretagne, readily conſented, to hinder the king of England from aſſiſting that dukedom; and, on the other hand, Henry, a ſtranger to his deſigns, believed it muſt, of courſe, be for his advantage to live in a good underſtanding with that monarch, as it would render him more formidable to his domeſtick enemies, who could no longer expect any diverſion from France.

The earl of Derby is made high-conſtable. Act. Pub.

Shortly after, the king made Thomas Stanley, earl of Derby, high-conſtable, and William Stanley, his brother, lord chamberlain; to whom, of all the kingdom, he was under the greateſt obligations, ſince they enabled him to gain the victory of Boſworth, which procured him the crown; and the lord D'Aubeney was appointed governor of Calais, for ſeven years.

A diſpenſation for the king's marriage. March 10. Act. Pub.

Henry and Eliſabeth, being both deſcended from Edward III, had wanted a diſpenſation to marry, becauſe they were couſins, in the fourth degree; and the biſhop of Imola, legate a Latere, in England and Scotland, had granted the diſpenſation, by vertue of his commiſſion, which impowered him to grant that favour to any 12 perſons he pleaſed. The king, at firſt, believed, that this diſpenſation was ſufficient, and, accordingly, conſummated his marriage; but he, afterwards, apprehended, that occaſion might be taken, from hence, to queſtion the validity of his marriage, and to maintain, that a power, for 12 perſons, in general, could not be extended to ſovereigns. To prevent, therefore, any ſuch objection, he deſired Innocent VIII, then pope,

1486. pope, to grant him a diſpenſation, immediately from himſelf, and peculiarly adapted to his caſe; upon which, his holineſs ordered a bull to be drawn; but, as it was dated, March the 13th, about two months after the marriage, and did not mention the conſummation, or the legate's diſpenſation, Henry deſired another, with theſe two articles inſerted, which was granted him, the July following. This ſhews, how careful he was, to guard againſt whatever might afford his enemies a pretence to diſturb him; but another precaution he took, at the ſame time, is ſtill a more evident proof of this point.

The bull confirming the act of ſettlement. March 27. Act. Pub.

With the firſt diſpenſation he received a bull, ratifying the act of ſucceſſion made by the parliament; in which the pope declared, "He had heard, that, tho' the crown of "England fell to Henry, not only by con-"queſt and an indiſputable hereditary right, "but alſo by the unanimous conſent of the no-"bility and people, and by an act of parlia-"ment; and tho', doubtleſs, and of right, "it belonged to him and the heirs of his bo-"dy; yet, to put an end to the troubles which "had long diſtracted the kingdom, he was "deſirous to marry Eliſabeth of York, eldeſt "daughter and heir of king Edward IV, of "glorious memory: That, therefore, hav-"ing conſidered, with his brothers, the car-"dinals, his intent, in the ſpirit of charity, "he had granted the diſpenſation neceſſary "for the marriage, and pronounced the chil-"dren, that ſhould iſſue from it, legitimate, "and capable of ſucceeding to their father "and mother: That he had granted this fa-"vour, not at the requeſt of Henry, or Eli-"ſabeth, or any other in their name, but of "his own accord, certain knowledge, and "pure generoſity, as it was more copiouſly "expreſſed in the letters of diſpenſation, to "which he gave the ſame force, as if they "were inſerted, verbatim, in theſe preſents; "and that, therefore, he decreed, declared, "and pronounced legitimate the ſucceſſion of "the children born of this marriage, and con-"firmed the act of parliament about king "Henry's title, and the ſucceſſion of his "children, ſupplying, by his apoſtolical au-"thority, all defects of right, or fact, that "might therein occur.

"That, of his own motion, and by his au-"thority, he admoniſhed and charged all the "people of England, and all king Henry's "ſubjects, of what rank ſoever, to obey that "prince, and expreſly prohibited them to raiſe "diſturbances concerning the ſucceſſion, or "on any other account whatſoever, or to in-"fringe, in any manner, the diſpenſation, "declaration, and act of parliament.

"Beſides, he commanded all archbiſhops, "biſhops, abbots, deans, archdeacons, curates, "rectors, priors, and ſuperiors of monaſteries, "upon the penalties expreſſed in the holy "canons, to excommunicate publickly, and "to pronounce excommunicate, whenever "they were enjoined, all perſons that ſhould "create any diſturbances, on that account, or, "in any manner, oppoſe the execution of the "ſaid acts, notwithſtanding all the conſtitu-"tions and ordinances apoſtolical, to the "contrary, &c."

Remarks on the bull.

Nothing more fully demonſtrates, how much Henry was convinced of the weakneſs of his title, than his procuring the pope's confirmation; for this precaution was not only unneceſſary, but even unlawful, ſince it directly contradicted the ſtatute of Præmunire, for which the Engliſh had ſuch a tender regard. Accordingly, he took care to have it ſaid, in the bull, that the pope granted the diſpenſation, of his own motion, and without any previous requeſt; a clauſe manifeſtly falſe; for it is certain, that the bull of diſpenſation ran, in expreſs terms, that the pope granted it, upon the repreſentations made to him by Henry and Eliſabeth. Moreover, what the pope affirmed, that the crown of England fell to Henry, by hereditary right, with that confuſed heap of other titles, viz. the conſent of the nobility and people, the act of parliament, and the king's marriage with Eliſabeth; all this, I ſay, correſponded ſo preciſely with Henry's uncertainty about his title, that, doubtleſs, it did not proceed from the pope's own knowledge, but rather from the king himſelf, who had, as it were, dictated, how the bull ſhould be worded. In fine, the pope would never have dreamt of confirming the act of ſettlement, if he had not been requeſted; but it was inconvenient, that the king ſhould appear to have deſired ſuch a bull, ſince nothing could be more diſagreeable to the Engliſh. King John, by taking ſuch a ſtep, even before the ſtatute of Præmunire was enacted, entirely loſt the love and confidence of his barons, with the crown which he intended to ſecure, by that expedient; and Henry III. had like to have been expoſed to the ſame fate, for the like precautions. Accordingly, the ſequel will ſhew, that this bull could not prevent the king's being frequently moleſted; for the Engliſh were not, as formerly, ſuch bigots, as to imagine, that the papal authority could give Henry a title which he really wanted.

The king's uneaſineſs, with regard to the houſe of York.

Tho' the king had fortunately attained his ends, with reſpect to the act of ſettlement and ſucceſſion; yet the proceedings of the parliament contradicted the ſentiments of the people; for Bacon.

1486. for he had been invited into England, to deliver the kingdom from the tyranny of Richard III, and not wholly to diſpoſſeſs the houſe of York; and, indeed, if the Yorkiſts had not joined with him, in order to preſerve the crown, in that houſe, by means of his marriage with Eliſabeth, the Lancaſtrians would never have been able to raiſe him to the throne. The queen, widow to Edward IV, the duke of Buckingham, and the lord Stanley were not attached to the houſe of Lancaſter, tho' ſecret enemies to the perſon of Richard; and yet to theſe Henry was principally indebted, for his greatneſs; and, if the people had been, conſulted, and at liberty to elect a ſovereign, tho' Richard would have been dethroned Eliſabeth would have been placed on the throne, and the earl of Richmond left in his exile, in Bretagne. Henry, therefore, was only conſidered, as the inſtrument of their deliverance from the dominion of a tyrant; but, as it was reaſonable to reward him, the giving him a ſhare of the regal dignity, by his marriage with the princeſs Eliſabeth, was thought an ample recompence; and, if it was readily agreed, that his right from the houſe of Lancaſter ſhould be united with Eliſabeth's, it was rather to avoid freſh troubles, than from a belief of the lawfulneſs of his title. He had himſelf joyfully accepted the propoſal, upon which foundation he formed his enterprize; otherwiſe he would have, doubtleſs, met with leſs aſſiſtance, and much greater oppoſition; but he had no ſooner gained the battle of Boſworth, than he reſolved to reign, in his own right only, and exclude the houſe of York, in which he defeated the expectations of the Engliſh, and abuſed their confidence; and this is what continually employed his thoughts, tho' he concealed his uneaſineſs, with all poſſible diligence.

The king's progreſs into the north. Hall.

As the houſe of York had moſt adherents, in the northern counties, Henry determined to take a progreſs into thoſe parts; hoping that his preſence, with ſome acts of grace and favour he might have an opportunity to diſpenſe, would produce a good effect; and, with this view, he departed, towards the middle of the ſpring, and kept his Eaſter, at Lincoln. Before he left that city, he heard, that the lord Lovel, one of Richard III's favourites, with Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, brothers, who refuſed to accept of the general pardon, had quitted their ſanctuary, tho' he could not learn their deſign; and, therefore, he continued his journey to York. Shortly after, he received more certain advice concerning the fugitives; being informed, that the lord Lovel was advancing towards York, at the head of 3 or 4000 men; and that the Staffords were in arms, in Worceſterſhire, before the city of Worceſter. This news exceedingly perplexed him; for he was in a part of the kingdom, where he knew he was not beloved, and where it would be difficult to levy forces; moreover, he had reaſons to apprehend, that the lord Lovel had correſpondents, in York, and among the nobility of the county; and conſequently that he muſt ſpeedily reſolve, either to quit York, or take ſome courſe to oppoſe the rebels. In this extremity, he choſe to ſeem unconcerned, perceiving that flight would neceſſarily prove of dangerous conſequence; wherefore, not diſcovering any ſigns of fear, he armed ſuch of his followers, as were able to carry arms, and commiſſioned ſome truſty adherents to raiſe men, in and about York, with all poſſible expedition; and he was ſo fortunate, as to aſſemble, in a ſhort time, 3000 men, of whom he gave the command to his uncle, the duke of Bedford; but theſe troops were ſo ill armed, and in ſuch diſorder, that he could not expect much ſervice from them; beſides, they were raiſed in a county, where the inhabitants were diſaffected to the king. On this account, Henry expreſly charged the duke of Bedford, to avoid fighting, if poſſible, till reinforced, but, at the ſame time, to ſhew no dread, and proclaim, in his name, pardon to all that would lay down their arms; which precaution ſucceeded to his wiſh. The duke of Bedford, approaching the male-contents, ordered the proclamation to be publiſhed, in terms importing great ſuperiority and confidence; yet it had very little effect on the rebels; but the lord Lovel, their commander, apprehenſive that they would accept of the pardon, deſerted them, firſt; and, retiring alone, he concealed himſelf, in Lancaſhire, at his friend Sir Thomas Broughton's, and, ſhortly after, paſſed into Flanders to the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy. His army, being without a leader, ſubmitted to the king; and the Staffords, who were beſieging Worceſter, being told what happened, in the north, raiſed the ſiege, and, abandoning their troops, took ſanctuary, in the church of Colnham, a ſmall village near Abingdon; but, that church enjoying no peculiar privilege, it was judged, in the king's bench, to be no ſufficient ſanctuary for traytors. Upon this, the two brothers being taken thence, by force, Humphrey, the eldeſt, was ſent to London, to be executed, at Tyburn; but Thomas, becauſe he was ſeduced by his brother, received a pardon. This rebellion, the firſt, in this reign, was, like a blaze, of a ſhort continuance; for it was quenched with the blood of a ſingle perſon; but we ſhall ſee, hereafter, others that coſt the king more, to extinguiſh the flames.

The rebellion of the lord Lovel and the two Staffords.

On the 3d of July, the Scotch ambaſſadors, who had been, ſome time, at London, concluded a truce with Henry, which was to laſt, three years. Act. Pub.

Cardinal Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury, died, about this time; and the king, intending to procure the archbiſhoprick for Dr. Moreton, biſhop of Ely, entruſted him with the cuſtody, during the vacancy, that no other biſhop might make intereſt, for the nomination. Accordingly, Moreton was elected, ſome time after; but he had not the pope's bulls, till December. The death of cardinal Bourchier; Moreton ſucceeds him. Act. Pub.

July the 22d, John de Bouteillier, lord de Maupertuis, ambaſſador of Francis II, duke of Bretagne, concluded, at London, with the king, a truce, or rather a prolongation of the truce, 1486. truce, ſubſiſting between England and Bretagne, till the death of one of the two princes; but the trade, between the two nations, ſettled by ſeveral articles of this treaty, was to continue, till the death of the ſurvivor.

The birth of prince Arthur.

September the 20th, the queen was delivered of a prince, tho' ſhe had been, but eight months, with child; and the king called the new-born prince Arthur, in memory of the renowned Britiſh monarch; but, the family of the Tudors being Britiſh or Welch, it was not improbable, that Henry, by naming his ſon Arthur, deſigned to inſinuate his being deſcended from that illuſtrious monarch. However, it is certain, that this report was not ſpread, nor were genealogies forged, to confirm it, till after the time we are ſpeaking of; for thoſe who ruled the ſtate, during Henry VI's minority, were very far from this opinion, ſince, after the deceaſe of Catharine of France, the prince's mother, they ſent Owen Tudor, grandfather of Henry VII, to the tower, for preſuming to marry the queen; nay, according to ſome, he was beheaded.

The murmurs of the people.

The king's proceedings, to deprive the houſe of York of their rights, had extremely diſguſted the people, who were deceived in their expectations; for they, who had called in Henry, had entertained hopes, that, the titles of the two houſes being confounded by his marriage with Eliſabeth, there would be no more diſtinction between Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians, but all might equally expect the places, in the king's diſpoſal. Theſe hopes were farther confirmed by the birth of prince Arthur, in whom were united the rights of the two contending houſes; but it was obſerved, with the greateſt concern, that the king ſtill conſidered the houſe of York, as rivals and enemies, and that his jealouſy extended to the queen, whoſe intereſt ſhould have been as dear to him as his own; for, not ſatisfied with ſhewing, by his continual coldneſs, and ſeveral mortifications, the little kindneſs he had for her, he had given her a very convincing proof of it, in deferring her coronation, as if ſhe had been unworthy to ſhare in his royalty; nay, after ſhe had brought him a ſon, her coronation was no more talked of, than upon their firſt marriage. This conduct evidently proved, that the houſe of York was ſtill odious to him, and that he dreaded to take any ſtep which might give the people occaſion to believe, that ſhe had ſome right to the crown; and it was impoſſible but this affectation ſhould greatly trouble the Yorkiſts, who were much more numerous than the Lancaſtrians.

It is rumoured, that the king deſigned to put Warwick to death; Bacon. Hall. and that one of Edward's ſons was alive.

This diſcontent being almoſt univerſal, ſome malicious perſons ſpread a rumour, that the king intended to take away the life of the earl of Warwick, a priſoner in the tower, and the ſole male of the houſe of York; and, doubtleſs, their view was to compare Henry with Richard III, who had put to death his two nephews, to ſecure the crown, and intimate to the people, that, in changing kings, they had only received one tyrant, for another; moreover, it was publickly rumoured, that one of Edward IV's ſons was ſtill alive, having, as it were miraculouſly, eſcaped his uncle's cruelty. All this manifeſtly tended to ſound the people's inclinations; and the king himſelf, whether he was the author of this report, as his hiſtorian affirms, or only fomented it by his carriage, was not ſorry, that the people ran after a phantom, becauſe it prevented them from too firmly adhering to the perſons of the houſe of York, which really exiſted; but, in the interim, as the eagerneſs, with which the people ſwallowed this falſe rumour, was a clear evidence, how ready they would be, at a favourable juncture, to liſt againſt the king, ſo it occaſioned the following project. 1486.

The project of a prieſt.

A certain Oxford-prieſt, Richard Simon, perceiving the people's joy, at the fictitious report of one of Edward IV's ſons being alive, reſolved to put upon the world, for Richard, duke of York, brother to Edward V, a young man, called Lambert Simnel, a baker's ſon, whom he trained up, in his houſe, and thought a proper perſon to act ſuch a part; for he was about the duke of York's age, of good natural parts, and, in his whole behaviour, had ſomething grand, and above his extraction. Simon had ſcarce begun to inſtruct his pupil, when another rumour was ſpread, that the earl of Warwick had made his eſcape out of the tower; which news, tho' falſe, cauſed among the people ſo general a joy, that the prieſt judged it more adviſable to make Simnel paſs, for the earl of Warwick; for Simnel's age was more agreeable to the earl's, and the circumſtance of his eſcape was ſuitable to the plot; and his pupil ſtood in need of particular inſtructions, for this purpoſe, ſince he was not to perſonate a young man taken out of his cradle, in his infancy, and concealed in ſome obſcure retreat, but a prince well known, and brought up in the court of Edward IV. The earl was about 12 years old, when impriſoned by Richard III; wherefore, Simnel was to learn to talk pertinently of Edward's court, and to have a thorough knowledge of the lords and ladies that frequented it, as well as the king and queen; which renders it probable, that the prieſt was himſelf inſtructed by perſons well informed, and the plot ſuggeſted to him; for, tho' he had the aſſurance to form ſuch a deſign, it is unlikely, that he could inſtruct his pupil, in many neceſſary particulars; at leaſt, it is certain the king imagined, that the queen, his mother-in-law, and other friends of the houſe of York were the real authors of this contrivance, and only employed the prieſt, as an inſtrument, to execute their deſigns. The queen dowager was extremely intriguing; who ſet on foot the project, in behalf of the king, when in Bretagne, and ſo ſhewed her credit with the Yorkiſts; moreover, ſhe could not but be very highly diſpleaſed with the king's coldneſs to her daughter, and his refuſing to have her crowned; which alone was ſufficient to induce the king to ſuſpect her; but, poſſibly, there was more than bare ſuſpicions.

A prieſt makes Simnel paſs for the earl of Warwick.

1486. The prieſt carries Simnel into Ireland.

However this be, Simon, or thoſe that employed him, judging it improper to produce Simnel, firſt, in England, where he might be examined too cloſely, and by perſons too knowing, thought it convenient, that he ſhould act his firſt ſcene, in Ireland, where Simon the prieſt accompanied him; and, in all probability, ſome meaſures had been taken for his reception, in that iſland; for Henry, ſince his acceſſion to the crown, had extremely neglected the affairs of that country, fancying that, as he was maſter, in England, the Iriſh were not to be feared. Indeed, he made the duke of Bedford governor of Ireland, in the room of the earl of Lincoln, nephew to Richard III; but he continued the ſame deputy and chancellor, and all the reſt of the officers placed there by Richard; ſo that, the duke of Bedford being ſtill, in England, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, earl of Kildare, acted, in Ireland, as deputy, and his brother was chancellor. Bacon.

Simnel is received and proclaimed king.

It is more than probable, that the the earl of Kildare was concerned in the plot, and had even concerted meaſures, to cauſe Lambert Simnel, the pretended earl of Warwick, to be owned, in Ireland; for, ever ſince laſt June, Henry had received intelligence, that ſomething was contriving againſt his ſervice, in that country, tho' he was ignorant of the particulars; and, upon this information, he ſent for the deputy to court; but, at the earl's inſtigation, the council of Ireland wrote to the king, that the deputy's preſence was abſolutely neceſſary, in the iſland. Simnel, upon his arrival at Dublin, addreſſed himſelf to the earl of Kildare, as earl of Warwick, and acquainted him, how he eſcaped out of the tower; but, if the earl of Kildare had not been in the plot, or, at leaſt, wiſhed the affair to be, as Simnel related it, he would, doubtleſs, have ſeized the pretender. This was his duty, as he commanded, in the name of the king; but he left him at liberty, and ſo managed, with his brother the chancellor's aſſiſtance, that the arrival of the pretended earl of Warwick was divulged, without their appearing to be concerned. They were willing, firſt, to ſee, how the people reliſhed the news; but the impreſſion it made was as great and ſudden, as the authors of the plot could have deſired; for it was no ſooner known, in Dublin, that the earl of Warwick was arrived, than the people were tranſported with joy, inſomuch, that the deputy and chancellor concluded, that there was no danger, in owning the pretender. Accordingly, after a conference with their friends and confidents, they ſolemnly waited upon him, at his lodging, and conducted him, in a very pompous manner, to the caſtle, where he was treated, like a prince; and Simnel received the reſpect that was paid him, with a countenance and carriage vaſtly exceeding the meanneſs of his extraction. In a few days, he was proclaimed, in Dublin, king of England, and lord of Ireland, by the name of Edward VI; for the Iriſh overlooked the attainder of the duke of Clarence, his pretended father, having lately learnt, by the example of Henry himſelf, that the advancement to the throne removes all defects. Hall.

1486. The king is embarraſſed. Hall. Bacon.

The news of this unexpected event gave the king the greateſt uneaſineſs, becauſe it ſtruck upon that ſtring, which he ever moſt dreaded; viz. his title, of the goodneſs of which he was not himſelf thoroughly convinced. Indeed, the victory at Boſworth had enabled him to decide the queſtion, in his own favour; but he very well knew, that, if the titles of the two houſes came, once more, to be put in competition, he ſhould want a ſecond victory to confirm his, and the houſe of York would have reaſons more than ſufficient, in a time of proſperity. In the next place, Ireland, where the pretended earl of Warwick was retired, was a country entirely devoted to the houſe of York; and conſequently, to attack the rebels, it would be neceſſary to lead thither a powerful army, which could not be done, without an immenſe charge; and, in fine, it was to be feared, that the flames, which broke out, in Ireland, would reach England, and that there was a ſecret correſpondence between the Iriſh and Engliſh. In this perplexity, he called a council of his moſt intimate friends, ſecretly to conſult with them, about proper meaſures, in the preſent emergency; and it is to be preſumed he told them, that the queen dowager, his mother-in-law, had raiſed this ſtorm, whether he had any proof, or it was only an imaginary ſuſpicion.

A ſecret council. Hall. Bacon.

Henry confines his mother-in-law to a monaſtery, and ſeizes her eſtate.

However this be, preſently after holding this council, he confined his mother-in-law in the nunnery of Bermondſey, in Southwark; and he likewiſe ſeized all her eſtate, which was very conſiderable; but, as he was unwilling to diſcover to the publick the reaſon of this rigorous uſage, for want of ſufficient evidence, he cauſed it to be reported, that ſhe was, thus, puniſhed, for delivering up the princeſſes, her daughters, to Richard III; but this pretence rendered his action ſtill more enormous, with the people. They could not avoid thinking it very ſurpriſing, that the queen dowager ſhould be ſo ſeverely treated for a fault, which might rather be accounted a weakneſs, than a premeditated malice; ſecondly, it could not be imagined, why the king had ſo long neglected to inquire into this pretended crime; thirdly, in marrying her daughter, he ſeemed to have owned, that ſhe was innocent, or, at leaſt, had forgiven her; and, laſtly, as it was notorious, that ſhe had been one of the chief inſtruments of his advancement to the throne, they abhorred his ingratitude. This ſevere treatment was taken to be a manifeſt indication of a ſettled deſign, by all poſſible pretences, to compleat the ruin of the houſe of York, and its adherents; and it was not only compaſſion for the queen's ſufferings, that occaſioned theſe reflections; but her example ſtruck a terror into all the kingdom. Moſt of the families, in England, had either aſſiſted Richard III, or, at leaſt, not oppoſed him; and, therefore, when it was conſidered, that the king's mother-in-law was reduced to this wretched condition, for not having been able, or willing, to reſiſt the tyranny of the late king, every one was in dread of being puniſhed, for the like crimes, 1486. crimes, which were ſuppoſed to be buried in oblivion; however, the queen dowager was kept in confinement, to the day of her death, which did not fall out, till after the courſe of ſome years. 1486.

The earl of Warwick is ſhewn in publick.

It was, at firſt, believed, that the queen dowager's misfortune was a puniſhment of the crime charged upon her by the king; but it was ſoon perceived to be an effect of the decrees of the ſecret council, held upon Simnel's affair. Shortly after, purſuant to another decree of the ſame council, the king ordered the true earl of Warwick to be ſhewn, in publick, who was led through the main Streets of London, and then conducted, in a ſolemn proceſſion, to St. Paul's, where multitudes flocked to ſee him; and, there, all had leiſure to view him attentively; nay, he was made to talk with thoſe that knew him beſt, and eſpecially with ſuch as were well affected to the houſe of York; after which, he was again conveighed to the tower. Nevertheleſs, the Iriſh maintained, that this earl of Warwick ſhewn in London, was an impoſture, and theirs, at Dublin, the true earl; and they even exclaimed againſt the king, for proſtituting the ceremony of a proceſſion to ſuch an impoſture. Henry, apprehenſive that the miſchief would gain ground, in order to ſtop it, proclaimed a general pardon to all that ſhould abandon the rebels, and promiſed a reward to thoſe who ſhould diſcover the ſecret of the plot; and, at the ſame time, he iſſued out orders to guard the ports, that the Engliſh male-contents might not paſs over, and join their friends, in Ireland; but all this was incapable of diſconcerting the meaſures of his enemies.

Bacon.

The earl of Lincoln goes over to the dutcheſs of Burgundy.

It was not only, in Ireland, that troubles were preparing for the king; for the readineſs, with which ſome Engliſh lords and gentlemen embraced this opportunity, to promote his ruin, evidently demonſtrated, that the conſpiracy had been formed, ſome time before, in England; indeed, it is unlikely, that a ſingle prieſt ſhould have contrived ſuch a project, without imparting it to perſons more able than himſelf to put it in execution. However this be, John, earl of Lincoln, declared, by Richard III, his uncle, heir apparent of the crown, was the firſt that openly eſpouſed the cauſe of the pretended earl of Warwick. He was ſon to John de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and and Eliſabeth ſiſter to Edward IV. and Richard III; yet this earl ſeemed to act contrary to his own intereſt, in taking part with the earl of Warwick, who was nearer the throne than himſelf; but, as, probably, he knew, that the perſon, in Ireland, was an impoſtor, he did not doubt, that he ſhould eaſily deſtroy him, when he ſerved his turn, in dethroning Henry; wherefore, upon the firſt news of Simnel's being proclaimed king, at Dublin, he embarqued for Flanders, to project, with the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, the means to execute this deſign.

Since the death of Charles, duke of Burgundy, Margaret of York, his widow, ſiſter to Edward IV. and Richard III, her dowry being aſſigned her, in Flanders, kept her reſidence there; and, as ſhe had no iſſue by the duke, her husband, ſhe diligently attended the education of the archduke Philip, ſon to Maximilian of Auſtria and Maria of Burgundy. She had, with extreme concern, ſeen the reſtoration of the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne, in prejudice of that of York; yet ſhe would not have been impatient, if Henry VII, in uniting the two houſes, by his marriage with Eliſabeth, had diſpenſed his favours impartially to the friends of both parties; but ſhe altered her ſentiments, when ſhe found that Henry deferred marrying her niece, till the crown was adjudged to himſelf, without any mixture of the title of the houſe of York. She could not perceive, without uneaſineſs, that, even after his marriage, he refuſed to let Eliſabeth be crowned, an honour that had been denied to no queen of England, ſince the conqueſt; and that the birth of a ſon had not induced him to do her that juſtice; wherefore, being convinced, that his hatred of the whole houſe of York was implacable, ſhe did not ſcruple to labour his deſtruction. Indeed, it is uncertain, whether this princeſs engaged in the prieſt's and Simnel's plot, before Ireland declared, in his favour; yet it is highly probable, that ſhe aſſiſted in the management of it, together with the queen dowager, the earl of Lincoln, and ſome other adherents of the houſe of York; for the earl of Lincoln's voyage snto Flanders, upon the firſt news of Simnel's arrival in Ireland, affords occaſion to preſume, that he concerted meaſures with the ducheſs of Burgundy, and from her expected the ſucceſs of the undertaking; and the lord Lovel, who was in Flanders before him, was alſo concerned in the plot, as well as Sir Thomas Broughton, who continued in England, to ſend them intelligence of what was tranſacting in that kingdom.

She promiſes to aſſiſt the earl of Lincoln. Hall. Bacon.

Whether the ducheſs of Burgundy contrived this plot herſelf, or was only acquainted with it by the earl of Lincoln, ſhe readily embraced this opportunity, which ſhe apprehended to be ſufficient to inſpire her with hopes of defeating Henry's eſtabliſhment; and, having adviſed with the earl Lincoln, lord Lovel, and ſome other fugitives, ſhe promiſed to ſupply them with 2000 veteran German ſoldiers, under the command of Martin Swart, a noted officer, with whom they ſhould paſs into Ireland, to reinforce the new king's party, not, in the leaſt, doubting but theſe ſuccours, coming from a foreign country, would encourage the Yorkiſts to take up arms, in England. In this ſituation were the king's affairs, about the end of 1486; but, before we proceed to the occurrences of the following year, we muſt briefly relate what paſſed, in the neighbouring countries, eſpecially in France and Bretagne, during the courſe of this year.

The affairs of Bretagne. Argentre.

I left the duke of Orleance in Bretagne, with the prince of Orange and the earl of Dunois; and theſe princes were no ſooner in that country, than they were joined by many of their friends, who even brought them ſome troops. The duke of Bretagne was old and 1486. infirm, both in body and mind; and, ſince the death of Landais, he was at a loſs whom he ſhould entruſt with the adminiſtration of his affairs, believing his barons to be ſo many enemies, tho' he had granted them a pardon. The duke of Orleans, ſeeing him, thus, embarraſſed, gained ſuch an influence over him, that he ruled Bretagne, as if he had been the ſovereign; and, as almoſt every thing was in his diſpoſal, he drew thither many Frenchmen, who came to offer him their ſervice. In the interim, the duke of Bretagne convened the ſtates, and cauſed his eldeſt daughter, Ann, to be declared heireſs of the duchy; and, provided ſhe died, without iſſue, it was decreed, that her younger ſiſter, Iſabel, ſhould ſucceed her.

The lords of Bretagne, lately reconciled to their ſovereign, finding that the duke of Orleans governed abſolutely, in the name of the duke, and that the French reſorted to him, in crowds, began to entertain ſuſpicions of their prince; for they were apprehenſive, that he had ſent for all theſe ſtrangers, to help him to be revenged on them, for their outrage upon his favourite; and, therefore, they aſſembled, at Chateaubriant, to conſult about proper means, to prevent the impending danger, being headed by the lord of Rieux, marſhal of Bretagne. Charles VIII, fearing that the duke of Orleans deſigned to make uſe of the duke of Bretagne's forces, to raiſe freſh commotions in France, judged it his intereſt to cheriſh the diſcontent of the Britiſh lords; for he expected, that this would hinder the duke of Bretagne from aſſiſting the duke of Orleans; and, with that view, he ſent to the barons met, at Chateaubriant, Andrew d' Epinay, commonly ſtiled the cardinal of Bourdeaux, with an offer of his protection. The propoſal was gladly accepted by many of them; ſome of whom, perhaps, were already gained by the court of France. Others, foreſeeing the conſequences, rejected it; alledging the ſeveral attempts of Charles's predeceſſors, to become maſters of Bretagne, and how dangerous it was to admit the French into the country; and, in fine, it was reſolved, that a treaty ſhould be made with the king of France, to determine the number of men he was to find them, and to preſcribe bounds to his pretenſions. Accordingly, they ſigned with the cardinal a treaty, importing, that the king ſhould ſend them no more than 400 lances, and 4000 foot; and that he ſhould not take, or beſiege any place, nor make any demands upon the duchy, before duke Francis's death. Charles ratified this treaty; but, as it afterwards appeared, not with an intent to obſerve it.

The cardinal of Bourdeaux, returning to the king, told him, that, before he left Chateaubriant, he had learnt, that the prince of Orange was ſecretly negotiating a marriage between Maximilian of Auſtria, and Ann, eldeſt daughter and heireſs to the duke of Bretagne; which diſcovery obliged king Charles to form the project of ſeizing Bretagne, if, perhaps, it was not already projected. The ſituation of the affairs of Europe was extremely favourable; for Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Arragon and Caſtile, did not much regard the preſervation of Bretagne; and, beſides, they were then employed in their wars with the Moors of Granada. But, tho' Charles might have feared, that Ferdinand would engage in ſome league, for the duke of Bretagne's defence, he had an infallible expedient to prevent him; namely, to reſtore him Rouſſillon, which was of far leſs conſequence, than Bretagne, to the crown of France. Henry VII, whoſe intereſt it evidently was to oppoſe this enterprize, was perplexed with affairs that, probably, would not allow him leiſure to concern himſelf with thoſe of others; for it was preciſely at the time, when the pretended earl of Warwick firſt appeared, in Ireland. As for the Low-Countries, Charles had not much to fear from that quarter; for Philip, the ſovereign, was ſtill a minor; and Maximilian, his father and guardian, who governed theſe provinces, in his name, was but little reſpected. Tho' he had made peace with the Flemings, there was a mutual diffidence, which would not ſuffer him to ſend his forces out of the country; moreover, the war with France was renewed, this year, upon Terouenne's being ſurpriſed, in full peace, by the governor of Douay; and, in a word, tho' Maximilian was the emperor's ſon, and elected king of the Romans, in February, he was ever in extreme want of money, his new dignity having made no addition to his power. 1486.

1487. In the beginning of the year 1487, Henry concluded with Maximilian a treaty entirely relating to trade; but it was only proviſional, till certain articles could be ſettled, about which the Engliſh and Flemings did not eaſily come to an agreement. The trade between England and the Low-Countries was ſo neceſſary, that it could not be interrupted, without greatly prejudicing the ſubjects of both princes; and, therefore, each of them ſtrove to reap ſome advantage, from the poſture of affairs, which rendered the treaties extremely difficult.

A treaty of commerce with the Low-Countries. Jan. 2. Act. Pub.

The biſhop of Exeter being tranſlated to Wincheſter, the king placed in his room Richard Fox, who was already keeper of the privy ſeal; and, of all the courtiers, he was the king's greateſt confident, next to the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Fox is made biſhop of Exeter.

In the interim, Henry was uneaſy, ſince the earl of Lincoln's retiring into Flanders; for he knew the ducheſs of Burgundy to be haughty, enterpriſing *, and in a condition to aſſiſt ſuch, as would attempt to diſturb him. The earl of Lincoln's retreat into Flanders, preſently after Simnel's arrival in Ireland, fully convinced him, that a deſign was formed, between that lord and the ducheſs of Burgundy, to ſupport the pretended earl of Warwick; and, therefore, leſt the ſtorm ſhould fall upon him, both from Flanders and Ireland, he reſolved to have two armies, under the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford, to be in readineſs, at the ſame time, to oppoſe the deſcent of the Flemings and Iriſh, if

In the mean while, as he was not afraid of an invaſion, before ſummer, he determined, during the winter ſeaſon, to take a progreſs into the eaſtern counties of Suffolk and Norfolk; from which parts there was the greateſt danger, becauſe of the neighbourhood of the Low-Countries. When he arrived, at St. Edmundsbury, he heard, that the marqueſs of Dorſet was haſtening, to clear himſelf of ſome accuſations againſt him, and to offer his ſervice; but the king, concluding that, after his late treatment of the queen dowager, the marqueſs, her brother, could have no great affection for him, refuſed his offer, and diſpatched the earl of Oxford to meet him, with orders to carry him to the tower. However, he gave him to underſtand, that, after the troubles were appeaſed, he ſhould willingly hear him; and that his whole deſign, in arreſting him, was to provide for his own ſafety, by preventing his being corrupted by evil counſels. Then he proceeded to Norwich, from whence he went in pilgrimage to our Lady of Walſingham *, and, after this, he returned to London.

Simnel is crowned at Dublin. J. Ware.

It was not till the beginning of May, that the earl of Lincoln, the lord Lovel, and Martin Swart embarqued for Ireland, with 2000 Germans raiſed by the ducheſs of Burgundy, at her own charge; and, ſoon after their arrival at Dublin, they put the crown on the head of the pretended king. The ceremony of the coronation was performed, with great ſolemnity, in the preſence of the earl of Kildare, the chancellor, and the reſt of the great officers; and he was crowned with a crown taken from the head of the virgin's ſtatue, in St. Mary's church; but two or three biſhops refuſed to own the new king. The Hiſtory of Ireland affirms, that the pretended ſovereign ſummoned a kind of parliament; in which the clergy granted the pope a ſubſidy, leſt the court of Rome ſhould take occaſion, from theſe proceedings, to moleſt them.

He reſolves to paſs into England. Bacon.

The coronation being over, a great council was called, to conſult about proper meaſures; and their ſucceſs, in Ireland, where not ſo much as a ſword was drawn for Henry, induced them to expect great matters, in England. The leaders imagined, that they were in a far better condition to overthrow Henry, than Henry himſelf was, when he paſſed into England, to overthrow Richard III; and they did not doubt of proving ſucceſsful, being confident that the Engliſh, for the moſt part, would riſe, in their favour. However, ſome propoſed the making Ireland the ſeat of the war; alledging, as the principal reaſon, that Henry would never venture to come over, in perſon, or, that, if he quitted England, his abſence would occaſion, in the kingdom, inſurrections which would exceedingly promote the affairs of the new king. Had this advice been taken, Henry would have been extremely embarraſſed; for, in that caſe, he muſt have had two powerful armies on foot, one to ſubdue Ireland, and another to maintain tranquillity, in England. It is obvious, that, at ſuch a juncture, it would have been imprudent to leave England, without troops, both on account of the correſpondents, the rebels might have in that kingdom, and the neighbourhood of the ducheſs of Burgundy, who would have improved ſuch a neglect; and, accordingly, Henry, as I obſerved, had already reſolved to have two armies. But others, on the contrary, repreſented, that Ireland was unable to pay the German troops, much leſs ſupport a long war; moreover, that the ſtanding upon the defenſive, in Ireland, was not the way to dethrone Henry, but the attacking him, in England, where, it was probable, they ſhould meet with many friends; and this advice was enforced by another reaſon, which, tho' not alledged, was the real motive of it, viz. that the Germans and Iriſh hoped to make their fortunes, in England, whereas, in Ireland, they had ſcarce what was ſufficient for their ſubſiſtence; wherefore, it was reſolved to paſs immediately into England, in the ſame veſſels that had tranſported the Germans. In the interim, Henry, hearing of the earl of Lincoln's arrival in Ireland, with the foreign troops, was no longer embarraſſed, when he found that he ſhould only be attacked from one quarter; wherefore, giving orders, that all his forces ſhould aſſemble, near Coventry, he repaired, in perſon, to that city, which lies in the center of the kingdom, till he had certain intelligence of the deſigns of his enemies.

Simnel arrives in England.

Some time after, he heard that Simnel was landed, in Lancaſhire, accompanied by the earls of Lincoln and Kildare, the lord Lovel, and the German general; and, Sir Thomas Broughton joining the rebels, with a ſmall body of Engliſh, they all marched together towards York, ſtudiouſly refraining from any any act of hoſtility, in their rout, to gain the people to their intereſt; but not a man, except thoſe Broughton had brought, took up arms, in their favour, the Engliſh diſliking to receive a king at the hands of the Iriſh and Germans. The earl of Lincoln, who commanded the army, had reſolved to avoid fighting, in hopes of being reinforced by great numbers of male-contents; but, perceiving the people's coldneſs, he judged it adviſable to come to a battle, as ſoon as poſſible, leſt his army, which was only 8000 ſtrong, ſhould diminiſh, inſtead of increaſing; and, therefore, on a ſudden, changing his rout, he marched towards Newark, in expectation of becoming maſter of that place, before the king's arrival.

The king marches to Nottingham. Hall. Bacon.

In the interim, Henry, being advanced as far as Nottingham, held a council of war; and, as he had yet drawn together only 6000 men, ſeveral adviſed him to decline fighting, till his army was augmented by the reſt of the expected troops; but he was himſelf of a different opinion. As he could not believe, that the earl of Lincoln had formed ſuch a project, 1487. without assurances of assistance, he thought it expedient to give him battle, without delay; and, two days after, his army being reinforced with 5 or 6000 men, all the reasons, against the resolution he had taken, entirely vanished. He no sooner had reviewed these new troops, than he detached several parties of light-horse, to discover the earl of Lincoln's designs; and, hearing that he was advancing towards Newark, he resolved to prevent him. With this view, he marched, with such expedition, that he encamped, between the enemy's army and Newark; and the earl of Lincoln, advancing, that day, to a small village, called Stoke, encamped, on the side of a hill.

The battle of Stoke. June 6. Hall. Bacon. Hollingsh.

Next morning, the 6th of June, Henry offered him battle, leaving only in the plain a space, to serve for the field; but the ground, being narrow, would not permit him to extend the front of his army, which was more numerous than that of the enemy; wherefore, he was forced to draw up his army into three lines, having taken care to place, in the first, all his best troops, to the number of 6000 men. In all probability, the earl of Lincoln had designedly chosen that ground, hoping that, if he could defeat the king's first line, they would attack the rest of the army and put them in disorder, as it happened to Richard III, in the battle of Bosworth; and, in effect, it was the king's first line only that resisted the enemy. They withstood, for three hours, the efforts of the Germans, who, being accustomed to war, and well disciplined, fought, with great order, and inspired the Irish with courage; but, at length, the earls of Lincoln and Kildare and Martin Swart being slain, on the spot, and most of the Germans killed, or wounded, the Irish took to flight, not being able alone to oppose the English; and it is said, that, at least, 4000 of the rebels were killed, and half of the king's first line; which shews, that both sides fought with the greatest obstinacy and resolution.

Simnel is taken and made the king's scullion, then falconer. Hall.

Among the prisoners, were found the new king of Ireland, reduced to Lambert Simnel, as before, and the priest, his companion and instructor; but Henry, either out of generosity, or policy, was pleased to give Simnel his life, and to honour, with the office of turn-spit, in his kitchen, the person that had boldly aspired to, and even wore a crown. In process of time, he was promoted to be one of the king's falconers, in which office he died; but, as for the priest, he was, immediately, put under close confinement, and heard of no more. Some imagined, that he was secretly put to death; others, that the king spared his life, in order to learn all the circumstances of the conspiracy, and, perhaps, to confront him with the guilty, if there was occasion; yet it does not appear from History, that Henry, by this means, made any discovery; at least, nothing was divulged. If the queen dowager was concerned in the plot, she could not be treated with more severity, than she was already, unless she was brought to the scaffold; and, as to the duchess of Burgundy, she had no reason to dread any proceedings against her. It is reported, that the king was extremely sorry, for the death of the earl of Lincoln, which deprived him of the satisfaction of learning all the particulars of the plot; but, as for the lord Lovel, according to some, he was drowned, in attempting to swim the Trent; whilst others affirm, that he was slain, in the battle. Some again relate, that he spent the residue of his days, in a cave; but, however that be, he appeared no more, from that time. 1487.

Several suspected persons are fined.

Presently after the battle, the king marched to Lincoln; and, after some stay there, he went to York; but, in his way, were tried many persons accused of holding an understanding with the late rebels. Indeed, most of them were punished only by fines, the king's sole view being to fill his coffers; and, therefore, he chose rather, that these trials should be ended by commissioners appointed by himself, or by a court martial, than by the usual course of justice, which would not so effectually answer his purpose. In such accusations, the laws of England admit of no medium between death and absolute discharge, and the king would have neither; but commissioners and court martials, not being so strictly confined to the letter of the law, judge in a more arbitrary manner; wherefore, in England, the frequent incroachments of the martial law, upon the privileges of the people, has caused it to be reduced within proper bounds, so that it cannot take place, until it be authorised by an act of parliament. As for administering justice by commissioners, the king still enjoys that prerogative; but then he seldom uses it, and in certain cases only by commissions of Oyer and Terminer *; and it is certain, that Henry, upon this occasion, discovered his avaricious and selfish temper. He pretended to favour the guilty, in sparing their lives; but this clemency was more than balanced, by the loss of their possessions. They were not charged with having assisted the rebels, but with having raised and spread a report, some days before the battle, that the royal army was cut in pieces; for the king, supposing that that the sole intent of such a rumour was to discourage his friends, and prevent them from supplying him with troops, made a strict inquiry after those that were suspected of this new sort of crime. As his only design was to make an advantage of the fines and confiscations, the persons, commissioned to be judges, were less scrupulous to countenance it, than if it extended to the lives of the parties accused; and it may be naturally presumed, that the king made choice of the fittest persons to serve his turn; for his historian asserts, that Henry's progress to Lincoln and York was more like an itinerary circuit of justice, than a king's progress to visit his counties. A bull concerning ſanctuaries. Bacon.

At the ſame time, Innocent VIII. ſent a bull, to reſtrain, in ſome meaſure, the privileges of ſanctuaries; for it ran, that, if thieves, murderers, or robbers, regiſtered, as ſanctuary-men, ſhould ſally out and commit freſh crimes, and enter again, they might be forced out of their ſanctuaries by the king's officers; that, as for debtors who had taken ſanctuary, to defraud their creditors, their perſons only ſhould be protected, but their goods out of ſanctuary ſhould be liable to ſeizure; and, as to traytors, the king was allowed to appoint them keepers, in their ſanctuaries, to prevent their eſcape. Doubtleſs, it was a great abuſe, to make churches ſerve for the protection of villains; and, as this had been long complained of, in England, probably, the king had applied for a reformation; but he could only obtain the bull that we have juſt related. Alexander VI. confirmed, this bull in 1493.

The queen is crowned. Nov. 25.

In the king's progreſs to Lincoln and York, he had often occaſion to obſerve, that his partiality to the houſe of York, and injurious treatment of his queen, in refuſing to have her crowned, were the main ſprings of the diſcontent of his ſubjects; and, therefore, contrary to his inclination, purely to prevent future troubles, he reſolved, at laſt, to do her that juſtice. He returned to London, the beginning of November, where he made a triumphant entry; and, the next day, he went in proceſſion to St. Paul's, and had Te Deum ſung, for his victory over the rebels; being extremely deſirous to render it as conſpicuous, as poſſible, in order to ſtrike terror into his enemies; after which, he commiſſioned the duke of Bedford, to execute the office of high-ſteward, at the queen's coronation, which was performed, on the 25th of November, with the uſual ſolemnities. The queen was, then, 21 years old, and had been married, two years; wherefore, the king's affected delay of this ceremony was neceſſarily conſidered, as proceeding from a ſettled deſign to humble the houſe of York, and the queen, in particular; and, accordingly, as it was evidently perceived, that his reſolution to have her crowned, immediately after Simnel's affair, was the effect of his fear, he received no thanks for it, becauſe it was believed, that he did it, with reluctance. He alſo releaſed the marqueſs of Dorſet, without examination, probably, to give the people ſome ſatisfaction; and he deſigned to have it thought an act of grace, and, at the ſame time, to leave that lord under apprehenſions of being ſtill called to an account; but it is to be preſumed, that, ſince he was ſo little inclined to ſhew mercy to the Yorkiſts, he would not have diſcharged the marqueſs ſo eaſily, had he not wanted proofs to convict him.

Act. Pub.

Towards the end of this year, Henry ſent a ſolemn ambaſſy to the pope; and the ambaſſador, that was ſpokeſman, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his extravagant encomiums of the king, his maſter; which would have been thought immoderate, if they had not appeared in a different light, by his commendations of the pope.

The troubles in Scotland.

During the king's ſtay at York, after the battle of Stoke, publick commotions, in Scotland, afforded him an opportunity to enter into a negotiation with James III, from which he expected to reap ſome advantage. I have already deſcribed James's character, in the reign of Edward IV, and ſhewn, that he had rendered himſelf ſo odious to his great men, as to force them to hang his favourites; but the war made upon him by Edward IV, and his danger of being dethroned, ſeemed to have ſomewhat moderated his paſſions, or, at leaſt, obliged him to reſtrain them, more than before. However, the death of prince Alexander, his brother, and of Edward IV, and the troubles, in England, during the reign of Richard III, inducing him to believe, that he was out of danger, he returned to his former courſes; and, notwithſtanding the riſque he had run, he entirely gave himſelf up to a new ſett of favourites, men of mean extraction, and no leſs odious to the nation than the former; but this was a trifle, in compariſon of the deſign he afterwards formed. As he harboured in his breaſt a violent deſire of revenge upon the lords who had offended him, he determined to diſpatch, at once, all thoſe whom he apprehended to be his principal enemies; and, with this view, he careſſed them exceedingly, that he might more eaſily ſurpriſe them; and when, by this diſſimulation, he had drawn almoſt all of them to court, he imparted his deſign to the earl of Douglaſs, and told him, that he was reſolved to take the preſent opportunity of deſtroying, at once, all his enemies. Douglaſs pretended to approve his reſolution; but he ſecretly warned the lords of their danger, and retired with them from court. The king, being diſappointed, levied troops, in order to execute his project, by open force; but the lords likewiſe armed for their defence. As all mutual confidence was deſtroyed, and no ſtreſs could be laid on an agreement with ſuch a prince, they found means to gain his ſon, by making him apprehenſive, that they would deliver up Scotland to the king of England, if he would not appear at their head; and no ſooner had the prince joined the lords, than their party grew ſo powerful, that the king, repenting of his enterprize, propoſed an agreement; but he was aſſured, that there was no other way to a reconciliation, than his reſignation of the crown to his ſon. Upon this, all hopes of peace vaniſhing, James ſhut himſelf up, in the caſtle of Edinburgh; from whence he diſpatched ambaſſadors to the pope, and the kings of France and England, to deſire their aſſiſtance.

A treaty of Henry with the king of Scotland.

In September, whilſt Henry was at York, the ambaſſadors of Scotland came to him, under the pretence of treating of ſome differences about the fiſhery of the river Eske; but Henry, Act. Pub.

1487. ry, who had an admirable talent of turning all things to his advantage, reſolved to improve this opportunity, to be rid, at once, of the queen, his mother-in-law, and her two daughters, by marrying them, in Scotland; and, with this view, he ſent to king James Richard Fox, biſhop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgecomb, who agreed with him upon the following articles, with their maſter's pleaſure.

Several matches are agreed upon. Nov. 28. Act. Pub. Hall.

I. That, purſuant to a former agreement, the marqueſs of Ormond, a Scotchman, ſhould eſpouſe Catharine, the third daughter of Edward IV.

II. That king James ſhould marry Eliſabeth, widow to Edward IV, and mother to the queen of England.

III. That James, duke of Rothſay, eldeſt ſon to the king of Scotland, ſhould eſpouſe another of Edward IV's daughters.

IV. That the king of England ſhould reſign, for ever, to the king of Scotland the town of Berwick.

V. That, to ſettle the articles and conditions of the three marriages, commiſſioners on both ſides ſhould aſſemble, at Edinburgh, the 24th of January next, and meet again, on the ſame account, in May.

VI. That the two kings ſhall have a conference, in July.

VII. Laſtly, That, as the truce, concluded between the two kingdoms, would expire, July the 3d, 1488, it ſhould be prolonged to the 1ſt of September, 1489.

As for the ſuccours that James expected from Henry, they were not mentioned, in theſe preliminaries; and, probably, king James's ambaſſadors were contented with a verbal promiſe.

Henry ratified theſe articles, the 20th of December; but the king of Scotland's ratification is not with Henry's, in the Collection of the Publick Acts; and, perhaps, James was prevented by the commotions in his kingdom, which daily increaſed, and alſo cauſed this project to vaniſh into air, as the ſequel will inform us.

The affairs of the Low-Countries. P. Daniel.

The war ſtill continued in the Low-Countries, between Charles VIII. and Maximilian, to the advantage of the former, whoſe troops ſurpriſed St. Omer and Terouenne; and, ſome time after, Maximilian, having ordered the lord Ruffingheim to be carried away and conducted to Wilvorde, the priſoner made his eſcape and retired to Gaunt. Upon his arrival, he excited the Gantois to revolt, and take up arms againſt Maximilian; and this war was of extremely great conſequence, with reſpect to the affairs of Bretagne, of which it is neceſſary, at preſent, to give a particular, tho' brief account, ſince they will be the ſubject of the hiſtory of the five following years.

The affairs of Bretagne.

The king of France and the lords of Bretagne had treated together, with quite different views; for the lords believed, that it would effectually ſecure them from the deſigns of their duke; and Charles perceived, that it was an infallible means to conquer Bretagne.

In the beginning of the ſpring, 1487, Charles ſent four armies into Bretagne, from four ſeveral quarters; and the firſt alone was 6000 ſtrong, which already exceeded the number he had promiſed to find by the treaty. Upon the news of this deſcent, the duke of Bretagne, finding himſelf abandoned by almoſt all his barons, retired into the center of his country, being accompanied by the duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, the earl of Dunois, and ſome other French lords of the duke of Orleans's party; and, ſtaying ſome time, at Maletroit, he very ſpeedily aſſembled an army of 16000 men ill armed, and undiſciplined, becauſe of the long peace Bretagne had enjoyed. 1487. Charles VIII. makes a great progreſs, in Bretagne.

The duke's court was in ſuch a conſternation, that none knew what ſteps to take, to reſiſt ſo formidable an invaſion. Indeed, means were found to engage the lord d' Albret, then in Navarre, to eſpouſe the duke's cauſe, on the promiſe of a marriage with the princeſs Ann, heireſs of Bretagne; and the duke himſelf, with all the reſt of the lords, except the duke of Orleans, gave it under their hands to procure him this match, but without the leaſt thoughts of performing their word. The duke of Bretagne thought him too inconſiderable for his daughter; the earl of Dunois intended to marry the young princeſs to the duke of Orleans; and the prince of Orange privately endeavoured to procure this great fortune for the king of the Romans. Thus, this engagement was ſolely deſigned to perſuade the lord d' Albret to withdraw two troops of men at arms, which he had in the French army, and ſend them into the duke of Bretagne's ſervice; a ſorry refuge, upon ſuch a preſſing occaſion!

In the interim, the French, being joined in one body, advanced into the country, and beſieged Ploermel; but the duke of Bretagne, immediately, marched to the relief of that place; yet he had the mortification to find himſelf deſerted by his army, of which there remained with him not above 4000 men. Upon this unexpected accident, he retired to Vannes; but the French, now maſters of Ploermel, ſo cloſely purſued him, that he was forced to embarque, in great diſorder, and ſhut himſelf up, in Nantz; and the French, improving this conſternation, took Vannes and Dinant, and then laid ſiege to Nantz. Some time before, the duke had ſent the earl of Dunois to England, to deſire aſſiſtance; but, tho' the earl had put to ſea, four ſeveral times, contrary winds had ſtill prevented him from purſuing his voyage. In the interim, the marſhal de Rieux, head of the male-contents, perceiving that king Charles ſo ill obſerved the treaty, made loud complaints of his conduct; but, inſtead of receiving any ſatisfaction, he was told, that great offence was taken at his boldneſs.

Whilſt Charles was employed in the ſiege of Nantz, he was informed, that the king of England had gained a ſignal victory over his enemies; and that the affair of the pretended earl of Warwick was entirely ended. He had

The French ambaſſadors diſcourſe to the king.

The ambaſſadors found the king at Leiceſter, where they had their audience; and they repreſented to him, that the king, their maſter, conſidering him, as his beſt friend, had ſent them, to acquaint him with the ſucceſs of his arms, in Flanders, and alſo to congratulate him, upon his victory over his rebellious ſubjects; that they were likewiſe ordered to tell him, that the king, their maſter, was obliged to enter into a juſt war with the duke of Bretagne, who had received the duke of Orleans, an avowed enemy of France, not to protect him, but purely to aid him to excite commotions in the kingdom, by lending him the aſſiſtance of his arms; that the king of France was forced to take proper meaſures, to prevent his pernicious deſigns, and, therefore, his war with the duke of Bretagne was properly only defenſive, tho' he had cauſed an army to enter his dominions; that he, that gave the firſt blow, was not to be accounted the aggreſſor, but he that offered the provocation; that the duke of Bretagne could not deny, that he had harboured in his country, and even in his court, French rebels, and was concerned with them in plots extremely prejudicial to France, tho' he had no cauſe to complain of any injury; that, therefore, the king, their maſter, hoped, from his wiſdom and juſtice, that, before he engaged in the war, he would weigh the dangerous conſequences of a protection given to rebellious ſubjects, contrary to the law of nations, and the moſt ſolemn treaties, particularly by a homager; that, if he was under ſome obligations to the duke of Bretagne, he had not, doubtleſs, forgot the aid he had received from the king of France, when the duke of Bretagne had not only abandoned him, but was even upon the point of delivering him up to his enemy; that this aid was granted, contrary to the intereſt of France, ſince it would be more advantageous for her, that a tyrant, abhorred by all his ſubjects, ſhould reign, in England, than ſuch a prince as himſelf; and that, therefore, the king, their maſter, hoped, that he would not undertake the defence of the duke of Bretagne, in ſo unreaſonable a quarrel, but, on the contrary, aſſiſt his real friend, or, at leaſt, ſtand neuter.

The king's anſwer. Hall. Bacon.

The ambaſſadors avoiding, as a rock, the leaſt mention of their maſter's deſign to conquer Bretagne, the king judged it improper to take notice of it, in his anſwer, tho' it was not difficult to diſcern it, through all their diſguiſes; contenting himſelf with ſaying, that, of all perſons, he was moſt obliged to the king of France and the duke of Bretagne; wherefore, he was extremely deſirous to give them both convincing proofs of his gratitude; and that he would, on the preſent occaſion, diſcharge the office of a ſincere friend, by endeavouring amicably to end their differences, and very ſpeedily ſend them ambaſſadors, to offer his mediation. 1487.

The king has a wrong notion of the war of Bretagne.

Henry was not ſo blind, as not to perceive the king of France's intention; but, unfortunately for Bretagne, he was poſſeſſed with a notion, that Charles would never be able to accompliſh his deſigns. His belief was grounded upon the forces of Bretagne, which had, hitherto, ſucceſſfully reſiſted France; the natural levity of the French, who are eaſily diſcouraged by difficulties; the commotions the duke of Orleans might excite in that kingdom, by means of his friends; and upon the diverſion the king of the Romans could make, in Flanders. Accordingly, tho' he afterwards found, that he was greatly miſtaken, in his opinion, he reſolved to become only mediator, without ſending any effective ſupplies to the duke of Bretagne; for he was confident, that king Charles would conſent to an accommodation, leſt he ſhould draw upon him the arms of England. Indeed, it was manifeſtly the intereſt of the Engliſh to prevent the ruin of Bretagne; wherefore, Charles muſt have thought, that they would do all that was poſſible, to defeat his project; and Henry, building upon this foundation, that Bretagne could not be conquered, if England ſeriouſly eſpouſed her cauſe, and that Charles would not think that he was ſo impolitick, as to ſuffer that duchy to become a province of France, fancied that he would readily accept of his mediation, and deſiſt from his undertaking. He hoped, by this means, to gain two conſiderable advantages; firſt, the reputation of making peace between the two princes, to whom he was equally obliged; and, ſecondly, which was of far greater importance to him, as he was natually extremely covetous, and as the deſire of accumulating riches was the principal end of all his deſigns, he perceived that this affair would afford an occaſion to demand money of the parliament, under the pretence of aſſiſting Bretagne, with which he might fill his own coffers.

He offers his mediation to both the princes; and Charles accepts of it.

Purſuant to this ſcheme, he ſent ambaſſadors to Charles, to offer his mediation; and, if it was accepted, the ambaſſadors had orders, to make the ſame propoſal to the duke of Bretagne. Charles was then employed in the ſiege of Nantz; and, expecting to be ſoon maſter of the place, and ſeeing nothing that, after this, could hinder him from entirely ſubduing Bretagne, his ſole ſtudy was ſo to manage, as that Henry ſhould not aſſiſt the duke of Bretagne, before the taking of Nantz. When the ambaſſadors offered him the mediation of the king, their maſter, he replied with great diſſimulation, that he readily conſented, that the king of England ſhould act, not only as a mediator between him and the duke of Bretagne, but alſo as an abſolute arbiter of the peace. He entertained hopes, that the duke of Bretagne would reject this offer; or, if he accepted it, that he ſhould gain time, till the taking of Nantz, which would render him maſter of Bretagne.

The

1487. The ambaſſadors, concluding that they had ſurmounted the greateſt difficulty, repaired to the duke of Bretagne, who was ſhut up in Nantz, and made him the ſame propoſal from their maſter; but the duke of Orleans told them, in the name of that prince, that, at a juncture when his dominions were invaded, and ready to be ſwallowed up by the French, he expected rather an effective ſupply from the king of England, than a mediation, which muſt prove ineffectual, ſince nothing was more eaſy than to prolong the negotiation, till Bretagne was loſt; and that he intreated the king to remember the favours he had received, in Bretagne, and conſider how prejudicial it would be to England, if that duchy ſhould become a province of France. The ambaſſadors returning with this anſwer to Charles, he aſſured them, that, for his part, he was very deſirous of peace, as evidently appeared from his propoſal, but was ſorry to find, that the duke of Bretagne, ſwayed by the duke of Orleans, would never conſent, unleſs he was compelled by the continuation of the war; and this he artfully inſtilled into the ambaſſadors, who, upon their return into England, repreſented to the king, that it was proper to leave the duke of Bretagne, in his extremity, that he might be induced, of his own accord, to deſire the rejected mediation.

The duke rejects it. Hall.

In the interim, the ſiege of Nantz was proſecuted, with vigour; and Charles, probably, would have, at laſt, taken the place, had not the earl of Dunois been detained, in Lower Bretagne, by contrary winds; but, whilſt he was in thoſe parts, the inhabitants of the country, hearing that their duke was beſieged, in Nantz, aſſembled, to the number of 60,000 men, with a reſolution to relieve him. The earl of Dunois, putting himſelf at their head, approached Nantz; but the French not daring to attack the undiſciplined multitude, and even contracting their quarters, for their better defence, left the earl of Dunois at liberty to throw ſuccours into the town. Having done this, he ſuddenly retreated, not deſiring, with ſuch troops, to fight the French army; but this ſeaſonable relief obliged the French to retire, in deſpair of taking the place. The raiſing of the ſiege confirmed Henry in his opinion, that the conqueſt of Bretagne was too difficult for France; and, ſtill perſiſting in his reſolution to ſtand neuter, he had even no thoughts of ſending ſuccours to the duke of Bretagne. However, he pretended to have his intereſt at heart; but it was only to procure a ſubſidy from the parliament, which he had ſummoned, for the 9th of November. In the mean while, he ſent again the ſame ambaſſadors to king Charles and the duke of Bretagne, in appearance, to be perfectly informed of the ſtate of this affair, in order to lay it before the parliament; tho' he knew, beforehand, the particulars of their anſwer.

The earl of Dunois cauſes the ſiege of Nantz to be raiſed.

Hall.

About this time, Edward, lord Woodville, the queen's uncle, deſired the king's leave to go and ſerve the duke of Bretagne, with a troop of voluntiers; but Henry denied his requeſt, judging it improper to aid one of the parties, when he was offering his mediation to both; nevertheleſs, Woodville ſailed from the Iſle of Wight, of which he was governor, with 400 men, into Bretagne. This aid, tho' inconſiderable, made a great noiſe, at the court of France; and Charles openly complained of it; but, Henry declaring, that the lord Woodville had carried theſe troops to the duke, without his conſent, he was contented with that ſatisfaction, at the preſent juncture. 1487.

Woodville carries a ſmall aid to the duke of Bretagne.

Before the Engliſh ambaſſadors arrived, in Bretagne, there had been, in that country, a revolution prejudicial to Charles's affairs; for the lords of Bretagne, who had treated with him, manifeſtly perceiving that he intended to conquer the duchy, made their peace with the duke, and obtained a full pardon. The marſhal de Rieux, their head, was the laſt to comply; who would firſt be thoroughly convinced of the king of France's deſigns, which, as yet, he only ſuſpected. With this view, after ſecretly treating with the duke of Orleans, he diſpatched a meſſenger to tell the king, that the duke of Orleans offered to quit Bretagne, with all his followers; and, therefore, as the French troops had entered Bretagne, only to expel that prince, he moſt humbly intreated him to recall them, purſuant to his treaty with the barons. Ann of Beaujeu, who was haughty and imperious, fancying that there was no need of any farther ceremony, told the meſſenger, that the king had gone too far to recede, and would ſee the iſſue of the affair; which anſwer obliged the marſhal to follow the example of the reſt of the lords, and be reconciled to the duke, who gave him the command of his army.

The lords of Bretagne are reconciled to the duke. June 20.

Tho' Charles had raiſed the ſiege of Nantz, he continued his conqueſts, in other places; and, ſhortly after, his troops took the town of Dol, by ſtorm; upon which, the duke, not thinking himſelf ſafe, in Nantz, retired to Rennes. He found himſelf extremely preſſed; and yet he could not learn, that preparations were, any where, making for his relief. In this extremity, he was prevailed on by the prince of Orange, to promiſe Ann, his eldeſt daughter, to the king of the Romans, tho' he had already promiſed her to the lord d' Albret; for the prince of Orange aſſured him, that Maximilian, finding himſelf concerned to defend Bretagne, would come to his aſſiſtance, with a numerous army; but, at this very time, the revolt of the Gantois diſabled that prince from aſſiſting Bretagne.

The duke promiſes his daughter to the king of the Romans. September.

During theſe tranſactions, Henry's ambaſſadors, in Bretagne, had frequent opportunities to learn, that Charles only amuſed the king, their maſter, and deſigned to conquer that duchy; but Henry knew this, ſtill better than they; yet he was willing, that their report ſhould ſerve for a pretence to demand a ſubſidy, for the defence of Bretagne, tho' he ſtill believed, that the affair might be adjuſted, without compulſive methods; and his ſole view was to make the parliament apprehenſive of the loſs of Bretagne, that they might more readily ſupply him with money, which he intended to put entirely into his own coffers.

Henry's ambaſſadors diſcover the king of France's deſigns. Hall. Bacon.

The

1487. The parliament meets.

The parliament met, the 9th of November, juſt after the return of the ambaſſadors; and pains had been taken to ſpread the report they had brought to the king, to prepare the commons to make a vigorous effort, in the defence of Bretagne. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, as lord chancellor, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, to the following purpoſe:

The chancellor's ſpeech. Bacon.

"That the king thanked his parliament, "for the acts paſſed in his favour, at their "their laſt meeting: That he was ſo well "ſatisfied of their affection, that he had made "it a rule for himſelf, to communicate to ſo "good ſubjects all affairs, as well foreign as "domeſtick, that might happen; and that one "now occured, concerning which, he deſired "to have their advice.

"That the king of France (as, no doubt, "they had heard) was making fierce war up-"on the duke of Bretagne: That he alledged "for a reaſon the protection given by the duke "of Bretagne to the duke of Orleans; but "others gueſſed a very different motive: That "both parties applied to the king, one to "pray him to ſtand neuter, the other to de-"ſire a powerful aid: That the king, having "offered his mediation, found the French "king ready to treat, but without diſconti-"nuing the war: That the duke, on the con-"trary, tho' he was very deſirous of peace, "and moſt wanted it, was averſe to a nego-"tiation, not upon confidence of his own "ſtrength, but upon diſtruſt of the French "court's ſincerity: That, after ſundry am-"baſſies tending to an amicable determinati-"on of this affair, the king had deſiſted from "his meditation, becauſe he could neither re-"move the duke of Bretagne's diſtruſt, nor "perſuade the king of France to ceaſe hoſtili-"ties, during the treaty: That, this being "the ſtate of the caſe, he deſired their ad-"vice, whether he ſhould ſend ſuccours to the "duke of Bretagne, and enter into a defenſive "league with him, againſt France."

Having, thus, ſtated the queſtion, he alledged ſeveral arguments, Pro and Con, his intent being, under colour of leaving the parliament free in their determinations, to convince them of the neceſſity of aiding Bretagne; but this point was, in effect, ſo evident, that a very moderate knowledge of the intereſts of the ſtate was ſufficient to diſcover, of what conſequence it was to England to prevent the conqueſt of Bretagne. However, it deſerves to be remarked, that the king, knowing how much it concerned the Engliſh to defend Bretagne, advanced theſe reaſons, by the mouth of his chancellor, only to procure a ſubſidy, which he had not the leaſt thoughts of employing, in ſupport of the oppreſſed prince; and this will manifeſtly appear from the ſtrain of his future proceedings. The parliament, as the king expected, adviſed him to undertake the defence of Bretagne; and they granted him, for that purpoſe, as large a ſubſidy as had ever been given to any of his predeceſſors, on account of a foreign war.

A ſubſidy granted for the aid of Bretagne.

The parliament no ſooner broke up, than Henry reſumed the way of negotiation with Charles, ſtill imagining, that the terror of his arms would lead that prince to an agreement; tho' the only means, to ſave Bretagne, was to ſend thither a powerful aid, and declare war with France, purſuant to the parliament's intention; but Henry had formed another plan, entirely founded upon his extreme deſire, that the affair might be decided, without his being forced to expend the money lately received. He was ſatisfied, therefore, with ſending ambaſſadors to king Charles, to notify to him the reſolution of the parliament; but, at the ſame time, as if he was afraid of proceeding too far, he declared, that the war, on the part of England, ſhould be only defenſive, and purely with reſpect to Bretagne.

The king ſends an ambaſſy to France.

The court of France eaſily diſcovered, from theſe proceedings, that Henry was not ſtrongly inclined to puſh this affair, ſince, when he ſhould have made preparations for war, he was ſatisfied with ſending ambaſſies; wherefore, Charles told the ambaſſadors, that he was ever ready to accept of the king of England, for arbiter of the quarrel between him and the duke of Bretagne; but yet he did not deſign to be amuſed with a treaty, which would only give the duke leiſure and opportunity to reſtore his affairs; tho' he ſhould be always willing to treat, provided it was not intended to require a truce deſtructive of his intereſts.

Charles's anſwer.

1488. The duke of Bretagne makes ſome progreſs. Argentre. Mezerai.

The duke of Bretagne, by means of the winter, obtained a ceſſation of arms, which all the inſtances of the king of England had not been able to procure, as it obliged Charles to put his troops into quarters, and return to Paris; and, beſides, in March, 1488, the marſhal de Rieux retook Vannes and Dinant, and garriſoned Ancennis and Chateaubriant. On the other hand, the lord d' Albret's two troops of men at arms, deſerting the French ſervice, reinforced the duke's army; but this little turn of fortune was of a ſhort duration; for, in April, the king took the field again, and, having retaken Ancennis and Chateaubriant, razed them to the ground; and then, marching to Fougeres, he beſieged, at once, that place and St. Aubin du Cormier.

The lord d' Albret arrives in Bretagne, and preſſes the duke about his marriage; and the duke evades his demand.

In the interim, the lord d' Albret, having accepted the propoſal made him, in the beginning of the war, came into Bretagne, to ſerve the duke with 1000 horſe; and, upon his arrival, he preſſed the duke to make good his engagement, about the marriage; but the duke, who had ſecretly promiſed his daughter to Maximilian, being extremely embarraſſed, perſuaded the young princeſs to declare, that ſhe would never marry the lord d' Albret, tho' ſhe was then only 11 years old; which oppoſition afforded the duke a pretence to elude d' Albret's purſuits, till he could gain the conſent of that princeſs.

He ſues for peace to the king of France.

In the mean while, the unfortunate duke, being in no condition to reſiſt the French, and having no proſpect of aſſiſtance, either from Maximilian, or the king of England, ſent the earl of Dunois to Charles, to ſue for a peace; but that monarch did not think fit to return a poſitive anſwer. He was deſirous, firſt, to ſee 1488. the ſucceſs of his ſieges; moreover, he was treating with Henry for a truce, which he expected ſhortly to conclude; and that was to determine him, either to refuſe the duke's requeſt, or enter into a treaty with him; wherefore, keeping the earl of Dunois ſtill at court, under various pretences, he put him off, from day to day, till he had received certain intelligence from England. Soon after, he heard, that Henry had ſigned, at Windſor, a truce, to commence, the 14th of July, this year, and to end, the 17th of January, 1490; and, having nothing to fear from this quarter, he entirely applied himſelf to continue his conqueſts.

Remarks on Henry's conduct, and upon an omiſſion of his hiſtorian. Bacon.

Doubtleſs, Henry, in leaving the duke of Bretagne to the mercy of his enemy, directly oppoſed the intention of the parliament, who had granted him a ſubſidy, for the aid of that prince; and this truce, made without any neceſſity, when the duke of Bretagne was moſt preſſed, evidently ſhews, that he ſuffered himſelf to be blinded by the court of France, or rather by the deſire of appropriating the money granted by the parliament, to aſſiſt Bretagne. The duke could not be in greater want of a powerful ſupply; for Charles was in the heart of his country, at the head of a numerous army, taking his towns, one after another, whilſt he was unable to make any reſiſtance; and, at the ſame time, Henry was concluding with France a truce, which afforded king Charles time, with eaſe, to conquer Bretagne. On this account, his hiſtorian, queſtionleſs, prepoſſeſſed in his favour, and not imagining, that he had ſo cauſeleſly abandoned the poor duke, in his diſtreſs, does not mention this truce made with France, at ſuch an unſeaſonable juncture; nay, he makes the ſuccours, ſent by Henry into Bretagne, to arrive there, in the beginning of Auguſt, this year, tho' it is very certain they did not come till March, ſeven months after; and theſe affected delays, which ſurpriſed all the world, proceeded wholly from the king's miſtaken notion of this war, and his deſire to end it, without uſing the money given by the parliament.

The duke of Bretagne reſolves upon a battle. Argentre. Hall.

In the interim, the duke of Bretagne, the duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, and the marſhal de Rieux were in the utmoſt confuſion; for, tho' the king of the Romans, the king of England, and the duke of Lorrain had ſeemed to eſpouſe their quarrel, it did not appear, that any of them were preparing for their aſſiſtance. In this extremity, a council was held, to conſult about proper meaſures; and moſt were for marching to the relief of Fougeres, and fighting the enemy, rather than ſuffer that place to be loſt. The marſhal de Rieux, to no purpoſe, on the other hand, repreſented, that the loſs of a battle would infallibly occaſion the ruin of Bretagne; and that it would be much more adviſable to delay the time, till the neighbouring princes ſhould perceive their own intereſt, ſince it muſt, of courſe, be extremely prejudicial to them, to ſuffer Bretagne to be ſwallowed up by France. To this it was anſwered, that, probably, Bretagne would be loſt, before any ſuccours arrived, and, therefore, the only way, to preſerve it, was a victory; and, the duke of Bretagne being rendered incapable of judging ſoundly of an affair of ſuch conſequence, ſuffering himſelf to be governed by the counſels of the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange, his nephew, reſolved to march to the relief of Fougeres. However, upon his approach, he found, that the town had already capitulated; and then he determined to relieve St. Aubin du Cormier; but the governor, for want of proviſions and ammunition, had, a few days before, ſurrendered to the French. 1488.

During the duke of Bretagne's march, all the forces of France joined, in a body, under the command of Lewis de la Trimouille, apprehenſive that the duke deſigned to retake that place; and, in a few days, the two armies were ſo near each other, that it was impoſſible to part, without giving battle. In the interim, a rumour being ſpread among the Bretons, that the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange intended to betray them, they were upon the point of disbanding; but the two princes diſpelled their fears, by going among them, to charge on foot. The battle was fought, the 28th of July; which proved fatal to the duke of Bretagne, who was defeated, with the loſs of his beſt troops. The duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange being taken priſoners, the king confined the former, in the tower of Bourges, but releaſed the latter; and the 400 Engliſh, brought over by the lord Woodville, were almoſt all ſlain, with their leader. As the Engliſh were then diſtinguiſhed by a red croſs, 1200 Bretons were joined to them, with the ſame badge, to make the French believe, that freſh ſuccours were arrived from England; and, perhaps, this gave occaſion to ſome to affirm, that Henry had already ſent a freſh body of troops to the duke of Bretagne. The lord Verulam, who wrote the Hiſtory of this reign, does not ſay ſo much; but he aſſures us, that 8000 Engliſh arrived, a few days after, and offered the French battle, who did not think fit to accept it. Polydore Virgil and ſeveral others aſſert the ſame thing; but, in this point, they are all miſtaken; for Henry had not, as yet, made any treaty with the duke of Bretagne, and it was not till after the duke's death, and in March, the following year, that he ſent, as will be ſeen, 6000 men to the ducheſs, his daughter. 1488.

An inſurrection in the north of England. Hall. Hollingſh.

During theſe tranſactions, in Bretagne, Henry levied, in England, the money granted by parliament; which was a principal affair that he haſtened extremely, under pretence of the duke of Bretagne's preſſing want of a ſpeedy aſſiſtance. All the counties, except Yorkſhire and the biſhoprick of Durham, readily paid the tax impoſed by the parliament; but, in theſe parts, where the friends of the houſe of York 1488. York were very numerous, it was not collected, with the ſame facility; for, ſome incendiaries ſtirring up the people, the commiſſioners, for gathering the ſubſidy, met with ſo great oppoſition, that they were obliged to make application to the earl of Northumberland, who, immediately, gave notice to the court, and deſired the king's direction. The king replied, that he would not have one penny abated of the money granted by parliament, both on account of the urgent occaſion, and becauſe other counties might expect the like mitigation; and, upon this anſwer, the earl of Northumberland, aſſembling the chief juſtices and free-holders of the county, in very imperious terms, declared to them the king's intention; but his rough language, in which he did not expreſs the leaſt regard for perſons, who were but too much incenſed, induced them to conclude, that he himſelf adviſed the king to ſuch an anſwer; which being rumoured in York, the mob roſe, and, forcing open the earl's houſe, murdered him, with ſeveral of his ſervants; and the mutineers, preſently after, being inflamed by one John a Chamber, they placed Sir John Egremond at their head, and publickly declared, that they were marching to London, to give the king battle.

The earl of Northumberland is killed by the mob.

Henry, upon the news of this inſurrection, ſent into the north a body of troops, under the command of the earl of Surrey, whom he had received into favour, preparing to follow him, in perſon, with more conſiderable forces; but, whilſt he was on the road, he was informed, that Surrey had defeated and diſperſed the rebels, and John a Chamber was taken priſoner. As for Egremond, he had the good fortune to eſcape, and retire into Flanders to the ducheſs of Burgundy, whoſe palace was a ſanctuary to all the king's enemies; however, tho' this affair was ended, Henry proceeded on his journey to York, where he ordered John a Chamber to be executed, on a gibbet, raiſed in the midſt of a ſquare gallows, on which 12 of his accomplices were hanged round about him; and then he returned to London, leaving the earl of Surrey preſident of the north, and Sir Richard Tunſtal his principal commiſſioner, to levy the ſubſidy, of which he would not remit a ſingle penny.

The king goes to York, and puniſhes the ring-leaders.

In the mean while, the king, hearing of the battle of St. Aubin, appeared to be reſolved to ſend a powerful aid to the duke of Bretagne; but it was ſtill in expectation, that the terror of his arms would oblige king Charles to conſent to a peace; yet, notwithſtanding this artifice, the court of France plainly diſcerned all his deſigns.

He feigns to be reſolved to aid Bretagne.

The loſs of a battle had reduced the duke of Bretagne to a truly deplorable condition; for he could no longer ſupport himſelf, with his own forces, and ſaw no preparations for his defence, either in Flanders, or England. Henry inſpired him with hopes of aſſiſtance, but was not in haſte to ſend him any; and, as to Maximilian, he was himſelf detained, as a priſoner, in a ſedition againſt him, at Bruges, where ſeveral of his officers were killed; and his captivity laſted, from the beginning of January to the 15th of May, and, then, he was indebted, for his releaſe, to the emperor Frederick, his father, who had marched into the Low-Countries, at the head of an army, to his relief; ſo that, inſtead of thinking to aſſiſt Bretagne, he was himſelf ſeeking, on all ſides, for foreign ſuccours againſt the Flemings. With this view, forgetting his engagements with the duke of Bretagne, his future father-in-law, he ſent, this very year, to the king and queen of Spain, to demand in marriage Iſabella, their eldeſt daughter, and alſo Jane, their ſecond daughter, for his ſon Philip; but the firſt of theſe demands could not be granted, becauſe Iſabella was already promiſed to the prince of Portugal. However, the other was effected, in time; and, at laſt, in September, Philip de Cleves, lord of Ravenſtein, heading the Gantois and ſurpriſing the city of Bruſſels, Maximilian retired into Germany, leaving, in the Low-Countries, Albert, duke of Saxony, to command in his place, in the name of the archduke, his ſon.

The ſad condition of the duke of Bretagne.

There was, therefore, no proſpect of aid for the duke of Bretagne, either from England, or the Low-Countries, or, in a word, from any other quarter; and, in this extremity, the unhappy duke humbly ſued to the king of France, for peace, who very willingly complied with his requeſt, not from a motive of generoſity, but entirely to diſable him from defending himſelf, by cauſing him to loſe the aſſiſtance of the king of England, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport him. Tho' Henry had conſented to a truce with France, which was not to expire, till January, 1490, Charles was afraid, that he would alter his mind, and aſſiſt the duke, his ally, with all his forces, the next campaign; and, therefore, in order, to divert him from this thought, he very readily concluded a peace with the duke of Bretagne, deſigning to keep it no farther than was conſiſtent with his intereſts; for, in his whole conduct, with reſpect to Bretagne, he did not ſeem more ſcrupulous than his father, king Lewis XI, in all his negotiations.

The duke of Bretagne ſues for peace; and reaſons, why Charles granted it. Hall. Bacon.

The diſcuſſion of Charles's pretenſions to Bretagne delayed, for ſome time, the concluſion of the treaty which was negotiating, at Verger, a ſeat belonging to the marſhal de Rieux, where the king then was; for, Charles pretending, that, upon the death of the duke of Bretagne, he had a right to the guardianſhip of his daughters, as ſovereign lord of the duchy, this point was diſputed by the Bretons, who alledged, that the dukes of Bretagne had never done liege homage to the kings of France, and conſequently that they could not juſtly claim the guardianſhip in diſpute. This was an improper juncture to decide, to the advantage of the Bretons, this ſo long and, as yet, undetermined conteſt; but this claim of Charles was a trifle, in compariſon of another of much greater importance; for he maintained, that the duchy itſelf belonged to him, by vertue of a grant to king Lewis XI, from the lady de la Broſſe, heireſs of the houſe of Blois, who had diſputed 1488. disputed Bretagne with the anceſtors of Francis II. Thus, he revived an antient quarrel, which had been ended by ſeveral treaties, and particularly by that of Guerande, by which the houſe of Blois relinquiſhed all their pretenſions; yet Charles did not obſtinately inſiſt on theſe two articles, reſting ſatisfied with the mention of them, till he could proſecute them, in a proper time and place; ſo that the treaty was concluded, about the end of Auguſt, importing, that Charles ſhould keep the places he had conquered, and withdraw his forces out of the reſt of Bretagne; but it was not his intent to obſerve the laſt article. The duke ratified the treaty, at Coyron, where he then was; wherefore, it is called by the Bretons, the treaty of Coyron, and by the French, the treaty of Verger, or Vergy.

The treaty of Verger or Coyron. Argentre. Mezerai.

Diſſenſions among the Bretons, upon the death of the duke.

A few days after, viz. on the 9th of September, died Francis II, duke of Bretagne, in a very advanced age; and with his underſtanding ſo impaired, that, for ſome years paſt, he had been incapable of ruling the ſtate. He was ſucceeded by Ann, his eldeſt daughter, about 12 years old; and the duke, her father, had appointed her, for guardian, the marſhal de Rieux, who was to be aſſiſted by the earl of Cominge; but Philip de Montauban, chancellor of Bretagne, carried away the young ducheſs to Guerande, where, under the pretence of adviſing her, he made her ſpeak, as he pleaſed; which cauſed between the marſhal and the chancellor a difference, that proved extremely prejudicial to the ducheſs, and to the Bretons, in general.

Henry pretends to aid the ducheſs. Hall.

Henry, upon the news of the duke of Bretagne's deceaſe, publickly declared, that he conſidered the intereſt of the young orphan ducheſs, as his own, and ſeemed to prepare, in earneſt, to aſſiſt her; but, being alſo informed that, a few days before the duke's death, a proviſional treaty had been concluded, till all the king of France's pretenſions were ſettled, he did not doubt, that the affair would be ended, without a war. The buſineſs was only to prevent king Charles from taking advantage of the preſent conſternation of the Bretons; and this, he fancied, could be effected, by loudly proclaiming his concern for the ducheſs's affairs. He ſtill believed, that Charles feared him, and, rather than break with him, would recede from his pretenſions; and, therefore, his view was to become arbiter of this difference, and avoid a war which would have obliged him to empty his coffers.

He ſends ambaſſies to ſeveral courts,

Accordingly, he ſent ambaſſadors to the king of the Romans, the archduke, his ſon, and the kings of Spain and Portugal, to induce the king of France to conclude, that he was labouring to form a league againſt him; and he likewiſe ſent an ambaſſy to Charles himſelf, to preſs him to enter into a treaty with Bretagne; whilſt, in the interim, he diſpatched Edgecomb and Ainſworth, to offer his aſſiſtance to the ducheſs, and commiſſioned them to promiſe, in his name, to ſupply her with a certain number of troops, upon ſufficient ſecurity for the repayment of the charges. However, all theſe ambaſſies proved inſignificant, as the ſequel will inform us; but, before we proceed, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate the revolution in Scotland.

and offers to aid Ann. Act. Pub.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Hall.

The affair of Bretagne ſo employed the kings of France and England, that James III. could procure no aid from either, againſt the lords who were headed by the prince, his ſon; and the male-contents would have been extremely glad to decide the quarrel, by a battle; but the king ſtill remained in the caſtle of Edinburgh, where it was impoſſible to force him. Tho' Charles and Henry had promiſed to aſſiſt him, they were not very deſirous to eſpouſe his cauſe; yet he ſtill ſhut himſelf up, expecting that theſe monarchs would make good their engagements.

In the mean while, he was adviſed, to quit the caſtle of Edinburgh for Sterling, as a more convenient place, and there expect the foreign ſuccours; and James, approving this advice, began his march, with his few troops, and, preſently, the lords cloſely purſued him; yet he was far enough before them, to be ſecure, if the governor of Sterling, bribed by his enemies, had not denied him admittance. James, at a loſs where to go, reſolved to return to Edinburgh; but, meeting the army of the male-contents, he was conſtrained to fight, tho' much inferior, in number of troops; and he was ſlan in the battle which was fought, in the month of June. After his deceaſe, James IV, his eldeſt ſon, about 15 years old, was proclaimed, in his room, by the lords who had ſet him at their head; but many of the Scots diſliked this change, and refuſed to own the young prince, whom they conſidered, as the murderer of his father, and gave him, for ſome time, great diſturbance. In July, the new king ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, to notify his acceſſion to the throne.

James III. ſlain, and James IV, his ſon, ſucceeds him.

1489. Henry's view in his treaty with Ann.

On the 10th of February, 1489, the ambaſſadors, ſent into Bretagne, concluded a treaty with the ducheſs; and the chief article was, that the king engaged to ſend into Bretagne an aid of 6000 men. To conſider this, abſtractly, one would be apt to conclude, that Henry acted purely, from a principle of generoſity, or, at leaſt, for the intereſt of his ſubjects; but theſe were the fartheſt from his thoughts. His ſole view was, firſt, to hinder Bretagne from being over-run by a ſudden invaſion of the French, in order to pave the way for a treaty; and, ſecondly, to draw a pecuniary advantage from the ſuccours ſent to the ducheſs, the expences of which he was willing to advance, that he might afterwards be repaid with uſury. As this treaty diſcovers his ſelfiſh views, in this affair, it will be proper to inſert the ſubſtance of each article; which, added to what will be ſaid, hereafter, will greatly contribute to conveigh a juſt idea of this prince's character.

XXVIII. Engliſh money ſhall paſs, in Bretagne, after this manner,——the king ſhall receive the ſame money, in payment.

Remarks upon this treaty.

It is obvious, that, in making this treaty, Henry had three different views; firſt, to hinder Charles VIII. from being maſter of Bretagne, whilſt the ducheſs was ſo unable to reſiſt him; for, if Charles ſhould have compleated the conqueſt of Bretagne, the next campaign, as might very eaſily be done, he would have been inexcuſable to the parliament, who had given him a large ſubſidy, for the defence of that duchy. His ſecond deſign was to terrify the king of France, by the ſending of Engliſh troops, into a compliance to end the affair, by way of negotiation; which manifeſtly appears from his lending the 6000 men, for eight months only; and that too, when they could be of no farther ſervice, than to prevent the court of France from violating the treaty of Vergy, then ſubſiſting. His third and principal intent was, to ſecure the re-imburſement of what he was about to advance, for the ſupport of the 6000 men, for eight months; for he had already projected the keeping, for his own uſe, the ſubſidy granted by parliament, for the defence of Bretagne, in hopes of deciding the affair, by his mediation. In the interim, he perceived, that the young princeſs was in no condition to withſtand the king of France, if he thought of purſuing his conqueſts; ſo that, to oblige king Charles to enter into the treaty, it was neceſſary to ſhew him that the ducheſs would not want protectors, if he pretended to continue to make uſe of force of arms. He could 1489. not, therefore, help advancing the money, ſince the ducheſs was unable to do it; but, at the ſame time, he took ſuch precautions not to loſe his money, that it is viſible from the treaty, that his principal view was the repayment of his expences. It may be farther remarked, firſt, that, probably, he would lend his troops, only for eight months, leſt the ſum ſhould riſe too high, and conſequently become difficult to be repaid; and, ſecondly, that he was willing not only to ſecure the principal, but to receive it with intereſt; for, after he had in his hands the places mortgaged, for his ſecurity, he left the ſum undetermined, in order to have it ſettled by commiſſioners. He knew, that, when he was poſſeſſed of the towns, Ann would, one day, be forced to ſubmit to what he ſhould preſcribe; and that it would be in his power to mount the charges of levying and maintaining his troops, as high as he pleaſed. What I have ſaid is not a bare conjecture, ſince the ſequel will demonſtrate, that he raiſed this expence to an exorbitant ſum; and, thus, Ann's aid became no leſs expenſive to her than the French army itſelf, which continued quiet, tho' it ſtill remained in the country. Charles had fully reſolved to take advantage of the conſternation of the Bretons, upon the deceaſe of their duke; but, in a council held, on that occaſion, the chancellor de Rochefort was of a directly contrary opinion from motives of honour and equity; and his allegations made the deeper impreſſion upon the king, as he was ſtill apprehenſive, that, tho' Henry acted but faintly, he would alter his ſentiments. Moreover, that monarch's ambaſſies to Spain, the king of the Romans, and the archduke, gave the court of France ſome uneaſineſs; for they were afraid of a league, that would have obſtructed the execution of a grand project already formed, and which will be mentioned, hereafter.

During the negotiations, at Redon, the ducheſs's affairs were in a deplorable ſituation; for ſhe not only ſaw a French army, in the heart of her country, poſſeſſed of ſeveral towns, but was likewiſe deſtitute of men and money; and what was ſtill more afflicting, at ſuch a juncture, was the diſſenſion among her principal lords. The marſhal de Rieux pretended to govern her, as her guardian; but Philip de Montauban, her chancellor, had ſuch an influence over her, that, through his inſinuations, ſhe conſidered the marſhal, as an enemy, and abſolutely refuſed to be under his guardianſhip. Montauban's pretence to incenſe her againſt him was, that the marſhal would have married her to the lord d' Albret; for he repreſented to her, that the marſhal deſigned to ruin her, by giving her a huſband unable to protect her; and he even inſinuated, that the marſhal was bribed by king Charles, whoſe intereſt it was to eſpouſe her to a lord not ſupported by any prince, in Europe. Perhaps the chancellor was himſelf gained, in favour of the king of the Romans; but, however that be, their animoſity roſe to ſuch a height, that the marſhal de Rieux cauſed the gates of Nantz to be ſhut upon the ducheſs, and even threatened to beſiege her, in Rennes. It is not, therefore, ſurpriſing, that Montauban, who managed the ducheſs's affairs, ſhould conſent to the treaty of Redon; ſince the arrival of the Engliſh troops would exceedingly ſtrengthen his party. 1489.

The Engliſh ſuccours, at laſt, arrived, in March; which, with Henry's ambaſſies to ſeveral courts, led king Charles to imagine, that he intended to act vigorouſly, in defence of Bretagne; and, in this belief, ſince he could not execute his deſigns, by open force, without a war with the Engliſh, and drawing, perhaps, other enemies upon himſelf, he judged it adviſable to take other meaſures. There was a treaty on foot between him and Maximilian, and between Maximilian and the Gantois, by the mediation of the German princes, convened a Francfort; and, as this affair was in a promiſing way, he did not doubt, that it would end in a peace. He had in his power Margaret, daughter to the king of the Romans, in order to eſpouſe her, when marriageable, and was not inſenſible of the late duke of Bretagne's engagement with that prince, about his daughter's marriage; and, therefore, being confident that his future father-in-law, with whom he was on the point of concluding a peace, would readily favour him, he ſent and offered the ducheſs of Bretagne, to make him umpire of their quarrel. Ann gladly accepted the propoſal, being almoſt ſure of an intereſt in the prince who expected to marry her; and Maximilian did not want much intreaty to become arbiter of a diſpute, in which he himſelf was ſo greatly concerned; and, thus, Charles, Ann, and Maximilian acted, all three, with inſincerity. The Engliſh arrive in Bretagne. Hall.

The ambaſſadors of France and Bretagne, at Francfort, concluded, by the mediation of the king of the Romans, a proviſional treaty, importing, that Charles ſhould reſtore the towns conquered upon Bretagne, except Dinant, St. Aubin, Fougeres, and St. Malo; that theſe four places ſhould be committed in truſt to Maximilian and the duke of Bourbon, and the French troops quit the reſt of Bretagne; that the ducheſs ſhould ſend away the Engliſh, and, next April, a congreſs be held, at Tournay, to determine all diſputes; and that, in the interim, both parties ſhould ſend their reaſons to Avignon, to be diſcuſſed by civilians, that their opinions might ſerve for the inſtruction of the mediators. The treaty of Francfort.

This treaty was ineffectual, tho' both parties ſeemed pleaſed with it; for Ann engaged, by the treaty of Redon, to deliver two places to the king of England, which were to be kept by 500 Engliſh; yet, by the preſent treaty, ſhe engaged to ſend away all the Engliſh; but, as the 500 men, which kept the two places, were not excepted, Charles pretended, that he was not bound to execute the treaty of Francfort, till all the Engliſh quitted Bretagne, to which Ann could not oblige them. Accordingly, tho', in November, purſuant to the treaty of Redon, the Engliſh troops returned into England, the 500 men remained; and Charles does not obſerve the treaty.

1489. and the ducheſs could not ſend them away, unleſs ſhe repaid the king of England all his expences, which was impoſſible. The affair, therefore, continued in the ſame ſtate, as before the treaty of Francfort; and the two parties neither ſent their reaſons to Avignon, nor their ambaſſadors to Tournay.

The ducheſs is perſuaded to marry Maximilian. Argentre.

In the interim, Maximilian's marriage with Ann was negotiating, with all poſſible ſecrecy; and his agents repreſented to the young princeſs the honour ſhe would enjoy of being queen of the Romans, and, in time, empreſs; but, after all, it was not in her lover's power to give her a powerful aſſiſtance. He could not draw any forces out of Flanders, and ſend them to Bretagne, without breaking with France, included in his late treaty with the Gantois; moreover, this peace was ſo ill ſecured, that it did not laſt, an entire year; ſo that Maximilian, ſon to an emperor, himſelf king of the Romans, and governor of the Low-Countries, with all theſe empty titles, was in no condition to aſſiſt Bretagne. However, the young ducheſs was ſtill made to expect great matters from him, whether her counſellors wilfully ſhut their eyes, or there was, then, no other prince, in Europe, from whom ſhe could hope for any aſſiſtance; for, tho' the king of England might have protected her, he had entertained ſuch a wrong notion of the affair, that the event alone was capable to undeceive him.

The marriage is ſolemniſed by proxy.

At laſt, the marriage was ſolemniſed, in November, with a ceremony, then, altogether new, in thoſe parts; for the prince of Naſſau, Maximilian's ambaſſador and proxy, put his naked leg into the bed, where the ducheſs was laid, as a ſort of conſummation; yet this was tranſacted ſo ſecretly, that neither Charles nor Henry appear to have known it, till March, 1491. Indeed, Argentre, an hiſtorian of Bretagne, affirms, that, from the beginning of 1490, all the publick acts, ran in the name of Maximilian and Ann; and, if ſo, it would be difficult to conceive, how their marriage could be kept ſecret; but, in all probability, Argentre was miſtaken, in a whole year; for we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral commiſſions of the year 1490, in the name of the ducheſs alone, and the firſt, with Maximilian's name, is dated, in March, 1491.

1490. Charles is put to a ſtand.

Notwithſtanding the departure of the Engliſh forces, Charles did not renew hoſtilities, in Bretagne; which forbearance led Henry to imagine, that he had attained his end, that is, had terrified Charles, by the ſole appearance of a rupture; but the truth is, Charles was extremely embarraſſed. He could not think of dropping his deſign upon Bretagne; and yet he ſaw, that it would be very hard to compleat the conqueſt, without drawing on himſelf a war from England, and, perhaps, from ſeveral other ſtates.

An ambaſſy of Ann to Henry. Act. Pub.

In the mean while, Ann, perceiving that the war would infallibly be renewed, as ſoon as her marriage was divulged, did all that was poſſible, to convince Henry of the neceſſity of ſending freſh ſuccours to Bretagne, and, at the ſame time, concealed the true reaſon; and, with this view, ſhe ſent to him, in February, 1490, chancellor Montauban, and other ambaſſadors, with orders to deſire an aid, and expreſly impowered them to promiſe, in her name, that ſhe would never marry, without his conſent. This ſhews, that her marriage with Maximilian was ſtill a ſecret, which ſhe did not think fit to diſcover; and, in their inſtructions, the ambaſſadors were ordered to inform the king of her proteſtation, in form, againſt her father's engagement with the lord d' Albret, and of all that d' Albret and de Rieux had done, to compel her to ratify the ſame. This was an inſinuation of her wanting his aid, as well againſt her own ſubjects, as the king of France, ſince Bretagne was in danger from both; nevertheleſs, Henry, inſtead of treating with the ducheſs, about freſh ſupplies, ſent ambaſſadors to France, to treat with king Charles, concerning all his differences with the ducheſs of Bretagne. He ſtill imagined, that Charles, dreading the junction of England with Bretagne, was extremely deſirous of a peace; and he reſolved to make him pay for it, inſiſting upon a freſh demand; viz. the arrears of the penſion that Lewis XI. was obliged to pay Edward IV, by the treaty of Pequigny, which, by a ſubſequent treaty, was not to expire, till the death of the ſurvivor of the two kings. Theſe arrears amounted to 125000 crowns; and, thenceforward, this article was always inſerted in the king's commiſſions to treat with France; for Henry believed, that, in Charles's treaty with Ann, of which he thought himſelf almoſt ſure, he would ſubmit to this article, leſt it ſhould prove an obſtruction to the peace. 1490.

He treats with Bretagne, but upon his own affairs. Act. Pub.

Whilſt his ambaſſadors were in France, he appointed commiſſioners to treat with thoſe of Bretagne; but it was purely to amuſe them; for the negotiation ſolely tended to a treaty, which ſtill, more effectually than the former, ſecured him the re-imburſement of his charges, on the ducheſs's account, without the leaſt mention of the deſired aſſiſtance. He only made ſome verbal promiſes, that he would never abandon the ducheſs; for he fancied, that this aſſiſtance was entirely needleſs, in the preſent ſituation of the affair, being ſtill apprehenſive that the king of France was wholly inclined to a peace. In the interim, Charles, in his turn, amuſed the Engliſh ambaſſadors, reſolving to conclude nothing, till he could more evidently diſcover Henry's intention; for he had an army in the bowels of Bretagne, and ſeveral towns in his poſſeſſion, and Ann was in no condition to expel him, without auxiliary forces; and, therefore, he willingly waited for a favourable opportunity to end the affair, otherwiſe than by the king of England's mediation, whom he too much ſuſpected. Henry, who entertained quite different ſentiments made it his principal ſtudy to ſecure the payment of what he had advanced, in behalf of Bretagne; wherefore, pretending that the city of Nantz was in danger of being poſſeſſed by the French, he demanded, that it ſhould be 1490. be delivered to him, promiſing to reſtore it, whenever required; but, preſently after, he heard, that the lord d'Albret had prevented him, who, deſpairing to marry the ducheſs, had joined with France, and taken that wealthy city, where he had acquired a great booty.

The Flemings revolt again.

During theſe negotiations, freſh commotions aroſe, in Flanders, vaſtly prejudicial to the affairs of the ducheſs of Bretagne; for the duke of Saxony, who commanded, in Flanders, for Maximilian, having iſſued out an edict, concerning the coin, the inhabitants of Bruges not only refuſed to obſerve it, but drew the Gantois into the revolt; and the king of France, who deſired nothing more than a war, in Flanders, ſent an aid to the rebels, under the marſhal Deſquerdes, governor of Picardy; whilſt, on the other ſide, Maximilian, or the duke of Saxony, in his name, ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, to negotiate a league with him againſt France.

With the troops arrived from Picardy, the rebels made great progreſs, and, after taking Ipre and Sluce, beſieged Dixmude; but Henry, incenſed againſt Charles, for delaying his anſwer ſo long, being likewiſe concerned to ſupport the archduke, reſolved to aſſiſt him; and, with this view, he ſuddenly ſent the lord Morley, with 1000 men, to Calais, with orders to the lord D'aubeney, governor of that place, to relieve Dixmude, if poſſible. D'aubeney, joining 1000 men of his garriſon, to thoſe come from England, marched directly to Dixmude, which was not well inveſted, and he entered the town, by night, without reſiſtance; and, at break of day, ſallying out of the oppoſite gate, he attacked the camp of the French and Flemings, and entirely put them to rout. This affair created a great coldneſs between Charles and Henry; but the former durſt not complain, ſince he had no more right to aid rebellious ſubjects, than the latter had to aſſiſt the ſovereign.

The lord D'aubeney relieves Dixmude. July 16. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the ambaſſadors of Bretagne waited, at London, to no manner of purpoſe. However, the king gave them good words, which only engaged them the more to do his, inſtead of the ducheſs's affairs; and, on the 26th of July, he required of them an acknowledgment, that he had punctually obſerved the treaty of Redon, a freſh engagement to re-imburſe all his expences, and a promiſe to deliver to him Morlaix and Concarneau, upon the hopes of an aid which he never deſigned to give; yet it was neceſſary, in order to accompliſh his ends, to make the king of France believe, that it was, in reality, his intent to aſſiſt the ducheſs of Bretagne, the only means to put a ſtop to his proceedings. Charles appeared to have ſome knowledge of Henry's ſentiments; for he ſeemed more cold than ever, with reſpect to his agreement with the ducheſs, returned no direct anſwer, nor did he talk of reſtoring his conqueſts upon Bretagne, or of paying the arrears of the penſion, due till the deceaſe of Edward IV; ſo that Henry thought it time to proceed more openly, and inſpire that monarch with a dread not only of the arms of England, but of ſeveral other ſtates.

Henry makes ſeveral alliances. Act. Pub.

In the beginning of this year, he had renewed the treaties of alliance with Portugal and Denmark; and, in September, he concluded with Maximilian and his ſon, Philip, a league againſt France, for their mutual defence, and for that of the ducheſs of Bretagne. At the ſame time, he publiſhed a treaty made with Ferdinand and Iſabella, in March, the preceding year; by which, the two kings were obliged to make war upon the king of France, unleſs he reſtored Rouſſillon to Ferdinand, and Guienne and Normandy to Henry; and they likewiſe agreed upon a marriage between Arthur, prince of Wales, Henry's ſon, and Catharine, third daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, as ſoon as the prince was 14, and the princeſs 12 years of age. His treaty with the king of the Romans had a relation to this; and the three princes were, at once, to enter France, each at the head of an army, as well for their own, as for the intereſts of the ducheſs of Bretagne; but, by ſecret articles ſigned, two days after, there were ſo many reſtrictions, as to the time, manner, and conditions of the war, that it is evident Henry's ſole aim was to frighten the king of France; for, by one of the ſecret articles, the time of this invaſion was fixed to the 15th of Auguſt, 1492. 1490.

The 4th of October, Henry concluded with John Galeazzo, duke of Milan, a treaty of alliance, containing only general articles of friendſhip and a good underſtanding; but, in the interim, Henry reaped this advantage, that theſe negotiations, which were openly tranſacting, embarraſſed the king of France. Indeed, all theſe treaties, as he was ignorant of the ſecret articles, gave him uneaſineſs; having cauſe to fear, that a league was forming againſt him, which would obſtruct not only the conqueſt of Bretagne, but likewiſe that of the kingdom of Naples, which he had been, ſome time, projecting. It was this that prevented his renewing the war, in Bretagne, tho', in the ducheſs's preſent circumſtances, it ſeemed eaſy to diſpoſſeſs her entirely; moreover, Henry's conduct appeared ſo extraordinary, that he was utterly at a loſs how to judge concerning it; for, tho' he had made a great noiſe, about the league he was making, for the defence of Bretagne, he ſent no aid to the ducheſs. In this uncertainty, Charles reſolved to ſend an ambaſſy into England, under colour of diſengaging Henry from the ducheſs's party; but, in reality, to know by his anſwer what he was to hope, or fear from him. He appointed for this purpoſe Francis de Luxemburgh, viſcount of Martigues, Waleran de Sams, and Robert Gaguin, general of the order of the Trinity; who, upon their arrival at London, had their audience of the king, when nothing particular was tranſacted; but, ſome days after, the king having nominated to treat with them Richard Fox, biſhop of Exeter, Thomas, earl of Ormond, and ſome others, in their firſt conference, the general of the order of the Trinity, being the ſpeaker, made the moſt humble and cringing ſpeech that ever was ſpoken by a French ambaſſador to a foreign prince, if, after all, the matter is to be referred Charles's ambaſſy to ſound Henry. Dec. 10. Act. Pub.

1490. red to Henry VII's hiſtorian; yet, having ſeveral reaſons to ſuſpect this ſpeech to be rather that author's than the ambaſſador's, I ſhall only mention the principal points, without keeping to the very words, or taking notice of certain articles which, in my opinion, are altogether improbable.

The ambaſſador's ſpeech.

The ambaſſador began with ſaying, "Their "maſter had ſent them, to implore a peace "with the king of England; and ſuch was "his reſpect for that great prince, that, paſſ-"ing by all formalities, he would make ad-"vances unuſual in ſuch ſovereigns as he; nor "would he conceal from him another motive, "which made him deſirous of peace. Having "determined to carry his arms into remote "countries, it muſt, of courſe, be for his ad-"vantage, that all the world ſhould know, "that he was in amity with all his neigh-"bours, and particularly with the king of "England; and then the ambaſſador himſelf "excuſed Henry's aiding Bretagne and Flan-"ders, even againſt France, and owned it to "be no juſt cauſe of a rupture between the "two crowns. As for Flanders, he juſtified "the king his maſter's ſending troops thither, "becauſe he was under obligations to protect "the Flemings, his vaſſals, againſt the king "of the Romans, their oppreſſor; adding, "that king Charles deſigned to make war up-"on the kingdom of Naples, unjuſtly detain-"ed from him by a baſtard of the houſe of "Arragon; and, as that kingdom belonged "to him, by an unqueſtionable right, he was "obliged, in honour, to attempt its recove-"ry; tho' his thoughts did not reſt there, ſince "he intended to make the conqueſt of Naples "ſerve, as a bridge, to tranſport his forces "into the Eaſt, and ſubvert the empire of the "Turks, to which he was invited, as by a "voice from Heaven, by a rent in the Otto-"man family; wherefore, being reſolved up-"on a holy war, he was content, for the credit "and intereſt of the Chriſtian religion, to beg "peace from all the princes of Europe, that he "might not be diverted by them from his "grand deſign.

The ambaſſador, in concluſion, ſaid, "He "had only another affair to mention, not as "a ſubject of treaty, but as a proof of his "maſter's great deſire to preſerve a good un-"derſtanding with the king of England, viz. The chancellor's anſwer, in the king's name. Bacon.

Some days after, the ambaſſadors of France being ſent for to the council, the chancellor returned them the following anſwer from the king: "That the king, his maſter, had not "forgot his former love and friendſhip with "the king of France; that, if the friendſhip "was ſtill the ſame, there was no occaſion to "talk of it; but, if not, it was not words "but deeds that muſt renew it; that, as for "the affair of Bretagne, he could not help "thinking it ſtrange, that the king of France "ſhould make him his inſtrument to ruin one "of his beſt allies, and moreover pretend, he 1490.
"was very much obliged to him for it: As "for the ducheſs's marriage, he meant not
"to meddle with it, provided the king of "France would proceed by law, and not by
"the ſword: That, however, what had paſſ-
"ed in Bretagne, as well as in Flanders,
"did not make ſo deep an impreſſion, as
"to refuſe to treat of a peace, if all their "other affairs might be debated, at the "ſame time. That as for the war upon
"Naples, the king had but one thing to ſay,
"which was, as the king of France thought
"himſelf bound, in honour, to try to recover
"that kingdom; ſo, for the ſame reaſon, the "king thought himſelf obliged to exert his
"utmoſt, for the recovery of Guienne, Nor-
"mandy, and the kingdom of France itſelf,
"which, of right, belonged to him."

Henry had eaſily diſcovered the intent of this ambaſſy, and that, by a general propoſal to live in peace with him, Charles's ſole view was to ſound his intentions, with reſpect to Bretagne; wherefore, purſuant to the maxim he had eſtabliſhed, namely, to frighten him, he threatened a war, not only for the ſake of the ducheſs of Bretagne, but alſo for his own. In the interim, it is probable, that he ſpoiled his affairs, by carrying the artifice too far; and that Charles perceived, that this anſwer was no more than bare words. It was very unlikely, that, in the then ſituation of France, Henry, who tottered, as it were, on the throne of a kingdom abounding with male-contents, would renew a quarrel of ſuch importance, of which he could not naturally expect to ſee a fortunate iſſue; for his reputation, of being one of the moſt politick princes of his time, made it incredible, that he would embarque in ſuch an undertaking; and, therefore, Charles, taking it for granted, that he intended only to frighten him, ſtill purſued his courſe, with reſpect to Bretagne, and ſucceeded, at laſt, as the events of the next year will inform us. On the other hand, his ambaſſadors, ſurpriſed at the chancellor's ſpeech, warmly replied, that the king, their ſovereign, did not fear ſuch menaces, being able to maintain his juſt rights againſt any perſon whatſoever; and the chancellor calmly anſwered, that the king expected no other reply from them, but would directly ſend ambaſſadors, to acquaint their maſter more fully with his intentions. Then he asked them, whether the king of France would conſent to have the diſpoſal of the marriage of the ducheſs of Bretagne, with an exception that he ſhould not marry her himſelf; and the ambaſſadors anſwered, that the king, their maſter, was ſo far from intending to marry the ducheſs of Bretagne, that he had given them no inſtructions, as to that point.

The ambaſſadors reply. Bacon.

Ann notifies to Henry her marriage.

In the mean while, Ann was extremely troubled to find, that no aid arrived, either from Maximilian, or the king of England; wherefore, tho' ſhe had, hitherto, kept her marriage ſecret, perceiving that it could uot be concealed any longer, and that it was diſhonourable to hide it from him whom ſhe accounted her principal protector, ſhe ſent a ſolemn am-

1490. bassy into England, consisting of the prince of Orange, the earl of Dunois, and the chancellor. Their business was to desire assistance, and, probably, notify her marriage to the king; for, till after this ambassy's arrival in England, the beginning of the following year, we do not find Maximilian's name and her's joined together in the Publick Acts.

1491. Henry's ambassy to Charles. Act. Pub.

In February, 1491, Henry sent ambassadors into France, pursuant to his promise, in order to treat of all his differences with king Charles, and, in particular, of a certain sum due to him from that prince, as also of the quarrel between Charles and the duchess of Bretagne. These instructions alone evidently prove, that Henry did not design vigorously to push his pretensions to the kingdom of France, or, at least, to Guienne and Normandy; for is it to be imagined, that he would have comprized under the general word, differences, his claim to all France, or to two of the richest provinces, and have specified a debt of 125000 crowns, if the first had been the principal? It is, therefore, manifest, that he was still desirous to end the affair of Bretagne, without a war, and to secure the sums that were advanced by the parliament.

Ann's marriage is imparted to him. Act. Pub.

A few days after, he appointed commissioners to treat with the ambassadors, that came last from Bretagne; and then it was, in appearance, that the duchess's marriage with Maximilian was communicated to him; for, tho, perhaps, he was told of it before, he pretended ignorance, because it had not been notified to him, in form.

Charles besieges the duchess in Rennes. Argentre.

In the interim, Charles, having, at last, notice of this marriage, which had been industriously concealed, resolved to use no more ceremony, but vigorously hasten the conquest of Bretagne; for, in all probability, he plainly saw through all Henry's disguises, and, perhaps, believed the acquisition of Bretagne well deserved the hazarding a rupture with England. As to Maximilian, he did not much fear him, having an infallible expedient to pacify the king of Arragon, by restoring Rousillon, much less important to the crown of France than Bretagne; wherefore, without loss of time, he ordered Rennes, capital of the duchy, where the princess then was, to be invested. During the siege, which continued, some months, Ann sent into England John Bouteiller, lord of Maupertuis, and Peter Cojalu, to sollicit Henry's aid; and, shortly after, she dispatched the countess de la Val, the marshal de Rieux, and some others, to inform him of her distress, and demonstrate to him, that Bretagne was on the point of falling into the hands of France. This ambassy afforded the king a pretence to borrow money of his subjects, to enable him to make war upon France; and yet, tho' he seemed in extreme haste, he gave no orders for levying troops, but took particular care, about collecting the loans.

Shortly after, the league between Henry and Ferdinand was renewed; who agreed, once more, that, in May, or, at fartherest, in June, next year, each should enter France, at the head of an army; and Maximilian also engaged to do the same, who sent an aid of 2000 men to his duchess; but all this was no more than an empty flourish, in order to deter the king of France from his design to conquer Bretagne; for it was not the intent either of Henry, Ferdinand, or Maximilian, to make war upon France. Ferdinand was then entirely employed in the war of Granada; and, if he leagued with Henry, it was only to force king Charles, by the terror of the league, to restore him Rousillon, being very ready to desist, the moment he should recover the possession of that province. Maximilian's view, who wanted both men and money, was to engage the kings of England and Spain in a war with France, and reap all the fruit, by being possessed of the duchess and duchy of Bretagne; and, Henry, as he could not, in any measure, depend upon such allies, and saw Bretagne almost lost, was unwilling to engage alone in its defence. His sole design was to secure, by the dread of this league, the payment of what was owed him by France and Bretagne; and, in the interim, Henry and Ferdinand, to attain their ends, feigned a real intention to make war upon France. 1491.

Charles VIII. demands Ann in marriage. Argentre. P. Daniel.

Whilst these two monarchs were taking measures to execute their designs, and the ambassadors of Bretagne waited, to no purpose, at London, Charles caused the siege of Rennes to be continued; but, the siege being in an ill way, and the season far advanced, he found out a speedier and more effectual means, than the sword, to secure Bretagne. He gained, by his liberalities, all the young duchess's counsellors, whom he employed, to persuade her to break off her marriage with Maximilian, and take himself for her husband; and, perhaps, he had formed that project before; but, however, he first discovered it, during the siege of Rennes. Being secure of the concurrence of the lords of Bretagne, he caused the duchess, then above 15 years of age, to be so strenuously importuned, that she had not a moment's repose; but, at first, she courageously withstood all their sollicitations, affirming that she could not resolve to be false to a prince whom she had voluntarily espoused. However, it was represented to her, that Maximilian had abandoned her, first; that, instead of coming, in person, to defend her, or, at least, of sending her sufficient aids, he had remained quietly, in Germany, as if he was, no way, concerned in the affairs of Bretagne; that, at present, it was impossible to prevent Bretagne from becoming a province of France, and Maximilian would regard her still less, when he found her dispossessed of her dominions; nay, perhaps, she would have the mortification to see, that he himself would cancel his marriage, by which means she would lose, at once, both her duchy and spouse, and reduce her subjects to slavery: That, in marrying king Charles, she might preserve, by a treaty, the sovereignty and liberties of Bretagne; whereas, by an obstinate and ineffectual defence, she would ruin her subjects, without reaping any advantage herself: In fine, that the king of France was more suitable to one of her age; and that 1491. that the glorious titles of queen of the Romans, and empreſs, did not outweigh that of queen of France, with a real kingdom. In the mean time, the ducheſs reſiſting, Charles thought of another expedient, to conquer her reſolution; for he went himſelf, and releaſed the duke of Orleans out of the tower of Bourges, where he was confined, after the battle of St. Aubin, and told him, that, being ſenſible of his great intereſt with the ducheſs of Bretagne, he required him, in return for his liberty, to labour to prevail on her to comply with his deſires. The duke of Orleans, tired of his impriſonment, readily accepted of the office, and, repairing to Rennes, ſucceeded, at laſt, in determining the ducheſs to the marriage; which was concluded, December, 1491.

He employs the duke of Orleans; who prevails on the ducheſs, and the marriage is concluded. Argentre. Mezerai.

Whilſt this affair was in agitation, Charles amuſed the Engliſh ambaſſadors, being unwilling to come to any concluſion, or even treat with them, till he knew the reſult of his negotiation with Ann; but, at laſt, the ambaſſadors, hearing that the marriage was on the point of being concluded, withdrew, about the end of November, without taking leave. Thus, Henry perceived, and not without confuſion, that his avaricious policy was defeated, not only as he had not ſaved Bretagne, but principally as the re-imburſement of the ſums, he had advanced, was become more precarious, than ever; yet he had ſtill one refuge left, which he had the art to improve, and that brought him off, if not with honour, at leaſt, with a pecuniary advantage, which he chiefly conſulted, in all his proceedings. Fortunately for him, Charles perſiſted in his deſign of conquering the kingdom of Naples; and, as a rupture with England would have laid inſuperable obſtacles in his way, he reſolved to avoid it, by all poſſible means. Henry, on his part, well knowing that, at the preſent juncture, Charles would not ſcruple to purchaſe a peace, feigned an extreme reſentment of the affront he had received, and a reſolution to be revenged, at any expence; and, the very moment his ambaſſadors made their report, he iſſued out orders to levy forces, and prepare tranſports, intimating, that he would undertake the moſt dreadful war that had ever been, between England and France. He ſeemed to prepare to tread in the ſteps of Edward III. and Henry V, and not think of ſtopping, till he had wreſted the crown of France from the houſe of Valois; but we ſhall preſently ſee the iſſue of all this ardor.

Henry prepares for war. Act. Pub.

The king of the Romans threatens high.

Maximilian was inraged, to find that Charles had ſo injuriouſly robbed him of his wife; and he threatened, like Henry, to carry fire and ſword into the heart of France, in revenge of ſuch a mortal affront. On the other hand, the archduke Philip demanded his ſiſter, Margaret, who was at Paris, and contracted to king Charles; but the court of France did not, as yet, think fit to ſend back that princeſs. They feared neither father nor ſon; and they made it their whole ſtudy to avert the ſtorm, with which they were threatened from England and Spain, tho it was not near ſo violent, in reality as in appearance; but, before I relate the effects of this quarrel, it will be neceſſary briefly to enter upon the affairs of Scotland.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Since James IV's acceſſion to the crown of Scotland, he had found it extremely difficult to ſupport himſelf on the throne; and the troubles, that, immediately, broke out, ſtill continued, by the policy of king Henry, who took care to foment them; for he gave, from time to time, the Scotch male-contents ſome little aids, which enabled them to maintain their ground, but not to make any remarkable progreſs againſt their ſovereign. It is very uſual, with princes, to cheriſh the commotions among their neighbours, taking it to be the moſt effectual way to preſerve peace, at home, tho' there are ſome, who would ſcruple to uſe ſuch methods; but Henry was not of this number; for he even ſeems to have been leſs ſcrupulous than many others, ſince it appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the lord Bothwel and Sir Thomas Tod, both Scots, had engaged to deliver up to him the perſons of the king of Scotland and the duke of Roſs, his brother, which could not be done, without notorious treachery. Nay, it is evident from the record, that he had lent the earl of Buchan and Sir Thomas Tod 2661. 13s. 4d. Sterling, to enable them to execute this deſign, and that Tod left his ſon in hoſtage, for ſecurity; which act is dated, April the 17th, 1491.

A truce between England and Scotland, in vain.

This project failing, Henry, who was preparing for the war in France, was willing, firſt, to prevent the diverſions the Scots might make, in England, during his abſence; and king James deſired nothing more than to deprive his rebellious ſubjects of the protection always afforded them by the king of England; ſo that, the two kings ſending their ambaſſadors to Caldſtream upon Tweed, a treaty of truce was concluded, from the 21ſt of December, to the ſame day five years, 1496; purſuant to which, the city of Berwick, with its territory, was to ſtand neuter, and the lordſhip of Lorn, in Scotland, with the little iſland of Lundey belonging to England, were excepted out of this treaty. Henry ratified it, January the 9th, 1492; but, probably, the king of Scotland, whether bribed by France, or from ſome other motive, refuſed to confirm it; tho' he conſented to a much ſhorter truce, from the 20th of February, 1492, to the 20th of November following.

1492. France is threatened on all ſides.

France ſeemed to be threatened, from all ſides, with a furious war; for Maximilian vigorouſly preſſed it, expecting that his ſon Philip, then 20 years old, would make a powerful diverſion, in Flanders, whilſt the allies acted, in other places; and Henry openly made preparations for war, with great noiſe and boaſtings. In fine, Ferdinand and Iſabella, who had lately, in a glorious manner, compleated the war with the Moors, by the taking of Granada, publickly threatened to invade France; wherefore, Charles would have been greatly embarraſſed, if this formidable league had been, in reality, what it was, in appearance. Upon his being maſter of Bretagne, he thought of executing his 1492. his grand project, relating to the conqueſt of Naples; but he muſt, firſt, diſpel the ſtorm that was gathering, in Spain, England, and Flanders; and, whilſt he was wholly employed about this affair, Henry was no leſs intent upon his own concerns.

Henry acquaints the parliament with his deſign to war upon France.

In the beginning of 1492, he convened a parliament, and communicated to both houſes his deſign to carry war into France, not with an intent to ask their advice, as in the caſe of Bretagne, but to acquaint them with his reſolution to do all that was poſſible to recover the kingdom of France, which he ſtiled the inheritance of his anceſtors; and, to inflame them the more, he reminded them of the glorious battles of Crecy, Poictiers, and Azincourt, wherein the Engliſh alone, with a ſmall number of troops, defeated the ſtrongeſt armies of France; by which he would inſinuate, that he was no leſs a warrior than Edward III, the prince of Wales, his ſon, and Henry V. In demanding a ſubſidy proportionable to the greatneſs of the undertaking, he exhorted the commons to ſpare the purſes of the poor, and lay the tax upon the rich, not, in the leaſt, doubting, that they would grant his requeſt; tho', certainly, great fault might have been found with his miſmanagement of the former aid given, for the defence of Bretagne, ſince the duchy was loſt, without his uſing the leaſt endeavours to prevent it; but the conqueſt of France was a very proper decoy to draw in the parliament. Indeed, the king was not deſirous to embarque in ſuch an hazardous enterprize; for he knew that, France being now at unity with itſelf, it would be too difficult a task to conquer that kingdom. Of his two allies, the one had will but not power, and the other had power but not will, Ferdinand's view being, by the ſhow of war, to attain a peace, which might procure him the reſtitution of Rouſſillon; moreover, as he had but lately ended his war with the Moors, he was not in a condition to begin another with France. However, Henry expreſſed to his parliament and council an ardent deſire to ſignaliſe his name, by the conqueſt of France, or, at leaſt, of Normandy and Guienne; in which he had an eye to his profit, two ways, viz. upon his ſubjects, for a ſubſidy for the war, and upon his enemies, for a peace, which would ſecure him the payment of his debts. He evidently foreſaw, that the defection of the king of the Romans, and Ferdinand, would furniſh him with a ſpecious excuſe to deſiſt from a war he was undertaking, with ſo much noiſe; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the biſhop of Exeter were the only perſons, that were privy to his real intentions; the latter of whom was, ſhortly after, tranſlated to the ſee of Bath and Wells.

The parliament grants a benevolence. Bacon.

The parliament took fire, as the king expected, and granted him a very conſiderable ſum, which, purſuant to his exhortation, was to be levied upon the rich, by the name of benevolence; which ſort of tax was introduced by Edward IV, and raiſed, without the conſent of parliament. Richard III, to ingratiate himſelf with the people, aboliſhed it; but this parliament revived it, and gave it the ſeal of their authority *. 1492.

An ambaſſy from France. Feb. 5. Act. Pub.

Henry, ſoon after, received ambaſſadors from king Charles, with propoſals that were not divulged; and it is probable, that nothing was concluded, in their conferences with the archbiſhop of Canterbury and biſhop Fox, ſince the martial preparations were ſtill ſeen to continue; yet, in all likelihood, theſe ambaſſadors laid the firſt foundations of the peace, which was made, before the end of the year.

The birth of prince Henry.

In June, the queen was delivered of a prince, who ſucceeded the king, his father, by the name of Henry VIII.

Succours are ſent to the archduke.

The warlike preparations, in England, were very ſeaſonable for the archduke Philip; for, ſince the laſt year, the Gantois had revolted, once more, and placed at their head Philip de Cleves, a zealous adherent to France. Some commotions, in Holland, preventing the archduke from attempting to ſuppreſs this revolt, it was the middle of this year, before he marched againſt Philip de Cleves, and beſieged him, in Sluice; and he would have found it difficult to take that place, if Henry had not ſupplied him with 12 ſhips, and 2500 men; but, with this aid, he was enabled to compel the rebels to ſue for peace, and ſurrender Sluice into his hands.

The king not, in the leaſt, intending to puſh vigorouſly the war with France, did not haſten his preparations, being glad to begin the campaign late, in order to end it the ſooner; and, in the interim, he ſent ambaſſadors to France, to ſhew that he was, firſt of all, willing to try amicable methods; but it is extremely probable, that the deſign of this ambaſſy was only to finiſh, with king Charles, the terms of peace. Moreover, the king's honour was to be ſecured, who, after making ſo great a noiſe, could not think of deſiſting, without a ſeeming neceſſity; and, with this view, he muſt act in concert with the king of France. At the ſame time, Henry diſpatched ambaſſadors to the king of the Romans, and to Ferdinand, to ſummon them to take the field and enter France, purſuant to their treaty; but he knew they had neither power nor will, to perform their engagements. Maximilian had no army, and Ferdinand was now in treaty with Charles, for the reſtitution of Rouſſillon; and yet Henry, pretending ignorance, in theſe reſpects, in appearance, laid a great ſtreſs upon their aſſiſtance. In the beginning of Auguſt, he iſſued out orders, for the levying a great number of forces; and, on the 22d, of that month, he nominated commiſſioners to confer, at Caldſtream, with thoſe of Scotland; all which afforded him pretences, to delay his expedition. At length, tho' not till the 2d of October, he came to Dover, in 1492. order to embarque, having conſtituted, by patent, his eldeſt ſon, Arthur prince of Wales, guardian of the realm; and ſuch of his courtiers, as were ſtrangers to his real intentions, could not forbear telling him, that it was very late to begin a campaign; but he replied, "That he "did not deſign to make a ſummer's buſineſs "of the war, and, therefore, it was inſignifi- "cant, when it began; and that he had Ca- "lais at his back, where he might winter, in "order to be ready to open the campaign, "early next ſpring." He arrived, the ſame day, at Calais; where his whole army, being aſſembled, amounted to 25000 foot, and 1600 horſe.

Before the embarquement, Henry received a letter from the marſhal Deſquerdes, offering a negotiation of peace, in England; but he judged it more proper, in order to ſalve appearances, to treat, in France. He was ſcarce landed, at Calais, when the ambaſſadors, ſent to the king of the Romans, arrived, who informed him, that Maximilian was altogether unprepared to enter France, according to his promiſe; which news was, immediately, publiſhed to the whole army; and, ſome days after, he received from his ambaſſadors, in Spain, letters that were alſo made publick, importing, that Ferdinand had concluded a peace with the king of France, in which he promiſed to reſtore Rouſſillon, without demanding the 300,000 crowns lent by Lewis XI. upon that country. Henry knew all this, before, but had ſo managed, that theſe advices came together, after his arrival in France, that it might appear he was conſtrained to the peace he intended to make; and, upon theſe advices, at which he ſeemed extremely ſurpriſed, he agreed, that Richard Fox, biſhop of Bath and Wells, and the lord D'aubeney, governor of Calais, ſhould hold a conference, at Eſtaples, with the marſhal Deſquerdes. However, he marched, the 15th of October, to beſiege Boulogne, and, in four days, appeared before the place; yet it muſt be remarked, that king Charles was then at Tours, and, tho' the martial preparations, in England, had been notorious, there was no army, in Picardy, to oppoſe the invaſion of the Engliſh; at leaſt, no ſuch thing is mentioned, in Hiſtory. This clearly proves, that all Henry's proceedings were concerted with the king of France, who was not ſo ill furniſhed with troops, but he could have ſent an army ſufficient to ſtop his progreſs; ſo that this pretended ſiege of Boulogne was only an artifice to diſcourage the Engliſh, that, by conſidering the difficulties of a ſiege, at ſuch a ſeaſon, they might the leſs wonder at a peace; and, at the end of eight days, Henry received, at the camp before Boulogne, the articles of peace agreed by the commiſſioners of both parties, with the conſent of the two monarchs, the ſubſtance of which was, as follows:

A remark on the king's conduct.

Articles agreed upon by the commiſſioners of the two kings. Act. Pub.

I. That the king of France ſhould pay the debt contracted by his queen, for the defence of Bretagne; which, according to the account of the Engliſh ambaſſadors, amounted to 620,000 crowns of gold, French money, or 124,000 l. ſterling.

II. That the king of France ſhould diſcharge to the king of England the arrears of the annual penſion of 50,000 crowns paid by Lewis XI. to Edward IV, amounting, in the whole, to 125,000 crowns, or 25,000l. ſterling.

III. That the king of France ſhould pay theſe two debts, at ſeveral times, viz. 50,000 livres, every year, each livre at 20 ſcutz, or crowns, and to be paid half-yearly, till the whole was diſcharged.

IV. Whereas, in the obligation of the ducheſs of Bretagne to the king of England, there was no ſum ſpecified, the king of England ſhould be obliged to prove his debt, before commiſſioners of Bretagne, or France, to be ſent to England, on that account.

V. That the two kings ſhould name ſuch of their allies, as they intended to include in the peace, who ſhould declare, within four months, whether they would be included, or not.

VI. That, provided the king of the Romans and the archduke Philip, his ſon, deſired to be included in the treaty, if afterwards the king of France ſhould, in any manner, invade their country, the king of England might lawfully aſſiſt them; but, if, on the contrary, they ſhould attack the king of France, the king of England ſhould give them no aſſiſtance.

VII. That, if the two kings conſented to theſe articles, they ſhould give each other hoſtages, till the treaty was drawn up and ſigned, in form.

Henry asks the opinion of his principal officers, who adviſe him to peace.

As theſe articles exactly correſponded with Henry's ſentiments, from the beginning of the war of Bretagne, doubtleſs, they were framed by himſelf, or his own ambaſſadors; and yet he would have them accounted propoſals from the French king, and pretended to queſtion, whether he ſhould accept, or reject them; wherefore, he called a council of all the lords and general officers, and ſent them the articles, with his orders to give him their real opinion. As this council, in all probability, was managed by ſome perſon of great credit, who was in the king's ſecret, all that were preſent unanimouſly agreed, that he ought to accept of the terms; and they inſerted their reaſons in a long memorial, under all their hands, which, omitting the exaggerations, were, as follow:

Their reaſons for ſo doing. Act. Pub.

I. The firſt reaſon was drawn from the length of the nights, the ſeverity of the weather, the want of proviſions, as they were to come, by ſea, the fear of diſtempers, and the like.

II. They inſiſted on the conſideration of the ſum offered, far exceeding any ever yet paid by France to the king's predeceſſors; and alſo on the apprehenſion of the murmurings the refuſal of a peace might occaſion, in England, and in the army.

III. They alledged the great benefit that would accrue, by the peace, to the king of the Romans and the archduke; the advantage they had already received, in the reſtitution of 1492. Sluice; and, laſtly, the fruits which the Engliſh merchants would reap, ſince the peace would ſecure their commerce with Flanders.

IV. They ſaid, that the king had honourably performed his engagements with his allies, in ſpite of the inſtances of his council, who ſollicited him to defer his expedition to a more convenient ſeaſon, and till his allies ſhould be prepared; that he had led his army into France, put himſelf in a condition to oppoſe alone all the enemy's forces, and expoſed his perſon to the greateſt dangers, at a juncture when his allies diſappointed him; and that, therefore, if the war was diſcontinued, he might very juſtly charge the blame upon them.

V. That the king was far from being in ſo good a ſituation, as Edward IV, when he conducted an army into France; for that monarch was joined by the duke of Burgundy, with all his forces, and by ſeveral French lords who were in his intereſt; and he was poſſeſſed of all the towns, as far as the Somme, and began the war, in the midſt of ſummer; but that, on the contrary, the king was not aided by any foreign troops: That, when he marched out of Calais, he entered the enemy's country, and was advanced to Boulogne; and that he had razed ſeveral places, as Ardres and Montory, and had ſtood, 24 days, ready for battle, defying the armies of France.

VI. That, very probably, the Engliſh would thank the king for a peace, which would put a period to taxes and exactions, and reſtore the publick tranquillity.

VII. They likewiſe added, that the reſtoring the archduke to his dominions would redound to the king's honour, and the nation's advantage, becauſe of their trade with his ſubjects.

VIII. They alledged, that, before the ſiege of Boulogne, it was believed to be a weak place and eaſy to be taken; whereas it was found to be well fortified, ſtrongly garriſoned, and plentifully ſtored with artillery and proviſions; wherefore, in all probability, if the king continued the ſiege, he would be compelled to raiſe it, with diſgrace, tho', by making a peace, he could retire with honour.

IX. They ſaid, that it was impracticable to continue the war, during the winter, without utterly deſtroying the army, which would extremely afflict the whole kingdom.

Remarks on theſe reaſons.

If theſe reaſons are never ſo ſlightly conſidered, they will appear to be all fallacious, except the article of the money; but, without canvaſing them too ſtrictly, I ſhall only obſerve, that, of all the inconveniencies mentioned by the officers, there was not one which was not obvious, and which the king did not actually foreſee; ſo that he could only blame himſelf, for beginning the campaign ſo late. All, in the 5th article concerning Edward IV, is evidently falſe; and, as to the murmurs of the people, which were pretended to be feared, if the king rejected the peace, it was, on the contrary, much more probable, that the nation would murmur to ſee the money, levied for a war with France, employed about a diſhonourable peace, advantageous only to the king; in a word, his cauſing this peace to be approved by the officers of his army evidently ſhewed, that he was himſelf convinced, how little it would redound to the advantage of England. 1492.

A treaty concluded at Eſtaples. Act. Pub.

Henry, feigning to be determined by theſe conſiderations to accept of the peace, the treaty was drawn up, in form, and ſigned, at Eſtaples, the 3d of November; and Charles ratified it, the 6th of that month; who was then at Tours, unconcerned at the ſeemingly threatened invaſion, tho' an Engliſh army, in France, had never failed to give his predeceſſors the greateſt uneaſineſs. It was peculiar to this treaty, that, tho' it was ſtiled a treaty of a peace, it was to laſt no longer, than the lives of the two kings; but the ſucceſſor of him, that died firſt, was to ratify it, within a year after his acceſſion to the crown; which, in my opinion, was an expedient deviſed to excuſe the ſilence concerning the kingdom of France, or, at leaſt, Guienne and Normandy, of which there was not the leaſt mention, tho' the war was proclaimed, ſolely upon that occaſion. In the interim, this treaty, which properly concerned only the payment of two debts, was to be approved and confirmed by the ſtates of France, and the parliament of England; which proves, that it was not conſidered, as a bare truce, and, indeed, it was called a treaty of peace; but, on the other hand, it is difficult to conceive, how a treaty, in which the principal difference was not ſettled, and which was to expire, upon the death of the two kings, could be accounted a treaty of peace; for nothing could more reſemble a truce. However this be, Henry was extremely ſollicitous to ſee, that king Charles ratified every article of the treaty, and eſpecially thoſe relating to the payment of the money; and Charles was, on his part, very punctual, in paying the 50,000 livres, every year, as was alſo Lewis XII, his ſucceſſor.

Reflections on the affairs of Bretagne.

Thus, ended the war of Bretagne, which had continued, ſince the year 1487; I ſay the war of Bretagne, becauſe that, I have been ſpeaking of, was only a conſequence of the other; and Henry reaped the intended benefit, namely large ſums of money which were not expended, in the ſervice of the publick. Firſt, he obtained of the parliament a tenth of all the perſonal eſtates of his ſubjects, of which he laid out no more than was neceſſary, for levying and ſupporting 6000 men, for eight months; but this expence was only advanced, the money being repaid him with intereſt; and we have ſeen, that he mounted his charges to 620,000 crowns of gold, a prodigious ſum, in thoſe days, when money was much ſcarcer, than at preſent. In the next place, he borrowed money, over all the whole kingdom, which, probably, was never repaid; and he had a ſubſidy, under the name of benevolence, 1492. nevolence, which amounted to a vaſt ſum, much exceeding what was ſufficient for the maintenance of his army, for two or three months. Laſtly, he received 125000 crowns, for the arrears of the penſion due to Edward IV; but, on the other hand, he ſuffered Bretagne to be loſt, to the irreparable prejudice of England, ſince her alliance with the duke of Bretagne gave her an advantage over France, which ſhe could never recover. Moreover, the recovery of the money, advanced for Bretagne, is to be aſcribed rather to his good fortune than policy; for he was entirely indebted for it to the king of France's deſign upon the kingdom of Naples, which induced him to purchaſe a treaty with England; for, otherwiſe, Henry would have found it a very hard task to recover his money, and who knows what might have been the iſſue, had he been forced to obtain it, by dint of ſword? However, the fruits Charles reaped, by this peace, were much more conſiderable; becauſe, for the penſion of 50,000 livres paid, a few years, and which he received with intereſt from Bretagne, he annexed that duchy to the crown of France, and deprived the Engliſh of their principal ally.

I have inſiſted the longer on the circumſtances of this affair, becauſe they perfectly diſcover the genius and character of Henry VII; who, ever greedy of money, and always conſulting his own intereſt, made an advantage, whether of war, or peace; and it was he that, by his policy, wholly bent to promote his ſelfiſh ends, gave the turn we have ſeen to the affairs of Bretagne.

A truce with Scotland.

The very day the peace of Eſtaples was ſigned, the ambaſſadors of England and Scotland concluded, at Caldſtream, a truce, from the 3d of November, this year, to the 30th of April, 1494.

Henry, having made a peace with France, purſuant to his own ſcheme, ſet out for London, where he arrived, the 17th of December.

On the 5th of November, the archduke's forces ſurpriſed Arras, which had been, fifteen years, in the poſſeſſion of the French; and, Philip refuſing to be included in the treaty of Eſtaples, the war continued, in Flanders, till the following year.

Columbus's firſt voyage.

In Auguſt, this year, Chriſtopher Columbus ſailed, the firſt time, from Cadiz, with king Ferdinand's licenſe, in queſt of the new world *.

1493. Henry imagined, that he ſhould, for the future, enjoy a peaceable reign; for there was not, among his ſubjects, the leaſt appearance of a revolt; and no prince, or princeſs, of the houſe of York was in a condition to give him any diſturbance. The earl of Warwick was ſtill a priſoner, in the tower; Edward IV's daughters were in his power; and there was not a lord of the York-party of ſufficient credit, to raiſe commotions in the kingdom. Beſides, he was in peace, or truce, with his neighbours; and, in the ſeven years and a half that he had ſat on the throne, he had, by his œconomy, accumulated ſuch large ſums of money, as none of his predeceſſors had ever been maſter of, at once; but yet this ſtate of proſperity was incapable of diſmaying his enemies; for whilſt he was entirely taken up with the affairs I have juſt related, the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy was labouring to raiſe him domeſtick troubles, ſo much the more dangerous, as they were not ſuſpected. This princeſs was not inſenſible, how well affected the Engliſh and Iriſh were to the houſe of York; and ſhe principally built her hopes of dethroning Henry upon their affection. Tho' Simnel's affair had miſcarried, ſhe did not aſcribe the ill ſucceſs ſo much to the project itſelf, as to the managers; moreover, Henry was expoſed to the hazard of a battle, which he might have loſt, and it was not impoſſible but he might be defeated, hereafter, if he ſhould be in the ſame ſituation; and, thus, ſhe did not deſpair of wreſting the crown from the houſe of Lancaſter, or rather of Tudor, after which, ſhe thought it would not be difficult to reſtore the houſe of York. 1493.

Since Simnel's misfortune, ſhe had inceſſantly ſpread a report, either by herſelf, or emiſſaries, that Richard, duke of York, ſecond ſon to Edward IV, having eſcaped the cruelty of his uncle, Richard III, was ſtill alive; and this ſhe did, to prepare the people to receive a ſecond phantom, who was to perſonate the young prince, her nephew, as Simnel had done the earl of Warwick. With this view, ſhe induſtriouſly ſought out for young lads, of the duke of York's age, fit for her purpoſe; and, at length, ſhe found one, in whom ſhe fancied to ſee all the qualities requiſite to repreſent that prince. His name was Perkin Warbeck, ſon to John Osbeck, a Jewiſh convert of Tournay, who had long lived at London; and Edward IV, having occaſion to know this Jew, and receive ſome ſervice from him, did him the honour to ſtand godfather to one of his children, and gave him the name of Peter, from whence was derived the diminutive Peterkin, or Perkin; but, ſome years after, Osbeck, returning into Flanders, placed young Perkin with one of his relations, at Antwerp, who kept him, ſome time. This boy was ſo handſome, and endowed with qualities ſo far ſurpaſſing his birth, that many ſuſpected him to be ſon to Edward IV; and, indeed, it was ſomewhat extraordinary, that Edward ſhould ſtand godfather to one of ſo mean extraction. Perkin, leaving Antwerp, lived in ſeveral towns of Flanders, and ſhifted his habitation ſo often, that, when Henry afterwards would have traced him, in order to learn the whole ſtory of his life, he found it extremely difficult; and, as Perkin generally converſed with the Engliſh ſettled in the Low-Countries, he was ſo perfect in the Engliſh

The ducheſs inſtructs him. Hall. Bacon.

This lad being mentioned to the ducheſs of Burgundy, ſhe cauſed him to be ſecretly brought to her palace; and, finding him proper for her purpoſe, ſhe took care to inſtruct him, with reſpect to the perſon he was to repreſent; from whence it may be preſumed, that Perkin was a youth of great wit and ſenſe, to enter into the ducheſs's deſigns, otherwiſe it would have been fruitleſs to give him inſtructions. She ſo frequently deſcribed Edward IV, his queen, prince Edward, their eldeſt ſon, and the princeſſes, their daughters, that, after ſeveral repetitions of her leſſion, he could talk very pertinently of the court of the king, his pretended father, at leaſt, as far as the duke of York could be ſuppoſed to have a knowledge of it; and the natural way he had acquired, of relating circumſtances fit for a child's memory, and certain particulars of Edward's court, induced the ducheſs to conclude, that he would not fail to gain credit, when he appeared in the world. Above all, ſhe took care thoroughly to teach him what he was to frame, whilſt in ſanctuary with the queen, and when taken from thence by the contrivance of Richard III, and particularly in the manner of his eſcaping from the executioners, who were ordered to murder him; which things might ſo much the eaſier be counterfeited, as few people could contradict them; and, beſides, ſhe taught him to aſſume the air and character of a well-bred prince. The youth was ſo apt a ſcholar, that ſhe was herſelf aſtoniſhed at it; for, in a ſhort time, Perkin contracted ſuch a habit of talking and acting, like a prince, that one would have ſworn he had been born ſo, and educated in a palace.

It is not known, when the ducheſs of Burgundy took Perkin home, to inſtruct him; but, in all probability, it was not long after the battle of Stoke, wherein the earl of Lincoln and Simnel were defeated. However that be, the affair of Bretagne leading that princeſs to think, that Henry would ſoon break with France, as himſelf would have had it believed, reſolved, that Perkin ſhould appear, as duke of York, ſo ſoon as the war was begun; and, in the interim, being very ſenſible that, if he appeared firſt, in Flanders, or in any town, in the Low-Countries, the world would not fail to ſuſpect her, ſhe ſent him into Portugal, where he lived in obſcurity, for a year; but, at length, in 1492, the war between England and France ſeeming unavoidable, ſhe diſpatched orders to Perkin, to repair into Ireland, where, probably, ſhe had already tampered with ſeveral perſons of diſtinction. Perkin, inſtantly, obeying, and arriving at Cork, ſtiled himſelf duke of York, ſon of Edward IV, in which he was countenanced by the mayor, who, it is likely, was concerned in the plot; and, a few days after, he wrote to the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, zealous adherents to the houſe of York, acquainting them with his arrival.

She ſends him to Portugal.

Henry was, then, employed in preparing for his expedition into France; and, as the ducheſs of Burgundy imagined he would depart, early in the ſpring, ſhe expected, that he would be involved in the war with France, by the time Perkin appeared in Ireland, in which ſhe was miſtaken; for the report, that the duke of York was come from Portugal into Ireland, occaſioned no alteration in Henry's meaſures, who apprehended it to be only a contrivance to divert him from his enterprize. However, preſently after, he heard, that the duke of York was gone from Ireland into France, which gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs; and, indeed, the news was but too well grounded. It happened, ſome time before, that one Frion, ſecretary to the king, for the French tongue, had withdrawn from court, and retred to Paris, where he was very kindly received; and this Frion, who followed king Charles's court, being informed that the duke of York was in Ireland, told that monarch of it, intimating, that he might make that affair turn to his advantage. Whatever were Charles's ſentiments of this pretender, he really believed, that, tho' he was an impoſtor, he might be uſeful to him, in making a peace with Henry; wherefore, he ſent Frion into Ireland, to invite him, in his name, to come to him, with aſſurance of his protection, and aid to recover the crown of his anceſtors. Perkin, receiving this invitation from a prince ſo great, and ſo able to aſſiſt him, departed, immediately; and, arriving in France, he waited on the king, who gave him a very gracious reception, treated him, as duke of York, lodged him in his palace, and aſſigned him a guard, under the pretence of doing him honour, but in reality to prevent his being ſeized, by order of the king of England. The courtiers, copying after their maſter, paid no leſs reſpect to Perkin, than if he had actually been duke of York; and, ſhortly after, above 100 Engliſhmen, diſcontented with Henry, repaired to Paris, with offers of their ſervice to the pretender; but the honours, Perkin received, at the court of France, were of a ſhort continuance. As ſoon as Charles had a fair proſpect of a peace, he diſmiſſed him, leſt the king of England, who now demanded him, ſhould make it one of the articles of the treaty; for, he was unwilling to be thought to ſurpriſe the young man, in order to deliver him up to his enemy; and on the other hand, he would not have the peace miſcarry, on his account.

Charles VIII. ſends for Perkin to Paris.

Perkin conſidered his freedom, as a ſingular happineſs; ſince he was apprehenſive of worſe uſage, when he heard, that a peace was negotiating between the two kings. Having readily left the court of France, he retired into Flanders to the ducheſs of Burgundy, very induſtriouſly concealing that he had ever ſeen her before; and, at the firſt interview, Margaret, playing her part extremely well, treated him very roughly, and ſeemed much ſurpriſed, that, in her preſence, he ſhould preſume to ſtile himſelf duke of York. She openly ſaid, that, having been already deceived by a counterfeit 1493. counterfeit earl of Warwick, it would be more difficulr to impoſe on her, a ſecond time; and, therefore, ſhe adviſed him to withdraw, leſt he incurred the puniſhment due to his inſolence. Perkin did not ſeem, in the leaſt, concerned at theſe menaces; but, confeſſing that ſhe was in the right to doubt, he perſiſted in affirming, that he was the duke of York, her nephew. The ducheſs, feigning a deſire to prove him an impoſtor, asked him, before her whole court, certain queſtions, to which, ſhe knew, he could make pertinent anſwers; and, accordingly, he replied, in ſo natural and unaffected a manner, as to aſtoniſh the ducheſs. In a word, they acted their parts ſo well, that the ducheſs, pretending ſhe could not withſtand ſuch evident proofs, owned him, for her nephew, aſſigned him a guard of 30 halberdiers, and gave him the title of the white Roſe, the badge of the houſe of York; and Perkin, on his part, laboured to ſatisfy the world, that he was the real duke of York, by his natural way of relating the principal occurrences of his life. If, at any time, his diſmiſſion out of France was objected to him, he anſwered, with a ſigh, it was not very ſurpriſing, that a young prince, perſecuted by fortune, ſhould be ſacrificed to the policy of two potent monarchs; and that this very particular was a ſtrong argument in his favour, ſince the peace, between Charles and Henry, could only be eſtabliſhed upon his ruin. What Perkin ſaid, together with the ducheſs's publick approbation, convinced the whole court, that he was the true duke of York; and from thence the rumour ſpread over all the Low-Countries, and, at laſt, all Europe.

Many in England believe the duke of York to be alive. Hall. Bacon.

News being brought into England, about the beginning of 1493, that the duke of York was in Flanders, and acknowledged by the ducheſs of Burgundy, it was credited by an infinite number of people, ſome of whom diſliked the king, and others were greedy of novelty. Some implicitly followed their leaders; and others, of deſperote fortunes, were deſirous of a change in the government. The king was not generally beloved; and the loſs of Bretagne, his late treaty with the king of France, the uncivil uſage the queen and the whole houſe of York had met with, and did daily receive at his hands, and, laſtly, his unneceſſary taxes were but too apt to induce the people to wiſh the report to be true.

The king's conduct.

The king was aſtoniſhed to ſee, with what greedineſs the news was believed; and it made him ſenſible, that he was in great danger from the Yorkiſts, who were ready to embrace all opportunities, to promote his ruin. However, he appeared unconcerned, leſt his fears ſhould encourage his enemies; and, therefore, continuing to act, as uſual, he waited, till they more manifeſtly diſcovered their deſigns.

He ſends the garter to the duke of Calabria. Act. Pub.

In the beginning of March, Henry ſent the order of the garter to Alphonſo, duke of Calabria, eldeſt ſon to Ferdinand, king of Naples; who had been extremely deſirous of this honour, to inſinuate to the Italian princes, that he was under the king of England's protection; and to induce them to league with the king, his father, againſt Charles VIII, who was reſolved to undertake the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples.

A few days after, Henry concluded, at London, a treaty of perpetual peace and friendſhip with Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Caſtile and Arragon; which alliance was a mutual engagement to aſſiſt each other, on all occaſions. It was ſo far particular, as it did not extend to all the kings of England and Spain, without diſtinction, but only to all their ſucceſſors deſcending from them; and, in this treaty, the marriage-articles between prince Arthur and Catharine, daughter to Ferdinand and Iſabella, were confirmed and renewed.

He concludes a perpetual peace with Ferdinand and Iſabella. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the king's enemies, not content with embracing the report concerning the duke of York, laboured to form a plot, to dethrone him; for his avaricious temper had alienated ſeveral of the firmeſt adherents to his perſon and the houſe of Lancaſter; and William Stanley, lord chamberlain, brother to the earl of Derby, John Ratcliffe, the lord Fitz-Walter, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, and William Barley, were the principal conſpirators. The lord chamberlain had greatly contributed to his victory of Boſworth, by declaring for him, in ſo critical a moment; and, tho' the king owned it, he thought him ſufficiently rewarded with the ſpoils of Boſworth-field, and the office of lord chamberlain; but Stanley was diſſatisfied, who thought it too mean a recompence for his ſervice. Sir Robert Clifford was ſon to him that murdered the young earl of Rutland, brother to Edward IV, at the battle of Wakefield; and who afterwards loſt his life, in fighting for the houſe of Lancaſter; but Henry, perhaps, had forgotten the conſtant attachment of that family to his houſe, and neglected to give him a ſhare in his favours. Clifford and Barley were deputed to go into Flanders, to concert meaſures with the ducheſs of Burgundy and the pretended duke of York, for the execution of their deſigns; and they were very civilly received by that princeſs, who conſidered it, as an auſpicious omen, that avowed enemies of her houſe ſhould be the firſt to offer their ſervice. Soon after their arrival, Clifford wrote to his friends, in England, that the duke of York, ſon to Edward IV, was in Flanders, and that he knew him perfectly well; which news inflamed the conſpirators, who, from that time, did all that wat poſſible, to promote the intereſt of the pretended duke of York.

A conſpiracy againſt the king. Bacon.

Whilſt the king's enemies were ſollicitous to create him troubles, he himſelf was no leſs intent upon deviſing means, to avert the impending ſtorm; and his main buſineſs was to undeceive the people. To ſucceed, in this, he had occaſion for two ſorts of proofs, it being neceſſary to ſhew, firſt, that the duke of York was dead; and, ſecondly, that, tho' he was alive, the perſon that borrowed his name, was an impoſtor.

who had diſpatched him, or ſeen him dead, and who were only four, in all; viz. Sir James Tyrrel, ordered by Richard III. to take away that prince's life; John Dighton, employed by Tyrrel to commit the fact; Miles Foreſt, his ſervant, who aſſiſted him; and the prieſt who buried both the princes. Of theſe perſons, the prieſt and Foreſt were dead; ſo that there remained only Tyrrel and Dighton, who were apprehended by the king's order and impriſoned. After a private examination, it was given out, that they agreed in their depoſitions; namely, that Dighton and Foreſt ſmothered the two princes in their bed, and ſhewed their dead bodies to Tyrrel; and that the prieſt afterwards buried them, under a ſtair-caſe; but that, ſoon after, Richard ordered them to be removed, elſewhere, by the ſame prieſt who was ſince dead, without diſcovering where he laid them. However, it is likely, that Tyrrel's depoſition was not ſo favourable to the king's purpoſe, as Dighton's, ſince he was detained in priſon; whereas Dighton was enlarged, probably, that he might divulge his own evidence.

Objections againſt the depoſitions. Bacon.

The publication of theſe teſtimonies did not produce the effect expected; for what vertue could there be in a confeſſion, taken at a private examination, and publiſhed by him, whoſe intereſt it was to make it appear for his advantage? Beſides, the removal of the bodies from the place, where they were firſt interred, to another unknown, juſtly occaſioned violent ſuſpicions; for, were it not for this removal, nothing would have been more eaſy than to prove the death of the two princes, ſince the bodies would have been ſtill found, under the ſtair-caſe; and, therefore, people imagined, that the king, wanting ſuch a natural proof, had invented this removal. Moreover, the teſtimony of two villains, who confeſſed themſelves guilty of ſo black a crime, and whoſe evidence was ſo advantageous to the king, could not be very convincing; and, accordingly, the king, finding this method inſufficient to undeceive the people, made it his principal ſtudy to diſcover, who this impoſtor was, that pretended to be the duke of York.

The king ſends ſpies into Flanders.

To ſucceed in this deſign, he could think of no better expedient, than to bribe ſeveral perſons, who repaired to the counterfeit duke, under the pretence of offering him their ſervice; and he charged them to leave no method unattempted, to know, who and whence he was, and to trace him, from his nativity to the day he came to the ducheſs of Burgundy. He likewiſe ordered them to inquire ſtrictly after his correſpondents, in England, and narrowly watch every thing that paſſed about him; eſpecially he enjoined ſome of the moſt prudent, to ſpare no pains, or expence, to gain Sir Robert Clifford, much ſuſpecting him to be concerned in the ſecret. It is ſaid, that, in order to make diſcoveries, he bribed the ſervants, and even the very confeſſors of the great men he ſuſpected; and, to procure his ſpies, in Flanders, the greater credit, he uſed to have them pronounced excommunicate, every Sunday, at St. Paul's, by vertue of a bull of pope Innocent VIII. He was ſo effectually ſerved by theſe ſpies, that he ſoon found, that the pretended duke of York was no other than Perkin Warbeck; and he had a perfect information of his birth, life, actions, profeſſion, and of all the places he had lived at, from his childhood; which was inſtantly divulged, in all parts of the kingdom. However, as the particulars were publiſhed by the king, the principal party concerned, the generality of the people did not think themſelves obliged to believe him, upon his bare word; but their prejudice made them require more convincing proofs.

1493. He learns the whole ſtory of Perkin, and publiſhes it.

During theſe tranſactions, he was employed about two affairs, from which he wanted to be diſengaged, leſt any troubles ſhould ariſe in the kingdom, on account of the pretended duke of York. The firſt was, to make peace with Scotland; and the ſecond, to procure the pope's confirmation of the peace of Eſtaples, purſuant to his agreement with the king of France. With this view, he ſent ambaſſadors to Edinburgh and Rome; and the former concluded with king James a truce, from April the 30th, 1494, to that day ſeven years, 1501, upon the ſame terms with that of Caldſtream, which expired, the day that this was to commence. It appears from the ambaſſadors inſtructions, that he deſired to conclude a marriage, between the king of Scotland and Catharine, daughter to the counteſs of Wiltſhire, and grand-daughter to the duke of Somerſet; but this match was not propoſed, or, at leaſt, the negotiation did not prove ſucceſsful.

A ſeven years truce with Scotland. Jan. 25. Act. Pub.

As to the affair of Rome, the ambaſſadors petitioned pope Alexander VI, for a bull of excommunication againſt whichſoever of the two kings ſhould violate the treaty of Eſtaples; and the pope, owning it to be one of the articles of the treaty, anſwered, that he was ready to grant ſuch a bull, provided the king of France did not oppoſe it, an inſtrument of which he ordered to be given to the ambaſſadors.

The 21ſt of the ſaid month, John Moreton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was made a cardinal of St. Anaſtaſius.

Moreton is made a cardinal.

Henry, having had a thorough information of every circumſtance relating to Perkin Warbeck, ſent ambaſſadors to the archduke Philip, to deſire him to deliver him up; repreſenting, "That it was contrary to the law of nations, "and the alliance they had made together, to "protect a counterfeit, who ſought to rob him "of the crown by an evident impoſture; that "he had an account of all the paſſages of Per-"kin's life, from his cradle, and offered to "produce authentick proofs of the cheat, as "well as of the death of the duke of York, "whoſe name Warbeck borrowed; and that, "as Perkin was only a theatrical king form-"ed by the ducheſs of Burgundy, he hoped "that the archduke would not ſcruple to ſur-"render him into his hands." Philip being ſtill a minor, his council told the ambaſſadors, "That

The treaty of Senlis between Charles VIII. and Philip.

Philip thought, that he had then the leſs reaſon to regard the king of England, as he had made a peace with Charles VIII, by a treaty concluded, at Senlis, the 23d of May; by which, Charles had reſtored to the archduke his ſiſter, Margaret, with the earldoms of Artois and Burgundy; yet he detained ſome towns, on promiſe to reſign them, as ſoon as Philip was of age.

A rupture between Henry and Philip. Hall.

The ambaſſadors brought Philip's anſwer to the king, and, at the ſame time, told him, that there was a colluſion between him and the ducheſs of Burgundy; and, upon this news, Henry broke off all commerce with the archduke, and baniſhed all the Flemings out of his kingdom. The archduke did the ſame by the Engliſh, in Flanders; but the animoſity between theſe two princes proceeded no farther, each fearing that he might, one day, want the other's aſſiſtance.

Henry wins Clifford, who betrays Warbeck's ſecrets.

In the interim, Henry, having, at length, gained Sir Robert Clifford, who was intruſted with Warbeck's and the ducheſs's ſecrets, received a perfect information of their correſpondents, in England; and, as it muſt, of courſe, be dangerous to ſuffer the evil to increaſe, he reſolved to apply proper remedies. With this view, he ordered to be arreſted, in one day, and almoſt at the ſame inſtant, John Ratcliffe, the lord Fitz-Walter, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William D'Aubeney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Creſſener, and Thomas Aſtwood; who were all convicted and condemned, for high-treaſon, in adhering to, and promiſing to aſſiſt the pretender. The lord Fitz-Walter was ſent priſoner to Calais, with ſome proſpect of obtaining a pardon; but, his impatience cauſing him to attempt his eſcape, he was diſcovered and beheaded. Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, and William D'Aubeney were executed, immediately after their condemnation; the reſt were pardoned; and thoſe, that were apprehended, on the ſame account, among whom were certain Dominican friars, and William Worſeley, dean of St. Paul's, were releaſed; but Sir William Stanley, lord chamberlain, whether he was not, as yet, accuſed, or the king was willing to ſtay for ſtronger proofs to convict him, was not touched, at that time.

Henry notifies to the king of France, that he would be included in the peace of Senlis.

On the 1ſt of November, Henry wrote to king Charles, deſiring to be included in the peace of Senlis, purſuant to the tenor of the treaty; and, the 17th of the ſaid month, he notified to him the ſame thing from Ferdinand, king of Naples, and Alphonſo, duke of Calabria, his ſon, who were expreſly included in the treaty of Senlis, on the part of the emperor and archduke; nevertheleſs, the king of France did not deſiſt from his deſign upon the kingdom of Naples.

1494. Henry takes care of Ireland.

England was extremely quiet, during the year 1494; for Perkin Warbeck ſtill continued in Flanders, without offering to ſtir, the execution of his adherents convincing him, that the king knew more of his affairs than he imagined. In the interim, Henry endeavoured, underhand, to learn more and more of the circumſtances of the conſpiracy, and what the ducheſs of Burgundy was contriving, in England and other places. In this, Sir Robert Clifford, whom he had gained, was very ſerviceable; who informed him, that Perkin had ſtill ſome dependence, in Ireland, and had written to the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, when he landed there from Portugal; which diſcovery led him to reſolve to take care of that iſland, that had been, hitherto, much neglected. With this view, he made Henry, his ſecond ſon, then only two years old, lieutenant or governor of Ireland; but he appointed, for deputy, Sir Edward Poynings, a man verſed in affairs, and employed in ſeveral ambaſſies; to whom he gave a very extenſive power, as well over the militia, as the civil government, that he might reduce the iſland to their allegiance.

Poynings, upon his arrival in Ireland, made a ſtrict inquiry after thoſe that were ſuſpected of diſaffection to the king; particularly, he vigorouſly attacked the earls of Deſmond and Kildare. The firſt took care to keep out of of the reach of the lord-deputy; but the earl of Kildare was ſent priſoner into England, tho' he was quickly ſent back by the king, with marks of friendſhip and eſteem. As he dreaded freſh commotions, in Ireland, where a rebellion, in his circumſtances, would have extremely embarraſſed him, he judged it expedient to prevent them by acts of grace, rather than ſeverity; and, therefore, he ſent a commiſſioner with a general pardon, in form, as well for the earl of Deſmond, as for all the Iriſh rebels, to ſtifle, if poſſible, all the ſeeds of rebellion in that iſland, where the houſe of York had but too many adherents.

Whilſt Poynings was in Ireland, he aſſembled a parliament, famous for the ſtatutes enacted to the advantage of the crown of England, and of the Engliſh ſettled in the iſland; and one of theſe ſtatutes, ſtill called Poyning's law, ran, that the parliament of Ireland ſhould not be convened, before the lord lieutenant and council had acquainted the king with the reaſons, and obtained the royal licenſe, under the great ſeal. It was likewiſe enacted, that all the ſtatutes of England, relating to the publick, ſhould take place, in Ireland; and both theſe ſtatutes are in force, to this day.

Henry exacts money by unlawful ways. Bacon.

Tho' Henry had given ſeveral proofs of his ſelfiſh temper, they might be varniſhed over; becauſe the ſecret ſprings of his policy were not, as yet, fully known; but the caſe was otherwiſe, with reſpect to his proceedings, this year, which manifeſtly diſcovered his natural diſpoſition; for, tho' he wanted the pretence of foreign affairs, he extorted large ſums from 1494. from private perſons, by forfeitures upon penal laws, on purpoſe to fill his coffers. This ſtep was the more diſpleaſing to the people, as they evidently perceived, that it flowed from his nature, ſince he had no occaſion to make uſe of ſuch extraordinary methods; for he was in peace with all the princes of Europe; and he had drawn from the parliament two very conſiderable ſubſidies, of which he had not expended a fourth part, and even that was repaid him with intereſt. Moreover, beſides ſeveral confiſcations, he received, every year, 50,000 livres of the king of France; and all this, added to the uſual revenues of the crown, which were no leſs than in the preceding reigns, ſeemed to enable him to eaſe, inſtead of oppreſſing his ſubjects with frivolous accuſations, to drain their purſes. The firſt he attacked, in this manner, was Sir William Capel, alderman of London, who was fined 2700 l. and forced to compound with the king, for 1600; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury was charged with being the projector of theſe means, to procure the king money; but, whether Henry's avarice daily increaſed, or the miniſters, who ſucceeded that prelate, were ſtill leſs ſcrupulous, the people had but too great cauſe to lament him, after his deceaſe.

Towards the end of this year, Henry gave a freſh inſtance of his avarice, which proved extremely injurious to his reputation, eſpecially as he endeavoured to cover it with the veil of juſtice; for, by ſecret advices from Sir Robert Clifford, he was informed, that Sir William Stanley, lord chamberlain, was one of Perkin Warbeck's adherents; and, tho' that lord had done him the greateſt ſervice imaginable, ſince he had gained him the victory, which raiſed him to the throne, he determined to ſacrifice him to his avarice, under the pretence of puniſhing his crime. I ſay, to his avarice, and not to juſtice, or revenge; for, if we may paſs a judgment, from his uſual conduct to the ſtate-criminals, of whom there was nothing to be got, he would, doubtleſs, have pardoned Stanley, had he not been rendered inexorable, by the deſire of confiſcating his eſtate.

To attain his ends, he ordered Clifford, ſtill in Flanders, to repair privately into England; and, upon the news of the informer's arrival, he removed to the tower, that the lords, who ſhould be accuſed, might be more conveniently arreſted. Clifford being ſecretly come to London, the king aſſembled the council, in the tower, and ſent for Sir Robert; who, falling down at his feet, implored his pardon, offering to declare whatever he knew of the conſpiracy; and the king, immediately, pardoned him, but on expreſs condition, that he ſhould conceal nothing of what was come to his knowledge. Upon this, Clifford impeached ſeveral perſons, and, among the reſt, the lord chambrelain; but, the king ſeeming extremely ſurpriſed, charged him to take care what he ſaid, ſince his life lay at ſtake, if the accuſation ſhould prove groundleſs. Clifford perſiſting, the lord Chamberlain was quickly apprehended; and, next day, he was examined by the council, where he confeſſed what was ſufficient to condemn him; but the ſignal ſervice he had done the king, and the intereſt of the earl of Derby, his brother, induced him to hope, that he ſhould meet with gentle treatment. However, two things rendered his crime unpardonable; firſt, his immenſe riches, which promiſed the king a plentiful confiſcation; and, ſecondly, his being accuſed, and, probably, convicted of ſaying to Clifford, in diſcourſing of Perkin Warbeck, "If he was ſure, that young man was king "Edward's ſon, he would never take up arms "againſt him." This was wounding the king, in the moſt tender part, ſince he, in effect, owned, that the houſe of York had a better title than that of Lancaſter; but, if this had been his only crime, it is a queſtion, whether the judges would have ſentenced him to death; ſo that he was, probably, convicted of acting more directly againſt the king, and holding intelligence with Warbeck and the ducheſs of Burgundy. All the favour, he could procure, was a delay of ſome weeks, to prepare for his fate, which he did not ſuffer, till the beginning of the following year; but, the king's rigour, on this occaſion, was, in appearance, exceſſive; for all the world imagined, that he would pardon a lord to whom he was ſo highly obliged, and who had even put it in his power to exerciſe acts of mercy, by placing him on the throne; moreover, he was brother to the earl of Derby, a zealous ſervant, and father-in-law to the king. 1494.

A great terror in England. Bacon.

The lord chamberlain's execution ſtruck a terror, all over the kingdom; who was condemned, for a crime of which moſt Engliſhmen were guilty, viz. preferring the title of York to that of Lancaſter; but they were ſtill more terrified, to perceive that the king had planted ſpies about that lord, to inſpect his conduct. As this might be every man's caſe, the great men were afraid of ſpeaking their ſentiments to one another, leſt thoſe, whom whom they thought their beſt friends, ſhould be the king's ſpies; but this reſtraint was, in ſome meaſure, made up by ſwarms of libels againſt the judges, the council, and even the king; which licenſe ſo diſpleaſed the king, that he took away the lives of five perſons, convicted of diſperſing theſe libels.

Richard Fox, biſhop of Bath and Wells, one of Henry's favourites, was tranſlated, this year, to the ſee of Durham.

Prince Henry, the king's ſecond ſon, two years old, was alſo, the ſame year, created duke of York.

A negotiation with Scotland.

Tho' a truce was concluded with Scotland, to the 30th of April, 1501, there ſtill remained ſome differences between the Engliſh and Scots, about certain lands on the borders of the two kingdoms, and the fiſhery of the river Eske; but Henry, continually dreading ſome domeſtick inſurrection, was extremely deſirous to have no diſputes with his neighbours; and, therefore, he had, in May, this year, moved, that the affairs between England and Scotland might be adjuſted. King James ſeeming

to

1494. to have the ſame inclination, they both ſent ambaſſadors to Caldſtream, to negotiate ſome expedient; and Richard Fox was at the head of the Engliſh ambaſſy; but, with all his addreſs, he could not end a conteſt, that, in all appearance, might eaſily be decided; which led Henry to ſuſpect, that the king of Scotland reſerved it, for an occaſion of quarrel, and to order the earl of Surrey to be upon his guard, in the north.

Charles VIII. undertakes the conqueſt of Naples. Commin.

Charles VIII. undertook, this year, the long projected conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples; but this affair is ſo notorious, that it is unneceſſary to relate the particulars; tho', at the ſame time, it is requiſite briefly to mention the riſe and principal events.

An abſtract of the ſucceſſion of the kingdom of Naples. Colien. Capac. Summ, &c.

The poſterity of Charles of Anjou, firſt king of Sicily, of the houſe of France, was divided into two branches; one of which reigned, in Naples, and the other, in Hungary. After ſeveral revolutions, the crown of Naples fell, at length, to Joan, the firſt of that name; but, in 1380, Charles de Durazzo, of the branch of Hungary, claiming the ſame crown, and repairing into Italy, attacked queen Joan, who, being preſſed by this enemy, adopted Lewis I, duke of Anjou, uncle to Charles VI, king of France; and, thenceforward, there was a continual war between the two houſes of Anjou. At laſt, Charles de Durazzo remained in poſſeſſion of Naples, and was ſucceeded by Ladiſlaus, his ſon; who, dying, in 1414, left the crown of Naples to Joan II, his ſiſter. In the interim, Lewis I, duke of Anjou, and Lewis II, his ſon, conſtantly ſtiled themſelves kings of Sicily, and maintained their pretenſions to Sicily, on this ſide the Pharo, or the kingdom of Naples; and Lewis II, who died, in 1417, left three ſons, viz. Lewis III, Rene, and Charles.

In 1421, Lewis III. led an army into Naples, to dethrone Joan II, who, to ſupport herſelf, adopted Alphonſo, king of Arragon; and Alphonſo, arriving in the kingdom of Naples, compelled Lewis III. to quit the country, and retire into France. Shortly after, upon a quarrel between Joan and Alphonſo, Joan, revoking his adoption, adopted the very Lewis of Anjou, that would have deprived her of the crown, and declared him her preſumptive heir and ſucceſſor; but Lewis died, without iſſue, in 1431; and Joan departed this life, the following year, having made a will, in favour of Rene of Anjou, brother to Lewis III.

Rene made ſome attempts to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, but to no purpoſe; for Alphonſo, king of Arragon, kept the crown, till his death, in 1458; leaving the kingdom of Arragon to John, his legitimate ſon, and that of Naples to Ferdinand, his baſtard.

Mezerai. In 1474, Rene made a will, appointing for his heir Charles, earl of Maine, his nephew, ſon to Charles, his younger brother, to the prejudice of Violante, his daughter, ducheſs of Lorrain, and Rene, his grandſon, the duke of Lorrain.

Charles, earl of Maine, nephew and heir of king Rene, died, in 1481, leaving Lewis XI, king of France, his ſole heir; and by vertue of this will, Charles VIII, ſon to Lewis XI, pretended, that he had a right to the kingdom of Naples. 1494. The foundation of Charles VIII's claim.

If what has been ſaid be never ſo ſlightly conſieerhd, it will, doubtleſs, appear, that Charles's title to the kingdom of Naples was very diſputable; but, to determine this affair in a judicial way, it would have been neceſſary to examine two points of equal importance. Firſt, whether Joan II. could revoke the adoption of Alphonſo, king of Arragon, and adopt Lewis of Anjou, in his room. Indeed, the French hiſtorians alledge, that Alphonſo would have dethroned his benefactreſs, and, upon that ſuppoſition, the revocation ſeems to be juſt and reaſonable; but the Arragonians deny the fact, aſcribing it to Joan's levity, who was fickle and capricious. In the next place, ſuppoſing the houſe of Anjou's title better than that of the houſe of Arragon, it muſt have been examined, whether king Rene could ſet aſide Violante, his daughter, and her heirs, and give the kingdom of Naples to Charles, earl of Maine, his nephew. It could not be pretended, in favour of this will, that the kingdom of Naples was a maſculine fief, ſince the houſe of Anjou's title was derived from a daughter; ſo that Charles VIII. could lay no claim to that kingdom, only upon ſuppoſition that the laws decided theſe two points, in his behalf, which, to ſay no worſe, was very doubtful and precarious. Moreover, the houſe of Arragon had another title, founded upon a 60 years poſſeſſion; but what rendered this affair extremely intricate was, that the popes, as ſoverign lords of Naples, ſeemed to have decided it, in favour of the houſe of Anjou, by inveſting the princes of that houſe with this kingdom.

The cauſes of the war of Naples. Mezerai.

But it was not ſo much his title to the kingdom of Naples, that put Charles VIII. upon this conqueſt, as the juncture of time, and the ſituation of the affairs of Italy. Ferdinand, king of Naples, had two ſons; viz. Alphonſo, who was ſtiled duke of Calabria, and Frederick; and Alphonſo had a ſon, named Ferdinand, after his grandfather. Theſe Arragonian princes were not only deteſted, in Naples, but in the reſt of Italy; and, beſides, old king Ferdinand had baniſhed the prince of Salerno, with all the other heads of the Angevin faction. Theſe exiles excited Charles to undertake the conqueſt of Naples; but this alone would not have been ſufficient, had he not been encouraged by Ludovico Sforza, uncle to the duke of Milan. The occaſion was this:

The affairs of Milan. Bern. Corio. Hiſt. di Milan.

The duchy of Milan was paſſed from the family of Viſconti, to that of Sforza; Philippo Maria Viſconti, laſt duke of that houſe, having adopred Francis Sforza, who had eſpouſed Blanche, his only daughter.

Franciſco Sforza, becoming duke of Miſan, upon the deceaſe of his father-in-law, died, in 1466, leaving two ſons, Galeazzo, his ſucceſſor, 1494. ceſſor, and Ludovico, ſirnamed the Black; but, the former being aſſaſſinated, John Galeazzo, his ſon, ſucceeded him, under the guardianſhip of his mother, a woman infamous for her lewdneſs, and of Ludovico, his uncle. In proceſs of time, the young duke eſpouſed Iſabella, daughter to Alphonſo, duke of Calabria, eldeſt ſon to Ferdinand, king of Naples; but, John Galeazzo being a prince of a mean genius, Ludovico, his uncle, engroſſed the whole power, leaving to his nephew only the bare ducal title, without giving him much concern. However, Iſabella, his ducheſs, diſdaining to ſee the duke, her ſpouſe, without any authority, complained to the duke of Calabria, her father, of this ill uſage; and, ſoon after, the duke perſuaded Ferdinand, his father, to proclaim war againſt Ludovico, to compel him to reſign the government to his nephew.

To avoid this war, Ludovico excited Charles VIII. to undertake the conqueſt of Naples, by inſpiring him with hopes, that he would aſſiſt him, with all his forces; and he likewiſe deſigned to make uſe of Charles's aid, to become maſter of the duchy of Milan, and diſpoſſeſs John Galeazzo, his nephew. He had already taken ſome ſecret meaſures, with the emperor Maximilian, to whom he had given Blanche, his niece, in marriage, with a dowry of 400,000 crowns; and Maximilian had privately inveſted him with the duchy of Milan, for him and his heirs.

Upon the rumour of Charles VIII's preparations for the conqueſt of Naples, king Ferdinand offered him an annual tribute of 50,000 crowns; but the propoſal was rejected; and Ferdinand died, a little before Charles's expedition, being ſucceeded by Alphonſo, his eldeſt ſon.

The war of Naples, at firſt view, ſeems entirely foreign to the Hiſtory of England; yet, as it was the ſource and origin of many remarkable tranſactions, in Europe, in the next century, I judged it not improper to ſhew the occaſion; and, for the ſame reaſon, it is neceſſary to relate the principal events.

Charles's departure and journey to Rome. Commin.

Charles VIII, departing from Paris, in July, 1494, came to Aſti, in Piedmont, where he fell ſick of the ſmall-pox; and, this diſtemper detaining him, at Aſti, he could not proceed, till the 6th of October, to Turin, where he was obliged to borrow the ducheſs of Savoy's jewels, ſo preſſing was his want of money, to execute ſuch an important undertaking. Ludovico Sforza, who made haſte to meet him, accompanied him to Pavia, where they found duke John Galeazzo out of order, upon eating ſomething that his uncle, Ludovico, had cauſed to be given him; and, when they arrived at Placentia, they heard of John Galeazzo's death. Then Ludovico left the king, in order to take poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, tho' the late duke, his nephew, had left a ſon; and Ludovico, having obtained what he deſired, had not the ſame attachment for the king of France, as before; but, on the contrary, it was his ſole ſtudy how to expel him out of Italy, by a league of which he was the chief promoter. 1494.

In the interim, Charles, purſuing his march, entered the ſtate of Florence, and forced Peter de Medicis, the duke, to deliver him four of his beſt towns, and lend him money. He made his entry into the city of Florence, the 17th of November, and publiſhed his manifeſto concerning the war with Naples; then he took the rout to Rome; and all the places, in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, readily brought him their keys. Alexander VI, upon Charles's approach, required prince Ferdinand, ſon to the king of Naples, to depart from Rome, where he was received, ſome time before; and, on the other hand, Frederick, Alphonſo's brother, who was on the coaſt of Genoa, with a fleet, came to Naples, where things were in the utmoſt conſternation. Thus, Charles having paſſed through Italy, without the leaſt reſiſtance, entered Rome, the 28th of December, whilſt the pope, in a fright, ſhut himſelf up, in the caſtle of Angelo, for the ſecurity of his perſon; but it is, now, time to return to the affairs of England. 1495.

A precaution of Henry againſt Scotland. Act. Pub.

Henry, finding that the negotiation with Scotland went on very ſlowly, tho' he could not diſcover any viſible reaſon, was apprehenſive, that king James would take occaſion, from their differences about the fiſhery of the river Eske, to violate the truce; wherefore, not to be ſurpriſed, he ordered the earl of Surrey to levy troops, for the defence of the north, againſt the attempts of the Scots and Iriſh; but theſe attempts, which he pretended to fear, were only an excuſe to put himſelf in a ſtate of defence, in caſe he ſhould be attacked by the king of Scotland.

The duke of York is made governor of the north. Act. Pub.

Shortly after, he made the duke of York, his ſecond ſon, preſident of the northern marches, tho' he was only three years old, having made him, laſt year, lord lieutenant of Ireland; by which means, he kept in his own coffers the ſalaries of both theſe poſts, that muſt, otherwiſe, have been given to two ſeveral lords; for no prince ever better underſtood the art of husbanding his money, and making every thing turn to his advantage.

The ducheſs of York, mother to Edward IV. and Richard III. died, this year, in a very advanced age.

In July, Alexander VI. ſent into England a bull, impowering all the biſhops of the kingdom to abſolve the rebels, which, by Innoſent VIII's bull, was ſolely granted the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Perkin's attempt upon the county of Kent miſcarries. Hall. Bacon.

Perk in Warbeck had not, as yet, made any attempt, in England, being ſenſible that the king was informed of all his correſpondents; but, as the ducheſs of Burgundy could not relinquiſh her hopes of gaining ſome advantage by the idol ſhe had formed, ſhe, at length, reſolved, to ſend him into England; judging it neceſſary to ſound the people's affection for the houſe of York, without waiting any longer for the aſſiſtance of the great men, who, being narrowly watched, were extremely cautious; and 1495. and ſhe likewiſe perceived, that, if the people ſeemed ready to riſe, there would be no want of great men, to ſupport and conduct them. She, therefore, having given orders to prepare ſome forces and ſhips, cauſed Perkin Warbeck to embarque, and make a deſcent, in the county of Kent; whilſt, in the interim, Henry, entirely ignorant of theſe preparations, in Flanders, took a progreſs to Yorkſhire, to viſit the counteſs, his mother; but, as the projected invaſion miſcarried, it was not doubted, that the king, being informed of the pretended duke of York's deſign, had taken that journey, on purpoſe to draw him into the ſnare, ſo perſuaded were people, that policy was the ſpring of all his actions.

Perkin, purſuant to the ducheſs of Burgundy's directions, arrived upon the coaſt of Kent, near Sandwich, and landed ſome men, to ſound the ſentiments of the inhabitants; and theſe troops greatly boaſted of the powerful armament the duke of York had made, in Flanders, pretending that the ſhips, in view, were but a ſmall part of the fleet which would ſoon appear; but the people, finding that theſe men were almoſt all foreigners, inſtead of joining them, conſulted the gentlemen of the county, to know how they ſhould behave; and it was reſolved, that they ſhould feign to be willing to aſſiſt Perkin, to allure him to land, and take him priſoner. Purſuant to this reſolution, they took up arms and appeared on the coaſt, making ſigns, to invite Perkin and his men to land; but Perkin and his counſellor, Frion, ſuſpecting the artifice, kept on board, expecting the return of ſome of their troops, to inform them of what paſſed, on ſhore; and, at laſt, the Kentiſhmen, perceiving that they could draw in no more, fell upon thoſe that were already landed, and cut them in pieces, except about 150, who, being taken alive, were all hanged, by Henry's order. Perkin, being an eye-witneſs to this tragical ſpectacle, weighed anchor and returned into Flanders; and the king, who was then on his progreſs, hearing of the deſcent, intended to turn back towards Kent; but, preſently after, receiving news of what was tranſacted, he proceeded on his journey, and ſpent ſome time with the counteſs, his mother, at the earl of Derby's houſe; with an intent to make a ſort of excuſe to that lord, for putting his brother to death, and alſo to give him a proof of the continuance of his favour.

A remarkable ſtatute. Bacon.

The 13th of October, the king aſſembled a parliament, in which, it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould be impeached or attainted, for aſſiſting the king, for the time being; but it is obvious, that the deſign of this act was to hinder a ſtrict examination of the king's title to the crown, ſince, whatever was the conſequence, thoſe that ſerved him would be always in ſafety. Indeed, the precedent he had himſelf given, in the condemnation of thoſe that carried arms for Richard III, muſt have rendered his friends apprehenſive of being in the ſame caſe, upon a like revolution; but the clauſe, in the body of the ſtatute, that, if, hereafter, any act of attainder ſhould paſs againſt ſuch, as aſſiſted the king, for the time being, it ſhould be of no force, was itſelf void and of no effect; for how could an act of the preſent limit the power of a future parliament, and cauſe an act, in its nature revocable, to be perpetually binding? In the mean while, this ſtatute, which ſeemed to be made, ſolely for the people's ſafety, was, in reality, only for the king's ſecurity; and it diſcovered Henry's diſquiet and uncertainty, with reſpect to his title. 1495.

An act was likewiſe paſſed, to oblige thoſe who had not paid their quota of the benevolence, to pay the arrears, by a limited time; which brought in large ſums to the king, the arrears of this tax being very conſiderable, becauſe, as the war with France was of a ſhort continuance, many perſons had declined to pay, either in full, or in part; and the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury was indebted, no leſs than 1500 l. ſterling.

Warbeck comes to Ireland.

Before the parliament broke up, the king received intelligence, that Perkin Warbeck was landed, in Ireland; and, as this muſt, of courſe, be with ſome evil deſign, he ordered, that the coaſts ſhould be diligently guarded, in order to oppoſe a deſcent, wherever it was made. It was but too true, that the ducheſs of Burgundy had ſent Perkin into Ireland, to raiſe a rebellion; and ſhe had ſecretly treated with the king of Scotland, who, probably, had engaged to aſſiſt him. It is generally believed, that the emperor, the archduke Philip, and the king of France, were alſo concerned in the plot; the two former, in revenge of Henry's prohibiting his ſubjects all commerce with the Low-Countries; and the other, to prevent his entering into a league, that was forming in Italy, to which he was ſtrenuouſly ſollicited; but, however that be, in all probability, James, in promiſing to eſpouſe the cauſe of the pretended duke of York, had been induced by ſome private view, or by the ſollicitations of ſome other prince.

He goes to Scotland, and king James marries him to one of his relations.

In the interim, ſince Poynings had been in Ireland, the affairs of that iſland were entirely altered; ſo that Perkin, not finding the country inclined to favour his deſigns, departed for Scotland, where, in all appearance, he knew he ſhould be kindly received. When he arrived at Edinburgh, he demanded an audience of the king, by the name of the duke of York; and, James pretending to be extremely ſurpriſed, gave him a ſolemn reception, in the preſence of the whole court. Perkin made a long ſpeech, recounting his fictitious adventures, and how he eſcaped the cruelty of Richard III; and then he inveighed againſt Henry Tudor, who had uſurped the crown of England, and unjuſtly detained it from the lawful heirs of Edward IV. He copiouſly inſiſted on the ſteps he had taken, to attempt the recovery of his kingdom; and he concluded with ſaying, that, ſeveral accidents having diſconcerted his meaſures, he was come to put himſelf under his protection, hoping that, aided by ſuch a generous prince, he ſhould expel the uſurper, and aſcend the throne 1495. throne of his anceſtors; and that, upon this, he ſhould always regard him, as a brother, and, on all occaſions, demonſtrate his gratitude.

James ſeemed to be touched with Perkin's misfortunes, and told him, that, whoſoever he was, he ſhould not repent of putting himſelf into his hands; yet he feigned to have ſtill ſome doubt, to ſhew that it was upon a mature examination, that he was convinced of the truth; and, ſhortly after, he publickly owned him, for duke of York, and gave him in marriage Catharine Gordon, daughter to the earl of Huntley, one of the handſomeſt and moſt accompliſhed ladies, in Scotland.

Henry projects to marry his daughter to the king of Scotland. Act. Pub.

Henry, whether he had received private advice of what was plotting againſt him, or it was purely the effect of his foreſight, ardently deſired to live in a good underſtanding with the king of Scotland; and, therefore, he had impowered his ambaſſadors, who were ordered to repair to Caldſtream, to treat of the marriage of Margaret, his eldeſt daughter, with that monarch. Indeed, this match was accompliſhed, ſome years after; but, in all likelihood, it was not mentioned, in this congreſs, the Engliſh ambaſſadors having, doubtleſs, perceived, that ſuch a propoſal would be, then, unſeaſonable.

The 28th of January, 1495, Charles VIII. departed from Rome, having received the ſtrongeſt towns of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, with cardinal Cæſar Borgia, natural ſon to pope Alexander VI, in hoſtage; but, whilſt he was on his march, the ambaſſador of Ferdinand, king of Spain, informed him, from his maſter, that, when he engaged not to moleſt him, in the conqueſt of Naples, he did not intend, that this conqueſt was to extend to all Italy; that, notwithſtanding, he ſaw him poſſeſſed of Florence, Piſa, and all the papal dominions; that, therefore, he declared, that he did not think himſelf obliged to obſerve their treaty; and, accordingly, the ambaſſador tore it in pieces, before his face; yet Charles, who was ſailing with a proſperous gale, made a jeſt of the ſe menaces, and purſued his march.

In the interim, Alphonſo, the new king of Naples, finding that he ſhould be attacked by a powerful king, who was now upon the borders of his dominions, was entirely diſcouraged; and, knowing he was not beloved by his ſubjects, he reſigned his crown to Ferdinand, his ſon, and retired to a monaſtery, where he died, this very year; but the new king, in order to defend his kingdom, advanced towards the frontiers, to endeavour to ſtop the king of France; yet he was ſuddenly deſerted by his own troops. In this extremity, he would have retired to Naples, but the gates were ſhut againſt him; and, in a word, he was forced to ſeek a retreat, in the little iſle of Iſchia, having firſt garriſoned the caſtles of his metropolis, where he could enter, without paſſing through the city.

In the mean while, Charles ſtill continued his march; and Triulzi, a Milaneſe, who was in the ſervice of the king of Naples, having ſurrendered Capua, all the reſt of the towns 1495. ſent him deputies, with offers of ſubmiſſion. At laſt, he entered Naples, the 22d of February; and, a few days after, he became maſter of the caſtles.

Such a torrent of ſucceſs ſo blinded the young monarch and his council, that they knew not how to take any proper meaſures, to ſecure this conqueſt; and, by degrees, the towns, that had ſubmitted, returned to their ſovereign; for his army, which was not very numerous, could not furniſh all places with garriſons; moreover, the French rendered themſelves ſo odious to the inhabitants of Naples, that they ſoon repented of their ſubmiſſion to them.

But what moſt embroiled the conqueror's affairs was a league formed againſt him by the pope, the emperor, the king of Spain, the archduke, the king of Naples, Ludovico Sforza, new duke of Milan, and the republick of Venice; and this league, which was to laſt, 25 years, was ſigned, the 25th of March, 1495, when the confederates began to aſſemble their forces. Bembo.

Charles now found, that it was time to think of his return; but he was reſolved, firſt, to make a triumphant entry into Naples; from whence he departed, the 20th of May, for France, leaving only a few troops to defend his conqueſt. However, the allies did not ſuffer him to retire, without oppoſition; for they expected him, upon his rout, with an army of 40,000 men, and poſted themſelves, at Fornova, to oppoſe his paſſage. Tho' Charles was much inferior, in number of troops, he determined to give them battle, being ſenſible that he muſt either conquer, or periſh; and the battle was fought, on the 6th of July; but the king of France defeated that formidable army, and, on the 15th of that month, arrived at Aſti.

The battle of Fornova.

Whilſt he marched through Italy, Naples again ſubmitted to Ferdinand; and almoſt all the towns, that were ſtill in the French intereſt, followed her example. The duke of Montpenſier, left by Charles, at Naples, with a few troops, retired to the caſtle of leOvo, where, after maintaining a ſiege of three months, he was, at laſt, conſtrained to capitulate; and, thus, Charles who had conquered the kingdom of Naples, in the ſpace of three weeks, loſt it, with the ſame rapidity. He afterwards formed ſeveral projects, to recover his conqueſt; but they proved abortive.

This year, the emperor Maximilian came into the Low-Countries, and reſigned the government to his ſon, Philip, tho' he ſtill wanted ſome years to be of age; and then, he returned into Germany; but Philip, being no longer under the emperor's guardianſhip, ſent, about the end of the year, ambaſſadors to Henry, to negotiate the renewal of the commerce between England and the Low-Countries.

The ambaſſadors eaſily ſucceeded, in their 1496. negotiation; for the renewal of the commerce, which they came to deſire, was no leſs neceſſary for the Engliſh than the Flemings; ſo that, on the the 24th of February 1496, was concluded, 1496. concluded, at London, a treaty of peace and perpetual friendſhip between Henry and Philip; and the trade between the nations was ſettled, to the ſatisfaction of both the parties.

Among the articles of this treaty, there were two eſpecially very remarkable; by the firſt of which, the two princes engaged to give neither aid, nor protection, to the rebellious ſubjects of either; and Philip, in particular, expreſly obliged himſelf to hinder the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, from harbouring the king's rebellious ſubjects, in the lands ſhe poſſeſſed, by what title ſoever ſhe held them, whether of dowry, or otherwiſe; but, if ſhe acted, contrary to this prohibition, he promiſed to deprive her of all her poſſeſſions, in the Low-Countries.

By another article it was, in expreſs terms, agreed, that any veſſel, ſuffering ſhipwrack, on the coaſts of either of the two princes, ſhould not be liable to confiſcation, if there was left alive a man, woman, or child, a dog, a cat, or a cock.

The Flemings termed this treaty Intercurſus magnus, or the great Treaty of Commerce, not only on account of the great number of articles, but principally with reſpect to another, made afterwards; and which, not being ſo much to their advantage, was called Intercurſus malus, or the bad Treaty.

A patent to John Cabott. Act. Pub.

It appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, March the 5th, this year, the king granted a patent to John Cabott, a Venetian, and to three of his ſons, to go in queſt of new lands, with Engliſh colours, on condition, that all charges being deducted, they ſhould give the king a fifth of the profit.

The king of Scotland and Warbeck's invaſion.

In the interim, the king of Scotland, not ſatisfied with affording the counterfeit duke of York a ſanctuary, in his dominions, likewiſe undertook to place him on the throne of England; for he was told, that, as ſoon as he appeared, in that kingdom, at the head of an army, all the Yorkiſts would riſe, in favour of the pretender. It was with this view, that, immediately after his arrival in England, he took care to diſperſe the pretended duke's proclamation, in which the king was called an uſurper, tyrant, and murderer; and, beſides, he promiſed all ſorts of favours to ſuch as would aid the lawful heir, to deſtroy him that unjuſtly detained the crown; but, notwithſtanding this proclamation, not a man offered to join the Scots. Indeed, Henry was deteſted, eſpecially in thoſe parts; but, as, ſince Perkin had aſſumed the title of duke of York, many were undeceived, and others in doubt, it was judged improper to hazard life and fortune, without a greater aſſurance, that it was really for a ſon of Edward IV. Moreover, the execution of the lord chamberlain ſo terrified all, that they deſpaired of the king's pardon; and, at length, James, finding that there was no room to expect, that the Engliſh would take up arms, for his duke of York, that he might not wholly loſe his labour, ravaged Northumberland, and acquired a great booty; but Perkin, pretending to be extremely moved with the calamities of the Engliſh, conjured that prince, before his whole court, to ſpare his miſerable ſubjects. This was a very artful device, to perſuade the publick, that he was no impoſtor; but James anſwered, with a ſmile, that he thought him very generous, to be ſo ſollicitous about what was none of his, in order to ſave it for the uſe of his enemy. In the interim, the news of, that an Engliſh army was advancing, made him reſolve to return into his own country, being unwilling to expoſe his great ſpoils to the hazard of a battle; ſo that this expedition, on which he founded ſuch raiſed expectations, ended only in the ruin of the people of Northumberland. 1496.

Charles VIII. cauſes the peace of Eſtaples to be confirmed by the ſtates. Act. Pub.

During theſe tranſactions, in England, Charles VIII, leſt Henry ſhould enter into the league of Italy, procured the peace of Eſtaples to be confirmed by the ſtates, purſuant to the treaty, which he had, hitherto, neglected, tho' it was ratified by the parliament of England, the preceding year; yet, not thinking it expedient to aſſemble the ſtates general, he cauſed the peace to be approved by the ſtates of each province, and, in all appearance, to Henry's ſatisfaction. We find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the approbations of the ſtates of Languedoc, Normandy, and ſeveral other provinces; and alſo of particular towns of little note, ſigned by great numbers of people of inferior rank and condition.

Tho' the king of Scotland's invaſion had proved abortive, he was ſtill apprehenſive of future attempts, that might be attended with dangerous conſequences; for he knew, that his ſubjects were diſpleaſed; that the Yorkiſts were very numerous; that Ireland was diſaffected; and that Perkin Warbeck was in Scotland ready to take advantage of theſe diſpoſitions. To guard againſt the danger, which might ariſe from all theſe quarters, he granted, firſt, a general pardon to all the Iriſh adherents of the pretended duke of York, leſt the dread of puniſhment ſhould induce them to revolt; ſecondly, he commiſſioned Richard Fox, biſhop of Durham, to try, as of himſelf, to negotiate, with the king of Scotland, a treaty of marriage between his eldeſt daughter, Margaret, and that monarch; and, laſtly, he ſent ambaſſadors to Ferdinand and Iſabella, to ratify his alliance with them, and ſecure, by freſh engagements, the marriage of Arthur, his eldeſt ſon, with Catharine, their third daughter.

He enters into the league of Italy.

Some time before, he diſpatched to Rome Robert Sherburn, who, in his name, entered into the league of Italy againſt Charles VIII; and, the 23d of September, he confirmed what his ambaſſador had done; by which he thought himſelf ſufficiently ſupported; for he had nothing to fear from the king of France, who was, elſewhere, employed, and he was allied to the moſt potent princes of Europe. As to the king of Scotland, he believed, that he could eaſily reſiſt him, in caſe of an attack; and, tho' he had juſt taken ſteps, to make peace with that 1496. prince, and had grounds to hope for ſucceſs, he determined to improve this opportunity to demand a ſubſidy of the parliament, as well to put himſelf in a poſture of defence, as to revenge the inſults of the Scots. With this view, he called a parliament, the 16th of January following; however, it was not difficult to foreſee, that the king of Scotland, being aſſiſted neither by France, the archduke, nor the ducheſs of Burgundy, would not alone undertake a war, for the ſake of Perkin Warbeck, tho' he was ſo blind, as to think him to be the real duke of York.

The marriage of the archduke with Jane of Arragon, and of Margaret of Auſtria with the prince of Spain.

In October, this year, Jane, ſecond daughter to Ferdinand and Iſabella, came into the Low-Countries, to marry the archduke Philip, to whom ſhe had been contracted; Iſabella, her eldeſt ſiſter, had been eſpouſed, in 1490, to Alphonſo, king of Portugal, who died, ſhortly after; and the ſhips, that brought Jane into the Low-Countries, carried Margaret of Auſtria, Philip's ſiſter, into Spain, to conſummate her marriage with prince John, heir apparent of Caſtile and Arragon.

1497. The parliament grants a ſubſidy for the Scotch war. Hollingſh.

The parliament meeting, the beginning of the year 1497, the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, highly aggravating the affront received from the king of Scotland; and he, very pathetically repreſented the calamities endured by his northern ſubjects, when the truce ſhould have ſecured them from ſuch provocations. In a word, he told them, that his honour, and the protection he owed his people, would not ſuffer him to paſs over theſe inſults, with impunity; and the parliament, apprehending his meaning, gave him a ſubſidy, after which, they were inſtantly diſſolved, as having been called, on purpoſe for that affair.

The king haſtens the levying the ſubſidy.

Tho' Henry expected much from his negotiation with the king of Scotland, he believed it neceſſary to prepare for war; for, without ſuch preparations, negotiations generally prove abortive. The levy of the ſubſidy granted by the parliament was the firſt and principal object of his care; and the neceſſity of a war with Scotland furniſhed him with a pretence to haſten that affair, from which he hoped the ſame advantage as from that of Bretagne; namely, to put the whole into his coffers. In order to this, it was requiſite, that it ſhould be entirely levied, before the concluſion of the treaty with Scotland, otherwiſe the people would pay their reſpective ſums, with reluctance; but, as the king ſet his heart upon this affair, he iſſued out very ſtrict orders to the commiſſioners, who were to collect the ſubſidy, in the ſeveral counties.

A rebellion in Cornwall.

The commiſſioners, proceeding with extreme rigour, in the county of Cornwall, met with unexpected oppoſition; for the Corniſhmen, being leſs tractable than the reſt of the Engliſh, made loud complaints, that, for ſome petty damage done to the other end of the kingdom, they were deprived of their neceſſary ſubſiſtence. Theſe murmurs were inflamed by Michael Joſeph, a farrier of Bodmin, and Thomas Flammock, a lawyer; the latter of whom affirmed, That ſubſidies ought not to be granted, or levied, for the war of Scotland, the law having provided for it by eſcuage; much leſs when the Scotch invaſion was made a pretence to fleece the whole nation; that it would be ſhameful to ſubmit to ſuch an oppreſſion, and all the miſchief entirely proceeded from the king's miniſters, who made their court, at the poor people's expence; that, to redreſs theſe grievances, it was expedient to take up arms, and, without injuring any perſon, to go and preſent a petition to the king, to beſeech him to deſiſt from this tax, and puniſh his evil counſellors, for a warning to others, how they gave him ſuch advice, for the future; and that a greater ſervice could not be done to the kingdom, than to free it from ſuch harpies, who ruined it, under the pretence of ſerving the king. Flammock chiefly ſtruck at Moreton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Reginald Bray; who were generally the king's inſtruments, in affairs of this nature. 1497.

The rebels march towards London.

The people beginning to take fire, Flammock and Joſeph, offered to lead them, till ſome lord ſhould appear at their head; which they affirmed would ſoon be the caſe; and, indeed, the ſequel ſhewed, that they were countenanced by perſons of diſtinction. This was ſufficient to excite all the rabble of the country to an inſurrection; who, arming themſelves, in the beſt manner they could, marched under the conduct of theſe two incendiaries into Devonſhire, and from thence into Somerſetſhire; and the number of the rebels was daily augmented, by many of the inhabitants of the places where they paſſed, who had nothing to loſe, and were inflamed by Henry's ſecret enemies. At Taunton, they killed a commiſſioner, who had ſignaliſed himſelf by his rigour, in levying the ſubſidy; but this was all the miſchief they did, in their march. Then they proceeded to Wells, where the lord Audley, a nobleman of a turbulent and factious ſpirit, joined them, who was, immediately, accepted, as their general. Audley, heading the male-contents, led them directly to Saliſbury, and from thence to Wincheſter; not permitting them to commit any violence, and obliging them to reſt ſatisfied with a bare ſubſiſtence. When they arrived at Wincheſter, inſtead of marching to London, as was, at firſt, deſigned, they forced their commander to lead them into Kent; for Flammock, having aſſured them, that the people of that country were extremely fond of liberty, they imagined that they ſhould be re-inforced by them, in defence of the rights and privileges of the nation; but, coming there, they were greatly diſappointed. By the diligence of ſome Kentiſh lords, not a man would take up arms, in their favour; which ſo diſpirited many of the rebels, that they returned quietly to their own habitations. However, thoſe that remained, encouraged by the king's remiſſneſs, who had not, hitherto, moleſted them, inſolently boaſted, that they would give give him battle, or take London, before his face; wherefore, they encamped, between Greenwich and Eltham, within a few miles of London.

The

1497. The king's measures againſt the rebels.

The firſt news of this inſurrection gave the king the greateſt uneaſineſs; for a war with Scotland, a rebellion in England, and a pretender to the throne were affairs of the laſt importance, eſpecially as they came upon him, at once; and theſe objects were exceedingly magnified by his inward diſquiet, about the doubtfulneſs of his title to the crown. He was apprehenſive, that the Corniſh rebellion would introduce a general conſpiracy, of which Perkin was waiting the iſſue, in Scotland; but, fortunately for him, this rebellion broke out, at a juncture, when he had an army in readineſs, which was to march into the north, under the command of the lord D'aubeney. Upon the intelligence of this inſurrection, he kept his forces, about London, and contented himſelf with detaching the earl of Surrey, towards the borders of Scotland, to oppoſe king James, if he ſhould make a ſecond inroad into England; and, in the interim, the rebels traverſed the counties, without the leaſt oppoſition. This conduct ſurpriſed all the world, ſince it was his cuſtom ſpeedily to march to the place where there was any appearance of danger; but, on this occaſion, he acted otherwiſe, and for ſeveral reaſons. Firſt, he greatly rejoiced, that the rebels were ſo far from their homes, and harraſſed themſelves, with tedious marches; ſecondly, he did not apprehend any neceſſity to haſten his attacking them, ſince they committed no outrages; moreover, he could not find, that their numbers increaſed; but the principal reaſon of his ſlowneſs was, that he would ſee, if they had any correſpondents, in other countries, that he might divide his army, if neceſſary, or more ſpeedily relieve the weakeſt; and, in fine, age, and the continued enjoyment of a crown, had, doubtleſs, rendered him more averſe to encounter dangers; for any other way ſeemed to him leſs hazardous than a battle, on the preſent occaſion.

He reſolves to gives them battle. Hall. Bacon.

However, the rebels encamping, on Black-Heath, from whence they might have a proſpect of London, the king could no longer delay to oppoſe them; for he was afraid that it would be believed, that his coldneſs proceeded from fear, which might have produced very pernicious effects, among the people; yet, as he was much ſuperior to the rebels, both in number of troops and military knowledge, he determined to leave little to hazard or fortune. With this view, he divided his army into three bodies, the firſt of which, commanded by the earl of Oxford, was poſted behind the hill, where the rebels were encamped, to cut off their retreat, and, if neceſſary, to attack them, in the rear; and the ſecond, under the conduct of the lord D'aubeney, was ordered to charge them, in the front. The king, retaining the third, about his own perſon, encamped, in St. George's-Fields, that, in caſe of ill ſucceſs, he might be ready to renew the fight, or throw himſelf into London, to ſecure the city, as he ſhould judge expedient; and, beſides, he was ſo near, that he could ſuccour his people, during the battle.

Every thing anſwered the king's expectation; for the rebels were deceived by a report he had cauſed to be ſpread, that he reſolved to give them battle, on the Monday following; whereas he attacked them, on the Saturday, which he fancied to be the moſt fortunate of all the days of the week. As this attack was unexpected, they were ſo ſurpriſed, that they had ſcarce time to draw up; and, moreover, for want of intelligence, they ſuffered themſelves to be ſurrounded by the earl of Oxford, who, being poſted behind them, prevented their retreat; ſo that, of 6000 men, 2000 were ſlain, on the ſpot, and the reſt were forced to ſurrender, at diſcretion. The king, for once, only cauſed to be executed the lord Audley, Flammock, and the farrier *, who were taken alive; but he gave the priſoners to the captors, with leave to compound with them, for their ranſoms, as they ſhould think convenient. It is not improbable, that the moderation of the male-contents, in their march from Cornwall to London, tempered alſo the king's ſeverity; eſpecially as they had not aſſerted the title of the houſe of York, a crime he never could pardon; but, however that be, he was contented with theſe three victims, for the expiation of this great rebellion.

1497. The battle of Black-Heath, where the rebels are defeated. June 22.

Soon after the battle, the archduke's ambaſſadors ſigned, at London, articles of agreement; by which, in explaining the late treaty of commerce, the archduke deſiſted from the duty of a florin, that he before exacted, upon every piece of Engliſh cloth that was imported into his dominions.

A new treaty of the archduke. July 7. Act. Pub.

The 18th of July, Henry confirmed the marriage-articles between Arthur, his eldeſt ſon, and Catharine of Arragon; and this marriage, concluded in 1491, was ratified, the 1ſt of October, 1496.

About the ſame time, Charles VIII. ſent an ambaſſy into England, on purpoſe to confirm the treaty of Eſtaples, by the reparation of ſome outrages committed by both the parties.

Whilſt Henry was employed againſt the Corniſh rebels, king James, improving this advantage, made a ſecond irruption into England, and appeared before the caſtle of Norham; but, the earl of Surrey, then in Yorkſhire, poſting to its relief, he raiſed the ſiege and retired into his own kingdom. The earl of Surrey, not contented with expelling him out of England, purſued him into Scotland, and took the little town of Aton; but this war was, on ſeveral accounts, inconvenient to the king. Firſt, he could not carry it on, without expending all the money given by the parliament, which he would have gladly avoided; and, beſides, Perkin Warbeck making him uneaſy, he perceived, that it would be eaſier to remove him from Scotland by treaty, than by arms; yet he was deſirous, that the overtures of peace ſhould come from another, to prevent the diſgrace of a refuſal, if the king of Scotland ſhould reject the propoſal.

Whilſt he was in this perplexity, he apprehended, that Don Pedro d' Ayala, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, Henry employs the Spaniſh ambaſſador to make peace with Scotland.

* He is ſaid to pleaſe himſelf with the notion, that he ſhould be famous, in ſucceeding ages. Hall.

1497. ambaſſador, would be a proper inſtrument, on the preſent occaſion; who readily undertook to go to king James, and propoſe, as of himſelf, an agreement with the king of England; and he pretended, that nothing could be more agreeable to king Ferdinand, his maſter, than to ſee the two kings, his friends and allies, live in peace and amity. This expedient anſwered Henry's expectation; for the ambaſſador found the king of Scotland ſo well diſpoſed, that he ſent word to the king, that, if he would enter into negotiation, he did not doubt of ſucceſs; upon which, the two kings, ſending their ambaſſadors to Aton, to negotiate a peace, Ayala performed the office of mediator. The greateſt difficulty, that occurred in this negotiation, was about Perkin Warbeck, whom Henry demanded, and James refuſed to deliver; and the biſhop of Durham, finding that he could not gain that point, propoſed an interview of the two kings, at Newcaſtle; but, when it was mentioned to the king of Scotland, he declared, that, tho' he greatly deſired peace, he would not go and beg it of his enemy. However, at length, it was mutually agreed, that the king of Scotland ſhould honourably diſmiſs the pretended duke of York, before the negotiation of a peace proceeded any farther, leſt he ſhould be thought to be conſtrained to it; and that, after this, they ſhould treat, as if Perkin had never been in that kingdom.

James ſends away Perkin to Ireland.

Purſuant to this agreement, James told the counterfeit duke, that he had done for him all that was poſſible; that he had twice entered England, at the head of an army, to try the diſpoſition of the Engliſh; but that, being diſappointed, there was no probability, that, with his forces alone, he could place him on the throne, and diſpoſſeſs a king ſo firmly eſtabliſhed; that his misfortune was ſolely occaſioned by the Engliſh refuſing to eſpouſe his quarrel, and his being abandoned by thoſe who had engaged him in the undertaking, whilſt the Scots expoſed their lives, for his ſake; and that, therefore, he adviſed him to ſeek his fortune, elſewhere; yet that he would make good what he promiſed him, at firſt, "That he ſhould not repent of putting him-"ſelf into his hands." Perkin, finding that the king of Scotland was reſolved to diſmiſs him, thanked him for the protection he had, hitherto, received from him, and for all his other favours; intreating him alſo to conveigh him into Ireland, with his wife, which the king, immediately, granted.

A truce of ſeven years between Scotland and England. Act. Pub.

Perkin Warbeck was no ſooner removed from Scotland, than all the obſtacles to a peace vaniſhed; and the ambaſſadors, aſſembled at Aton, ſigned a truce, for ſeven years, to commence, the 30th of September, the day of ſigning the treaty. It was expreſly agreed, that neither of the two kings ſhould make war upon the other, by himſelf, or ſubjects, or any other perſon, by which Perkin Warbeck was ſufficiently underſtood, tho' he was not named; and that certain points, not ſettled by the ambaſſadors, ſhould be referred to the deciſion of Ferdinand and Iſabella. This truce, limited to ſeven years, was afterwards prolonged, till 1497. a year after the deceaſe of the ſurvivor of the two monarchs; and, in fine, each of the two kings gave letters patent to the mediator, deſiring him to report to Ferdinand and Iſabella the differences not yet decided, and promiſing to ſtand to their determination. Theſe letters abounded with marks of eſteem and acknowledgement for the ambaſſador; and the two princes demonſtrated, how much they were pleaſed with his equity, wiſdom, impartiality, and the trouble he had ſo willingly undertaken. Nothing could be more honourable to Ayala, whom the Engliſh and Scotch writers term Hialas, or Elias, than the perfect confidence repoſed in him by theſe two princes; but yet it may be ſaid, that he had the good fortune, to find them equally inclined to a peace ſo neceſſary for both.

The firſt propoſal of the marriage of Margaret with the king of Scotland.

I obſerved, that, in 1495 and 1496, Henry commiſſioned his ambaſſadors to treat of a marriage, between Margaret, his daughter, and the king of Scotland; but we do not find, that this affair was taken notice of, in any of the former negotiations, or even in this laſt mentioned; yet it is highly probable, that Henry, who was deſirous of that marriage, inſinuated the propoſal, by the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who was in his intereſt and confidence. It was an extremely proper occaſion, ſince Ayala might make the overture, as from himſelf, without engaging Henry, in caſe of refuſal; and, tho' it proceeded no farther, at this time, we ſhall ſee preſently its happy effects, which gave birth to the union of the two kingdoms.

The death of the prince of Spain. Mayern.

In the beginning of the year, Margaret of Auſtria, ſiſter to the archduke, went into Spain to Don John, her husband; and the nuptials were celebrated, in a very ſolemn and magnificent manner; but, a few months after, Don John died, leaving the princeſs with child, who was delivered of a ſtill-born infant.

The marriage of Iſabella, his ſiſter, with the king of Portugal.

By the deceaſe of Don John, his ſiſter, Iſabella, widow to prince Alphonſo of Portugal, became preſumptive heir to the kingdoms of Caſtile and Arragon; but, ſince the death of the prince, her ſpouſe, ſhe was contracted to Don Manuel, new king of Portugal; who, hearing of Don John's ſickneſs, ſo preſſed his marriage, that it was conſummated, before that prince expired.

The affairs of France.

The preceding year, as was related, Charles VIII. loſt the kingdom of Naples; and, tho' the diviſions, among the Italian princes, ſeemed to invite him to this conqueſt, he could never reſolve upon it, having turned all his thoughts to love and pleaſure; yet he punctually paid Henry 25000 livres, every half year, purſuant to the treaty of Eſtaples, leſt he ſhould draw upon himſelf new troubles from England.

1498. After this treaty, there was no war, or difference, between France and England, during the reign of Henry VII; for the two monarchs ſtood in awe of each other. Charles, who, at firſt, had formed vaſt projects, found that the king of England was the only prince that 1498. that could lay obſtacles, in his way; and, afterwards, when he deſiſted from the war of Italy, to indulge his pleaſures, he was continually afraid, that a war with Henry would diſturb his tranquillity. Henry, on the other hand, dreaded all foreign wars, and particularly with France, on account of his domeſtick enemies; ſo that the two kings, having the ſame intereſt, lived in peace, till Charles's death, on the 6th of April, 1498; and the duke of Orleans, his ſucceſſor, by the name of Lewis XII, was no leſs ſollicitous to preſerve a good underſtanding with England. As his mind was ſolely intent upon Italy, it highly concerned him to keep fair with Henry, who might overthrow all his projects by a diverſion, in Picardy; and Lewis was no ſooner on the throne, than he cauſed his marriage with Jane, daughter to Lewis XI, to be annulled, in order to marry Ann of Bretagne, his predeceſſor's widow; or elſe he would have run the riſque of ſeeing Bretagne, once more, ſevered from France, and in the poſſeſſion of a foreign family.

The death of Charles VIII; Lewis ſucceeds him.

Freſh troubles in England.

Tho' Henry had nothing to fear from abroad, being in peace with all the princes of Europe, the caſe was different, with reſpect to his own ſubjects; for, before he could acquire that perfect tranquillity, he ſo ardently deſired, he was again attacked by the Corniſhmen; for Perkin Warbeck himſelf, having learnt to live, like a prince, could not think of returning to his primitive obſcurity, and, therefore, embraced this opportunity, to create new commotions.

An inſurrection in Cornwall.

The Corniſh rebels had been uſed more gently, than they could have reaſonably expected, conſidering the nature of their crime; for moſt of them had compounded, for two or three ſhillings a man, ſo extreme was their poverty; but theſe, being returned home, openly ſaid, that, if the king had treated them with lenity, it was not from a motive of clemency, but becauſe he perceived, that, if he puniſhed all that were of their party, he muſt hang up three parts in four of his ſubjects. Theſe diſcourſes inducing their friends and neighbours to believe, that the whole kingdom was ready to riſe, they, by flocking together, ſhewed, that they were not diſcouraged by the battle of Black-Heath; and, at laſt, ſome of the ring-leaders, hearing that Perkin Warbeck was in Ireland, propoſed to ſend for him, with an intent to place him at their head. The propoſal meeting with applauſe, they acquainted Warbeck, that, if he would come among them, he ſhould find a conſiderable aid; and that, with the aſſiſtance of other well affected Engliſhmen, they hoped to place him on the throne.

Perkin comes and heads them. Hall.

Perkin, having no refuge, in Ireland, nor any expectations from Scotland, France, or the Low-Countries, gladly accepted the invitation; and his counſellors were Hern, a broken mercer, Skelton, a taylor, and Aſtley, a ſcrivener, who told him, that he had committed an egregious error in relying upon the ducheſs of Burgundy, and the kings of France and Scotland, who, regardleſs of his, ſolely conſulted their own intereſts; that he had taken a wrong ſtep, when he landed, in Kent, which was too near London; but, if he had been ſo fortunate as to have been in Cornwall, when the Corniſhmen took up arms, he would have been already crowned, at Weſtminſter: That the Scots were improper inſtruments to put the crown on his head, becauſe they were not beloved by the Engliſh; but he muſt entirely depend upon the people of England, who alone were able to procure him the crown; and that, therefore, they adviſed him to repair into Cornwall, where he was expected. 1498.

Accordingly, Perkin embarqued for Cornwall, with no more than 70 men, in four ſmall veſſels, and arrived, in September, at Whitſand-bay; but he no ſooner landed his little troop, than he came to Bodmin, the farrier's town, who was executed, after the battle of Black-Heath; where, aſſembling about 3000 men, he publiſhed a proclamation, aſſuming the title of king of England, and the name of Richard IV. He very freely reproached and inveighed againſt Henry and his government, with magnificent promiſes to ſuch as ſhould take up arms, to dethrone the uſurper; and he formed a deſign to become maſter of Exeter, not only to make it ſerve for a magazine, but likewiſe for a retreat, in time of neceſſity. At firſt, he attempted to bribe the inhabitants, promiſing them the preſervation and augmentation of their privileges; but, finding this means to be ineffectual, he reſolved to ſtorm the city. As he wanted artillery, he was obliged to ſcale the walls, and, at the ſame time, endeavoured to fire one of the gates; but the attempt miſcarried, and he loſt 200 men, in the aſſault.

and beſieges Exeter. Bacon.

Henry, upon the news, that Perkin had joined the Corniſh rebels, and was before Exeter, merrily ſaid, "He hoped now to have "the honour to ſee him, which he could ne-"ver, as yet, obtain." He likewiſe intimated, that he ſhould receive, with pleaſure and gratitude, the ſervice of the nobility, on the preſent occaſion; upon which, ſeveral lords and gentlemen of Devonſhire, and the adjacent parts, not called from court, drew ſome forces together, and appeared in arms; and, on the other hand, the king ordered the lord D'aubeney, to march to the relief of Exeter, ſpreading a report of his following, in perſon, with a powerful army.

He flies to ſanctuary. Stow. Hollingſh.

Perkin, hearing of theſe preparations againſt him, raiſed the ſiege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton, where he prepared all things, as if he deſigned to fight; but, that very night, he fled to Bewley-monaſtery, in the New-Foreſt, where he and ſeveral of his company regiſtered themſelves, as ſanctuary-men; but the lord D'aubeney, being informed that Perkin had deſerted his army, detached 300 horſe to purſue him, and prevent his eſcaping, by ſea; yet, arriving too late at Bewley, they contented themſelves with ſurrounding the ſanctuary, till farther orders. In the interim, Perkin's troops, tho' augmented to 6000, wanting their head, ſubmitted to Henry's mercy, who pardoned them all, except a few ring-leaders, who were hanged, for 1498. an example. Presently after, he detached a party of horse to St. Michael's Mount, to bring away Perkin's wife who had retired thither, lest, if she was with child and escaped, this affair should not end, in the person of Perkin; but this virtuous lady, who entirely loved her husband, tho' unworthy of her, so attracted the king's favour, by her modesty, that he afforded her a very gracious reception. He comforted her himself, in the most affectionate terms, had her conducted to the queen, and assigned her an honourable allowance, which she enjoyed, during his life, and many years after; and she was called the white Rose, as well by reason of her beauty, as on account of the name given by the duchess of Burgundy to her husband.

The king goes to Exeter. Bacon.

Tho' Perkin was in a place, from whence he could not escape, the king went to Exeter, to inquire more strictly into the rise and origin of the rebellion; and, as he entered the city, taking his sword from his side, he gave it to the mayor, to be always carried before him, honouring, by that mark of distinction, the zeal shewn by the inhabitants for his service. On the morrow, he ordered some of the rebels to be hanged, as so many sacrifices to the inhabitants of Exeter, and as a sort of satisfaction for what they had suffered; but, as to the rest, who had submitted to his mercy, he, indeed, gave them their lives; tho' he appointed commissioners, to punish them by fines, proceeding, on this occasion, with so great severity, that one would have imagined, he repented of giving them their lives, and intended to starve the miserable wretches, after freeing them from the gallows.

Debates about Perkin. Hall.

After this, he advised with his council, how he should proceed, with respect to Perkin, who was still in his sanctuary; and some were for removing him, by force, and putting him to death, not, in the least, doubting, that, after the execution, the king might easily agree with the pope. Others were of opinion, that, pursuant to the license granted by Innocent VIII's bull, it was sufficient to have him narrowly watched; and that, unless it was absolutely necessary, such an advantage should not be given to his holiness; and, besides, that the king ought studiously to avoid being accounted a violater of sanctuaries, which his enemies would not fail to improve to his prejudice. In a word, some expresly told the king, that he could never satisfy the people, that Perkin Warbeck was an impostor, unless Warbeck himself voluntarily undeceived those that his artifices had seduced; and that, therefore, it was most advisable to engage him, by a pardon, freely to make a confession of his crime. The king, following this advice, sent to Perkin an offer of his life, provided he would voluntarily surrender himself; which he readily accepted, being so strictly watched and guarded, that he despaired to make his escape; moreover, if he could have escaped, he was destitute of all hopes, after the trial of so many different means had proved unsuccessful.

Soon after, Henry caused Perkin to be brought to court, as if he was entirely at liberty; but yet he was attended by several persons, who were commanded to take all possible care, to prevent his escape. Every one might see and discourse with him; but he could never obtain leave to throw himself at the king's feet, tho' the king, to gratify his curiosity, saw him, without being seen; and, after that, Perkin was conducted to London. He was, all the way, exposed to the insults and derision of the populace; but he seemed to bear all, with uncommon courage and constancy. He never acted the prince better, than at present, neither affecting too great an insensibility, nor discovering too much dejection; and, upon his arrival at London, he was made to ride, twice, through the city, that people might have time and opportunity to view him thoroughly, and then he was confined in the tower. A few days after, was executed one of his principal confidents, who, rather than take sanctuary with him, in Bewley, chose to wander about the country, in a hermit's habit*; and, this execution being over, Perkin Warbeck was secretly examined, and his confession published, giving a full account of all his actions, and the places where had lived, from the time of his nativity; but all were surprised to find no particulars of the conspiracy, or the authors. The duchess of Burgundy herself was not so much as named; from whence some were confirmed in the belief, that the person, termed Perkin Warbeck, was the real duke of York; being persuaded, that this affected silence was mysterious, and that the king durst not insert, in Perkin's pretended confession, any of the circumstances relating to foreign princes, lest he should be publickly contradicted by persons, who would not have for him the same regard as his own subjects; and, as to what was published about Perkin's life and kindred, nothing, as they said, was easier than to invent such stories. However, some believed, that the king's silence was the effect of complaisance to the king of France, the emperor, archduke, duchess of Burgundy, and king of Scotland; and that there were even English lords concerned in the plot, against whom he did not think fit to proceed.

1498. He is carried to London, and confined in the tower. Bacon.

The year 1498 ended with an accident, at which Henry was not a little concerned; for, whilst he was at his palace of Shene, a fire broke out, the 21st of December, with such violence, that, in a few hours, the buildings with all the rich furniture, was entirely consumed; but Henry, being extremely fond of that palace, caused it, soon after, to be rebuilt, from the ground, calling it Richmond; which name it retains, to this day.

The same year, Isabella, queen of Portugal, was solemnly acknowledged heir apparent of Castile and Arragon, by the states of both these kingdoms; but, soon after, she died, in childbed, at Saragossa, having been delivered of a prince, named Michael, who was proclaimed presumptive successor to Ferdinand and Isabella.

Since

1499. A quarrel between the Engliſh and Scots. The truce between England and Scotland being concluded, as was ſaid, to the ſatisfaction of both parties, the Scots familiarly converſed with their neighbours, the Engliſh; eſpecially with the inhabitants of Norham. This place, which was fortified with a ſtrong caſtle and an able garriſon, is ſituated on the little river Tweed, that parts the two kingdoms; and it happened, one day, that ſome Scotchmen, walking out of the town, ſtood looking attentively upon the caſtle; but, this creating ſuſpicion in the ſoldiers of the garriſon, they ſent them an order, to retire. The Scots, reſenting their being ſuſpected, returned an angry anſwer; and, in ſhort, falling from words to blows, ſome of them were ſlain. The affair, being brought before the wardens of the marches, was overlooked; ſo that, after many delays, the king of Scotland diſpatched ambaſſadors into England, to demand ſpeedy ſatisfaction. Henry, unwilling to quarrel with James, replied, that, tho' what had been done was a mere accident, and without his privity, he would readily make all convenient ſatisfaction, and, with that view, would ſend ambaſſadors to the king of Scotland. Buchanan and the lord Bacon, Henry VII's hiſtorian, affirm, that the firſt overture of the match, between king James and the princeſs Margaret, was made, during this negotiation; and that James himſelf propoſed it to Richard Fox, biſhop of Durham; whereas the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that, above four years before, Henry had projected this marriage, and, probably, procured it, as I obſerved, by ſome indirect means, to be ſuggeſted to the king of Scotland. As the biſhop of Durham could not be ignorant of the king's intent, who had been twice commiſſioned to treat of this marriage, he took care to inſpire king James with hopes, that he ſhould be entirely ſatisfied with the reſult of this buſineſs; and, ſhortly after, the ambaſſadors of the two kings, meeting at Sterling, to decide the Norham-affair, renewed the former truce, adding certain articles, to prevent the like accidents; after which, Henry appointed the biſhop of Durham, to ſettle with the king of Scotland the articles of the intended marriage, tho' this affair was not finiſhed, till January, 1502.

Perkin Warbeck, accuſtomed to live, like a prince, was heartily tired of the tower, where, doubtleſs, he was treated in a different manner; and, tho', probably, the king had ordered him to be ſtrictly guarded, he found means to eſcape, and take the road into Kent, where he expected to find ſome ſhip to carry him out of the kingdom; but, hearing that orders were every-where ſent, to apprehend him, he fled for refuge to the monaſtery of Bethlehem, which enjoyed the privilege of a ſanctuary. The prior could not eaſily protect ſuch a perſon; and yet he could not reſolve either to ſet him at liberty, or violate the privilege of the houſe, in delivering him up to the king. In this perplexity, he choſe to wait upon the king; and, informing him that Perkin Warbeck was in his power, he petitioned for his life, leaving him, otherwiſe, to the diſcretion of the king. Henry evidently perceived, that it was impoſſible to draw Perkin out of the monaſtery, to put him to death, without raiſing a great clamour againſt him; and, therefore, pretending a profound reſpect for the prior, who was extremely reverenced, he granted the priſoner his life; but he ordered him to be ſet in the ſtocks, a whole day, in the palace-court, at Weſtminſter, and, next day, at the croſs in Cheapſide, from whence he was conveighed to the tower. Such a priſoner ſhould, naturally have been thrown into ſome dungeon; and yet his confinement was not the moſt rigorous, ſince he was allowed to converſe with the reſt of the priſoners. 1499.

After he had continued, ſome time, in this ſtate, he found means to gain four ſervants of Sir John Digby, lieutenant of the tower, with whom he conſpired to kill their maſter, ſeize the keys of the tower, and eſcape with the earl of Warwick, who had been alſo perſuaded to engage in the plot, in hopes of recovering his liberty, of which he had been ſo long unjuſtly deprived; but, unfortunately for them, the affair was diſcovered, before it could be put in execution. It was ſcarce doubted, that the king himſelf contrived this plot; and that his view, was to draw, at once, Perkin Warbeck and the earl of Warwick into the ſnare, in order to put them both to death. Indeed, ſeveral reaſons rendered it highly probable; for, firſt, it was extremely ſurpriſing, that Perkin was not more cloſely confined, ſince he had attempted to make his eſcape; ſecondly, it was unlikely, that, as he was in no condition to reward Sir John Digby's ſervants, they ſhould run ſuch a riſque, for his ſake; thirdly, Perkin was too cunning to join with the earl of Warwick, who would have hurted him only, if they had eſcaped; and, laſtly, if they had diſpatched the governor, without being diſcovered, and procured the keys of the tower, is it to be ſuppoſed, that the guards would have opened the gate, or ſuffered it to be opened, in the night, without either examining the perſons that went out, or the governor's expreſs order; but it farther confirms this ſuſpicion of the king, that, about the ſame time, a young man, one Wilford, a ſhoemaker's ſon, pretended to be the earl of Warwick. He was accompanied, or rather directed, by an Auguſtin friar, named Patrick, who preached publickly, in ſome town, in Kent, that Wilford was the earl of Warwick, and exhorted the people to take up arms, in his favour; but, tho' they were both apprehended, Wilford was hanged, and the friar pardoned; from whence it was believed, that Wilford had been ſeduced by the friar, and by the king's particular direction, that 1499. that he might have a plauſible pretence to take away his life, under colour of cauſing freſh commotions.

However this be, it is certain, that Henry reſolved to free himſelf, at once, from all the uneaſineſs occaſioned by Perkin Warbeck and the earl of Warwick; and, tho' it cannot be poſitively aſſerted, that he laid a ſnare for them, at leaſt, this plot afforded him a ſpecious pretence to deliver them over to juſtice. Perkin was condemned, by commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, to be hanged, and was executed with the mayor of Cork and his ſon, who had been his conſtant companions, in all his adventures; but, of eight others, condemned with them, among whom were Sir John Digby's four ſervants, only two were put to death. This was the fate of Perkin Warbeck, who had been owned, as a lawful king, in Ireland, France, Flanders, England, and Scotland, and made Henry ſhake in his throne; and, perhaps, he would have ſucceeded in his deſigns, had he been concerned with a leſs politick prince. However, it is certain, that the king took too little care to undeceive the publick; and that the proofs alledged to ſhew, that Perkin was an impoſtor, being taken only from a private examination, did not appear to be ſufficiently evident.

The earl of Warwick is condemned and beheaded.

A few days after Perkin's execution, the earl of Warwick was brought before the houſe of lords, the earl of Oxford exerciſing, by commiſſion, the office of high-ſteward; and he was arraigned, not for attempting to eſcape, which could not be made high-treaſon, ſince he was not impriſoned for any ſuch crime, nor even for any other, but for, jointly with Perkin Warbeck, conſpiring the death of the king. The poor prince, confeſſing that he conſented to the project laid by Perkin and Digby's ſervants, was condemned to loſe his head; and the ſentence was executed, on Towerhill *. He was the laſt male heir of the houſe of York, which, in reality, was the crime that coſt him his life, the king chuſing rather to ſacrifice his own reputation, than not ſecure the crown to himſelf and his heirs; and to leſſen, in ſome meaſure, people's horror of this cruelty, the king ſpread a report, that king Ferdinand had expreſly declared, that he would never marry his daughter, Catharine, to prince Arthur, whilſt the earl of Warwick was alive; a ſtrange apology, inſinuating, that the marriage of the princeſs of Spain was ſo neceſſary for England, that it muſt be purchaſed with blood! However, if this marriage was not requiſite for the ſtate, it was, at leaſt, very advantageous to the king, who was to receive 200,000 crowns of gold, for Catharine's dowry; which alone would have induced him to ſacrifice the earl of Warwick, if he had no other advantage by his death; and he had beheaded the lord chamberlain, from a like motive; but, in the interim, in all probability, what was publiſhed, concerning king Ferdinand, was a mere pretence to excuſe Henry, ſince Arthur's marriage with Catharine was celebrated, by proxy, the 19th of May, this very year, before the earl of Warwick's execution †. 1499.

The peace of Eſtaples is confirmed by the ſtates of France. Act. Pub.

Lewis XII. had ſolemnly ratified and ſworn to the peace of Eſtaples, a little after he aſcended the throne; but, being deſirous to convince Henry, that he really intended to obſerve it, he cauſed it to be approved and confirmed by the ſtates-general, aſſembled at Nantz, in the beginning of the year. Then he ſent ambaſſadors to the pope, to requeſt his confirmation of it; and his holineſs, ſeeing no farther obſtacle from France, iſſued out a bull of excommunication againſt whichſoever of the two kings ſhould violate the treaty.

Lewis had reaſon to deſire the preſervation of the peace, made by his predeceſſor with England; for he had projected to ſeize the duchy of Milan, and, with this view, entered into a league with the Venetians, who were to have, for their ſhare, all that part of the Milaneſe, ſituated beyond the Adda. This very year, the confederates attacked the duchy of Milan; and Ludovico Sforza, the moſt perfidious of men, being forſaken by all the world, was conſtrained to fly to the emperor, having loſt all his places, except the caſtle of Milan; Genoa, of which he was poſſeſſed, following the example of the Milaneſe, in voluntarily ſurrendering to the king of France.

The king of Naples is included in the peace of Eſtaples. Act. Pub.

Frederick, king of Naples, ſucceſſor to Ferdinand, his nephew, fearing that the preparations, in France, were intended againſt him, gave Henry ſpeedy intelligence, that he was deſirous to be included in the treaty he had lately renewed with France; but Lewis had no thoughts of attacking him, this year; for he reſerved the war of Naples, after the conqueſt of Milan.

1500. A jubilee furniſhes the pope with means to raiſe money. Hall.

Alexander VI, having publiſhed a jubilee, for the year 1500, the laſt of the century, had granted, by his bull, to all chriſtians at a diſtance from Rome, the privilege of the jubilee, without obliging them to viſit the churches of that city; but on condition they paid a certain ſum, for the favour. This was an infallible means to draw money from all the ſtates of Chriſtendom; and the commiſſioner appointed to levy it, in England, was Jaſper Pons, a Spaniard, who diſcreetly executed his commiſſion, without noiſe or ſcandal, and carried a conſiderable ſum to his maſter.

A Cruſade intended with the ſame view. Act. Pub.

tentates,

1500. tentates, that the Hungarians, Polonians, and Bohemians ſhould make war upon the Turks, in Thrace; the French and Spaniards, in Greece; and himſelf, with the king of England, the Venetians, and the Italian princes, who were moſt powerful, at ſea, ſhould attack Conſtantinople: That, purſuant to this reſolution, he had ſent nuncio's to all the courts, to exhort the ſovereigns amicably to put an end to their private quarrels, that all the Chriſtian forces might be united together for ſuch a pious undertaking. Alexander VI. was too well known, to be thought to act, in this reſpect, from a motive of religion and zeal for the glory of God; and, conſequently, it was obvious, that the ſole intent of this Cruſade was to accumulate money by voluntary contributions, as well from private perſons as ſovereigns. However, Henry, unwilling to ſhew his diſlike of this project, which, probably, would be ſufficiently oppoſed, from other quarters, told the nuncio, "That no "prince, in all Chriſtendom, ſhould be more "zealous than himſelf, to promote this affair, "to the glory of God and the good of the "church; but as his dominions were ſo "remote from Conſtantinople, as he had no "gallies, and as his mariners were not ſuffi-"ciently acquainted with the Mediterranean "ſea, he judged it more proper, that the "kings of France and Spain ſhould accom-"pany his holineſs, by ſea; whereby, not "only all things would be ſooner ready, but "the jealouſy wiſely avoided, which would "infallibly ariſe between theſe two monarchs, "in caſe they ſhould march together, by "land, without a ſuperior: That, for his "part, he would freely contribute both men "and money towards the undertaking; but, "if the kings of France and Spain ſhould "refuſe to accompany the pope, he would go "himſelf and command under him, provided "all differences between the Chriſtian princes "were firſt appeaſed, which he would not "obſtruct, ſince he was in peace with all the "world, and ſome good towns, on the coaſt "of Italy, put into his hands, to ſerve for "retreat, in caſe of neceſſity."

The king's anſwer. Bacon.

Henry is choſen protector of the order of St. John. Act. Pub.

The pope evidently perceived the meaning of this anſwer; and, as, probably, the other princes would return the like, the Cruſade vaniſhed into air. In the interim, Henry, to diſplay his zeal, appointed ambaſſadors to go to Rome, to treat with his holineſs, about that affair; but it does not appear, that theſe ambaſſadors ever went from London; however, Henry's anſwer being publiſhed, the knights of Rhodes elected him, for protector of their order, believing there was no prince, in Chriſtendom, more zealous than himſelf for religion.

The plague having, for ſome time, raged, in England*, the king, after frequent removals, determined to go and make ſome ſtay, at Calais, with his family, till the danger was over; and, upon his arrival, the archduke Philip ſent ambaſſadors, to welcome him into thoſe parts, and expreſs'd his deſire of making him a viſit; but, at the ſame time, he intreated him to appoint, for their interview, ſome place that was not a fortified town; not that he, in the leaſtt ſuſpected him, but becauſe he had already refuſed to confer with the king of France, in a walled place. Henry, very civilly accepting this compliment, appointed the place at St. Peter's church, without the gates of Calais; and then he diſpatched ambaſſadors to Philip, to return his compliment, and acquaint him, that he expected his coming, with the utmoſt impatience. Some days after, being told that the archduke was near Calais, he rode out of the town, to receive him; and, when Philip ſaw him, he alighted and offered to hold the king's ſtirrup; but, Henry not permitting him, they embraced, after which, they had a long conference, at the place appointed. The archduke, to efface the impreſſion which his protection of Perkin might have made on the king, declared that he was ardently deſirous of living in friendſhip with him, calling him his patron and father; which is evident from the king's letter to the mayor of London, on that occaſion; and it is likewiſe ſaid, that overtures were made of croſs marriages between Henry, duke of York, the king's ſecond ſon, and Margaret, Philip's ſiſter, widow to the prince of Spain, and between Charles, ſon to Philip, and Mary, the king's ſecond daughter. Charles was born, the 24th of February, this year; and, prince Michael of Portugal dying, about the ſame time, he was become heir apparent of the crowns of Caſtile and Arragon.

The Engliſh and Scotch ambaſſadors, at length, agreeing upon the terms of the marriage between king James and Margaret, the pope gave a diſpenſation; but, as the princeſs was only between 10 and 11 years old, it was not conſummated, till three years after.

The king inquires after Warbeck's adherents. Act. Pub.

As Henry was now in peace with all the princes of Europe, and there was no appearance of any commotions, in his kingdom, he could not have any pretence to demand of his parliament new ſubſidies; but, this way of raiſing money, which he ſo greedily deſired, failing him, he deviſed other infallible methods. Perkin Warbeck's affair was a plentiful fountain, which was not yet exhauſted; and the commiſſion he had eſtabliſhed, whilſt at Exeter, properly regarded only ſuch as had actually taken up arms againſt him; but, tho' that commiſſion had brought him in very large ſums, he was not contented. Under colour, that thoſe, who had, in any manner, adhered to Warbeck's party, were ſtill expoſed to the ſeverity of the law, he was willing to grant them a pardon, unasked; but then it was on condition, that they paid the fines impoſed on them; and, with this view, he appointed new commiſſioners, to inquire after thoſe that aſſiſted Michael, the farrier, author of the firſt Corniſh rebellion, and Perkin Warbeck, the impoſtor, impowering them to pardon the

From hence it is manifeſt, that, if the king had ſpared the rebels, during the troubles, it was only becauſe he was afraid of driving them to deſpair, whilſt they were yet heated; ſince he treated them with rigour, as ſoon as he believed them to be no longer dangerous.

The death of cardinal Moreton. Hall. Stow.

Cardinal Moreton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was conſidered, as the author of theſe oppreſſions; but it afterwards appeared, that they ſprung from the king himſelf. The archbiſhop died, the latter end of this, or the beginning of the next year, little lamented by the Engliſh, who were extremely prejudiced againſt him; and Henry Dean, biſhop of Saliſbury, ſucceeded him, tho' he had not poſſeſſion, till the Auguſt following; but, before we conclude this year, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate what paſſed, in Italy.

Lewis XII. and Ferdinand ſhare the kingdom of Naples. Mezerai.

Lewis XII, being maſter of the duchy of Milan, applied his thoughts to the conqueſt of Naples; and, tho', probably, he might alone have ſubdued that kingdom, he made an alliance with the king of Arragon, by which they engaged to join their forces, and ſhare the conqueſt; for Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria, and Lewis the city of Naples, Abruzzo, and Terra di Lavaro. Upon the ſigning of this treaty, Ferdinand ſent an army into Italy, under the conduct of the famous Gonzolvo, commonly ſtiled the great captain; and Lewis gave the command of his army to d' Aubigni, the earl of Gaiazzo, and Cæſar Borgia, the pope's baſtard, who, having relinquiſhed the cardinalate, was become duke of Valentinois; but the French fleet was commanded by Philip of Cleves, lord Ravenſtein. In a very ſhort ſpace, each of the two monarchs conquered the portion aſſigned him by the treaty; and the unfortunate Frederick, king of Naples, was obliged to caſt himſelf upon the mercy of Lewis XII, who ſent him to reſide, in France, with a penſion of 30,000 crowns.

1501. Henry, having no war with any of his neighbours, lived in profound tranquillity; and the more, as he ſaw, in England, no lord in a condition to create him any diſturbance. The ability he had diſcovered, in ſeveral affairs, as well foreign as domeſtick, which had unexpectedly happened, kept his neighbours in awe, and his ſubjects in obedience; ſo that he could perceive nothing capable of interrupting his quiet; and yet, in the interim, when he leaſt expected it, he imagined, tho' without a cauſe, that a new ſtorm was gathering againſt him. The earl of Suffolk *, nephew to Edward IV. and Richard III, and brother to the earl of Lincoln, ſlain at Stokefield, quarrelling with a man, had the misfortune to kill him; which accident might have given the king a pretence to free himſelf from the earl, of courſe, odious to him, ſince he was, by his mother, of the houſe of York; however, whether the action, in itſelf, was not criminal, or for ſome other reaſon, the king was pleaſed to forgive him, provided he publickly pleaded his pardon. The earl, more offended at this diſgrace, than grateful for the favour he received, ſhortly after, retired into Flanders, to his aunt, the ducheſs of Burgundy; but Henry was ſtartled at his retreat, fearing that he went into the Low-Countries, to contrive ſome plot againſt him; for his conſtant uneaſineſs, with reſpect to his crown, made him apprehenſive, that the leaſt beginnings would be attended with fatal conſequences; wherefore, that the earl might not have leiſure to concert new projects with the ducheſs of Burgundy, he prevailed on him, by meſſages, to return into England, where he was very readily pardoned. The ducheſs of Burgundy, being advanced in years, was tired with ſo many fruitleſs attempts to dethrone Henry; and, beſides, ſhe had no proſpect of any farther aſſiſtance from the archduke, who was willing to live in amity with him.

Several marriages.

This year abounded in marriages, and projects of marriages of conſequence. The archduke going into Spain, by land, had an opportunity to confer with Lewis XII, and conclude with him a marriage between his ſon Charles with Claude, eldeſt daugher to that monarch.

On the other hand, Margaret of Auſtria, the archduke's ſiſter, and widow to the prince of Spain, married Philibert, duke of Savoy.

The marriage of Arthur with Catharine is conſummated.

In fine, Catharine of Arragon, daughter to Ferdinand and Iſabella, arriving in England, in October, her nuptials with Arthur, prince of Wales, were ſolemnized, the 14th of November; and, tho' the prince was only in the 16th year of his age, the conſummation of the marriage was not called in queſtion. The prince himſelf, next morning, ſaid ſeveral things, which left no room to doubt it; and yet there were afterwards very warm conteſts about it, Catharine, or her council, affirming that there was no conſummation; but it is not yet time to treat about this point.

A diſpenſation is granted to Thomas Wolſey. Act. Pub.

Thomas Wolſey, afterwards archbiſhop of York and cardinal, who made ſo great a figure, in England, was now rector of the pariſh-church of Lymington, in the dioceſs of Bath and Wells; and the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that, in November, this year, the pope, on account of his diſtinguiſhed merit, granted him a diſpenſation to hold two benefices, otherwiſe, inconſiſtent.

1502. The laſt agreements about Margaret's marriage with James IV.

Tho' the diſpenſation for the king of Scotland's marriage was come, Henry delayed to finiſh that affair, becauſe of his daughter's tender age; but, at length, the princeſs being entered upon her 13th year, the 29th of November, 1501, James ſent ambaſſadors to London, where every thing relating to this match was ſettled, and the contract drawn, in form, the 24th of January, 1502. Henry gave with his daughter 30,000 angel nobles of

It was farther agreed, that ſhe might have 24 Engliſh ſervants, and, as one died, appoint another in his room; that the marriage ſhould be performed, per verba de Præſenti, about the feaſt of Purification; but the king of Scotland ſhould not have Margaret in his hands, till September the 1ſt, 1503; and that, then, Henry ſhould cauſe her to be conducted, at his own expence, to the borders of the two kingdoms. Before this contract was ſigned, a privy-counſellor repreſented to the king, that it was poſſible this marriage might, one day, give England a Scotch ſovereign; but Henry replied, that, if this ſhould be the caſe, the ſtrongeſt would carry it from the weakeſt, and Scotland be annexed to England, and not England to Scotland, which fell out accordingly.

Two treaties between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

The ſame day, two other treaties were alſo ſigned; one of perpetual peace and alliance between Scotland and England, and the other about the outrages that might be committed, on both ſides, contrary to the peace.

The death of prince Arthur.

Whilſt the court rejoiced, for the marriage of the queen of Scotland, prince Arthur, her brother, was ſeized with a diſtemper that laid him in his grave. He died, the 2d of April, about five months after his marriage, and in the 17th year of his age; but, as the princeſs, his widow, might be with child, the king deferred, for two or three months, to create Henry, his ſecond ſon, prince of Wales. The lord Bacon affirms, that Henry was not made prince of Wales, till February, 1503; but there are, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, letters patent of the 22d of June, 1502, in which he is ſtiled prince of Wales; a convincing evidence, that he was now inveſted with that principality.

Shortly after, Henry received an ambaſſy from the emperor Maximilian, to propoſe a league againſt the Turks, tho' this was properly no more than a pretence to demand of the king an aid of money, which the emperor promiſed punctually to repay; but the king, knowing Maximilian to be always in want, choſe rather to make him a preſent of 10,000l. than to lend him the ſum he deſired. As to the league propoſed by the emperor, Henry would not engage in it, contenting himſelf with ſtipulating, that the 10,000l. ſhould be expended in the war againſt the Infidels; yet he concluded with him a treaty of commerce, and another of friendſhip, wich was to laſt, one year after the death of the ſurvivor. It was likewiſe agreed, that Maximilian, and his ſon, the archduke, ſhould be admitted into the order of the Garter, and Henry into that of the Golden-fleece; purſuant to which agreement, Henry ſent ambaſſadors to Maximilian, with the order of the Garter, and to ſee him ſwear to the treaties.

About this time, Ladiſlaus, king of Hungary, being preſſed by the Turks, and deſirous of the aid of the Chriſtian princes, Henry ſent ambaſſadors, to treat with him; but they were only impowered to promiſe, in his name, a ſum of money to be employed againſt the Infidels. 1502. An ambaſſy to Hungary. Act. Pub.

During the remainder of the year, nothing remarkable paſſed, in England; for James and Henry were entirely taken up with ratifying their three late treaties, and ſwearing to obſerve them. It appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, the king of England's ambaſſadors having delivered to king James a writing, containing the oath he was to take, he, reading it, as it was, inadvertently, gave Henry the title of king of France; but, afterwards perceiving his error, he publickly took another oath, in which the words, "and of France," were omitted, making that his authentick act; for he was, doubtleſs, apprehenſive, that the king of France would be diſpleaſed with his giving Henry the title, tho' it was of little importance. A confirmation of the treaty between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

We alſo find, in the Collection, that, on the 9th of December, Henry granted a patent to James Elliot and Thomas Aſhurſt, merchants of Briſtol, and to John Gonſalez and Francis Fernandez, natives of Portugal, to go, with Engliſh colours, in queſt of unknown countries, upon certain terms expreſſed in the patent. 1503. Eliſabeth, Henry's queen, died, the 11th of February, 1503, not much lamented by the king, who never loved her, and had given her ſenſible mortifications; for his hatred to the houſe of York was extended to his own wife, eſpecially as he always conſidered her, as a dangerous rival; and his confining the queen, her mother, in a convent, and confiſcating all her eſtate, were evident proofs of the ſmall intereſt ſhe had in his affections. The death of the queen.

The king oppreſſes his ſubjects by Empſon and Dudley.

The king's affairs were, now, ſo proſperous, that he ſeemed to poſſeſs all he could deſire; for he was in peace with all the princes of Europe, and without domeſtick commotions, or the appearance of any thing to diſturb or embarraſs him; but, unhappily for his ſubjects, his avarice was ſtill as inſatiable, as before, and he continually projected new ways to accumulate riches, which he did not want, ſince it was not to uſe them, and no prince was ever a greater œconomiſt than himſelf. His inſtruments, for this purpoſe, were Sir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, two infamous perſons, who, regardleſs of their own and their maſter's reputation, made it their ſole ſtudy to gratify his humour, and deviſe new means, to fill his coffers; the latter of whom was of a good family, well ſkilled in the laws of the land, and able to varniſh the moſt deteſtable actions; but Empſon was of a very mean extraction *, extremely impudent, and ſo little aſhamed of his unjuſt proceedings, that he gloried in them; and theſe are the methods they uſed, to extort money from the people, for the king's treaſury, beſides numberleſs others too tedious to be recited. Their character.

In

1503. In the firſt place, they cauſed ſuch as were reputed rich, to be indicted of ſeveral crimes; and, when the bills were found by the grand-jury, they committed them, without bringing them to their trial, till, of themſelves, they deſired to compound with the king; but, if they delayed too long, the miniſters took care to terrify them by emiſſaries, who made them believe, that their lives were in danger. Thus, the parties were forced, at length, to come to a compoſition, which deprived them of the beſt part of their eſtates; and yet the miniſters termed theſe mitigations, as if the king had done them a favour, in allaying the exceſſive rigour of the law.

2. They proceeded, at laſt, ſo far that, without obſerving any form of juſtice, they iſſued out their precepts, to attach and cite people before themſelves, at their own private houſes, in a court of commiſſion; where, after a ſummary examination, without proofs or witneſs, they paſſed ſentence, and condemned them, in large fines, to the uſe of the king. Thus, without vouchſafing to make uſe of juries, and the methods preſcribed by the law, they aſſumed themſelves a power to give judgment, as well in civil controverſies, as in pleas of the crown; and one would have imagined, that all criminal cauſes had belonged to that kind of juriſdiction, which, tho' it had been extremely rare, in the preceding reigns, was grown common, in this.

3. They charged the ſubjects lands with tenures in Capite, by finding falſe offices, refuſing, upon ſeveral pretences and delays, to admit people to traverſe them, according to law; from whence they formed a variety of proceſſes, of which they alone were the judges, that were always decided, in favour of the crown.

4. When the king's wards had attained to their full age, they could never have livery of their lands, without paying exorbitant fines, contrary to the expreſs tenor of Magna Charta.

5. If men were out-lawed, in perſonal actions, the miniſters would not ſuffer them to purchaſe their charters of pardon, unleſs they paid intolerable ſums; inſiſting on the rigour of the law, which, upon out-lawries, gives forfeiture of goods; nay, againſt all law and colour of reaſon, they maintained, that the king had a right to the half of men's lands and rents, during two whole years.

6. They would alſo menace the jurors, and oblige them to find, as they ſhould direct; and, upon their refuſing to act ſo unjuſtly, they were cited, impriſoned, and fined.

It is unneceſſary to relate any more of their courſes; ſince theſe, already mentioned, are ſufficient to prove, that men of this character did not ſcruple to commit the greateſt enormities, provided it was for the king's advantage; tho', in this, leſs blameable than the king himſelf, who permitted them to abuſe his name and authority.

A remarkable inſtance of the king's rigour.

We do not find, in the life of this monarch, that he ever exerciſed one act of grace, as to fines or confiſcations; for he was always inflexible, even with reſpect to his moſt faithful ſervants; and his hiſtorian takes notice of a very remarkable particular, which manifeſtly diſcovers this prince's character. Of all the lords of the kingdom, he repoſed moſt confidence in the earl of Oxford, who, had, indeed, done him the greateſt ſervices, both in war and in peace; but, one day, the king went to viſit him, at his caſtle at Henningham, and was entertained with the utmoſt magnificence. When the king was ready to depart, he ſaw a great number of men, dreſſed in rich liveries, and ranged, on both ſides, to make him a lane; for the earl, it ſeems, had forgotten that it was prohibited by ſeveral acts of parliament, to give liveries to any except menial ſervants; but the king, who remembered it, turning to the earl, ſaid, "My "lord, I have heard much of your magni-"ficence and hoſpitality; but I find they ex-"ceed all report. Theſe handſome gentle-"men and yeomen I ſee, on both ſides of "me, are, ſure, your menial ſervants." The earl, not apprehending the king's deſign, ſmiled, and anſwered, that he did not keep ſo many domeſticks; but theſe people were only his retainers, who came to ſerve him, on ſuch extraordinary occaſions. The king, ſtartling a little, replied, "By my faith, my "lord, I thank you for your good chear; but "I muſt not ſuffer to have my laws broken, "before my face. My attorney muſt talk "with you." The hiſtorian adds, that this treſpaſs coſt the earl, 15000 marks. 1503.

The ſame author affirms, that he had ſeen a book of accounts of Empſon's, with the king's hand almoſt to every leaf, by way of ſigning; and it was alſo, in ſome places, poſtilled in the margin, with the ſame hand, where, among many others, were the following memorandum:

"Item, received of ſuch a one five marks, "for the pardon to be procured; and, if the "pardon do not paſs, the money to be repaid, "execept the party be, ſome other way, ſa-"tisfied." And, over-againſt this memorandum of the king's own hand, was written by him, in the margin, "Otherways ſatisfied." He was unwilling to pardon the man; and yet he could not think of reſtoring the five marks; which plainly ſhews, that he did not overlook inconſiderable profits.

The earl of Suffolk's conſpiracy. Hall. Bacon.

It may be naturally preſumed, that the conduct of the king and miniſtry created great diſcontent and murmurs, among the people; nay the nobility, meeting with no better quarter, than thoſe of the loweſt rank, groaned under the oppreſſion of Empſon and Dudley, two leaches, who ſpared neither friend, nor foe. The earl of Suffolk, whom the king had lately pardoned, imagined, that theſe diſcontents would raiſe, in the end, ſome violent ſtorm againſt the king, if the people were headed by a perſon of diſtinction; and, as he was of the houſe of York, by his mother, he believed, that they would not fail to declare for him; wherefore, he perſuaded ſeveral lords and gentlemen to promiſe to ſupport him, at a proper juncture, and then retired into Flanders,

Henry diſcovers his ſecrets. Bacon.

The king, ſurpriſed at the earl of Suffolk's retreat, did not doubt, that he had formed ſome plot, in England, before his departure, and had his accomplices; and, to be fully informed, he thought, that it was moſt adviſable to recur to the arts he had uſed, with reſpect to Perkin Warbeck; and, with this view, he ſent orders to Sir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes near Calais, whom he knew to be fit for his purpoſe, and entirely devoted to his intereſt. Accordingly, Curſon, relinquiſhing his government, under the pretence of ſome affront deſignedly put upon him by the king, came to the earl of Suffolk, with offers of his ſervice; and he acted his part ſo well, that the earl imparted to him all his ſecrets; by which means, the king found that William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, eſpouſed to Catharine, Edward IV's daughter, William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, Sir John Windham, and ſeveral other meaner perſons engaged in the conſpiracy. They were all apprehended in one day; but, probably, for want of ſufficient evidence againſt the two firſt, the king was ſatisfied with detaining them in priſon; which afforded occaſion to think, that they were innocent, and that the king made uſe of their pretended crime, as a handle to ſecure them, becauſe their relation to the houſe of York gave him uneaſineſs. As for Tyrrel, againſt whom the blood of Edward V. and the duke of York cried for vengeance, he was beheaded, with Windham, his accomplice; and the reſt of inferior condition were puniſhed, as traytors.

The king uſes an extraordinary method to deceive him. Hall.

In the interim, Henry, in order to be better informed of Suffolk's ſecrets, took care to preſerve Curſon's credit, by an extraordinary method; cauſing Innocent VIII's bull of excommunication to be publiſhed, at Paul's-croſs, againſt all perſons that ſhould moleſt him in the poſſeſſion of the throne, and particularly againſt the earl of Suffolk and Sir Robert Curſon. When he had learned all the earl's ſecrets, he returned into England, where he was graciouſly received by the king; but the people, viewing him with horror, loaded him with curſes. The earl of Suffolk, confounded by Curſon's flight, roved about, for ſome time, in Germany; and, at length, he returned into Flanders, where the archduke, notwithſtanding his treaties with Henry, took him into his protection.

A project of marriage between the princeſs of Wales and prince Henry.

The king being ſenſible that the earl had not, in England, a party able to ſupport him, ſeemed to be no longer uneaſy; but another affair did not a little perplex him; for he had now received 100,000 crowns of gold, in part of the portion of the princeſs of Wales, his daughter-in-law, Arthur's widow. As that prince died, without iſſue, he muſt either ſend back the widow to Spain, and, of courſe, return the 100,000 crowns; or, if he kept her, in England, give her the third part of the principality of Wales; which was ſettled upon her; but both were equally diſagreeable to a prince of Henry's temper. However, he could not diſpenſe with either, without breaking with Ferdinand, which did not ſuit with his preſent circumſtances; for, indeed, the deference paid him by all the other princes, and particularly by the French king, was properly the reſult of his ſtrict alliance with the Spaniſh monarch. In this perplexity, he thought of a very apt expedient to preſerve the friendſhip of Ferdinand, with the ſum already received, and procure him the other 100,000 crowns that remained due; namely, to marry Catharine to his ſon Henry, now prince of Wales, by the death of his elder brother. The propoſal being made to the king and queen of Spain, they conſented to it, provided the pope's diſpenſation was firſt obtained; and this was the ſubject of an agreement between the two crowns, the 23d of June, without a particular mention of the articles of the propoſed marriage; in which it muſt be remarked, it was alledged, as a neceſſary reaſon for demanding the diſpenſation, not only that Arthur and Henry were brothers, but alſo that Arthur's marriage with Catharine was ſolemniſed, and conſummated, in a proper manner. 1503.

Pope Julius's diſpenſation for the marriage.

Alexander VI. dying, in the interim, Pius III. ſucceeded him; but, as he did not outlive the 18th of October, it was to Julius II, elected, the 1ſt of November, that the two kings applied for the diſpenſation. The new pope granted a bull, for that purpoſe, wherein he ſaid, that, in the petition lately preſented to him, Henry and Catharine declared, that Catharine was married, per verba de Præſenti, to the late prince Arthur; and that the marriage was celebrated, in form, and "perhaps, conſummated;" but, as to the word, "perhaps," it muſt be obſerved, that, in this caſe, it cannot denote a doubt, ſince it is not his holineſs that ſpeaks, in the petition, but Catharine, who muſt know, whether the marriage was conſummated, or not; and it is only a term, which gives more ſtrength to the diſpenſation, as it obviates all objections. This manifeſtly appears from the ſequel of the bull, where the pope permits Henry and Catharine to continue in the matrimonial ſtate, tho' they were married before, publickly, or privately, and had, perhaps, conſummated their marriage, by carnal copulation; ſo that it is obvious, the word, perhaps, is inſerted, purely to ſtrengthen the diſpenſation, by preventing all caſes that might render it invalid; but it was requiſite to make theſe obſervations, on account of the important conſequences of this affair, in the ſucceeding reign.

The king of Scotland's marriage was conſummated, in September, purſuant to agreement, Henry having conducted the queen, his daughter, to York, from whence ſhe proceeded on her journey to Scotland.

The archduke returns to the Low-Countries. Mezerai.

The archduke Philip returned, this year, into Flanders, having ſtaid, about a year, in Spain; and, in his paſſage through France, he attempted to adjuſt a difference between 1503. king Ferdinand, his father-in-law, and Lewis XII, about the kingdom of Naples. He even concluded, in Ferdinand's name, a treaty which was afterwards diſclaimed; and, had he been concerned with a prince of leſs goodneſs and equity, than Lewis XII, that diſclaiming might have plunged him into great trouble; but Lewis was ſo generous, as not to take the advantage. The occaſion of the rupture between the two monarchs was briefly, as follows:

A rupture between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand.

They had, as was ſaid, divided the kingdom of Naples, after the conqueſt; and it was ſcarce poſſible, that theſe two princes ſhould long poſſeſs the portion fallen to each, without ſome occaſion of quarrel. Accordingly, a conteſt aroſe, concerning the province of Capitanata, which each of them claimed, as being in his diviſion; upon which, the French and Spaniards came to blows; and, at firſt, the French had the better, but afterwards loſt two battles, one near St. Severina, in Calabria, the 21ſt of April, and the other, on the 28th of that month, at Cerignoles, in which the duke of Nemours, their general, was ſlain. After theſe two victories, Gonzolvo, commander of Ferdinand's troops, became maſter of the whole kingdom of Naples; but Lewis, in order to repair his loſſes, ſent a numerous army into Italy, tho', by ſeveral unexpected accidents, it was rendered unſerviceable.

1504. A ſubſidy is given the king, for the marriage of his daughter. Hall.

The 16th of January, 1504, the king convened the parliament, pretending it was neceſſary to revive certain ſtatutes, and enact ſome new ones; but the real motive was to procure a ſubſidy, for the dowry of his eldeſt daughter; for the cuſtom of demanding money, on ſuch occaſions, was too beneficial to the king, to ſuffer it to be aboliſhed. The queen of Scotland's portion was only 30,000 nobles; but the ſum, granted by the parliament, may reaſonably be thought to be much more conſiderable, beſides a handſome preſent made him by the clergy. Thus, inſtead of emptying his coffers, by the marriage of his daughter, he filled them the fuller; but nothing more evidently ſhews the almoſt abſolute power of the king, than the choice of Dudley, for ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, who was the moſt generally deteſted perſon, in the kingdom, except Empſon, his aſſociate; and, doubtleſs, it was ſolely the fear of diſpleaſing the king, by rejecting the perſon he recommended, which determined the commons to make that choice.

Advantageous ſtatutes for the king. Bacon.

The ſubſidy was not the only thing, that Henry artfully turned to his advantage, in this parliament; for he found means to obtain acts, which ſeemed to tend entirely to the good of the publick, but, in reality, only to procure him money. For example, all patents of leaſe or grant were diſannulled to ſuch as came not, upon lawful ſummons, to ſerve the king, againſt the rebels; but, as the delinquents, in this reſpect, were very numerous, this act was a fertile ſource of treaſure to the king, becauſe they were obliged to renew their leaſes and grants, which could only be done upon very rigorous terms.

Another ſtatute made all ſorts of clipped or impaired ſilver coins not to be current, in payments, nor did they ſuffer them even to paſs, for the value of their weight; and, as there were ſcarce any other, in the kingdom, every one was conſtrained to bring in his ready money to the mint, in order to be new coined, which proved highly advantageous to king. 1504.

The ſtatute againſt giving liveries to any, except menial ſervants, was likewiſe revived; which gave Empſon and Dudley an opportunity to attack a great number of perſons.

Thus, the king, continually amaſſing, without being obliged to any extraordinary charge, at a time when his ordinary expences were very moderate, and husbanded with the utmoſt œconomy, muſt neceſſarily be extremely rich, in ready money; but then he doubly ruined his ſubjects; firſt, by draining their purſes; and, ſecondly, by preventing the coin, of which he had vaſt quantities, in his coffers, from circulating, in trade; whilſt, on the other hand, Empſon and Dudley continued their extortions, without the leaſt reſerve; and with a rigour unknown to the Engliſh, under any of the king's predeceſſors.

The king thinks of canonizing Henry VI, but drops it. Bacon.

About this time, Henry had thoughts of canonizing Henry VI, the laſt king of the houſe of Lancaſter; but there were two powerful obſtacles againſt it; for, firſt, the miracles aſcribed to that monarch, ſince his death, were not well atteſted, and the actions of his life, tho' oſtentatiouſly diſplayed, diſcovered rather his weakneſs than ſanctity; but the ſecond difficulty, viz. the neceſſary charges of this canonization, wholly defeated the project. As this is an act of grace, the pope uſually proportions the expences, not to the perſon of the ſaint, but to the riches of him that ſollicits the canonization; and the king even perceived, that the court of Rome's calling in queſtion Henry VI's ſanctity tended only to magnify the favour, and, of courſe, inhance the price; which was ſufficient to cauſe him to deſiſt from his intention. Such an avaricious prince could hardly reſolve to empty his coffers, for a thing ſo needleſs, and which, at moſt, would have procured him only the praiſes of the Lancaſtrians; wherefore, he was contented to obtain a bull, for the removal of Henry VI's body to Weſtminſter, among his anceſtors; for he was, at firſt, obſcurely buried, in Chertſey-monaſtery near London, from whence he was removed to Windſor.

A proclamation in favour of the ſubjects. Aug. 19. Act. Pub.

The 19th of Auguſt, Henry publiſhed a proclamation, to give notice that he had appointed commiſſioners, to whom his creditors, and ſuch as had any demands upon him, might apply, for the ſpace of two years, to commence, the 19th of Auguſt, and to continue, till Michaelmaſs come two years; but it is difficult to judge, whether, in this, he acted from a principle of equity, and with an intent to ſatisfy thoſe he had injured, or only deſigned to blind people's eyes, by this ſhow of juſtice. The firſt would be moſt probable, if, henceforward, he had put a ſtop to the exactions of 1504. Empſon and Dudley; but it is ſcarce credible, that, whilſt he permitted theſe miniſters to oppreſs his ſubjects, he really intended to do juſtice to all the world.

Empſon

The death of the queen of Caſtile.

Iſabella, queen of Caſtile, dying, the 26th of November, Ferdinand, her ſpouſe, wrote, the ſame day, to Henry to notify the ſame; telling him, in his letter, that the deceaſed queen had appointed him, in her will, adminiſtrator of the kingdom of Caſtile, for Jane, their daughter, wife to the archduke of Auſtria, who, upon the deceaſe of the queen, her mother, was become queen of Caſtile.

A diſpute between Ferdinand and the archduke, his ſon-in-law.

When the archduke firſt heard of Iſabella's death, he was employed in a war upon the duke of Gueldres; which hindering him from repairing into Spain, ſo ſoon as he could have wiſhed, he was forced to leave to king Ferdinand, his father-in-law, the government of Caſtile, tho', at the ſame time, he fully reſolved to reſume it, as ſoon as poſſible. On the other hand, Ferdinand, improving Iſabella's will, pretended to keep the adminiſtration of that kingdom, during his life; probably, becauſe the deceaſed queen had not limited the continuance.

It gives Henry uneaſineſs. Bacon.

This diſpute created ſome uneaſineſs in Henry, whoſe caſe was the ſame with Ferdinand's, in the opinion of many; for he was not inſenſible, that moſt of his ſubjects were perſuaded, that Eliſabeth, his ſpouſe, had been, of right, the true queen of England; and, conſequently, the crown fell, after her death, to Henry, her ſon and lawful ſucceſſor. Tho' he affected to hold for certain, that the houſe of York never had any juſt pretenſions to the crown; yet he was very uneaſy, becauſe, in general, the Engliſh entertained different ſentiments. Indeed, beſides his deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter, he founded his right upon two other titles; namely, conqueſt, and the approbation of parliament; but he foreſaw, how weak both theſe foundations would prove, ſhould the houſe of York, by ſome revolution, gain the aſcendant. Upon this account, he was very attentive to what 1505. paſſed, in Spain, regarding the deciſion of this conteſt, as a precedent for, or againſt him; and, on the other hand, he was apprehenſive, that Philip, who had ſeemed, for ſome time, cloſely united with Lewis XII, would join in a league with that monarch and the emperor, to oblige Ferdinand to reſign him Caſtile; in which caſe he perceived, that he ſhould be conſtrained either to abandon Ferdinand to theſe three potent enemies, or enter into a war with them, to ſupport him; but both theſe equally oppoſed his intereſt. In fine, he had caſt his eyes upon the queen dowager of Naples, widow to king Ferdinand, for a wife, in order to enjoy the large dowry aſſigned her, in that kingdom; perhaps, expecting, by eſpouſing that queen, to render himſelf umpire of the differences between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, about the kingdom of Naples.

To have a full account of the diſpoſition of the Caſtilians, and the qualities of the queen of Naples, he ſent three perſons into Italy and Spain, not as ambaſſadors, but as travellers, for their pleaſure; yet, to procure them acceſs 1505. to the queen of Naples and Ferdinand, he ſo managed, that the princeſs of Wales gave them letters, both for the king, her father, and the young queen. Theſe gentlemen's ſecret inſtructions, with reſpect to the queen, were very particular; for the king wanted an exact information of her age, complexion, ſtature, health, temper, inclinations, behaviour, and eſtate. This evidently ſhews, how cautious he was, in the preſent proceeding; but the project vaniſhed, when Henry heard from his envoys, that, tho', indeed, the queen's jointure was very conſiderable, it had been changed by Ferdinand, ſince he was poſſeſſed of the kingdom of Naples, into a penſion for life.

The affairs of Ferdinand and Philip.

When the gentlemen arrived, in Spain, the diſpute between Ferdinand and Philip, his ſon-in-law, was ſtill in the ſame ſituation; wherefore, they acquainted the king, that Ferdinand ſtill governed Caſtile, as adminiſtrator, and even hoped to perſuade Philip to leave him the adminiſtration, during life, by means of ſome of his council whom he had gained, and by threatening him to marry again, and ſo give an heir to the kingdom of Arragon; that, accordingly, there was a project of marriage between Ferdinand and Germaine de Foix, which would infallibly be accompliſhed, if Philip moleſted the king, his father-in-law; moreover, that Ferdinand's ſecretary had told them, as a great ſecret, that the marriage of prince Charles of Auſtria, with Claude of France, would not ſucceed, becauſe Lewis XII. was reſolved to give his daughter to Francis, duke of Angouleſme, his preſumptive heir; and that, then, provided Philip would remain in the Low-Countries, with his queen, Ferdinand deſigned to demand Mary, the king's ſecond daughter, for the young prince of Auſtria; but, theſe informations containing nothing certain, Henry could not take any meaſures, till he ſaw the courſe of the Spaniſh affairs.

Philip and Jane aſſume the title of king and queen of Caſtile.

Whilſt Ferdinand and Philip were in treaty, concerning their difference, Philip and Jane were proclaimed king and queen of Caſtile, at Bruſſels; from whence it appears, that they did not intend to reſign, for ever, the adminiſtration of Caſtile to Ferdinand, as he had flattered himſelf; tho', in the interim, by reaſon of the war of Gueldres, and queen Jane's being near her time, they could not execute their reſolution of going to Caſtile. However, they knew, that the Caſtilians were diſpleaſed with Ferdinand, and that, as ſoon as they appeared, all would declare for them; and, therefore, Ferdinand uſed all ſorts of artifices, to diſſuade them from this voyage.

The death of the duke of Savoy.

In the mean while, Margaret of Auſtria, Philip's ſiſter, loſt her husband, the duke of Savoy, who died, the 10th of September; and, ſome days after, the new queen of Caſtile was delivered of a princeſs, named Mary, who afterwards became queen of Hungary.

Henry's alliance with the duke of Saxony. Act. Pub.

This year was very barren of remarkable events, with reſpect to England; for, beſides what has been related, we only find a treaty of alliance between Henry and George, duke of Saxony, hereditary governor of Friſe, to whom 1505. whom he had ſent ambaſſadors, ever ſince February; which treaty was concluded, the 30th of December.

1506. Philip and Jane ſet out for Spain. Hall.

The war of Gueldres being over, and queen Jane in a condition to travel, Philip reſolved to carry her into Caſtile, as it was the only way to ſecure the government of that kingdom; and, tho' they deſigned to go, by ſea, they choſe the winter; probably, to ſurpriſe Ferdinand, who would not expect them, at that ſeaſon. They departed, the 10th of January, under a ſtrong convoy, prepared for that occaſion; but, before they got out of the channel, a terrible tempeſt diſperſed their fleet, and the ſhip, in which they were, ran into Weymouth, in England, having very narrowly eſcaped the danger; and the king and queen were ſo fatigued and ſick, that, contrary to the opinion of their council, they would land, to refreſh their ſpirits.

A ſtorm drives them into England.

In the interim, the inhabitants of the country, extremely alarmed at the ſight of a numerous fleet, immediately took up arms; and Sir Thomas Trenchard, at the head of ſome troops, marched to Weymouth, to concert meaſures, in caſe of an invaſion; but, when he found, that the king and queen of Caſtile were landed, he waited upon them, humbly inviting them to his houſe, till the king was informed of their arrival. Philip would have gladly re-embarqued; but he perceived he ſhould not be ſuffered, till the king's orders were received, to whom an expreſs was diſpatched; ſo that, without much ſollicitation, he conſented to ſtay, till that time.

Henry no ſooner had intelligence of the king and queen of Caſtile's arrival, than he ſent the earl of Arundel, with his compliments, and to inform them, that he would come and embrace them, with all poſſible expedition; and the earl alſo aſſured them, from the king, that they were as much at liberty, in his kingdom, as himſelf. Philip, finding that he could not avoid the king's viſit, to prevent the loſs of time, poſted to Windſor, whilſt his queen followed, by eaſy journies; and Henry received them, with all imaginable marks of friendſhip; yet he ruminated, all the while, how to reap ſome advantage from the accident, that had thrown them into his dominions*.

They go to the king at Windſor.

Some days after, he inſinuated to Philip, that, ſince his condition was altered, it would be requiſite to renew their treaty of commerce, to which Philip conſented, tho' the reaſon, alledged by Henry, was invalid; for Philip, by being king of Caſtile, was ſtill ſovereign of the Low-Countries, as much as before. However, Henry gained his point; and Philip evidently perceived, that, being in his hands, he ought carefully to avoid all occaſions of offending him, leſt he ſhould find ſome pretence to detain him, in England. He was no ſtranger to the ſtrict union between Henry and Ferdinand, and was afraid, that Henry would obſtruct his voyage, to oblige his father-in-law; nevertheleſs, the treaty was renewed, but with ſome alterations to the advantage of the Engliſh. Among other things, an article of the former treaty was ſuppreſſed, which allowed Philip's ſubjects to fiſh, on the coaſts of England; which led the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, to call it Intercurſus malus, or the bad Treaty. 1506.

This affair being over, Henry told Philip, that it was his intent to marry Margaret, his ſiſter, widow to the duke of Savoy; and Philip ſeemed extremely well pleaſed with the propoſal. Indeed, nothing could be more advantageous to him, than to make Henry his friend, by this alliance, leſt he ſhould openly eſpouſe the king of Arragon's quarrel; ſo that the marriage was concluded, at Windſor, the 20th of March; and, in the articles ſigned by both, Philip engaged to give the ducheſs, his ſiſter, 300,000 crowns of French gold, with an annual penſion of 3850. In the interim, Henry fearing that Philip would recede from his word, when he was out of his power, cauſed to be inſerted, in the treaty, that the principal lords of the Low-Countries ſhould ſwear, that they would do all that was poſſible to procure the accompliſhment of this marriage; and the oaths of ſeveral lords, purſuant to this article, are to be ſeen, in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

Henry's marriage with the ducheſs of Savoy is agreed upon.

Henry had one thing more to obtain of Philip, without which he could not think of diſmiſſing him, tho', in appearance, he continued to careſs him; namely, to deliver up to him the earl of Suffolk, who was then in Flanders; but, at the firſt overture, Philip expreſly told him, that he could not grant his requeſt, being bound, in honour, not to ſacrifice a lord, whom he had taken under his protection; that, beſides, it would be diſhonourable to himſelf, ſince the world would infallibly ſay, that he was treated, as a priſoner. Henry, regardleſs of the reproaches of the world, provided he accompliſhed his ends, anſwered, that he would take all the diſhonour upon himſelf; which threw Philip into great perplexity. He was unwilling to betray the earl of Suffolk, after his promiſe to protect him; but, on the other hand, he ſaw, that Henry reſolved to have that lord, at any rate, and had in his hands an infallible means, to obtain his deſire. Moreover, not being yet certain, whether he ſhould not be forced to go to war with his father-in-law, it was natural to foreſee, that he might ſtand in need of the king of England, and, conſequently, it would be very imprudent to diſoblige him; and, therefore, ſuddenly coming to a reſolution, with an air of confidence, he ſpoke, as follows: "Sir, ſince you are "pleaſed to give law to me, permit me to do "the ſame by you. I will deliver the earl; "but you ſhall give me your honour, not to "touch his life. Henry conſenting to this condition, Philip requeſted, that the thing might be done, in a manner honourable to both, and he added, "I will ſo order it, that "the earl ſhall come to England, of his own

Henry approving the expedient, the earl of Suffolk readily accepted the offer; yet, in the interim, Henry, deſirous of having the earl in his power, before Philip's departure, continued his entertainments and diverſions, under colour of doing honour to the king and queen of Caſtile, but, in reality, to gain time, till the earl's arrival. He admitted Philip to the order of the Garter; and Philip made the prince of Wales a knight of the Golden-Fleece. Henry, afterwards, carried his gueſts to London, where they were magnificently entertained; and, ſhortly after, the earl of Suffolk returned from Flanders, and was conveighed to the tower. Thus, Henry, under the pretence of doing Philip honour, kept him, in England, above three months, till he had obtained his deſires; and, in all probability, Philip clearly ſaw, through all the careſſes he received, that he could not depart, when he pleaſed; otherwiſe, it is unlikely, as he deſigned to ſail into Spain, in January, that he would have willingly remained, in England, till the end of April, or the beginning of May.

Ferdinand retires to Arragon. Pet. de Angl.

When Philip and Jane were in Caſtile, the people diſcovered ſo great affection for them, that Ferdinand evidently perceived, that his endeavours, to keep the government of the realm, would prove abortive; wherefore, without inſiſting any longer upon his adminiſtratorſhip, which could take place only, in the queen his daughter's abſence, he retired to his own kingdom of Arragon. After this, he went to Naples, where Gonzolvo, his general, made him uneaſy, by which means, Philip and Jane continued, tho' not long, in poſſeſſion of Caſtile; but, within a few months, Philip was ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he died, the 25th of September; leaving the guardianſhip of his ſon, Charles, to Lewis XII, who appointed the lord de Chievres, for his governor. This choice, which met with general approbation, and was a convincing proof of Lewis's diſintereſtedneſs and ſincerity, became fatal to France; becauſe the governor made his pupil more able than was neceſſary, for the good of the kingdom.

Philip's death. Bacon.

Jane loſes her ſenſes, and Ferdinand returns to Caſtile. Bacon.

The death of Philip ſo affected his queen, that, depriving her of her reaſon, it rendered her entirely incapable of governing the ſtate; upon which, Ferdinand, her father, reſumed the adminiſtration of affairs, which he had been forced to reſign, but five months before; and it is ſaid, that he took little care of the queen's cure, leſt, recovering her ſenſes, ſhe ſhould ſend him back again to Arragon.

The diſintereſtedneſs, Lewis XII. ſhewed, with reſpect to the young archduke, prince of Spain, was of a ſhort continuance; for, tho' he had promiſed to give him Claude, his eldeſt daughter, in marriage, he judged it more adviſable to marry her to Francis, duke of Angouleſme, his preſumptive ſucceſſor; and, beſides, being apprehenſive of a league againſt him, between the emperor, the archduke, and Ferdinand, and that the king of England might alſo join in it, he laboured to embroil young Charles's affairs, by exciting the duke of Gueldres to renew the war. 1506.

1507. Margaret, ducheſs of Savoy, governs the Low-Countries.

The archduke being too young to hold the reins of government, the Flemings intreated the emperor, his grandfather, to govern, in his grandſon's name; and Maximilian complied with their requeſt; but, till he could come himſelf, he ſent them Margaret, his daughter, widow to the duke of Savoy.

This princeſs, upon her arrival at Bruſſels, concluded with Henry a proviſional treaty of commerce, till ſome differences, occaſioned by the late treaty, between the merchants of both nations, could be adjuſted; which treaty was ſigned, at Bruges, the 5th of June.

A marriage agreed upon, between Mary, the king's daughter, and Charles of Auſtria. Bacon.

The ſame ambaſſadors, that were aſſembled, at Calais, ſpent there the remainder of the year, in negotiating the marriage of Charles, archduke of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Low-Countries, and prince of Caſtile, with Mary, Henry's ſecond daughter; but, at length, on the 21ſt of December, they ſigned a treaty, that Charles ſhould eſpouſe the princeſs Mary, as ſoon as he was 14 years of age; and that her portion ſhould be 250,000 crowns of gold. The young prince run the riſque of loſing the kingdom of Arragon, Valencia, Granada, and the principality of Catalonia, his grandfather, Ferdinand, having married Germaine de Foix; but, fortunately for him, they had no iſſue.

Tho' Henry had filled his coffers, his avarice was ſtill as inſatiable, as ever; for, tho', as was obſerved, in 1504, the parliament granted a ſubſidy, for the marriage of the queen of Scotland, his daughter, before the expiration of that year, he iſſued out a proclamation to levy a benevolence, by his own authority, and, in all appearance, without the leaſt occaſion for it; but he was grown ſo abſolute, in his kingdom, that no man durſt oppoſe his will, or even murmur at his proceedings. In the interim, Empſon and Dudley continued their extortions and oppreſſions, with all imaginable rigour; and, this very year 1507, they ſharply proſecuted the mayor of London, for neglecting to bring to juſtice a coiner of falſe money, and, becauſe he was unwilling, or unable, to pay an exorbitant fine, ſent him to the tower. The ſheriffs, aldermen, and all, that had borne any office, in the city, were proſecuted with no leſs rigour, and compelled to pay to the king fines, not proportioned to their abilities, but to the rapaciouſneſs of the king and his miniſters *.

Empſon and Dudley continue their exactions.

However, he permitted his two miniſters to continue their exactions, without any reſpect of perſons; for he was ſo charmed to ſee his coffers full of gold and ſilver, that he could not reſolve to put a ſtop to theſe ſcandalous practices, which daily brought him in freſh ſums. It is ſaid, that he had amaſſed 1,800,000 l. ſterling; which ſum will appear prodigious, if it is conſidered, that money was, then, much ſcarcer, in Europe, than at preſent; and he laid up his treaſures under his own key and cuſtody, in ſecret places at Richmond.

1508. The marriage of Charles and Mary is ſolemniſed, by proxy.

As the marriage of the princeſs Mary with the archduke was, now, the only important affair Henry was employed in, he ſpent the whole year 1508, in projecting means, to ſecure its accompliſhment; and the acts of this year, in the Collection, ſcarce regard any other. At length, on the 17th of December, the marriage was performed, per verba de Præſenti, the lord de Berghes being the young prince's proxy; and, as ſuch, he eſpouſed the princeſs, gave her a ring, and ſaluted her publickly, in the name of the prince, her huſband.

About this time, the archduke pawned to the king a jewel, termed the rich Flower-deluce, for the ſum of 50,000 crowns; and the emperor, as Charles's grandfather and guardian, approved of the marriage and loan. In all probability, the money was borrowed for him; having occaſion for it, to make a figure in the league of Cambray, which he had concluded, this year, with his holineſs and the king of France, againſt the Venetians, which were become formidable to all Italy.

Henry thinks no more of his own marriage.

As to Henry's marriage with Margaret of Auſtria, tho' it was concluded, in 1506, it was entirely overlooked, when that monarch, fallen into a ptiſick, found it more proper for him to think of death, than a wife.

1509. The king, perceiving that his diſtemper daily increaſed, was pleaſed to prepare for death, by granting a general pardon; and he alſo diſcharged, with his own money, all priſoners about London that lay for fees, or debts, under 40 ſhillings. Then he made his will, ordering that his heir ſhould make reſtitution of whatever his officers and miniſters had unjuſtly taken from his ſubjects; but this remorſe came too late; for, ſince he could not reſolve to make this reſtitution, in his lifetime, the prince, his ſon, judged it improper to part with the money amaſſed by the king, his father. He died, at Richmond, the 22d of April, 1509, having lived 52 years, and reigned 23 and eight months. His death is obſerved to have happened, at a very ſeaſonable juncture; for, had he lived much longer, the prince, his ſon, now in his 17th year, might have been too impatient to wait, till his father's deceaſe put him in poſſeſſion of the crown; in which caſe, he might have ſupported himſelf with the queen his mother's title, heireſs of the houſe of York, and pretended, that the king, his father, reigned, only in right of his queen. This pretenſion, probably, would have revived the old quarrel, and rekindled a civil war, in the kingdom; but the king's death diſpelled the fears of the Engliſh. 1509.

Henry VII. had three ſons and four daughters; and Arthur, his eldeſt, as was ſaid, died, in his 17th year. Henry, his ſecond, was his ſucceſſor; and Edmund, his third, died, at the age of five years. Of his four daughters, two died, in their childhood; and the other two, Margaret and Mary, have already been ſufficiently deſcribed. His iſſue. Sandford.

If the Hiſtory of this reign be never ſo ſlightly peruſed, it will eaſily be ſeen, that Henry's views were only two; the firſt of which was to ſecure the crown, acquired by extraordinary good fortune, and, perhaps, not thought of, before he was invited into England by the duke of Buckingham; and the other, to accumulate riches. Henry's whole application centered upon a ſingle object, viz. upon thoroughly examining every thing that could, any way, promote the two ends he propoſed; for ambition, honour, glory, love, pleaſures, and all the other paſſions which generally diſquiet the hearts of princes, made very little impreſſion upon him, who, content with enjoying his throne, neither aſpired after new acquiſitions, nor the rendering his name illuſtrious by glorious actions. All his projects were confined to prevent, or defeat the deſigns of his domeſtick enemies, or to well fill his coffers; and he had a ſurpriſing ſagacity, to diſcover, in all occurrences, the ſide, from whence he might draw any advantage; which he manifeſtly ſhewed, in the affair of Bretagne, in his pretended wars with France and Scotland, and even in his domeſtick troubles, which, by his addreſs, he improved to his own intereſt. His character. Bacon.

Tho' he was ſometimes forced to take up arms, no prince ever was a greater lover of peace*; and, not having the leaſt ſparks of ambition, he perceived no advantage for him, in war. On the contrary, he conſidered, that all the events of a war, whether foreign, or domeſtick, were againſt him; for the former could, at moſt, only procure him ſome glory and acquiſitions abroad, of which he was not very deſirous, and he might be a great loſer by the latter. Moreover, a time of commotions afforded no opportunities to accumulate riches; wherefore, laying down this, as the fixed principle of his policy, not to engage in any war, without an abſolute neceſſity, he never deviated from it; and it is this that made him, unconcernedly, behold the loſs of Bretagne, and, without reſentment, ſuffer the inſults of the king of Scotland, becauſe it was not from the war that he deſigned to reap any advantage,

* The uſual preface to his treaties was, That, when Chriſt came into the world, peace was ſung; and, when he went out of the world, peace was bequeathed.

1509. but only from the preparations made to ſupport it. However, this policy would have been of dangerous conſequence, when he was attacked by domeſtick enemies, who intended to dethrone him; and, as his all was, then, at ſtake, he chearfully faced the danger, tho' with all imaginable precautions. He gained two victories over the rebels; one, at Stoke, and the other at Black-Heath; but, in both, he was very ſuperior, in number of troops, and fought againſt perſons ill armed and undiſciplined, in the art of war. It cannot, therefore, be affirmed what he would have done, had he been oppoſed with equal forces; and it is equally difficult to know, whether it was owing to his courage, that he headed his armies, in perſon, or to his diffience of thoſe in his ſervice. However this be, he was ever fortunate, in his domeſtick wars, by which he acquired ſo great a reputation, that all the princes of Europe ſtrenuouſly courted his alliance; and, on the other hand, the eſteem foreigners expreſſed for him greatly contributed to render him formidable, at home; I ſay formidable, for it is certain, that he never had the hearts of his ſubjects. In a word, his method of governing, which approached to arbitrary power, eſpecially towards the end of his reign; his inſatiable avarice, haughtineſs, pride, and ſhy and reſerved temper, were improper qualities to procure the affection of his people.

He never opened his mind to any man, unleſs, perhaps, to one or two of his miniſters; but, as to the reſt, tho' he employed them, they were ignorant of the motives of their own proceedings; and the world was ſo perſuaded, that he had always ſome ſecret deſign, even in his moſt indifferent actions, that the pure effects of chance were often aſcribed to his policy.

His ſpies, in foreign courts, gave him an extenſive knowledge of all that paſſed there; moreover, his ambaſſadors were always charged to inform themſelves, by all ſorts of ways, of the ſecrets of the princes to whom they were ſent; and very frequently this was the principal article of their inſtructions. By theſe means, he was enabled to convince the foreign miniſters, reſiding at his court, of his great inſight into their maſters affairs; from whence he reaped many conſiderable advantages, principally in that the princes of Europe, dreading his abilities, were very forward to live in amity with him. His ſtrict friendſhip with Ferdinand, king of Arragon, a prince of much the ſame character, was extremely advantageous to him; and, probably, it prevented the court of France from interpoſing more, in the affairs of England, and was one of the chief cauſes of his conſtant peace with his neighbours.

Inſtead of increaſing the credit of the nobility, he took all poſſible care to leſſen it; for his council almoſt entirely conſiſted of eccleſiaſticks and lawyers, who, being devoted to him, and ſolely conſulting his pleaſure, never oppoſed his will; which unlimited compliance of his council was the cauſe of his wholly addicting himſelf to his natural paſſion of accumulating money, ſince there was no perſon about him, that had either boldneſs, or conſcience, to give him wholſome advice, on that head. This conduct drew upon him the hatred of the Engliſh, which, at firſt, made him ſomewhat uneaſy; but, when he had ſurmounted all his troubles, regardleſs of it, he affected to rule, with an abſolute ſway; making of his council a court of juſtice in which all the pleas of the crown were decided, which had never been ſeen, before. 1509.

He has been extremely extolled, for the good laws made, in his reign, as if he, without the parliament, had been the ſole legiſlator; on which account, perhaps, he was ſtiled the Solomon of England, tho' he much more reſembled that glorious prince, in the heavy yoke he laid on his people; but, if theſe laws are ſtrictly examined, it will, doubtleſs, appear, that the king's intereſt was the real motive, tho' they ſeemed to be made, for the good of the people. Thus, William the Conqueror formerly acted; who was like Henry, in ſo many reſpects, that they may be very juſtly compared; and, in a word, Henry's moſt diſtinguiſhing character was, that he lived entirely for himſelf, regarding nothing, any farther than it tended to his own intereſt. Indeed, ſuch a diſpoſition is not uncommon among princes; but he had this peculiar to himſelf, that, whereas the intereſt of other princes is uſually divided into ſeveral parts, Henry's was, in a manner, contained in a ſingle branch; namely, to fill his coffers.

He was, to the laſt degree, ſuſpicious, as thoſe generally are who act, by ſecret methods, becauſe they believe all the world do the ſame; and the houſe of York's title, with the people's opinion concerning it, continually racked his mind with fears and ſuſpicions. It is true, he ſtudiouſly concealed his uneaſineſs; but his cautious conduct evidently demonſtrated, that his mind was diſturbed. This perpetual diffidence inceſſantly led him to ſeek means, to avoid the dangers, in which he was not always ſucceſsful; for inſtance, the report, he cauſed to be ſpread, that the duke of York was alive, had a quite contrary effect to what he expected. His genius was but mean; and he ſaw better near, than at a diſtance, his wiſdom diſcovering itſelf more, in extricating himſelf out of difficulties, than in finding means to prevent them. The principal troubles of his reign may be ſaid to happen, by his imprudence; yet he acquired qualities, which nature had denied him, by a long experience.

It is no wonder, that a prince, continually guarded againſt the rebellion of his ſubjects, and ever employed in accumulating money, ſhould have performed nothing glorious for himſelf, or the kingdom. Conquerors do not always make the greateſt monarchs; but, on the contrary, peace would have been very beneficial to the Engliſh, had it been attended with happineſs; but it was ſtill more fatal to them than war itſelf, ſince the king's inſatiable avarice, 1509. avarice, on all occaſions, prompted him to deviſe means to fill his coffers, which could only be done, at their expence. Some princes accumulate money, ſolely to diſperſe it; but Henry carefully hoarded it up, without any communication; for liberality was a virtue he did not pretend to, and, if he made any preſents, it was only to ſpies, or informers.

As for his religion and morals, nothing certain can be affirmed, on account of the contrarieties that met in the ſame perſon; for, if he was chaſte, temperate, an enemy to open and ſcandalous vices, conſtant in the exerciſes of devotion, and obſervant of ſtrict juſtice, where his intereſt was not concerned, on the other hand, his extreme avarice put him upon many unjuſt proceedings; and the fear of loſing his crown led him to conſider, as lawful, all means that could free him from that danger, how unlawful ſoever they might be, in other particulars. The earl of Warwick's death fixes an indelible ſtain on his memory; and his making a jeſt of religion, in ordering a ſolemn proceſſion to be made, on purpoſe to ſhew that prince to the people, and the excommunications he cauſed to be pronounced againſt his own ſpies, manifeſtly prove, that his religion was not proof againſt his intereſt.

In general, it muſt be confeſſed, that this prince had great abilities; but, as they ſolely centered in himſelf, they would have been more valuable, in a private perſon, than a ſovereign prince; and, tho' all his projects were crowned with ſucceſs, his reign cannot be termed happy, either for himſelf, or England. He lived under continual fears and ſuſpicions, and his ſubjects were always expoſed either to domeſtick troubles, or oppreſſion; but his reign was, in this reſpect, very remarkable, that, by Henry's abilities, the civil wars, which had ſo long afflicted England, were, at laſt, happily ended; I ſay, happily, ſince it was altogether indifferent, as to the welfare of the Engliſh, whether the nation was governed by a prince of the houſe of Lancaſter, or of that of York. 1509.

Henry VII. was of a ſerious and thoughtful temper, ever intent upon his affairs, without being diverted by his pleaſures, to which he was very little addicted; and he had a book, in which he marked down, with his own hand, the qualities and characters of the perſons he knew, in order to employ them, upon occaſion; but a monkey, that he kept in his chamber, having, one day, torn this note-book to pieces, he ſeemed to be grieved, as at a very conſiderable loſs.

He was of ſtature taller than the generality of men; and his face was long, thin, and lean, like the reſt of his body, but, at the ſame time, very grave, which made people ſpeak to him, with fear; yet he could be affable, on proper occaſions. He was rather ſtudious than learned; and what he read, at his leiſure hours, was generally in French, tho' he was acquainted with Latin too.

He founded a chapel, at Windſor, for which he obtained privileges and indulgences from the pope; and he converted into an hoſpital the palace of the Savoy, built by Peter, earl of Savoy, in the reign of Henry III. He alſo founded ſeveral convents of Dominicans and Franciſcans; but, of all the ſtructures, that which did, and ſtill does him the greateſt honour, is his chapel, in Weſtminſter-abbey, which equals, in any reſpect, the moſt ſtately chapels, in Chriſtendom. There he was buried; and there alſo are interred the bodies of his ſucceſſors *.

The STATE of the CHURCH of the XVth Century.

THE Chriſtian church had never been in ſo deplorable a condition, as in the XVth Century; for God's juſtice and mercy, and Chriſt's meritorious death, were ſcarce any longer the object of a Chriſtian's faith, the religion of the generality conſiſting in pilgrimages, and the worſhip of the bleſſed Virgin, ſaints, and reliques; and as for the clergy, their ſole care was to ſupport that exceſſive grandeur and power they had enjoyed, for ſeveral centuries, and to ſee that none preſumed to diſpute their immunities. Diſcipline was never more remiſs, than at preſent; for the eccleſiaſticks conſidered their ſpiritual power and juriſdiction, only as a means to prevent the violation of their temporal privileges; for, provided their rights were untouched, every man might do what ſeemed good, in his own eyes; and the authority of the church was become the capital article of religion.

The papal authority had ſurpriſingly increaſed, every century; for each pope made

* In the 5th year of the reign of Henry VII, it was ordained, that the mayors of London ſhall have conſervation of the river Thames, from Staines Bridge to the waters of Yeuſdale and Medway; and, in his 18th year, being himſelf a brother of the Taylors company, as were alſo his predeceſſors, Richard III, Edward IV, Henry VI, V, IV, and Richard II, beſides 11 dukes, 28 earls, and 48 lords, he gave them the name of Merchant-Taylors. Hollingſhead. In his 13th year, was the paſſage to the Eaſt-Indies, round the Cape of Good-Hope, diſcovered, by Vaſco de Gama, a Portugueſe; and, in his 10th year, the body of Alice Hackney is ſaid to be found, in the church of St. Mary-Hill, London, the skin being whole, and the joints of the arms pliable, after having been buried, 175 years. In this reign, John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, founded Paul's ſchool, in the church-yard; and the colleges, founded in the two Univerſities, in the ſame reign, were Chriſt's College and St. John's, in Cambridge, by Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, the king's mother; Jeſus College, in the ſaid Univerſity, by John Alcock, biſhop of Ely; Corpus Chriſti, in Oxford, by Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Brazen-Noſe College, by William Smith, biſhop of Lincoln. it it his buſineſs to enlarge it, as much as poſſible. They, at length, procured the diſpoſal of all the church-preferments, in Chriſtendom, and were the ſupreme judges, in all eccleſiaſtical cauſes; and national ſynods were entirely diſuſed; for, indeed, what occaſion was there for them, ſince the court of Rome claimed the cognizance of church affairs? In a word, the pope was, now, the center of religion; and the privileges of churches, as well as the prerogatives of ſovereigns, were all annulled by the Non-obſtante clauſe, commonly inſerted in every bull. But it was not only over ſpirituals that the popes had extended their authority; for they likewiſe pretended to ſtretch it over temporals, under the pretence that religion was concerned, in all matters; and monarchs themſelves were not out of their reach. The papal diſpenſation was neceſſary, in all the marriages of princes; and no peace, or truce, of any importance was concluded, without the pope's mediation or guaranty; nay, ſome popes carried their pretenſions ſo far, as to make peaces, or truces, without the conſent of the parties. In ſhort, it is extremely probable, that they would have altogether engroſſed the temporal power, as well as the ſpiritual, if, by the ſchiſms of the XVth century, they had not loſt ground; and ſtill more, by the revolutions of the following century. However this be, the popes were, in reality, ſovereigns, not only with regard to the power they had aſſumed, but alſo with reſpect to the immenſe riches, which, through numberleſs channels, flowed into the vaſt ocean of the apoſtolick chamber; for tenths, firſt-fruits, taxes for the ſervice of the chamber, diſpenſations for all caſes, as well contrary to the law of God, as to the canons of the church, ſubſidies exacted, from time to time, from the clergy, for the occaſions of the holy ſee; cruſades, benefices, which are rarely beſtowed, without a previous bargain with the apoſtolick chamber; and, in a word, ſimony publickly practiſed by many popes, ſome of whom were accuſed and convicted, were inexhauſtible fountains, which ſupported the affluence and luxury of the court of Rome. It was next to impoſſible, that purity of life and true religious principles ſhould be preſerved undefiled, amidſt ſo much wealth and grandeur; but, on the contrary, the popes were the more liable to abuſe their power, as moſt of them were not born for ſuch an exalted ſtation; and, accordingly, it appears from hiſtory, that Rome and Avignon were the center of pride, avarice, luxury, ſenſuality, and all the moſt ſcandalous vices. The popes were not either learned, or religious; for there was ſcarce one to be found that might paſs for an honeſt man, even according to the maxims of the world; and yet all the preambles of their bulls entirely conſiſted of expreſſions of their zeal, charity, humility, and juſtice; whilſt, for the moſt part, what they enjoined was an authentick proof of their pride and tyranny. This is no aggravation, for a great deal more has been ſaid, by the authors who wrote, before the reformation; nay, it has even been openly preached, before the councils.

It may be naturally preſumed, that ſuch popes took little care to fill, what they called, the ſacred college, with perſons of ſincere piety and devotion. Indeed, there were, in this century, cardinals of great repute, and eminent for their wit, eloquence, political virtues, and their capacity for temporal affairs; but yet theſe very men, for the moſt part, were governed by the maxims of the world, who conſidered religion, only as a means to eſtabliſh their fortune. The legates, ſent to the ſeveral ſtates of Chriſtendom, were ſo many incendiaries, who made it their ſole ſtudy to ſow diſcord and diviſion among princes, or excite them to ſhed the blood of their ſubjects; and, in a word, conſulting only the intereſt of their maſter and the Roman ſee, they did not ſcruple to violate all the rules of religion and equity, to accompliſh their deſigns.

The reſt of the clergy, in general, were no better; for moſt of the biſhops were promoted, purely for their zealous attachment to the court of Rome, or for their ſervices to princes, in their temporal concerns. They were perſons educated at court, and inſtructed in the maxims of the world; cruelty, injuſtice, and diſhoneſty were but too common among them; nay, they were looked upon, as ſo many virtues, when employed in the perſecution of ſuch as were termed Hereticks, eſpecially of thoſe that preſumed to conteſt any of the pope's or the clergy's pretended rights.

As to real learning, it was hardly ſo much as heard of, in this century; for ſchool-divinity, and the knowledge of the canon-law, conſtituted the whole merit of the eccleſiaſticks, ſince it was the only way to arrive at eccleſiaſtical dignities; and, on the other hand, the monks, having crept into moſt of the profeſſorſhips in the univerſities, overwhelmed divinity and philoſophy, with ſuch a heap of jargon, as only ſerved to give their diſciples falſe ideas of learning, and teach them to wrangle.

Such was, in general, the State of the Church, in this century; but, as for the civil affairs of Europe, they continued, in it and the following centuries, as in the preceding. The ſovereigns, divided among themſelves by their reſpective intereſts, ſtudied only to ſupplant one another, and make their neighbour's loſs turn to their own advantage; which occaſioned bloody wars, that rendered their people miſerable, and ſuffered neither princes, nor ſubjects, to attend to the breaches in the church, or think of means to repair them. Corruption was ſo great, in the world, and in the church, that God, in all appearance, had abandoned men to a reprobate ſenſe, ſuch was their blindneſs and inſenſibility; and we may add, for a farther repreſentation of the deplorable ſtate of the church, the great progreſs of the Turks, in Europe, during this unfortunate century. The entire deſtruction of the Greek empire, and the over-running of ſeveral other Chriſtian ſtates by the Infidels, were evident proofs of the divine wrath againſt Chriſtians, to move them to inquire after the cauſe; but, inſtead of "ſeeking the "Lord," they perſecuted, with fire and ſword, thoſe that ſought God alone, and refuſed to pay divine worſhip to creatures.

To effect a reformation in the church, ſo extremely wanted, all, or, at leaſt, the chief princes of Europe ſhould have united their endeavours, to promote ſuch a work; but how was it poſſible, that ſo many ſovereigns, who had religion ſo little at heart, ſhould ſacrifice their paſſions to ſo great a good; or was it practicable to reconcile ſo many jarring intereſts? All Europe paſſionately wiſhed, that the church might be reformed; and ſeveral biſhops ſeemed to deſire the ſame. Nothing was talked of, in the councils, but the neceſſity of executing this noble deſign; nay, it appeared, that the councils of Conſtance and Baſil intended to ſet about it effectually; but the well affected had neither prudence, nor courage, ſufficient to oppoſe the artifices and violence of the contrary party. The ſequel will ſhew, that the popes, cardinals, and principal clergy exerted themſelves, to prevent the projected reformation, being ſenſible that it would prove prejudicial to their temporal intereſts; and, on the other hand, if it is conſidered, with what eagerneſs and animoſity they laboured to extirpate the pretended hereſies, which combated the temporal grandeur of the clergy, no other inference can be drawn, than that they themſelves ſaw the neceſſity of a reformation, tho' they would not admit it, and that the fountain of corruption was in the principal members of the clergy, from whence it had but too great an influence over the reſt.

To repreſent, in a true light, the State of the Church of the XVth century, it would be neceſſary to give a particular account of what paſſed, at the councils of Conſtance and Baſil; but this detail would carry me too far; and, beſides, the Hiſtory of the firſt of theſe councils is lately publiſhed, and written, with ſo much plainneſs, circumſpection, and impartiality, that there is no room to ſuſpect, that the author * was byaſſed, by paſſion, or prejudice. The Hiſtory of the council of Baſil, by the ſame hand, will alſo ſoon appear; wherefore, referring the reader to theſe two Hiſtories, I ſhall only briefly relate the moſt remarkable paſſages of theſe councils; which will be of uſe to underſtand the then ſtate of the church of England.

* Mr. L' Enfant, late miniſter at Berlin.

A brief account of the council of Conſtance. L' Enfant.

The ſchiſm, begun, in 1378, by Urban VI. and Clement VII, was continued, to the beginning of the XVth century, by Boniface IX. and Benedict XIII, their ſucceſſors; Boniface, ſucceeding Urban VI, reſided, at Rome; but Benedict, who ſucceeded Clement VII, remained, at Avignon, where he was kept by the king of France, leſt he ſhould eſcape, before the ſchiſm was ended.

The univerſity of Paris had propoſed an expedient to end the ſchiſm, viz. that the two popes ſhould reſign the pontificate, which was termed the method of ceſſion. Boniface IX. and Benedict XIII. pretended both to be willing to comply with this method, for reſtoring peace to the church; but, at the ſame time, they uſed ſo many evaſions, that it was manifeſt, that they were not ſincere; and, therefore, the king of France had thought fit to ſecure the perſon of Benedict. This monarch's indiſpoſition afterwards placing the duke of Orleans, his brother, at the head of affairs, the young prince was a great favourer of Benedict XIII, and, in 1404, permitted him to make his eſcape; and, Boniface IX. dying, this very year, the cardinals of his party elected Innocent VII, who behaved, like his predeceſſor, with reſpect to the ceſſion. To Innocent, who ſat in the pontifical chair, only two years, ſucceeded Angelo Corario, who aſſumed the name of Gregory, XII; and, thus, the ſchiſm ſtill ſubſiſted, between Gregory and Benedict. Theſe two popes, feigning an inclination to end it, by the method of ceſſion, long amuſed the world, with their artifices and diſſimulation; and, in a word, the ſchiſm having now laſted, 30 years, without any appearance that the two popes would perform their promiſe, Gregory XII. found himſelf deſerted, on a ſudden, by his cardinals, who retired to Piſa; for only four remained with him. On the other hand, France, the main ſupport of Benedict XIII, being tired with his evaſions, withdrew from his obedience; and the pope, upon the loſs of that protection, went and reſided in Spain; but his cardinals, refuſing to follow him, choſe to join thoſe of Gregory; and, preſently after, the cardinals of both parties unanimouſly called a general council, at Piſa, to which moſt of the princes of Europe ſent their ambaſſadors and prelates.

This council, held in 1409, depoſed both the popes, and impowered the cardinals to chooſe another, who aſſumed the name of Alexander V; but, Gregory and Benedict not thinking themſelves lawfully depoſed, it fell out, that, inſtead of the two popes before the council, there were now no leſs than three.

Alexander V. died, in 1410; and John XXIII. was choſen, in his room, who ſummoned a general council to meet, at Conſtance, in November, 1414; which found no better way to end the ſchiſm, than by removing the three popes. John XXIII. and Benedict XIII. were depoſed; and Gregory XII. voluntarily reſigned the pontificate. Then the council elected cardinal Odo Colonna, who aſſumed the name of Martin V; and John XXIII, who was committed to the cuſtody of the emperor Sigiſmund, having eſcaped, ſubmitted to Martin V, who made him a cardinal. As to Benedict XIII, he ſtill retained the title of pope; and, retiring to the caſtle of Reniſcola, belonging to the kingdom of Valencia, he was ſuffered by the king of Arragon to live there, without interruption. After his deceaſe, which did not hapen, till 1424, his cardinals elected a canon of Barcelona, who aſſumed the name of Clement VIII; but, in 1429, he quitted his dignity, in favour of Martin V; and,

This abſtract, tho' ſhort, will enable us to judge of the character of the popes, who governed the church, during theſe 50 years; who were men that ſacrificed the peace of the church to their own private intereſts, damned, without mercy, as far as lay in their power, all that were of a different party; and they would not have ſcrupeled to engage all Chriſtendom in a bloody war, for their intereſts, were it not for the wiſer conduct of the ſovereign princes. Doubtleſs, one cannot help forming a very melancholy idea of the State of the Church, in thoſe days, when it is conſidered, that the Chriſtians, of both ſides, owned, for Chriſt's vicars, popes whom they deteſted, and who, indeed, were ſo unworthy of their exalted ſtation, that ſeveral were depoſed, for hereſy, ſimony, and perjury.

But I have ſtill one important remark to make upon the conduct of the council of Conſtance, the motive of which is, at firſt, difficult to be conceived. If the council of Piſa was general and lawful, as was even acknowledged by that of Conſtance, why were her deciſions diſregarded? Why was Gregory XII's reſignation accepted, which ſuppoſed him ſtill to be pope, notwithſtanding his being depoſed? Why were terms propoſed to him, to induce him to quit the papal chair? Why was Benedict XIII, once more, depoſed, when he had been already depoſed by a general council? In a word, why was John XXIII. deprived of his dignity, for violating his promiſe to reſign the papacy, ſince it could not be doubted, that he was really pope, and his miſſion lawful? Was not the authority of the council of Piſa ſacrificed by theſe proceedings?

It will be in vain to object, that John XXIII. was not depoſed, for any defect in his miſſion, but for his crimes; for it is certain, when his promiſe to reſign the pontificate was required, it was purely with a view to put an end to the ſchiſm; and, had he reſigned, with a good grace, he would never have been accuſed, much leſs condemned, for the crime for which he was afterwards depoſed. It will, perhaps, be ſaid, that this inconvenience was not ſo great, as that of perpetuating the ſchiſm; but can the ſtriking at the authority of a general council be accounted a ſlight inconvenience? Did not the council of Conſtance give occaſion to have her own authority called in queſtion? No reaſon can be aſſigned, why the depoſing of Benedict XIII. and John XXIII, by the council of Conſtance, ſhould be more valid, than the depoſing the ſame Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII, by the council of Piſa.

However, we may diſcover, through all this intricacy, the motive of the proceedings of the council of Conſtance; for the ſchiſm evidently tended to the diſſolution of the papal dignity, which was the baſis and foundation of moſt of the clergy's privileges, and of the hierarchy itſelf. Caſtile, Arragon, Navarre, and Portugal had been neutral, ſome years, without owning any of the contending popes; France had withdrawn her obedience from Benedict XIII, without transferring it to Gregory XII; and, in a word, the whole world began to contemn their excommunications, which they ſo notoriouſly abuſed. There was, therefore, reaſon to fear, that, by degrees, a pope would be thought uſeleſs, which would undermine the foundation of the hierarchy, and, perhaps, introduce a new form of government into the church; and the intereſts of the cardinals and prelates, of whom the council of Conſtance conſiſted, were ſo nearly concerned, that their ſacrificing all, to prevent this inconvenience, is not, in the leaſt, ſurpriſing. This is the real reaſon of their conduct; but they took care to proceed very differently, with reſpect to the pretended hereticks, who, publickly, conteſted the privileges of the clergy. To extirpate a hereſy ſo prejudicial to them, they uſed fire and ſword, rather than ſacrifice, the leaſt of their intereſts; and this we ſhall preſently ſee, in the manner they went to work, in this particular.

All the world knows, that John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were burnt alive, at Conſtance; but every one has not taken the pains to examine, for what errors they ſuffered that rigorous puniſhment; for they were, then, and ſtill are, charged with maintaining impious, horrible, and damnable tenets. They were condemned, as ſeditious, obſtinate, and incorrigible followers and defenders of Wickliffe; obdurate, ſubtle, malicious, and convicted hereticks; and, had there been yet ſtronger terms, they would, doubtleſs, have been made uſe of, to expreſs the abhorrence of theſe hereſies. But, wherein conſiſted theſe hereſies? In their being diſciples of Wickliffe? If the authors, who relate their ſentence, be conſulted, ſcarce one will be found that ſays more; John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were followers of Wickliffe, and, conſequently, abominable wretches, deſerving to be burnt. In the opinions of Wickliffe, then, we muſt trace their errors; but there is an ambiguity, in this, which has been conſtantly improved, to juſtify the condemnation of both theſe doctors; and it is hardly to be doubted, that the council of Conſtance had this ambiguity in view, when ſhe cauſed the errors and memory of Wickliffe to be firſt ſtigmatized, before John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were brought upon their trial.

Wickliffe's opinions were of two ſorts; for ſome concerned the principal articles of faith; and others related to the hierarchy, the clergy, their juriſdiction, power, and riches. Wickliffe did not believe tranſubſtantiation; and he rejected the invocation of ſaints, the adoration of the croſs and images, pilgrimages, and reliques. On the other hand, he thought that the hierarchy had no foundation, in ſcripture; from whence he drew ſeveral inferences againſt the exorbitant authority uſurped by the popes, cardinals, and biſhops. Beſides, he charged the clergy with leading very immoral and diſſolute lives, and maintained, that the revenues of the church were greatly greatly misapplied; and, from these principles, his enemies drew numberless consequences, some of which had, perhaps, never entered into his thoughts. There were, at last, discovered, in his writings, 260 capital errors; and his followers added many more which he had never taught, tho' the whole was imputed to him, as if he had maintained them all, in express terms.

However, John Huss embraced Wickliffe's opinion; but then it was only in what concerned the hierarchy and clergy; for, it is manifest, he believed transubstantiation, and died in that belief. As to images, his opinion was, that a man might honour them, kneel to them, and kiss them, because the intention referred that worship to the originals; so that it is certain, that he was not burnt, for maintaining errors, in the principal doctrines of faith, but for opinions which combated the excessive power and riches of the church, that is, of the clergy. All possible efforts were used to make him confess, that he did not believe transubstantiation; but he could never be brought to such a confession; and yet, by the advice of the cardinal of Florence, the council condemned him, upon the deposition of the witnesses, who accused him of rejecting that doctrine, without regarding his own positive declaration to the contrary. It is not extremely difficult to conceive the council's design, in causing that article to be inserted in Huss's sentence; for they foresaw that it must have appeared very surprising, that a person should be burnt, whose principles tended to a reformation, in the head and members of the church, which all Christendom required, and which was pretended to be necessary by the council itself. It was requisite, therefore, to justify the sentence, by rendering this man odious, as rejecting a fundamental article of faith; and, for this very reason, without distinguishing Wickliffe's errors, John Huss and Jerome of Prague were condemned, as followers of that arch-heretick; by which it was insinuated, that they embraced all the opinions of their master.

To prove by an incontestable testimony, that both these men were burnt, for their opinions concerning the clergy, I need only quote what Æneas Sylvius, alias pope Pius II, affirms, in his History of Bohemia; for, the deputies of the council having admonished the accused, to renounce their errors, and conform to the sentiments of the church, they replied, "That "they were, indeed, lovers of the holy gos- "pel, and true disciples of Christ; that the "church of Rome, and all the other churches "in the world, had greatly swerved from the "apostolical traditions; that the clergy "eagerly pursued pleasures and riches; that "they lorded it over the people, affected the "highest seats, at entertainments, and bred "horses and dogs; that the revenues of the "church, tho' they belonged to the poor "members of Christ, were consumed, in "vanity and wantonness; and that the "priests were ignorant of the commandments "of God, or, if they knew them, lightly "regarded them.

"The fathers of the council, (continues "the Historian) perceiving and knowing "the incorrigble obstinacy of these people, "jugded, that the corrupted members of "the church, when incurable, ought to be "cut off, lest they should infect the rest of "the body. Accordingly, sentence was pas- "sed upon them, all the fathers unanimously "agreeing, that persons, who rejected sound "doctrine, approved by the church, deserved "to be burnt."

This account most evidently shews, wherein consisted the heresy of John Huss and Jerome of Prague; viz. in their charging the clergy with corruption. It was, therefore, to destroy these enemies of the clergy, that the council made no conscience of violating the safe-conduct given by the emperor Sigismund to John Huss, or, at least, to allow him to violate it himself; moreover, the council did not perform the promise they publickly gave to Jerome of Prague, in order to draw him to Constance. Indeed, the council had inserted these words, in their engagement, "Without prejudice to justice, and as far as "the catholick faith requires it," a captious clause, if ever there was any; for was not the catholick faith the very point in dispute; and of what service could the council's promise be to Jerome of Prague, unless against justice? Did he run any risque, or stand in need of such a promise, if he had not maintained the tenets, of which he was accused.

Let us now proceed to the decree of this council, against communion, in both kinds; wherein we shall see, as well as in the preceding article, that the authority of the church, or the clergy, was the sole point in question; for, the fathers of Constance did not condemn communion, in both kinds, as sinful in itself. On the contrary, they owned, that it was practised, in the primitive church, and that the church might grant it to the laity, if she judged it expedient; but they anathematized such as asserted, that the church had no right to abolish this practice. What did they mean, then, by the church? Did they not intend the councils composed of the several members of the clergy? It is so true, that, in this decree, the council's sole view was to support the authority of the church representative, that, some years after, another general council did not scruple to permit the Hussites to communicate, in both kinds, without the least apprehension, that the faith was therein concerned, when they were willing to receive that liberty, as a favour from the church.

As to other opinions, that appeared, at the same time, as they did not attack the clergy, the council of Constance behaved, with an astonishing coldness. John Petit, advocate of the duke of Burgundy, maintained, that it was lawful for any private person to kill a tyrant, even by surprize; but, when this tenet was brought before the council, how did they proceed? After much sollitation, they declared it erroneous, without naming the author, or puniſhing his perſon; tho' they had ordered Wickliffe's bones to be dug up, 30 years after his burial. The ſect of the Scourgers * broached ſeveral capital errors; but the council was ſatisfied with the bare propoſal of finding ſome gentle means, to reſtore them to the unity of the church.

What reformation could be expected from a council, that ſo rigorouſly proſecuted ſuch as diſputed the privileges of the pope, cardinals, and clergy? This work muſt have begun, with the ſuppreſſion of moſt of theſe prerogatives. Indeed, before Martin V's election, the reforming of the court of Rome was diſcourſed of, in the council; and a liſt of the abuſes, to be redreſſed, was drawn up; but, by the artifices of ſome, and particularly of the cardinals, this noble deſign proved abortive; for a pope was elected, who found means to have this article deferred to a more convenient ſeaſon.

This is the ſum of the moſt remarkable tranſactions, in the council of Conſtance. A full account of theſe things will be found, in the fore-mentioned new Hiſtory, to which the reader is referred. Now let us ſee what the council of Baſil acted, with reſpect to the Huſſites, and the conteſt of pope Eugenius IV, with the ſame council; for nothing is more proper to ſhew the State of the Church of thoſe days.

The hiſtory of the council of Baſil.

The Bohemians, who, for the moſt part, had embraced the doctrines of John Huſs, highly reſented the uſage he had met with; and this ſeverity, ſerving only to confirm them in their opinions, the reſolved to maintain them, in ſpite of the council's decrees. The principal doctrine was, communion in both kinds. This occaſioned terrible commotions, in Bohemia, which Martin V. greatly inflamed, by his haughty treatment of the Huſſites. In the midſt of theſe troubles, Wenceſlaus, king of Bohemia, dying, the emperor Sigiſmund, his brother, pretended to the ſucceſſion; but the Bohemians rejected him, becauſe he would not conſent, that they ſhould live in the faith they profeſſed. Martin V. ſupporting Sigiſmund, publiſhed a Cruſade againſt the Huſſites, which obliged them to arm, in defence of their lives. It is needleſs to inquire here, whether Sigiſmund had any right to aſcend the throne of Bohemia, without the conſent of the ſtates; for this is a query, that would lead me too far. However that be, Ziska, a Bohemian, heading the Huſſites, defeated the emperor ſeveral times, and made him as well as the pope, deſpair of extirpating theſe pretended hereticks, by arms. This war laſted till the council of Baſil, without Sigiſmund's being able to take peaceable poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Bohemia.

The council of Baſil, which met, in 1431, finding that the arms of the emperor and the Croiſes, had not the ſucceſs that was expected, reſolved to make peace, with the Huſſites; probably, their view was to ſet Sigiſmund, at any rate, on the throne of Bohemia, to enable him the better to take proper meaſures to extirpate theſe people; for which purpoſe, they ſent deputies into Bohemia, to invite the Huſſites to come and produce their reaſons, before the council. They agreed to it, and their deputies being arrived, at Baſil, required theſe four articles, for which they offered to be reconciled to the church.

Firſt, That the communion ſhould be adminiſtered, in both kinds, to the Bohemian laity.

Secondly, That offenders ſhould be puniſhed, according to the law of God, and by thoſe whoſe proper buſineſs it was.

Thirdly, That the word of God ſhould be preached by able prieſts.

Fourthly, That the clergy ſhould have no temporal juriſdiction.

Theſe were the ſentiments of the Huſſites, for which ſo bloody a war had been made upon them, even to exciting all Europe againſt them; but it was not ſo much for their doctrines, that they were thus cruelly perſecuted, but for their obſtinate refuſal, to ſubmit to the deciſions of the church, and for their contempt of the clergy; for the council uſed all poſſible means to perſuade the Bohemian deputies, to an unconditional ſubmiſſion to the church; but, at laſt, perceiving, that they inſiſted upon the four articles, the council thought fit to grant them, on condition, that that they ſhould, firſt, be explained, becauſe, being couched, in general terms, they might give occaſion to freſh diſputes. The Huſſites conſenting, the council explained the four articles, as they judged convenient; after which, an agreement was drawn, conformable to the four articles, and their explication.

This affair being, thus, ſettled, Sigiſmund demanded to be received for king of Bohemia, and was ſo accordingly, after ſigning certain conditions; viz. the approbation of the agreement, and ſome others relating thereto. It ſeemed, that the perſecution againſt the Huſſites was thereby to ceaſe; but Sigiſmund was no ſooner on the throne of Bohemia, but he diſappointed them. On the other hand, the pope pretending, that they obſerved not the conditions, on which the four articles were granted, poſitively refuſed to approve of the agreement; which occaſioned, in Bohemia, freſh troubles, that were always fomented by the court of Rome, and which properly ended not, till the middle of the laſt century, in the utter ruin of the Huſſites.

Before we leave this ſubject, let us make one reflection. Let the Huſſites be inveighed againſt, as much as you pleaſe; let them be accuſed of holding impious and deteſtable errors; yet theſe ſame errors muſt be reduced to the four articles, exhibited by themſelves, to the the council of Baſil; for which, Cruſades were publiſhed againſt them, and John Huſs, and Jerome of Prague were burnt. But a general council, owned by all the world, when the agreement was granted them, judged, theſe articles might be ſuffered, without prejudice to the catholick faith; wherefore, it appears, that war was made upon them, ſolely, for the ſupport of the church's authority; which was the main point of religion. But, why were they perſecuted afterwards? Becauſe the popes would never ſtand to the agreement, tho' the Huſſites offered, frequently, to ſubmit to the church, upon that condition. It is, therefore, evident, that the war, from the beginning to the end, was wholly founded on this principle, that the church has a deſpotick power; and, that it is unlawful to bind her to any conditions. But what church is this, inveſted with ſo high a prerogative? It cannot be a general council, ſince ſuch a council has not judged that article unqueſtionable; wherefore, it is the pope alone, which muſt be meant by the church. Perhaps, it will be ſaid, that the authority of the council of Baſil, is not acknowledged by a great part of the church; but this will be groundleſs; for the agreement, with the Huſſites, was made before the council was removed to Ferrara, and the council of Baſil is owned by all the world, for lawful, before that removal.

We are going, now, to ſee a quarrel of another nature, not of the church, with her heretical enemies, but of the church with herſelf, of the members with the head; for, till the council of Baſil, the popes and the councils were very well agreed to improve the church's authority, and cauſe it to be abſolutely obeyed. By the help of the equivocal word church, an entire ſubmiſſion was required of Chriſtians, ſometimes to the pope, as the head, ſometimes to the councils, as repreſentatives of the body, according as occaſion offered to improve that term, for the benefit of either. As for the Chriſtian laity, they had been long excluded out of the meaning of the word church. However, tho', in confining the ſignification of the word church, to the clergy alone, there ſtill remained ſome ambiguity, it had not yet been removed, by deciding, whether the authority of the church was lodged in the body of the clergy, or in the pope, as head. The councils of Piſa and Conſtance had taken ſome ſteps towards aſſuming this authority, in depoſing the popes themſelves; but Martin V, after his election, had artfully evaded the deciſion of this important point, either by breaking up the council, or by confirming whatever was done, with regard to the doctrines, without meddling with any of the other articles; for he knew, it would be very prejudicial for him, if the queſtion was decided by the council, as it would be for the council the moment they broke up. At length, the council of Baſil had occaſion to take this queſtion into conſideration.

The council had been called, by Martin V, who had now appointed cardinal Julian Cæſarini, to preſide as legate; but Martin dying, in 1431, before the council was aſſembled, Eugenius IV. was choſen in his room. The new pope oppoſed not the opening of the council, but intended that it ſhould not continue long; for ſome time, the neceſſity of reforming the church, both in the head and members, had been every where talked of; and, as ſuch a reformation muſt have been made by a general council, ſuch a council could not but terrify a pope, who, as yet, had not time to taſte the ſweets of the pontificate. The council of Baſil was no ſooner aſſembled, but Eugenius ſought means to diſſolve it; for he found a pretence, in the council's invitation of the Huſſites to Baſil, during the firſt ſeſſion. He affirmed, that theſe hereticks being condemned, in the council of Conſtance, ought not to be allowed a re-hearing; and, upon this frivolous pretence, he publiſhed a bull, for diſſolving the council.

Inſtead of ſubmitting to the pope's pleaſure, the council reſolved to continue their ſeſſions; from which ſprung a quarrel, that produced a real ſchiſm, ſome maintaining the authority of the council, and others, that of the pope. The council made ſeveral decrees, which placed the authority of a general council above that of a pope, and the pope annulled theſe decrees, affirming, that the body could act but by the directions of the head; but the emperor, the king of France, and moſt of the other princes declaring, immediately, for the council, Eugenius ſaw himſelf, under a neceſſity, to approve the council, and conſent, that the ſeſſions ſhould be continued; and having ſent other legates to preſide, in his name, the council refuſed to receive them, as preſidents. This was a freſh occaſion of diſſenſion, for the pope threatened to diſſolve the council, and the council threatened to ſuſpend the pope; and, accordingly, they made ſome advances to accompliſh it; upon which, Eugenius finding himſelf the weakeſt, was obliged, once more, to approve and confirm the council.

The forced compliance of the pope, appeaſed the quarrel, for ſome time; but, in 1435, the council having ſhewn, that they would ſeriouſly endeavour a reformation of the church, in the head and members, and made, for that purpoſe, decrees to aboliſh the firſt-fruits, and ſettle the rights of the apoſtolick chamber; the pope ſaw himſelf ruined, unleſs he found ſome way to ſtop their proceedings. On the other hand, the cardinals eaſily perceived, that the pope being begun with, their turn would ſoon come; and, there were alſo biſhops, who were ſorry to ſee a reformation going forward, which would be to their prejudice, in many things, tho they might hope to be gainers by it, in ſome reſpects; which occaſioned the forming two oppoſite parties, in the council; but, however, the reformers had the majority. In the interim, the pope continued to gain ground, ſince the cardinals, and ſeveral biſhops, thought it their intereſt to ſupport him.

Another thing alſo helped to ſet the pope's affairs affairs upon a good foot; for, ſome time ſince, John Emanuel Palæologus, emperor of Conſtantinople, had been vigorouſly attacked by the Turks; and, as he wanted aſſiſtance, he imagined, that, if he could unite the Greek church with the Latin, the pope and princes of Europe would aſſiſt him, in defence of his empire. This affair had been already propoſed to Martin V, and it was chiefly with deſign to accompliſh this union, that pope Martin had called the council of Baſil, where the Greek emperor was to come in perſon, with the biſhops of his church; and Eugenius IV, failed not to improve this opportunity, to ſtrengthen his party; for he ſent nuncio's to this emperor, to acquaint him, that the time was come to perform his promiſe; but, as it might be inconvenient for him and his attendants, to repair to Baſil, he promiſed to remove the council to ſome good town, in Italy, provided he would engage to be preſent. On the other hand, the council ſent ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople, to diſſuade the emperor from coming to any other place than Baſil; but the emperor had already reſolved to repair wherever the pope ſhould appoint. The fathers of Baſil perceiving, that the pope intended to remove the council elſewhere, made haſte, and paſſed ſeveral decrees, which very much leſſened the papal authority, and, at length, cited the pope before them.

Eugenius little regarded the proceedings againſt him, at Baſil; for, when he heard the Greeks were arrived, at Venice, he publiſhed a bull, for tranſlating the council of Baſil to Ferrara; but, the council refuſed to comply with the bull, and, by a majority of votes, ſuſpended the pope, till he ſhould come, in perſon, and make his defence. In the interim, cardinal Julian, preſident of the council, and the reſt of the cardinals, except one, left Baſil, carrying a good number of biſhops with them, and repaired to Ferrara, where the pope opened his council, the 10th of February, 1438. Thus, aroſe a new ſort of ſchiſm, between the councils, both calling themſelves general, and, mutually, condemning each other; but the pope's ſoon had a conſiderable advantage of the other, by the arrival of the Greek emperor, at Ferrara, with a great many prelates of his empire; and, the next year, Eugenius tranſlated the council to Florence, where a ſort of a union was made between the Greeks and Latins, which did not laſt long.

In the mean time, the council of Baſil, continuing their proceedings againſt Eugenius IV, came, at laſt, to depoſe him, and elect another pope, in his room, namely, Amedeus, duke of Savoy, who, reſigning the government of his dominions, had retired to the ſolitudes of Ripaille. The new pope aſſumed the name of Felix V. Hence was formed, in the church, a double ſchiſm, between two general councils, and two popes, who thundered their anathema's againſt each other, to the great ſcandal of Chriſtendom. It was no ſmall ambarraſſment to moſt people, to ſee, thus, two popes and two councils condemning one another, and each excommunicating the adherents of the other party, without ſparing even thoſe, who thought to eſcape, by being neuter.

Charles VII, who then reigned, in France, cauſed a ſynod to be held, on this occaſion; in which it was reſolved, that France ſhould own the council of Baſil, for lawful, but ſhould remain, however, in the obedience of pope Eugenius. Another embarraſſment to the French. Indeed, it is hard to conceive, how two ſuch oppoſite things could be reconciled.

Such another aſſembly was held in 1441, in Germany, where no better expedient was found, than the calling of a new council, ſomewhere elſe, than at Baſil and Florence; and that, Germany ſhould remain neuter, till this new council was aſſembled; and a diet, held at Francfort, in 1442, approved of this expedient; the council of Baſil conſented to it, tho' with reluctance. But obſtacles occurred, that prevented the execution of this deſign.

In the interim, Felix V, being diſpleaſed with the council of Baſil, for taking ſo much upon them, reſolved to withdraw to Lauſanne, under pretence, that Baſil Air did not agree with him; and, on the other hand, Eugenius tranſlated the council of Florence to Rome, in the church of St. John of Lateran, where they bgan their ſeſſions, in 1444.

At length, in 1446, the princes of Germany, aſſembled, at Francfort, unanimouſly agreed, that, if Eugenius would not redreſs the grievances complained of, they would all recognize pope Felix. Eugenius demurred at firſt, but the emperor, telling him, he muſt comply, or reſolve to loſe all Germany, he granted whatever the Germans deſired, whereupon an agreement was made.

This was a terrible blow to the council of Baſil, who had, now, loſt Italy, Arragon, and ſeveral other ſtates; and, as for France, they could not rely much upon her, ſince ſhe ſtill continued in obedience to pope Eugenius. England had likewiſe ſo far declared for that pope, that, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Henry VI. ſent an ambaſſy, to make a league with him.

Eugenius IV. died, whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, and was ſucceeded, by Nicholas V.

The council of Baſil loſing a great part of their authority, and Felix V, having but few friends, the king of France held a ſynod, at Lyons, to find means to put an end to the ſchiſm; and Felix V. ſending legates thither, it was reſolved, with his conſent, that, if Nicholas V. would grant him certain conditions, he would reſign the pontificate; which was the ſubject of a negotiation, that laſted the whole year 1448. In the mean while, the council of Baſil, finding themſelves forſaken, by almoſt all the world, and deſpairing of farther protection, at Baſil, ſince the emperor and Germany had declared for Eugenius, reſolved to remove to Lauſanne.

Felix having, at length, obtained moſt of his deſires, reſigned the papal dignity, in 1449; but it was with conſent of his council, who found means to preſerve ſome remains of authority. By their laſt decree, they approved of Felix's reſignation, created him cardinal and Legate a latere, in Savoy and the Tarentaiſe, and allowed him to wear the papal habit all his life; and, Nicholas V. confirmed this decree, according to agreement. Thus ended, at length, the ſchiſm, in which there was a complication of three ſchiſms: Firſt, between Eugenius IV, and the council of Baſil; ſecondly, between two general councils; and, laſtly, between two popes. The firſt, may be ſaid, not to be yet ended, ſince the diſpute, which occaſioned it, ſtill ſubſiſts; for the court of Rome's adherents, perpetually inveigh againſt the council of Baſil, in decreeing, that a general council is above the pope. On the other hand, their oppoſers reſt upon the decrees of this council, to ſupport their opinion. Probably, this queſtion will remain long undecided.

I have enlarged, a little, on what paſſed in the two famous councils of Conſtance and Baſil, nothing, in my opinion, being more proper to diſcover the wretched ſtate of the church of thoſe days; for, from the cloſe of the laſt ſchiſm, to the end of the XVth century, the papal chair was filled with popes, cruelly reſolved on the deſtruction of the Huſſites, contrary to the faith of the agreement, or entirely employed in maintaining the exorbitant power uſurped by their predeceſſors, and, generally, to have an opportunity to ſatisfy their avarice.

1455. The characters of the popes of the xvth century. Calixtus III, ſucceſſor to Nicholas V, ſo oppreſſed the Germans, that they were, at length, forced to break the Concordat, made with Eugenius IV, plainly perceiving that it was entirely uſeleſs.

1458. Pius II, lately canonized, was ſo far from agreeing to a reformation, in the head of the church, that, by a bull, he excommunicated all perſons, that ſhould preſume to appeal from the pope to a general council.

1464. Paul II. was no ſooner choſen, than he broke the oath taken before his election, concerning the redreſs of certain abuſes, which himſelf, with the reſt of the cardinals, had deemed neceſſary. Never were the Gratiæ expectativæ, or bulls for church-preferments before they become void, more frequent, than whilſt he ſate in the papal chair. He ſpent the whole time of his pontificate, in endeavouring to aboliſh the pragmatick ſanction, in France, which deprived him of the liberty of doing, there, whatever he pleaſed.

1471. Sixtus IV, by one of his bulls, raiſed the hierarchy, to the higheſt degree it could be carried, at a time, when the exceſſive power uſurped by the clergy, was, generally, complained of.

1484. Innocent VIII, quarrelled with Ferdinand of Arragon, king of Naples; and, by his ſollicitations, inclined Charles VIII, to carry his arms, into Italy.

1492. Mezerai. Alexander VI, was one of the moſt corrupt men of his age; and it is of him a famous Roman catholick writer gives this fine character, that he would have been the wickedeſt man in the world, if his baſtard ſon *, had not been more wicked than himſelf.

* Cæſar Borgia.

I paſs over, in ſilence, the cruel diſpoſition of all theſe popes, to perſecute the Bohemians, contrary to the faith of their Concordat. The Cruſades againſt the Turks, in which they would have engaged all the princes of Europe, appeared very ſpecious; but ſovereigns were ſo well ſatisfied, that, in publiſhing Cruſades, the popes had only their own private intereſt in view, that they could never confide in them.

Such, in general, was the ſtate of the Chriſtian church, in the XVth century, on which I ſhall make but one ſingle remark, leaving my readers, at liberty, to add as many as they pleaſe. What I would obſerve is, that the abſtract I have given, plainly ſhews, how trifling their opinion is, who ſay, it is not the buſineſs of private perſons, to endeavour a reformation of the church, but it muſt be left to the care of the church herſelf. What then is this church, from which we are to expect this happy reformation? Doubtleſs, this is not what is meant, by the word church; for, it is the pope with his cardinals. But, theſe are the very men, who have always prevented it, and, very likely, will, to the utmoſt of their power, prevent it, for ever. Shall a general council undertake this reformation? But, what has, hitherto, paſſed, in theſe aſſemblies affords no room to expect ſo great a benefit; and, beſides, who ſhall call this general council? of whom ſhall it be compoſed? who ſhall preſide? Can the pope be perſuaded to convene a general council to reform the church? will he give the precedency to another, that himſelf and court may be, with more freedom, reformed? In a word, will it not be the pope, cardinal, and prelates, that will have the deliberative vote, in this council? but, theſe are ſo many perſons concerned to leave things as they are.

Will it be ſaid, with ſome, that the church has no need of a reformation; that ſhe is innocent and pure, without ſpot or wrinkle, or any thing like it; that all the prerogatives enjoyed by the popes, cardinals, and biſhops, belong to them by divine right; that the pope exerciſes only the power committed to him by Chriſt; that his deciſions are infallible, as well in point of fact, as of right; and the ſame obedience muſt be paid to his decrees, as to thoſe of God himſelf. But, if, purſuant to this principle, the pope ſhould unfortunately enlarge their phylacteries, and every day form new pretenſions, as it has too often happened, how ſhall they be ſtopped, if, it is confeſſed, that the church has no need of reformation, or left to reform herſelf?

The State of the Church of England. After viewing the State of the Church, in general, it is time to proceed to that of the church of England, in particular. England, with regard to religion, was in the ſame condition with the reſt of Europe. The people, paſſionately wiſhed for a reformation of ſeveral abuſes, crept into the church; but the eccleſiaſticks vigorouſly oppoſed it, as every change would be to their prejudice. As for the kings, they made religion ſubſervient to their intereſt; for, when they imagined that they wanted the clergy, clergy, they found ways enough to evade the people's deſires; but when the parliament's favour was neceſſary, they aſſented to the ſtatutes, which reſtrained the incroachments of the pope and clergy.

In the beginning of the century, Henry IV, whoſe ſole view was to eſtabliſh himſelf in the throne, and, who thought he could not effect it, without the clergy, appeared, throughout his whole reign, to have a great reſpect for them; and, from hence, proceeded all the ſtatutes paſſed, in thoſe days, againſt the Lollards. Henry V, ſhewed, at firſt, a great inclination to ſtrip the clergy of their riches, purſuant to the parliament's deſire; but, afterwards, turning his thoughts to the conqueſt of France, carefully avoided, that religion ſhould cauſe any commotions, in his kingdom; for it was highly requiſite, in order, to execute his grand deſigns, that his ſubjects ſhould be ready to aſſiſt him with their purſes; and, on the other hand, he was no leſs concerned to live in a good underſtanding with the court of Rome, leaſt it ſhould prevent his enterpriſe; for he knew what ſhe was capable of, when ſhe thought herſelf injured; and, ſo, artfully managing, both the pope and his ſubjects, he hindered the firſt, from abuſing his power too much, without depriving him, however, of what he poſſeſſed. By this prudent conduct, he made his reign peaceable, with regard to religion; but, we muſt, however, except what he did, in the beginning, againſt the Lollards; for he had ſuffered himſelf to be prepoſſeſſed, that they had conſpired againſt his life; and, that belief made him, at firſt, a little ſevere; but, as he was endowed with an excellent judgment, he ſoon diſcerned the intereſts of the clergy, from thoſe of religion, and put a ſtop to the perſecutions of the unfortunate Lollards. Henry VI, was a weak man, ever ready to receive the impreſſions that were given him; and had he held the reins of the government himſelf, very probably, the clergy would have gained much ground, in his reign; but the directors of his affairs, as well during his minority, as after, were men of a very different character; beſides, the French war, the diſturbances, at court, after the king's marriage, and the civil wars, which quickly followed, gave thoſe, at the helm, no time to think much of religious affairs. For the ſame reaſon, the reign of Edward IV, was not diſturbed either by the Lollards, or their adverſaries. It is true, Edward ſhewed a great condeſcenſion for the clergy, in granting them a favour, conſtantly denied by the former kings; but his complaiſance, did not go ſo far, as to indulge perſecution. The reigns of Edward V, and Richard III, were entirely ſpent in domeſtick troubles, which had no influence upon the affairs of the church; and, as for Henry VII, he made it a rule, to keep the church upon the ſame foot he found it, when he aſcended the throne; for he, always avoided, as a rock, all innovations which might hinder the execution of his two ſole deſigns; viz. to ſecure the crown to himſelf and his heirs, and to accumulate riches. Such was, with reſpect to religion, the diſpoſition of the kings that reigned in England, during the XVth century.

As for the Engliſh nation, it is certain, it was, generally, Wickliffite, in ſome reſpects; for Wickliffe's opinions, manifeſtly tended to theſe two principal ends: Firſt, to reform the government of the church, and to ſet bounds to the power of the pope and clergy; ſecondly, to alter the church's creed, concerning ſome doctrines, long ſince received, and which he thought, contrary to ſcripture. Now, as he found it, almoſt impoſſible, that Chriſtians ſhould return to what he believed the antient faith of the church, becauſe the clergy were concerned to maintain the eſtabliſhed errors, he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon the firſt point, as being abſolutely neceſſary to the attainment of the ſecond. It is certain, that, with regard to his general view, in the firſt of theſe two articles, not only his profeſſed followers, but all the reſt of the people did, as it were, join with him. For many ages the Engliſh had felt the oppreſſion wherein the pope and clergy had kept them; and, in all Chriſtendom, no nation had more experienced the rigour of this dominion; for the Hiſtory of England ſhews it, ſo manifeſtly, that a man would be blind not to ſee it; and, tho' the Hiſtory were ſuſpected, the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, ſo often revived, leave no room to queſtion, that the Engliſh thought themſelves oppreſſed; ſo, that it may be ſaid, in general, the Engliſh nation was Wickliffite, as to the firſt point, tho' many believed, Wickliffe would have carried the reformation a little too far, and, to correct the abuſes of the hierarchy, had run into the contrary extreme; but the nation was not, generally, Wickliffite, with regard to the ſecond article; namely, the alteration of belief, concerning the doctrines. Indeed, Wickliffe had, in this reſpect, many followers, but they were not the majority. Thus, the name of Wickliffite, or Lollard, was an equivocal term, capable of being underſtood two different ways; for, ſome times, it ſignified a man, who, ſeparating himſelf from the church, embraced all Wickliffe's opinions; and, it might, alſo, be underſtood of one, who, remaining in the church, as it was then, and adhering to the received doctrines, was, however, of Wickliffe's opinion, concerning the temporal and ſpiritual juriſdiction of the clergy. In this laſt ſenſe, there were more Lollards, in England, than can be imagined; and, this diſtinction, may ſerve to account for divers proceedings of the parliaments, in the beginning of the XVth century, which ſeem to be contrary one to another. Some times they were ſeen to ſpeak and act like Lollards, requiring earneſtly, that the clergy ſhould be ſtript of their riches, and ſome times to condemn theſe ſame Lollards to the flames, when they conſidered them, in the firſt ſenſe beforementioned. The clergy knew how to take advantage of the ambiguity of that term; for when a man was ſo hardy as to ſhew, that it were to be wiſhed, ſome alteration were made in the government of the church, he was, infallibly, accuſed of being a Lollard, and charged with all Wickliffe's opinions; by which he became odious, becauſe the true Lollards maintained doctrines repugnant to the faith of thoſe days. The firſt parliament, which petitioned Henry IV, to ſeize the church lands, could not eſcape that imputation, which made a deep impreſſion in the king's mind. Thus, it often happened, that the people did not dare, publickly, to approve Wickliffe's firſt opinions, for fear of being taxed, alſo, with holding the others, and expoſed to ſuffer, for tenets they never had received, as it happened to John Huſs and Jerome of Prague. It was not, without cauſe, that the clergy proſecuted the Lollards, with ſuch animoſity, ſince their principles tended to deprive them of all their prerogatives; and, at this very day, the Church of England, tho', embracing Wickliffe's opinions, concerning the doctrines, cannot forbear expreſſing very little eſteem for that doctor, becauſe he has combated the hierarchy, which ſhe has thought fit to retain.

The Lollards were perſecuted, ſome times more, or leſs, according to the character of the kings, archbiſhops, and the reſt of the prelates; but, chiefly, according to the circumſtances of affairs. In general, the beginning of the XVth century, was much more ſevere for them, than the middle, or the end; and the reaſon is evident; for, as their number continually increaſed, their enemies found much leſs ſupport, and themſelves more protection. In the beginning of the XVth century, which was the moſt troubleſome time for them, there were, however, but very few burnt; of which, three principal reaſons may be given: Firſt, as the ſtatutes did not enact, that all, in general, ſhould be burnt, who held the tenets of Wickliffe, but only ſuch as preached, or taught them openly, the number of the guilty was not very great; for theſe ſtatutes were not obſerved, after the manner of the inquiſitions, but agreeably to the liberties and privileges of the Engliſh nation. In the next place, the idea, which the clergy were pleaſed to give of the Lollards, was, that they entirely ſubverted religion; but, often, in the examination of the parties accuſed as ſuch, it appeared, they only believed, that the pope and clergy abuſed their power too much, which was the general opinion of the kingdom. It was well known, the parliament had not that in view, in their ſtatutes againſt the Lollards. Laſtly, the judges themſelves ſome times happened to be of the ſect; and this was the occaſion of the ſtatute in the reign of Henry V, obliging all magiſtrates, at their entrance into office, to ſwear to the execution of the laws, againſt the Lollards; but I do not know whether that ſtatute was ever ſtrictly obſerved. If we believe Walſingham, the monk, the judges, and ſeveral biſhops themſelves, were very remiſs in the proſecution of the Lollards; which he aſcribes to the general corruption, which reigned, in England; but this corruption was nothing elſe, but the inclination of the Engliſh, for Wickliffe's opinions; or, at leaſt, their ſcruple to put people to death on account of religion. The moſt remarkable thing in England, concerning the Lollards, is the trial and puniſhment of Sir John Oldcaſtle, otherwiſe called lord Cobham, of whom I have ſpoken in the reign of Henry V. We muſt now proceed to another ſubject; viz. the conteſts which England had, with the court of Rome, during the XVth century.

Diſputes between England and the popes.

Notwithſtanding the complaints continually carried to the court of Rome, concerning her frequent incroachments, and the precautions taken, by ſeveral parliaments, to ſcreen themſelves from the ſame, the popes did not abate their pretenſions; for the acts of parliament, were to them, but like thunders, without execution, which reached not their rights. Upon every occaſion, they made no ſcruple to act contrary to theſe ſtatutes, as if they had not been made; and aſſert their apoſtolick power, without troubling themſelves, whether they prejudiced the king or his ſubjects. The parliament, willing to remedy the abuſes, flowing from the continual diſpenſations, granted by the pope, without hearing the cauſe, paſſed, in 1400, an act, "That all "perſons, who purchaſed or executed any bulls "to be diſcharged from the payment of tythes, "ſhould incur the penalties contained in the "ſtatutes of Proviſors." It was enacted, by another ſtatute paſſed, at the ſame time, "That, if any perſon ſhould procure a pro- "viſion, to be exempt of the juriſdiction of "the biſhops, he ſhould incur the ſame pe- "nalties.

Theſe acts being chiefly made with a view to the monks, were not capable of producing the deſired effect, becauſe the pope, by the fulneſs of his apoſtolick authority, exempted the monks from the obſervance of theſe parliamentary ſtatutes. The biſhops, whom this affair chiefly concerned, not daring to diſpute the power uſurped by the pope, it was the parliament's buſineſs to defend their cauſe, as well as their own; and, to that purpoſe, the ſtatutes, upon this ſubject, were revived, with an additional clauſe, prohibiting the monks, in particular, to purchaſe, or execute any ſuch exemptions, on the penalty compriſed in the ſtatute of Præmunire.

This ſtatute, which I have mentioned, on ſeveral occaſions, was a terrible fence, againſt the court of Rome's uſurpations. Indeed, it did not directly attack the pope, ſince the parliament had no juriſdiction over him; but, as it hindered the Engliſh from applying to the court of Rome for things, contrary to the prerogatives of the crown, and the laws of the realm, it abridged the pope of good part of the advantages, which he pretended to reap from his apoſtolick power. Perhaps, it will be thought ſtrange, that the popes ſhould be ſilent, when, and long after, this ſtatute was paſſed; but it is eaſy to diſcover the reaſon; for the ſchiſm which began, in 1378, and, laſted, till 1409, hindered them from ſtirring; and the popes received by England, took care to give no offence, at ſuch a juncture. It is true, there was an interval of ſome years, during which Alexander V, and John XXIII, might have made made ſome attempt againſt that law; but Alexander's pontificate, was very ſhort, and John was employed in affairs, as he thought, of more importance. Martin V, did not conſider this affair, with the ſame indifference; for, in 1426, he wrote a thundering letter to Chicheley, archbiſhop of Canterbury, upbraiding him for his remiſneſs, and enjoining him, to exert his utmoſt, that this ſtatute might be repealed. Henry VI, who then reigned, not being above five years old, the pope thought it a favourable juncture to compaſs his ends. It will not be, perhaps, unacceptable, to inſert part of this letter, which ſhews the pope's ſentiments concerning the pretended privileges of his ſee.

MARTIN,

SERVANT of the SERVANTS of GOD,

To his reverend brother, the archbiſhop of CANTERBURY, greeting, and apoſtolical benediction.

Martin V's letter to the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Burnet's Hiſt. Ref. T. I. Col. p. 95.

'HAD you conſidered, what a ſtrict account you muſt give to almighty God for the flock committed to your care; had you called to mind the obligations of your office, and, how much you are bound to maintain the rights and honour of the Roman church, of whom you hold your dignity; had you, I ſay, duly thought of theſe things, you would never have ſuffered your ſelf to be ſeized with ſuch a lethargy and negligence. No, you would have done your duty, long ſince; you would have endeavoured to ſet right the miſled, and oppoſed, with all your power, thoſe, who had ſacrilegiouſly invaded the privileges granted, by our Saviour, to the church. Was the authority of your character, beſtowed upon you, only to enrich your ſelf, and give you opportunity of "ſeeking your own, and not the things which are Jeſus Chriſt's?" If this be your opinion, you greatly miſtake the inſtructions of our bleſſed Saviour, who, when he committed his ſheep to St. Peter's care, only commanded him to "feed them;" neither received he his command, till he had given his maſter, repeated aſſurances of his love. Is this, then, your manner of ſhewing your love to Chriſt? Is this feeding and taking care of the flock? Will ſuch conduct as this, diſcharge your duty to the holy ſee? Alas! your flock are running down a precipice, before your eyes, and you are regardleſs of their danger, and make no attempt to ſave them: You ſuffer them to feed in dangerous paſtures, without warning them; and, which is horrible, you ſeem to put poiſon in their mouths, with your own hands; you ſee the wolves ſcatter and tear them to pieces, and like a dumb dog, vouchſafe not ſo much as to bark; and you can behold the authority of our bleſſed Saviour, and the holy ſee, deſpiſed and trampled on, without dropping one word of remonſtrance. One would have thought, you might, at leaſt, have whiſpered your diſlike, tho' you had been ſo very prudent, as not to have declared it openly. Are you not ſenſible, you muſt, one day, account, to the utmoſt farthing, for all omiſſions and prevarications of this kind? Do not you think, if any of your flock are loſt, by your neglect, (and, alas! there are a great many,) "their blood will be required at your hands? Conſider and tremble, what vengeance God denounces, by his prophet Ezekiel: "Son of man, I have ſet thee a watchman unto the houſe of Iſrael; if thou ſeeſt the ſword come, and doſt not blow the trumpet, and any perſon is taken away, his blood will I require at thy hands." Ezek. xxxiii. 6, 7.

To ſee this beginning, would not one think the point in queſtion, was ſome new hereſy, tending to ſubvert the foundations of religion? At leaſt, one ſhould believe, the pope had the Wickliffites in view. But it was not ſo; for we ſhall ſee, in the ſequel of the letter, what the affair was; namely, the ſtatute of Præmunire, which the archbiſhop had not cauſed to be repealed, the pope, groundleſsly, ſuppoſing, that it was in that prelate's power to annul the laws of the realm. He continued in this manner:

'I leave it to your ſelf, to conſider, what abominable violence has been committed upon your province. Pray read that royal law, if there is any thing in it, that is either law or royal; for, how can that be called a ſtatute, which repeals the laws of God and the church? Or, how can it deſerve the name of royal, when it deſtroys the antient cuſtoms of the kingdom; and ſo contrary to theſe words of ſcripture, "The king loveth judgment"? Tell me, then, reverend brother, whether you, who are a catholick biſhop, can think it reaſonable ſuch an act, as this, ſhould be in force, in a Chriſtian country?

'In the firſt place, under pretence of this execrable ſtatute, the king of England graſps at the ſpiritual juriſdiction, and governs ſo abſolutely, in eccleſiaſtical matters, as if our Saviour had appointed him his vicar. He makes laws for the church and clergy; for, in ſhort, he makes ſo many proviſions about clerks, benefices, and the concerns of the hierarchy, that one would think "the keys of the kingdom of Heaven" were put into his hands, and the ſuperintendency of theſe affairs, had been intruſted with him, and not with St. Peter.

'Beſides theſe monſterous uſurpations, he has enacted ſeveral penalties againſt the clergy; and, ſuch a rigour, is the more unjuſtifiable, as the Engliſh government does not treat Turks and Jews, with ſo great ſeverity. People of all countries and perſuaſions have the liberty of coming into England; and, only thoſe, who have cures beſtowed upon them, by Chriſt's vicar, are excluded: I ſay, only thoſe are baniſhed, ſeized, impriſoned, ſtripped of their fortunes? and, if any eccleſiaſtical perſon, charged with the execution of the mandates and cenſures of the holy ſee, happens to ſet foot on Engliſh ground, and proceed in the buſineſs of his commiſſion,

'commiſſion, he is treated like an enemy, 'thrown out of the king's protection, and 'moreover, expoſed to greater hardſhips. 'Was ever ſuch iniquity, as this, paſſed into 'a law? Pray conſider, whether ſuch ſta-'tutes, as theſe, are for the honour of the 'kingdom; and whether it becomes you, to 'be ſilent under all this outrage. Is this an 'inſtance of filial obedience? Is this the 'Engliſh people's way of ſhewing their love, 'to their mother church and the holy ſee? 'Can that be called a catholick kingdom, 'where ſuch profane laws are practiſed; 'where application to Chriſt's vicar is prohi-'bited; where St. Peter's ſucceſſor, is not al-'lowed to execute our Saviour's commiſſion? 'Chriſt ſaid to St. Peter, and in him to his 'ſucceſſors, "feed my ſheep," but this ſtatute 'will not ſuffer him to feed them, but tranſ-'fers that office upon the king, and pretends, 'in ſeveral caſes, to give him apoſtolical 'authority. Chriſt built his church upon St. 'Peter; but this act of parliament hinders 'the effect of this diſpoſition, not permitting 'St. Peter's ſee to proceed in the functions of 'government, or to make proviſions ſuitable 'to the neceſſities of the church. Our Lord 'has ordered, that whatever his high-prieſt "ſhall bind or looſe in earth, ſhall be bound "or looſed in heaven;" but this ſtatute over-'rules the divine command; for, if, the im-'mediate repreſentative of our Saviour thinks 'fit to delegate any prieſt, to execute the 'power of the keys, contrary to the intent 'of the ſtatute, he is refuſed admittance, 'forced out of the kingdom, ſtript of his ef-'fects, and made liable to farther penalties. 'If any diſcipline, if any apoſtolick cenſure, 'appear againſt this uſage, it is puniſhed as 'a capital crime.

'And, what does your prudence think of 'all this? Is this a catholick ſtatute? Can it be 'ſuffered, without diſhonour to our Saviour, 'without a breach upon the laws of the goſ-'pel; and the ruin of people's ſouls? Why, 'therefore, did you not "cry aloud? Why Iſaih lviii. 1. "did you not lift up your voice like a trum-"pet? ſhew your people their tranſgreſſion, "and the houſe of Jacob their ſins, that their "blood may not be required at your hands?"

'If all perſons, who have the cure of ſouls, 'are bound to this duty, how much more are 'you, who have both the prieſts and people 'committed to your care, by the holy ſee, 'and, by whoſe favour, you enjoy the privi-'lege of primate and legate, for the church 'of England, and have the honour of being 'ſucceſſor to that glorious martyr, St. Thomas, 'who, to remove the oppreſſion of ſuch ſta-'tutes, ſcrupled not to ſacrifice himſelf for 'the intereſt of the church.

'Theſe things conſidered, you, who ought 'to have ſet up the church's ſtandard, been 'moſt forward in the defence of religion, and 'animated your fellow biſhops to a noble con-'teſt, are the firſt that turn your back, and 'decline the ſervice. Thus, either by your 'great cowardice, or, as it is, generally, be-'lieved, by your downright prevarication, 'you diſcourage thoſe, who offer to make a 'ſtand; wherefore, if the church complain 'of your conduct; if the whole be laid to 'your charge, be not ſurpriſed, but troubled 'at the imputation; and let this reproach 'ſerve to put you upon reforming your con-'duct, and make you boldly perform the du-'ties of your office; which, were you but in-'clined to make the moſt of your power, 'would not be very difficult; for which reaſon, 'exert your character among the laity, in-'form their underſtandings, in this point, 'and endeavour to reclaim them. Shew them, 'what a ſnare this ſtatute will prove, and 'how much guilt it will draw upon their con-'ſciences; and let your admonitions be preſ-'ſing and ſharp, and then," the crooked "will be made ſtrait, and the rough ways "ſmooth."

After ſo ſevere a reprimand, the pope continues to tell the archbiſhop, that he thought himſelf bound, in conſcience, to deal, thus, plainly, with him; and then, he charges him, upon pain of excommunication, to go, immediately, to the privy-council, and make what intereſt he could, for repealing the ſtatute of Præmunire; to apply to both houſes of parliament for the ſame purpoſe, and let them know, that thoſe, who obey that ſtatute, were under excommunication; moreover, he orders him to enjoin all the clergy, to preach publickly, and every-where, the ſame doctrine; to take with him two grave perſons to atteſt his diligence, and to ſatisfy him of the reſult of the affair.

Reaſons of the pope's conduct.

If it be inquired what made Mattin V, ſo very angry with Chicheley, who was not concerned in the ſtatute of Præmunire, paſſed long before he was archbiſhop, and who had not the power to procure a repeal, the reaſon is this. Chicheley had oppoſed, to his utmoſt, the papal exemptions; for, he had diſſuaded Henry V, from conſenting, that Henry Beaufort, his uncle, ſhould be made cardinal, legate a latere for life, and hold the biſhoprick of Wincheſter in commendam; moreover, he had ſaid, publickly, that all the pope's proceedings tended only to drain England continually.

The archbiſhop, willing to juſtify himſelf, did not do it to the pope's ſatisfaction; for, on the contrary, he drew upon himſelf a more thundering letter, and, after that, a third, directed to the two archbiſhops, wherein, to mortify Canterbury, York is named firſt. Chicheley fearing the pope's threats, got ſome biſhops to write in his behalf, but nothing was capable of pacifying him; and, at length, he ſent him a letter himſelf, telling him, he heard, by common report, that his holineſs had proceeded to a ſentence againſt him, which had never happened to any archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſince the days of St. Auguſtin; that, however, he was not certain of the thing, becauſe he was commanded, by the king, to bring all the inſtruments, received from Rome, with the ſeals whole, and lodge them in the paper-office, till the ſitting of the parliament.

In

In the interim, Martin V, reſolving to puſh this affair, wrote to the king and parliament, in a more imperious ſtrain, than had ever been uſed by any pope; for he admoniſhes, or rather commands them, to repeal the ſtatute of Præmunire, otherwiſe, he aſſures them, they cannot be ſaved.

The archbiſhop, at laſt, ſeeing the pope thus obſtinate, and not daring any longer to diſobey him, went, with ſeveral other biſhops, to the houſe of commons, where he made a long ſpeech, endeavouring to perſuade the houſe to repeal the ſtatute, and put them in mind of the danger of an interdict, on the whole kingdom; but neither his arguments nor menaces, were capable of inducing the commons to repeal, or even explain the act. On the contrary, they addreſſed the king, to take the archbiſhop into his protection, and to write to the pope, in his behalf.

Pope Martin's letter, and his extraordinary endeavours for repealing the ſtatute of Præmunire, afford matter for three remarks. The firſt is, this letter is a demonſtration, that the chief of religion, was then made to conſiſt, in the pope's prerogatives, and the clergy's immunities. Hence it alſo appears, how averſe Martin was, to conſent to the leaſt diminution of his pretended rights, and, conſequently, to a reformation, in the head and members of the church, demanded with ſo much earneſtneſs, at the council of Conſtance, where he was preſent himſelf.

The ſecond remark is, that, at all times, the popes, in their conteſts, with the ſeveral ſtates of Chriſtendom, have had, always, great advantages. Theſe advantages conſiſted, in that, by the threats of excommunication and interdict, they puſhed matters ſo far, that there was need of great reſolution, not to be over-awed, and loſe ground, either by agreement, or otherwiſe; but, if this reſolution was proof againſt all attempts, and the circumſtances of affairs were not favourable to the court of Rome, ſhe had the power to ſtop when ſhe pleaſed, in expectation of a better opportunity; for they, who had the misfortune to contend with her, always accounted it a great victory, not to be vanquiſhed, being ſatisfied, if ſhe would but ſuffer them to live in peace.

Conjecture upon this matter.

The third remark, is a conjecture, which I ſhall leave to the reader's judgment. Tho' Henry VI, was then but five years old, and his minority ſeemed to countenance the pope's deſign, it is, however, certain, England had never been in a more proſperous condition; for the Engliſh were quiet, and pleaſed with the government, and the victories of Crevant and Verneuil had put their affairs, in France, upon a very good foot; but, on the other hand, the affairs of Charles VII, were in ſuch confuſion, that there was no likelihood of their being ever reſtored; and, therefore, Martin V, could not think it a proper time for him; beſides, the king's two uncles, were not diſpoſed to ſuffer the prerogatives royal, and the people's rights, to be trampled upon, when their affairs were in ſo flouriſhing a condition; it is, therefore, ſomething probable, that Martin V, who was more inclined to France, than to England, made, then, all that noiſe, only to excite commotions, in England, which would be of ſervice to Charles, and give him time to breathe. If the archbiſhop had, punctually obeyed him, and the clergy every where preached againſt the ſtatute of Præmunire, according to the pope's expreſs orders, the parliament would have been obliged to ſupport their act, and puniſh the clergy's preſumption; and, then, the pope would have had a pretence to put the nation under an interdict, which would have greatly embarraſſed the affairs of the Engliſh, in France; but Chicheley's prudence, prevented the miſchief, which might have ſprung from Martin's haughty proceedings. In ſhort, Martin perceiving, that he was neither ſupported by the king's council, nor the clergy, nor people, dropped the affair, not thinking it proper to expoſe his authority, any farther. This conjecture is built upon Martin's continual partiality to France, whether out of inclination, or becauſe, indeed, it was not for the intereſt of the court of Rome, that France ſhould be ſubject to England.

Before I leave the Præmunire, it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that this ſtatute had two principal clauſes; the firſt, containing the ſtatute of Proviſors, made in the reign of Edward I, prohibiting to ſollicit and procure benefices from the court of Rome, by way of proviſion, contrary to the rights of the crown, or the patrons; and, the ſecond, forbid to carry to the court of Rome, or elſewhere, cauſes belonging to the king's courts. The clergy complained, that, by theſe words, or elſewhere, the king's judges pretended to deprive the eccleſiaſtical courts, of numberleſs cauſes, which, before, they had the cognizance of. They maintained, that theſe words, or elſewhere, inſerted in the act, had no relation to the eccleſiaſtical courts, but only to the ſeveral places where the pope might reſide; that, nevertheleſs, the judges underſtood them, in the firſt ſenſe; and, if, there was, in a proceſs, the leaſt point, belonging to the royal juriſdiction, they took occaſion from theſe two words, to remove it from the eccleſiaſtical court, as well as from the court of Rome. In 1439, the convocation complained to the king of the explanation of theſe terms by the lay judges, pretending, that it was contrary to the intent of the law, for ſeveral reaſons alledged in their addreſs; for, that time the clergy had no anſwer, or, if they had, it was not to their mind. But, in the reign of Edward IV, they obtained the king's charter, prohibiting his judges to meddle with criminal matters, where the clergy were concerned. I do not know whether Edward granted this charter, out of policy, to gain the clergy's protection, or was convinced, that the words, or elſewhere, were explained, contrary to the parliament's intention.

Beſides the conteſts, occaſioned by the ſtatute of Præmunire, between England and the court of Rome, there were alſo others, which I ſhall but juſt mention. In 1403, in the reign of Henry IV, the parliament paſſed an act, forbidding all perſons that ſhould have proviſion of any benefice, to pay into the apoſtolick chamber, more than was paid in old time; and the penalty for offenders was, that they ſhould forfeit to the king, the ſame ſum they paid the pope. The occaſion of this ſtatute, was a grievance introduced, ſome time before, by the court of Rome; which was, that no perſon ſhould have proviſion of any benefice that was void, till he had compounded with the apoſtolick chamber, as well for the firſt-fruits, as for other leſſer ſervices, in that court, and paid, beforehand, the ſum agreed upon.

But the greateſt diſpute, between England and the popes, was concerning the collation of the biſhopricks. Tho' the popes, when the firſt Anglo-Saxons were converted, had ſent Italian, or other foreign biſhops, into England, it is certain, that, towards the latter-end of the Saxon monarchy, the biſhops were choſen by the chapters, and the ſame privilege was continued to them, after the Norman conqueſt, and confirmed by king John's charter. In the mean while, the popes, having, by degrees, extended their authority, aſſumed the power of beſtowing archbiſhopricks and biſhopricks, by way of proviſion, ſome times on one, ſome times on another pretence; and this is what I have had frequent occaſion to remark; for they would have, at once, eſtabliſhed this rule, that the diſpoſal of all the biſhopricks belonged to them by divine right; but, meeting with oppoſition, they thought of another expedient; and, that was, to get poſſeſſion, by degrees, in order, hereafter, to plead preſcription. Thus, being content, at firſt, with maintaining, that on certain occaſions, they had a power to fill the vacant ſees, they, afterwards, framed theſe occaſions, whenever they pleaſed; and, in ſhort, they multiplied them ſo very faſt, that ſcarcely was there a vacant biſhoprick, but what they filled, by way of proviſion; for time and favourable junctures, confirming them in this prerogative, there was no poſſibility to wreſt it from them; and, thus, the privilege of the chapters was entirely deſtroyed.

Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying, in 1413, the monks of St. Auguſtin choſe Henry Chicheley, biſhop of St. David's. But pope John XXIII, annulled the election, declaring, that, for this turn, he had reſolevd to diſpoſe of the archbiſhoprick, by way of proviſion. However, to avoid diſputes, he made choice of the ſame Chicheley; thereby preſerving his pretended right, without detriment to the perſon elected.

But Martin V, dealt not ſo gently with England; for, he was no ſooner ſeated, in the papal chair, than he boldly diſpoſed of all the vacant ſees, without any regard to the privilege of the chapters; and, in two years only, he filled, by way of proviſion, 13 biſhopricks, in the province of Canterbury. It was not only with reſpect to the ſees that England had cauſe to complain of the pope; he diſpoſed, likewiſe, of all the other benefices of the kingdom, without troubling himſelf about the right of the patrons, or the inſtruction of the people; and the beſt preferments were generally conferred upon foreigners, who underſtood not a word of Engliſh, or reſided not in England, and ſome times, even upon children; for inſtance, he made Proſper Colonna, his nephew, who was but 14 years old, archdeacon of Canterbury. Henry V, a high-ſpirited prince, ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, to complain, both of theſe, and other grievances; but Martin V, delayed his anſwer ſo long, that the ambaſſadors told him, the king their maſter, purely out of reſpect to the holy ſee, had proceeded by way of requeſt, to which he was not obliged; but for the future, he would uſe his prerogative; that, accordingly, they had inſtructions to make a ſolemn proteſtation before himſelf and the conclave, if his holineſs would not give them immediate ſatisfaction. I know not what anſwer the pope returned; but not long after Martin having tranſlated the biſhop of Lincoln to the ſee of York, by way of proviſion, the chapter refuſed to admit him, and the pope was forced to revoke his bull.

In 1438, the univerſity of Oxford complained, that church-preferments were beſtowed, without any regard to learning or merit; that the colleges thereby were become empty, becauſe there was no need of ſtudy or learning, to be qualified for a benefice; whereupon, the convocation, to whom this complaint was addreſſed, paſſed a canon, that none but graduates, in the univerſities, ſhould be capable of benefices; but this was a weak fence againſt the papal power.

In the interim, tho' the court of Rome made the apoſtolick authority ſound very high, the popes now and then, met with mortifications; for example, in the reign of Henry IV, the parliament ordered, that the Peter-pence ſhould be depoſited in the king's hands, till the ſchiſm was cloſed.

In the reign of Henry V, the alien priories were ſuppreſſed, without asking the pope's conſent.

Under Henry VI, pope Nicholas V, demanding an extraordinary ſubſidy of the clergy of England, for the occaſion of the holy ſee, the king forbid the clergy to grant it.

The like demand, made ſome years after, by Vicentini, a nuncio, was, ſharply, denied by the clergy; for, the papal power, formerly ſo dreadful to the whole church, and, particularly to England, began to be leſs feared. The ſchiſms did the pope irreparable damage.

During the whole XVth century, it does not appear, that any national councils were held in England, only convocations of the clergy, in the two eccleſiaſtical provinces of Canterbury and York. The condemnation of the Lollards, was, almoſt, the ſole buſineſs of theſe convocations. As for national ſynods, ſynods, they were become uſeleſs, ſince the popes had engroſſed the cognizance of all eccleſiaſtical affairs; beſides, the leaſt appeal to the pope, was ſufficient to annul, all the canons of a council. On the other hand, the popes had ſo managed, that no national ſynods could be held without their licence; and, as in theſe ſynods, there was frequent occaſion to inquire into the extent of the papal authority, they were grown ſo odious to the court of Rome, that the uſe of them was inſenſibly laid aſide. At this very day, in the ſtates which have not yet received the reformation, national councils are no more talked of, or, at leaſt, ſo very rarely, that it is plain, the popes allow them with reluctance, and very great difficulties. Of this, we have, in France, a late remarkable inſtance, in the tranſactions concerning the famous conſtitution Unigenitus of Clement XI; for king Lewis XIV, tho' powerful and formidable, could never obtain the pope's leave, to call a national council, except on ſuch terms, as rendered the thing impracticable, tho' that monarch's ſole view, was to cauſe the conſtitution to be approved.

The article of the eminent men, who flouriſhed, in the church of England, during this century, will not long detain us. There were, indeed, cardinals, archbiſhops, biſhops, and other clergymen, very famous, but it was neither for their piety or learning; for, their poſts, at court, ambaſſies, intrigues of the cabinet, and ſhare in the revolutions, in the court and kingdom, were the only things, by which they were diſtinguiſhed. Henry Chicheley, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was one of the beſt; for, which reaſon, he obtained not the honour of the cardinalate, laviſhly beſtowed on Henry Beaufort, biſhop of Wincheſter, Kemp, Bourchier, Moreton, who were leſs worthy of it, than he, if true merit had been regarded; but Chicheley wanted one indiſpenſable quality of a cardinal; namely, to be entirely devoted to the holy ſee.

If there were any learned men, beſides, they were ſo, with regard to the time they lived in, when true learning was not much in vogue; and, therefore, it would be very needleſs to ſpeak of each, in particular, ſince their fame hardly ſurvived them. Some were noted for their great animoſity againſt the Lollards, and, among the reſt, Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury; for, this prelate, in his funeral ſermon for Ann of Luxemburgh, Richard II's queen, highly commends her for ſpending her time, in reading the holy ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue; and yet, ſome years after, in the reign of Henry IV, he condemned, in convocation, the tranſlations of the bible, as very pernicious *.

* As there was a ſcarcity of perſons eminent in other parts of learning, in this rude and illiterate century, ſo was there likwiſe of hiſtorians. The moſt noted were;

Sir John Froiſſart, who wrote a general Hiſtory of the affairs of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up, in his youth, in the court of Edward III, and familiarly converſant, in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own tongue, which was then the court language of England. His account of matters, ſeems to be plain and honeſt; and, perhaps, none gives a better of the affairs of Edward III. and Richard II. Rapin has made good uſe of him.

Enguerrand de Monſtrelet, and Philip de Commines, may not improperly be called Froiſſart's continuators. They gave a faithful and compleat account of the affairs of England, as far as they are intermixed with, or have any relation to thoſe of France, Burgundy, &c.

Thomas Walſingham, a Benedictine monk of St. Albans. His Hiſtoria Brevis, or ſhort hiſtory, begins at the concluſion of Henry III's reign, where Matthew Paris ended his. The account he gives, is well enough; and we are indebted to him, for many things not taken notice of, by any other writer of thoſe times. His Ypodigma Neuſtriæ, as he calls it, gives an account of Normandy, from the time it came firſt into the hands of Rollo and his Danes, down to the ſixth year of Henry V, wherein the readers will find many occurrences not elſewhere to be met with. Both theſe works were publiſhed by archbiſhop Parker, in 1574, and reprinted at Francfort, in 1603.

John Harding comes next, a northern Engliſhman, and an inveterate enemy to the Scots. He collected whatever might tend to the proof of the antient vaſſalage of Scotland to the crown of England; and, hearing of an old record, in that kingdom, which put the matter paſt diſpute, he went in diſguiſe, and with much ado brought it away, and ſhewed it to Henry V, Henry VI, and Edward IV. To the laſt of theſe he dedicated his two books of Chronicles, in Engliſh rhime. Printed at London, 1543.

William Caxton was a menial ſervant for 30 years together, to Margaret, ducheſs of Burgundy, ſiſter to Edward IV, in Flanders. Finding, as he ſays, after his return to England, an imperfect Hiſtory, he continued it, in Engliſh, under the Latin title of Fructus Temperum. It begins with the firſt inhabiting of this iſland, and ends, the laſt year of Edward IV, 1483. Folio, printed 1515.

John Roſſe, or Rous, travelled over the greateſt part of England; and, having made large collections, out of the libraries where he came, he wrote the Hiſtory of our kings, which is ſtill extant in MS, in the Cottonian library. He died, in 1491.

THE

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XV.

The Reign of HENRY VIII; containing 37 years and 9 months.

20. HENRY VIII.

1509. HENRY VIII. HENRY VIII, ſon and ſucceſſor to Henry VII, came to the crown, at the age of 18 years, wanting a few months. The lord Herbert, his hiſtorian, affirms, that the king, his father, deſigned him, at firſt, for the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, becauſe, having an elder ſon, there was no likelihood that this would aſcend the throne; and, therefore, continues he, care was taken to inſtruct him, in all parts of learning, requiſite for a prince, that was, one day, to be a churchman. He would have ſpoken more juſtly, if he had only ſaid, that Henry VII, had ſuch a deſign, when he firſt put him upon his ſtudies; but, as the young prince became his heir apparent, at 11 years of age, it could not be with the ſame view, that he cauſed him to purſue the ſtudy of ſuch parts of learning, as were proper for a clergyman; for, it is more likely, that the king, his father, kept him to his ſtudies, for fear his active and fiery ſpirite ſhould carry him to more dangerous employments. He was only ſon of queen Eliſabeth, heireſs to the houſe of York; and, conſequently, he might have given the king, his father, ſome trouble, had he thought of aſſerting his right, as heir to his mother. However this be, Henry having taken a reliſh for learning, in his younger years, preſerved it ever after; for, he always delighted in peruſing good books, and converſing with the learned, even when the multitude of his affairs ſeemed to divert him from ſuch kind of employments. By this means he made advances, in the ſciences, very uncommon to great princes; for Francis I, his cotemporary, ſtiled by the French hiſtorians, the Father of the Muſes, was much his inferiour in learning. He ſpoke French and Latin very well, and readily; and, he was perfectly skilled, in muſick, as two entire maſſes, compoſed by himſelf, and often ſung in his chapel, do abundantly witneſs. He was exerciſed to the moſt abſtruſe points of the Ariſtotelian philoſophy, which alone, was in vogue, in thoſe days; but he applied himſelf, chiefly, to the ſtudy of divinity, as it was then taught, in the univerſities, all ſtuffed with uſeleſs queſtions. Thomas Aquinas's Summary was his favourite book. 1509.

Henry has a good conceipt of himſelf. This knowledge, which was conſidered as a great accompliſhment, even in ordinary perſons, had an effect upon the young prince, which is not unuſual; for it gave him a good opinion of himſelf, which had but too much influence upon all the actions of his life; and, the exceſſive commendations beſtowed upon him, by all, helped to confirm him, in his conceipt. When he was, yet unexperienced, in the affairs of ſtate, he fancied himſelf very able; and, this preſumption, was the cauſe, of his being often the dupe of thoſe princes, with whom he was concerned, as will more plainly appear, in the ſequel of his reign.

His good qualities. But, in remarking, that this prince had a great deal of ſelf-conceipt, I do not pretend to rob him of, or any ways leſſen the noble qualities he had from nature, or education; for, 1509. for, in his youth, he was very handſome, and expert in all bodily exerciſes, as much, or more, than any prince of his time. Accordingly, he was paſſionately fond of thoſe diverſions, which gave him an opportunity to ſhew his activity. He was courageous, without oſtentation, of a free and open temper, an enemy to fraud and inſincerity, ſcorning to uſe indirect means to compaſs his ends; and, his liberality, perhaps, was as much too great, as the king his father's avarice; for, Henry VII, ſeemed to have been deſirous to heap up money, only to afford his ſon, the pleaſure to ſquander them away, without any diſcretion.

Henry's firſt counſellors. Herbert.

Henry VIII, when he aſcended the throne, being little experienced, in the affairs of the government, he made uſe, at firſt, of the king his father's miniſters and counſellors. The principal were William Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and lord chancellor of England, of whom honourable mention is made by Eraſmus, ſomewhere in his writings; Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretary and lord privy-ſeal, who had been employed, in the late reign, in the niceſt affairs; Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, lord treaſurer of England, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, ſlain at Boſworth-field, fighting for Richard III; George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, lord ſteward of the king's houſhold; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of law; Sir Edward Poynings, knight of the garter, comptroller, whoſe name is ſtill famous, for a ſtatute enacted, in Ireland, in the former reign, whilſt he had the government of that iſland; Sir Charles Somerſet, lord Herbert, of Gower, Chepſtow, and Ragland, lord chamberlain.

Henry VII's funeral. Hall.

Henry VII's funeral, was celebrated, with great magnificence, a few days after his deceaſe; and, his body was interred, at Weſtminſter, in the chapel, built by himſelf, for the adorning of which, he had ſpared no coſt. This chapel paſſed, then, for one of the ſtatelieſt, in Chriſtendom; for, Henry VII, covetous as he was, laid out 14000, ſome ſay, 20,000 l. ſterling; a very conſiderable ſum, in thoſe days, when money was much ſcarcer, in Europe, than at preſent.

While the obſequies were preparing, the new king, privately retired, from his palace of Richmond, to the tower of London, under pretence of withdrawing, on account of the king his father's death; but it was, rather, to ſettle, with his miniſters, ſome affairs, which would not admit of delay; for, whilſt he was thought in his retirement, to be employed, in devotion, he ordered Henry, lord Stafford, brother to the duke of Buckingham, to be apprehended, probably, upon ſome groundleſs ſuſpicion, which ſoon vaniſhed, ſince, ſhortly after, he was created earl of Wiltſhire.

Ruthal is made biſhop of Durham. Act. Pub.

The ſee of Durham, vacant by the tranſlation of Chriſtopher Bambridge, to the archbiſhoprick of York, was conferred on Thomas Ruthal, doctor of law, and one of the privy-council.

A general pardon.

A few days after, the king confirmed his father's general pardon, granted before his deceaſe; but, all offenders, had not the benefit thereof; for, a proclamation, immediately, appeared, in which, the king ſaid, that being informed, his good ſubjects had been oppreſſed, under colour of preſerving the prerogatives of the crown, he gave them leave to bring their complaints, and promiſed them ſatisfaction. The deſign of this proclamation, was not to reſtore to his ſubjects the ſums, unjuſtly extorted, by the late king, but only to encourage them to exhibit their complaints, againſt Empſon and Dudley, the inſtruments made uſe of, by Henry VII, and to give them ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, by puniſhing theſe two miniſters. 1509.

When this proclamation was publiſhed, numberleſs petitions were preſented againſt them. This was what the court wanted, not only becauſe theſe men were odious to the whole nation, but, moreover, to ſhew the people, that the new king intended to rule, in a very different manner, from the king, his father. Upon all theſe petitions, Empſon and Dudley were called before the council, where they were briefly told the principal articles, alledged againſt them. Empſon anſwered for both, "That the accuſation was of a very "new and ſtrange nature; that, generally, "men were proſecuted for acting againſt the "laws, or diſobeying their ſovereign; but, "for their part, they were accuſed by the people, of executing the laws, of which, they "themſelves, were the authors; that, on the "other hand, the king called them to an ac-"count, for obeying his father's orders, un-"heard of crime, the puniſhment of which, "would be apt to throw all his ſubjects into "rebellion; that, if they muſt be puniſhed, "for ſuch offences, he deſired, it might not "be divulged to foreign nations, leſt they "ſhould infer, that the final diſſolution of the "Engliſh government was approaching." To this it was briefly anſwered, "That he had "ſpoke with great freedom; but his eloquence "was fruitleſs, and unſeaſonable; that they "were not accuſed of executing the laws, or "of obeying the king, but of ſtretching the "laws beyond their due bounds, and exceeding their ſovereign's commiſſion; which ac-"cuſations, they had reaſon to fear, were too "well proved." Then they were both committed to the tower. The king was reſolved to make them an example, in order to content the people, who were extremely incenſed againſt them. Thus, their condemnation was reſolved before their appearance, tho' it was not yet known, on what to ground their proceſs. In any other country, an act of ſovereignty to ſend theſe two men to the gallows, would have been ſeen with joy; but it is not the ſame, in England, where the greateſt offenders have privileges, of which they cannot be debarred, without giving the people occaſion to think, that the court is forming projects againſt liberty. It was, therefore, neceſſary, to ſearch for ſome expreſs law, to condemn them; but, upon examining the accuſation, already, brought againſt them, great difficulties occurred; for, it appeared, that tho' they were accuſed of numberleſs offences, nothing could be proved, but their mercileſs execution of the 1509. laws; but, notwithſtanding, they had ſtretched theſe ſame laws, as far as the words would bare, it could not be charged to them, as a crime, ſince they had the king's warrant, in whom the execution of the laws is lodged. It is true, the late king, contrary to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, had acted purſuant to the utmoſt rigour of the ſtatutes; but he might do it; and, if, the former kings, had done otherwiſe, it was more out of condeſcenſion than juſtice; wherefore, theſe two miniſters could not be tried for obeying him; and, beſides, to condemn them for executing their maſter's orders, was, openly, to diſhonour that prince's memory, and renew the remembrance of his ſeverities on his ſubjects; it was, therefore, reſolved, to put them to death, on a falſe accuſation, of intending to withdraw their allegiance from the king, ſince his acceſſion to the crown. It is evident, this accuſation was entirely groundleſs; for, how could two perſons, ſo obnoxious to the whole kingdom, and deprived of all credit, by the deceaſe of Henry VII, think of ſuch a project, and ſtill leſs, put it in execution. In the mean while, it was not ſcrupled to take away their lives, for a forged crime, becauſe they were believed worthy of death, tho' not condemned, by the letter of the law; for, upon this frivolous accuſation, they were brought before their proper judges, and found guilty; whether falſe witneſſes were ſuborned againſt them, or by a mental reſervation, hitherto, unknown, in England, in judgments of this nature. Dudley was tried at London, the 16th of July, but Empſon was not condemned, till the 14th of October, at Northampton; for Henry, either out of ſcruple, or ſome other motive, ſuſpended their execution, till the next year.

They are condemned to die.

A debate about the king's marriage with Catharine of Arragon. Herbert.

Whilſt means were contriving, to execute theſe two miniſters, the king and his council, had a more important affair, to take into conſideration. We have ſeen, in the late reign, prince Arthur's marriage, with Catharine of Arragon; that prince's death, without iſſue; the reaſons inducing Henry VII, to deſire, that prince Henry, become his heir apparent, ſhould marry his brother's widow; the conſent of Ferdinand and Iſabella, father and mother of the princeſs; and, pope Julius's diſpenſation, for the marriage. The true reaſon, why Henry VII. propoſed this match, was, his unwillingneſs to reſtore the 100,000 crowns, received, in part, of Catharine's dower; and he was alſo afraid of loſing the other half, which remained to be paid; for, in ſhort, he foreſaw, that, after the receipt of the whole, the princeſs, his daughter-in-law, would enjoy her ſettlement of the third part of the revenues of the principality of Wales, and the county of Cornwall; but, however, as it was not decent to urge ſuch a motive to the pope, to obtain a diſpenſation, for ſo ſtrange a marriage, which could not but be deemed ſcandalous, it was pretended, to be expedient, to preſerve the peace between Henry VII, and the king and queen of Spain. This was the motive alledged to the pope, which he readily conſidered, as ſufficient, tho' there was too much reaſon to queſtion, whether it was the true one. 1509.

In conſequence of the pope's diſpenſation, Henry and Catharine, were, ſolemnly affianced; however, whether Henry VII, intended only to deceive Ferdinand, and get the remaining 100,000 crowns, or was moved by the remonſtrances of Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, concerning this marriage, he ſo ordered it, that the prince, his ſon, on the very day he was 14 years of age, made in the preſence of certain witneſſes, a proteſtation, in form, againſt the conſent he had given; but this proteſtation was kept ſo ſecret, that it came not to the knowledge of the publick, till it was requiſite, many years after, to divulge it. Upon the news of Henry VII's deceaſe, Ferdinand ſent to the earl of Fuenſalida, his ambaſſador, in England, a very ample power to renew the treaty of alliance, made with the deceaſed king; ordering him, alſo, to demand the confirmation and execution of that which was concluded, for Catharine's ſecond marriage, with prince Henry, now become king of England.

Difficulties about the marriage. Burnet.

The Spaniſh ambaſſador having preſented a memorial, on this occaſion, it was deliberated, in council, whether the king ſhould conſummate his marriage with Catharine. This affair was debated with grear attention. Againſt the marriage, it was alledged, that for a man to marry his brother's widow, was a thing unheard of among Chriſtians; that ſuch a marriage, was contrary to the law of God, and, therefore, it was a queſtion, whether the pope had power to diſpenſe with it. This was the archbiſhop of Canterbury's opinion, who could not forbear conſidering the marriage as really inceſtuous; but Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, was of another mind; for he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon the pope's diſpenſation, and the unlimited power of Chriſt's vicar, affirming, "That the pope's granting a diſ- "penſation, was a certain proof, that he had "the power, and was ſufficient to ſatisfy the "king's conſcience; that no perſon, on earth, "could limit, or ſo much as inquire into the pa- "pal authority; and, tho' ſuch a power ſhould "be aſcribed to a general council, at leaſt, the "council of England could not pretend to it." To theſe arguments, concerning conſcience, the biſhop added others, drawn from reaſons of ſtate, and the king's particular intereſt; for he ſaid, "That, probably, the king would "have, during the courſe of his reign, many "diſputes with France, England's old enemy, "and whether he would attack, or only de- "fend, the alliance, with Spain, was abſo- "lutely neceſſary; that, in ſending back the "the princeſs Catharine, after having affian- "ced her, he would affront Ferdinand, which "he would certainly revenge, by leaguing "with France, and ſuch a league would en- "danger England, or, at leaſt, be extremely "expenſive, to the kingdom; moreover, that, "if the king refuſed to conſummate his mar- "riage, with Catharine, he muſt reſolve, ei- "ther to reſtore her dower, or ſuffer her to "enjoy

1509. " enjoy her ſettlement; but by marrying her, " he would ſave the 100,000 crowns, received " by the king, his father, gain another " 100,000, which the king of Arragon was to " pay, and avoid the great charge he ſhould " be at, in marrying another princeſs, and " conducting her, into England. In fine, " he enlarged upon the ſweet and virtuous " temper of the princeſs of Wales, capable " of making a husband entirely happy." Adding, " there was no room to doubt, that " the princeſs was ſtill a virgin, ſince ſhe her- " ſelf affirmed it, offering even to be tried by " matrons, to ſhew, that ſhe ſpoke the truth."

Henry reſolves to marry Catharine.

All theſe arguments, except the firſt, concerning the diſpenſation, were very ſtrong. As to that, it was ſo dangerous for a churchman to diſpute the pope's authority, eſpecially ſuch a pope as Julius II, who was ſtill in his vigour, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury, durſt not perſiſt, openly, in his opinion; ſo, the king cloſing with the biſhop of Wincheſter's and almoſt the whole council's ſentiments, it was reſolved, he ſhould conſummate his marriage. But, firſt, he demanded of the princeſs, that ſhe ſhould renounce, by a ſolemn act, her dower, of 200,000 crowns, and agree, that the ſum ſhould belong to the king, her husband, to be claimed again, neither by her ſelf nor heirs, nor by king Ferdinand, nor queen Joan, her ſiſter, nor any perſon living, on any pretence, whatſoever. Two days after, the earl of Fuenſalida, made the like renunciation, in the name of Ferdinand and Joan. Catharine's letters patent, wherein ſhe ſtiles herſelf, only princeſs of Wales, dated the 7th of June, it is evident, that the king did not marry her on the third of that month, as hiſtorians affirm, nor ſooner than the day theſe letters were ſigned. Their coronation was ſolemnized on the 24th of the ſame month, and five days after, died, Margaret, counteſs of Richmond and Derby, the king's grandmother.

The death of the counteſs of Richmond. Hall.

In the beginning of his reign, Henry, willingly, left to his council and miniſters, the care and management of his affairs; and, as he was, in peace, with all his neighbours, what paſſed in the kingdom, could not keep him much employed; he, therefore, thought only of ſuch pleaſures and diverſions, as were more ſuitable to his years, than application to buſineſs; and, as he was naturally liberal, his entertainments, at court, were very expenſive. The antient biſhop of Wincheſter, Henry VII's old miniſter, could not help murmuring, to ſee the money laviſhed away, without any neceſſity, which his deceaſed maſter had amaſſed, with ſo much care, pains, and injuſtice, in which he had himſelf been employed. He threw all the blame upon the earl of Surrey, lord treaſurer, who was his rival, in favour, under the late king, and continued to be ſo ſtill, under the preſent, by gaining the affection of his new maſter, by a blind compliance to his will. During Henry VII's life he was more cloſe, and harder to part with money, than the king himſelf. How expreſs ſoever the orders were for payments, he always found difficulties, and by that means made his court admirably to his maſter; but being continued in his poſt, in the preſent reign, he became quite another man; for, he not only paid, without examination, whatever was ordered, but alſo put the king upon ſpending extravagantly; which gained him the favour of the young prince, who was, naturally, addicted to prodigality. The biſhop of Wincheſter openly blamed this conduct, as highly prejudicial to the king's intereſt; but he was little regarded, in a court, where every one was ſtriving to make an advantage of the monarch's liberal temper. In the mean while, his diſcourſes exaſperated more and more, the earl of Surrey, and the young courtiers, againſt him, who never ceaſed to do him ill offices with the king. Thus, the biſhop, who was in ſo great credit, in the late reign, by degrees, loſt it in this. His diſgrace, which ſate heavy upon his mind, threw him upon deviſing means to ſupplant his rival, by introducing, at court, Thomas Wolſey, whoſe qualifications he was no ſtranger to. Wolſey was a clergyman, already, eminent for his merit, tho' he was but a butcher's ſon of Ipſwich. The biſhop of Wincheſter eaſily foreſaw, the king would be in want of perſons about him, fit and able to eaſe him; and as he knew Wolſey's genius, did not queſtion, that, when he was at court, he would render himſelf neceſſary to the king; to which end, he procured him the place of almoner. We ſhall ſee, preſently, that the biſhop was not miſtaken, in his judgment, or, rather, that his foreſight, was far ſhort of Wolſey's fortune,

Wolſey is introduced at court.

About the middle of the year, the treaties, concluded between Henry VII. and the king of Scotland, were confirmed, or renewed, by the biſhop of Murray, who was ſent into England, to congratulate Henry, upon his acceſſion to the throne.

A confirmation of the treaties with Scotland,

The emperor Maximilian ſent, likewiſe, an ambaſſy to Henry, to congratulate him, and confirm the treaties made with Henry VII, in the year 1502.

and with the emperor. Act. Pub.

Chriſtopher Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, being at Rome, where he was gone to have his election confirmed, received a commiſſion, from the new king, to act as his ambaſſador. We ſhall ſee preſently the reaſon, why the pope wanted to have an Engliſh ambaſſador reſide at his court, and why the king was deſirous to be particularly informed of what paſſed in Rome, and, in all Italy.

Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, ambaſſador at Rome. Act. Pub.

The neceſſity of knowing the affairs of Italy.

Theſe were the moſt remarkable tranſactions in England, during the firſt eight months of the reign of Henry VIII. They were for the moſt part domeſtick affairs of little importance, except the king's marriage, which was attended with very great conſequences; but there paſſed abroad matters, of great importance, that became, as it were, the ſource of the troubles, with which almoſt all Chriſtendom was affliſted, for above 50 years, and, wherein England was but too much engaged. For ſome time, the affairs of Europe had begun 1509. gun to have a new face, and what happened, this year, in Italy, put them on ſuch a foot, as obliged almoſt every monarch to be concerned therein. Henry VIII. unhappily entangled himſelf, in the troubles of that country, which ſeem to have had no relation to him; which makes the knowledge of the affairs of Italy, ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that without it, neither the events of this reign can be underſtood, nor the king's character fully known. It will, therefore, be neceſſary to enlarge upon this ſubject, which concerns, not only the Hiſtory of England, but alſo thoſe of France, Spain, Germany, Switzerland; the principal events whereof, for a long time, flowed, properly, from the affairs of Italy. It is true, moſt of the authors who have wrote the hiſtories of theſe ſtates, ſuppoſed their readers to be acquainted with what paſſed, in Italy, at the ſame time. They have, thereby, much ſhortened their works; but withal, rendered them very obſcure to thoſe, who were not ſo fully inſtructed, as they have ſuppoſed. For my part I intend another courſe. Since the affairs of Italy, are the foundation of moſt of the occurrences, in Europe, and, particularly, in England, during almoſt one half of the ſixteenth century, I think they ought to be ſpoken of ſomething largely, which, alone, can clear the particular hiſtories, proceeding from thence; but to avoid tedious digreſſions, which would be indiſpenſible, in the ſequel, it is neceſſary to give, firſt, a diſtinct idea of the ſtate of Italy, as well as of the character and intereſts of the ſeveral princes.

The ſtate of Italy, Milan, and Naples.

I have, already, related, in the preceding reign, how Lewis XII, aſſiſted by the Venetians, conquered the duchy of Milan upon Ludovico Sforza, pretending a right to it, as grandſon to Valentina Viſconti, daughter to John Galeazzo I, duke of Milan; and I have, likewiſe, had occaſion to ſpeak of the conqueſt of Naples, by the united arms of Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, and of the means uſed, by the laſt, to remain ſole maſter of that kingdom; it will ſuffice, therefore, to add here, that, tho' Lewis XII. loſt his portion of that conqueſt, he deſiſted not from his pretenſions, but waited for a favourable juncture, to aſſert them. I muſt, now, briefly ſpeak of the other ſtates of Italy; and, firſt, of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

The eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Before the kings of France and Spain had ſet foot in Italy, the popes were as ſovereign arbiters of that country; but it was not ſo much by their temporal arms as their ſpiritual, of which they made frequent uſe. For ſome centuries paſt they had loſt great part of the demeſnes formerly belonging to the church; for about the end of the reign of Otho I, the eccleſiaſtical ſtate conſiſted of the city of Rome and its territory, with Tuſcany, the Marquiſate of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, Ravenna, all La Romagna, and the whole country, in general, comprized, formerly, under the Exarchate; but, afterwards, during the wars of the Guelphs and Gibelins, the the emperors wreſted, from the popes, all Tuſcany, and ſeveral towns, in other parts. 1509. Some of theſe towns had thought fit to withdraw their obedience from the church, and the popes themſelves, had been forced to grant others in fee, to lords who ſerved them, or from whom they expected aſſiſtance; at length, the emperor Rodolphus I, having ſold liberty to as many cities of Italy as would purchaſe it, there were ſeveral, formerly, belonging to the church, that embraced the opportunity, to ſhake off, at the ſame time, both the emperor's and the pope's yoke. Hence, there were, quickly, in Italy, almoſt as many ſovereignties as cities. The ſtrongeſt ſubdued the weakeſt, and fell, at laſt, themſelves, under the dominion, or rather the tyranny, of ſome of their own citizens, who found means to ſeize the whole power. In this manner, were formed, in Italy, ſeveral petty ſtates, out of the ruins of what the antient kings of Italy, the emperors, and the popes had formerly poſſeſſed.

In the pontificate of Alexander VI, the eccleſiaſtical ſtate was reduced within narrower bounds, than before, tho' the popes had preſerved the ſovereignty of ſeveral cities, of which they were no longer proprietors; of which number were Ravenna, Bologna, Ferrara, Urbino, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro, Imola, Ceſena, Peruſa. Notwithſtanding, all theſe loſſes, they were ſtill very powerful; becauſe their ſpiritual arms, gave them great advantages over their neighbours; moreover, beſides the revenues of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, they had very conſiderable incomes, from all Chriſtendom.

But, when Lewis XII, took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, and Ferdinand of the kingdom of Naples, the affairs of Italy had quite another face; for, then, the temporal power of the popes, was nothing, in compariſon of that of theſe two monarchs, who, beſides their dominions, in Italy, had, moreover, at their command, the forces of two large kingdoms. On the other hand, the Roman pontiffs met with much more oppoſition, when they had a mind to brandiſh their ſpiritual weapons, whoſe force was, in proportion, to the weakneſs of thoſe againſt whom they were darted; for which reaſon, they ſought all ſorts of means to drive the foreigners out of Italy; but, as they could not, by their own ſtrength, execute ſuch a deſign, they were obliged to make uſe of one of theſe kings, to deſtroy the other, in which their policy was frequently deceived; for, they could not humble one, without giving the other a ſuperiority, more deſtructive of their intereſts, than the equality that was between them before. This was the occaſion of all the popes intrigues, for many years, and, likewiſe, an incumbrance, they could never get clear of; for, ſome times, they joined with one, to pull down the other; ſome times, ſetting them at variance, they remained bare ſpectators of the battle; and, ſome times, they called in foreigners, to make the balance incline to the ſide they intended to favour; but, whatever was the ſucceſs of theſe wars, the conqueror was ever formidable

1509. to the pope, and all Italy; wherefore, it is certain, that the conqueſts of Naples and Milan, gave a mortal wound to the temporal power of the popes, and were, alſo, very prejudicial to their ſpiritual authority. As the popes, from this time, had frequent occaſions of quarrel, with the kings of France, now become their neighbours, they ſome times made uſe of their ſpiritual arms, but not with the ſame ſucceſs, as formerly, againſt the ſovereigns of Italy. As they had to deal with princes, who did not eaſily bend, they only gave them occaſion to examine the grounds of the papal authority; and this inquiry was not to the advantage of the popes.

Beſides the intereſt of their ſee, the Roman pontiffs had, alſo, that of their family, of which they were no leſs mindful; every one of them, ſeeking to raiſe his nephews or other relations; all the cities, formerly belonging to the church, being ſo many objects that inflamed their deſires. Alexander VI, who, of all the popes, his predeceſſors, was the leaſt ſcrupulous, had formed the project of making Cæſar Borgia, his baſtard, a great prince, by erecting him a ſtate out of ſeveral cities, or ſtates of la Romagna, which ſtill owned the pope's ſovereignty, and were under his protection. To execute this deſign, it was, that Cæſar Borgia, either by fraud or force, became maſter of Peruſa, Urbino, Imola, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro, Ceſena, under pretence that the poſſeſſors had not been punctual in paying the tribute, or annual relief, to the holy ſee; but Alexander VI. dying, before his ſon was well ſettled in his conqueſts, it happened, during the ſhort pontificate of Pius III, and the interval between his death, and the election of Julius II, that the former owners of theſe cities found means to recover them. This was, chiefly, by the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, who, for their pains, kept Faenza and Rimini.

The character and deſign of Julius II. Guicciard.

Julius II, who ſucceeded Pius III, formed for the houſe of la Rovere, of which he was, the ſame deſigns as Alexander VI. had formed for that of Borgia; for, he was no ſooner, in the papal chair, than he began the execution of his projects, with haughtily acquainting the Venetians, that his intention was to re-annex to the church, whatever had been alienated, and, therefore, they muſt reſtore Faenza and Rimini; and, upon their refuſal, he demanded aid of the emperor Maximilian. This was, properly, the firſt riſe of the league of Cambray, mentioned in the preceding reign, and of which, I ſhall be obliged to ſpeak more fully hereafter.

The republick of Venice. Bembo.

The ſenate of Venice, had long paſſed for the wiſeſt and moſt politick aſſembly, in the world; for, by their prudence and abilities, they had, by degrees, formed, in Terra Firma, a ſtate, which, being ſupported by a very ſtrong naval force, was inferior to none, in Italy. This ſtate conſiſted of Friuli, Treviſo, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Bergamo, Breſcia, Crema, Cremona, Rovigo, and the whole Poleſin, Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini. Moſt of theſe cities, with their territories were formerly part of the kingdom of Italy. After that, they fell under the dominion of the German emperors, who governed them, by their vicars. At length, theſe vicars either became ſovereigns, or, being expelled, the cities had recovered their liberty, to fall again, afterwards, under the tyranny of ſome private perſons, who had uſurped an abſolute power. Of theſe the Venetians had required them, either by money or force of arms; but, however, it be, when they had made theſe acquiſitions, it is certain, the authority of the emperors was ſeldom acknowledged; but, in the interim, the emperors ſtill preſerved their pretenſions to all theſe cities, as having been formerly parts of the empire, or rather the kingdom of Italy, enjoyed by ſome of their predeceſſors. Friuli was conquered upon the church of Aquileia, to whom it was preſented by Otho I; Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini, formerly belonged to the ſee of Rome; Rovigo and the Poleſin, were conquered on the duke of Ferrara; Cremona and Gietradadda, appertained to the duchy of Milan, having been reſigned by Lewis XII; Breſcia was taken from the dukes of Milan, and Crema freely given up by duke Francis Sforza. They had alſo, in the kingdom of Naples, five maritime places, mortgaged to them, by one of the kings. 1509.

Bologna. Alberti.

Bologna was a rich and powerful city, yet, not ſo conſiderable as formerly; for civil diſcords, had, at length, obliged her, on certain terms, to ſubmit to the church; after which, the city was governed by the pope's legates, ſent thither, from time to time; but their dominion ſuffered frequent interruptions; for the legates, oppreſſing the people, forced them, often, to ſhake off their yoke, and expel them the city; but, it was only to fall again, under the tyranny of the heads of faction, who, by their oppreſſions, obliged them, to have recourſe to the pope, and receive his legates again; which was very often the caſe. In the year 1440, Hannibal Bentivoglio, became ſo powerful, that he was little leſs than a ſovereign; for, from that time, to 1506, ſome one of the family of Bentivoglio, held the government, tho' the pope's legates, were, ſtill admitted, and honoured, yet, without having any real power. At laſt, Julius II, not content with this ſhadow of authority, demanded, in 1506, aid of Lewis XII, to make himſelf maſter of Bologna. Tho' France had, hitherto, protected the Bentivoglio's, Lewis, however, ordered the governor of Milan, to ſend the pope troops; whereupon, John Bentivoglio, head of that houſe, ſeeing himſelf forſaken by the king of France, quitted Bologna, with all his family, and retired to Milan, leaving the city to the pope.

Ferrara. Sardi.

The duchy of Ferrara was a fief of the church, long poſſeſſed by the family of Eſte, who were inveſted, by the pope, and paid an annual relief, in money. This petty ſtate, bordering on the pope and the Venetians, being very convenient for both, preſerved itſelf by their mutual jealouſy; yet, however, the Venetians had taken from them Rovigo, and 1509.

the Poleſin; but Julius II. had greater views, thinking, ſeriouſly, of annexing the whole duchy, to the church.

Modena and Reggio.
G. Batt. Pigna.

Modena and Reggio were, likewiſe, under the dominion of the family of Eſte, not, as belonging to the duchy of Ferrara, but as a diſtinct ſtate, acquired, by that family, after being poſſeſſed of Ferrara. Julius II, had alſo pretenſions to theſe two cities, as having been formerly given to the church by Charlemaign, and, perhaps, on the ſole pretence, that they belonged to the duke of Ferrara, his vaſſal.

Urbino.
Cimarelli.

Urbino had formerly been of the church's demean; but, the popes, had not, for many, years, challenged more, than the right of ſovereignty. Cæſar Borgia had ſeized this city, and expelled duke Guidobaldi Ubaldini, who recovered it, after the deceaſe of Alexander VI. As Guidobaldi had no children, Julius II. perſuaded him, to adopt Francis Maria de la Rovere, nephew to both, ſon of the pope's brother and the duke's ſiſter; and, ſoon after, la Rorere became duke of Urbino, by the death of Guidobaldi, his adoptive father.

Parma and Placentia.
Alberti.

Parma and Placentia had been under the dominion of ſeveral lords, or tyrants, till, at laſt, they became ſubject to the dukes of Milan. Lewis XII. took poſſeſſion of them, after his conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

Florence.
Machiavel.

Florence, a very potent city, and the chief of Tuſcany, was fallen, at length, under the dominion of the family of Medicis; but, afterwards, an oppoſite faction prevailing, they were driven from thence, and were, now, in exile, attempting, however, from time to time, to be reſtored to their country.

Piſa.
Alberti.

Piſa had been, formerly, a very conſiderable city, on account of her naval forces; but, at length, becoming ſubject to the dukes of Milan, a baſtard of that family, to whom it was given, ſold it to the Florentines. The Piſani were againſt the ſale, and would have recovered their liberty, but were overcome. After that, Charles VIII, in his way to Naples, reſtored Piſa to her liberty; but, as ſoon as the Florentines had nothing more to fear from him, they beſieged Piſa, tho' aſſiſted by the Venetians, and the ſiege was, ſtill, carrying on, at the time of the league of Cambray.

Genoa.
Pizarro.

The city of Genoa, after ſundry revolutions, cauſed by the factions of the Fregoſa's, and the Adorno's, was, at length, fallen into the hands of the French, in the reign of Charles VII; after which, Lewis XI. reſigned it, to the duke of Milan; but, Lewis XII. ſeized it, after his conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

Motives of the league of Cambray againſt the Venetians.

This ſurvey of the ſtates of Italy ſhews, that it was, then, divided between ſix powers, viz. pope Julius II, Lewis XII, king of France and duke of Milan, Ferdinand, king of Arragon and Naples, the republicks of Venice and Florence, and the duke of Ferrara. To theſe ſix, may be added, the emperor Maximilian, who without poſſeſſing a foot of land, in Italy, had, however, pretenſions to whatever was, formerly, enjoyed by the emperors, and particularly to the firm Land State of the Venetians, whoſe ruin the other ſix were equally concerned to procure. The emperor pretended, that all the Venetian dominions, belonged to the empire. He paſſionately deſired to wreſt ſome place from them, that would give him entrance, into Italy, and an opportunity to reeſtabliſh the imperial power, in that country. Julius II, as I ſaid, had formed a deſign to annex, to the church, whatever had been alienated, and, eſpecially, the duchy of Ferrara, and the towns of la Romagna. This project could be effected only, by the deſtruction of the Venetians, ever attentive to oppoſe the growth of their neighbours; and, beſides, the pope had a mind to begin with them, and wreſt from them Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimina. Lewis XII, repenting of yielding to them Cremona and Gierradadda, wanted to diſpoſſeſs them, and, under that pretence, to get poſſeſſion, alſo, of Crema, Bergamo, and Breſcia, and, in general, of whatever had belonged to the dukes of Milan. Ferdinand was deſirous to recover, without money, the five maritime towns of the kingdom of Naples, which had been mortgaged to them; moreover, his intereſt required, that there ſhould be, always, commotions, in Italy, to hinder Lewis XII, from thinking of the conqueſt of Naples. The duke of Ferrara wiſhed to recover Rovigo, and the Poleſin. And, laſtly, the Florentines, obſtinately reſolved on the ſiege of Piſa, protected and defended, by the Venetians, could deſire nothing more advantageous, than to ſee that republick unable to aſſiſt the Piſani.

Hiſt. della legha di Cambray.

League of Cambray.

Such were the motives of the league, formed againſt Venice, of which the pope, emperor, and king of France, were the chief promoters; and, for the greater ſecrecy, they ſpread a report, that the emperor, as guardian to Charles of Auſtria, his grandſon, had agreed, that his differences with the duke of Gueldres, ſhould be amicably adjuſted; to which purpoſe, the city of Cambray was appointed for the place of congreſs, thereby to intimate, that the affairs of Flanders would only be conſidered. Here the famous league againſt the republick of Venice was concluded; and the better, to deceive the ſpies, was ſigned, at firſt, a treaty of perpetual peace between the pope, emperor, Lewis XII, and Ferdinand, which was, indeed, made publick; but a ſecond treaty, which care was taken not to divulge, contained a league offenſive and defenſive, againſt the Venetians; the principal articles whereof, were as follows:

The treaties of the allies againſt Venice.
Bembo.

In the firſt place, it was ſet forth, in the preamble, that the Turks having begun to make great progreſs, in Europe, it was abſolutely neceſſary, for the Chriſtian princes, to join their forces againſt them, but, the Venetians, by their continual incroachments, greatly hindered this union; from which, it was concluded, that they were to be diſpoſſeſſed of what they had uſurped. This was the pious motive of the league. And, therefore, it was agreed, that of their ſpoils, the pope ſhould have Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini; the emperor, as ſuch, Verona, Vicenza, and 1509. and Padua, and as duke of Auſtria, Treviſo, and Friuli; Lewis XII, as duke of Milan, Cremona, Gierradadda, Breſcia, Crema, and Bergamo; the king of Arragon, Manfredonia, Trani, Monopili, Brindiſi, and Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples; and, that the dukes of Ferrara and Savoy, and the marqueſs of Mantua, ſhould be admitted into the league, if they deſired it; the firſt, to recover Rovigo, and the Poleſin; the ſecond, to get the kingdom of Cyprus out of the hands of the Venetians; and the third, to obtain ſatisfaction, concerning certain pretenſions he had upon Venice. Laſtly, that all, who had any claim upon the Venetians, ſhould be received into the league, as principals, if they declared themſelves, within three months. Thus, in order to wage war againſt the Turks, no other means were found, than to ſtrip the Venetians of all their firm Land State, and leave them only the city of Venice.

The projects of the allies. Mezerai.

To accompliſh this deſign, it was agreed, that the king of France, in perſon, ſhould enter the territories of the Venetians, the firſt of April, in the year 1509, with an army of 40,000 men; that the pope ſhould ſend an army into la Romagna; and Ferdinand have one in Lombardy, with a fleet in the gulph; and the emperor attack the Venetians from the ſide of Germany. But, as he had, lately, made a three years truce with them, an admirable expedient was deviſed, to furniſh him with a pretence to break it, which was, that the pope ſhould ſummon him, as the church's advocate, to come and defend the patrimony. In fine, Julius II. engaged to thunder out all the eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt Venice. This league was ſigned, at Cambray, the 10th of December, 1508.

The campaign of the year 1509. Bembo.

The time of executing the projects of the league, being come, Lewis XII, departed from Milan, the beginning of April 1509, with 40,000 men, whilſt the pope's army entered la Romagna, under the conduct of Francis Maria de la Rovere, duke of Urbino; and Raymond of Cardona, threw himſelf into Lombardy, with the king of Arragon's troops; and, at the ſame time, the duke of Ferrara took the field, in the Poleſin; but the emperor contented himſelf, with keeping, at Trent, and ſeeing the reſt of the allies act, in order to be ready to reap the fruit of their labours. In the interim, the Venetians, having, firſt, provided their towns, with ammunition, raiſed an army, under the command of count Pitigliano, their general, whoſe lieutenant was Bartholomew d' Alviano.

The battle of Agnadel. Bembo.

The van of the French army, commanded by Chaumont, paſſed the Adda, the 15th of April, and, at the ſame time, the pope excommunicated the Venetians, and put the city of Venice under an interdict. On the 14th of May, was fought, the battle of Gierradadda or Agnadel, between the French and Venetians, contrary to the opinion of count Pitigliano, tho' general, in chief, of the Venetians, and to all reaſon; for the Venetians having no refuge but their army, it was, by no means, proper, to hazard a battle. But the heat of Bartholomew d' Alviano prevailed over his general's prudence. The Venetian army was entirely defeated, and Alviano taken priſoner. Whereupon, the Venetians, being no longer able to reſiſt their enemies, Lewis, in leſs than a fortnight, became maſter of Cremona, Peſchiera, Crema, Breſcia, Bergamo, and of all the places, in general, formerly belonging to the Milaneſe; moreover, Vicenza, Verona, and Padua, ſent him their keys; but, as by the treaty of Cambray, theſe places were in the emperor's diviſion, he ſent their deputies to him. Maximilian was then, at Trent, expecting the ſucceſs of the confederate army; and, upon the arrival of the deputies, ordered his troops to advance towards the ſtate of Venice, and, as theſe cities freely opened their gates, he had only to garriſon them. Treviſo, alone, refuſed him admittance, remaining firm to the Venetians, tho' reduced to the laſt extremity. Friuli, and the towns of Iſtria, followed the ſtream, and ſubmitted to the emperor. On the other hand, the duke of Urbino, with the pope's army, took Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, Rimini, whilſt the duke of Ferrara became maſter of Rovigo, and the marqueſs of Mantua of ſome caſtles that were convenient for him. Thus, in a moment, the Venetians ſaw all their dominions reduced to the city of Venice, with five places, in Naples, which could not be of great ſervice to them; however, they were not entirely diſcouraged amidſt ſo many misfortunes, tho' the ſenate and people, were under the greateſt conſternation; for their chief care, was, to draw together, their ſcattered troops, and uſe their utmoſt, to diſſolve ſo deſtructive a league.

1509. The Venetians loſe all their ſtate of Terra-firma.

Piſa ſurrenders. Guicciard.

The misfortune, befallen the Venetians, occaſioned the loſs of Piſa; for this city, deſpairing of being relieved by Venice, or the king of France, who had deſerted her, at laſt, ſubmitted to the Florentines, after having endured a long ſiege.

Lewis XII. returns to France. Guicciard.

Lewis XII, having obtained his ends, returned into France, after he had detached a body of troops, commanded by la Paliſſe, to join the emperor, who, probably, had not men enough to ſupply his garriſons, and, to keep an army, in the field, againſt the Venetians, who were drawing together again. Upon the king of France's departure, affairs began to have a new face; for the Venetians took Padua, by ſurpriſe, and kept it ever after; moreover, they found means to ſend, into Friuli, an army, which employed the greateſt part of Maximilian's troops; in ſhort, they appeaſed the pope, by their humble ſubmiſſion, and obtained his poſitive promiſe, to give them abſolution, and take off the interdict, upon certan conditions, which they could not refuſe him. On the other hand, Ferdinand, who had not yet reaped any benefit, by the league, was eaſily gained, by the offer of the five cities, held by the Venetians, in the kingdom of Naples.

The emperor beſieges Padua, in vain.

Whilſt the ſenate was endeavouring to draw off the pope and king of Arragon, from the league, the emperor, with his own and la Paliſſe's forces, laid ſiege to Padua; but, after an 1509. an unſucceſsful aſſault, raiſed it, and retired into Germany; and, at the ſame time, the French general, alſo, returned to Milan; by which means, the Venetians had ſome time to breathe, and continue negotiations, with the pope, which made them hope, that the iſſue of the war would not be ſo fatal, as they had, hitherto, imagined.

The pope's uneaſineſs. Mezerai.

The union of the king of France, with the emperor, made Julius II. extremely uneaſy; for he beheld the French king ſo firmly ſettled, in the duchy of Milan, that it ſeemed impoſſible to diſlodge him; and, on the other hand, the emperor could not but be formidable to him, ſince he had an entrance into Italy, by means of Verona and Vicenza; beſides, he did not know what to think of the powerful aid lent that prince, by Lewis XII, to compleat the ruin of the Venetians; and, he was not without fear, that theſe two monarchs had made a private treaty together, to ſhare all Italy. In the mean while, he hardly ſaw, how theſe two powerful princes could be withſtood; for Venice was come to nothing; the Florentines were drained by the long Piſan war; and, as for Ferdinand, it was, almoſt impoſſible to treat with him, without being liable to be deceived; for he knew how to improve all the treaties, and ſcrupled not to forſake his allies, when it was for his intereſt. Notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the pope formed the deſign of putting the affairs of Italy on another foot, in order to execute his firſt projects; he, therefore, reſolved to agree and league with the Venetians; to take off the king of Arragon from the league of Cambray, by inveſting him with Naples; to uſe his endeavours to ſet the emperor and Lewis at variance; to bring a Swiſs army, into the Milaneſe; and, in a word, to perſuade the new king of England, to make a diverſion, in France. Theſe were the pope's deſigns, the ſucceſs of which, we ſhall ſee hereafter. He began with making peace with the Venetians, upon three conditions; firſt, that they ſhould relinquiſh all their pretenſions to the cities of la Romagna, lately taken from them; ſecondly, that they ſhould renounce the right of placing, in Ferrara, a certain magiſtrate called Biſdomina; thirdly, that they ſhould leave the navigation of the gulph free to all the ſubjects of the church. In the preſent circumſtances of Venice, there were no other conditions to be impoſed upon her.

He makes peace with the Venetians. Bembo.

After ſo long a digreſſion, concerning the affairs of Italy, which, however, is not uſeleſs, as will appear in the ſequel, we muſt return to the affairs of England.

1510. The parliament meets. Herbert.

The parliament being aſſembled, the 21ſt of January, 1510, the commons repreſented to the king, that certain ſtatutes, made in the former parliaments, had given occaſion to the king his father's miniſters, to oppreſs the people, by putting forced interpretations upon them, contrary to the natural meaning of the words; that, therefore, it was neceſſary, to ſoften, or ſo explain them, as to prevent ſuch abuſes, for the future. Henry readily agreed to what was propoſed by the commons, not only becauſe the thing was juſt, in itſelf, but, chiefly, becauſe it naturally led to his deſign of having Empſon and Dudley attainted, by the parliament; and, tho' theſe men had been already condemned by their proper judges, the king had deferred the execution of the ſentence; for he could not help having ſome ſcruple, in cauſing them to be accuſed of a crime, of which he knew them not to be guilty; nevertheleſs, he wanted to ſacrifice them to the people, without incurring the imputation of a falſe accuſation, and, likewiſe, to vindicate his father's memory, by intimating, that they had exceeded his orders To reconcile theſe two things, he ſo managed it, that the parliament paſſed an act of attainder againſt them; that is, they were condemned to die, by the authority of the king and parliament, without any particular mention of the crimes they had incurred, or of the proofs on which their ſentence was founded. This method, which, till then, had ſeldom been practiſed, was but too frequently uſed in the ſequel of this reign; ſo dangerous is it to eſtabliſh ſuch precedents. However, Henry having ſtill ſome difficulty, to overcome his ſcruples, delayed their execution, till the following Auguſt. 1510.

An act of attainder againſt Empſon and Dudley. Hall.

Whilſt the parliament was, thus employed, Lewis ſent ambaſſadors to England, to renew, with the king, the treaties made with the late king. As by the peace of Eſtaples, after the death of one of the two kings of France or England, his ſucceſſor was to ſignify to the ſurvivor, whether he would continue the alliance, it was Henry's buſineſs to inform Lewis XII, of his intention; but he had done nothing towards it. However, as he was a lively young prince, and abounding in riches, Lewis thought, doubtleſs, it would be proper to prevent him, for fear he might engage, in deſigns, deſtructive of the welfare of France; therefore, his ambaſſadors concluded, with Henry, a new treaty of alliance, wherein the former treaties were not mentioned; by which it was agreed, that the peace between the two kings, ſhould laſt till the deceaſe of the ſhorteſt liver; that it ſhould be confirmed by the ſtates-general of France, and the parliament of England; and, that each of the two kings ſhould take care to obtain the pope's approbation, with a previous ſentence of excommunication, againſt the firſt violator.

A new treaty of alliance between Lewis XII. and Henry VIII. Act. Pub.

There was nothing ſaid, in this new treaty, of the 745000 crowns, that Charles VIII. had promiſed to pay to Henry VII, or his ſucceſſors, and for which Lewis XII. himſelf was engaged, by a ſubſequent treaty, becauſe the buſineſs was only to renew the peace between the two preſent kings; however, Henry did not forget to ſecure the debt, by demanding of Lewis letters patent, wherein he promiſed to pay the arrears, by means of 25000 livres every ſix months, till the whole was diſcharged; after which, the peace was ratified and ſworn to, by both the kings.

Julius II, was meditating great projects againſt Lewis XII. The ſucceſs of the league of 1510. of Cambray, tho' he had turned it to his advantage, made him very uneasy; for he saw the French more firmly settled, in Italy, than ever, and Lewis XII. better able to protect the duke of Ferrara. To accomplish his design against France, he, doubtless, wanted assistance; and, to that end, tried to excite all the states of Europe against that kingdom, as will be seen presently. To insinuate himself into the king of England's favour, he sent him, this year, the Golden Rose, which the popes, after solemnly consecrating it, were wont to present to some prince. Probably, also, the king of Arragon, in concert with the pope, began, now, to take measures to engage Henry, his son-in-law, in a league against France.

The pope sends Henry a consecrated rose.

Ferdinand falls off from the league.

The success of the last campaign, made Ferdinand no less uneasy, than the pope; for he was sensible, that Lewis never loved him, nor had any reason to love him, and saw this enemy, since the ruin of the Venetians, in a condition to disturb him, in the possession of Naples. On the other hand, the league of Cambray could not procure him any farther advantages, whereas the offers made him to leave it, were very considerable; for the Venetians agreed to restore him the cities, they possessed, in the kingdom of Naples, and the pope was willing to depart from his claim of 40,000 crowns, and give him the investiture of that kingdom, for a Spanish genet only. This was sufficient to induce him to break his engagements, at Cambray. In all appearance, ever since the end of the last year, he had taken measures with the pope, to form a new league, against France; but, as he never acted publickly, he desired these measures to be kept private, in order to attack Lewis the more irresistibly. To that purpose, on the 6th of January, this year 1510, he commissioned Lewis de Caroz of Villaragud, his ambassador, at London, to treat with Henry VIII, about a stronger alliance, than had, yet, been concluded, between the crowns of England and Spain.

A new treaty of alliance between Henry and Ferdinand. Act. Pub.

Whether Henry could not so soon resolve to conclude this new alliance, with Ferdinand, or was willing, first, to finish his affairs with Lewis XII, it was not till the 24th of May, that the new treaty was signed. It was only a defensive alliance, between the two kings, with a promise of mutual aid, upon occasion; but, Ferdinand, who had his views, caused these words to be inserted; that in case one of the two kings was attacked, by any prince, whatsoever, the other should be obliged to proclaim and wage war against the aggressor, tho' he should be his ally; that, if, one was attacked, by the king of France, the other should be obliged to go against him, in person, with a powerful army. This treaty, secured to Ferdinand, the kingdom of Naples, because, if, Lewis XII, had intended to undertake the conquest, the diversion, he would have been threatened with, from England, would have infallibly kept him from his purpose. But it is hard to conceive, what advantage Henry could reap from such a treaty, since it was not likely, Lewis designed to attack him; so that all the advantage was on Ferdinand's side. It must be either, that Henry's ministers were not very clear-sighted, or he, from a motive of generosity, for a father-in-law, whom he did not, yet, sufficiently know, was imprudently persuaded to this proceeding, the more strange, as he had lately renewed the peace, with France. 1510.

Henry minds only his diversions. Herbert. Hall.

But it must not be thought, that Henry was then a compleat politician; for, he was, yet, young, and minded his diversions more than the publick affairs; there being nothing every day but turnaments, balls, entertainments, consorts of musick, which consumed, by degrees, the 1,800,000 l. sterling, found in the king his father's coffers. He used, likewise, to play, at tennis and dice, with certain strangers, who cheated him of his money, which he discovered, at last, and, tho' a little too late, shamefully chased them from court. He was so passionately fond of musick, that it devoured great part of his time; which, added to the hours he spent, in his studies, and other diversions, left him but little leisure to apply himself to the affairs of the government, the management of which, he willingly left to his ministers, and, therefore, it may be affirmed, that in matter of policy, never prince committed grosser faults, or was more imposed on, than himself, especially, in the first years of his reign.

Wolsey rises at court.

Whilst Henry was wholly addicted to his pleasures, there was a person, gradually, rising, at court, who was, one day, to have an absolute power over him, and to manage all his affairs, as well foreign as domestick; I mean Thomas Wolsey, who was made the king's almoner, last year, and, in the beginning of this, dean of Lincoln. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 30th January, the king gave him a house, in London, formerly Empson's, no inconsiderable present, since the patent mentions 13 gardens belonging thereto. We must now return to the affairs of Italy, which will afford us farther matter, for several years.

The pope's designs.

Julius II, had two grand designs, in his head; the first was, to seize the duchy of Ferrara; the second, to expel the French and Germans out of Italy. His forces alone not being capable to execute these projects, it was necessary to use the assistance of some other princes, and try to engage them in his designs. His scheme was to league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand and Maximilian from the interests of France; to break the league of Cambray; to persuade the king of England to make a diversion, in France; and excite the Switzers to invade the duchy of Milan. He executed all these projects, but not without encountering such difficulties, as would have discouraged any man, less resolute than himself; for, first, he made a private league, with the Venetians, after which, he solemnly gave them absolution, the 24th of January; and then, he secretly agreed, with Ferdinand, by promising him the investiture of Naples. That done, he quarrelled with Lewis XII, 1510. by filling a biſhoprick in Provence, without asking his conſent, contrary to his own promiſe. Lewis complained of it; the pope denied he had promiſed any ſuch thing; and, in ſhort, they came, at laſt, to give one another the lie, in form. This was, preciſely, what the pope wanted, in order to have occaſion to break with him.

He quarrels with Lewis XII, Bembo.

His league with the Venetians, being publickly known, he imperiouſly commanded the duke of Ferrara to renounce the league of Cambray, and join his arms with thoſe of the church. The duke not believing, his being vaſſal to the holy ſee required him to be, thus, blindly devoted to the pope's humours, refuſed to break his alliance with France, and, ſo gave his holineſs the pretence he had long been ſeeking; for, when the duke offered to pay him the tribute, due to the church, for the fief of Ferrara, the pope refuſed it, plainly intimating by that refuſal, he intended to confiſcate the duchy.

and with the duke of Ferrara. Sardi. Mezerai.

In the interim, Ferdinand was ſecretly acting with Henry VIII, his ſon-in-law, to draw him into the pope's intereſts, which were become his own, in conſequence of the deſigns they had formed, in common; but his practices were ſo ſecret, that Lewis XII. never miſtruſted him; for, on the contrary, he wholly confided in the aſſurances, given him, by his ambaſſador, that his deſign was to continue firmly attached, to the league of Cambray.

Ferdinand acts underhand to gain Henry. Herbert.

On the other hand, Julius II, gained the biſhop of Sion, who, having great credit, among th Switzers, found means to ſet them at variance, with France, by perſuading them to require an augmentation of their penſions. Their alliance with that crown being about to expire, they demanded to renew it, that their penſions ſhould be increaſed. Lewis refuſing it, the biſhop of Sion effectually uſed that refuſal, to ſtir them up againſt France, to which the king himſelf, alſo, contributed, by making an alliance with the Griſons. He thereby, ſo provoked the Switzers, that in a diet, at Lucern, they declared for the pope, and reſolved to ſend an army into the duchy of Milan.

In fine, the pope forgot nothing that he thought capable of perſuading the Venetians, to agree with the emperor, at any rate, even to the adviſing them to deliver him Treviſo and Padua. He intimated to them, that the moſt effectual means to drive the French out of the Milaneſe, was to diſengage the emperor from their intereſts; and when once they were out of Italy, it would be eaſy to wreſt from the emperor, not only Treviſo and Padua, but all his other conqueſts; but the Venetians would not run ſuch a riſque.

He tries to reconcile the Venetians to the emperor. Guicciard. Mezerai.

Such were the vaſt projects of the pope. He was ſo private, in his negotiations, that Lewis XII, imagining he had no other deſign, than to ſeize Ferrara, contented himſelf, with ordering Chaumont, governor of Milan, to aid the duke, in caſe he was attacked; but ſoon after, a Ventian fleet and papal army, commanded by Fabricius Colonna, attempting, tho' unſucceſsfully, to ſurpriſe Genoa, Lewis had too much reaſon to ſuſpect, there was ſome grand project formed againſt him; and, therefore, ſent Chaumont orders, to have an eye to his holineſs's proceedings. 1510.

Lewis XII. begins to ſuſpect the pope. Mezerai.

Theſe orders came to Milan, very forunately. Julius II really intended to beſiege Ferrara, and, for that purpoſe, was come to Bologna, till an army, preparing, on ſome pretence, by Raymond of Cardona, at Naples, was ready to join his and the Venetian troops. But Chaumont did not allow him time to execute his deſigns; for, hearing the pope was arrived, at Bologna, he departed from Milan, at the head of an army, and made ſuch ſpeed, that he would have ſurpriſed him there, had he not ſuffered himſelf, to be amuſed with parlies. Whilſt he was treating with the pope's envoys, ſome Venetian troops, in the neighbourhood, entering the city, ſecured it from the danger of being inſulted; whereupon, Chaumont, being not prepared, for ſo important a ſiege, was obliged to retire.

Julius II. is like to be ſurpriſed at Bologna.

Julius II. made great noiſe, at this inſult of the French, and filled all Europe, and, particularly, the court of England, with his complaints. He excommunicated all the generals of the French army, and, preſently after, his and the Venetian gallies, made a ſecond attempt upon Genoa, but with no better ſucceſs than before.

He excommunicates the French generals, and tries to ſurpriſe Genoa. Bizarro.

At the ſame time, 12000 Switzers began their march, in order to enter the Milaneſe, under the command of the biſhop of Sion; but he found the paſſages ſo well guarded, that they deſpaired of ſucceeding in their deſign; ſo, beſides, not receiving from the pope, the money promiſed them, they returned, into their own country.

The Switzers cannot enter the Milaneſe.

War being, thus, proclaimed, between Lewis XII. and the pope, Lewis thought himſelf under no farther reſtraint. He had done his utmoſt to be reconciled with him, even to the offering to abandon the duke of Ferara; but the pope, depending upon Ferdinand, and expecting great aſſiſtance from England, had evaded all his propoſals; wherefore, to ſtop the fury of this impetuous old man, Lewis made a new league with the emperor, promiſing to put him in poſſeſſion of all Italy, except Genoa and Florence. Maximilian had the good fortune, that, in all his leagues, he had ever great advantages, tho' he contributed the leaſt. On this occaſion, Lewis XII. could hardly proceed without him, becauſe it was highly neceſſary to continue the war, in the ſtate of Venice, otherwiſe the Venetians would have been able to give the pope too great an aſſiſtance. The league being concluded at Blois, in Auguſt, Lewis called a ſynod, at Tours, to conſult how he ought to behave to the pope. The ſynod were of opinion, that the king ſhould, once more, offer the pope a reaſonable agreement; and, in caſe of refuſal, might with a ſafe conſcience, wage even an offenſive war with him. Lewis wanted no more to juſtify his intended proceedings; for, ſoon after, he concluded, with Maximilian, a new treaty, whereby they agreed to cauſe a general council to be ſummoned

Lewis XII. joins in a league with the emperor.

1510. moned to Piſa, to depoſe Julius II. To that end, they gained nine cardinals, who readily undertook to call the council, in their own name. Some of theſe cardinals were now with the pope, but found means to leave him, under divers pretences; and, when he would have recalled them, refuſed to obey.

Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy, during the year 1510. I have ſaid nothing of the events of the war, which laſted all this while, between the emperor, aſſiſted by the French king and the Venetians, becauſe theſe particulars are of little ſervice to the Hiſtory; it will, therefore, ſuffice to obſerve, that Chaumont, ſeeing Genoa and Milan in danger, had withdrawn the French troops from the emperor's army, to keep them at Milan. The departure of theſe troops, gave the Venetians ſome reſpite, who, thereby, were enabled to repair ſome loſſes ſuſtained in the beginning of the campaign, and to aſſiſt the pope, who, ſtill, deſigned to beſiege Ferrara.

The pope's forces and Spaniards join.

Chaumont's attempt to ſurpriſe the pope, in Bologna, afforded Raymond of Cardona, viceroy of Naples, a pretence to march to the relief of his holineſs. The pope's troops and the Venetians were, in December, joined by the Spaniſh army, near Modena, which Fabricius Colonna, had taken, in his return from his Genoa expedition. Tho' the ſeaſon was not very proper to enter upon action, the pope was fully reſolved to beſiege Mirandola. This town belonged to the heirs of Joannes Picus of Miranda, with whom he had no conteſt; but, as it lay convenient to favour the ſiege of Ferrara, he would not leave it in his rear, but ordered it to be vigorouſly attacked; and, in ſpite of his age, and the rigour of the ſeaſon, he came himſelf to the ſiege, to animate the troops, by his preſence; and, the town ſurrendering, at laſt, on the 20th of January, he was pleaſed to enter through the breach.

Lewis complained to Ferdinand of his aſſiſting the pope; but Ferdinand calling that a triſle, anſwered, that, as vaſſal of the holy ſee, he could not help defending his holineſs's perſon and ſtate; that, beſides, he was not concerned, in the quarrels of the pope and the king of France, but his intention was to keep to the articles of the league of Cambray.

Henry, hitherto, does not ſeem to be concerned with the affairs of Italy, tho' the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, had formed a deſign to engage him therein. He peaceably led a life of pleaſure, without much regarding what paſſed abroad. On the 1ſt of January, 1511, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his queen delivered of a prince, at whoſe birth, there was great rejoicing over all the kingdom; but the joy laſted not long, ſince the young prince died, before the end of February.

1511. The birth of a prince; and his death. Hall.

The deſigns of Ferdinand.

In the interim, Ferdinand was ſeeking means to engage Henry, in the league he intended to make with the pope, againſt France; for Henry was rich and powerful, and, conſequently, his junction to the league, would be of great ſervice, and, extremely incommode France; and, on the other hand, his youth and ſmall experience, made his father-in-law hope, it would not be impoſſible to engage him, by degrees, into projects, with which a king of England ought not to concern himſelf. It is certain, that Ferdinand was, now, in agreement, with the pope; for, all his proceedings, and the ſeveral circumſtances of Hiſtory, renders it ſo plain, that it cannot be doubted. However, he uſed a profound diſſimulation, in this reſpect; for he feigned, to intend only the peace of Europe, that all the princes of Chriſtendom might join together, in a war, againſt the Infidels. But, as he wanted an army and fleet, to execute his deſigns, he pretended, to have very much at heart, the continuance of the war he had undertaken, againſt the Moors; for he had ſent, laſt year, on the coaſts of Africa, a fleet, under the conduct of Peter of Navarre; and, ſhortly after, he reinforced it, with ſome troops, commanded by a ſon of the duke of Alva, who, endeavouring to land at Gelves, was ſlain, and all his men cut in pieces. Ferdinand made uſe of this ill ſucceſs, to cover his preparations againſt France; for, under pretence of being revenged on the Moors, he aſſembled an army, and equipped a fleet, which he pretended to ſend, into Africa, but was, however, deſigned for Italy; and, as it was not, yet, time to diſcover his intentions, he carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to demand of Henry, his ſon-in-law, 1000 Engliſh archers, to ſerve in his pretended expedition. Weak aid! to be ſent for ſo far, and at ſo great charge, if he had really intended to uſe them. Henry, not perceiving his deſigns, readily complied with his requeſt, and appointed Sir Thomas Darcy, on whom, at the ſame time, he conferred the title of baron, to command that ſmall body; and, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Ferdinand's letter of thanks to Henry, for this aid, and, for his advice, not to hazard his perſon, in the undertaking; advice, continued he, that he could not follow, becauſe religion was concerned; and yet, it ſoon appeared, he had never intended any ſuch thing, ſince he employed, againſt France, the very forces, which ſeemed to be deſigned againſt the Moors. 1511.

They try to get Henry into the league againſt France.

Nothing more was wanting, to conclude the projected league, againſt Lewis XII, but to gain the king of England, which was ſtrenuouſly endeavoured, during the beginning of the year 1511; for, the Venetians ſent him an ambaſſador, under pretence of thanking him for his care, to reconcile them to the pope, deſiring him, likewiſe, in their credentials, dated the 2d of March, to give credit to what their ambaſſador ſhould impart to him, which could relate only to the intended league; and, about the ſame time, it was, that the pope conferred the dignity of cardinal on Chriſtopher Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, and ambaſſador, at Rome, in a promotion the 11th of March, at Ravenna. All the hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, that Bambridge was made cardinal, purely, for endeavouring to ſet Henry at variance, with France; and Matthew Skinner, biſhop of Sion, was promoted Bambridge is made cardinal.

1511. moted to the ſame honour, for his paſt and future ſervices, of the like nature; for, in thoſe days, it was neither learning nor virtue that raiſed clergymen to the cardinalate, but ſolely their abilities in temporal affairs, joined to an entire ſubmiſſion to the pope.

Henry engages with the allies.

The methods that were uſed to engage Henry, in the Italian league, had, at length, the deſired ſucceſs. In all appearance, it was repreſented to him, that he was highly concerned to oppoſe the progreſs of the king of France, who was, already, become too powerful, by the conqueſt of the duchy of Milan, and the ruin of the Venetians. However this be, it appears, that, about the middle of the year, Henry was now determined to follow the ſuggeſtions of the pope and Ferdinand; for, in June, he appointed commiſſioners, to take care, that the militia of the kingdom were provided with good arms, and ready to ſerve, on the firſt notice, which it was cuſtomary to order, only when a war was foreſeen; and the reaſon, alledged by the king, for theſe orders, plainly ſhew what was his deſign; for, he ſaid, tho' the nation was in perfect tranquillity, nevertheleſs, as the arms were commonly ſuffered to ruſt, in time of peace, he wiſhed that his ſubjects would be in a readineſs to ſerve him, as well againſt invaſions, if any were intended, as in defence of his allies. Theſe laſt words could regard only the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians; from whence it may be inferred, that the king had now given his word. But the ſequel will ſhew it more clearly.

He guards againſt Scotland.

The antient and ſtrict union, between France and Scotland, gave Henry juſt cauſe to fear, that as ſoon as the war with France was begun, the king of Scotland, as ally of Lewis XII, would interpoſe in the quarrel; and, therefore, to remove all pretence of rupture, he took care to appoint commiſſioners, with power, to repair all the outrages committed, ſince the late peace; but his precautions proved ineffectual; for, an accident, this year, afforded the king of Scotland, afterwards, that pretence of breach, which Henry would have prevented.

The cauſe of a quarrel between England and Scotland. Hall.

Andrew Breton, a Scotch merchant, complaining to the king of Scotland, that the Portugueſe had killed his father, and ſeized his ſhip, the king gave him letters of mark, after having, in vain, ſought redreſs from the court of Portugal; whereupon, Breton equipped two ſtout ſhips, and found means to make himſelf amends for his loſſes, by falling upon all the Portugal ſhips, trading to Flanders and England. The Portugal ambaſſador, reſiding at London, complained to the council, and repreſented, that ſince the king of England pretended to the ſovereignty of the narrow ſeas, it was but reaſonable he ſhould protect the foreign ſhips that came into the channel; upon which complaint, the king equipped two large men of war, and gave the command of them to the two ſons of the earl of Surrey, with orders to take the Scotch pyrate. Theſe two lords watched him ſo narrowly, that they met with him, at laſt, as he was returning from Flanders to Scotland. Breton fought deſperately, but was killed in the fight, and his two ſhips taken and brought into England. The king of Scotland hearing of this, ſent and demanded the two ſhips, with ſpeedy reparation of the outrage committed againſt the peace; but the ambaſſadors were told, that pyrates were not included in the peace, and that, to puniſh ſuch people, according to their deſerts, was no breach of treaty. Probably, Breton had made himſelf more than amends, for the damage he had ſuſtained, as it too frequently happens, on ſuch occaſions; but, however, king James, not being able to obtain any thing from the court of England, proteſted againſt the injuſtice, being determined to reſent it, the firſt opportunity. 1511.

The pope rejects Lewis's offers. P. Daniel.

I left Julius II, after the taking of Mirandola, reſolved on the ſiege of Ferrara, and only waited the return of good weather. Tho' Lewis XII. was in good meaſure ignorant of what paſſed in Spain and England, he knew, however, enough, not to doubt, that the pope was endeavouring to raiſe him enemies, on all ſides; for he was even ſatisfied, that, tho' he ſeemed to have no other deſign, than to become maſter of Ferrara, yet that was only the firſt ſtep to ſome greater project. In the mean while, he was very much embarraſſed; for he had, properly, nothing to gain upon the pope, unleſs he would ſeize the church's patrimony; but he had a great deal to loſe, beſides the troubles which the obſtinate and haughty temper of the pope might create him; wherefore, he reſolved to try all poſſible ways to be reconciled with him; and, to that end, whilſt the pope was employed, in the ſiege of Mirandola, he made him ſome overtures, by Chaumont; but the pope would hearken to nothing, and continued the ſiege, till he forced the town to capitulate. At laſt, Lewis ſeeing there was no proſpect of a reconciliation, ordered Chaumont to regard him no longer, and, at any rate, ſupport the duke of Ferrara. Chaumont receiving theſe orders, takes the field, in the midſt of winter. His army, joined by the duke of Ferrara, was not ſo numerous as the forces of the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, but, compoſed of ſo good troops, that the allies durſt never venture a battle, tho' it was offered them more than once. In the interim, the pope was greatly embarraſſed; for, inſtead of quietly preparing for the ſiege of Ferrara, he was forced to keep the field, during the winter, without knowing, even, how to ſave Modena, which was in danger of a ſiege. Ferdinand, who foreſaw what trouble that place would give the pope, had adviſed him to reſign it to the emperor; nay, that affair had been negotiated, but without ſucceſs, becauſe Maximilian would receive it only as a place held of the empire, to which the pope would not conſent; but, at laſt, on Chaumont's approach to beſiege it, the pope was willing to deliver it, as the emperor deſired, becauſe it was not to be ſaved, without hazarding 1511. ing a battle. The terms of this bargain, are not, preciſely, known; but, from thenceforward, all the emperor's proceedings, gave occaſion to ſuſpect, Modena was acquired upon conditions, very prejudicial to the king of France, his ally. 1511.

Ferdinand's diſſimulation.

The king of Arragon pretending to be, in alliance with France, he would not declare againſt her, till he had ſecured the king of England, with whom he was privately negotiating a treaty, which required a long diſcuſſion. Indeed, his troops, that were to ſerve the pope but three months, according to the terms of the inveſtiture of Naples, were, ſtill, joined with thoſe of the allies; but he pretended, that the viceroy of Naples acted contrary to his orders, in remaining in the pope's army longer than he was commanded. In the mean while, the army was preſſed by Chaumont and the duke of Ferrara, who followed them cloſe, and endeavoured to provoke them to a battle; ſo, that to gain time, Ferdinand, who, would, ſtill, paſs for a neutral prince, and well affected to the repoſe of Italy, propoſed a congreſs, at Mantua, for a peace. The pope, immediately, accepted the overture. The emperor agreed to it, likewiſe; and, Lewis XII. durſt not reject it, leaſt he ſhould be charged with being the ſole author of the troubles of Italy. It is certain, if, at this juncture, inſtead of ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed, by a negotiation, the ſole aim of which, was to rob him of the opportunity of puſhing his enemies, had ordered his troops to advance, he would have over-run the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate; with ſo great terror had his arms inſpired the allies; but he had to manage his ſubjects, as well as his queen, who conſidered a war, with the head of the church, as a crime, tho' there was but too much provocation. He had himſelf, likewiſe, ſcruples, on that account, which he could not eaſily ſurmount; but, however, he was willing to try once more, whether the propoſed congreſs of Mantua, would produce ſome good effect; he hoped, at leaſt, that the breaking off the negotiation, in caſe it was not ſucceſsful, would fully juſtify him. The congreſs produced the effect, expected by the allies, that is, it cauſed the French to loſe a great deal of time, to no purpoſe.

The emperor ſides, privately, with the pope. Guicciard.

A few days before the congreſs of Mantua, the biſhop of Gurck, who was to be there, from the emperor, had a conference, at Bologna, with the pope, after which, they pretended to part, in great diſcontent; but what followed, plainly ſhewed the contrary, ſince the emperor never after did any thing agreeable to his alliance with Lewis XII; however, he conſented that the council of Piſa ſhould be called, in his name, and the ſummons ſet up, at Modena, and ſeveral other places belonging to him, becauſe it was not yet time, to declare himſelf. The ſummons ran, that Julius II, having refuſed to call a council, according to the decree of Conſtance, the cardinals were empowered, by the ſame decree, to ſummon a council, in their own name; and, therefore, with the conſent of the emperor and the king of France, they ordered the council to meet the 1ſt of September, in the city of Piſa, to endeavour the reformation of the church, in the head and members.

Lewis ſuſpects the emperor and king of Arragon.

The biſhop of Gurck's conference, with the pope, and the breaking up of the congreſs of Mantua, made the king of France greatly ſuſpect the emperor; and, on the other hand, he could not help fearing the king of Arragon, knowing, by experience, what was to be expected from him; for, he ſaw him making great preparations, under colour of the Aſrican war, and knew, alſo, that, notwithſtanding his daily aſſurances, that he would not concern himſelf, with the troubles of Italy, he was uſing his utmoſt endeavours to procure a peace, between the emperor and the Venetians; that is, properly ſpeaking, he was labouring to diſengage Maximilian from the intereſt of France. In ſhort, Ferdinand ſent him brotherly admonitions, to make his peace, with the pope, and not draw on himſelf the juſt reproach of waging an unnatural war, with the common father of Chriſtians. Lewis could not but conſider theſe remonſtrances, as a ſort of proteſtation to aſſiſt the pope, in caſe of need; yet, at the ſame time, he could not believe he would engage in ſuch an undertaking, without being ſecure of the emperor. Theſe things made him uneaſy, being apprehenſive, that he ſhould, at laſt, be the dupe of the pope, emperor, and Ferdinand; ſo, for fear of being prevented, he gave expreſs orders to Triulzi, who commanded his army, in the room of Chaumont, lately deceaſed, to take all the advantages of the allies that lay in his power.

Triulzi takes Concordia.

Triulzi, upon this order, aſſaulted and took Concordia, in the beginning of May, at the time of the calling of the council of Piſa was every where poſted up. Then he endeavoured, by ſeveral marches, to oblige the allies to a battle, without being able to ſucceed; and, at laſt, he reſolved to approach Bologna; not that he believed himſelf in a condition to beſiege the city, but to draw the allies from their advantageous poſts, and give the Bolonnois opportunity to riſe, in favour of the Bentivoglio's, whom he brought with him. The pope had, now, done his utmoſt, to perſuade the generals of the allies to hazard a battle, without being able to prevail, ſo much did they dread engaging with the French; wherefore, knowing how the army ſtood diſpoſed, and diſtruſting the Bolonnois, who loved him not, he retired to Ravenna, leaving, in Bologna, the cardinal of Pavia, his prime miniſter. He was no ſooner gone, but a tumult aroſe in the city, during which, the citizens called in their old maſters, the Bentivoglio's, and put them in poſſeſſion of the government. The cardinal of Pavia had taken to flight, the moment he perceived their reſolution. On the other hand, the army of the allies, advancing to one of the gates of Bologna, and hearing the Bentivoglio's were admitted, and the legate withdrawn, ran away in confuſion, leaving, in the camp, their artillery, baggage, and ammunition; upon which, the inhabitants 1511. sallying out, and joining with the peasants, compleatly stripped the scattered army, and rendered it entirely unserviceable, for several months. The duke of Ferrara improving this opportunity, very easily recovered the places, lately taken from him, by the allies.

The cardinal of Pavia stabbed by the duke of Urbino. Guicciard.

Amidst all these mortfications, the pope, still, met with another, which sensibly touched him; for the cardinal of Pavia, was stabbed, by the duke of Urbino, who taxed him with being the cause of the loss of Bologna; and the pope's concern was the greater, as he durst not punish, in the person of his nephew, a crime he would have thought worthy of the severest treatment, had it been committed by any other hand. His army being dispersed, and his designs on Ferrara vanished, he quitted Ravenna, and retired to Rome; and, in his way, he had the frequent mortification, to see the papers posted up, for the calling of the council of Pisa, wherein he was himself summoned to appear, in person.

Lewis orders his army to retire to Milan. Guicciard.

It was universally expected, that Lewis XII. would pursue his successes; and, certainly, in the then situation of Italy, it was his own fault, that he was not master of Rome; for the pope had no remedy, speedy enough, to free himself from his sad condition, Ferdinand being too remote; the Venetians, likewise, were unable to lend him a sufficient assistance; and the emperor was not powerful enough, to save him, had he been willing to attempt it; also Genoa, Bologna, Florence, Milan, were in the hands of his enemies; but Lewis, either through scruple, or some other motive, instead of pushing his point, ordered Triulzi to retire to Milan, with the army, and, even disband part of the troops. Probably, he was willing to deprive the pope of the pretence of exciting all Christendom against him, and publishing, that he intended to seize Rome, and all Italy. He was very justly apprehensive of this, from the pope, since it was, in effect, the foundation, or rather the pretence of the league formed, some months after, against France. Triulzi was no sooner, at Milan, than Ferdinand's fleet arrived, at Naples, with about 3000 men, who were soon to be followed, by a more considerable body.

Julius II. offers to agree with Lewis XII.

It was not difficult to perceive, that the king of Arragon had sent his fleet to Naples, to support the pope's interests, and give jealousy to the king of France. Julius II, who was better informed than any man, revived at the news, and the rather, as he well judged, that Ferdinand would not have been altogether assured of the king of England. Since the loss of Bologna, and the rout of his army, he had seemed willing to consent to an agreement, with France, and, tho' he had made overtures more like a conqueror, than one conquered, Lewis had accepted them, on condition, they were approved by the emperor; but when the pope found, the Spanish fleet was at Naples, and Ferdinand began to declare himself, he added new terms, to those he had already proposed, and plainly shewed, that he was no longer for peace. This conduct put Lewis XII. beyond all patience; so, despairing to agree with so obstinate an enemy, 1511. he ordered Triulzi, to send supplies to Bentivoglio, to guard Bologna, and, some time after, took Bologna and the Bentivoglio's under his protection. On the other hand, tho' he was not obliged to assist the emperor, unless he came into Italy, in person, he added, however, to the German troops, in the state of Venice, a strong reinforcement under, the conduct of la Palisse. Mean while, the pope having certain advice of the good inclination of the kings of Arragon and England, in his favour, resolved to summon a general council, in opposition to that of Pisa; and, to that end, he published a bull, wherein, having first excused the neglect the schismatick cardinals laid to his charge, and inveighed against their insolence, he called a council to be held, at the Lateran, in Rome, the 19th of April, 1512.

The doubtful behaviour of the emperor.

Since the bishop of Gurck's conference, with the pope, Maximilian's conduct was so doubtful, that it was difficult to judge, certainly, of it. He had agreed to the calling of the council of Pisa, which was done with his express consent; but he had not yet, appointed ambassadors, neither was it known, that any German bishop was preparing to go thither; moreover, he had promised to command, in person, in Italy, and lead thither, a strong reinforcement; but he remained immoveable, continuing at Inspruck, yet, without shewing any thoughts, either of the council of Pisa, or the war with Italy. In the interim, the conquests that were expected to be made upon the Venetians, were to be all his. Thus in the present posture of the affairs of Italy, Lewis XII. saw the burden of the war laid upon him alone, without his daring, almost, to complain to the emperor, for fear he should join with his enemies. Indeed, Maximilian was strongly solicited by the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians themselves, who offered him a good sum, to induce him to desist from his pretensions, to their dominions; but, probably, he was not, yet, resolved, and knowing the league that was forming against France, was willing, according to custom, to let the two parties proceed, in order to take, afterwards, that side which best suited with his interest; which, doubtless, was the cause of his preserving a good understanding, with Lewis XII, in consenting to the calling of the council of Pisa, and, also, of reserving a means to be reconciled to the pope, in sending neither bishops, or ambassadors to the council; and, thus, remaining, almost, equally suspected, by both parties, he waited till the success of the war, or the offers from both sides, should engage him to declare for one or other.

Uncertainty of the affairs of Italy.

In the interim, affairs continuing, still, in the same situation, the pope and the Venetians were, alone, in open war, with France. The emperor seemed to float between both sides. The king of Arragon had, hitherto, done nothing more, than afforded hopes, that he would join the league, when concluded. But, it was not so yet, every one fearing to engage

in

1511. in it, unſeaſonably; for Julius II. and Ferdinand, knew one another too well, to confide in each other, each endeavouring to make the other ſubſervient to his deſigns, and was afraid, at the ſame time, of being deceived. Ferdinand had, ſtill, in France, an ambaſſador, who endeavoured to perſuade the king, that the preparations, in Spain, concerned only the Moors; and, on the other hand, the pope had not ſo quarrelled, with Lewis XII, but that he had ſtill left him ſome hopes, and continued a ſort of negotiation with him, by means of the biſhop of Murray, the Scotch ambaſſador, who did the office of mediator. Ferdinand was afraid, in caſe the pope made a ſeparate peace with France, the kingdom of Naples would be in danger; and, the pope, had no leſs reaſon to fear, that Ferdinand, to ſecure the quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, would forſake the intereſts of the church, and leave him expoſed to the mercy of the king of France; in which caſe, the pope would have nothing to expect from England. Thus, affairs were come to that paſs, that it was neceſſary either, that each ſhould quickly make a ſeparate treaty, or both, jointly, declare themſelves, not to remain in this ſtate of uncertainty; and, therefore, Ferdinand began, at laſt, to pull off the mask, a little more, by ſending to Naples, the troops he pretended to deſign for Africa, in order to hinder the pope from thinking of a ſeparate agreement with France.

The opening of the council of Piſa. Guicciard.

Whilſt the pope and Ferdinand were, thus, ſounding each other, the cardinals, who had ſummoned the council to Piſa, and were come to Milan, thought fit to open it by commiſſioners; but this was only for form's ſake, to keep to the day appointed. Never was general council ſo thin; for the biſhops of France were not yet arrived, and there was no likelihood of any from Germany. The pope was ſo enraged, when he heard the council was opened at Piſa, that, in his paſſion with the Florentines, for ſuffering the council to meet, in one of their towns, he excommunicated them, as well as the Piſans, and put both the cities under an interdict; but the Florentines forced the prieſts to celebrate divine ſervice, leaving to private perſons, the liberty to obſerve or reject the interdict.

Henry promiſes to enter into the league. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

It was difficult for Julius II. and Ferdinand, to continue long, in their preſent ſituation, without cauſing mutual ſuſpicions, capable of changing the face of affairs. The reaſon, which had, hitherto, with-held Ferdinand, viz. his uncertainty, with regard to the king of England, was now vaniſhed; for Henry, after long ſuſpenſe, had, at laſt, poſitively promiſed, to enter into the league againſt France; upon which, the negotiation of the league advanced more in one month, than in a whole year before. It was a conſtant rule with Ferdinand, to cover all his projects with the cloke of religion, little caring, that after the execution, his artifices were diſcovered; for, the fleet and army, he had prepared, in Spain, had for pretence, a war with the Infidels; and when he was going to declare publickly againſt France, he failed not to uſe the pretence of protecting the church, againſt the outrages of Lewis; for, as ſoon as he had gained the king of England, they jointly ſent ambaſſadors to Lewis, to require him to leave the pope unmoleſted, intimating, that, as Chriſtian princes, they could not diſpenſe with protecting the church, diſturbed by his ambition. Lewis ſaw, plainly, that their meaſures being now taken, it would be too late to juſtify his conduct; and, therefore, choſe to return a haughty anſwer, which was, preciſely, what his enemies wanted.

Henry's and Ferdinand's ambaſſy to Lewis XII.

Soon after, on the 4th of October, the pope, Ferdinand, and Venetians, concluded a league, at Rome, leaving a place for the king of England, who had ſhewn his deſire to be included. Indeed, cardinal Bambridge was concerned in the negotiation as ambaſſador of England; but he was ordered not to ſign the treaty, becauſe Henry expected to make a private one, more agreeable to the intereſts of England, than that which concerned Italy only. By this treaty, the pope promiſed to find, for the ſervice of the league, 600 men at arms, 500 light horſe, 6000 foot, and 20,000 ducats a month; the Venetians 800 men at arms, 1000 light horſe, 8000 foot, and to pay monthly 20,000 ducats; and, Ferdinand 1200 men at arms, 1000 light horſe, 10,000 foot, and 20,000 ducats a month. It is true, neither the king of France, or the duke of Ferrara, were named, in the treaty, as enemies of the allies; but it was eaſy to perceive it, ſince the intent of the league was to reſtore to the pope, the city of Bologna, and whatever belonged to the holy ſee, and to make war on all perſons, that ſhould offer to hinder it. A place was left for the emperor, in caſe he would enter into it; and Raymond of Cardona, viceroy of Naples, was declared general of the league.

The league againſt France concluded at Rome. Guicciard.

Whilſt the world was in expectation of the effect of this league, the council of Piſa was ſolemnly opened, in that city, by the cardinals, who had convened it, and ſome biſhops of France and Milan. The firſt ſeſſion was held the 4th of November, tho' the pope had excommunicated the cardinals, and deprived them of their dignity; and the ſecond was held the 11th of the ſame month; but becauſe there was a commotion, that day, in the city, the cardinals and biſhops were ſo terrified, that on the morrow, they removed the council to Milan, where they expected to be more out of danger. Indeed, the inhabitants of Piſa could not look, on a council, with a good eye, which expoſed them to an excommunication and interdict, tho' it was not in their power to oppoſe the orders of the Florentines, their ſovereigns.

A more ſolemn opening of the council of Piſa. Guicciard.

I obſerved, that the Switzers were at variance, with Lewis XII, by the practices of the cardinal of Sion, or rather of the pope himſelf, who ſet him to work. Their firſt attempt to enter the Milaneſe proving unſucceſsful, they reſolved, this year, to levy 16000 men, the cardinal of Sion having poſitively promiſed them money, at their entrance into Italy, and that the army of the allies would employ the French, in la Romagna; and, as this levy could not be ready, till the beginning of the winter,

The Switzers march into the Milaneſe. Guicciard.

1511. winter, they began their march, in November, and penetrated as far as Vareſe. Gaſton de Foix, nephew of Lewis XII, governor of Milan, was ſo deſtitute of troops, that he knew not how to oppoſe their paſſage; however, with the few men he had, he took the field, to annoy them and obſtruct, their march; but it was not poſſible for him to hinder them from coming to the very gates of Milan. The French had now began to furniſh the caſtle, with ammunition, in order to quit the city, when, ſuddenly, the Switzers hearing no news of the pope, or the army of the allies, which they thought to be aſſembled, in la Romagna, retired to their own country, after burning ſome villages. If the pope had not diſappointed them of the money he had promiſed them; and, if the army of the allies had acted, in la Romagna, Milan, Bologna, and Ferrara, would have been in great danger, ſince the French were, at that time, very weak, in thoſe parts, la Paliſſe being then, in the emperor's army, with a large body of the king's beſt troops.

False policy of Henry VIII. to meddle with the affairs of Italy.

Nothing could be more advantageous to England, than to ſee the forces of France turned againſt Italy. The conqueſt of the duchy of Milan was leſs beneficial to Lewis XII. than to England; for, it procured England, a ſettled tranquillity, whereas it expoſed France to perpetual troubles, and an immenſe expence; wherefore it was policy, in Henry, to ſuffer the French, Germans, Italians, and Spaniards, to battle it, in Italy, without involving himſelf in a war, which could never procure him any advantage. To the time I am ſpeaking of, the kings of England had taken care not to meddle with the affairs of Italy, if we except Henry III, who, being unfortunately deſirous of making his ſecond ſon, king of Sicily, ruined his own kingdom, to execute that extravagant project. But he was not a prince to be imitated, by his ſucceſſors. The advantages of this policy, were ſo manifeſt to all the Engliſh, that it required no leſs than a Ferdinand, the ableſt and moſt ſubtle prince of his age, to make them ſwerve from it.

This prince had joined with the pope, ever ſince the beginning of the year 1510, or, perhaps, the end of the preceding, and yet had been near two years, without declaring himſelf. This delay, proceeded only from his deſire to ſecure England firſt, that Henry might make a diverſion, in France, which would oblige Lewis to neglect the affairs of Italy; and, this diverſion muſt have been advantageous to Ferdinand, ſince it would remove from Italy, or, at leaſt, weaken, a very formidable rival. But it is hard to conceive wherein it could be ſerviceable to England; for, on the contrary, there ſeemed to be ſeveral very ſtrong reaſons to divert Henry from ſuch a deſign, without mentioning the peace he had lately renewed with France, and confirmed by a ſolemn oath; which, probably, was the cauſe of his ſo long deferring the concluſion of the league I ſhall ſpeak of hereafter. Indeed, it was not poſſible, but that ſome of the king's council were clear-ſighted enough to ſee, that this league was no ways advantageous to England, whatſoever colour was given thereto. 1511.

Whilſt this negotiation languiſhed, in England, new occurrences put Ferdinand upon taking freſh meaſures, and contriving all ſorts of ways to ſucceed with Henry. Lewis XII. perſiſted in his deſign to hold the council of Piſa, as was ſaid, and that cauſed Julius II. to convene another, at the Lateran, and excommunicate by the ſame bull, all princes and others, who adhered to the firſt. Among theſe princes, was John d' Albret, king of Navarre, who being allied to Lewis XII, blindly followed the directions of the court of France. The king of Navarre had no ſooner declared for the council of Piſa, than Ferdinand, on that pretence, formed the deſign to ſeize his whole kingdom, and make Henry, his ſon-in-law, the inſtrument to execute it; and, to that end he gave Henry to underſtand, that a fair opportunity offered to recover Guienne, taken, by France, from one of his predeceſſors, ſince the league that was going to be concluded, in Italy, would find Lewis XII ſo much employment, that, probably, he would not be able to defend his own country. But, as the diſtance of Guienne might deter Henry from attempting this conqueſt, Ferdinand, out of affection, very willingly promiſed to ſupply him with troops, tranſport-ſhips, artillery, proviſions, ammunition, without requiring any thing for himſelf, but the ſole pleaſure of procuring his ſon-in-law, ſo great an advantage. This offer opened the eyes of Henry and his council *. The acquiſition of Guienne ſeemed to them a thing ſo advantageous, and, alſo, ſo glorious, in the beginning of this reign, that the king, without any farther difficulty, entered into the league propoſed by the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians. Such was the real motive that induced the court of England to break the peace, lately renewed with France, without alledging any other reaſon, than the protection granted, by Lewis, to the Bentivoglio's, and the calling of the unlawful aſſembly of Piſa; as if England was concerned to help the pope to Bologna, and oppoſe, with arms, a council, conſiſting of 20 French biſhops, without power and credit, even in the very place where they were aſſembled. But, we ſhall ſee, preſently, how Henry was the dupe of his affectionate father-in-law, and, how Ferdinand politickly made uſe of him, to ſerve his own ends, without giving himſelf the leaſt trouble about his ſon-in-law's affairs.

When Ferdinand had gained Henry, he concluded, at Rome, with the pope and the Venetians, the fore-mentioned league. In this treaty of Rome, it was expreſly ſaid, that all

* The lord Herbert affirms, that ſome of the council, who more ſeriouſly weighed the buſineſs, were againſt a war with France, and more particularly, for a reaſon that England ſhould never forget: "Let us, therefore, ſays one "of the council, leave off our attempts againſt the Terra-firma; for the natural ſituation of iſlands, ſeems not to ſort "with conqueſts, of that kind. England alone is a juſt empire. Or, when we would enlarge ourſelves, let it be "that way we can, and to which it ſeems the eternal Providence hath deſtined us; and, that is, by ſea.".

A league between Henry and Ferdinand, for the conqueſt of Guienne. Act. Pub.

About ſix weeks after, Henry and Ferdinand concluded, at London, a private league, for the conqueſt of Guienne. This was a conſequence of the firſt, on the ſuppoſition, that the depriving the king of France of that province, was a good means to ſerve and protect the church of God, the great and principal aim of the allies. If ever God's holy name was openly and ſhameleſly taken in vain, it is in the preambles of theſe two treaties; for, in the firſt, the pope proteſted, that his ſole aim, in deſiring Bologna, and the other ſtates which belonged to the church, was to reſtore Italy to her former tranquillity, that all Chriſtians might join their forces againſt the Infidels, as he had ever wiſhed, and ſtill did wiſh, with all his heart. Thus, to make war upon the Infidels, it was neceſſary, that Italy ſhould be free from troubles, which could not be hoped till the pope had executed his ambitious projects.

The articles of the league of London, between Henry and Ferdinand.

In the ſecond treaty, Henry and Ferdinand ſet forth, "That they had made alliances "with all Chriſtian princes, ſolely to be enabled to wage war with the enemies of "Chriſt; and, for that purpoſe, were now employed, in preparing powerful armies by "land and ſea; but, ſuddenly, when they "they leaſt expected it, they were told, that "the king of France's troops were beſieging "Bologna, where the pope, old and infirm, "lay ſeized with a grievous diſtemper, and "attended by all his cardinals; that being "extremely afflicted at this news, they had "beſought the king of France, by letters and "ambaſſadors, to give over his deſign; that "the pope had offered him the pardon of all "his ſins, provided only, that he would abſtain from the patrimony of the church, "ceaſe to inflame the ſchiſm, and adhere to "the council of Lateran; but that all this, had "been to no purpoſe. On the contrary, he "had made himſelf maſter of Bologna, by "the treachery of ſome of the inhabitants; "twice routed the army of the holy church of "Rome, and, in contempt of the holy ſee, "called a council, after having bribed ſome "of the cardinals. That ſince, the pope had "ſent a legate to him, to demand only, that "he would forbear to attack the church; that "the legate not prevailing, the two kings of "England and Spain had ſent ambaſſadors, to "adviſe him, amicably, to deſiſt from his attempts, and be reconciled with the pope, or "elſe they could do no leſs than undertake "the protection of the church; but that their "advice had been ſlighted. That upon all "theſe conſiderations, the two kings perfectly knowing how detrimental ſuch an ambition might prove to the catholick faith, the "church of God, and the welfare of Chriſtendom, had thought proper to agree on the "following articles, to the praiſe and glory of "almighty God, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and "the whole triumphant court of heaven, for "the defence, exaltation, increaſe of the catholick faith, the Chriſtian religion, the holy Roman church, which was unjuſtly oppreſſed, and on the frequent inſtances, exhortations, and admonitions of the pope, "the head thereof." The ſubſtance of this pious treaty was as follows: 1511.

I. The two kings took upon them, the defence and protection of the holy Roman church, againſt all perſons that ſhould attack her.

II. Ferdinand, as catholick king, and to diſcharge his duty to God and the church, promiſed to take arms in her defence, in Italy.

In the IIId article, it was ſaid, that the pope and the ſacred college had judged, that, in order, to deliver the church from the oppreſſion ſhe groaned under, it was neceſſary to wage war upon the king of France, not only in Italy, but in ſuch of his provinces alſo, as bordered upon the two allies; and, therefore, it was agreed, that they ſhould carry their arms into Guienne, and conquer that province for the crown of England, and that Henry, in aſſiſting the church, might, at the ſame time, recover what belonged to him; and, to that purpoſe, as ſoon as Ferdinand ſhould have actually declared againſt the kingdom of France, and taken arms, in defence of the church, Henry, at a proper ſeaſon, ſhould proclaim war againſt the ſame prince, in defence of the ſame church.

To perform this article, Henry promiſed to ſend into Guienne, ſome time in April, 1512, a body of 6000 foot, under the conduct of a good general; to maintain them at his own expence, and not recall them, without the conſent of Ferdinand. The king of Arragon, on his part, bound himſelf to find 500 men at arms, 1500 light-horſe, 4000 foot, on the ſame terms; moreover, he engaged to furniſh the Engliſh troops, with proviſions and ammunition, at a moderate price; and, it was farther agreed, that each of the two kings ſhould ſend a fleet to ſea, with 3000 good ſoldiers, for ſix months, beſides the mariners; and that neither ſhould recall his fleet, without the other's conſent.

IV. That Ferdinand ſhould find 40 ſhips, at a reaſonable rate, to tranſport the Engliſh forces.

V. That, in caſe the allies ſhould take any places, in Guienne and elſewhere, they ſhould be delivered to him of the two kings, who had a prior title to the ſame.

VI. That, if either of the two kings ſhould be attacked, out of Guienne, they ſhould, jointly, take care of the defence of the country of him, who wanted aſſiſtance, ſincerely, and with all their power.

VII. That the two kings conſidering, that the pope had called a council, at Rome, which all Chriſtian princes ought to obey, and ſend ambaſſadors to, and it was ſaid, that the king of France perſiſted in his deſign to continue the council ſummoned to Piſa, they agreed to adhere to whatever ſhould be decreed by the council of Lateran, and oppoſe that of Piſa, with all its favourers and adherents.

1511. VIII. That neither of the two kings ſhould make peace or truce, without a mutual conſent.

IX. That by this, the former treaties ſhould not be deemed void, but, on the contrary, remain in full force.

X. That it ſhould be ratified within four months, by Henry, and Ferdinand, in his own and the name of queen Jane, his daughter.

Imprudence of Henry and his council.

Henry and his council thought, doubtleſs, that they had made a very advantageous treaty, ſince it was to procure them the duchy of Guienne, and Ferdinand demanded nothing for himſelf, as if he had acted, purely, from a motive of religion, and out of affection to his ſon-in-law, tho', in reality, he had conſulted only his own intereſt; and, as for the pope's affairs, about which, both kings ſeemed to be ſo greatly concerned, it may be affirmed, they did not ſo much as think of them, as it afterwards appeared; but they wanted that pretence to dazzle the eyes of the publick, tho' in all appearance, the world was not ſo blind, as to imagine, that two great kings ſhould take arms, on account, to diſſolve a council, which called itſelf general, compoſed of a few biſhops, of one nation only, and ſo little regarded, that even, at Milan, where it was removed, the government was obliged to make uſe of their whole authority, to procure its reception.

Lewis's ſuſpicions of the emperor. Guicciard.

During theſe tranſactions, the emperor gave the king of France ſo much cauſe to ſuſpect his ſincerity, that only neceſſity obliged him to feign any farther confidence in him; for there was no German biſhop come to the council; and when the emperor was preſſed on that ſubject, he anſwered, it was neceſſary, firſt, to have the approbation of the diet of the empire, which he did not doubt of obtaining; that tho' he ſhould ſend biſhops from his hereditary dominions, to Piſa, it would be more prejudicial than advantageous to the council, ſince it would give occaſion to imagine, he deſpaired to obtain the diet's conſent. On the other hand, inſtead of commanding, in perſon, his army, in the ſtate of Venice, as he had promiſed, he left all to the French troops, who were come to his aid; and, in ſhort, whilſt he liſtened to the offers of the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, he told the French ambaſſador, that he was ready to march to Rome, at the head of an army, provided his maſter would ſend him a ſtrong re-inforcement, and a ſum of money, proportionable to the greatneſs of the undertaking. In the midſt of all theſe uncertainties, Lewis knew not what to truſt to; for he could look on Maximilian, but as an ally, ready to abandon him, if he found it more for his intereſt to join with his enemies; in which caſe, all the emperor's conqueſts upon the Venetians, would be ſo many loſſes to France. In the interim, the ſupplies he lent him, were very expenſive, and yet, he durſt not afford him a pretence to change ſides. Thus, Lewis ſaw himſelf upon the point of being attacked, by all the forces of the pope, the king of Spain, and the Venetians, without any hope of aſſiſtance from the emperor; and, as for England, tho' he was yet ignorant of the treaty of London, and Henry's ambaſſador poſitively denied, that his maſter intended to be concerned, all Henry's proceedings were plain indications, that he would ſoon declare againſt him. 1511.

The king of Arragon's army joins the pope and Venetians. Guicciard.

In the interim, the pope, who had ever in view, the taking of Bologna and Ferrara, was very preſſing with the viceroy of Naples, to advance with his troops, and take the command of the confederate army; but, notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations, the junction could not be, till the middle of December; and, even then, the Naples artillery, being not yet arrived, the army could only be employed in ſome trifling expeditions, in la Romagna, with which, ended the year 1511. It is time, now, to return to the affairs of England.

Tho' Henry had not, yet, proclaimed war with France, Lewis XII. knew what he was to expect; for he had good intelligence, by means of one Buonviſo, a merchant of Lucca, who being a bankrupt, was retired into England, where he had obtained ſo much favour from the pope, as to be made a kind of agent. This man, being corrupted by France, diſcovered to Lewis the ſecrets, the pope was ſometmes obliged to truſt him with; and hence it was, that the court of France was informed of many things, which the Engliſh would have concealed from them; and, it was, probably, by this means, that the king of France had the firſt notice of the league concluded, at London, tho' it was made a great ſecret; but ſoon after, he had no more occaſion for ſpies, to know Henry's intentions.

1512. Henry acquaints the parliament with his deſign, and obtains an aid of money. Herbert. Hall.

The parliament being met, the fourth of February, Henry communicated his deſign of making war upon France, proteſting, his ſole aim was, to free the pope from the king of France's oppreſſion, and, eſpecially, to cauſe the ſchiſmatical council of Piſa, now removed to Milan, to be diſſolved. Tho' this war, undertaken, as the king himſelf ſaid, ſolely to oblige the pope, was little agreeable to the intereſt of England, the parliament, however, gave the king a large ſubſidy. In all appearance, the leading members of the houſe of commons, being informed of the true reaſons, ſo ordered it, that the reſt came into their opinion; for, otherwiſe, it would have been difficult to make them to perceive the neceſſity of England's engaging in a war with France, to reſtore Bologna to the pope, and diſſolve a council, ſo inconſiderable as that of Piſa. Before the parliament broke up, the king was pleaſed to reſtore John Dudley, ſon to Edmund Dudley, to the rank and honours his family had been deprived of, by the father's attainder; from which time, he had, always, an affection for him, and, at length, towards the end of his reign, made him lord admiral of England.

Henry ſends ambaſſadors to the council of Lateran. Act. Pub.

The war Henry intended to undertake againſt France, having for pretence, the diſſolving of the council of Piſa, he could not diſpenſe with acknowledging that of Lateran, and 1512. and ſending thither ambaſſadors; he, therefore, made choice of Silveſter, biſhop of Worceſter, with Sir Robert Wingfield, and commiſſioned them to agree, in his name, to whatever ſhould be judged neceſſary for the reformation of the church, as well in the head, as in the members. This clauſe was only to caſt a miſt before people's eyes, ſince nothing, certainly, was farther from the pope's thoughts, than to endeavour, in this council, either his own, or the church's reformation.

The marqueſs of Dorſet leads an army into Spain. Act. Pub.

The time being come, to execute the deſigns, agreed by Henry and Ferdinand, in the treaty of London, Henry gave the command of his fleet, to Sir Edward Howard, ſon and heir to the earl of Surrey, and of his army, which was to act on land, to Thomas Grey, marqueſs of Dorſet. All the troops that were to ſerve in the Guienne expedition, being embarqued, about the end of May, in Spaniſh veſſels, arrived the 8th of June, at Paſſage, in the province of Guipuſcoa, where the marqueſs of Dorſet landed thoſe he was to command. The lord Herbert ſays, theſe troops conſiſted of 10,000 men, but, probably, he included, in that number, the 3000 that were to ſerve, at ſea, purſuant to the treaty,

The admiral having convoyed the marqueſs of Dorſet to Spain, put to ſea again, and arriving on the coaſt of Bretagne, landed ſome troops, and plundered the country. Henry hearing, the king of France was preparing a great naval armament, ſent a reinforcement to his admiral, which enabled him to make head againſt the French; and, the two fleets meeting, the 10th of Auguſt, came to a furious engagement, which ended in great loſs on both ſides. The Regent, a firſt rate ſhip, and the Cordeliere, commanded by Primauget, being grappled, were both blown up, with loſs of all their men. This accident happened by the deſperate courage of Primauget, who finding he could not ſave his ſhip, ſet fire to the powder.

Ferdinand's private deſign to conquer Navarre.

The treaty of league, concluded at London, ſeemed to be made only to pave the way for Henry, to the conqueſt of Guienne; but Ferdinand had never any ſuch thought; for his ſole aim was to conquer Navarre for himſelf, and employ to that end, the Engliſh troops he had ſent for into Spain; but, as it was by no means proper to inform Henry of ſuch a deſign, he had been obliged to allure him with the hopes of recovering Guienne, in order to induce him to ſend his troops. This is the true reaſon why Ferdinand ſhewed, in the treaty, ſo much diſintereſtedneſs, that all the advantage ſeemed to be on the ſide of England; but the performance was very far from anſwering the engagement.

His many artifices to compaſs his ends. Hall.

The marqueſs of Dorſet, being arrived in Guipuſcoa, found a commiſſioner of the king, who paid him great reſpect, and told him, the duke d' Alva was taking the field, in order to join him; and, indeed, the duke, immediately, put himſelf at the head of the Spaniſh army; but inſtead of joining the Engliſh, who were encamped near Fontarabia, with a deſign to beſiege with him, the city of Bayonne, as was reſolved, he kept, at Logrogno, on the borders of Navarre. He intimated to the Engliſh general, that the king of Navarre, being in alliance with France, it would be very dangerous to attack Bayonne, with Navarre behind them; that whilſt they ſhould be employed in the ſiege, the king of Navarre might introduce the French into his dominions, join with them, and by encamping between the mountains of Navarre and the ſea, cut off the proviſions, which ſhould be brought to the camp before Bayonne, without being obliged to give battle, if he thought proper; that, therefore, it was neceſſary, before they engaged, in the ſiege, to try to gain the king of Navarre, to the intereſt of their maſters.

Theſe reaſons were ſo plauſible, that the marqueſs of Dorſet was eaſily perſuaded, to ſend an Engliſh officer to the king of Navarre, to require him to join with the allies; and, Ferdinand ſummoned him, likewiſe, but more haughtily, to forſake the king of France, and come into the league. The king of Navarre anſwered, he was reſolved to ſtand neutral; but the Engliſh and Spaniards, not being ſatisfied with this anſwer, jointly preſſed him to declare himſelf, or deliver four of his towns for their ſecurity, which that prince would not grant. During theſe negotiations, a French army, commanded by the duke of Longueville, approached the frontiers of Bearn; whereupon the marqueſs of Dorſet complained to Ferdinand, that the time loſt in ſoliciting the king of Navarre, had ſerved only to give the French opportunity, to come and defend their borders, and likewiſe preſſed him to declare, whether he would attack Guienne, according to the treaty of London. Ferdinand replied, prudence would not ſuffer him to ſend his army to Fontarabia, to beſiege Bayonne, and leave his dominions expoſed to the invaſions of the French and Navarrois; that it was much more convenient, to paſs through Navarre, and ſecure three or four places, in order to hinder his enemies from making uſe of that kingdom againſt him; that, therefore, he wiſhed the Engliſh would join the duke of Alva, and his army ſhould make the vanguard, to be expoſed to the firſt dangers; that, however, the ſiege of Bayonne would not be retarded, becauſe there was no queſtion, that the king of Navarre would be glad to be ſomething preſſed, in order to juſtify himſelf to the king of France, when he ſhould enter into the league. The marqueſs of Dorſet, who did not, yet, ſee, into his deſigns, having held a council of war, anſwered, that by his inſtructions, he could undertake nothing againſt the king of Navarre; but, if, the duke of Alva would paſs through that kingdom, he might if he pleaſed; but for his part, being already near Bayonne, he could not think of taking ſo great a compaſs to join him.

The duke of Alva beſieges Pampeluna. Guicciard. Hall.

Ferdinand was not content with this anſwer; for he ſtrongly inſiſted on what he had propoſed, that the Engliſh troops ſhould come, and join 1512. join his army, and, in the mean while, gave orders to the duke of Alva, to beſiege Pampeluna, metropolis of Navarre. During the ſiege, he continually amuſed the marqueſs of Dorſet with poſitive promiſes, that, immediately, after the taking of Pampeluna, the duke of Alva ſhould join him, to beſiege Bayonne. In the interim, the king of Navarre, being unable to defend himſelf, was retired into France, where he made a treaty with Lewis XII, for their common defence; but it coſt him the town of Salvatierra, and all Bearn, which he was forced to deliver to the French.

Pampeluna taken.

Pampeluna having ſurrendered, by capitulation, the 25th of July, Ferdinand, purſuant to his promiſe, ſhould have ordered the duke of Alva to join the Engliſh; but the reſt of the fortified towns, in Navarre, ſerved him, for pretence, to delay the junction; ſo the duke of Alva continued his conqueſts, whilſt the Engliſh troops, tho' without ſtirring from their camp, ſerved as a countenance to his deſigns. And, indeed, tho' the French, who daily received freſh ſupplies, ſaw themſelves ſufficiently ſtrong to withſtand the duke of Alva, they never dared to enter Navarre, for fear of coming between the Engliſh and Spaniards; wherefore, being contented to remain encamped between Bayonne and Salvatierra, they gave the duke of Alva all the leiſure he wanted, to ſubdue almoſt all Navarre.

The marqueſs of Dorſet perceives Ferdinand's artifices.

Then it was, that the marqueſs of Dorſet plainly perceived, that Ferdinand acted with inſincerity, and that his deſign, from the very firſt, was not to invade Guienne, but conquer Navarre. Ferdinand was very ſenſible, his artifice would, at laſt, be diſcovered; ſo, to prevent the complaints, the Engliſh general might make, to the king, his maſter, he ſends an expreſs to England, to give Henry an account, after his manner, of the affairs of that country, and to deſire him to order his general, to act in concert with him. Henry, who had received nothing to the contrary, from the marqueſs, readily ſent Windſor herald, with the deſired orders to the general.

Whilſt the herald was on his journey, the duke of Alva became maſter of St. Juan de Pie del Puerto; and, preſently after the taking of that place, Ferdinand acquainted the marqueſs of Dorſet, that his army was ready to march into Guienne, and deſired him to join the duke of Alva, without delay. But the marqueſs was no longer willing to be deceived; for he knew, that the French army was intrenched, between Bayonne and Salvatierra, with the river Bidaſſoa, in front, which muſt be paſſed within view; and, beſides, Bayonne was ſo well provided, that there was no probability of beſieging it. What Ferdinand, therefore, propoſed, was impracticable, and only a continuation of his artifices. From St. Juan de Pie del Puerto, the right-hand road led into Bearn, and the left to Bayonne; ſo the duke of Alva's intent, was to engage the Engliſh to enter Bearn, with him, under pretence, that there was no other way to draw the enemies from their advantageous poſt, or, at leaſt, to beſiege Salvatierra; but the Engliſh general having no orders to make war upon the king of Navarre, either in Bearn or elſewhere, refuſed to join the Spaniards. Ferdinand reaped this advantage from his refuſal, that he caſt the whole blame upon him, of their not invading Guienne, purſuant to the treaty. After that, the duke of Alva turning back, laid ſiege to Eſtella, the only place that remained to the king of Navarre. 1512.

He prepares to return to England. Hall.

The marqueſs of Dorſet, full of indignation, at theſe proceedings, and conſidering, that his army was daily weakened, by ſickneſs and want of proviſions, which were grown ſcarce, ſince the war, in Navarre, deſired Ferdinand to furniſh him with ſhips, for his return; and, it was, with great difficulty, that he obtained his requeſt, Ferdinand ſtill proteſting againſt his departure, as directly contrary to the treaty; however, he was not ſorry for it, ſince the Engliſh were almoſt become uſeleſs, after the conqueſt of Navarre. In the interim, the marqueſs of Dorſet falling ſick, the lord Thomas Howard took the command of the army; and, at the ſame time, as the troops were a going to embarque, the herald arrived from England, with poſitive orders to the general, to obey the commands of king Ferdinand; but the army mutinying, it was impoſſible to detain the ſoldiers any longer, in Spain, and the embarquation being made, they arrived, in England, in November. Henry was, at firſt, very angry with his general; but being informed of all particulars, during the campaign, plainly ſaw, that Ferdinand had deceived him, and his affected diſintereſtedneſs, in the treaty of league, was only to draw him more eaſily into the ſnare; however, he thought proper to diſſemble, for fear of giving Ferdinand a pretence, to join with France, and leave him, in ſtraits.

Henry perceives he had been impoſed upon.

Before the year was expired, Ferdinand ſaw himſelf in full poſſeſſion of Navarre, tho' the king of France had uſed ſome means to wreſt that conqueſt out of his hands. In December, the king of Navarre, and Francis, duke of Angouleſme, beſieged Pampeluna; but not being able to take the place, were forced to abandon the reſt of the kingdom, to the Spaniards. After Ferdinand was in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he ſought pretences to keep it; but found no better, than a bull of pope Julius II, who excommunicated John d' Albret, king of Navarre, and gave his kingdom, in prey, to the conqueror. Mezerai ſays, that this bull never appeared; but the lord Herbert affirms, it was dated March 1, 1512.

Ferdinand keeps Navarre.

Affairs of Italy. Bembo.

We muſt, now, ſee what paſſed, in Italy, whilſt Ferdinand was conquering Navarre. The confederate army of the pope, king of Arragon, and Venetians, commanded by the viceroy of Naples, taking the field, in December, the pope cauſed the viceroy to be continually preſſed by cardinal John de Medici, his legate, to beſiege Bologna; and, at length, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the viceroy, and the Venetian general, who foreſaw great difficulties 1512. difficulties in the execution of that deſign, the pope's inſtances were to be complied with, and the ſiege of Bologna being reſolved, the army of the allies appeared before the city; but Gaſton de Foix, duke of Namours, and governor of Milan, coming to its relief, compelled the allies to raiſe the ſiege; and, ſome days after he defeated a Venetian army, at Breſcia, and ſlew 8000 men; at laſt, on the 11th of April, finding means to give the allies battle, near Ravenna, he put them to rout, and took the legate priſoner; but was himſelf ſlain, after the battle, in too warmly purſuing a body of Spaniards, who were retreating, in good order. After that prince's death, la Paliſſe took the command of the army, and the next day became maſter of Ravenna; whereupon all the towns of la Romagna, taken by the pope, after the battle of Agnadel, voluntarily ſurrendered to the cardinal of St. Severin, who was in the French army, as legate of the council of Piſa, transferred to Milan.

Gaſton de Foix routs the allies, but is killed himſelf.

The conſternation, at Rome, was ſo great, that the cardinals went in a body, to petition the pope, to make peace with France. But Julius II. had reſſources unknown, perhaps, to the cardinals; ſo, all they could obtain, was to engage him to make ſome feigned advances, in order to gain time, and hinder the French from marching to Rome, as they might eaſily have done, without fear of meeting any obſtacle.

Lewis's affairs decline. Guicciard.

Whilſt Lewis's affairs ſeemed to be in the moſt flouriſhing condition, they were, in reality, going to decay. The Switzers, encouraged by the cardinal of Sion, preparing to exert their utmoſt, to invade the duchy of Milan, la Paliſſe thought it more proper for his maſter's intereſt, to relieve that country, which was deſtitute of troops, than make conqueſts, in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; ſo leaving the cardinal of St. Severin, in la Romagna, with 5 or 6000 men, he haſtily marched into Milan. The retreat of the French, when it lay in their power to march to Rome, inſpired Julius II, with freſh courage. From thenceforward, he would no more hear of peace, tho' Lewis XII. offered him the ſame terms, as before his victory. At this juncture it was, that the council of Lateran was opened, the 3d of May, which had been delayed, by reaſon of the battle of Ravenna.

The opening of the council of Lateran.

Lewis XII. is excommunicated. Bembo. Guicciard.

All hopes of peace vaniſhing, the pope excommunicated Lewis XII, and put France under an interdict *. He uſed for pretence, the captivity of his legate, who was detained, at Milan, where, tho' a priſoner, he performed, however, the functions of the pope's legate, the inhabitants of Milan refuſing to own the authority of the council, held in their city. It was a great mortification to Lewis, to ſee his council contemned by his own ſubjects; but this was only a ſmall part of the misfortunes to which he was expoſed, this ſame year. After la Paliſſe had quited la Romagna, all the towns of that country ſubmitted to the pope. At the ſame time, Ferdinand became maſter of Navarre, and Lewis was forced to ſend an army into Bearn, to hinder the Engliſh and Spaniards from invading Guienne. On the other hand, the emperor concluded a truce with Venice, and ſecretly promiſed to withdraw from the French army, a body of German troops, lent the king, for the defence of the Milaneſe; and yet, on the aſſurance of this aid it was, that Lewis recalled from Milan, part of his own troops, not doubting, that, with thoſe he left there, and the Germans ſent him, by the emperor, he ſhould be able to reſiſt his enemies. Thus, the French finding themſelves weak, in the duchy of Milan, la Paliſſe was obliged to recall the cardinal of St. Severin, with his troops, which was the cauſe of the loſs of la Romagna. 1512.

The emperor lets the Switzers paſs thro' Trent. Guicciard.

Mean while, the Switzers, to the number of 16000, began their march about the end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September; but, inſtead of taking the direct road to the Milaneſe, the paſſes whereof, they did not queſtion, were ſtrongly guarded, they marched to Trent, with Maximilian's permiſſion. Tho' this, if any, was an enemy's act, he was ſtill deſirous to hide his intentions, by telling the French ambaſſador, that his alliance with the Switzers, ſuffered him not to refuſe them a paſſage through his dominions; as if his treaty with Lewis XII, was to be leſs obſerved. The Switzers having paſſed unmoleſted, through Trent, proceeded to Verona, and joining the Venetians, they marched together towards Milan; whereupon the French entirely diſconcerted, and not having above 10,000 men, reſolved to retire into the fortified towns, in order to waſte the enemy's army, by ſieges, till the king ſent them ſupplies, or the approaching winter ſtopped the progreſs of the allies; but they were ſoon deprived of this refuge, by the emperor's orders for his troops to retire, immediately. Theſe orders being punctually obeyed, la Paliſſe found himſelf too weak, that deſpairing to ſave the Milaneſe, he reſolved to repaſs the mountains, and return into France. The prelates of the council, ſeeing Milan was going to be abandoned, by a ſudden decree, removed the council to Lyons, and followed the French troops; and, they would have carried the cardinal de Medici with them; but went away in ſuch confuſion, that his friends found means to ſecure him. After the French were retired, all the towns of the duchy, readily ſurrendered to the Switzers and Venetians, except Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, which ſubmitted to the pope. On the other hand, Alexander Bentivoglio, not thinking himſelf ſafe in Bologna, departed from thence, with all his family, leaving the city to the pope's mercy. Thus, Julius II, who, about a month before, ſaw himſelf in a very ill ſituation, was arrived at the height of his wiſhes, by this ſurpriſing revolution, which reſtored him Ravenna, Bologna, all la Romagna, and drove the French out of Italy.

Cardinal de Medici makes his eſcape.

* It is affirmed, that Lewis cauſed ſeveral medals to be coined, with this inſcription, Perdam Babylonem, I will deſtroy Babylon.

1512.

The duke of Ferrara goes to Rome, and eſcapes. Guicciard.

There remained four things, ſtill, to do, to complete the pope's happineſs, viz. to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Ferrara, to reſtore the Sforza's to Milan, and the Medici to Florence; and, laſtly, to expel the Germans and Spaniards out of Italy. As for the duke of Ferrara, he voluntarily delivered himſelf to the pope, on the faith of a ſafe-conduct; an imprudence that would have coſt him dear, had he not been freed by Fabricius Colonna, his friend, who forced the guard ſet, at the gates of Rome, to hinder his departure.

The congreſs of Mantua.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, than the allies began to diſcover their different ends, in acting againſt France. Upon this occaſion, they judged it proper to meet, at Mantua, where they could agree only on two articles, viz. that Maximilian Sforza, eldeſt ſon to Lodovico the Moor, ſhould be reſtored to Milan, and the houſe of de Medici to Florence. In conſequence of this laſt reſolution, the army of the allies approaching Florence, compelled the Florentines to conſent to a treaty, whereby the Medici were reſtored to their country, as citizens only, and not as governors; but the cardinal de Medici entering the city, by vertue of the treaty, whilſt the army of the allies was at the gates, found means to introduce many officers and ſoldiers, and raiſe a ſedition, that made him maſter of the city; upon which, the government was ſettled upon the ſame foot, it was before the baniſhment of the Medici.

Another congreſs at Rome. Guicciard.

It was a great ſtep for the pope, to have reſtored the Medici to Florence, and Sforza to Milan; but this did not content him. The duke of Ferrara was ſtill maſter of his duchy, and the council of Piſa ſitting at Lyons; therefore, the allies muſt be brought to turn their arms againſt Ferrara, and procure a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, that the emperor might, without difficulty, abandon his council. To that purpoſe, the pope obtained a ſecond meeting, at Rome, where he could gain nothing with regard to Ferrara, becauſe the duke was protected by Ferdinand; beſides, the Venetians could not agree to find men and money, to render the pope maſter of that duchy; and, as for the peace between the emperor and Veniſe, he found ſtill greater difficulties, tho' he paſſionately wiſhed to accompliſh that project, for fear one or other of the two powers ſhould recall the French into Italy; but the extravagant terms propoſed by the emperor to the Venetians, hindered him from ſucceeding. In ſhort, the pope ſeeing his labour was in vain, and deſiring, at any rate, to diſſolve the council of Piſa, and prevent the return of the French into Italy, concluded, with the emperor, a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Venice. By this treaty, the emperor engaged to become a principal party in the league of Rome, and agreed, that the pope ſhould keep Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, however, ſaving the rights of the empire; he promiſed, likewiſe, to renounce the council of Piſa, and forſake the duke of Ferrara, and the Bentivoglio's; and, the pope engaged, on his part, to aid the emperor with all his power, thunder his cenſures againſt the Venetians, declare them excluded out of the league of Rome, and drop the proſecution of the Colonna's, for aiding the duke of Ferrara to make his eſcape. The treaty being ſigned and ratified, the biſhop of Gurck, as the emperor's lieutenant, renounced, in the next ſeſſion of the council of Lateran, the aſſembly of Piſa, and revoked whatever had been done by the emperor, towards the calling and ſupporting it.

Sforza is put in poſſeſſion of Milan.

About the end of December, Maximilian Sforza, eldeſt ſon to Lodovico the Moor, was put in poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, according to the agreement of the allies, at Mantua.

Remarks on the year 1512.

I have now ran over the tranſactions of the year 1512, a year very remarkable for the ſeveral revolutions in the affairs of Italy, and ſtill more, for the conduct of the princes concerned, which diſcovers their different characters. Lewis XII. was the dupe of his ſcruples, which made him loſe the opportunity of diſabling the pope to hurt him, and, in the end, occaſioned the loſs of the Milaneſe. Julius II. made religion ſubſervient to his immoderate ambition, by uſing the glory of God and the good of the church, for a cloak to gratify his paſſions; for, having formed a league, to reſtore the Venetians to their dominions, to the glory of God and exaltation of the Chriſtian faith, he concluded another, on the ſame pretence, to diſpoſſeſs them of all they had recovered. Ferdinand drew Henry VIII. into a war, for the pope's defence, and to procure Guienne for the crown of England; but artfully made it ſubſervient to the conqueſt of Navarre, for himſelf. The emperor Maximilian acted with no more ſincerity. His conduct was the more extraordinary, as he was ſolely indebted to Lewis XII, for all he had conquered in Italy, after the league of Cambray; nay, the preſervation of his conqueſts was wholly owing to that prince's continual ſupplies; and yet, he no ſooner ſaw him upon the decline, than he moſt ungratefully helped to hurl him down the precipice. It is affirmed, that he had a book, in which he marked, in red letters, the injuries received from the king of France; but I do not know in what colour Lewis ſhould have wrote, in his book, the wrong done him, by the emperor. As for Henry VIII, he was, certainly, the dupe of Ferdinand and the pope. But what is more ſtrange, after the king of Arragon and Julius II, by their artifices, had engaged that prince, in a league againſt France, as ſoon as affairs had taken ſuch a turn, that they no longer wanted his aſſiſtance, they thought no more of him, than if there had been no ſuch perſon in the world. In all the negotiations, between the allies, whether at Mantua, or Rome, after the retreat of the French, cardinal Bambridge was never called to them, neither was there any mention of the king of England. The pope and Ferdinand, ſatisfied with expelling the French, forſook Henry, without troubling themſelves about his concerns. It even appears, that he was not informed of theſe negotiations; for, we ſee,

1512. see, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the 10th of November, he ſtill gave full powers to his ambaſſadors, at ſeveral courts, to treat of a league, in favour of the pope, at the very time, the pope was entirely neglecting the intereſts of England. About the ſame time, Henry ſigned letters patent, declaring, that he entered into the league, concluded at Rome, a year before, tho', ſince that, Julius II. was in poſſeſſion of Ravenna, all la Romagna, Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and his deſires had been accompliſhed, by Lewis's loſs of Genoa and Milan, and by the emperor's renouncing the aſſembly of Piſa. Thus, he was evidently the dupe of all theſe intrigues. He lent, without knowing it, his troops to Ferdinand to conquer Navarre. On the other hand, the terror of his arms was greatly ſubſervient to the pope's deſigns, as it hindered Lewis XII, from keeping, in Italy, troops, which he judged neceſſary for the defence of his kingdom, againſt the Engliſh. This was the real view of Julius and Ferdinand; and Henry was ſo blind as to engage, without neceſſity, in a war with France for their intereſt, imagining that he was acting for his own.

Henry ſuffers himſelf to be farther impoſed upon.

Who would not have thought, that Henry's experience ſhould have rendered him wiſer and more circumſpect? And yet, he was farther amuſed by theſe very princes, who told him, that having nothing more to fear, in Italy, they were going to join all their forces to invade France; and if he would act, likewiſe, he might eaſily recover Guienne and Normandy. Henry, being perſuaded of their ſincerity, immediately, ſent ambaſſadors to Bruſſels, to conclude a league againſt France, with the pope, Maximilian, Ferdinand, Charles of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Low-Countries, and Margaret, ducheſs dowager of Savoy, his aunt, who governed his dominions, during his minority. Henry expected, that the execution of the treaty would, immediately, follow the concluſion; but, hereafter, it will be ſeen, that if they concluded the league, it was only to draw money from him, and leave him to make war all alone. He was young and unexperienced, and alſo ſo ſelf-conceipted, as to think himſelf wiſer than his council; and, beſides, he had plenty of ready money in his coffers. What could perſons, ſo ſubtle as the pope, emperor, and king of Arragon, deſire better, than to have to deal with ſuch a prince as Henry? We have ſeen already, this year, 1512, how artfully they improved ſo favourable a diſpoſition; and, in the ſucceeding years, we ſhall ſee, how very little he himſelf profited, by what he might have learnt by experience, during the courſe of the preſent. However this be, being reſolved to carry war into France, he aſſembled a parliament the 4th of November, to demand and aid of money; and ſoon after, the commons, without examining cloſely the reaſons which induced him to take arms, granted him a ſubſidy, and a poll-tax on all his ſubjects, for the expences of the war.

A bull in favour of the king. Act. Pub.

During the ſeſſion of the parliament, Henry received a bull from the pope, who, to encourage him to puſh the war vigorouſly againſt France, granted a plenary indulgence to all his ſubjects, that ſhould aſſiſt him with their perſon or purſes. This was all the aid he had from the pope for a war, the ſole motive whereof, as it was pretended, was the defence of the church. 1512.

Nothing more remains to finiſh the account of the tranſactions of this year, but briefly to mention the meaſures taken by Henry, with reſpect to Scotland.

Henry tries, in vain, to prevent a rupture with Scotland. Herbert.

Whilſt Henry determined to carry war into France, he uſed his utmoſt efforts to preſerve a good underſtanding with the king of Scotland; but it was almoſt impoſſible, that England ſhould be in war with France, and Scotland not interpoſe. Henry, however, imagined, that by the aſſurances he gave the king of Scotland, of his intention to obſerve, punctually, the treaty of peace, he ſhould prevent him from being concerned in the quarrel. James ſuffered him to think as he pleaſed, and, in the mean time, was preparing to aſſiſt France, by a powerful diverſion, in caſe that kingdom was attacked. Upon the firſt report, that Henry was going to quarrel with Lewis, James took care to be provided with pretences to break with him. The affair of Breton furniſhed him with one, and he, moreover, ſought others; but the true reaſon of his acting was, that, for ſome ages paſt, the kings of England were grown ſo powerful, and had ſhewn ſo great a deſire to unite all Great-Britain under their dominion, that the Scots could little expect to reſiſt them, but by the aſſiſtance of France, which had ever protected them; therefore, it was more neceſſary than juſt, for Scotland to continue firm to the intereſts of France, and not ſuffer that crown to be diſabled to aſſiſt her allies. So, not to ſwerve from this maxim, James IV, who had reſolved to go to Jeruſalem, laid aſide his deſign, when he heard there was like to be a rupture between France and England. He equipped a fleet, which he intended to ſend into France, under pretence of preſenting it to queen Ann, wife to Lewis XII; but this fleet, in which was the largeſt ſhip that had yet been ſeen on the ſea, was loſt, or diſabled, by a ſtorm and the admiral's ill conduct.

James concludes a league with Lewis XII.

Henry having, at laſt, proclaimed war with Lewis, James concluded a league againſt him with France, the 22d of May this year; and, ſoon after, he prepared an army, but, without divulging for what it was deſigned. His intent was to make an inroad into England, as ſoon as Henry had ſent his forces into France. Henry having notice of this armament, ſent two ambaſſadors into Scotland, under colour of adjuſting ſome little differences, but, in reality to ſound the king's intentions; and the ambaſſadors acquainting king James, that their maſter was ſomething jealous of this armament, as if it was made in favour of France, he anſwered, that being equally an ally of both crowns, his deſign was to obſerve an exact neutrality. The ambaſſadors prayed him to give that anſwer in writing; but he refuſed, on pretence, that it would breed a ſuſpicion in the king of France. Soon after, Henry learnt, 1512. learnt, by his ſpies, that a league was concluded between France and Scotland, and he even procured a copy of the treaty; ſo, perceiving that a war with Scotland, was unavoidable, he ſent the earl of Surrey into the northern parts, with power to levy an army, and act againſt Scotland, in caſe of neceſſity.

1513. The views and intereſts of the princes.

The tranſactions of the year 1512, made great alterations in the intereſts of the princes concerned, and conſequently in their deſigns and meaſures.

Of Julius.

Julius II, pleaſed with having expelled the French out of Italy, and ſo greatly increaſed his power, by the acquiſition of ſo many places, was thinking, however, of ſeizing Ferrara. After that, he hoped, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians and Florentines, to be able to drive the emperor out of Venice, tho' he had lately leagued with him; and, as for the reſt, he had no thought of making conqueſts in France, his ſole view being to find Lewis employment at home, and to diſſolve entirely the remains of the council of Piſa, which, however, was not very formidable to him, ſince the emperor's diſengagement.

Of Ferdinand.

Ferdinand's ſole view was, to preſerve his late conqueſt of Navarre. To enjoy it in peace, the only way was to keep the king of France employed elſewhere, or prevail with him, not to diſturb him; and, to that purpoſe, it was neceſſary to uſe the terror of the arms of the allies, and, particularly, of the king of England, that Lewis being attacked from ſeveral quarters, might be induced of himſelf to deſire a peace, and leave him in poſſeſſion of Navarre. Ferdinand would not have ſcrupled to abandon his allies, provided he could obtain, at that rate, ſuch a peace as he wanted.

Of the emperor.

Maximilian ſought only to draw money, both from his friends and enemies; for he was very ſenſible, that with his own forces alone, it would be difficult to make conqueſts upon the Venetians; and that the pope, tho' his ally, did not wiſh it; but he was extremely reſerved to them, to procure the larger ſums in making a peace. On the other hand, he endeavoured to embroil matters as much as poſſible, and make new leagues, becauſe, in all the treaties of that kind, money was ſtill given him to maintain imaginary troops, which he never raiſed, at leaſt, not ſo many as he promiſed.

Of the Venetians.

The Venetians were very deſirous to end a deſtructive war, by which they were drained; for their ſole view was, to induce the emperor to be ſatisfied with a good ſum of money, for the reſtitution of their towns, and thereby put their ſtate upon the ſame foot it was before the league of Cambray. But as the emperor could not think of depriving himſelf of an entrance into Italy, by the reſtitution of theſe places, it was their buſineſs to compel him, in ſome meaſure, by new leagues, which might make him apprehenſive of loſing them without any advantage. But as this was the ſenate's ſole view, they were always ready to break all their engagements, as ſoon as the emperor would hearken to reaſon.

Of the Switzers.

The Switzers thought only of ſupporting Sforza, at Milan, to have always, in that duchey, a prince, who ſhould rely on their aſſiſtance. Conſequently, it was their intereſt to keep the king of France at a diſtance, and oppoſe all his attempts to recover it. 1513.

Of Lewis.

Lewis XII, extremely mortified at the good ſucceſs of his enemies, in Italy, ardently deſired to recover Genoa and Milan; and, to ſucceed, the aid of the Venetians, the emperor, or the Switzers was neceſſary; it was alſo requiſite ſo to haſten the concluſion with one or other of the two laſt powers, that the expedition of the Milaneſe might be made in the ſpring, for fear it ſhould be prevented by the war, the king of England was preparing againſt him in Picardy.

Of Henry VIII.

Of all Lewis's enemies, Henry was the only one, who thought of making conqueſts, in France, prepoſterouſly imagining, his allies would make diverſions in ſeveral places, to faciliate the execution of his deſigns. But he did not yet ſufficiently know them. The Venetians had been excluded out of the late league. The pope and Ferdinand had no deſire to attack France, but only to create Lewis troubles, that might hinder him from thinking of Italy; and, it was ſolely with this view, that they feigned a willingneſs to ſecond the king of England. As for the emperor, Henry and his council muſt have voluntarily deceived themſelves, to hope for any aſſiſtance from him.

Of the king of Scotland.

James IV, king of Scotland, ſeeing France on the point of being attacked by Henry, was preparing to aſſiſt her, deeming his own and that kingdom's intereſts, to be inſeparable. He eaſily perceived, that the king of England courted him only to prevent his interpoſing in the quarrel, and was willing to feed him with hopes of ſucceeding in his deſign; but, however, he was determined to break the peace, rather than leave a nation in danger, from which alone he could expect a ſpeedy and powerful protection, in caſe of neceſſity. It is true, he had made a peace with Henry VII, and renewed it with Henry VIII; but it was, when theſe monarchs had no conteſt with France, his antient and conſtant ally; and, in his opinion, Henry, by wantonly attacking France, on trifling pretences, violated, indirectly, the treaty made with Scotland; at leaſt, James pretended, that in ſigning a peace with England, he was not bound to forſake France, whenever the king of England ſhould think of attacking her.

Such were the diſpoſitions of all theſe potentates, in the beginning of the year 1513. We muſt now ſee, by what methods each endeavoured to attain his ends; for this new ſcene will diſcover to us no leſs variety, artful managements, devices, and artifices, than the preceding, ſince the actors and perſonages will ſtill be the ſame.

Whilſt Henry was ſeriouſly preparing for war, his pretended allies were taking care of their own affairs, without regarding his intereſts. Since he had entered into the league of Rome, the allies, it ſeemed, ſhould have done nothing without his knowledge; and yet, Julius 1513. lius II. had leagued with the emperor, and excluded the Venetians, without informing him of it.

The emperor offers a league to Lewis, in order to deceive him. Guicciard.

In the beginning of the year 1513, Maximilian had no farther regard for his new allies, ſince he ſent and propoſed a freſh league to Lewis XII, on new terms; for he offered to aid him in recovering the Milaneſe, provided Lewis, in return, would aſſiſt him againſt the Venetians; and, moreover, he demanded Renee, Lewis's ſecond daughter, for Charles of Auſtria, his grandſon, and that, for her dower, Lewis ſhould aſſign him all his pretenſions to Milan and the kingdom of Naples. But that the performance of the treaty might not entirely depend on the faith of Lewis, he required that the princeſs ſhould, immediately, be ſent to him, and Cremona, and all Gierradadda delivered to him as ſoon as the duchy of Milan was recovered. Certainly, one cannot but admire the emperor's aſſurance in making theſe propoſals. He had not, hitherto, been able to continue the war againſt Venice, without the aſſiſtance of Lewis XII; nay, he thought he ſtill wanted it, and yet made him an offer of aid to recover the Milaneſe. But, on what terms? Why, after Lewis ſhould have been at a vaſt expence to recover that duchy, he was to reſign it to the emperor's grandſon, with his pretenſions to Naples. This is called, uſing people like true dupes. But after the ill turn Maximilian had lately ſerved Lewis, it is not very likely, that he believed his propoſals would be accepted. Probably, he made them only to hinder Lewis from joining with the Venetians. At the ſame time he intended to inſpire theſe laſt with jealouſy, and a fear of his uniting with France, that this fear might induce them to offer him more advantageous conditions.

Lewis tries in vain, to win the Switzers.

Lewis XII. hearkened to theſe propoſals, as if he had ſome deſign to accept them, becauſe he thereby hoped to create ſuſpicions in the Switzers and Venetians, and incline them the ſooner to join with him. As for the Venetians, they deſired nothing more than a ſtrict union with France; and if any thing retarded the negotiation, it was only the hope of an agreement with the emperor, in which caſe they would have gladly renounced all ſorts of leagues. As for the Switzers, it was not poſſible for Lewis XII. to gain them to his ſide, tho' he offered them more than, at firſt, was demanded. Beſides their hatred of him, the face of their affairs was altered, ſince the reſtoration of Sforza to Milan; for whilſt that prince was in exile, it was doubtful, whether, in good policy, they ought to engage in a war with France, for his ſake; but, ſince he was, by their aſſiſtance, in poſſeſſion of the duchy, their honour and intereſt required their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport him. However this be, Lewis's negotiation with the Switzers, not ſucceeding, he was under a neceſſity to join in a league, either with the emperor, or with Venice, otherwiſe he could little expect to recover Milan.

In the interim, the Venetians ſent and propoſed a league to him, on the ſame terms with that of the year 1498, viz. that they would aid him to recover the Milaneſe, provided he would reſign Cremona and Gierradadda. Lewis readily liſtened to their offers; but the Venetians themſelves did not haſten the concluſion, by reaſon of their circumſtances preſently after. 1513.

Propoſals of the Venetians to Lewis.

Ferdinand having good intelligence of what paſſed between Lewis XII. and the Venetians, informed Maximilian, and adviſed him to offer Verona to the Venetians for a ſum of money. This was the ſubject of a long, tho' fruitleſs negotiation.

Whilſt the affairs of Italy were in this ſtate of uncertainty, Julius II, who was preparing to beſiege Ferrara, in the beginning of the ſpring, died, the 21ſt of February, having kindled a flame, which his death was not capable of extinguiſhing *. As ſoon as the news reached the viceroy of Naples, who was ſtill with his army, in Lombardy, he approached Placentia, and entering without oppoſition, reſtored that place to the duke of Milan. Parma quickly followed the example of Placentia, and was likewiſe delivered to the ſame prince. No one was in haſte to ſend aſſiſtance to the future pope to preſerve theſe places for him. On the contrary, the princes of Italy could not ſee without uneaſineſs, that the popes had footing in Lombardy, under a pretence, which might, on occaſion, be uſed againſt moſt of them.

The death of Julius II. Guicciard.

On the 11th of March, cardinal John de Medici, who 11 months before, was taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, was elected pope and aſſumed the name of Leo X. He was only 37 years old, yet, however, had great experience, having been employed in divers important affairs, in the late pontificate. He was neither ſo hot nor haughty as Julius II, his predeceſſor, but was much more artful and politick. I ſhall have occaſion, hereafter, to add to his portraiture ſome ſtrokes, which will more fully ſhew his genius and character.

Leo X, pope. Act. Pub.

Before the death of Julius II, Ferdinand was employed in framing a plot, perfectly anſwering the name he had in the world. The beginning of the year, he had ſent two monks into France, to make ſome overtures to Lewis, by means of queen Ann, to whom they had acceſs. But, as Lewis perceived it was not poſſible to make a peace, or even a truce with Ferdinand, without leaving him in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he had appeared, at firſt, very cold; but, at length, conſidering, that he could hardly expect to recover the duchy of Milan, whilſt Ferdinand was his enemy, becauſe it was he that excited Henry, his ſon-in-law, he determined, tho' unwillingly, to conclude with him a truce, for a year, on condition Henry was included, and Italy excepted. He reckoned, that during this truce, he ſhould, with eaſe, be able to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, after which, he ſhould be

A truce for one year, between Lewis and Ferdinand.

* He took the name of Julius from his inclination to war, in memory of Julius Cæſar. He commanded his army, in perſon, againſt the French; and, it is ſaid, as he marched over a bridge on the Tiber, he threw St. Peter's keys into the river, and called for St. Paul's ſword.

1513. ſufficiently ſtrong to defend his own kingdom, againſt the Engliſh. Nothing was farther from Henry's thoughts, than ſuch a truce, which would have broke all his meaſures, and yet, Ferdinand doubted not to act in his name, as if he were ſure of his conſent. This affair was began in January, and the 8th of February, Lewis empowered Odet de Foix, lord of Lautrec, to treat with Ferdinand's commiſſioners. In ſhort, the treaty was concluded, at Orthez, in Bearn, the 11ſt of April; and, the treaty ran, that there ſhould be a truce for a year, out of Italy, between the king of France, the king of Scotland, the duke of Guelders on the one part; and on the other, the emperor, the king of Arragon, the queen of Caſtile, and the king of England. Lewis undertook to procure the king of Scotland's and the duke of Guelders's conſent, and Ferdinand engaged for the king of England. But as Ferdinand knew he ſhould not eaſily obtain Henry's conſent, he cauſed it to be inſerted in the treaty, that it ſhould be ratified within a month, by himſelf and Lewis, but that the other parties ſhould be allowed two months; with expreſs declaration, that with regard to the emperor, the king of England, the king of Scotland, and the duke of Guelders, the truce ſhould take place, but from the day of the exchange of their ratifications. Never, perhaps, was ſeen any thing ſo bold as what Ferdinand did, on this occaſion; for, he perfectly knew, that Henry would never agree to the truce, and yet took upon him to procure his conſent, as if he had been fully empowered to that end. The laſt article, concerning the ratification, plainly diſcovers his thoughts; but it is ſtill more viſible, in that he not only took no ſtep to perſuade Henry to do what he ſeemed to deſire, but even concealed from him the truce, as far as poſſible.

Ferdinand complains of the allies. Guicciard.

As ſoon as the treaty was ſigned, Ferdinand took care to publiſh his complaints, that he had been very ill-uſed, by the allies of the league; that the pope and the Venetians had acquired ſeveral places; but, for his part, he had gained nothing at all, and yet the allies refuſed to continue the ſupply, to which they were bound, tho' the king of France ſtill poſſeſſed many towns, in Italy, and the Spaniſh army was, yet, in the ſervice of the league; but this was only to prepare people to ſee with leſs ſurpriſe and indignation, the private truce he had juſt made with France, without the participation of his allies.

The eyes of the publick were fixed on the new pope, to ſee what courſe he would take; but he did not long leave the politicians in ſuſpence. Tho' he did not wholly approve of Julius II's conduct, when a cardinal, he, however, purſued his plan, as ſoon as he was in his place; for he was doubly concerned to keep the French out of Italy; firſt, as pope, ſince neighbours ſo powerful could not but be formidable to him; ſecondly, as head of the houſe of the Medici, he had cauſe to fear, that if Lewis XII. recovered the Milaneſe, he would endeavour to reſtore the Florentines to their liberty; in a word, he deſired to put an end to the council of Piſa, which could be done only by engaging Lewis in wars, which ſhould compel him to make his peace with the church. Ferdinand had, alſo, the ſame views, to keep the king of France at a diſtance from Navarre, Rouſſillon, and the kingdom of Naples. And, as for the emperor, it was his intereſt to diſable France to aſſiſt the Venetians. But they had, none of them, any deſire to carry war into France, but only ſo to manage, that this diverſion might be made at another's expence. 1513.

The allies try to engage Henry in a war with France.

To that purpoſe, they, unanimouſly, caſt their eyes on Henry VIII, as a prince extremely proper to execute their projects; for he had ready money, warlike ſubjects, and could with eaſe tranſport troops into ſome part of France, remote from the borders of Spain and Italy; and, in a word, he was exceeding deſirous to ſignalize himſelf by illuſtrious actions, and ſcrupled not to ſhew it publickly. So, each of them laboured with all his power, to confirm him in his deſign, to wage war with France, by putting him in hopes of being vigorouſly ſupported, tho' nothing was farther from their thoughts. Leo X. was no ſooner in the papal chair, but under colour of notifying his promotion, ſent him a letter, aſſuring him, that he was fully reſolved to adhere to the league formed by Julius II, his predeceſſor, and even to conclude a new one with England; but, at the ſame time, he preſſed the emperor, to make a peace with Venice, and negotiated with the Venetians, to prevent their union with France, promiſing to uſe all his intereſt with the emperor, to procure them an honourable and advantageous peace. All theſe practices could not be managed ſo privately, but the king of France had ſome intelligence of them; ſo, that he ſoon grew very jealous of the new pope.

A league concluded at Mechlin, between the allies and Henry.

Henry did not want much ſollicitation to carry his arms into France; for his thoughts was already bent upon a war; ſo, finding, the pope, emperor, and king of Arragon, promiſed him to act vigorouſly, he did not doubt the favourableneſs of the opportunity, to recover good part of what his predeceſſors had formerly loſt; and, therefore, he readily agreed to form a new league with them, not for the affairs of Italy, with which he was, probably, diſguſted, but to attack France from ſeveral quarters. And, that the league might be the more ſecret, it was agreed, that it ſhould be negotiated, at Mechlin, between Margaret of Auſtria, governeſs of the Low-Countries, authorized by the emperor, her father, and the ambaſſadors of England, and that, afterwards, it ſhould be approved and ratified by the pope, Maximilian, and Ferdinand. This was another ſnare laid for Henry, which he perceived not, till it was too late to avoid it. Tho' the king of Arragon was then on the point of concluding the truce with Lewis XII, he made himſelf, however, one of the principal parties in this league, as repugnant as it was to the truce. The ſubſtance of the new league concluded at Mechlin, the 5th of April, about the ſame time the truce was ſigned, at Orthez, was as follows.

That

The terms of the league.

That within 30 days, after the date of this treaty, each of the confederates ſhould proclaim war with Lewis, and within two months invade him, viz. the pope in Provence or Dauphine; the emperor in ſome place out of Italy; the king of Arragon in Bearn, Guienne, or Languedoc; the king of England in Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy; and that their armies ſhould be ſtrong and well provided with all things.

That the emperor (if he had not yet done it) ſhould revoke all his proceedings, in favour of the council of Piſa. This ſhews, how little Henry, or his plenipotentiaries knew of what paſſed at Rome, ſince it was now three months, or more, that the emperor had abandoned that council.

That the pope ſhould thunder his cenſures, againſt all the oppoſers of this league and abbettors of the contrary party.

That towards the expences of the war, the king of England ſhould give the emperor 100,000 crowns of gold, at three payments; 35000 preſently after the declaration of the war, as much more when the war was began, and 30,000 within three months after.

That the emperor meant not to enter into this league, as guardian to Charles, his grandſon.

That the emperor and king of England ſhould ratify the treaty within a month, and the pope and king of Arragon within two months; with this expreſs declaration, that, in caſe the pope and king of Arragon ſhould not ratify the treaty by the time appointed, it ſhould, however, be in force between the emperor and the king of England.

Laſtly, The confederates renounced all exceptions whatever, and, particularly, that which might be made to another's ſtipulating for them.

Never, perhaps, was ſeen more inſincerity, than in this whole negotiation, ſince of all the confederates Henry alone intended to keep his word. Leo X. ratified not the treaty; Ferdinand, as will be ſeen, preſently, diſowned his ambaſſador; and, as for the emperor, he received the money from the king, without troubling himſelf to perform his engagements. Thus, Henry was the conſtant dupe of theſe princes, who were a little too politick for him.

Ferdinand's ambaſſador, at London, ratifies and ſwears to the league of Mechlin. Act. Pub.

The treaty being brought to London, Lewis Carroz de Villaragud, Ferdinand's ambaſſador, approved and ratified it by letters patent of April 18th. He declared in theſe letters, that, tho' he had a ſufficient power from the king, his maſter, to conclude the league with the plenipotentiaries of the confederate princes, he had not been able, for certain weighty reaſons, to be preſent at the ſigning, at Mechlin; but being very ſure, the treaty contained only what was agreeable to the king, his maſter, who deſired nothing more earneſtly, than its execution, he approved and ratified, in the ſaid king's name, all the articles of the treaty. And to remove all occaſion of diſputing the validity of his ratification, he incerted the treaty verbatim, in his letters of ratification, and concluded it again, with the earl of Surrey, Henry's commiſſioner, by vertue of a full power, received for that power. Afterwards, the 25th of the ſame month, he ſwore to the obſervance of the articles, on the ſouls of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, and Jane, queen of Caſtile. It is not certain, whether the ambaſſador was himſelf deceived, or, whether knowing it, voluntarily helped to impoſe on Henry. All that can be ſaid, is, that the great precautions taken to hinder his being ſuſpected of inſincerity, are not very common with thoſe who intend to act fairly.

Henry is impoſed upon.

It muſt, doubtleſs, be thought ſtrange, that a pope, an emperor, and a king of Spain ſhould, thus, join, to lay ſuch a ſnare for a young prince of 21 years of age, and who was even ſon-in-law to one of them; and, yet it is ſcarce to be doubted, that the league concluded at Mechlin, in the abſence of the pope's and Ferdinand's ambaſſador's, was, thus, projected, to entangle Henry, under pretence of keeping it the more ſecret. They ſucceeded ſo well, that Henry depending on the diverſions, his pretended allies would make in Guienne, Bearn, Provence, Dauphine, Burgundy, flattered himſelf that he might eaſily extend his conqueſts, in Picardy. To that end, he made extraordinary preparations by ſea and land, which put him to a vaſt expence. But whilſt we leave him employed in preparing for the next campaign, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed, in Italy.

A league between Lewis XII. and the Venetians. Mezerai.

The Venetians not being able to obtain a peace from the emperor, who pretended to ſubject them to very unreaſonable terms, ſollicited afreſh the negotiation they had began with France. On the other hand, Lewis, to whom time was precious, readily accepted their propoſals. Thus, the league, between that monarch and the Venetians, was quickly concluded, on the ſame foot as that of the year 1498. This was tranſacted by Andrew Gritti, who being then priſoner, in France, was commiſſioned to conclude it in the ſenate's name. Preſently after, he was releaſed, as well as Alviano, who returned to Venice, was made general of the forces of the republick.

Lewis ſends Trimouille into Italy, with an army. P. Daniel.

When Lewis XII. had concluded his treaty with the Venetians, he ordered his troops to march into Italy, where they arrived in June. As, by the treaty of truce, concluded at Orthez, Henry was allowed two months to ſend his pretended ratifications, and, as that term was not yet expired, very probably Lewis ſtill flattered himſelf, that Henry would perform what Ferdinand had promiſed for him; otherwiſe he would not, doubtleſs, have ſent his beſt troops, into Italy. In the interim, the preparations, which were continuing in England, and the hoſtilities, already began at ſea, ſince April, between the French and Engliſh, ſhould have convinced him, that Ferdinand had deceived him. However this be, the French army, under the conduct of la Trimouille, being arrived on the borders of the Milaneſe, Maximilian Sforza quitted his capital, and retired among the Switzers, who were to the number of 7 or 8000 men, at Como and and Novarra, where they expected ſupplies from their own country.

Ferdinand's general goes from Milan.

Upon the approach of the French, Raymond de Cardona, who was ſtill in Lombardy, with the Spaniſh army, retired, without making the leaſt motion to aſſiſt the duke of Milan, tho' Italy was not included in the truce of Orthez. Very likely, Ferdinand was not diſpleaſed, that the French ſhould make ſome progreſs in the Milaneſe, to keep them employed there, whilſt Henry carried war into Picardy; at leaſt, any other reaſon of his general's conduct, can ſcarce be imagined. The duke of Milan having no other forces, but the Switzers, to oppoſe the French, Milan, and the reſt of the towns of the duchy, except Como and Novarra, ſubmitted to la Trimouille, without offering to reſiſt, whilſt the Switzers, who were not ſtrong enough to take the field, remained immured within the walls of theſe two places. Whilſt the French were making theſe conqueſts, Alviano took, for the Venetians, Peſchiera, Breſcia, Valeggio, and, at laſt, Cremona, after a fruitleſs attempt to become maſter of Verona, by intelligence.

Genoa is reſtored to France. Guicciard.

About this time, the faction of the Adorno's, who in Genoa, ſided with France, found means to become ſuperior, and put the city again, under the dominion of the king.

La Trimouille is repulſed by the Switzers at Novarra.

Lewis XII, was now in poſſeſſion of the whole Milaneſe, except Como and Novarra. La Trimouille knowing, the Switzers expected a ſtrong reinforcement from their own country thought he ſhould make haſte, and beſiege Novarra, before the arrival of theſe troops. He, therefore, marched to the town, and in the expectation of taking it, immediatly, furiouſly ſtormed it; but, whatever bravery the French ſhewed, on this occaſion, they were repulſed, with a very great loſs, which even obliged the general to retire to Riotta, a village about two miles from Novarra. In the mean while, the Switzers, proud of repulſing ſo terrible an aſſault, and beginning to deſpiſe the French, before whom, they had not yet dared to appear, in the field, ſuddenly reſolved to ſally out of Novarra, and attack the enemy in their camp. This reſolution, was, immediatly, executed, to the great aſtoniſhment of the French, who, not being able to reſiſt this unexpected attack, were entirely routed. But that was not all, for their conſternation, after the defeat, was ſo great, that they thought it their only ſafety to repaſs the mountains, and with all poſſible diligence, return into France; and, the news of their flight, reaching Genoa, the Adorno's quitted the city, to the Fregoſa's their enemies, who choſe for doge, Octavian Fregoſa, head of their family and faction. Thus, within the ſpace of a month, Lewis XII. got and loſt Genoa and Milan, and Maximilian Sforza, who had been expelled out of his duchy, took poſſeſſion again; but it was the latter end of the year, before he recovered the caſtles of Milan and Cremona, kept by the French and Venetians.

Alviano retires. Guicciard.

The revolution, in the king of France's affairs, occaſioned much the ſame to thoſe of the Venetians; for Alviano, their general, no ſooner heard of the French army's misfortune, but he haſtily retired into the territories of Venice, and beſieged Verona; but Raymond de Cardona, who had affected a ſort of neutrality, whilſt the French were in the Milaneſe, knowing they were out of Italy, turned his forces againſt Alviano; and, he not only forced him to raiſe the ſiege of Verona, but even purſuing him, from place to place, obtained over him, a ſignal victory, which obliged the Venetians to refer their differences to the pope, tho' he had declared againſt them, by aſſiſting the emperor; the neceſſity of their affairs obliging them to take that ſtep, in order to gain time; for they had loſt all their towns, in the Milaneſe, and their own country had been horribly ravaged by the Spaniſh troops, even within ſight of Venice.

Whilſt theſe things were acting, in Italy, Henry was preparing to paſs into France, with a numerous army. But, before I ſpeak of the ſucceſs of his firſt campaign, it will be neceſſary, briefly, to mention what paſſed at his own court, and which it will be worth while to inſiſt on a moment. Thomas Wolſey had been introduced to court, by the biſhop of Wincheſter. Soon after, he was made privy-counſellor, and as ſuch, had opportunity to make himſelf better known to the king, and gain his eſteem, as well by his own qualifications, as by the intereſt of the biſhop, his benefactor, who ceaſed not to cauſe the king to admire the ſtrength of his genius, and obſerve, how fit he was for the greateſt affairs. Wolſey, on his part, did not neglect what he thought capable of increaſing Henry's opinion of him; for, to an indefatigable application, and extreme diligence, in all the affairs he was charged with, he added, a blind condeſcenſion for all his maſter's paſſions. The king was highly pleaſed, to ſee, in his court and council, a churchman, leſs rigid and ſcrupulous than the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or the old biſhop of Wincheſter; for Wolſey danced, ſung, laughed, and played with the young courtiers, who were moſt in favour; and, if Polidore Virgil is to be credited, who loved him not, neither had reaſon to love him, he carried his complaiſance ſo far, as to lend the king his houſe, for his moſt ſecret pleaſures. However this be, his condeſenſion, joined to his talents for buſineſs, and a pretty extenſive knowledge, in divinity, which he had acquired, as well as the king, by reading the works of Thomas Aquinas, ſoon gave him the advantage over all the other courtiers; and, when he ſaw himſelf well fixed, he made it his particular buſineſs, to ſhew the king his errors, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, and how his youth had been abuſed. By this method, he inſinuated to him, by degrees, that he was ill ſerved, and wanted an able miniſter, capable of eaſing him, in the adminiſtration of the moſt important affairs, and, of ſhewing him the conſequences; in ſhort, he ſo managed, that he became himſelf, that miniſter, which he adviſed the king to

Thomas Wolſey becomes prime miniſter. Burnet.

1513. ſeek, and, by degrees, was intruſted with the care and conduct of Henry's principal affairs. His credit rendered him haughty, proud, inſolent, and ungrateful, to his old friends; in a word, he was taxed with all the failings of this nature, which favourites are uſually charged with, and which, indeed, few of them can avoid; for, Wolſey, like moſt others, grew extremely obnoxious, chiefly, becauſe his counſels were always ſelf-intereſted, which the event diſcovered to all, but the king, who was blind in that reſpect. His favour and credit, cauſed the moſt powerful princes of Europe, to ſtrive to gain him to their intereſts, and glory, at leaſt, outwardly, in being of the number of his friends; and, the reaſon is, becauſe, during this reign, the affairs of Europe, were in ſuch a ſituation, that England was capable of making the balance incline to the ſide ſhe eſpouſed. Wolſey knew how to improve this advantage, to render himſelf the richeſt and moſt powerful ſubject, that ever was; but laboured not, with the ſame ardor, for his maſter's honour, as for his own intereſt. After he was declared prime miniſter, he managed, during the ſpace of 17 years, all the king's affairs, both foreign and domeſtick.

Before Henry was ready to paſs into France, the war was already began, at ſea; for, in April, admiral Howard putting to ſea, with 32 ſhips of war, whilſt the French fleet remained, at Breſt, expecting ſix gallies that Pregent was to bring from Marſeilles, approached Breſt, reſolving to attack the French ſhips, as they lay, at anchor, but, on notice, that Pregent was arrrived, at Conquet, he ſailed that way, to endeavour to take the ſix gallies, and attacked them, indeed, with great bravery; and, during the fight, his ſhip being grappled with Pregent's galley, he entered it, ſword in hand, which, at firſt, cauſed great diſorder; but, unfortunately, the galley being, afterwards, diſengaged, he was left in the hands of his enemies, with a few attendants; and, being unknown, was knocked over-board, with a half-pike. The loſs of the admiral, cauſed ſuch a conſternation, in the Engliſh fleet, that they durſt not continue the fight. The news being carried to court, the king conferred the office of lord admiral, on Thomas Howard, brother to the deceaſed. In the interim, as the French fleet, by receiving a ſtrong reinforcement, was become ſuperior to the Engliſh, the laſt returned to ſome port, in England, expecting the arrival of the new admiral; and, the French, encouraged by the retreat of the Engliſh, ſailed to the coaſt of England, and, even made a deſcent, in Suſſex, and carried away ſome booty.

A ſea fight, wherein admiral Howard is loſt.

In the interim, Henry was preparing to carry war into France, tho' none of his pretended allies, had yet, made the leaſt ſtep towards performing the treaty of Mechlin; for, Leo X, had not ratified the treaty, and nothing was farther from his thoughts, than the ſending of an army, into Provence, or Dauphine; the emperor began, to ſeek excuſes, not to enter Burgundy, with an army, tho' he had poſitively promiſed it; and, as for Ferdinand, he had not only concealed from Henry, his one year's truce with France, but was even trying to amuſe him with hopes, that he was directly going to make a powerful diverſion, in Guienne, and he ſo artfully acted his part, that it was June, before Henry was fully informed of the truce of Orthez. Henry, incenſed, at ſuch a fraud, diſpatched an ambaſſador, to the king, his father-in-law, to upbraid him with breach of faith, and ſummon him to execute the treaty of Mechlin, or rather, that ſigned by his ambaſſador, in his name, at London. Whereupon Ferdinand, ſeeing he could no longer wear the mask, diſowned his ambaſſador, and ſaid, he had exceeded his inſtructions; however, he confeſſed, that he had concluded a truce for a year, with Lewis XII, being obliged by the neceſſity of his affairs, but promiſed to do wonders, when it was expired, and adviſed his ſon-in-law, to accept of the truce, that they might, afterwards, unite their forces, and jointly invade the common enemy. But Henry could no longer rely on ſuch promiſes. Thus, by the artifice of the pope, emperor, and Ferdinand, he ſaw himſelf engaged to carry war, alone, into the enemy's country, which was to have been attacked in four ſeveral quarters. He was not convinced of their inſincerity, till it was, almoſt, too late to recede, the greateſt part of his army having already paſſed the ſea, and juſt entering on action. Happily for him, Lewis XII, deceived by the treaty of truce, concluded, at Orthez, had, now, ſent his beſt troops into Italy, imagining Henry would accept of the truce, purſuant to Ferdinand's engagement.

Henry prepares to paſs into France. Hall.

Soon after, Henry received a letter from the emperor, with many excuſes, that it was impoſſible for him, this year, to lead an army into Burgundy, but he would punctually perform his engagement next year; however, to ſhew, he meant not to forſake him, he ſaid, he would come and ſerve as a volunteer, in his army. Thus, of the four allies, who were to act, at once, againſt France, Henry, alone, was charged with the burden of the war. Edward IV, his grandfather, had been, formerly, in much the ſame caſe, and thought it no diſhonour to make a ſpeedy peace, with Lewis XI, when diſappointed by his allies. If Henry had followed his example, he would have terribly embarraſſed thoſe, by whom he was deceived; but being greedy of glory, would ſhew he had no occaſion for them. He had ſo relied on the ſincerity of his allies, that tho' the treaty of Mechlin was not to be ratified by the pope and the king of Arragon, till the 5th of June, he had cauſed the beſt part of his army to paſs over to Calais, in the middle of May. It is evident, the ratification of the treaty of Mechlin, had been ſo long retarded, only to engage Henry beyond a poſſibility of receding.

The emperor breaks his word with Henry. Herbert.

The hiſtorians have endeavoured to diſcover Henry's inducement, at ſuch a juncture, to put the earl of Suffolk to death, who was not in a condition to hurt him; but they have ſaid nothing ſatisfactory.

The Engliſh beſiege Terouenne. Act. Pub.

The two bodies of troops, tranſported to Calais, departed thence the 17th of June, under the conduct of the earl of Shrewsbury, and the lord Herbert, in order to march to Teroeunne, to which they laid ſiege; but the king departed not from England, till the 30th of the ſame month, having conſtituted queen Catharine, regent. He arrived the ſame day, at Calais, being attended by Thomas Wolſey, his prime miniſter, Charles Brandon, another favourite, lately made viſcount l'Iſle, with many other lords. Whilſt the troops continued the ſiege of Terouenne, he remained at Calais, with a body of 9000 men, ready to march on the firſt occaſion; but, at laſt, having certain advice, that the duke of Longueville was approaching to relieve the town, he haſtened from Calais, to the ſiege, where he arrived the 4th of Auguſt. On the 9th, the emperor came, and conferred with him, between Aire and Teroeunne, and three days after, repaired to the camp, and ſerved as a volunteer, under the king, making no ſcruple to receive 100 crowns a day for his pay. By this mark of eſteem, and the imaginary honour he did the king, he meant to make amends for his breach of faith, and the 100,000 crowns received for an expedition, which he had never intended to make.

The battle of Spurs. Herbert.

In the interim, the duke of Longueville, who commanded the French army, approaching Teroeunne, Henry paſſed the Lys, with the greateſt part of his troops, in order to meet him. The two armies engaged, but not long; for the fight was hardly began, when the French, by what accident is unknown, ran away, in confuſion, without any poſſibility of their being rallied; but the principal officers choſe rather to be taken priſoners, than follow ſo diſhonourable an example. The duke of Longueville was of the number, with chevalier Bayard, la Fayette, Buſſi d' Amboiſe, and ſome others of the greateſt diſtinction. This battle, if ſuch a rout may be ſo termed, was called, the battle of Guinegaſte, and by ſome, the battle of Spurs, the French making more uſe of their ſpurs, than their ſwords. Whilſt the two armies were in view, before the engagement, a body of French attempted to introduce a convoy of proviſions into the town, but were repulſed by the lord Herbert, who was left to guard the trenches. After the battle, the beſieged deſpairing of relief, ſurrendered the city the 22d of Auguſt, and the king, in company with the emperor, entered on the 24th.

Terounne ſurrenders. Hall.

Henry gives the place to the emperor, who razes it.

It ſeemed to be Henry's deſtiny, to be always the emperor's dupe; for, after the taking of Terouenne, Maximilian, who had only ſerved, at the ſiege, as a volunteer, found means to have the place delivered to him, and, immediately, ordered it to be demoliſhed. It is hard to conceive, what induced Henry to this condeſcenſion; and, all that can be conjectured is, that there was, perhaps, in the capitulation, ſome article againſt the razing of the place; but that altering his mind, he was willing to ſave his honour, by delivering it to the emperor. Tho' this were the caſe, there would be no leſs reaſon to be ſurpriſed at his management. It is eaſy to perceive it was very advantageous to Charles of Auſtria, grandſon to Maximilian, that Teroeunne belonged neither to the French nor the Engliſh; but what intereſt could Henry have to loſe ſo many men, and ſo much time, to take a place, in order to have it razed, in favour of Maximilian, who had not merited ſuch a condeſcenſion? 1513.

The ſeaſon being not far advanced, Henry reſolved, before the end of the campaign, to beſiege Tournay; whether he heard the place was ill provided, or the emperor's intrigues had again influenced his council, for the conqueſt of Tournay, which lies at ſome diſtance from Calais, was much leſs advantageous to Henry, than to the archduke Charles, whoſe dominions it ſecured; whereas Boulogne would have been, without doubt, much more convenient for the king, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Calais. However, the ſiege of Tournay was reſolved, probably, becauſe the emperor hoped the king would give him that place as he had done Terouenne; but he found againſt him, intereſts ſtronger than thoſe of the king himſelf, which oppoſed his deſigns.

The ſiege of Tournay. Mezerai.

Whilſt preparations were making for the ſiege, Henry paid a viſit to Margaret, governeſs of the Low-Countries, who was at Liſle, and ſtaid three days with her. Then he returned to his army, which was marching to Tournay, but the emperor left the king, on ſome diſguſt, the reaſon whereof is not known; The next day, the 15th of September, the army arrived before Tournay, which held out but ſeven or eight days. Henry entered the city on the 24th, a month after his entry into Terouenne. By the capitulation, the inhabitants were to have their antient privileges, on paying to Henry, a ſmall annual acknowledgment of 4000 livres Tournois, for 10 years only.

Tournay taken. Act. Pub.

After the taking of Tournay, the king calling a council of war, it was debated, whether it was proper to keep the place, which ſeemed to be difficult, on account of its diſtance from Calais; but, after a long debate, it was reſolved to keep it, and leave Sir Edward Poynings for governor, with a ſtrong garriſon. The contrariety of the two reſolutions, with regard to Terouenne and Tournay, will, perhaps, appear ſtrange. The firſt of theſe places, which was neareſt Calais, and ſecured the road from Calais to Tournay, was demoliſhed; and the ſecond, which could not without great difficulty be relieved, was deemed neceſſary to be kept. This contrariety could only proceed from Wolſey's intereſt, who influenced the council, as he pleaſed; for he had caſt his eyes on the biſhoprick of Tournay, as a thing very 1513. very convenient for him, whereas that of Terouenne was nothing in compariſon; and, accordingly, he, afterwards, found means to obtain the adminiſtration of this ſee, under pretence, that the biſhop refuſed to ſwear fealty to the king. This is the true reaſon, why it was reſolved to keep Tournay, and, perhaps, of undertaking the ſiege.

Margaret and Charles come and ſee Henry at Tournay. Herbert. Hall.

The next day, after the king's entry into Tournay, the princeſs Margaret, ducheſs dowager of Savoy, and the archduke Charles, her nephew, came to congratulate him on his new conqueſt. The fortnight they ſtaid with him, he took care to entertain them, with all ſorts of diverſions, as juſts, turnaments, running at the ring, balls, maſquerades, and the like; and, in the interim, amidſt all theſe diverſions, the miniſters of the two courts, began a treaty, which was concluded a few days after.

Henry returns their viſit. New treaty at Liſle. Act. Pub. Herbert.

Margaret and Charles being returned to Liſle, Henry repaid their viſit, and was received with all imaginable reſpect and civility; and, ſome days after, on the 15th of October, they ſigned a treaty, importing, that tho' Henry had bound himſelf not to repaſs into England till the war was ended, he ſhould, however, have liberty to return thither, with his army.

That, during the winter, the emperor ſhould keep, in Artois and Hainault, a body of 4000 horſe, and 6000 foot, for the defence as well of Tournay and the Tournaiſis, as of the archduke's dominions.

That, for the maintenance of theſe troops, Henry ſhould pay the emperor 200,000 crowns, at ſeveral payments.

That, before the 1ſt of June, next year, Henry ſhould carry war into Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, and the emperor into ſome other province of France.

That, before the 15th of May, the emperor, the ducheſs Margaret, the archduke Charles, the king of England, queen Catharine, and the princeſs Mary, ſhould meet all together, at Calais, to celebrate the archduke's marriage with the princeſs Mary, according to the treaty concluded, between the emperor and the late king Henry VII.

Remarks on the treaty.

Whatever was to be done, Henry muſt always find money. The emperor had already received 100,000 crowns of gold, without having executed any of his engagements entered into, by the treaty of Mechlin, and found means to procure 200,000 more by the preſent treaty, beſides the advantage of razing Terouenne, which very much annoyed his grandſon, the archduke's dominions; nay, it is very probable, the diſguſt, which made him quit the king's army, proceeded from his not being able to perſuade him to promiſe him Tournay, alſo, when taken; which manifeſtly ſhews, that he looked upon Henry, as a novice, eaſily to be enſnared. Certainly, Henry's many falſe ſteps, in the beginning of his reign, can only be excuſed, by his little knowledge of the character of the princes, with whom he treated.

Doubtleſs, Ferdinand was of the ſame opinion, concerning Henry, his ſon-in-law, for, notwithſtanding, the ill turn he had ſerved him laſt year, he had, ſtill, the aſſurance to ſend him an ambaſſador, at Liſle, to propoſe a new league, as if his word had been more to be relied on, than ſome months before; but it does not appear, that Henry was, then, inclined to truſt to his promiſes.

1513. Ferdinand propoſes a new league to Henry.

Henry departed from Liſle the 17th of October, and on the 24th arrived, at his palace, at Richmond, after a glorious campaign. I call it glorious, if the ſucceſs of his arms be only conſidered; but, in another reſpect, it was not very honourable, ſince he had been the dupe of the pope, Maximilian, and Ferdinand, who had thrown upon him the whole burden of the war, which ſhould have been common to all the four. It is true, he had taken Terouenne and Tournay; but the firſt of theſe places being given to the emperor, and razed, was to him of no benefit; and, as for Tournay, he never reaped any conſiderable advantage from it, by reaſon of its diſtance from Calais. Wolſey was the only gainer by it, the biſhoprick of that city, which he obtained in the end, together with the abbey of St. Amand, being of a much greater revenue, than what the king himſelf received from Tournay, and its territory.

Henry returns to England. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

The ill ſucceſs of the Italian campaign, had put Lewis XII's affairs, in a bad condition, and the loſs of the battle of Guinegatte, with the taking of Terouenne and Tournay, had entirely diſordered them; but this was a trifle, in compariſon of the danger France was in, by a Swiſs invaſion, after the French were driven out of the Milaneſe; for, the warlike Switzers, excited againſt Lewis, by the pope and the emperor, not being ſatisfied with their advantages over him in Italy, reſolved to attack him in his own kingdom. The opportunity was favourable, by reaſon of the ſeveral forementioned junctures; therefore, to improve this opportunity, the Switzers levied 15000 men, to whom the emperor joined all the nobility of Franche-Comte, and ſome German horſe, under the conduct of Ulrick, duke of Wirtemberg. This army entering the duchy of Burgundy, encamped before Dijon, where la Trimouille, lately returned from Italy, had ſhut himſelf up with ſome troops; but that place was ſo weak, that there was no likelihood of keeping it; he, however, defended it ſix weeks; but, at laſt, ſeeing that by the loſs of Dijon, not only Burgundy, but all the reſt of France would be in great danger, he thought he ſhould hinder it, without waiting Lewis's orders, which might come too late, by a capitulation with the Switzers, wherein he bound himſelf to pay them 400,000 crowns, of which he paid down 20,000, and promiſed, in the king's name, that he would deſiſt from all his pretenſions to the duchy of Milan. The Switzers, pleaſed with their expedition, retired into their own country, carrying with them four hoſtages, who found means to eſcape, when they knew the king refuſed to ratify the capitulation.

Lewis makes a peace with the pope. Guicciard. Mezerai. and Herbert.

Lewis XII, finding himſelf attacked, in ſo many places, and not doubting, that the pope

1513. and the king of Arragon created him all theſe troubles, reſolved, at laſt, to be reconciled with the pope. This agreement was the more eaſy, as Leo X, had not, like Julius II, a perſonal enmity againſt him; for, ſince the French were out of Italy, he had nothing to demand of the king, but the diſſolving of the council of Piſa, without which, indeed, he could not conſent to a peace; and, the council was grown ſo thin, that Lewis, in forſaking it, made no great ſacrifice to the pope. It is true, the ſubmitting in a point he had, hitherto, openly, maintained, ſeemed to be ſomething diſhonourable; but, as the council of Piſa had been properly ſummoned againſt Julius II, he thought he might, without reproach, yield to another pope. However, Lewis perceiving, that by his reconciliation with Leo X, he ſhould take from the kings of England and Arragon the pretence they uſed to make war upon him, was, at length, induced to renounce his council, and acknowledge that of Lateran. This renunciation was ſolemnly made in the tenth ſeſſion, held about the end of December.

The pope exhorts Henry to peace. Act. Pub. March 16. Guicciard.

Leo X, in the beginning of his pontificate, wrote to Henry, as to all the reſt of the princes, earneſtly exhorting him to peace; for, in this manner, he was to talk, in order to diſcharge the duty of the common father of Chriſtians. Henry, who ſaw, plainly, and was, afterwards, ſtill, more fully convinced, that this was only grimace, anſwered, he could not make peace without his allies, and, that a ſeparate peace would be directly contrary to all his engagements. This reply diſpleaſed not the pope, who then ſought only to raiſe enemies to France; but when he was ſure of his agreement with Lewis, he took occaſion to ſend another Letter to Henry, telling him, he never intended to perſuade him to make a ſeparate peace, but as he had taken arms ſolely for the defence of the church, and the holy ſee, and had, by his late victories, attained the end he had propoſed, it was reaſonable he ſhould lay them down, ſince the prince, who oppreſſed the church, was returned to his obedience. This letter was dated December the 17th, about the time of the tenth ſeſſion of the council of Lateran, wherein the French ambaſſadors made a ſolemn ſubmiſſion in their maſter's name.

Henry ſees he is abuſed.

Nothing contributed more to open Henry's eyes, than this ſecond letter; for, he imagined, when he proteſted, that he took arms in defence of the church, his allies knew, he did not mean, for all that, to neglect his own intereſt, that language being, properly, only to amuſe the publick. He had the more reaſon to believe it, as, even in the treaty of league, each of the allies had evidently propoſed to himſelf, temporal advantages; and yet, he ſaw, the pope had no ſooner obtained his deſire, but he took the words of the preamble of the treaty, in the literal ſenſe, as, if there had been, indeed, no other deſign, than to labour for the church, and, under that colour, pretended to diſſolve a league formed, by himſelf. This convinced him, that the pope, in drawing him into a war with France, had only his own intereſt in view. On the other hand, he was not better pleaſed with the king of Arragon, nor had reaſon to be ſo; and, as for the emperor, he had performed nothing of what he had promiſed. All theſe conſiderations having, at laſt, opened his eyes, produced a peace with France, which was concluded the next year. But before we cloſe this, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed, during the campaign, between the Engliſh and Scots. 1513.

War between England and Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert.

James IV, ſeeing Henry ready to carry war into France, called his parliament, and repreſented to them the indignities Scotland had ſuffered from the Engliſh, ſince the laſt peace Breton's affair was not forgot in this enumeration. But the beſt reaſon, he alledged to induce the Scots to a war, was, that France, the ancient and faithful ally of Scotland, being about to be attacked by the king of England, he could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting her. This reaſon, tho' very plauſible, was not, however univerſally approved; for, many thought it ſtrange, that the king ſhould, thus, wantonly, and without a preſſing neceſſity, break a peace advantageous to Scotland, ſolemnly ſworn to, and even, lately, renewed. But the king's creatures and the penſioners of France, whom Lamothe, the French ambaſſador, had now prepared to ſerve the king, his maſter, on this occaſion, carried it, by a great majority; ſo that war was determined.

James IV. enters England He ſends a defiance to Henry. Act. Pub. Hall.

Henry was in France, when James aſſembled his army, to invade England, according to the preceding reſolution; but to keep ſome ſort of formality, James wrote him a letter, and ſent it by a herald, who found him at the ſiege of Terouenne. This letter, dated the 26th of July, contained the grievances, James believed to have cauſe to complain of, and a declaration of war, in caſe he deſiſted not from his invaſion of France. Henry could not ſend his anſwer, till the 12th of Auguſt, the ſubſtance whereof was, "That he was

As for the "pretended grievances, alledged in his letter, "he ſaid, they had been ſo often anſwered, "that all farther mention of them was entire-"ly needleſs. But for the king of Scotland's "ſummoning him to deſiſt from the war with "France, he told him, he did not acknow-"ledge him for a competent judge in his af-"fairs with Lewis XII; and, notwithſtand-"ing, his menaces, would continue the war. James takes Norham. Herbert, &c.

James ſtayed not for an anſwer to his letter, to take the field; for, on the 22d of Auguſt, he entered Northumberland, and took ſeveral places, particularly Norham-caſtle. The Engliſh writers affirm, his army to be 60,000 ſtrong; nay, ſome mount the number to 100,000, which is hardly credible; however, it cannot be doubted it was very numerous, conſidering the care Buchanan takes to ſhew, it was extremely leſſened by deſertions, and by being kept unemployed for ſome time. The earl of Surrey was then in Yorkſhire, with 20,000 men; but, at the firſt news of the Scots entering England, he marched, immediately, towards them, and the 4th of September, came near enough to ſend and offer them battle, by a herald, who reported, that the king of Scotland accepted it for the Friday following. James was then encamped on the edge of mount Cheviot, where it was difficult to attack him; and, therefore, the earl of Surrey, ſeeing the Scots would fight only in ſo advantageous a poſt, reſolved to ſtay till they deſcended on the plain. The Engliſh not appearing on the day appointed, an old Scotch lord took occaſion to repreſent to the king, that he had done enough to ſave his honour; that it was not prudent to fight the Engliſh in their own country; but the beſt way would be to retire with his booty into Scotland, where it would be in his power to fight, or avoid a battle, as he pleaſed. That as he had taken arms only to make a diverſion, in favour of France, he no leſs employed the Engliſh forces, without fighting, than by hazarding a battle; that, on this occaſion, he ought not to liſten to the intereſted councils of the French ambaſſador, who only wanted to hazard ſome great action, at another's expence, in order to free the king his maſter from his preſent ſtraights; but in ſerving France, Scotland was, likewiſe to be regarded. This advice ſeemed too cautious to the king; for, as he had reſolved to give battle, he fiercely replied, he would fight the Engliſh, were they 100,000. In the interim, the earl of Surrey, to draw him from his poſt, marched along a river which parted the two armies, as if he intended to enter Scotland, through Carliſle, the road to which place he ſeemed to take. James having notice of it, ſet fire to his camp, and marched along the ſame river on the oppoſite ſide; but, unfortunately, for him, the ſmoak of his own camp hindered him from ſeeing the Engliſh, who forded the river unperceived. Then James halting about Flodden, drew up his army. Here it was the earl of Surrey attacked him, having paſſed, with difficulty, a ſort of moraſs, between the two armies. The particulars of this battle, are ſo variouſly related by the hiſtorians of both nations, that the one cannot be followed, without departing from the other. But as to the ſucceſs, it is not the ſame; for, they all agree, the Scots loſt the day, after valiantly fighting till night, which parted the combatants. The two armies retiring, the Engliſh knew not they were victorious, tilll the morning, when they ſaw, their enemies had quitted the field of battle, with all their artillery. The Engliſh own, they loſt 5000 men, in this battle, which was fought the 9th of September; but they ſay the Scots loſt 10,000. The Scots pretend, there were only 5000 ſlain, on each ſide, but confeſs their loſs was very conſiderable, by the great number of lords and officers of their nation, killed in the battle; whereas the Engliſh loſt not one perſon of diſtinction. King James was neeer more ſeen after the battle. The Engliſh imagined, they found his body wounded in two places, on a heap of dead, and orderad it to be put into a leaden coffin, without, however, daring to bury it, becauſe he died excommunicate. But the Scots ſaid, it was not the body of their king; for, they affirmed, that before the battle, he had cauſed five men, of his own ſtature, to wear the ſame arms with himſelf, and that the body which the Engliſh took for the king's, was one Elphinſton's, who greatly reſembled him; however, they could not tell what was become of the king. One ſaid, indeed, he ſaw him ride over the Tweed, after the battle. But as the fight laſted till night, this evidence is not much to be depended on. It was, however, the foundation of the report of his not being dead. Some ſuſpected, he was killed, in retiring out of the battle, by the lord Alexander Humes, or his vaſſals; but this fact was never well proved. However this be, it was never known, for certain, whether the body found by the Engliſh, on the field of battle, was the king's or nor. In the interim, Henry ſuppoſing it to be the very corpſe of James IV, wrote to the pope for a diſpenſation to inter it in St. Paul's church. Remarks upon this brief.

Among many remarks, that might be made on this brief, I shall confine my self to this one. There was no declaration of war, between James and Henry, before James's letter, dated the 16th of July, and received the 12th of August, nor any hostility committed before the 22d of August, when James entered England. So the king of Scotland cannot be said to have violated the truce till that time. Now, he died the 9th of September, excommunicated by the cardinal of York, who was then ambassador, at Rome. Hence, I think, it may be infered, that the cardinal had excommunicated James, without knowing the cause, or hearing his reasons, and, probably, upon a bare letter sent him, by Henry, that the king of Scotland intended to break the peace; since, I say, he only intended to break the peace, since there is no likelihood, that from the 22d of August, when James entered England, to the 9th of September, the day of his death, the cardinal, who was at Rome, could have been informed of the actual rupture, and proceeded to an excommunication. I say nothing of the supposition that James, slain on the spot, shewed any signs of repentance, especially, as it was even, uncertain, whether the body they would have interred, was the king of Scotland's. I pass over, likewise, the limitation set to the absolution, that it should serve only for interring the dead prince, in holy ground, and the penance enjoined a living person, in the name of a dead one. Every reader may make what reflections he thinks proper on these things, 1514. Interests and views of the princes of Europe.

Such being the situation of the affairs of Europe, at the end of the year 1513, it is not surprising, that the projects and interests of the princes should be different from what they were in the beginning of the same year; wherefore, it is necessary, before we enter on the recital of the events of the year 1514, to mention how the chief sovereigns stood affected.

Lewis XII.

Lewis XII. burned with desire to recover Genoa and Milan; but, he perceived, that to succeed, in that design, the allies must be divided, otherwise there was not even a possibility of undertaking it. The pope, emperor, Ferdinand, and Switzers, were equally concerned to oppose it; and yet, as they had also their separate interests, he thought it would not be impossible to divide them, by offering to each apart, or, at least, to some of them, advantages as great as those they could naturally expect from their union; besides, he hoped, in treating with each, in particular, to breed jealousies and suspicions among them, which would induce them to make haste and treat with him, for fear of being deserted. He had the more hopes of succeeding this way, as most of the princes with whom he was in war, were not over scrupulous, but rather, very ready to sacrifice their allies to their own private interest. To this artifice, therefore, Lewis recurred, to free himself from his present embarassment; for, at the beginning of the year 1514, he took care to renew the negotiation, concerning the marriage of the princess Renee, his second daughter, with Charles, archduke of Austria, knowing, Maximilian and Ferdinand were equally desirous of it, especially, on the terms proposed by themselves; however, he started difficulties capable of continuing the negotiation, without entirely breaking it off. The pope could not look upon this project, without uneasiness, being as much afraid of Milan's being in the hands of a grandson of the emperor and king of Arragon, as of seeing the French king restored; for his interest required, that Milan should remain in the family of the Sforza's. The Switzers passionately wished it, also. The Venetians too, would have therein found a great advantage, if another interest had not prevailed; and that was, to oblige the emperor to make peace with them on reasonable terms; but this they could not hope, without the assistance of France; and this assistance could not be obtained without aiding Lewis XII, to recover the Milanese.

1514.

Maximilian.

The emperor found his account, in his war with Venice, because it cost him little. Since the league of Cambray, he had always been powerfully assisted by France, or Spain, or rather, had never made war only at another's expence. His allies were necessarily obliged to find him men, or money, otherwise they might be sure he would quickly change sides; for, since he had left France, the Spanish troops had done all, in the war with Venice, and Ferdinand, with all his policy, was not able to dispense with acting for him; wherefore, it is not surprising, that he was so difficult, when a peace was on foot, or used his endeavours to inflame the divisions among the princes.

The king of Arragon.

As for king Ferdinand, since he was become master of Navarre, it was his interest to embroil affairs, and cherish in Italy, the hopes and fears of the several parties, to make himself necessary, and that a peace might not be concluded without him. He thereby tried to hinder Lewis from thinking of Navarre, and hoped, at last, to come to a treaty, which should leave him in quiet possession of his conquest; and, for that reason, he acted all sorts of parts, in order to attain his ends. One while, he assisted the emperor against the Venetians, another while, he solicited him in their favour. Sometimes he excited the pope and Switzers not to suffer the king of 1514. France to become maſter of Milan; and ſometimes he offered to aſſiſt the ſame prince to conquer that duchy. This was only deceit and artifice to preſerve a diſſention ſo advantageous to him. His policy, however, began to fail him; for he had ſo forfeited his reputation, with regard to ſincerity, that he was no longer truſted; and, it was merely neceſſity, or from a deſire to breed ſuſpicion in their enemies, that the reſt of the ſovereigns made any treaties with him, which they were ſenſible, they could not depend on.

Henry VIII. Henry had, with glory, got clear of his firſt campaign, but, plainly, ſaw himſelf indebted, for his good ſucceſs, to Lewis's paſſion, who had neglected the defence of his own kingdom, by ſending his beſt troops to recover Milan. The truth is, Henry, depending on the treaty of Mechlin, and the diverſions, his allies were to make, in ſeveral provinces of France, had led into that kingdom, not above 25000 men; too weak an army, to give him hopes of great advantages, had he been to deal with all the forces of his enemy. Forſaken as he was, by the pope, Maximilian, and Ferdinand, how would he have diſengaged himſelf, if Lewis XII. had reſolved to defer his Milan expedition to another time, and marched all his troops into Picardy? Thus, Henry ſhould have conſidered, and, in effect, did conſider, that he was more indebted for the victory of Guinegaſte, and the taking of Terouenne and Tournay, to the circumſtances of the time, than to his prudence or valour; wherefore, he was inclined to get clear of an affair, he had indiſcreetly embarqued in, without flattering himſelf, any longer, with the imaginary aſſiſtance of his allies. It was neceſſary, however, to conceal his inclination, in order to draw from France, advantageous conditions, in a treaty. Such was the poſture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1514. But before I ſpeak of thoſe of England, in particular, it is neceſſary to ſhew what ſteps were taken, by the princes concerned in the troubles of Italy, becauſe that was, then, the chief point, on which all the other affairs did depend.

The affairs of Italy. Guicciard.

Leo X. tries to reconcile the French and Switzers. Leo X, being alarmed at the negotiation, Lewis had renewed with the emperor, concerning the marriage of Renee, his ſecond daughter, uſed all poſſible means to reconcile the Switzers to France, that Lewis might be the leſs inclined to treat with the emperor and Ferdinand; but he wiſhed, that Lewis would ratify the capitulation of Dijon, as to what concerned the duchy of Milan; and, on the other hand, exhorted the Switzers to be ſatisfied with a leſs ſum, than was promiſed, by la Trimouille. This was the plan, he had formed for that reconciliation; and, in ſhort, he had ſo far gained his point, that the king of France had offered a truce for three years, without, however, departing from his pretenſions to Milan, and many of the principal Switzers were ſatisfied with it. But it was not poſſible to perſuade that people, to abate any thing of the capitulation of Dijon; for they even debated, whether they ſhould make a ſecond incurſion into France, to revenge the breach of that treaty. Thus, the pope's pains were fruitleſs, and the Switzers ſtill remained mortal enemies to France.

Ferdinand prolongs the truce with Lewis XII. Act. Pub. Ferdinand having advice of what was tranſacting in Switzerland, was afraid of being deſerted, whether Lewis gave up his claim to Milan, or the Switzers accepted the truce he offered them; ſo, without communicating any thing to his allies, he ſpeedily ſent Quintana, his ſecretary, to Paris, who renewed, for a year, the truce with France, on the ſame foot with the former; only, by a ſecret article, Lewis promiſed not to invade the Milaneſe, this year. In the publication of the truce in France, there was no mention of Milan; but Ferdinand publiſhed it, in Spain, with that article; ſo that the world was at a loſs, to know what to think of the matter. Lewis made no ſcruple to prolong the truce, becauſe he could not undertake to invade Milan and Navarre, before he had made a peace with England; and, beſides, he was very glad the world ſhould think, that the truce he had prolonged with the king of Arragon, would be followed by a peace.

The pope ſtrives to make peace between the emperor and Venetians. This was a very natural conſequence, and, probably, it inclined Henry, ſeriouſly, to think of a peace; but, on the other hand, Lewis was going to receive a great prejudice by it, in that the pope, to break his meaſures with regard to Milan, laboured with all his power, to procure a peace between the emperor and the Venetians. He deſired, above all things, for the good of his ſee, of all Italy, and of himſelf, that the French ſhould never more ſet foot in Italy; for whilſt the French were in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, Italy had never been free from troubles, the popes had been leſs regarded than before, and the Florentines had preſerved their liberty. Theſe were ſufficient reaſons to make the pope wiſh, they might never return; and, beſides, he had formed projects, for raiſing his family, which their neighbourhood might obſtruct. One great means to attain his ends, was, to deprive Lewis XII, of the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, which would infallibly happen, if it was poſſible to find ſome expedient to make their peace with the emperor. Laſt year the Venetians, preſſed, by the Spaniſh army, had agreed to make the pope umpire, and the emperor had accepted him; but the affair had lain dormant ever ſince. Soon after Ferdinand's renewing of the truce, with Lewis XII, the pope fearing a peace would be concluded, between the two kings, at the expence of the duchy of Milan, ſtrove to renew the negotiation between the emperor and the Venetians; for, he knew, if it ſucceeded, Lewis would, in vain, expect the aſſiſtance of the republick, to conquer Milan. In ſhort, with much ſollicitation, he obtained, from both parties, an engagement, to ſtand to his arbitration, and to give him power to ſettle the terms of the peace, as he ſhould think fit; but, however, by a writing under his own hand, he promiſed not to pronounce ſentence, without both their conſents.

It was very difficult to make this peace, becauſe

1514. The difficulties of the peace.

cauſe the war ſtill continuing, in the ſtate of Venice and Friuli, the leaſt ſucceſs was ſufficient to cauſe the parties to riſe or fall in their demands; for, when the Venetians found themſelves preſſed, they very willingly agreed, that the emperor ſhould keep Verona; but, then Maximilian would have alſo Vicenza, Padua, and Treviſo; and, when his affairs were not fortunate, he was ready to leave them theſe three places, but then they could not think of making peace without Verona. Thus, the pope, finding the various ſucceſs of the war, was a perpetual obſtacle to his projected agreement, paſſed a proviſional ſentence, ordering, that both parties ſhould lay down their arms; that the emperor ſhould depoſite, in his hands, Vicenza, and whatever was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards, in the territories of Padua, and Treviſo; that the Venetians ſhould do the like, with regard to Crema, and pay down to the emperor, 50,000 ducats. But that this proviſional agreement ſhould be deemed void, if the two parties ſhould not think proper to ratify it; and, in caſe they approved of it, he promiſed to pronounce a definitive ſentence, within a year. The Venetians did not think proper to ratify the ſentence, being perſuaded, that, in their preſent circumſtances, a truce was much more prejudicial, than the continuation of the war. Thus, the pope's endeavours were ineffectual. Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy, during the year 1514. We muſt ſee, now, what paſſed in England.

A parliament in England. Herbert.

Henry, at his return from his glorious campaign, thought only of mirth and diverſions. However, the parliament met, the 3d of January, but there was nothing done of any moment, with regard to the publick affairs. Before the end of the ſeſſion, the king gave the earl of Surrey, the title of duke of Norfolk, which his father had enjoyed, and loſt, with his life, at Boſworth-field, fighting for Richard III; and, by this change, Thomas Howard, ſon and heir of the new duke, became earl of Surrey. Charles Brandon, viſcount Liſle, one of the king's favourites, was alſo created duke of Suffolk; and Charles Somerſet, earl of Worceſter. Margaret of York, daughter to the duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV, obtained, likewiſe, the title of counteſs of Sarum, as heir to the earl of Warwick, her brother, beheaded by Henry VII.

Thomas Wolſey is made biſhop of Lincoln.

Thomas Wolſey had, now, been ſome months prime miniſter, without receiving other particular marks of his maſter's favour. But Wolſey was not forgetful of himſelf; for the biſhoprick of Lincoln, being vacant, he ſo ordered, that the king demanded it for him, of the pope, who had engroſſed the collations of all the ſees, by anticipated reſervations; and, ſoon after, Lewis Guillard, biſhop of Tournay, neglecting to repair to his biſhoprick, ſince the city was in the hands of the king of England, the pope readily ſuppoſed, that he had quitted his ſee, and gave the adminiſtration thereof to Thomas Wolſey, both in temporals and ſpirituals. This was ſuddenly and, almoſt, at once, a great addition, to the new favourite's income. Leo X, not expecting much, either from the empeor, or Ferdinand, eaſily perceived, he might want the king of England; and, in order, to gain his protection, he had diſpoſed of the ſees of Lincoln and Tournay, in favour of Wolſey, to win him to his intereſt, by preſents which coſt him nothing; but after, having ſatisfied the favourite, he muſt teſtify, by ſome mark of diſtinction, his eſteem for the maſter; and, to that purpoſe, he ſent him a ſword and a hat, conſecrated on Chriſtmas-day, which the popes were wont to preſent to princes or generals, who had obtained ſome ſignal victory over the enemies of the church. 1514.

Lewis XII. makes an offer of peace to Henry.

Whilſt the pope, Maximilian and Ferdinand, were labouring to accompliſh their projects, Lewis XII, was not neglectful of his own affairs. Among all his enemies, none gave him ſo much uneaſineſs, as the king of England, chiefly for two reaſons; firſt, Henry was young, greedy of glory, rich in ready money, and, moreover, always ſure of ſupplies from his parliament, eſpecially, in caſe of a war with France; ſecondly, the diverſion he could, and did make in Picardy, by means of Calais, rendered all Lewis's future projects, in Italy, abortive. He thereby kept the forces of France ſo divided, that it was, almoſt, impoſſible to aſſiſt one another, in caſe of accident. Thus, it was the king of France's great intereſt, to remove this thorn, from his ſide, otherwiſe he could not undertake to recover Genoa and Milan. Accordingly, he had been very ſeriouſly endeavouring it, ever ſince the end of the laſt campaign, by the miniſtry of Lewis of Orleans, duke of Longueville, taken priſoner at the battle of Guinegaſte. It was this private ambaſſador, who, in his frequent converſations, with Henry, laboured, by degrees, to open his eyes, by ſhewing him, how little he could depend on his allies, and clearly diſcovering their artifices, to draw him into their ſnares. Henry was convinced, but, in all appearance, was told many things which he knew not before. However this be, theſe converſations, had ſuch an effect, that Henry told the duke, he was inclined to a peace, provided it was on reaſonable terms. Lewis XII, having notice thereof, ordered the duke of Longueville, privately, to negotiate the affair, and try to diſcover the king of England's real intentions. Henry, probably, inſiſted, ſome time, on his claim to the whole kingdom of France, and, particularly, to Guienne and Normandy, which made the duke apprehenſive, his negotiation would not be ſucceſsful. However, to induce Henry to abate ſomething of his pretenſions, the duke had orders to demand the princeſs Mary, his ſiſter, for the king, his maſter, who had loſt Ann of Bretagne, his queen, the beginning of the year. This private negotiation, to which only Thomas Wolſey, biſhop of Lincoln, was admitted, continued ſome time, without making great progreſs, by reaſon of Henry's exceſſive demands; but, at laſt, at a ſecret conference, which the king himſelf had with the duke of Longue-

Here is a letter, from the king to Wolſey, under his own hand, after the conference, wherein appears, what was his laſt reſolution*.

HENRY R.

Tho' this letter has no date, it may, by ſeveral circumſtances, be conjectured, to be written, in June, 1514.

Lewis is not pleaſed with Henry's propoſals.

Lewis XII, being informed of the king of England's laſt reſolution, entertained great hopes of a peace. There were, however, two articles, which troubled him. The firſt, was to pay, yearly, 100,000 crowns, as a compenſation, for Henry's claim to the kingdom of France. This was, in ſome meaſure, to own the juſtice of his title, and pay him a ſort of tribute, which he could not reſolve. The other article related to Tournay, which he deſired to recover, and, which, however, was not mentioned, in the king's propoſals. But, as to this article, there was an obſtacle, which was not eaſily to be ſurmounted; and that was, Wolſey was concerned. It was not ſufficient to gain Henry by flatteries, or by giving him a ſum of money, in lieu of Tournay; the favourite muſt, alſo, be made amends for the loſs of a ſee, which brought him a conſiderable revenue. To endeavour, therefore, to agree on theſe two articles, Lewis ſent ambaſſadors to England. He choſe for this purpoſe, Lewis d'Orleans, duke of Longueville, John de Selve, firſt preſident of Roan; and Thomas Bohier, to whom Du Bellai gives the title of general of Normandy, and the king, in his commiſſion, that of chevalier general of France. In the interim, the two monarchs agreed on a ceſſation of arms, during the treaty.

He ſends ambaſſadors to England. Act. Pub. July 29.

A truce agreed on.

Henry refuſes to reſtore Tournay.

It was eaſier for the French ambaſſadors, to cauſe Henry to alter his laſt reſolution, concerning the firſt article, than to obtain the reſtitution of Tournay. The reaſon is evident. In the firſt article, the king, alone, was concerned; whereas in the ſecond, the miniſter's intereſt was, properly, in queſtion. However, ſince Henry was reſolved to make 1514. peace with France, Tournay could be of no farther uſe, and a ſum of money would have been, doubtleſs, more advantageous, than the preſervation of that place; but Wolſey perceived, when Tournay ſhould be in the hands of the king of France, he would, infallibly, loſe the adminiſtration of the ſee; ſo the negotiation of the ambaſſadors, on that article, was wholly fruitleſs. It was not the ſame, with regard to the penſion of the 100,000 crowns, demanded by Henry. They found means to perſuade him, to be ſatisfied with 1,000,000 of crowns, in which were included the 745,000, contained in the treaty of Eſtaples; but whereof, indeed, an inconſiderable part had been paid. The Spaniſh ambaſſador reſiding, at London, uſed all poſſible endeavours to intervene in the negotiation; but Henry would never ſuffer him, well knowing, he only intended to obſtruct it. The commiſſioners of the two kings having ſettled all the articles, the treaties were ſigned the 7th of Auguſt.

Three ſeveral treaties ſigned at London. Act. Pub.

There were three ſeparate treaties; the firſt, concerned only the renewing of the alliance, between France and England; the ſecond, was about the marriage of the princeſs Mary with Lewis XII; the third, related to the payment of 1,000,000 of crowns. As theſe treaties ſerved for a foundation, to many others, hereafter, concluded, it is neceſſary to inſert the ſubſtance, at leaſt, of the moſt material articles.

I. TREATY,

Of peace and amity, between LEWIS XII, and HENRY VIII, concluded, at London, Auguſt 7, 1514.

THAT the amity, between the two kings, ſhould laſt, till a year after the deceaſe of the ſhorteſt liver.

That the ſucceſſor of him that died firſt, ſhould give notice, within the year, to the other, whether he would prolong this, or make a new treaty.

That all impoſitions laid, within 52 years laſt paſt, by one king on the ſubjects of the other, ſhould be aboliſhed.

That the peace ſhould not be deemed violated, by the outrages committed on either ſide.

That neither of the two kings ſhuld afford protection or refuge, to the rebels of the other.

By the 14th, 15th, and 16th articles, the two kings bound themſelves to mutual aſſiſtance, in three caſes. 1. For defence of one another's dominions. 2. For recovery of the territories with-held by other princes. 3. In caſe one of the two kings ſhould be attacked on account of the preſent treaty, and ſaid, upon his honour, it was for that cauſe. In each of theſe caſes the conditions were different. But in the laſt, they promiſed mutual aſſiſtance, tho' the aſſailant ſhould be relation, friend, or ally, of one only, or of both. 1514.

Lewis included, in the treaty, as his allies, the pope, and Switzers, and king of Scotland; and, on Henry's part, were named, the pope, Bologna, all the towns of St. Peter's patrimony, archduke of Auſtria, and Switzers.

Scotland was included, in the treaty, but, on condition, that the Scots ſhould commit no hoſtilities againſt England, after the 25th of November.

That the treaty ſhould be ratified and ſworn, by the two kings, and confirmed by the parliament of England, and the ſtates-general of France.

That each of the two kings ſhould endeavour to obtain of the pope, a ſentence of excommunication againſt the violater of the peace.

II. TREATY,

Concerning the marriage of LEWIS XII, with the princeſs MARY.

THAT matrimony ſhould be contracted by proxies, and per verba de præſenti, within 10 days, after the date of this treaty.

That the king of England, within two months after the contract, ſhould conveigh, at his own charge, the princeſs, his ſiſter, to Abbeville, where, within four days after her arrival, the king of France ſhould ſolemnly marry her.

That Mary ſhould have, in dower, 400,000 crowns, 200,000 whereof ſhould be reckoned for jewels, &c. and in caſe of recovery, Lewis ſhould be obliged to reſtore only the jewels, &c. which ſhould be valued, at the ſum of 200,000 crowns.

That the other half, amounting to 200,000 crowns, Henry ſhould pay, by deducting the ſum out of the 1,000,000 the king of France was bound to pay, by a late treaty.

That the future queen's jointure ſhould be as great, as that aſſigned to Ann of Bretagne, or any other queen of France.

That in caſe of Lewis's death, Mary ſhould enjoy her dower and jointure, during Life, whether ſhe reſided in France or England.

III. TREATY,

For the payment of 1,000,000 of crowns.

BY this treaty, Lewis XII. acknowledged, that by the treaty of Eſtaples, Charles VIII. was bound to pay Henry VII, or his ſucceſſors, the ſum of 745000 crowns, and that himſelf was obliged to pay the arrears of the ſame.

Moreover, that Charles, duke of Orleans, his father, by an obligation, dated March the 7th, 1444, had owned himſelf debter, in a certain ſum to Margaret of Somerſet, grandmother of Henry VIII.

That theſe two ſums not being yet paid, Lewis bound himſelf to pay to the king of England, or his ſucceſſors, 1,000,000 of crowns, "as well for the arrears of the ſaid two ſums, "as on account of the good affection he bore "him, and to the end their amity might be "the more laſting."

That this 1,000,000 ſhould be paid by Lewis, to the king of England, by half-yearly payments of 50,000 livres Tournois, till the whole was diſcharged.

Thus, the war, which had been undertaken, on pretence of religion, and for the glory of God, ended in a treaty, which mentions neither religion, pope, or church.

The princeſs Mary proteſts againſt her contract with Charles of Auſtria. Act. Pub. July 30. Herbert.

On the other hand, tho' the princeſs Mary had been ſolemnly affianced, to Charles of Auſtria, Lewis XII, and Henry VIII, made no difficulty concerning this ſecond marriage, neither did they ſo much as vouchſafe to demand the pope's diſpenſation, to abſolve Mary from her firſt contract; only, a few days before the ſigning of the treaty, Mary declared, in the preſence of a notary publick, and other witneſſes, that ſhe had been forced to plight her faith, to the prince of Caſtile, archduke of Auſtria; that, moreover, the archduke, having promiſed to eſpouſe her, by proxy, and per verba de præſenti, as ſoon as he was 14 years of age, had broken his word; and, ſhe added farther, that ſhe was credibly informed, the counſellors and confidents of the prince of Caſtile, were inſtilling into him, to the utmoſt of their power, an averſion for the king of England, her brother. Upon theſe allegations, the two kings making themſelves judges, in a cauſe, which, doubtleſs, belonged to the pope's cognizance, thought fit the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

Remark on the third treaty.

I have ſtill to remark on the third treaty, that, tho' Henry had declared to the duke of Longueville, as appears in his letter to Wolſey, that he could not make peace, unleſs the king of France would pay him a yearly penſion of 100,000 crowns, as a compenſation for the inheritance he with-held from him, an expedient was found to ſatisfy him with much leſs; for, the whole was reduced to Lewis's bond, to pay him 1,000,000 of crowns, two thirds, of which, were, already, due, before the treaty. Beſides, that this bond might not be conſidered, as a compenſation of the king of England's title to France, purſuant to Henry's intentions, it was expreſly ſaid, in the treaty, to be in payment of the arrears of the 745000 crowns, due to the king of England, by the treaty of Eſtaples, of another ſum, due from the duke of Orleans, to Margaret, the king's grandmother, and laſtly, for Lewis's good affection to Henry. Hereby was cauſed to vaniſh, the principal foundation, on which Henry had built his demand, of a penſion of 100,000 crowns; a demand, conſidered by him, at firſt, as the baſis of the treaty, according to his letter to Wolſey. It may, therefore, be affirmed, that Henry was no leſs over-reached, by the king of France, in the treaty of peace, than he had been by the pope, emperor, and Ferdinand, in that which had engaged him in the war. This proceeded not from his miſunderſtanding his own intereſts, ſince it appears in his letter, that he was very ſenſible of the conſequence of his demand. To what then can his eaſineſs be aſcribed, but to the inſinuations of his prime miniſter, who certainly erred not, out of ignorance? Lewis, probably, found means to make Wolſey his friend. We ſhall ſee ſtill more plainly, hereafter, that this miniſter was much more mindful of his own, than his maſter's advantages, when they came in competition, and that he loſt no opportunity of inriching himſelf.

The death of cardinal Bambridge. Herbert. Act. Pub.

Whilſt Wolſey was employed with the French ambaſſadors, in negotiating the peace, cardinal Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, died, at Rome, the 14th of July. The ſame day, cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards pope, by the name of Clement VII, ſent the king notice, acquainting him, likewiſe, that he had prevailed with the pope, not to diſpoſe of the ſee of York, before his pleaſure was known; upon which, the king demanded the archbiſhoprick, for Thomas Wolſey, which was, immediately, granted. This miniſter was then, in ſo great favour, that he abſolutely directed all the king's affairs, who had for him a very great eſteem and affection. It may be preſumed, that he was, now, doing Lewis XII, ſome good ſervices, ſince there are, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral letters from that monarch to him, beginning with theſe kind words, "My lord of York, and very "good friend.

Wolſey is made archbiſhop of York.

Lewis's marriage with Mary conſummated. Hall. Stow.

Auguſt and September were ſpent in preparations for the new queen of France's journey, in the celebration of the marriage by proxies, in France and England, and in the ratifications of the treaties; after which, Mary was conducted to Abbeville, with a numerous train of lords and ladies, where the marriage was conſummated the 9th of October.

Leo X. propoſes a new league to the king of France. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

Whilſt the peace, between France and England, was treating, at London, the pope, emperor, and Ferdinand, omitted nothing, that they imagined would obſtruct it; for, they plainly perceived, it could not but turn to their prejudice, and, that the burden of the war would fall upon them, being even afraid, that Henry would join againſt them, with France. Leo X. had ſent to Henry, to perſuade him to a peace, and yet, when he ſaw it on the point of concluſion, would have been glad, his exhortations had not been regarded; ſo, to croſs the negotiation at London, as much as he could, he propoſed a new league with the king of France, imagining it would be a means to abate his eagerneſs for a peace with England; but as Lewis took a fortnight to give him his anſwer, he was afraid of being left alone, and for that reaſon, made haſte and concluded a defenſive league, with the king of Arragon, for a year only.

On the other hand, Ferdinand fearing Lewis, after making a peace with England, would invade Navarre, offered him his aſſiſtance to conquer Milan; but Lewis knew him too too well, to put any confidence in him. In ſhort, the emperor and Ferdinand, deſiring, at any rate, to hinder him from concluding with England, ſent him their conſent in form, for the marriage of Renee, his ſecond daughter, with Charles of Auſtria, their grandſon; and, at the ſame time, Maximilian ratified the one year's truce, made by Ferdinand with France. But all would not do; for, they had even the mortification to hear, that they were neither of them included in the treaty of London; a clear evidence how little Henry valued their friendſhip; yet, notwithſtanding all this, they, both feigned to be extremely pleaſed with the peace, tho', in their hearts, they were exceedingly vexed.

The pope tries to amuſe Lewis XII. Guicciard.

It was expected, that the king of France, being freed from the war with England, would infallibly recover Genoa and Milan; and the pope was ſo perſuaded, of it, that he wrote to exhort him to that expidition, tho', at the ſame time, he uſed all his endeavours to break his meaſures, by an agreement between the emperor and the Venetians. He even diſpatched to Venice, Peter Bembo, afterwards cardinal, to incline the Venetians to peace. But theſe fearing the pope was laying a ſnare for them, to take off the king from their alliance, gave him immediate information, and thereby rendered him very jealous of his holineſs,

He forms vaſt projects for his houſe. Guicciard.

Leo X. was forming, at that time, grand projects, in favour of Julian de Medici, his brother. His deſign was to become maſter of Ferrara and Urbino, and to join theſe two ſtates to Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and the city of Modena, lately purchaſed of the emperor, in order to caſt them into one ſtate, for this brother, of whom he had a mind to make a great prince; nay, it is affirmed, he intended to add the kingdom of Naples; and to make that conqueſt, had joined in a league with the Venetians; but, as he ſaw the king of France would quickly invade the Milaneſe, he ſhewed great regard for him, leſt he ſhould make an enemy of a prince, who, if he came to be poſſeſſed of Milan, would have it in his power to obſtruct his deſigns. In the interim, Lewis not being pleaſed with the pope, preſſed him to declare himſelf, reſolving to know for certain, whether he was to conſider him as a friend, or an enemy. Leo, who perceived his intent, amuſed him with fair words, however, without being determined, becauſe his purpoſe was to regulate his conduct, by the events of the war, he foreſaw. This did not hinder Lewis from vigorouſly continuing the neceſſary preparations, for his expedition into Italy, where he intended to go, in perſon, the next ſpring; but whilſt he was thinking of means to relieve the Lanthorn-Tower, which he ſtill held at Genoa, and by the help whereof, hoped to become maſter of the city, he received the news, that it was ſurrendered by capitulation, and, immediately, razed, by the Genoeſe. However, this was not capable to deter him from his deſigns upon Italy, Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Before I cloſe the year 1514, it will be neceſſary, briefly, to relate what paſſed in Scotland, this year. James IV. left two ſons, of whom the eldeſt, called after his own name, was not yet full two years old. By a will, made before he took the field, he left the regency of the kingdom, after his death, to his queen, ſiſter to Henry VIII, during her widowhood. The ſtates being met, the beginning of the year 1514, immediately, acknowledged for king, James V, ſon and heir to the deceaſed; and, as for the regency, there would, doubtleſs, have been great debates, if the loſs of the battle of Floddon had not made the Scots apprehenſive, that the king of England would improve the advantage he had over them. There had never been, in Scotland, a queen-regent, and that would have been ſufficient to reject the clauſe of the late king's will; but it was hoped, the queen would prevail with the king, her brother, to leave, in peace, a country whereof ſhe had the government. This expectation was not diſappointed; for the queen being declared regent, and writing to the king, her brother, to entreat him not to diſturb the minority of the young king, his nephew, Henry generouſly anſwered, he was equally inclined to peace, or war, and left it to the Scots, to chuſe which they pleaſed.

1514.

The queen dowager marries, and loſes the regency.

After this declaration, probably, Scotland would have remained in quiet, under the regency of the queen, if that princeſs had not married again, ſome months after. She choſe for her conſort, Archibald Douglaſs, earl of Angus, one of the greateſt lords, in Scotland, and by this ſecond marriage filled the kingdom with confuſion and trouble. As by the late king's will, ſhe was to be regent only during her widowhood, the queſtion was, to appoint another in her room. Douglaſs, her husband, uſed all his endeavours to have her continued in the regency, affirming, that there was no other way to preſerve peace with England; and beſides, Henry would be obliged to ſupport the queen, his ſiſter, in caſe any one ſhould pretend to diſturb her. But this laſt conſideration had a quite contrary effect, to what the earl expected, on thoſe who dreaded his too great advancement; for, they knew, that being husband to the regent, he would always be countenanced by the king of England, and by his aſſiſtance, enabled to engroſs more authority, than they wiſhed him. Alexander Hume, governor of all the country north of the Frith, was the head of thoſe that oppoſed the queen's regency. He was a proud and haughty man, who could not indure a ſuperior. During the late king's life, he had been preſident of the Marches, bordering on England, where he ha dcommitted ſuch outrages, that, as ſome ſay, for fear of being called to an account, he killed, or cauſed to be killed, James IV, when he was retiring out of the battle of Floddon. However this be, Hume uſed all his intereſt to break Douglaſs's and the queen's meaſures, and propoſed John Stewart, duke of Albany, for regent. This duke was ſon to Alexander, duke of Albany, brother to king James III, who, to avoid the perſecutions of the king, his brother, was forced to fly into France,

1514. France, where he died. He left there this ſon, who being married, and adhering to the ſervice of Lewis XII*, had received many favours from that monarch, and acquired great reputation. Tho' he had never been in Scotland, he was, however, the young king's neareſt relation, and Hume had intereſt enough to have him declared regent; upon which, the ſtates ſent deputies to offer him the regency, and to pray him to come inſtantly, and govern the realm, in the king's name. Lewis XII, dying, whilſt theſe things were in agitation, Francis I, his ſucceſſor, having great reaſons not to diſpleaſe the king of England, would not ſuffer the duke of Albany to depart, till he had finiſhed his affairs with Henry; and, for this cauſe, the regent did not arrive in Scotland, before May, 1515. During this interval, Scotland being without a governor, the diſſenſions among the great men much increaſed, every one having time to form his cabals againſt the regent's arrival.

1515. The death of Lewis XII. Francis I. king of France. Mezerai.

The firſt day of the year 1515, was the laſt of Lewis XII's life. But the death of that prince made no alteration in the ſituation of the affairs of the kingdom; for the duke of Valois, who ſucceeded him, by the name of Francis I, plainly diſcovered, by adding the title of duke of Milan to that of king of France, that he intended to purſue his predeceſſor's deſigns; but, in the interim, he did not think fit, openly, to declare his intentions, till he had ſettled his affairs, both abroad and at home.

The queen dowager of Lewis XII, marries the duke of Suffolk. Hall.

By the death of Lewis XII, queen Mary, his widow, was at liberty to diſpoſe of herſelf, and to follow her own inclinations, rather than the politick views of the king, her brother. Before her marriage, ſhe had conceived an affection for Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, a moſt accompliſhed lord; and, it is even ſaid, that the king had promiſed to marry her to him; but Lewis XII, coming in the way, and her marriage with that prince, being to make the ſeal of the peace between France and England, ſhe was under a neceſſity to ſacrifice her love, to the good of the two kingdoms. However, the duke of Suffolk waited on her, into France, tho' he was not of the number of thoſe who were appointed to conduct her; and, Mezerai affirms, that the duke of Valois, preſumptive heir to the crown of France, cauſed him to be narrowly watched, for fear he ſhould give the king a ſucceſſor; which ſhews, that the queen's inclination was no ſecret. The death of Lewis XII. happening, within three months after his marriage, the queen dowager was not willing to run a ſecond riſque, of being given to another husband, not of her own chuſing. Henry ſuſpecting her deſign, wrote to her, the beginning of February, deſiring her not to marry again, without his participation. But, the queen believed it would be eaſier to obtain the king's pardon, when the thing was done, than his permiſſion to do it; ſo in March, about two months after the the death of Lewis XII, ſhe was privately married to the duke of Suffolk; and the next day, ſhe ſent word of it, in a letter to the king, her brother, and taking the whole blame upon herſelf, intimated to him, that ſhe had, in ſum meaſure, forced the duke to this raſh action. Henry ſeemed, at firſt, very angry, but his anger was ſoon over. Their peace being made, they returned to Henry, and were very well received. 1515.

Parliament in England.

The parliament was then ſitting, and as England was in profound tranquillity, the houſes was only employed in domeſtick affairs, which are of little or no conſequence to foreigners. However, there were three ſtatutes paſſed this ſeſſion, which deſerve notice. It was provided by the firſt, that unwrought wooll ſhould not be exported out of the kingdom, for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture. This act has been often revived, by reaſon of its importance, and yet, even, now, an effectual means is wanting to prevent the clandeſtine exportation of wooll. The ſecond ſtatute declared all the king's ſecond letters patents to be void, unleſs mention was made of the firſt. This was to prevent the king from being ſurpriſed. The third was no leſs neceſſary. It frequently happened, that towards the end of a ſeſſion, ſeveral members went home, imagining, there was nothing more of moment to be done; then the factious took advantage of their abſence, to propoſe and paſs ſuch bills, as, probably, would have been thrown out, had the houſe been more numerous; wherefore, it was enacted, that the members who abſented themſelves before the end of the ſeſſion, without the ſpeaker's and commons leave, to be entered in the clerk of the parliament's book, ſhould loſe their wages. I muſt, now, interrupt, for ſome time, the recital of domeſtick, to ſpeak of foreign affairs, which are to ſerve for a foundation to what will, hereafter, be ſaid with regard to England.

The alliance between France and England renewed. Act. Pub.

Francis I. was too much concerned, to renew the alliance between France and England, to fail of performing the article of the treaty, whereby the ſucceſſor of him that died firſt, was to acquaint the other, whether he deſigned to prolong the time of the alliance; for, as he intended to paſs into Italy, to recover the duchy of Milan, it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſecure the king of England; and, to that purpoſe, about the middle of March, he ſent to the firſt preſident of Roan, his ambaſſador at London, a commiſſion to renew the alliance with Henry, as well as the bond for the payment of 1,000,000, to which Lewis XII. was obliged. This was done by a new treaty, ſigned the 5th of April, and exactly like the former.

Ferdinand ſeeks Henry's friendſhip.

After all the frauds uſed by the king of Aragon to Henry, there was no room to hope for a perfect friendſhip between them; but, however, Ferdinand, who was not eaſily diſcouraged, ſent to the king, his ſon-in-law, a new ambaſſador, to propoſe the renewing of their alliance. It is likely, he did not believe, Henry had ſo ſoon forgot his deceits, but it was for his intereſt, that he ſhould be known 1515. to have an ambaſſador in England. This ambaſſador arrived in May, but was ſuffered to wait, in vain, till October, without being diſpatched; nay, very probably, he would never have ſucceeded in his negotiation, if Wolſey's intereſts had not cauſed the king to alter his reſolution, never to have any thing to do with the king, his father-in-law. I ſhall ſpeak more fully of this affair, in another place.

Henry tries to be reconciled with Charles, the archduke.

Whilſt the Spaniſh ambaſſador was waiting, in vain, at London, Henry had two, at Bruſſels, who made no greater progreſs. He had not dealt very generouſly with the young archduke, in giving the princeſs, his bride, to Lewis XII, without any ceremony. Charles Indeed, had not repaired to Calais, the 5th of May, laſt year, as he was bound by the treaty of Liſle; but it could not thence be inferred, that he had renounced his marriage, at leaſt, before he was asked, whether he intended to conſummate it. Therefore, Henry was afraid, the archduke, having lately aſſumed the government of the Low-Countries, and made a treaty with Francre, would think of revenging the affront put upon him; ſo, in order to ſound him, or prevent the effects of his reſentment, he ſent two ambaſſadors, to propoſe the renewing of the former alliance, between Henry VII. and Philip I, their fathers; but theſe ambaſſadors were ſuffered to wait a good while, at Bruſſels, without being much regarded, or receiving any anſwer.

Francis I. prepares to recover Milan. Guicciard.

The affairs of Europe were, then, in a ſituation, which would not allow the young archduke to engage in any party. It was neceſſary, in order to take juſt meaſures, to wait the ſucceſs of the war, Francis I. was preparing to carry into Italy; for, in all appearance, it would produce events, capable of altering the intereſts and projects of moſt of the ſovereigns. Since Francis's acceſſion to the crown, he had ſufficiently ſhewn, that he intended not to ſuffer Maximilian Sforza, peaceably, to enjoy the duchy of Milan. On the other hand, the king of Arragon was under apprehenſions for Naples and Navarre. Francis I, was a young prince, full of courage and ambition, and it could not be doubted, that he had formed great projects; ſo, that the eyes of all were upon him, to ſee in what manner he would begin his reign. He was making preparations, which diſcovered he had ſome great deſign in his thoughts, and did not take much pains to conceal, that he had Milan in view. In the interim, he uſed for pretence of his armament, the invaſion Burgundy was threatened with, by the Switzers. But the league he had lately renewed, with Venice, and his offer to Ferdinand to prolong the truce, provided the ſecret article, concerning the Milaneſe, was annulled, were plain indications of his deſigns.

Ferdinand forms a league againſt France. Guicciard.

All this was not ſufficient to make Ferdinand perfectly eaſy; for he was afraid of being deceived by Francis, and that his preparations were intended for Navarre. To prevent this danger, he rejected Francis's offer, and made uſe of it, likewiſe, to induce the emperor and Switzers, to join with him for the defence of the Milaneſe, intimating there was no room to queſtion, that the king of France would turn his arms that way. As for the emperor, he did not want much ſollicitation; for he readily entered into all ſorts of leagues, becauſe he ever found means to thrive at another's expence. There was more difficulty, with reſpect to the Switzers, becauſe Francis had among them adherents, who endeavoured to diſſuade them from the league; but his enemies prevailed in the end, and the league was concluded between the emperor, king of Arragon, duke of Milan, and the Switzers. Ferdinand played one of his uſual artifices on this occaſion. He perſuaded the Switzers, that to defend the Milaneſe, the ſhorteſt way was to attack the king of France, in his own kingdom; and, for that purpoſe, he engaged to make a powerful diverſion on the ſide of Fontarabia, whilſt the Switzers ſhould invade Burgundy, and the emperor, by continuing the war in the ſtate of Venice, hinder the Venetians from aſſiſting the common enemy. His chief view was to defend Navarre, in caſe Francis I, had thoughts of turning his arms that way, and then to hinder that prince from becoming maſter of the duchy of Milan. His league with the Switzers, was equally ſubſervient to both theſe ends; for, if Francis I, invaded Navarre, the Switzers would divert him from his purpoſe, by making an inroad into Burgundy; but it he really intended to conquer Milan, the Switzers, as next neighbours, and moſt concerned, could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting that duchy. What Ferdinand had foreſeen, came to paſs; for Francis, having ordered his forces to file off towards the Alps, the Switzers ſent their troops into Italy, where they ſeized the two paſſes, through which only, it was thought poſſible to enter the Milaneſe. When Ferdinand was aſſured, that the king of France was marching towards Milan, he disbanded the army, levied for the defence of Navarre, leaving the Milaneſe to be taken care of, by the Switzers. The very army Ferdinand had in Italy, under the comand of the viceroy of Naples, made no motion to join them; the emperor remained, without acting, at Inſpruck; and Leo X, who had alſo entered into the league, gave them no ſort of aſſiſtance. Thus the whole burden of the war fell upon the Switzers, without even the other allies ſending a penny of the money that was promiſed them. But this was not ſtrange. The Switzers were no more exempted, than the king of England, and ſo many other princes, whom Maximilian and Ferdinand had ſerved in the ſame manner.

Guicciard.

In the interim, Francis I, having found means to march his army through a place, which ſeemed impracticable, the Switzers, who gaurded the paſſes, retired to Milan, and Francis advanced, alſo, towards the ſame city. When he approached, he offered the Switzers a ſum of money to return home. This negotiation was, now, in great forwardneſs, when they received a ſupply of 15000 men of their nation; and this aid rendered them more ſtout, they reſolved, by the ſuggeſtions

of

1515. of the cardinal of Sion, immediately, to attack Francis, who lay encamped, at Marignano, little expecting their coming; but they were defeated, and 10,000 ſlain on the ſpot; after which, they retired into their country, leaving Francis maſter of all the Milaneſe. Maximilian Sforza, who had ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Milan, ſurrendered it, by capitulation, and was ſent into France, to live as a private perſon.

Francis gains the battle of Marignano.

Before Francis I, began his expedition, Octavian Fregoſa had brought Genoa under the dominion of France, and inſtead of doge, ſtiled himſelf governor for the king.

Genoa is ſubjected to France. Guicciard.

Leo X, had been in hopes, that Francis would never be able to enter Italy. He had joined in the league againſt him, but ſo privately, that Francis knew nothing of it, till he came to Verceil. During the time between the king's arrival in Italy, and the battle of Marignano, the pope was under great perplexities. He had ſent an army into Lombardy, to ſupport the duke of Milan; but when he heard that Francis had ſurmounted the difficulties of the paſſage, he ſent orders to Lorenzo de Medici, who commanded his army, to commit no hoſtilities againſt the French; and, at the ſame time, he told the king, his army was there only to guard Parma and Placentia. In the interim, as the affair of Milan was not yet decided, he durſt not make too many advances to the king, for fear of diſpleaſing the allies, who would have it in their power to be revenged, if the king happened to be vanquiſhed; but, after the battle of Marignano, he was, immediately, reconciled with him, and tho' he had grievouſly offended him, obtained, however, advantages, which he could ſcarce have expected, had he taken his part from the beginning. The popes make leagues, and undertake wars, as temporal princes, and when their affairs do not proſper, diſintangle themſelves, as heads of the church, and vicars of Jeſus Chriſt. Tho' Leo X's behaviour to Francis was ſuch, that he deſerved no favour from that victorious prince, he obtained, however, whatever he pleaſed, and among other things, the abolition of the pragmatick ſanction, which the popes, his predeceſſors, had, hitherto, in vain, demanded of the king of France.

Leo X. makes his peace with Francis.

Tho' Henry had not been able, entirely, to avoid the ſnares laid by the pope, emperor, and Ferdinand, he had happily got clear, but with a firm reſolution never more to be, thus, over-reached; for, his affecting not to mention them, in his treaty with France, plainly ſhewed, that he did not much value their friendſhip; but, he was not ſo fortunate, as to perſiſt in this reſolution, ſince it was his own fault that he engaged in a freſh war with France, not ſo much for his own, as the inter-of others. His change may be aſcribed to three ſeveral cauſes; the firſt is, his jealouſy of the glorious ſucceſs of Francis's arms in Italy; the ſecond, to prevent the growing power of that neighbour; the third and principal, Wolſey his favourite's intereſt, who thinking to have reaſon to complain of the king of France, would be revenged. The two firſt need no explanation; for, it is well known, that princes are ſubject to paſſions, like other men, and that jealouſy may induce them to run counter to their intereſt; it is known, likewiſe, that policy is as it were the hinge, on which almoſt all their actions turn. But on this occaſion, Henry proceeded upon a very wrong policy, ſince nothing was more capable of ſecuring the peace of England, than the king of France's acquiſitions in Italy. The third cauſe requires a more particular explanation. 1515.

Thomas Wolſey, archbiſhop of York, was prime Miniſter, and chief favourite; but this does not fully expreſs the thing; for it muſt be added, that he ſo abſolutely governed the king, that he turned him which way he pleaſed; but he managed ſo artfully, that the king always fancied he took his own courſe, when he only followed the ſuggeſtions of his miniſter. Wolſey had great talents, for a perſon of his birth; but he had alſo great failings, being exceſſively revengeful, greedy of poſſeſſions and honours, and intolerably proud; for he no ſooner ſaw himſelf fixed, in his maſter's favour, but he ſought means to remove from court, all thoſe that gave him any jealouſy, by the king's eſteem for them. Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who had been moſt in favour, received ſo many mortifications from this imperious prelate, that, at length, they quitted the court, not to be expoſed to his inſults. Fox withdrew to his dioceſe, the beginning of this year*; the two dukes quickly followed, and Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, retired, alſo, at the end of the ſame year. Theſe old miniſters being thus removed, Wolſey became ſtill more abſolute over the king, who had only him to adviſe with, in his moſt important affairs; and, the reſt of the privy-council were all the favourite's creatures. The hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that Wolſey's intereſt was the ſole rule of the counſels he gave the king, and, as this intereſt anſwered his reigning paſſions, revenge, greedineſs, ambition, and pride, the reader muſt not be ſurpriſed, when he ſees him, hereafter, inducing the king to make ſo many falſe ſteps.

Wolſey's great credit. Pol. Virg.

Ever ſince Francis I. came to the crown, he had been thinking of recovering Tournay, out of the hands of the Engliſh; for there had even paſſed, in the beginning of the year, a treaty on that ſubject, but to no purpoſe, becauſe Henry demanded, in exchange of Tournay, ſome places in the neighbourhood of Calais, which Francis did not think proper to grant him; but the greateſt difficulty came from Wolſey, who was far from adviſing the king, his maſter, to reſign Tour-

nay,

1515. nay, becauſe himſelf would have loſt the adminiſtration of that biſhoprick and the abbey of St. Amand, which brought him a great revenue. On the contrary, he had been very urgent with Francis I, to beſtow ſome good benefice on Lewis Guillard, biſhop of Tournay, that he might ſuffer him peaceably to enjoy his adminiſtration. Francis had promiſed him, but without intending to keep his word; for, inſtead of aſſiſting him, to keep the adminiſtration, he ſecretly perſuaded the biſhop, to ſue to the pope for his reſtoration, and ſeconded his petition, to the utmoſt of his power, being of opinion, that when Wolſey ceaſed to be adminiſtrator, the reſtitution of Tournay would become much eaſier.

The pope reſtores the biſhop of Tournay. Herbert.

Whilſt Francis was ſtill in France, employed in preparing for his Italian expedition, the pope, yet uncertain of the ſucceſs of that enterpriſe, did not much regard the biſhop's ſollicitations; but when he ſaw that prince maſter of Genoa, and entered the Milaneſe, at the head of a powerful army, he readily granted a bull to Guillard, reſtoring him to his biſhoprick, and even allowing him to make uſe of the ſecular arm to obtain poſſeſſion. This bull, which ſacrificed the king of England's and his miniſter's intereſt, to thoſe of the French king, and the biſhop of Tournay, would ſeem very ſtrange, if the conſideration of the time and circumſtances, did not make the wonder ceaſe. Leo X. had given juſt cauſe to Francis, to complain of his conduct, and ſaw that monarch ready to take poſſeſſion again of the Milaneſe, and conclude a treaty with the Switzers, in order to ſend them back into their own country; it was, therefore, his intereſt to appeaſe him, by granting a favour, he ſo eagerly deſired. In the interim, Henry was extremely offended, at this bull, which reſtored to the biſhoprick of Tournay, a prelate, who refuſed to ſwear fealty to him, and on which the king of France, and the biſhop of Tournay, might proceed to raiſe a ſedition in the city; he, therefore, gave orders to his ambaſſador, at Rome, to expoſtulate with the pope, and repreſent to him the conſequences of his partiality. Leo X. could not help owning it; but, at that very time, Francis gaining the battle of Marignano, and preparing to make him feel the effects of his reſentment, it was no proper ſeaſon to incenſe him farther, by revoking the bull. This convinced Wolſey, that Francis was the real author of the biſhop's reſtoration. However, the pope being embarraſſed, choſe, on the king of England's oppoſition, to leave the affair undecided, by referring it to the examination of two cardinals, who, probably, were ordered not to haſten the concluſion. In the mean time, Wolſey was uncertain, whether he ſhould keep the biſhoprick of Tournay; and that was, preciſely, what the king of France wanted, that this uncertainty might induce the ſelfiſh miniſter, to find ſome expedient to make himſelf amends, after which it was apparent, he would no longer oppoſe the reſtitution of Tournay; but, at the ſame time, to preſerve his friendſhip, which was very neceſſary, by reaſon of his credit with the king, his maſter, he promiſed to aſſiſt him in procuring a cardinal's cap. Wolſey was extremely ambitious of that dignity. After the death of cardinal Bambridge, he was in hopes of ſucceeding him in the cardinalate, as well as in the archbiſhoprick of York; for he had even employed to ſollicit it, in his name, cardinal Adrian de Corneto, the pope's collector in England, under whom Polydore Virgil ſerved as ſub-collector; but cardinal Adrian, inſtead of ſerving him as he had promiſed, had done him ill offices. Wolſey being informed of it, was ſo incenſed, that on ſome ſlight pretence, he committed Polydore to the tower; then he cauſed the king to write to the pope with his own hand, to deſire him to appoint another collector in cardinal Adrian's room. The king's letter was ſo ſtrong and paſſionate, that the pope thought fit to comply with his requeſt; but, however, in his brief of advice, he told him, he knew very well his anger againſt cardinal Adrian, was inſtilled into him, by Wolſey. In the mean while, Polydore Virgil continued in the tower, till, at length, cardinal Julius de Medici, and the pope himſelf, interceded for him, by letters of Auguſt the 30th, and September the 3d. As this was, at the very time that Francis was ſolliciting a cardinal's cap for Wolſey, Wolſey did not think proper to refuſe the pope a thing of ſo little conſequence; ſo Polydore came out of the tower, where he had been about a year. This ill treatment was, doubtleſs, one of the reaſons that induced him to remember all the ill qualities of cardinal Wolſey, in his Hiſtory of England.

1515. Francis promiſes to help to make Wolſey a cardinal. Herbert.

Cardinal Adrian betrays Wolſey, who ſeeks revenge, and ſends Polydore Virgil to the tower.

Wolſey having, at length, obtained a cardinal's cap, was tranſported with joy when he received the news, by an expreſs, ſent by the king of France; but tho' he was highly obliged to that monarch, this favour begat in his breaſt much leſs gratitude, than the injury he imagined to have received, in the affair of Tournay, had cauſed reſentment; he reſolved, therefore, in order to be revenged, to endeavour to ſet the king, his maſter, at variance with Francis, and cauſe him to enter into a new league againſt France. In this he gratified three of his predominant paſſions; his pride, in letting Europe ſee, that ſovereigns themſelves offended him not with impunity; his revenge, in creating Francis great troubles; and his own intereſt, in ſecuring the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Tournay. Indeed, a rupture between the two kings was an effectual means to hinder Guillard's reſtoration to his ſee. This is obſerved by hiſtorians, as the principal cauſe of the alteration we are going to behold in Henry's conduct. Jealouſy and policy may have had ſome influence too, but leſs as true cauſes, than as motives uſed by Wolſey, to inflame the king's mind. Probably, under colour, that his honour was concerned, he repreſented to him the neceſſity of humbling the pride of the French king, and inſinuated, how dangerous it was for England, that France ſhould grow too powerful. When he had prepared Henry, he 1515. he privately ſent word to the emperor, that it would not be impoſſible to diſengage the king, his maſter, from the intereſts of France. It may eaſily be gueſſed, Maximilian received this overture with joy; beſides, that, being without aid and allies, he ſaw himſelf little able to preſerve his conqueſts in Italy, he knew, which way ſoever he was treated with, he ſhould always be furniſhed with money. Whilſt Wolſey was projecting to negotiate with the emperor, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who had heavily paſſed ſome months at London, was looked upon at court with a much more favourable eye; nay, a treaty was began with him, about renewing the alliance between England and Spain, which being ended the 19th of October, contained, however, only a confirmation of the antient treaties of amity.

An ambaſſy of Francis Sforza to Henry. Pol. Virg.

In the interim, the emperor, willing to improve the preſent opportunity, ſent to the king a Milaneſe ambaſſador, to deſire aid, in the name of Franciſco Sforza, who was in Germany, and had aſſumed the title of duke of Milan, ever ſince Maximilian, his brother, had reſigned his right to the king of France. Tho' Wolſey had taken care to diſpoſe Henry to a rupture with France, he was not, it ſeems, fully reſolved; for, Franciſco Sforza's requeſt, or rather the emperor's, ſeemed to him ſo important, that he deſired to have the opinions of the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who, to that intent, were ſent for to court. The council being met to debate on this affair, cardinal Wolſey ſpeaking firſt, made a long ſpeech, full of reſentment againſt France, labouring to demonſtrate, how much it was for the intereſt of England, to oppoſe her growing power. The biſhop of Durham, and all the new counſellors, ſtrenuouſly ſupported the cardinal's opinion; but the old ones endeavoured to diſſuade the king from breaking the peace, lately concluded with France, ſince the new king had given him no cauſe, and adviſed him, rather to turn his arms againſt Scotland. Henry, who was already prepoſſeſſed, took a middle way, inſinuated, doubtleſs, by his miniſter; and that was, privately to aſſiſt the emperor and Franciſco Sforza. Whereupon, he ſent orders to Pace, his ambaſſador to Maximilian, to treat with them, and, to promote the treaty, returned him large ſums of money. Thus, was he gradually engaged, without foreſeeing, that theſe ſteps muſt neceſſarily end in an open war, as Wolſey deſired.

The duke of Milan's promiſe to Wolſey. Act. Pub.

There is, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a paper, ſhewing, that the cardinal did not forget himſelf in his negotiations. It is a promiſe from the duke of Milan's ſecretary, who, by vertue of an expreſs power from the duke, his maſter, engaged to pay the cardinal an annual penſion of 10,000 ducats, to commence from the day of his maſter's reſtoration. It is true, this paper being neither dated nor ſigned, may be conſidered only as a draught of the contract; but it is, however, a proof of the cardinal's ſelfiſh temper. The emperor no ſooner heard, that Henry was inclined to aſſiſt him, againſt France, than he diſpatched to England, Matthew Skinner, cardinal of Sion, to negotiate a league with him. This is the ſame prelate, who, a little before, had encouraged the Switzers to give battle to Francis I. 1515.

A parliament meets. Herbert.

The parliament met again the 12th of November; but as it was not yet time, to lay before the houſes the king's reſolution, with regard to France, there was no mention of war, or any foreign affair. The clergy, in a ſynod, held, at the ſame time, returned an anſwer to the pope, concerning his demand of an extraordinary ſubſidy, on pretence of an apparent war with the Turks, alledging, that they were ſo exhauſted by the late war with France, undertaken at the inſtance of Julius II, for the defence of the church, that they were not in condition to grant a new ſubſidy; that, beſides, by a decree of the council of Conſtance, the pope could lay no impoſition on the clergy, without the conſent of a general council.

Cardinal Wolſey's pride. Herbert. Hall.

Whilſt the Engliſh were, thus, endeavouring to ſkreen themſelves from the oppreſſions of the court of Rome, they beheld one riſing in their own body, like a new pope, whom they foreſaw, it would be more difficult to reſiſt, than him at Rome, becauſe he was ſupported by the king; I mean Wolſey. Since that prelate was promoted to the cardinalate, he was grown more vain, proud, and imperious than ever; for he never ſtirred without a prince's retinue, always attended by a crowd of domeſticks, cauſing the cardinal's hat to be carried before him, like a ſort of trophy, and having it placed on the altar, when he went to the king's chapel *. He was the firſt clergyman, in England, that wore ſilk in his veſtments, and uſed gold in his ſaddles; and, in ſhort, he deviſed all ſorts of ways to diſtinguiſh himſelf. Every one took ſuch offence at his pride, that it was inceſſantly talked of with indignation; but no man durſt open his mouth before the king, ſince the old biſhop of Wincheſter, for only glancing upon it, was ſo ill received, that ſoon after, he withdrew to his dioceſe. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was no leſs offended than the reſt, to ſee the archbiſhop of York affect, thus, ſo great a diſtinction; but what gave him moſt offence, was, to ſee the croſs of York carried before the cardinal, tho' he was in the province of Canterbury. I have ſpoken elſewhere of this conteſt, between the two archbiſhops, which, after having cauſed violent quarrels, could be decided only by the king's expreſs commands to the archbiſhops of York, not to have the croſs carried before them, in the other province; but Wolſey, who thought himſelf much above his predeceſſors, prepared to revive the conteſt, in contempt of theſe prohibitions. Warham, who was of a peaceable temper, eaſily perceived, that tho' he ſhould attempt to hinder it, he ſhould not ſucceed, becauſe Wolſey had an abſolute ſway over the king; ſo, not to have this object continually before his eyes, he deſired the king's leave to reſign the chancellorſhip, and retire to his palace.

* Cavendiſh affirms, that he kept 800 ſervants, among whom were 9 or 10 lords, 15 knights, and 40 ſquires.

1515. His requeſt, was, immediately, granted; and the ſame day the king gave the ſeals to cardinal Wolſey. In all appearance, he had created Warham ſo many mortifications, only to oblige him to quit his office, with which he deſired to be inveſted himſelf. To ſupport the ſplendour of his dignity with more ſtate, than any other before him, the king loaded him, every day, with freſh favours, prebends, wardſhips, and the like, which continually increaſed his revenues; for, beſides the archbiſhoprick of York and the chancellorſhip, he had, in farm, on eaſy terms, the biſhopricks of Bath and Wells, and Hereford, held by Italians reſiding at Rome; but this was not ſufficient to ſatisfy him. I muſt now, before I cloſe the year 1515, briefly mention the affairs of Scotland; the knowledge whereof, is requiſite for the better underſtanding the events related hereafter.

He is made lord chancellor. Act. Pub.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Alexander, duke of Albany, who had been declared regent, in 1513, arrived not in Scotland, till May, 1515. He found the kingdom full of factions and diviſions, which made him ſenſible, the adminiſtration, committed to him, would prove very troubleſome; but what gave him moſt uneaſineſs, was, that the king of England was but too much concerned in what paſſed in Scotland, and fomented theſe diſſenſions to the utmoſt of his power. Under pretence, that Scotland had been ſome time without a regent, Henry VIII, as uncle of the young king, had taken the title of protector of Scotland, and by vertue thereof, his ambaſſadors, at Rome, demanded of the pope, the eccleſiaſtical preferments of that kingdom, which he beſtowed on his creatures; but as ſoon as the duke of Albany was arrived, he wrote to the pope, in the young king's name, ſharply complaining of the king of England's incroachments, and the court of Rome's condeſcenſion; and he even threatened the pope, in his letter, not to apply to him, for the future, on any account whatſoever, if this grievance were not ſpeedily redreſſed.

The duke of Albany, tho' of Scotch extraction, was a ſtranger to Scotland, from whence the duke, his father, had retired, in 1483; and, as he deſired, in the beginning of his regency, to be informed of the ſtate of the kingdom, he unhappily applied to Hepburne, biſhop of Murray, a hot and revengeful man, who took this occaſion to be revenged on his enemies. The biſhop, being prior of St. Andrew's, had been elected archbiſhop of that church, in the beginning of the preſent reign, but he was forced to reſign the archbiſhoprick to Forman, biſhop of Murray, who was armed with the pope's bull. However, Forman would never have ventured to make uſe of this bull, had he not been ſupported by Alexander Hume, a potent lord, before-mentioned; for by his credit and authority, Forman was inſtalled in St. Andrews, having reſigned the biſhoprick of Murray to Hepburne, and promiſed to pay him a certain penſion. Hepburne finding he had a fair opportunity to be revenged, gave the regent ſuch a character of Hume, that when he came to court, he was looked upon, with a very ill eye. Hume being naturally very proud and high-ſpirited, reſolving to let the regent ſee, no man ſhould ſlight him with impunity, went over to the queen dowager, and perſuading her, that the young king, her ſon, was in danger, adviſed her to carry him into England; but the regent hearing of this plot, ſuddenly went to Sterling-caſtle, and ſecured the young king's perſon; and to hinder his enemies from putting an ill conſtruction on this action, he renewed his oath of allegiance to the king, and committed the care of his education, to three perſons of great credit. 1515.

Alexander Hume and his brother William, ſeeing their plot was diſcovered, fled, immediately, into England, and were quickly followed by the queen and her ſpouſe, the earl of Angus. Whereupon, the regent ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, to juſtify his conduct, and at the ſame time, ſo artfully treated with the fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland; but the queen, being big with child, was forced to ſtay at Harbottle-caſtle, in Northumberland, where ſhe was delivered of a daughter, called Margaret. The ſequel of this affair ſhall be related in another place. Act. Pub.

1516. The death of king Ferdinand, in February, 1516, broke the meaſures taken by cardinal Wolſey, to engage all Europe, in a war with France. Thus, notwithſtanding the cardinal's projects, Henry was forced to remain in peace, becauſe the intereſts of the reſt of the princes were not agreeable, to his, or, rather to the paſſions of his miniſter; but, tho' Europe was peaceable for ſome time, it will be, however, requiſite to relate in each year of this peace, the ſituation of the affairs of the principal ſtates, in order to ſhew the occaſion of the following wars.

Ferdinand king of Aragon's death. Herbert.

Nothing remarkable paſſed, in England, in the beginning of the year 1516, except the birth of a princeſs, whom the queen brought into the world, the 18th of February, and called Mary. Cardinal Wolſey, commonly called the cardinal of York, ever mindful of what could procure him any advantage, cauſed thoſe who had managed the king's money, to be called to a ſtrict account. However, the moſt part were ſpared; but thoſe were ſeverely puniſhed, who had not the addreſs to make the miniſter their friend.

The birth of Mary Henry's daughter. Hall.

After Ferdinand's deceaſe, the kingdom of Arragon came of courſe to Johanna, his eldeſt daughter, already queen of Caſtile. But that princeſs was incapable of governing her dominions, by reaſon of her defect of underſtanding, which had obliged the king, her father, to keep her confined; ſo the adminiſtration of theſe two kingdoms, with all their dependencies, could not be diſputed with Charles of Auſtria, Johanna's eldeſt ſon, and ſovereign of the Low-Countries. But, as that prince lived in Flanders, Ferdinand had left, by his will, the regency of Arragon to Alphonſo, his natural ſon, biſhop of Saragoſſa, and that of Caſtile to cardinal Ximenes, till Charles ſhould come himſelf and aſſume the government.

Charles of Auſtria ſucceeds Ferdinand. Mezerai.

In

1516. In the interim, when Ximenes would have taken poſſeſſion of the regency of Caſtile, Adrian Florentio, doctor in divinity, who managed the prince of Auſtria's affairs in Spain, produced letters patent from his maſter, conſtituting him regent of that kingdom; but Ximenes refuſed to acknowledge him as ſuch, pretending, that Charles had not power to appoint a regent, before he was received for governor. However, the conteſt was adjuſted, by this expedient, that the orders ſhould be ſigned by both; but the cardinal left the doctor, the bare name of regent only, and diſcharged all the functions himſelf. In the interim, Charles took the title of king of Caſtile, with the conſent of the ſtates of that realm; but the Arragonians, more jealous of their privileges than the Caſtilians, refuſed to give him the title of king of Arragon, whilſt his mother Johanna was alive; nay, there was a party in the kingdom, who maintained, that Johanna herſelf, could not pretend to the crown of Arragon, becauſe the daughters were excluded by the laws of the realm, and, therefore, Charles could not derive from his mother, a right ſhe never had; but others affirmed, that the excluſion of the females extended not to their male heirs. This was much the ſame caſe, as happened formerly, in France, in the diſpute between Edward III, and Philip of Valois. I ſhall enter no farther into the affairs of Spain; for what I have ſaid, is ſufficient to ſhew, the neceſſity Charles was under, of going thither, and how dangerous it would have been for him, to engage in a war againſt France, in the beginning of ſo unſettled a reign; and, accordingly, he neglected nothing to renew the treaties of peace and alliance, as well with France as England, but with liberty to take other meaſures, when his affairs ſhould be in another ſituation. Juſt before Ferdinand's deceaſe, he had, as ſovereign of the Low-Countries, renewed the alliance with England, by a new treaty, concluded, at Bruſſels, the 24th of February, this year. About a month after, Henry, who was contriving to form a league againſt France, ordered his ambaſſador to treat with Charles, on that head; but Ferdinand's death ſo changed the face of affairs, that Henry was forced to be ſatisfied with a bare defenſive league, which I ſhall preſently mention, having firſt related the ſucceſs of an expedition made, by the emperor, into Italy.

The emperor's expedition againſt Milan. Guicciard.

It was not without reaſon, that Maximilian had readily embraced the opportunity offered him, by cardinal Wolſey, of making war on France. There was no more likelihood of his being able to keep his conqueſts in the ſtate of Venice, ſince Francis I. was become maſter of the Milaneſe, and had joined forces with the Venetians; beſides, he could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the pope, who had lately agreed with Francis; and, as for the Spaniſh army, which was retired to Naples, it was not eaſy to cauſe them to return, ſince they were neceſſarily to march through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. On the other hand, Ferdinand's death had changed the poſture of affairs, and quite deſtroyed the emperor's hopes; for the new king of Caſtile was ſo far from having any thoughts of a war with France, that it highly concerned him to keep peace with that kingdom, in order to have time to ſettle his affairs in Spain. Thus, the emperor, contrary to his uſual method, was forced to act alone, during this year, in the expectation of ſo embroiling affairs, that other potentates ſhould, at length, be conſtrained to join with him. He had already received ſome of the king of England's money, and, cardinal Wolſey put him in hopes of ſtill larger ſums; and, with this aid, he aſſembled an army of about 20,000 men, Germans and Switzers, and, in March, entered the ſtate of Venice, whilſt the Venetians, aſſiſted by a body of French troops under the conduct of Lautrec, were beſieging Breſcia. Upon his approach, the French and Venetians raiſed the ſiege, and after making a ſhew of oppoſing his paſſages of the rivers, retired to Milan to avoid a battle. Thus, the emperor approached Milan, without much difficulty. 1516.

The French were in ſo great a conſternation, that they were like to abandon both the city and duchy, and retire into France. If Maximilian had made all the haſte he could, he would have, doubtleſs, conſtrained them to execute that reſolution; but having ſpent two or three days to no purpoſe, by the time he came before Milan, the French had received news, that 10,000 Switzers of the cantons, in alliance with France, were coming to their aſſiſtance, and were within a day's march.

The arrival of the 10,000 Switzers, at Milan, threw both ſides into an equal conſternation. The French, who conſidered theſe troops, as a ſure aid, were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment, when they heard, that they abſolutely refuſed to fight againſt the Switzers, in the emperor's army. Theſe laſt, on their part, demanded their pay with ſuch boldneſs, that Maximilian was afraid, it was a pretence not to join battle with their countrymen, newly arrived, at Milan. He had no money for them, and was apprehenſive, that the French had only too much to corrupt them; ſo, when it was leaſt expected, he ſuddenly retired, after which, having no money to pay them, the army disbanded of themſelves.

The emperor makes as if he would reſign the empire to Henry. Herbert.

Thus, having miſſed his aim, the emperor was forced, upon new trials, to engage the pope, the king of England, the young king of Caſtile, his grandſon, in a league againſt France. But this project was not eaſy to be executed; for the pope had his private views, which ſuffered him not to break openly with Francis; and, Charles's council were better adviſed than to agree, that their maſter ſhould engage to gratify his grandfather's paſſion, at a time when he was neceſſarily obliged to go into Spain, and take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. Thus, the emperor's whole refuge lay in the aſſiſtance he could expect from England; but, as there was no likelihood, that Henry would undertake a war, of which he was to bear 1516. bear all the expence, Maximilian bethought himſelf of a device to preſerve his good diſpoſition towards him, or, at leaſt, to draw money from him; and that was, to declare to Robert Wingfield, the Engliſh ambaſſador, at his court, that he was tired with the burden of the empire, and having a particular eſteem for the king, his maſter, intended to reſign it to him. For that purpoſe, he charged him to write to the king, that, if he would come to Triers, he would call a diet and ſettle that grand affair, after which, he offered to wait upon him to Rome, to ſee him receive the imperial crown; moreover, he put him in hopes, that he would reſign to him his right to the duchy of Milan, and aſſiſt him to conquer it. Henry eaſily perceived Maximilian's view, in making ſuch an offer, and, therefore, wrote to his ambaſſador, to thank the emperor for his good intention, deſiring him to defer the execution of this project, to a more convenient ſeaſon, when the French ſhould be expelled out of Italy. In the interim, in return for his good-will, he ſent him ſome money, excuſing the former defect of payment, with laying the blame on a Genoa banker.

Francis I. forms the project of invading Naples, but does not do it. Guicciard.

Whilſt the emperor was endeavouring to embroil the French affairs, Francis was forming new projects. He had good reaſon to be pleaſed with his glorious campaign, which, in a ſhort time, had regained him the duchy of Milan. In the interim, Ferdinand's death inſpiring him with freſh hopes, he formed the deſign of ſeizing the kingdom of Naples, imagining, that the new king of Spain would be unable to defend it, before he was thoroughly ſettled in his kingdoms; beſides, he believed he had ſo attached the pope to his intereſts, by the treaty of Bologna, that he did not doubt to find in him, all the aſſiſtance neceſſary to his undertaking, looking upon him, as his beſt friend. But he did not know Leo X; for that pontiff, did by no means deſire, that the French ſhould become more powerful in Italy, and, if he teſtified to the king, that he was in his intereſts, it was only to prevent his oppoſing the projects he had himſelf formed, in favour of his own houſe. The emperor's invaſion of the Milaneſe, this year, interrupted the execution of Francis's deſign upon Naples, and what, afterwards, happened, cauſed him to lay aſide all thoughts of it; but, however, his deſire to conquer that kingdom, occaſioned a defenſive league againſt him, towards the end of the year, as will be related, after a word or two more of the Italian affairs.

The pope diſpoſſeſſes the duke of Urbino. Cimarelli.

Leo X. was no ſooner reconciled with Francis I, than he deprived, upon a frivolous pretence, the duke of Urbino of his duchy, and inveſted Lorenzo de Medici, who aſſumed from thenceforward, the title of duke of Urbino, and the old diſpoſſeſſed duke retired to Mantua.

He endeavours to drive the French out of Italy.

It was in order to accompliſh this project, that the pope had flattered Francis with the hopes of aſſiſting him, in the conqueſt of Naples; but after he was become maſter of Urbino, by that monarch's connivance, inſtead of thanking him for it, he thought only how to drive the French out of the duchy of Milan. 1516. To that end, he held ſecret intelligence with the emperor, the king of England, and the new king of Spain, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours, by the help of his emiſſaries, to perſuade the Switzers to break their alliance with France. Tho' he acted with all poſſible precaution, he could not treat ſo privately, but that his ſecret practices came to the king's knowledge, who, however, pretended to be ignorant of them. On the contrary, he did all that lay in his power to gain the pope, in reality, to his intereſt, otherwiſe he was ſenſible his attempt upon Naples, would never ſucceed. Leo X. deſired nothing better, than to amuſe him, whilſt he was ſecretly acting againſt him; but, at length, Francis perceiving more and more his inſincerity, loſt all thoughts of the conqueſt of Naples, and reſolved to treat with the king of Spain, who, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs, could not but wiſh to live in a good underſtanding with him. Thus, the two kings being equally inclined to a peace, ſent their plenipotentiaries to Noyon, to conclude it. The treaty was ſigned, the 26th of Auguſt, the ſubſtance whereof was, that Charles ſhould eſpouſe Louiſa, Francis's daughter, then about a year old; that he ſhould have with her, the king of France's pretentions to the kingdom of Naples, and, till the marriage ſhould be conſummated, he ſhould give for the young princeſs's maintenance, 100,000 crowns a year; that, within ſix months, he ſhould reſign the kingdom of Navarre to Henry d'Albret, ſon to John d'Albret, and Catharine, king and queen of Navarre, who were diſpoſſeſſed by Ferdinand; and in caſe Charles ſhould not perform this article, Francis ſhould be allowed to aſſiſt the king of Navarre; and laſtly, that the emperor ſhould reſtore Verona to the Venetians, who, in return, ſhould pay him 200,000 crowns, and give him a full diſcharge for the ſum of 300,000 crowns lent him by Lewis XII, to maintain the war againſt Venice. It is very viſible, that in a treaty ſo advantageous to Francis, Charles meant only to gain time, by granting him whatever he could deſire, for fear of being hindered from going to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. Accordingly, this treaty was, afterwards, very ill obſerved.

The treaty of Noyon, between Francis and Charles. Guicciard.

The peace of Noyon was directly contrary to the deſigns of the pope, emperor, and king of England. The pope was extremely deſirous, that the French ſhould be expelled out of Italy. Maximilian was wholly intent upon raiſing enemies to Francis, to hinder his aſſiſting the Venetians; for he ſaw, that he muſt reſolve either to ratify the treaty of Noyon, and, conſequently, reſtore Verona, or defend his conqueſt without the aſſiſtance of any ally. To avoid both theſe extremes, he tried all poſſible ways to embroil affairs, and kindle a new war which might occaſion a league againſt France, hoping thereby to be able to reject, without danger, the treaty of Noyon, which he believed very prejudicial to his intereſts. It is true, the reſtitution of Verona would be worth to him 500,000 crowns; but out of that ſum

The intereſts of the princes.

1516. sum were deducted, the 300,000 he owed the king of France, but never intended to pay him; so, for the sum of 200,000 crowns, he was bound to restore Verona, that is to say, he was to be shut out of Italy, the only thing that made him considerable in the present situation of the affairs of Europe. Henry VIII, was no less desirous of a war with France, being prompted thereto, by cardinal Wolsey, or by his jealousy of Francis; but it was not the same with the archduke, to whom a peace, for some time, was very advantageous.

Negotiations against France. Act. Pub.

This was the subject of the several negotiations, set on foot, from the conclusion of the treaty of Noyon, to the end of October. The chief view of the pope, emperor, and Henry, was, to disengage the eight Swiss cantons, in alliance with France, from the interest of that crown, that their troops might serve to invade the Milanese. In the interim, they were labouring to form a league, wherein they passionately desired to engage the new king of Spain; but all they could obtain, was, his consent to a defensive league, in case Francis attacked any of the confederates. Leo X, according to his usual custom, would not openly declare himself, but intimated, he would freely join in the league when concluded, if a place was left for him. As to the Switzers, it was resolved to include them, tho' they desired it not, upon the hopes of engaging them, by means of some of their nation, who had been gained.

Articles of the league of London. Act. Pub.

This league was, therefore, concluded, at London, the 29th of October, about two months after the treaty of Noyon. It ran, that the emperor, the kings of England and Spain, engaged to defend one another against any prince that should attack one of the three, and the number of troops, each was to find, was settled; that all princes, potentates, republicks, and states, which desired to enter into the league, should be admitted; that, as the confederates had reason to hope, the pope would be willing to be admitted, they declared him head of the league; and lastly, that all the Swiss cantons should be deemed included in the league, provided they ratified it; and, to that end, the pensions, which should be agreed upon with them, should be assigned them. By a private article, signed two days after, it was agreed what each of the allies was to pay towards the pensions, which should be distributed to the Switzers "as well to the "publick as to private persons," (which are the very words) to induce them to come into the league. This shews there were no certainty of gaining them, and that the chief reliance was, upon the cabals of some private persons of their nation.

The emperor makes peace with Venice.

To this league, so inconsiderable in itself, tended all the motions of the pope, Maximilian, and Henry, during the course of this year. The emperor had been in hopes of something more; and, tho' by the treaty the allies were, in some measure, bound to assist him, if the king of France continued to aid the Venetians, he soon dis-relished a league which procured him no money; for, before the year was expired, he accepted and ratified the treaty of Noyon; and, at the same time, he concluded with the Venetians, a truce for some months, and with one consent, they put the rest of their differences to arbitration. The emperor's resolution entirely changed the face of affairs, as will be seen the next year. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that presently after the league was signed, Henry sent Richard Pace to the Switzers, to persuade them to come into the league; but it was to no purpose. On the contrary, the emperor resolving to make peace with the Venetians, agreed, that the five cantons, who had refused to join with France, should come into the treaty, made by the other eight with that crown. 1516.

The affairs of Scotland.

Before I end the transactions of the year 1516, it will be requisite, briefly, to mention what passed in Scotland. Henry having formed great projects against France, and knowing how much the duke of Albany had at heart, the good of that kingdom, resolved to compel the Scots to remove him from the regency. To that purpose, he desired them to send ambassadors, to whom he might impart certain matters advantageous to both kingdoms. This negotiation tended only to press the great men of Scotland, to expel the duke of Albany. He even wrote to the parliament of Scotland, that the best way to preserve peace between the two nations, was to send back the regent into France, under colour, that it was dangerous to trust the presumptive heir to the crown, with the guardianship of the young king; intimating, also, that in case of refusal, he should be obliged to take care himself, by proper methods, of the safety of the king, his nephew; and, he, likewise, gave to understand, that he claimed the regency, as uncle to the young king. But the parliament returned such an answer, as fully convinced him, that the Scots were by no means inclined to comply with his will.

Hume's rebellion. Buchanan.

Whether Hume was concerned in Henry's proceedings, or was only suspected, the parliament summoned him to come, and answer to the accusations brought against him; but Hume not thinking fit to appear, was condemned for default. He looked upon this sentence as unjust, and in revenge committed hostilities upon some of his enemies; whereupon, the parliament granted to the vice-roy, a levy of 10,000 men, to chastise the rebel; but his friends advising him to submit, he cast himself upon the regent's mercy, who sent him to Edinburgh, and committed him to the custody of James Hamilton, his brother-in-law. Soon after, Hume persuaded the lord Hamilton to escape with him, and claim the regency, as son to James III's sister, and, consequently, as nearly related to the king, as the duke of Albany. He said, if the duke could alledge, that he was descended from the male line, it might be objected, he was son of a fugitive, and born out of the kingdom, and hardly able to speak the country language. The regent hearing of their flight and contrivance, marched against Hamilton castle, and took it in a few 1516. days; and, then Hume, perceiving it was time to throw off the mask, raiſed troops, and taking Dunbar, utterly deſtroyed the town.

A truce between England and Scotland.

In the interim, the ambaſſadors ſent by the regent into England, in May, had concluded a truce, the firſt of June; but, as Henry had granted the truce only to facilitate the execution of his deſigns, he appeared little inclined to obſerve it, after receiving the fore-mentioned anſwer. But to avoid a war, which muſt have been fatal to Scotland, the regent ſent him, by Francis de la Fayette, certain articles, deſiring his approbation, for which he offered to come, in perſon, and pay him his reſpects. At that time the affairs of the reſt of Europe having, as hath been ſaid, taken a new turn, Henry agreed to prolong the truce, to the end of the year 1517.

The council of Lateran ſets about reforming the calendar.

Theſe are the moſt conſiderable events, which paſſed in the ſeveral ſtates of Europe, during the year 1516. I ſhall only add a word, concerning the council of Lateran, which ſtill continued its ſeſſions, without having much to do. As the council meddled neither with the reformation of the church, tho' they ſeemed to be called for that very purpoſe, nor with the extirpation of hereſy, they reſolved, in order to keep themſelves employed, to reform the calendar, which was become very faulty. To that end, the pope cauſing memorandums to be drawn, undertook to write to all the Chriſtian princes, inviting them to ſend their beſt aſtronomers toRome, or, at leaſt,order them to examine what had been propoſed upon that ſubject. We find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the brief addreſſed to Henry, where the pope ſays, he had adjourned the next ſeſſion to December, to give the mathematicians time to ſend in their opinions.

1517. Maximilian reſtores Verona to the Venetians.

The emperor having ratified the treaty of Noyon, as far as it concerned him, reſtored Verona to the Venetians, the 15th of January, 1517, having received 200,000 crowns, and an acquittance for what he owed the king of France; moreover, to give the arbitrators time to adjuſt the differences, he ſtill had with Venice, he agreed, that the truce ſhould be prolonged for five years; but, on condition, that, during the truce, the Venetians ſhould pay him, yearly, 20,000 crowns. It was almoſt impoſſible to make a treaty with him, and money not accrue to him from it. Thus, ended, at length, a war, which may be deemed a conſequence of the league of Cambray. The Venetians were engaged in it, from the beginning to the end, and expended no leſs than 5,000,000 of ducats of the publick treaſure, beſides the infinite damages ſuſtained by the ſubjects.

He concludes with Francis and Charles, a league againſt the Turks. Herbert.

Maximilian, having, thus, deſiſted from his deſigns upon Italy, went into the Low-Countries, to ſee his grandſon Charles, before he departed for Spain; and, during his ſtay there he concluded with him and the king of France, a league againſt the Turks, wherein a place was reſerved for the king of England. The pope and the council of Lateran earneſtly preſſed all the princes of Chriſtendom, to join in this league, on the pretence of the progreſs the Turks were making, in Egypt, againſt the Mamalucks *; after which, he pretended, their deſign was to attack the Chriſtians; but what followed ſhewed, the pope's ſole view was to heap up money for his own uſe, and to inrich his family. 1517.

In the interim,Charles, the new king of Spain, thought only of going to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms; for he had juſt made a peace, with Francis, ſo advantageous to France, that he did not fear, that prince would break it, becauſe it would not be for his intereſt. So, when the Engliſh ambaſſador preſſed him to ratify the London league, he deferred it ſome time, on divers pretences, becauſe, deeming it needleſs, he was afraid of offending the king of France. However, he ratified it, after ſome alterations, and, at length, in Auguſt, departed for Spain, where his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary. Upon his arrival, he diſmiſſed cardinal Ximenes, who died with grief; and, after that, he ſo gave himſelf up to the Flemings, whom he brought with him, that the Spaniards conceived ſuch a jealouſy, as carried them, afterwards, to great extremities.

Charles arrives in Spain, and diſmiſſes Ximenes.

The pope and Francis diſſemble their thoughts of one another.

The pope, as I have obſerved, continually amuſed Francis, with the hopes of a ſtrict alliance with him, at the time he was raiſing him enemies on all ſides. Francis was partly informed of his proceedings, but did not know all; ſo, that in expectation of really attaching him, in the end, to his intereſts, he omitted nothing he thought capable of gaining him, even feigning to deem him his beſt friend, when he moſt ſuſpected him. But as the pope knew, in his conſcience, he had not deſerved Francis's friendſhip, he could not believe his advances ſincere. In the mean while, it was for his intereſt, that Francis ſhould publickly appear to be his friend, and, therefore, he kept very fair with him, and not without cauſe. In the beginning of the year 1517, Franciſco Maria della Rovere, who had been diſpoſſeſſed of the duchy of Urbino, prepared to recover his dominions. When, by the truce, concluded, between the emperor and the Venetians, the Spaniſh troops, in the ſtate of Venice, were become uſeleſs, la Rovere found means to gain and employ them, in his ſervice; and, with theſe ſupplies, he took Urbino, and carried terror into Tuſcany and the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. Lorenzo de Medici, the new duke of Urbino, or rather the pope, his uncle, being then unable to recover that duchy, he was forced to have recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian princes, under colour that the church was grievouſly oppreſſed, the intereſt of the Medici being then the ſame with thoſe of the church. Francis I, who had the gaining of the pope ever in view, made uſe of this opportunity to do him a ſignal ſervice, in ſending him a good body of troops, under the command of Leſcun, brother of Lautrec.

1517. This war, however, laſted ſeven or eight months, during which, the pope never ceaſed to preſs all the Chriſtian princes to contribute to the charges of a war, which, according to him, ought to have affected all the world. Henry VIII, being ſollicited like the reſt, refuſed to interpoſe; but the pope found means to engage his ſubjects, by levying a tenth upon the clergy, of which cardinal Wolſey was appointed collector. The war of Urbino ended in a way la Rovere did not expect; for the pope bribed the Spaniards, in his ſervice, who came to an agreement for him, which he was obliged to accept. Thus, being once more conſtrained to relinquiſh his dominions, he retired to Mantua.

A conſpiracy againſt the pope. Guicciard.

Whilſt the pope was employed, in the war of Urbino, he diſcovered a plot againſt his perſon, contrived by the cardinal of Sienna, who had bribed a ſurgeon to poiſon him. The cardinal, being abſent from Rome, when the diſcovery was made, the pope, who paſſionately deſired to have him in his power, ſcrupled not to uſe fraud to compaſs his ends; for, he ſent him a ſafe-conduct, and, moreover, promiſed the Spaniſh ambaſſador, that he would do him no hurt. The cardinal, being ſo weak as to come to Rome, on the faith of the ſafe-conduct, was, immediately, confined, in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and, afterwards, ſtrangled, in priſon. The Spaniſh ambaſſador complained of this breach of faith; but was told, by the pope, a ſafe-conduct was never reckoned to extend to high-treaſon, without expreſs mention of the caſe. Some other cardinals accuſed, or ſuſpected of being concerned in the plot, were depoſed, impriſoned, or ſeverely fined.

The marriage of Lorenzo de Medici with the heireſs of Boulogne. Guicciard.

Francis I. never ceaſed courting the pope, to gain his friendſhip, fearing, that by his ſecret practices, he would re-kindle the war, to deprive him of Milan. He imagined to have found, at laſt, an infallible means to attach him to his intereſts, in procuring Lorenzo de Medici a very advantageous marriage, with Magdalen, heireſs of the houſe of Boulogne. This propoſal was gladly accepted, and Lorenzo repairing to Paris, for that purpoſe, ſtood godfather, in the pope's name, to the French dauphin, born the beginning of this year; and, in acknowledgment for the king's favour to Lorenzo, the pope granted him tenths upon the clergy, under pretence of the war to be waged with the Turks; but he took care to aſſign 50,000 livres, for the charges of the wedding, which was to be ſolemniſed, at Paris.

The ſale of the indulgences on pretence of the war with the Turks. Guicciard.

The pretended war Chriſtendom was to undertake againſt the Turks, ſeemed to the pope, to be a fair opportunity to inrich himſelf, by the contributions of the Chriſtians. To that end, he granted plenary indulgences to all that would contribute, and cauſed them to be publickly ſold, at ſo moderate a price, that a man muſt have been very careleſs of his ſalvation not to purchaſe them; but it was this, that made the pope expect to reap an immenſe profit, for, probably, there would not be a Chriſtian without them. In the interim, that the money ariſing from the ſale might be regularly collected, all Chriſtendom was parted into ſo many diviſions, and in each were appointed collectors to receive the money, and preachers to extol the benefit of indulgences*; but, by an accident which, at firſt, ſeemed of no conſequence, the archbiſhop of Mentz, who was commiſſioned to appoint the preachers, in Germany, happened to aſſign Saxony to the Jacobins, whereas in the former Cruſades, the Auguſtines had been employed in that office. The injury done to theſe laſt, rouzed their jealouſy. They narrowly examined the behaviour of the preachers as well as collectors, ridiculed them, and, afterwards, publickly complained of them. At length, Martin Luther, an Auguſtine fryar and profeſſor of divinity, in the new univerſity of Wirtemberg, publiſhed ſome writings againſt them, not without ſatyrical remarks upon the indulgences themſelves. This boldneſs drew upon him enemies, who, by their oppoſition, obliged him, by degrees, to enquire more carefully, into the grounds of thoſe indulgences. In ſhort, he was convinced, they had no foundation in the holy ſcriptures. From thenceforward, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to undeceive the publick, concerning the hitherto received opinion of the papal power. Hence ſprung the reformation, which ſpread it ſelf, afterwards, through Germany, and ſeveral other ſtates of Europe.

The pope, at firſt, did not much regard Luther's repreſentation; for he never imagined, that the papal power, which ſeemed to ſtand upon unmoveable foundations, could be prejudiced by a ſingle fryar; ſo deſpiſing this inconſiderable oppoſition, he continued, without interruption, to ſell his indulgences. He every where publiſhed, that a powerful effort was going to be made upon the Infidels, and exhorted all Chriſtians to contribute, according to their abilities, towards ſo neceſſary a war, which would procure them, beſides many temporal advantages, deliverance from the pains of purgatory, provided they would qualify themſelves for the indulgences. There was, however, one thing, which very much cooled the zeal of many Chriſtians for the Cruſade. It was diſcovered, that the pope, had, beforehand, diſpoſed, for his temporal concerns, of the money which was to ariſe from the ſale of the indulgences. For inſtance, he had aſſigned to Magdalen de Medici, his ſiſter, wife to Franciſco Cibo, natural ſon of Innocent VIII, part of the money to be raiſed in Germany. Mean while, he continued his ſollicitations in all the ſtates of Europe. He forgot not to write to Henry VIII, exhorting him to join his forces with thoſe of the other Chriſtian princes, and to excite him to this good work, by great commendations of his conſtant zeal for the defence of the holy ſee, and the exaltation of the faith. All theſe encomiums ended in demanding 200,000 ducats, for the pretended war againſt the Infidels; but it does not appear, that the king complied 1517. with his requeſt. The Turks were then employed in Egypt and Perſia, and the Cruſade was founded only upon a bare conjecture, that after ending theſe wars, they would invade Chriſtendom. A man muſt have wilfully ſhut his eyes, not to ſee, it was but a pretence to fill the pope's coffers. Beſides, in the preſent ſituation of the affairs of Europe, Henry had no great occaſion for the pope.

Wolſey is uneaſy about the biſhoprick of Tournay.

In the interim, cardinal Wolſey perceiving, that the league of London would come to nothing, becauſe Francis was not diſpoſed to commence a new war, with any of the confederates, dreaded his making uſe of this time of peace, to move the affair of the biſhoprick of Tournay. On the other hand, he plainly ſaw by the time paſſed, ſince that buſineſs had been put into the hands of the commiſſioners, that he was greatly regarded, as having an abſolute ſway over the king, his maſter. Indeed, nothing could be expected from the king, but through his means, and for that reaſon all the princes ſtudiouſly made their court to him, to gain him to their intereſts. We find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Charles, king of Spain, aſſigned him, this year, an annual penſion of 3000 livres, tho' he had yet received no ſervices from him; and, therefore, it was for thoſe he hoped to receive, for the future. In the interim, Wolſey was uneaſy about Tournay. As the pope and the king of France, regarded him only for the ſake of what he could do for them, he was in danger of loſing the reſpect they ſhewed for him, in caſe they ſhould ever come to ſtand no longer in need of him. He began, therefore, privately, to intimate to Francis I, that it would not be impoſſible to perſuade Henry to reſtore Tournay, for a ſum, which ſhould be agreed upon, provided, he himſelf was recompenſed for the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick. I ſhall relate next year the ſucceſs of this negotiation.

A negotiation of Henry with the emperor, about the ceſſion of the empire, comes to nothing. Herbert.

Henry enjoying this year great tranquillity, reſolved to ſee what the emperor intended, with reſpect to the reſignation of the empire, which he had cauſed to be mentioned to him. Maximilian, being in Flanders with the king of Caſtile, his grandſon, Henry ſent the biſhop of Wincheſter, with doctor Cuthbert Tunſtal, to renew the negotiation with him, acquainting him, likewiſe, that, if he would appoint a convenient place, he would come and confer with him, in perſon. The emperor, who had never intended to reſign the empire to him, and ſtill leſs, at that time, very civilly replied, that to ſave the king the trouble of croſſing the ſea, he would come himſelf and confer with him, in England. But when the ambaſſadors preſſed him on the affair they were charged with, they found that he ſought only to evade his own offer. One while he ſaid, he would reſign the empire to Henry, but firſt, would try to obtain of the diet, that himſelf and poſterity might preſerve the title of king of the Romans. Another while, he talked of making Charles, his grandſon, emperor, Henry, king of the Romans, Ferdinand, brother to Charles, king of Auſtria, and himſelf only marſhal of the empire. Theſe alterations convinced the ambaſſadors, that nothing was to be expected from the negotiation; and acquainting the king, he was ſatisfied Maximilian had no other deſign, than to draw money from him. 1517.

There was, this year, an inſurrection of the London apprentices againſt foreign tradeſmen, wherein ſome perſons loſt their lives; but it was appeaſed, by the puniſhment of ſome of the ſeditious, who were hanged in the principal ſtreets of the city. Inſurrection at London. Hall.

The ſame year, the ſweating ſickneſs made great ravages in the kingdom, and eſpecially, at London. Moſt of thoſe that were ſeized with it, died within three hours, and no cure could be found. As this diſtemper was peculiar to England, it was called Sudor Anglicus, or the Engliſh Sweat, The ſweating ſickneſs. Stow.

The affairs of Scotland, were ſtill, in great diſorder, by reaſon of the factions in the kingdom. Alexander Hume, and his brother William, after ſeveral pardons, were, at laſt, beheaded. After the death of the two brothers, the duke of Albany, hoping Scotland would be in perfect tranquillity, reſolved to take a journey into France, promiſing to return in few months; but being detained there longer than he expected, by accidents mentioned hereafter, the affairs of Scotland fell into very great confuſion, becauſe of the diſſenſions of the great men, which were inflamed by thoſe, who deſigned to take advantage of them. The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

In the interim, the pope earneſtly puſhed the affair of the pretended war, contriving, with the amdaſſadors reſiding, at his court, projects, which would have required more zeal than princes uſually have, and greater union among them. To execute his deſigns, he ſhould have amaſſed vaſt ſums of money, and that was the ſecret intent of the league, propoſed by the pope, of which he was to be head and director. To that end, he exhauſted, if I may ſo ſay, the church's treaſures, to encourage the faithful, to exchange their periſhing riches, for everlaſting advantages. This affair was carried ſo far, that he ſent legates to all the courts, to excite the ſovereigns to join their forces together, for the deſtruction of the Infidels; and there was not one, but what, outwardly, ſhewed an extreme deſire to apply himſelf to ſo holy a work, provided he could be ſecured from being diſturbed by his neighbours; but that was the thing which rendered the execution of the project very difficult, becauſe they had no confidence in one another; and they had no more for the pope himſelf, who, ſince the beginning of his pontificate, had but too plainly diſcovered, that the concerns of religion were not what affected him moſt. So, in ſeeing him act with that zeal, they could not help ſuſpecting, that the deſire of inriching himſelf by the voluntary contributions of Chriſtians, by the ſale of the indulgences, by the tenths of the clergy, and by the bounties of the ſovereigns, was what moſt fired his zeal. However, not one of them ſhewed any averſion to the deſign, leſt he ſhould be taxed, with 1518. Leo X. ſends legates to ſollicit the Cruſade. Guicciard.

1518. with not having a due regard for religion. But they gave only words, whereas the pope wanted deeds. Hence the pope's project of an univerſal league had not, as will, hereafter, be ſeen, the ſucceſs he expected. However, the project, tho' chimerical, ſerved for pretence and a cloak to many other deſigns. The emperor, deſiring to have one of his grandſons choſen king of the Romans, uſed the pretence of the imaginary war, Chriſtendom was in danger of, from the Turks, to ſhew the neceſſity of continuing the imperial dignity, in the houſe of Auſtria, there being no other in Germany, able, by its own ſtrength, to withſtand their arms. Charles, king of Spain, made uſe of the ſame pretence for the ſame purpoſe. Beſides, that, as he wanted ſome years of peace, he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the project of a general truce, that the Chriſtian princes might be free to unite their forces againſt the Turks. Francis I, plainly ſaw, by the defenſive league made againſt him, that a pretence was only ſought to invade him, and take away the duchy of Milan; ſo, a general truce could not but be advantageous to him in his preſent circumſtances; beſides, he had in view, the recovery of Tournay, which could be accompliſhed but during a peace. Henry VIII, knowing that the pope, the emperor, and the kings of France and Spain, had joined in a league againſt the Turks, was apprehenſive, that league covered ſome deſign againſt him; for that reaſon, he would not refuſe to enter into the ſame engagement, for fear of giving them a pretence. Thus, the chief potentates of Europe, being concerned to improve the Cruſade, or, at leaſt, not to reject it, the leſſer powers were alſo obliged to follow the torrent. This gave the pope great hopes he ſhould, at laſt, effect his deſigns; but, as in truth, not one of the princes thought the thing practicable, the project was ſtill very far from being executed.

Negotiation about Tournay.

Whilſt Leo X, fed himſelf with theſe hopes, Francis was thinking, much more ſeriouſly, of means to recover Tournay, than of the affairs of the Cruſade. On the other hand, cardinal Wolſey was afraid of loſing the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick, becauſe he ſaw no likelihood of ſowing diſcord between France and England, at a time, when all the princes of Europe, ſhewed a deſire to live in peace. He could not, therefore, keep the adminiſtration, if Guillard, the true biſhop, would take the oath to the king, to which he ſeemed inclined. This made him embrace the ſecret offers of Francis, to make him ample amends, if he could induce the king, his maſter, to reſtore that place to France. Francis was very ſenſible, that before all things, the cardinal was to be ſatisfied, not only in order to recover Tournay, but to procure it as cheap as poſſible. This was the ſubject of a private negotiation between them, before Henry was informed of it. To ſucceed, Francis ſpared neither flatteries, promiſes, or preſents. If Polydore Virgil may be credited, theſe preſents were very conſiderable. But however, it was agreed between them, that the cardinal ſhould be recompenſed for the loſs of the adminiſtration, with an annual penſion; that the king of France ſhould give Henry 600,000 crowns, for Tournay; but as this ſum was a little too large, an expedient, mentioned hereafter, was found to reduce it, to a much leſs. Upon theſe two conditions, the cardinal undertook to obtain his maſters conſent to the king of France's deſires. One of leſs aſſurance than the cardinal, and not ſo ſecure of the king's confidence, would, doubtleſs, have been greatly embarraſſed, ſince the buſineſs was to convince the king of the contrary, to what, hitherto, he had been endeavouring to make him believe, viz. that Tournay was no longer neceſſary. When Francis I, would have treated of the reſtitution of Tournay, Wolſey had repreſented to the king, that both for his own and England's intereſt, it was of very great conſequence to keep that place, which was, moreover, a perpetual monument of his victories, whilſt it ſhould be in his hands; but, now, altering his tone, he undertakes to perſuade, and indeed, does perſuade him, that the place is of no uſe, and the maintenance of the garriſon far outweighs all the advantages he can receive from thence; that it was better yield it to the king of France, who earneſtly ſued for it, and, to obtain it, ſcrupled not to condeſcend to make preſents to a miniſter; that nothing could be more honourable for the king, than to ſee that monarch make the firſt advances to procure his friendſhip, and render it perpetual, by the marriage of the dauphin, with the princeſs Mary, which alſo he propoſed; that, therefore, the preſent opportunity ſhould be improved, to receive a good ſum of money in lieu of Tournay, which being ſo remote from Calais, would infallibly be loſt, upon the firſt rupture between the two crowns; that hereby the king of France would be obliged to be his friend, and their union would render them umpires of Europe; and, that this union was the more neceſſary, as it was time to think of oppoſing the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria, who poſſeſſing the empire, Spain, the Low-Countries, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, were, infallibly, going to render themſelves very formidable to all the ſovereigns. The ſtrength of theſe reaſons was too manifeſt for Henry to reſiſt them; and all he could think ſtrange, was, that the cardinal had not ſooner propoſed them, but, till then, had rather uſed directly contrary arguments, to hinder the reſtitution of Tournay. But, as it has been remarked, Wolſey had ſuch an aſcendant over him, that he could perſuade him, pro and con, as he pleaſed.

An Embaſſy of Francis to Henry. Herbert. Hall. Act. Pub.

Henry having agreed to what the cardinal propoſed, the next thing was to treat upon the matter. As ſoon as Francis I, was informed of it, he ſent a ſolemn ambaſſy to England, conſiſting of admiral Bonnivet, Stephen Poncher, biſhop of Paris, and M. de Villeroy, ſecretary of ſtate. For form's ſake, ſome time muſt be ſpent in this negotiation, tho' the king of France and the cardinal had already agreed on the chief articles, by the mediation 1518. of Villeroy, who had been in London ever since the beginning of July, whereas his colleagues arrived not till two months after. The French ambaſſadors had full powers to treat of the renewing of friendſhip, between the two kings; of a league with the pope, and all Chriſtian princes, who deſired to be included in it, for the defenſe of religion and the church; of a marriage between the dauphin and the princeſs Mary, daughter of Henry; of the reſtitution of Tournay, St. Amand, and Mortagne; and of the interview of the two kings; moreover, they brought Francis's letters patent, whereby he promiſed to pay to his good friend, the cardinal of York, an annual penſion of 12000 livres, in conſideration of his relinquiſhing the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Tournay. As the treaties concluded upon theſe atticles, were not ready, till the beginning of October, I ſhall briefly mention another affair, tranſacted about the ſame time.

The pope was ever intent on the buſineſs of the Cruſade, from whence he hoped to draw great ſums. He wrote, laſt year, to all Chriſtian princes, to notify the victory of Selim, emperor of the Turks, over the Mamalucks of Egypt, whoſe empire he had utterly deſtroyed. The beginning of this year, he cauſed the college of cardinals to ſend a letter to Henry, repreſenting to him, the danger Chriſtendom was in, after the victory by the Ottoman emperor over the Soldan of Egypt, who, according to the beſt advices, was ſlain in battle. The cardinals exhorted the king to undertake the defence of religion, jointly, with all the other Chriſtian ſovereigns, with the pope and ſacred college, who were ready to ſacrifice, to that end, their own, as well as the church's treaſure. The plain meaning of all this, was, that the king ought to contribute largely, towards the Cruſade, his country being too remote from Turky, to ſend forces thither.

Campejus is ſent as Legate a Latere to England. Herbert. Act. Pub.

Some time after, the pope ſent Legates a Latere to ſeveral courts, with orders to exhort the ſovereigns to accept and preſerve a five years truce, enjoined by his apoſtolick power; and, they were, likewiſe, to uſe their endeavours, to perſuade them to unite all their forces, and make war upon the Turk. Cardinal Laurentius Campejus was appointed for England, and already departed from Rome, in the beginning of May, to go and execute his commiſſion. But Wolſey deemed it a very great affront, that the pope had not thought of him for this legateſhip; ſo, whilſt Campejus was on the road, he ſent a truſty meſſenger to Rome, to repreſent to the pope, that by ſhewing ſo little regard for a cardinal, actually in England, and the king's prime miniſter, he put it out of his power to do him any ſervice; that whatever he ſhould ſay to ſupport what the pope required, would be of no weight, ſince he ſhould be conſidered as one, whom the court of Rome durſt not truſt with the legateſhip; that it was rather the pope's intereſt to make uſe of him, to obtain his deſires, conſidering the confidence the king honoured him with, and that, without his aſſiſtance, the preſent affair would be in danger of miſcarrying. Leo X, eaſily perceived, by this repreſentation, that Wolſey muſt be contented; ſo, by a bull of the 17th of May, he joined him with Campejus in the ſame commiſſion, giving them both an equal authority, "knowing, "ſays he, in the bull directed to Wolſey, your "great credit with the king, and how eaſily "you can perſuade or diſſuade him." In the interim, Campejus arriving, at Boulogne, Wolſey found means to detain him there, till he had received the pope's anſwer; for which reaſon, it was the 29th of July before the Italian legate made his entry, into London. As he had but a very poor train, Wolſey ſent him 12 mules, with coffers richly covered; but ſome of theſe coffers happening to fall, during the proceſſion, and being overturned and broken, were found to be empty, to the great ſport and laughter of the people, who derided this external pageantry. There is, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a bull of Leo X, with extraordinary powers to the two legates, authorizing them to grant a plenary indulgence to the faithful of both ſexes, who ſhould be preſent at the maſs, which either of the legates ſhould celebrate, in the preſence of the king and queen, or, at leaſt, of the benediction, provided they confeſſed their ſins, or deſired to confeſs, and were penitent.

Campejus's entry into London. Hall.

The legates commiſſion, conſiſted of two points. The firſt was, to try to obtain of the clergy, an aid of money, for the war againſt the Turk; but the clergy ſtood their ground againſt all their attempts. The ſecond was, to perſuade Henry to join in the projected league, with all the Chriſtian princes, for the defence of religion and the church. The pope's deſign was not to undertake a war againſt the Turk, but only to heap up money on that pretence. Thus, the league he was meditating, was ſolely to make the world believe he, really, intended to make war againſt the Infidels. After which, he had a very plauſible excuſe to lay impoſitions upon all the clergy, and draw money from the ſovereigns, and their ſubjects, to bear the charges of this pretended war. With this league, therefore, he was to begin, and on that, the legates were commiſſioned to treat with the king, who ſeemed inclined to agree to it, tho' he might eaſily foreſee the league would ſignify nothing.

The legates commiſſion.

As cardinal Wolſey's credit increaſed, in England, it became, likewiſe, greater, at the court of Rome; for he had cauſed, as was before obſerved, cardinal Adrian de Corneto, to be removed from the office of the pope's collector, in England; but this ſlight puniſhment, not ſufficing to ſatisfy his revenge, he had ſo ordered it, that the king wrote to the pope, deſiring him to deprive Adrian of the cardinalate, and of the biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, which had been conferred on him. Leo X. could not help thinking it very ſtrange, that the king ſhould make ſuch a requeſt, without alledging any reaſon; but, however, without giving him a poſitive denial, he contented himſelf with ſaying, he would give him ſatiſfaction, Cardinal Adrian depoſed.

1518. faction, at a more proper ſeaſon. In 1517, there was a conſpiracy againſt the pope, wherein cardinal Adrian being concerned, was committed to priſon. Guicciardini ſays, he was never more heard of, and that it is not known what became of him; but there is, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a letter of cardinal Julius de Medici, dated the 5th of July, 1518, notifying to the king, that, in a conſiſtory held that day, cardinal Adrian was depoſed and ſtript of all his preferments, intimating, alſo, to the king, that it was on his account. But it is more probable, he was puniſhed for his crime againſt the pope. However this be, a few days after, the pope gave cardinal Wolſey the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, ſuppoſing he wanted it, to maintain the dignity of cardinal.

Leo X, wiſhes to make an offenſive league againſt the Turks.

The negotiation of the two cardinals, proceeded very ſlowly, ſince it was not ſufficient to incline Henry to the league, but the reſt of the ſovereigns were, alſo, to give their conſent. Accordingly, the pope ſollicited, to the utmoſt of his power, all the potentates, magnifying the danger to which the Chriſtian religion was going to be infallibly expoſed. In ſhort, every prince returning him the ſame anſwer, viz. that it was neceſſary, all the ſovereigns ſhould unite in this affair, he ſent a bull to his legates, in England, impowering them to conclude between the emperor, and the kings of France and Spain, a league againſt the Turk. His intent was, that the league ſhould be offenſive, elſe it would be of no advantage to him, unleſs the Turk really intended to invade Chriſtendom, which was, hitherto, thought to be very uncertain. But Leo was too well known, for the princes to be thus taken in a ſnare, which tended only to render the pope maſter of their own, and the people's money; ſo, pretending, zealouſly, to enter into his deſign, they contented themſelves with concluding together, a defenſive league for the protection of the pope, the holy ſee, and their reſpective dominions, againſt all invaders, and, particularly, againſt the emperor of the Turks. The pope was declared head of the league, provided he ratified it, within ſuch a time; but, the treaty made no mention of what each of the allies was to furniſh. All which ſhews, this league, according to the intention of the parties, was only to caſt a miſt before people's eyes, to give the pope ſome ſatisfaction, and, perhaps, to frighten the Turks.

The pope ratifies the league. Herbert. Hollingſh.

This was not what the pope deſired. He could have wiſhed, that all the princes of Chriſtendom had joined together, in an offenſive league againſt the Turk, and engaged to ſend their forces to Conſtantinople, to attack the Ottoman emperor, in his metropolis; for, in that caſe, he knew, the moſt remote would have been eaſily induced to furniſh their quota, in money. Since the frentick zeal for Cruſades was over, the popes had loſt no occaſion to re-kindle the ſame zeal, which had formerly procured ſo many advantages to their predeceſſors; but the people, as well at the princes, were entirely diſcouraged, becauſe it was too viſible, that the Cruſades had been profitable to none but the popes; ſo, for once, the Chriſtian princes were contented to make a defenſive league, to ſhew only, they were ready to defend Chriſtendom againſt the attacks of the Infidels, deferring to take other meaſures, till they ſhould be obliged. Leo X, ſeeing he could obtain no more, approved and ratified the league, the 31ſt of December, after which, it was never more mentioned. All the terrible preparations of the Turks to fall upon the Chriſtians, as was affirmed, entirely vaniſhed, as ſoon as the pope found, his artifices could not produce the effect he expected. 1518.

Several treaties between France and England.

Whilſt theſe things were in agitation, cardinal Wolſey, jointly, with the French ambaſſadors, was employed in preparing the treaties, agreed upon, to be ſigned.

I. Treaty of marriage between the dauphin, and Mary.

The firſt related to the marriage, between the princeſs Mary and the dauphin, which was to be ſolemnized, as ſoon as the young prince ſhould be full 14 years old, each of the two kings promiſing to pay 500,000 crowns, in caſe it was his fault, that the marriage was not compleated. Mary's dower, was to be 333000 crowns of gold, one half to be paid on the day of marriage, and the other within a year after. The jointure was to be as great, as had ever been aſſigned to any queen of France, and, particularly, to Ann of Bretagne, and Mary of England, wives to Lewis XII.

II. Treaty about Tournay. Hall.

The ſecond treaty was, upon the reſtitution of Tournay, for which Francis I, engaged to pay Henry 600,000 crowns of 35 d. Tournois each, beſides 50,000 livres Tournois, due to him from the inhabitants. But out of theſe two ſums, Francis was to keep back the princeſs Mary's dower; and, as to the payments, he obliged himſelf to pay 50,000 livres, upon taking poſſeſſion of the place, and, then 25000 livres, every ſix months, till the whole ſum was paid.

III. Treaty about outrages. Act. Pub.

The third treaty concerned the outrages, which might be committed, for the future, againſt the peace, by the ſubjects of either king, and contained certain regulations, to procure ſpeedy reparation.

IV. Treaty about an interview.

By the fourth, the two monarchs agreed upon an interview, in the village of Sandinfelt, between Ardres and Guiſnes.

Cardinal Wolſey is made amends.

Theſe treaties being ſigned, the 14th of October, the French ambaſſadors gave cardinal Wolſey their maſter's letters patent, whereby he bound himſelf to pay him an annual penſion of 12000 livres Tournois, to ſatisfy him for the loſs of the biſhoprick of Tournay.

Eſpouſal of the dauphin with Mary.

As ſoon as the two kings had ratified the treaties, and ſolemnly ſwore to the peace, at London, and Paris, the king and queen of France, acting, in the name of the dauphin their ſon, affianced the princeſs Mary, repreſented by the earl of Worceſter, her proxy. This cermony was performed, at Paris, the 21ſt of December.

1519. The death of the emperor. Herbert.

Europe enjoyed, then, a profound tranquillity; but, on the death of the emperor Maximilian, the 12th of January, 1519, new troubles, 1519. troubles aroſe. By his death, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, England, Scotland, the Low-Countries, were engaged in wars, no leſs fatal to them, than the former. As ſoon as Maximilian was in his grave, the kings of France and Spain, openly, declared themſelves candidates for the empire, and began to cabal among the electors, to obtain their deſires. This threw the electors into great perplexity; for, on which ſide ſo ever they turned, they ſaw for themſelves, for Germany, for all Europe, advantages and inconveniencies, which deſerved their whole attention. It would have been the intereſt of Germany, to keep the balance even, between the two monarchs, who aſpired to the imperial dignity, and to reject both; but, by chuſing one of the competitors, ſuch ſuperiority would be given him, as could not but be fatal to all Europe, and, particularly, to Germany. I ſhall not farther inſiſt on the reaſons which the electors had to chuſe one, or reject both, it being well known, on theſe occaſions, the publick good does not always ſerve for rule and foundation, to form deciſions of this nature. Leo X, wiſhed, as it was, indeed, his intereſt, the electors would agree to chuſe one of their own body; for, Charles being poſſeſſed of the kingdom of Naples, and Francis of the duchy of Milan, the election of one of theſe monarchs, could not but one day diſturb the peace of Italy, and prove deſtructive to the papal power. Accordingly, the pope uſed his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the electors to take that courſe; but, however, he was forced to act privately, for fear of making the two candidates his enemies, by openly declaring againſt them.

The death of Lorenzo de Medici. Guicciard.

Whilſt the reſolution of the electors was, impatiently, expected, Lorenzo de Medici, the pope's nephew, was ſeized with a diſtemper, that laid him in his grave. By this unexpected accident, that branch of the family of Medici, was reduced to the perſon of the pope, ſole lawful deſcendent of Coſmo the Great, who firſt acquired the ſovereignty of Florence. Some endeavours were uſed to perſuade the pope, to reſtore his country to liberty; but he did not love the Florentines well enough, to ſuffer them to enjoy ſo valuable a bleſſing, of which he had taken ſo much pains to deprive them; therefore, reſolving to keep that ſtate, he ſent cardinal Julius de Medici, natural ſon to Julian, his uncle, to govern in his name. Soon after, he annexed the duchy of Urbino to the church, and razed the walls of the capital, for fear la Rovere ſhould think of recovering it.

The electors meets to chuſe an emperor. Guicciard.

The electors being aſſembled to proceed to the election of an emperor, Francis and Charles ſent ambaſſadors to the aſſembly, to manage their concerns. The pope would have a nuncio there too, who had orders, privately, to endeavour to cauſe them both to be rejected; but, however, to conform himſelf, outwardly, to the diſpoſition of the electors. Henry VIII, perceiving the difficulties which would occur in the choice of either of the candidates, ſent Richard Pace to the diet, to try, whether there was any thing to be expected for him; but, as he thought of it too late, his ambaſſador found the affair ſo advanced, that he did not think fit to expoſe the king's honour. He, therefore, wrote to him, that, indeed, ſome of the electors ſhewed an inclination to favour him; that the pope would have, likewiſe, ſupported him to the utmoſt of his power, had he declared ſooner; but that matters were ſo ordered, that the election would infallibly be over, before proper meaſures could be taken to accompliſh his project. And, indeed, a few days after, on the 28th of June, Charles, king of Spain, was declared emperor, by the name of Charles V, or rather of Charles Quint, as he was then, and, ſtill, is called, to this day. 1519.

Jealouſy of Francis I. Several occaſions of quarrel between Charles and Francis I. Guicciard.

The election of Charles, was a terrible mortification to Francis I. All the world, immediately, thought, the jealouſy between theſe two potent princes, would, infallibly, occaſion bloody wars; and, this opinion was but too well confirmed, by experience. Beſides the king of France's jealouſy, which was, doubtleſs, one of the chief cauſes of the following rupture, there were differences between them, of very great importance, and extremely difficult to adjuſt. Francis I. had pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples; moreover, by the treaty of Noyon, Charles was bound to reſtore Navarre to Henry d' Albret, within four months after ſigning the treaty, and this article was yet unperformed. On the other hand, Charles, as heir of the houſe of Burgundy, believed he had a lawful title to the duchy of that name; for, he pretended, that after the death of the laſt duke, his grandfather, Lewis XI. had unjuſtly ſeized it, upon a bare alligation, that it was a male fee, tho' the contrary was evident. He had ſuffered his title to lie dormant, during his minority; but after he was of age, he had thoughts of reviving it, and the imperial dignity lately obtained, helped very much to confirm him in that reſolution. The duchy of Milan was another cauſe of diſpute, which would naturally beget a war between theſe two monarchs. It could not be denied, that it was a fief of the empire, and yet Lewis XII. had ſeized it, and Francis I. re-conquered it, and was now in poſſeſſion, without either's being inveſted by the emperor Maximilian, or ſo much as deſiring it. Charles, therefore, could alledge, that it was his duty to maintain the rights of the empire, and endeavour to diſpoſſeſs the king of France of that duchy. The duke of Gueldres afforded another occaſion of quarrel, between theſe two monarchs. He was a profeſſed enemy to the emperor, and Francis protected him openly. And laſtly, the treaty of Noyon gave Charles another cauſe of complaint; for he pretended, that Francis had extorted from him ſo advantageous a treaty, by threatening war, when his affairs neceſſarily required his preſence in Spain, to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms; that, therefore, the reſignation of the kingdom of Navarre, and the penſion of 100,000 crowns, to which he had been engaged, under the 1519. the ſpecious pretence of a maintainance, for the princeſs, his future ſpouſe, were nothing elſe but the price of a peace, he had been made to purchaſe.

Intereſts of the princes of Europe.

Tho' theſe two monarchs looked upon each other, with a jealous and envious eye, and wanted not pretences for a war, neither of them durſt, however, begin, before he had ſounded the reſt of the ſovereigns. And how they ſtood affected, will, alſo, be neceſſary to know, for the better underſtanding the ſequel, the intereſts of princes, giving to hiſtory, a perſpicuity, which without that aſſiſtance, is ſought for, in vain.

Of Leo X.

Leo X. was equally afraid of the two monarchs, being ſenſible, to which ſide ſoever the balance inclined, Italy muſt be in danger. If he could have ſet them at variance, without making Italy the ſeat of the war, he would freely have done it; but that was not poſſible. Much leſs was it in his power to ſtand neuter; and, the reaſon is, becauſe he could not hinder the conteſts about Naples and Milan, from being decided by arms, and, therefore, could not avoid interpoſing in a quarrel, which would ſo nearly concern him. He took, therefore, the courſe which beſt agreed with his temper, and that was, to be reſerved, and manage both the monarchs, till he found it his intereſt to declare himſelf. But through all his diſguiſes, he diſcovered, however, ſome partiality to the emperor, in the grant of a diſpenſation to hold the empire with the kingdom of Naples, tho' that was directly contrary to the terms, on which he had given him the inveſtiture of that kingdom. Francis complained of it, but the pope excuſed it, as not having in his power to refuſe, without involving himſelf in troubles, from which, it would not have been eaſy for him to be delivered.

Of Henry VIII.

As for Henry VIII, the poſture of affairs, between Charles and Francis, might have rendered his reign very glorious, had he not entirely given himſelf up to the intereſted counſels of cardinal Wolſey. He had it in his power to preſerve the peace of Europe, by keeping the balance even, between the two rivals, without ſuffering it to incline too much to either ſide. This was his grand intereſt, as well as the kingdom's, and, accordingly, this was his reſolution. Hence it was, that he frequently engaged in one or other ſide, but not always, as the intereſt of Europe, the welfare of his realm, and his own glory required. Thus, whilſt he thought to follow the maxims of good policy, he ſerved, without perceiving it, to gratify the paſſions of his miniſter, as will be ſeen hereafter.

Both monarchs try to gain Henry by means of Wolſey. Herbert.

Charles and Francis were ſo convinced of the advantages to be reaped, from the king of England's friendſhip, that they neglected nothing, which they thought would procure it. The beſt, or rather the only means to that end, was, to gain cardinal Wolſey to their intereſts. And, therefore, they ſpared neither flatteries, promiſes, or preſents, to make him their friend. They took occaſion, ſometimes, to write to him, on purpoſe to ſtile him their friend, their father. In their letters, they extolled his virtue, his prudence, his capacity, in ſuch affected terms, that he muſt have been blind not to ſee, they had farther views, than to expreſs their eſteem for him. Wolſey made good uſe of theſe teſtimonies of their friendſhip, to obſerve to his maſter, how formidable he was to theſe two monarchs, ſince they did not diſdain even to careſs his miniſter. But, alſo, it ſerved him, to inſinuate, how far his own merit excelled that of other miniſters, ſince it was univerſally known. All this produced the effect he expected; for Henry deemed himſelf the arbiter of Europe, and remained ſo perſuaded of his favourite's capacity, that he no longer ſaw but with his eyes, or acted, but by his advice. 1519.

The cardinal's preferments.

Thus, Wolſey was, then, at the top of the wheel; for he was favourite, prime miniſter, lord chancellor, adminiſtrator of the biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, archbiſhop of York, ſole legate a Latere, Campejus, his collegue, being recalled. He had a penſion from the emperor, and the king of France, and received an immenſe profit from his chancellorſhip, by the privileges annexed thereto, by the king. Beſides this, the king never ceaſed making him preſents, and giving him continual occaſions of increaſing his incomes. On the other hand, the pope, the emperor, the king of France, and the republick of Venice, ſtrove, with emulation, to gain his goodwill, and ſeemed, as I may ſay, to glory in their dependence upon him. The beginning of the year, Francis I, ſent him letters patent, whereby he conſented, that he ſhould, alone, regulate the ceremonies of his interview with Henry, giving him thereby an authentick teſtimony of his confidence, in his probity, upon a point, of which kings are, commonly, very jealous. In the interim, the advances ſuch great princes made the cardinal, did not argue ſo much their eſteem for him, as their fear of loſing the friendſhip of the king, his maſter. Francis I, to give Henry a freſh mark of his reſpect, deſired him to ſtand godfather to his ſecond ſon, afterwards king of France, by the name of Henry II. Theſe things demonſtrate Henry's happy ſituation, and how glorious his reign might have been, had he wiſely improved theſe advantages; but, unfortunately for him, inſtead of acting for himſelf and his own glory, he laboured, in effect, for his favourite's intereſts.

Cardnal Wolſey's extreme pride.

It would have been hard to conceive, to what height the cardinal's pride was carried, if all the hiſtorians had not taken care to deſcribe it, and all, in the ſame colours. The legateſhip of Campejus, ſetting that cardinal on a level with him, he could not long bear that equallity. By his credit, at Rome, he had cauſed him to be recalled, and himſelf appointed ſole legate, with power to viſit the monaſteries, and all the reſt of the clergy; and, to obtain this commiſſion, he had taken care to deſame, to the pope, all the clergy of the kingdom, intimating, how neceſſary it was to commit the reforming them to his care. But this was only to increaſe his authority, 1519. and ſubject the whole church of England to his orders. When he ſaw himſelf inveſted, alone, with the dignity of legate, he let looſe, if I may ſo ſay, the reins to his vanity; for he ſaid maſs after the manner of the pope himſelf, not only biſhops ſerving him therein, but earls and dukes giving him water, and the towel; and, when he walked into the city, two croſſes were carried before him, by two of the talleſt prieſts that could be found, mounted on the higheſt horſes. One of theſe croſſes was that of legate, and the other that of York. At firſt, theſe things ſerved only for diverſion to the people, who paſſed their jeſts upon this external pomp; but, preſently after, were felt much more grievous effects of the power aſſumed by the legate. A new court of juſtice was erected, called the legate's court, the juriſdiction whereof extended to all actions relating to conſcience; that is, properly ſpeaking, to all the actions of life, ſince there is ſcarce any but where conſcience may be ſome way concerned. One John Allen, being made judge of this new court, committed numberleſs rapines and extortions, under colour of reforming the manners of the people, tho' he was himſelf a perſon of an infamous character. Strict enquiry was made into the life and manners of every body, which gave occaſion to the new judge to oppreſs all that obſtinately refuſed to compound with him. Particularly, he pretended, that his juriſdiction reached to all ſuits ariſing from wills, or marriage-contracts, and drew to his court numberleſs cauſes, without the king's judges daring to oppoſe it. On the other hand, the legate treated the clergy with inconceiveable rigour, and conferred all the benefices of the kingdom on his creatures, without troubling himſelf about the rights of the churches, the monaſteries, or the patrons. This is what had ever occaſioned violent quarrels between the kings of England, and the court of Rome, and given birth to the famous ſtatute of Præmunire, daily violated by the legate, the king ſuffering, in him, things which he would not, doubtleſs, have allowed in the pope himſelf, and being informed no farther, than the cardinal pleaſed. At laſt, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſeeing ſo many oppreſſions, thought it his duty to acquaint the king, who ſeemed ſurpriſed, and charged the archbiſhop to tell the cardinal, that, it was his pleaſure, he ſhould amend whatever was amiſs. The effect of this remonſtrance was, that the cardinal ſtill more hated the archbiſhop, for whom he had already conceived an averſion, for ſubſcribing himſelf, in one of his letters, "Your brother "of Canterbury." But ſhortly after, one John London, a prieſt, boldly accuſing the judge of the legate's court, it was not poſſible to hinder the affair from coming to the king's knowledge. As the judge was convicted of numberleſs miſdemeanours, the king ſo reprimanded the cardinal, that from thenceforward he became, if not better, yet more wary, at leaſt.

The grandeur, riches, power, and authority, enjoyed by Wolſey, in England, were not capable of ſatisfying his ambition, whilſt there was ſtill one ſtep higher to which a churchman could aſcend. He had began, ſome time ſince, to take meaſures to become pope, when the ſee ſhould be vacant, and the king of France had, now, offered him the votes of 14 cardinals; but ſince Charles was elected emperor, Wolſey thought him moſt capable to procure him the papacy, and, probably, continued a private negotiation with him. For that purpoſe, he gradually diſengaged the king, his maſter, from the intereſt of France, to turn him to the emperor. In the interim, he believed, he could not, without too much diſcovering himſelf, hinder the interview of Francis and Henry, which had been deferred till the year 1520; but he well knew, how to prevent the ill-effects this interview might produce againſt the emperor, his new friend. Beſides, he could not think of loſing the pleaſure of appearing before the court of France, with a magnificence, little inferior to that of a king, and of ſeeing himſelf, in the preſence of the Engliſh, honoured and careſſed by the king of France, and his whole court; as he would probably be. This was an opportunity, which a perſon ſo fond of pageantry and oſtentation, could not neglect.

1519. Cardinal Wolſey aſpires to the popedom, by means of the emperor. Herbert.

The emperor had reaſon to careſs cardinal Wolſey. He had met, in Spain, with unexpected difficulties; for the Caſtilians and Arragonians, were bent to preſerve their privileges, which were continually attacked by the emperor's Flemiſh counſellors. On the other hand, the emperor, on pretence of the Cruſade, publiſhed by the pope, having demanded a tenth of the clergy, that demand had cauſed, throughout Spain, troubles, which very much embarraſſed that prince. There had been, alſo, an inſurrection in Auſtria, which was not appeaſed, without difficulty. In ſhort, the king of France was privately labouring to raiſe the emperor troubles in Naples, Sicily, Navarre, and to withdraw his allies from him. All this made Henry's friendſhip ſo neceſſary to him, that it is no wonder he ſhould endeavour to win the cardinal to his ſide, ſince the miniſter's credit, was the only way to gain the maſter. The king of France uſed the ſame method, which exceedingly increaſed the cardinal's pride, who ſeeing himſelf courted by theſe two monarchs, had it in his power, if I may ſo ſay, to ſet what price he pleaſed on his ſervices.

Affairs of Spain.

Whilſt all the world was impatiently expecting the effect of the jealouſy, between the emperor and king of France, the affairs of Scotland ſtill remained in the ſame ſituation, that is, in extreme diſorder, becauſe of the regent's abſence. When he went from Scotland, he hoped to return in few months, but was not ſuffered to follow his inclination; for, Francis I, foreſeeing the want he might have of England, had made a private treaty with Henry, promiſing to detain the duke of Albany, in France. Thus, Henry obtained, by another way, what the parliament of Scotland had plainly refuſed him. It was very eaſy to conceive, why he oppoſed the duke of

1519. of Albany's return. His design was to throw Scotland into trouble and confusion, to have an opportunity to interpose in the affairs of that kingdom, under colour of supporting the interests of the young king, his nephew. He could not, therefore, execute it better, than by fomenting discord, among the nobility, which the regent's presence might have remedied; but the war which, afterwards, broke out between Charles and Francis, and wherein he was but too much concerned, prevented the prosecution of his designs against Scotland. Probably, this saved the kingdom, which otherwise was in great danger of being conquered by the English.

The discovery of Mexico, and New-Spain.

Before I close the year 1519, I must not forget to remark, that this year, the emperor received the news of the discovery, and beginning of the conquest of Mexico and New-Spain. The mention of this particular, is the more necessary, tho' it seems foreign to our History, as it was the gold and silver wherewith the new world furnished Spain, that contributed most to render Charles V, so powerful, as he will, hereafter, appear; besides, money growing more plenty, by the trade carried on by other countries with Spain, the reader must not be surprised to find, hereafter, more numerous armies, greater magnificence in princes courts, and the dowries of princesses much larger than before. But Spain first improved the gold and silver of the new world, and was thereby enabled, in the reigns of Charles V. and Philip II, to aspire to univer-monarchy.

1520. The regulation of the interview between the two kings, by Wolsey. Act. Pub. March 12. Hall. Stow. Hollingsh.

The confidence, placed by Francis I, in cardinal Wolsey, in giving him power to regulate his interview with Henry, would have been very honourable for that minister, if, on the other hand, this proceeding had not shewn his little esteem for him, as believing him liable to corruption. Be this as it will, Wolsey, by vertue of powers, received from the two kings, made the 12th of March, 1520, a regulation, importing, among other things, "That the interview should be on the 4th of June, between Ardres and Guisnes; that the king of England should go towards Ardres, as far as conveniently he could, without passing, however, the English pale, and the king of France should meet him at the place where he should stop." Hence, he so ordered it, that Francis paid the first visit to Henry. But he assigned for reason, that the king, his master, having crossed the seas, on purpose to do his friend honour, it was very just, Francis should, in some measure, make him amends, by advancing, to receive him, a little beyond the limits of his own territories, in some open place, appointed by deputies on either side. The rest of the regulation concerned the safety of the two monarchs, their queens, the queen dowager of France, sister to Henry, Louisa of Savoy, duchess of Angoulesme, mother to Francis I, the trains of the princes and princesses, who were to assist at the interview, the place where the monarchs were to meet and confer together, and lastly, the diversions which the two courts were to take.

During the time, between the regulation and the interview, Francis caused the cardinal to be sounded, to know whether, by his means he could not prevail with Henry to restore Calais, for a sum of money. This proposal was, doubtless, attended with secret promises to the cardinal, answerable to so great a service, since he did not think fit to reject it. He durst not, however, speak of it directly to the king; but tried so to manage, that others should inspire him with the thought, that in case the king advised with him upon it, he might give his opinion more freely; and, to that end, in his conversation, he would frequently turn the discourse upon Calais, and say, as it were accidentally, "What have we "to do with this Calais, that lies on the con-"tinent and costs us so much? It were to be "wished we were honestly rid of it!" This artifice failing, he never ventured to make the king so extraordinary a proposal, and the rather, as, being resolved to engage with the emperor, he was not so desirous to oblige the king of France.

1520. Francis gains Wolsey to get Calais given up. Herbert.

Henry sets out for the interview. The emperor arrives at Dover. Hall. Stow.

The time of the interview approaching, Henry came to Canterbury, the 25th of May, in order to pass his Whitsuntide there, and then proceed to Calais; but next day news was brought him, that the emperor was landed at Dover. This arrival surprised the whole court, and, perhaps, the king himself. But the cardinal had no reason to be surprised, since the emperor had, the 29th of March last, promised by letters patent, dated from Compostella, to give, or cause to be given him by the pope, the bishoprick of Badajos, within two months after the conference he was to have, in person, with the king of England, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Hence it is plain, that the emperor's journey to England, had been resolved ever since March, at least, between the emperor and the cardinal; but it is uncertain, whether the king was informed of it. However this be, the cardinal was commissioned to go and welcome the emperor, at Dover, where the king came, also, on the morrow. Then, the two monarchs went together to Canterbury, where Henry sent for his queen, who was extremely glad to see her nephew, the emperor, having never seen him before. The emperor's view, in this visit, was, to dissuade the king from the interview with Francis; but he could not succeed, Henry making him sensible, he could not recede, with honour. But very likely, he had also, in view, the securing of cardinal Wolsey, in order to gain, by his means, the king to his interest. It is the common opinion, his journey was not fruitless, but that he could obtain the cardinal's favour, only by promising to use all his credit to raise him to the papacy, in case Leo X. died before him. Tho' the emperor had not obtained all his desires, he departed, however, very well satisfied with his visit, Henry having promised not to enter into any engagement with the king of France, to his prejudice; and, on the 30th of May, Charles proceeded to Flanders, and Henry to Calais.

The interview of Francis and Henry. Stow. Hall.

I ſhall not ſtay to deſcribe the interview of the rwo monarchs, between Ardres and Guiſnes, as regulated by the cardinal. Whilſt it laſted, there was nothing but entertainments, tournaments, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions, wherein the two courrs mixed to their mutual ſatisfaction. Every thing on both ſides was ſo magnificent, that the aſſembly was called, the Camp of the Cloth of Gold. But, in the midſt of all the pleaſures, which the two courts took together, the affairs, however, were not neglected. The following articles were agreed on, by the two monarchs, at their conferences; that, after Francis ſhould have paid the 1,000,000 of crowns, according to the late treaty, he ſhould give Henry an annual penſion, for life, of 100,000 livres Tournois; that, in caſe the dauphin ſhould become king of England, by his marriage with the princeſs Mary, the penſion ſhould be continued to Mary and her heirs for ever; that the differences between the kings of England and Scotland, ſhould be referred to the arbitration of Louiſa of Savoy, the king of France's mother, and the cardinal of York. The two kings parted not, till the 24th of June, after paſſing about three weeks together, in continual diverſions.

Henry goes to ſee the emperor at Graveling.

Henry, being returned to Calais, was pleaſed, before he repaſſed into England, to repay the viſit received from the emperor, at Canterbury. To that end, he came to Graveling, the 10th of July, and returned, the ſame day, to Calais; and, on the morrow, the emperor, with the lady Margaret, his Aunt, governeſs of the Low-Countries, came to ſee Henry, at Calais, and ſtayed three days with him. Theſe mutual viſits made Francis extremely jealous, and not without reaſon; for, probably, in theſe conferences were laid the firſt foundations of the alliance, afterwards, concluded, between the emperor and Henry. In a few days after, Henry returned into England.

A letter of the doge of Venice to the cardinal.

The greateſt princes very juſtly courted cardinal Wolſey; for, he, abſolutely, governed his maſter, who, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs, could make the balance incline to which ſide he pleaſed. The ſenate of Venice foreſeeing, that a war would ſoon break out, in Italy, endeavoured, beforehand, to make Wolſey their friend, by ſhewing a great eſteem for him. There is, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a letter from the doge to the cardinal, to congratulate him on the interview of the two kings, as a work of his conſummate wiſdom.

The pope grants the cardinal penſions on Spaniſh ſees.

But this was only words, whereas the pope, who found he ſhould quickly want the cardinal, thought he muſt gain him by ſomething more ſubſtantial. He granted him, as appears, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, on the 29th of July, a penſion of 2000 ducats, on the biſhoprick of Palencia, in Spain, and conſtituted him perpetual adminiſtrator of the ſee of Badajos, without prejudice to the benefices he had, or ſhould have for the future. There is no doubt, this was done with the emperor's conſent, who endeavoured, by degrees, to gain ſo powerful a miniſter, whoſe credit was very neceſſary in the preſent ſituation of his affairs; for he had left Spain full of troubles, occaſioned by the greedineſs of the Flemings, who only ſought to inrich themſelves, at the expence of the Spaniards. This had even obliged him to depart with ſome precipitation, for fear of being embroiled in affairs, which might have prevented his going to receive the imperial crown. He had left for governors, in Spain, Adrian Florentio, biſhop of Tortoſa, and the conſtable of Caſtile; but he was no ſooner gone, than ſeveral lords, and ſome cities of Caſtile, joined in a league, for the defence of their liberties, and expulſion of the Flemings. This league was followed, by an open rebellion, which very much embarraſſed the two governors. In the interim, having drawn together a body of troops, conſiſting partly of the garriſons left in Navarre, they formed a good army, and, at length, defeated and reduced the male-contents to obedience.

The emperor is crowned.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Spain, the emperor was preparing for his coronation, which was ſolemnized the 21ſt of October.

The pope ſollicits the elector of Saxony againſt Luther.

Luther's defection made, then, great noiſe in Germany. Leo X. endeavoured to excite all the princes of the empire againſt the doctor, who had boldly appealed to a general council, notwithſtanding pope Pius II's bull; in ſhort, after fruitleſs trials, to win him, by promiſes, or frighten him by threats, he publiſhed a bull of excommunication againſt him, and his followers; but Luther, regardleſs of theſe thunders, renewed his appeal to a council, in very harſh terms. The pope, exaſperated, that a ſingle monk ſhould, thus, dare to brave him, deſired the elector of Saxony, then at Cologne, to put him to death, or ſend him to Rome; but the elector refuſing, the pope's nuncio ordered Luther's books to be publickly burnt, at Cologne, and Luther, in revenge, cauſed the pope's bull, and the decretals, to be openly burnt, at Wirtemberg, and publiſhed a manifeſto, in defence of his proceedings. He found himſelf ſupported by the elector, his ſovereign, who earneſtly deſired to ſee a reformation in the church.

The duke of Wirtemberg loſes his dominions.

In the interim, the duke of Wirtemberg, who, at the inſtance of Francis I, had forſaken the league of Swabia, was driven out of his dominions, and the emperor purchaſed them; and, as the king of France was not then, in condition to protect him, he was forced to ſubmit to the emperor's terms, without hopes of being reſtored.

Troubles in Scotland. Buchanan.

The troubles ſtill continued among the Scots, who were divided into two factions, whereof Andrew Hamilton, and George Douglaſs, earl of Arran, were the heads. During the year 1520, the Hamiltonians found means to conſtrain Archibald Douglaſs, earl of Angus, one of thoſe left by the regent, to govern in his abſence, to relinquiſh his poſt. After which, they would have taken away his life; but, with 80 men, he beat, in the ſtreets of Edinburgh, above 1000 of his enemies, and drove them out of the city. All this

1520. this ſerved only to exaſperate, more and more, the factions againſt one another, ſo that, at laſt, Douglaſs received into his party, all the friends of the two Humes, beheaded by the regent, in order, with their aſſiſtance, to withſtand his enemies. Theſe were the ſad effects cauſed by the regent's abſence, whom the king of England hindered from returning into Scotland. In the interim, the truce between the two kingdoms was farther prolonged, to the 9th of April, next year, by the king of France's mediation, and the council of Scotland poſitively promiſed, to ſend an honourable ambaſſy to Henry, to deſire a peace.

1521. The characters and tempers of the principal ſovereigns of Europe.

The poſture of affairs, in the beginning of the year 1521, did not promiſe the long continuance of the peace of Europe; for, four ſovereigns enjoyed, almoſt, the whole, and had a great influence on the dominions they were not poſſeſſed of; and, they were all four young, able, and ambitious enough to form vaſt projects, which could not be executed, without putting all Europe in combuſtion.

Of Francis I.

Francis I, ſecretly envying Charles V, ſought occaſion to ſhew his concern at ſeeing him on the imperial throne, and was thinking to uſe the pretence of recovering the kingdom of Naples for himſelf, and Navarre for Henry d'Albret; but his deſign of attacking the emperor, was founded on another and more powerful motive, viz. policy, which required his utmoſt endeavours, to humble this formidable rival, otherwiſe France might be in great danger. To execute this grand deſign, it would have been neceſſary for him to be wholly intent upon his affairs, and to be a good œconomiſt, in order to ſupport the expence, in which he was going to engage; but, unfortunately for him, he was too much addicted to his pleaſures, and very often applied to other uſes, the money deſigned for the war; moreover, he was too eaſily governed by his miniſters, and ſtill more, by the ducheſs of Angouleſme, his mother, whoſe intereſts were often contrary to his. However, he fancied his affairs in ſuch a poſture, as promiſed a happy ſucceſs of his undertakings; for, Spain was diſaffected and agitated, with inteſtine troubles, which, probably, would greatly embarraſs the emperor; and, on the other hand, the Turks threatened Hungary, which the emperor could not abandon, without endangering his Auſtrian dominions. In the next place, Francis flattered himſelf with having, in the king of England, a faithful friend, who would not forſake him, and who ſeemed to be, almoſt, equally concerned, to prevent the too great advancement of the houſe of Auſtria; and, in a word, he imagined to have reaſon to expect, that the pope, with whom he was in treaty for the conqueſt of Naples, inſtead of helping to increaſe the emperor's power, would uſe his utmoſt endeavours to humble a neighbour, who could not but be a terror to him. All this was ſtrengthened with Francis's alliances, with the Venetians and Switzers, who, joining with the pope and the king of England, would, of courſe, render him ſuperior to his enemy, whoſe kingdoms, remote from each other, were leſs capable of giving mutual aſſiſtance. Thus, Francis, flattered by theſe appearances, formed extraordinary projects, ſuitable to his ambition and age, being then only 27 years old. 1521.

Of Charles V.

As for Charles V, he had not yet done any thing to give a very advantageous idea of him; for his youth had been ſpent under the guardianſhip of the emperor Maximilian, his grandfather, or of Margaret of Auſtria, his aunt, and ſince he had aſſumed the adminiſtration of the Low-Countries, his governor, Chievres, did all in the name of the prince. His firſt proceedings, after the death of king Ferdinand, begat no great opinion of him, for he had ſcarce ſet foot in Spain, before the country was all in commotion; and, his advancement to the empire, was owing, perhaps, to the little eſteem the world had for him. However, he was then the moſt potent prince in Europe; for, beſides the imperial dignity, he poſſeſſed all Spain, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the Low-Countries, the archduchy of Auſtria, and many other provinces and lordſhips, in Germany; ſo, that with his own forces, alone, he was able to withſtand Francis I, aſſiſted by all his allies. Henry VIII, was the only ſovereign, that had, at firſt, embarraſſed him, by reaſon of his union with France; but he had artfully drawn that thorn out of his ſide, by means of cardinal Wolſey; and with this he began, as I may ſay, to diſcover his ability, which, till then, had been, as it were, concealed. After that, he diligently applied himſelf to gain the pope, and ſucceeded to his wiſh. Thus, at the time I am now ſpeaking of, he was become very formidable, not only by his forces, but alſo by the proofs he had given of his capacity. As ſoon as he was raiſed to the empire, he rightly judged he ſhould find, in Francis I, an enemy that would ſpare nothing to make him feel the effect of his envy; for that reaſon, he thought early of means to ſcreen himſelf from his attempts, not only by a juſt defence, but even by attacking him firſt, He had two plauſible reaſons; one was, that the crown of France withheld from him the duchy of Burgundy, ſince the death of his grandfather Charles, the laſt duke of Burgundy; the other concerned the duchy of Milan, whereof Francis ought to have received the inveſtiture from the emperor, ſince it was a fief of the empire, and yet he had never vouchſafed to ask it; and, he believed, moreover, to have cauſe of complaint for Francis's extorting from him, the treaty of Noyon, as was before related.

In vain, therefore, do the hiſtorians of both ſides, ſtrive to caſt the blame of the rupture upon one or other of the two monarchs; for it is certain, both thought, at the ſame time, of making war, and took meaſures beforehand, to execute their deſigns, tho' each privately, endeavoured to engage his rival, in ſomething that ſhould make him be deemed the aggreſſor. So, as the beginning of a rupture is not to be judged of, by the firſt act of 1521. hostility, but rather by the cause, one can hardly be mistaken, in affirming Charles V, and Francis I, to be equally authors of a war, which set all Europe in a flame. Charles was not above 21 years of age, but of a very different character from that of his enemy. Francis was too much addicted to his pleasures, whereas Charles was too intent on his affairs, having been used to it from his youth. Francis was of a free and open temper, but Charles was much more reserved; for he maturely thought of what he had to say or do, and readily made use of artifice and evasion to accomplish his ends, framing his conduct by that of Maximilian and Ferdinand, his grandfathers.

Of Leo X. Guicciard. Leo X. had reason to be satisfied with his lot, could he have resolved to live in quiet; for he was absolute master of the whole ecclesiastical state, to which he had lately added, all la Romagna, Modena, Reggio, and the duchy of Urbino; and, his own, the church's, and all Italy's grand interest, was, therefore, to endeavour, by all sorts of means, to keep the balance even, between the emperor and king of France, and to manage so, that neither of these two monarchs should become too powerful in Italy. This was very practicable, since his dominions being situated between those, belonging to these two princes, in Italy, they necessarily wanted him, in order to invade Naples, or Milan. Thus, by keeping a strict neutrality, he would have, probably, freed Italy from a war, and preserved the papal power in its full lustre. But he was of too active a spirit to remain in peace; for, as he had a great opinion of his address, he ventured to engage in all sorts of affairs, how difficult soever they appeared, because, let what would be the event, he hoped to get clear by some artifice; besides, he had this, in common, with all the popes, his predecessors, that the respect of his character removed his fear of being reduced to extremities, in case his undertakings were not crowned with success. As to the rest, he was entirely addicted to his pleasures, spending most of his time with musicians and buffoons, and in some still less innocent diversions; and, this, added to his liberal temper, threw him into such excessive expences, that he was poor amidst his vast incomes, and always contriving means to procure money. Hence his extraordinary zeal to form a league against the Turks, because it afforded him a pretence to levy the aoths upon the clergy, and sell his indulgences, to the great scandal of all Christendom *.

Had this pope been of a more narrow genius, he would have, doubtless, maintained the tranquillity of Italy; but as he found himself capable of forming and executing great designs, he had a mind to render his pontificate illustrious, by some signal actions. Unfortunately for him, and his successors, he resolved to drive the French, Spaniards, and Germans, out of Italy, a project which may well be deemed extravagant. To accomplish it, he 1521. was necessarily to make use of the one to ruin the others, and by, thus, causing the balance to incline all to one side, he could not but give masters to himself and all Italy, which he would have avoided by standing neuter; but what chiefly engaged him in this project, was his desire to seize the duchy of Ferrara, and recover Parma and Placentia, which he could not hope to effect, whilst the French were possessed of the duchy of Milan. On the other hand, he was something uneasy, with regard to Florence; for he could not help fearing, that Francis would think of restoring the Florentines to their antient liberty. He resolved, therefore, to begin with the French; but took care not to discover his designs; on the contrary, he continued private negotiations with the king of France, as well as with the emperor, and put both, equally, in hopes of his friendship. In the interim, as his intent was always to remain in this medium, he ordered 6000 men, to be levied in Switzerland, and sent for them into the ecclesiastical state, having demanded a passage through the Milanese, under colour of providing for the defence of his towns.

Of Henry VIII. Henry VIII, was then more advantageously situated, than any king of England had ever been before him; being at peace with all Europe, except Scotland, which would have been glad to be left in quiet. Tho' he had now consumed all the money, found in the king his father's coffers, he was, however, assured of being always supplied, since he was in a good understanding with his parliament, and had the art of managing the two houses, with a very singular address. Thus, being able to raise numerous forces, and at liberty to turn them which way he pleased, it was, doubtless, in his power to render himself umpire of Europe; and for that reason, Charles and Francis, with equal ardor, courted his friendship, being sensible, he could invincibly obstruct their designs, and cause the balance to lean to the side he should please to espouse. It was his interest to keep always in this situation, till obliged to interpose in their differences, to hinder the one from rising to the prejudice of the other. And, indeed, this was his aim and intention; but unfortunately for him, his weakness for his prime minister, the cardinal, was beyond all imagination; for this favourite had such an ascendant over him, that he inclined him which way he pleased, always under the specious colour of carrying his glory to a greater height, tho', in reality, he had only his own interests in view. We have already seen sensible proofs of his great influence, over his master, in what passed during, and after the late war with France. He had persuaded him to deliver to the emperor Maximilian, the city of Terouenne, which might have been of great service to him, and to keep Tournay, which was of little or no advantage; afterwards, when he was in pos-

1521. session of the bishoprick of Tournay, he had artfully persuaded him, that the keeping of that place would be an everlasting monument of his glory; but when he saw, he was like to lose the bishoprick, and had ample amends offered him, he found other reasons to convince him, that he ought to part with a place which was of no benefit to him. We shall see, presently, that he led him, also, to make a very false step, in espousing the emperor's part against France, whereas his true interest, was, to keep the balance even between those two potentates. All this was done for the sake of cardinal Wolsey, who having the ambition to aspire to the popedom, thought to succeed by the emperor's means. The pension procured him by Charles, upon the bishoprick of Palencia in Castile, and the administration of the see of Badajos, at a time when he had not yet received any publick service from him, are incontestable proofs, that the cardinal had engaged with him, as being sure of governing his master as he pleased. These things afforded no very advantageous idea of Hen y's penetration.

Such were the characters, interests, and designs of the four principal sovereigns, concerned in the new war, I am going to speak of. The king of Scotland was yet too young, to be reckoned among the directors of the affairs of Europe. The Venetians sought only to live in peace, being, as I may say, exhausted by the former war. However, they could not avoid entering into this also. As for the Switzers, they were satisfied with their pensions from France, and generally inclined to observe the articles of their alliance with that crown; but they were not intirely secured from the secret practices continued, by the pope's and the emperor's agents, with some of their magistrates, to try to persuade them not to take part with France.

Francis I. invades Navarre. Du Bellay. Mezerai.

Francis I, having formed a design to make war upon the emperor, without incurring the blame of the rupture, resolved to begin with what could not be imputed to him as a premeditated design to quarrel. By the treaty of Noyon, Charles was bound to resign Navarre to Henry d'Albret, within four months, in default whereof, Francis was free to assist Henry to recover his kingdom. The affairs of Spain being extremely imbroiled, since the emperor quitted that country, Francis believed it a fair opportunity to invade Navarre. He was the more inclined to this undertaking, as the two regents of Spain had been forced to draw troops from Pampelona, and other places of that kingdom, to reinforce the army which was to act against the fore-mentioned league. He sent, therefore, into Navarre, in the beginning of March, an army, commanded by Lesparre of the House of Foix, elder brother to Lautrec and Lescun. This general, finding the kingdom without troops, and almost deserted, became master of it, in the space of a fortnight. Had he stopped there, perhaps, Navarre would have been still, at this day, annexed indeed, as it is in name only, to the crown of France, since the Spaniards were unable to expel Henry d'Albret, from whom the kings of France, of the house of Bourbon, are descended; but the desire of acquiring fame, or procuring the king's advantage, carried Lesparre to enter the province of Guipuscoa, and besiege Logrogno. The regents of Spain had no thoughts of recovering Navarre; but when they saw the French invading Spain itself, they assembled their forces to stop their progress. The male-contents themselves, lately vanquished, accepting a general pardon, led all their troops to the regents. Lesparre seeing an army, much stronger than his, coming against him, would have retired; but was so closely pursued, that he was forced to come to a battle, wherein he was defeated and taken prisoner. The loss of this battle occasioned the loss of Navarre, which the Spaniards recovered in less time than the French had conquered it. Thus, the king of France had the mortification to lose his army, to no purpose, and flagrantly discover to the emperor how he stood affected towards him. 1521.

Francis stirs up Robert de la Mark against the Emperor. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

The same time that he invaded Navarre, he raised Charles an enemy from another quarter, viz. Robert de la Mark, prince of Sedan, and sovereign of Bouillon, who believing to have cause to complain of the emperor, for a denial of justice to the young princes of Chimay, whose guardian he was, implored the king of France's protection. Very probably, Francis had offered it before it was desired. However, Robert de la Mark, seeing himself supported by the king, was so bold as to send a defiance to the emperor, who was then at the diet of Worms. Soon after, the earl of Fleuranges, eldest son of la Mark, put himself at the head of 4 or 5000 men, levied in France, and besieged Vireton, a place in Luxemburgh, belonging to the emperor.

The emperor calls upon the king of England to aid him against France. Herbert.

Then it was, that Charles, who had, with reluctance, agreed to the league of London, thought proper, however, to make use of it, in summoning the king of England to assist him, as obliged by the treaty, since it was evident, the king of France had raised him this enemy. Henry, prepossessed by the cardinal, was glad of a pretence, to cast the blame of the rupture upon the French king. In the interim, to proceed according to the articles of the league, he sent an ambassador, to require him to forbear all hostility against the emperor, not only in Luxemburgh, but also in Navarre. Francis answered, he was not author of the war between Robert de la Mark and the emperor, and all he could do, was, to forbid his subjects to serve, or assist la Mark. As to Navarre, it would have been needless to reply, since it was now out of his power to re-enter it. He performed his promise with regard to the war of Luxemburgh, and Fleuranges disbanded his army. Francis took care not openly to support the duke of Bouillon, for fear of affording Henry, who had offered his mediation, a pretence to declare for the empeor. I shall pursue this affair, when I have spoken of those of Italy, which are of no less importance.

Leo X. joins with France, for the conquest of Naples. Guicciard.

In the beginning of this, or, perhaps, before the end of the last year, Leo X. concluded with the French ambassador residing at Rome, a treaty, whereby he joined in a league with Francis, for the conquest of Naples. The treaty ran, that all that part of the kingdom of Naples, lying between the ecclesiastical state and Gariglian, should remain to the pope, and the rest should be for Henry, the king's second son; but during his minority, the kingdom should be governed by the pope's legate, who should reside at the city of Naples. Whatever the pope's intention was in making this treaty, it may be almost affirmed, he acted with insincerity, because it must have been very disadvantageous to him, for the same prince to hold Milan and Naples. He was too politick, and too much used to by ways, to be thought to proceed fairly on this occasion. What may most probably be conjectured is, that his intention was to deal by Francis I, as Ferdinand, king of Arragon, had done by Lewis XII, when he made much the same partition with that prince. At last, Francis, who had frequently experienced what the pope was capable of, could never believe he really intended to assist him in that conquest; wherefore, he delayed the ratification of the treaty, to gain time to consider seriously of the affair.

The pope's league with the emperor. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Leo X, finding the time for ratifying the treaty was expired, suspected the king of projecting with the emperor, some agreement prejudicial to the holy see. Those that deal not sincerely, are ready to think others like themselves However, the king of France's affected delays, afforded the pope a motive, or pretence, to conclude another treaty with the emperor, to drive the French out of the Milanese, and restore the Sforza's. As he continued, at once, secret negotiations with the emperor and Francis, it would be something difficult to know his real design, if there was not a notable difference between the two treaties just mentioned. That with the French ambassador, concerned a chimerical project, the execution whereof, was almost impracticable in the present juncture of affairs, and, besides, really contrary to his true interest; whereas the other was to his advantage, and agreeable to the projects he had formed; so, probably, the first was made only to procure better terms from the emperor; besides, he had been ever wont to have, as they say, two strings to his bow, which he considered as the grand mystery of politicks. His treaty with the emperor was no less advantageous, than that he would have made with the king of France. The chief articles were these.

The articles of the treaty of league. Guicciard.

That the pope and emperor should join their forces, to expel the French out of the Milanese, and restore Francesco Sforza. That prince was then at Trent, having retired thither, a little before his brother Maximilian was dispossessed of his dominions.

That Parma and Placentia should be restored to the church.

That the inhabitants of the Milanese should provide themselves with salt, only at Cervia, a town in the ecclesiastical state.

That the emperor should aid the pope to conquer Ferrara.

That the sum the emperor gave the pope for the kingdom of Naples, should be augmented.

That the emperor should protect the family of Medici.

That he should grant to the cardinal de Medici, a pension of 10,000 ducats, upon the archbishoprick of Toledo.

That Alexander de Medici, natural son to Lorenzo, late duke of Urbino, should have, in the kingdom of Naples, lands, to the value of 10,000 ducats a year.

This treaty was kept so private, that it came not to Francis's knowledge, till the two allies were going to invade the Milanese. In the interim, they concerted proper measures, to accomplish their designs. The pope, who had already 6000 Switzers, in his service, took care to augment his forces, on divers pretences; and the emperor ordered the viceroy of Naples, to keep the troops of that kingdom ready to march, upon the first notice, and at the same time, caused levies to be made in Germany, to reinforce his army, in Italy. Prosper Colonna was declared general of the league.

They prepare for war.

Colonna, general of the league.

Whilst Francis continued in a fatal security, and left the Milanese destitute of troops, never imagining he should be attacked in Italy, because he thought himself sure of the pope, the two new allies were contriving to seize, at once, Milan, Genoa, and Como, before they proclaimed war against him. For the first of these projects, they employed Hieronimo Morone, senator of Milan, who being suspected by the French, was banished the city. Morone having assembled a great number of exiles, in the neighbourhood of Milan, Lescun, who commanded in the absence of his brother Lautrec, the governor, sallied out of Milan with some troops, and pursued the exiles to Reggio, a town of the pope's, where they had retired, and even demanded of the governor, to deliver them into his hands. The governor refusing, Lescun withdrew, and posted himself about 10 miles from Reggio, within the pope's territories, and lay encamped 10 or 12 days. Then the pope, who only wanted a pretence to declare against France, called a consistory, greatly aggravated Lescun's affront, and declared, that in revenge, he was resolved to join with the emperor; but he had already done so, and the affair of Reggio was a mere pretence to delude the cardinals.

Attempts upon Genoa, Milan, and Como. Guicciard.

Whilst Lescun was at Reggio, Adorno, banished from Genoa, attempted to surprise that city, with some gallies supplied by the pope and the viceroy of Naples, but could not succeed. A few days after, Lescun discovered a plot to surprise Como, and was fully informed, that the pope and the emperor were the authors. It is, therefore, evident, that in case they had succeeded in their designs, they would have made no scruple to appear the aggressors.

Lescun no longer doubting, that there was a design to invade the Milanese, acquainted the 1521. the king, and alſo, ſent for the 4000 Switzers, intended for Milan, who were ready to march. Francis ſurpriſed at the danger the Milaneſe was in, ſpeedily ordered a levy of 20,000 Switzers, and ſent Lautrec to Milan, promiſing he ſhould want for nothing; but this promiſe was but very ill performed.

Colonna beſieges Parma. Bellay. Mezerai.

In the interim, Proſper Colonna, having aſſembled, at Reggio, the army of the allies, beſieged Parma, where Leſcun had now thrown in ſome troops; but before he could take the place, Lautrec having received the ſupplies he expected from Switzerland, forced him to raiſe the ſiege, and purſued him even beyond the borders of the Milaneſe. As he imagined Parma to be out of danger, he had drawn out Leſcun with the garriſon, to ſtrengthen his army; but no ſooner was Leſcun out of the city, than the inhabitants declared for the pope, and erected the church's colours on the walls,

He raiſes the ſiege.

Lautrec is deſerted by the Switzers. Colonna purſues him cloſely. Guicciard.

But this was not the only misfortune Lautrec was to be expoſed to, during the campaign; for preſently after, he was deſerted by the 20,000 Switzers he had lately received, and conſtrained to retire to Milan, where Proſper Colonna purſued him in his turn, with all poſſible diligence. Whereupon, Lautrec deſpairing of defending Milan, quitted the town, after ſupplying the caſtle with ammunition, and withdrew to Como, where the 4000 Switzers he ſtill had, forſook him and returned home, becauſe he had no money to pay them. So, Colonna, taking poſſeſſion of Milan, went from thence to make other conqueſts, which Lautrec could not oppoſe. In a word, Francis loſt the whole duchy of Milan, except a few places.

Lautrec quits Milan.

The death of Leo X. Guicciard.

Probably, Lautrec would not have been able to ſupport himſelf long, in Italy, had not the pope's death, on the 1ſt of December, afforded him ſome reſpite. Leo X, is ſaid to die with joy, at the news of the good ſucceſs of the league. Some, however, affirm, his death was haſtened by poiſon. However this be, the news of the pope's death was no ſooner ſpread, but the troops he maintained, disbanded themſelves. Of the 12000 Switzers he had in the army of the allies, but 1500 remained, and the Florentines retired to their own country. Thus, Proſper Colonna found himſelf in a few days, in as ill a ſituation as Lautrec. The college of cardinals, not knowing what courſe to take, gave no orders, but deferred every thing till the election of a new pope. In the interim, the duke of Ferrara recovered ſome of his towns in la Romagna, and Franceſco Maria della Rovere, took poſſeſſion again of the duchy of Urbino. If Lautrec had then been ſupplied with the men and money, he was promiſed, he would have, doubtleſs, expelled the Imperialiſts out of Milan; but Francis I, entirely neglecting the affairs of Italy, thought only of defending himſelf in Flanders and Picardy, where he was vigorouſly attacked. However, he ſtill held, in Italy, Genoa, Cremona, the caſtles of Milan and Novarra, with ſome ſmall places, on the lake Gorda.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Italy, the war, at length, was begun in the Low-Countries, in a manner very diſadvantageous to France. The troops raiſed by Robert de la Mark, to beſiege Vireton, being disbanded, Francis thought he had ſatisfied the emperor and the king of England. It was indeed ſufficient to take from Henry all pretence of declaring againſt him, ſince by the treaty of league, in caſe one of the allies was invaded, the reſt were not to declare againſt the aggreſſor, till being ſummoned to deſiſt from the war, he ſhould have refuſed. Francis was ſummoned, and had deſiſted, conſequently Henry had no cauſe to complain. But it was otherwiſe with the emperor, who was not contented with ſo ſlight a ſatisfaction. He forbore, however, to complain of the king of France, but was reſolved to be revenged of Robert de la Mark, who had dared to ſend him a defiance; beſides, he conſidered, if Francis undertook to defend that prince, as it was very likely, he would incur the blame of the rupture, and this was what the emperor and cardinal Wolſey chiefly deſired, in order to make uſe of that inducement to perſuade Henry, to declare againſt France; ſo Charles having prepared an army, gave the command to Henry, count of Naſſau, who entering the territories of Robert de la Mark, took and razed ſeveral places. Francis was patient, chuſing rather to forſake his ally, than give the king of England a pretence to arm againſt him. Then Robert ſeeing himſelf without refuge, made his ſubmiſſion to the emperor, who granted him a truce for ſix weeks. In the interim, tho' the emperor had to deal only with a petty prince, unable to reſiſt him, and of whom he had been ſufficiently revenged, he continued to reinforce his army. Francis ſeeing ſo many troops, in the neighbourhood of Champagne, eaſily perceived, they were not ſolely deſigned againſt Robert de la Mark, and that he might be taken unprovided, unleſs he prepared for his defence. In the interim, he repreſented to the king of England, that he could not avoid taking arms, in order to reſiſt the emperor, who was preparing to attack him. Henry replied, he would ſide with neither, but as a common friend, offered to be their umpire; adding, if they would both ſend their plenipotentiaries to Calais, the beginning of Auguſt, cardinal Wolſey ſhould be there, to act in his name, as mediator. Charles readily accepted ſo advantageous a propoſal, ſince he and the cardinal underſtood one another. As for Francis, he durſt not reject it, tho' he had no reaſon to be pleaſed with the king of England; but he did not yet know that Wolſey was wholly devoted to the emperor. It was, therefore, agreed, that the plenipotentiaries of the two monarchs, the pope's nuncio, and the cardinal mediator, ſhould meet at Calais, the 4th of Auguſt.

1521. Campaign of the Low-Countries. Bellay.

In the interim, the lord of Liques having levied an army, at his own charge, as he affirmed, ſurpriſed Mortagne, and St. Amand, in the Tournaſis, on pretence of ſome claim 1521. of his houſe. The emperor affected to conſider this as a private quarrel, in which he had no concern, tho' Liques's army was compoſed of his ſubjects. His view was to oblige Francis to take ſome ſtep, which might give occaſion to accuſe him, of being the aggreſſor. Herein he only imitated that prince, who had attacked him under the name of Robert de la Mark. But ſome time after, the governor of Flanders beſieging Tournay, in form, it was not poſſible to put ſo favourable a conſtruction upon that ſiege, eſpecially as what paſſed then in Italy, left the emperor no room to diſſemble any longer. It is certain, Francis had been ſurpriſed as well in Italy, as in Champagne and Flanders. He had intended, no doubt, to attack the emperor, but did not expect to be invaded firſt. For this reaſon, he wanted time to prepare his army. In the interim, the Imperialiſts took and razed the town of Ardres.

The emperor tries to lay the blame of the rupture upon the French king. Bellay.

The congreſs of Calais. Act. Pub.

The time appointed for the congreſs of Calais, being come, cardinal Wolſey repaired thither, with a numerous retinue, and carried the great ſeal with him. It appears, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was furniſhed with ſeveral of the king's commiſſions, to be uſed as he ſhould think proper. By the firſt, he was conſtituted the king's lieutenant general to adjuſt, as mediator, the differences between the emperor and the king of France; by a ſecond, he was impowered to treat and conclude with Francis I, a renewal of the alliance. But, probably, this was only to ſhew the French ambaſſadors Henry's impartiality, and pretended deſign to join with that prince, who ſhould be found to be unjuſtly attacked. By a third, he had power to conclude a league between England and the emperor, the pope, the king of France, or any other potentate whatever. Thus, Henry, without having yet examined on which ſide the blame lay, left it to his lieutenant to engage him in which party he pleaſed. But very probably, his reſolution was taken already, and the congreſs of Calais intended only to ſhew, he was not reſolved, till after a ſtrict information, and to cauſe the blame of the rupture to be thrown on the king of France. All the proceedings of the cardinal mediator, diſcovered, that he meant not to procure a peace between the two monarchs, but only to find the king, his maſter, a pretence to declare for the emperor.

The emperor's army takes Mouzon, and ravages Champagne. Bellay. Mazerai.

Whilſt theſe affairs were negotiating, at Calais, the Imperialiſts beſieged and took Mouzon, in Champagne. Then they ravaged the country, and plundered the little town of Aubanton, where the count of Naſſau ſuffered his ſoldiers to commit grievous outrages; after which, he laid ſiege to Mezieres. Francis wanting time to aſſemble his army, could not be ready till the end of September; which, however, was ſoon enough to throw ſuccours into Mezieres, and thereby force the count of Naſſau to raiſe the ſiege. The earl of St. Pol recovered Mouzon ſoon after, and the count of Naſſau retired into the earldom of Namur. Champagne being thus freed, Francis ordered his army to march into Flanders, where the Imperialiſts ſtill continued the ſiege of Tournay. When his troops were drawn together, he aſſaulted Bapaume, Landrecy, Bouchain, and carried them; afterwards hearing, the emperor, who had headed his army, was retiring towards Valenciennes, he reſolved to go and attack him, but loſt the opportunity, by his own fault. It is ſaid, if he had been as ſpeedy as he might, and ought to have been, he would have infallibly defeated the emperor, who giving all over for loſt, was retired with 100 horſe only, quitting his army, not to be a witneſs of their deſtruction. Upon this occaſion, Francis I, gave the duke of Bourbon, conſtable of France, great cauſe of diſguſt, by ſetting the duke of Alenſon at the head of the vanguard, tho' that poſt properly belonged to the conſtable, when the king was in the army. It is ſaid, the king gave the conſtable this mortification, to oblige his mother, the ducheſs of Angouleſme, who hated him; but he had too much reaſon, afterwards, to repent his complaiſance to his mother. 1521.

The campaign in Navarre. Hall. P. Daniel.

At the very time Francis I, was attacked, in Champagne, he ſent an army into Navarre, under the command of admiral Bonnivet, who arrived about the end of September, at St. John de Luz. At firſt, he pretended to march towards Pampelona. Then, after ſeveral marches and counter-marches, he ſuddenly approached, and beſieged Fontarabia. When the breach was made, he ordered the town to be furiouſly ſtormed, but, however, was bravely repulſed; but the garriſon, being little able to ſtand a ſecond aſſault, ſurrendered by capitulation. This conqueſt was of very great importance, Fontarabia being one of the keys of Spain.

An account of the congreſs of Calais. Hall. Herbert.

Whilſt the war was vigorouſly continued in Italy, Champagne, Flanders, Picardy, Navarre, cardinal Wolſey was buſy, at Calais, in treating with the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and the king of France. This congreſs laſted 10 weeks, and the parties could not be brought to agree. In all appearance, the mediator, inſtead of cloſing, helped rather to widen the breach. It was long debated, to know which had begun the war. This was the chief point, with reſpect to Wolſey, who intended to throw the blame on the king of France. Afterwards, when the differences themſelves came to be conſidered, the propoſals of the emperor's plenipotentiaries ſhewed, a peace was ſtill very remote. They demanded reſtitution of the duchy of Burgundy, and abolition of the homage due to the crown of France, for Flanders and Artois. The only reaſon they alledged to ſupport their laſt pretenſion, was, that it was unbecoming for an emperor, to do homage to a king. Theſe two propoſitions were of ſuch a nature, that Francis would hardly have accepted them, even after the loſs of many battles. On the other hand, the French ambaſſadors having notice of what paſſed in Italy, earneſtly demanded reſtitution of Milan, and, that the emperor ſhould withdraw his troops from before Tournay. They inſiſted, moreover, upon 1521. on the reſtitution of Navarre, to which the emperor was bound by the treaty of Noyon. If the emperor had been afraid of Henry's joining with the king of France, he might have granted part of theſe demands, without being forced to diſmember his dominions. But Francis could not reſign Burgundy, without letting the enemy into the heart of his kingdom, nor the homage of Flanders and Artois, without diſhonour. But as the emperor was ſecure of the king of England, he perſiſted in his demands, without any abatements.

Wolſey declares he deſpairs of a peace. Act. Pub. Hall. Stow. Herbert.

After the mediator had long feigned to endeavour only to procure a peace, he declared, he ſaw no way to ſucceed. Then, he preſented to the plenipotentiaries, a treaty to ſign, containing articles of little importance, viz. that the French and Flemings ſhould have liberty to fiſh for herrings, till the end of January; that the two contending monarchs ſhould enjoin their ſubjects to purſue no veſſel into the ports, or harbours, belonging to the king of England, and commit no hoſtilities within the territories of the ſaid king, during the war; that the pope's nuncio, and the plenipotentiaries, at Calais, might freely retire with all their train, without receiving any injury from the troops of the two monarchs; that the king of England and the cardinal legate, his lieutenant, ſhould be the conſervators of theſe articles, to be ratified within 10 days. We have here a very ſenſible proof of the cardinal's inſolence, who, in a treaty drawn by himſelf, preſumed, thus, to ſet himſelf upon a level with his maſter, by being declared conſervator with the king. Theſe conventions were ratified by the two monarchs, the 2d and 11th of October, and there appears not in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the leaſt trace of any other treaty made, at Calais, at that time.

Remarks on a paſſage of Bellay's Memoirs.

Du Bellay, however, ſays, in his Memoirs, that the king of England having ſent ambaſſadors to Francis I, during the congreſs of Calais, they laboured ſo effectually, that, at length, it was agreed, the emperor ſhould raiſe the ſiege of Tournay, and withdraw his troops out of the Milaneſe; that Francis ſhould retire into France with his army, and their differences be referred to the arbitration of the king of England. He adds, after theſe conventions, each thought the peace concluded, but that upon the emperor's receiving news of the taking of Fontarabia, he demanded, before the treaty was ratified, the reſtitution of that place, and upon Francis's refuſal, the treaty remained unexecuted. But very probably, this illuſtrious author, who was better acquainted with the particulars of the war, than of the negotiations, was miſinformed. Firſt, becauſe the Collection of the Publick Acts, mentions not this pretended treaty, tho' we ſee there another of much leſs conſequence, concluded at the ſame time. Secondly, we don't find in the Collection, any ambaſſy from the king of England, either to the French king, or the emperor, in the time which muſt have preceded this ſame treaty. Thirdly, there is no likelihood, the emperor would have withdrawn his troops out of the Milaneſe, that is, would have reſtored Milan to France, and loſt the hopes of acquiring Tournay, which was now reduced to extremities, for the bare advantage of ſeeing Francis retire into his own kingdom. In ſhort, it may have been eaſily perceived, Henry was very far from the thoughts of forcing the emperor to yield to theſe terms, and it will ſtill be more plainly perceived by what follows. Add to all theſe conſiderations, that ſeeing the regard the emperor and the king of France had for cardinal Wolſey, it is not likely they ſhould conclude a treaty without his knowledge, and by the miniſtry of other ambaſſadors, whilſt he was at Calais, to do the office of mediator. It may be, theſe propoſals were made to Francis, and he was ſo blind as to imagine they would take place, becauſe he was yet ignorant of the ſecret engagements of the king of England and his miniſter, with the emperor, and becauſe ſuch a report was ſpread in the court of France. Be this as it will, after the taking of Fontarabia, the war continued without intermiſſion, and with great animoſity. Francis I, became maſter of Heſdin, about the beginning of November, and Tournay ſurrendered to the emperor by capitulation. 1521.

Wolſey goes to the emperor, at Bruges. Herbert. Hall.

In the interim, cardinal Wolſey ſtill remained, at Calais, under pretence of ſearching for ſome farther expedient to procure a peace between the two monarchs; for he frequently ſent expreſſes to both, with propoſals, which he knew they would not accept. At laſt, feigning to deſire to gain time, he went himſelf to the emperor, at Bruges, where he was received with as much reſpect, as if he had been king of England. Here he concluded with the pope and the emperor, a league againſt France, by vertue of the powers he had brought with him. By this treaty, the pope engaged to thunder the church's cenſures againſt the king of France. Henry was to invade him with an army of 40,000 men. The emperor and Henry obliged themſelves to break all their engagements with him; moreover, Henry promiſed to give, in marriage, to the emperor, the princeſs Mary, affianced to the dauphin. Theſe were the chief articles agreed upon, by the emperor and the cardinal, the 24th of November, 1521, which were to be ratified and put into form of treaty, within three months; but they engaged to be ſecret, till the time of performance. Thus, was Henry perſuaded by his miniſter, to oppreſs his ally, the king of France, who had done him no injury. The only thing he could complain of, was, that Francis had lately permitted the duke of Albany to return into Scotland, doubtleſs, becauſe he perceived the cardinal was meditating ſomething againſt him. It is in vain to inquire, what intereſt Henry had to declare againſt France, and cauſe the balance to incline to the emperor's ſide; no other can be found but the cardinal's, who wanted to be pope, at Francis's coſt. The death of Leo X, haſtened by poiſon, as ſeveral affirm, and happening during theſe tranſactions, has made ſome ſuſpect, that Wolſey was concerned in it, and the more, becauſe 1521. because he aſpired to be ſucceſſor to a pope much younger than himſelf; but no proof was ever produced. Certainly, Henry would have acquired more glory, in continuing umpire of the peace, between the two contending monarchs, and procuring tranquillity to all Europe, than by all the conqueſts, his miniſter flattered him with. 1521.

A bull to enlarge the legate's power. Act. Pub.

Hitherto cardinal Wolſey had puſhed his fortune to ſuch a height, that it ſeemed difficult to make any addition to it; and yet all this was not capable to ſatisfy him. His legateſhip had been prolonged for two years, the beginning of this year; but he thought himſelf to be too much above all other legates, not to have a different commiſſion from theirs. In April, he procured from Leo X, a bull, impowering him to make 50 knights, 50 count palatines, as many acolyths and chaplains, 40 notaries apoſtolick, who ſhould have the ſame privileges as thoſe made by the pope; to legitimate baſtards, give degrees in arts, law, phyſick, and divinity, and grant all ſorts of diſpenſations. In ſhort, not content with all the riches he poſſeſſed, or with the means he had to increaſe them inceſſantly, he cauſed alſo, the rich abbey of St. Albans to be given him, this year, in Commendam.

The diſgrace and death of the duke of Buckingham. Herbert.

It is no wonder, if, being arrived to ſo high a degree of grandeur and riches, his pride increaſed, in proportion. Tho' the king's blindneſs for him, was inconceiveable, it was not ſo with the courtiers, who ſaw but too plainly, how groſsly he miſled his maſter, who placed ſo great confidence in him; but none dared to take notice of it, ſuch was the dread of his haughty and revengeful temper. The duke of Buckingham, ſon to the duke of the ſame name, who, in the reign of Richard III, loſt his head on the ſcaffold, for endeavouring to procure the crown for Henry VII, ſadly experienced, how dangerous it was to diſcover what was thought of that proud prelate. He happened one day to ſay, in the hearing of one, who betrayed him, that in caſe the king died without iſſue, he thought he had a right to the crown, and if ever he aſcended the throne, his firſt care ſhould be to puniſh the cardinal, according to his deſerts. The duke's title was not altogether groundleſs, ſince he was deſcended from Ann of Glouceſter, grand-daughter to Edward III. Doctor Moreton, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, preſſed the duke, his father, to endeavour to ſeize the crown; but the duke choſe rather to act for the earl of Richmond, than for himſelf, as was ſhewn in the reign of Richard III. What the ſon had ſaid concerning his title, was, therefore, rather imprudent than criminal, ſince he pretended not to the crown, unleſs the king died without heirs. Indeed, his title might be ill-grounded; but he had done nothing to ſupport it. His crime, then, conſiſted only, in what he had ſaid againſt the cardinal, who, for that reaſon, reſolved to diſpatch him. For that purpoſe, he gained ſome of his domeſticks, and learnt, by their means, that he had conſulted a certain monk, who pretended to foretell things to come, and conferred with him, ſeveral times, ſince April, 1512. Probably, the duke, fond of his title, had inquired of the monk, whether the king would die without children; and, that was ſufficient to give the cardinal occaſion to miſconſtrue all his proceedings. When he believed he had ſufficient evidence againſt him, he began with depriving him, of his two principal ſupports; viz. Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, his father-in-law, whom he ſent to the tower, on ſome pretence, and Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, his ſon-in-law, on whom he conferred the government of Ireland, to remove him from London. Preſently after, the duke was apprehended, and accuſed of high-treaſon. The ſubſtance of his impeachment, was, that he had ſeveral times conſulted the monk, concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown, and affected to make himſelf popular. The duke confeſſed, he had talked ſometimes with the monk; but denied it to be with the intent he was charged with. He was, however, condemned to die, as a traytor, which he could not bear to hear when the ſentence was pronounced. "My lord of "Norfolk, cried he, you have ſaid as a tray- "tor ſhould be ſaid unto, but I was never "one. My lords, continued he, addreſſing "himſelf to the peers, his judges, I nothing "maligne for what you have done to me, "but the eternal God forgive you my death, "and I do. I ſhall never ſue to the king for "life, howbeit he is a gracious prince, and "more grace may come from him than I deſire. "My lords and all my fellows, I deſire you "to pray for me." When he ſaid he would not ſue to the king for life, his meaning was, he thought it would be fruitleſs, knowing he was the cardinal's victim, who had an abſolute ſway over the king. Indeed, the miniſter had ſo ordered it, that tho' all the peers of the realm, had a right to aſſiſt at the trial, there were preſent only one duke, one marqueſs, ſeven earls, and 12 barons; and probably, he had ſecured the majority. All the the favour the duke received, was, to be beheaded, inſtead of dying the death of a traytor. This execution was attended with loud murmurs, among the people, and ſatyrical libels againſt the cardinal, wherein was ſaid among other things, that it was not ſtrange the ſon of a butcher ſhould delight in ſhedding blood. But this was all the revenge that was taken for this injuſtice. He was too deeply rooted in the king's mind, to fear theſe murmurs, which, beſides, never reached the king's ears, all about him being either ſpies, or creatures of the cardinal.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

The king was then, wholly intent upon one affair, viz. the war he had reſolved to make upon France, as if his glory and grandeur had depended upon the ruin of that kingdom, whereas his true intreſt was, to ſupport France againſt the emperor, who was now grown too powerful. He was already formidable to all Europe, even without the aſſiſtance of England, how much more by his union with that kingdom? This was owing to cardinal Wolſey's ambition, whoſe counſels to his maſter, 1521. master, were always self-interested. Probably, France was going to be reduced to a very sad condition, it being hardly possible for her to resist so potent enemies, who were to invade her from several quarters. Francis I, imagined, however, he had still one refuge, by means of the Scots, who could make a considerable diversion, in England. The congress of Calais having plainly discovered Henry's partiality to the emperor, he made no doubt of its being an introduction to a rupture. In this belief, tho' he had engaged to detain the duke of Albany, in France, he thought proper to keep him no longer, not thinking himself bound to perform a promise, the motive whereof, was now no more, viz. the mutual friendship between him and Henry. He permitted, therefore, the duke of Albany, to return into Scotland, or rather sent him back, in hopes he would employ part of the English forces on the borders of the two kingdoms. He very justly expected this service from a prince, who was devoted to him, and looked upon his settlement, in France, as much more solid than that in Scotland, where his regency was to last but few years. The duke, therefore, departed for Scotland, and arriving the 30th of October, 1521, after a four years absence, resumed the regency. As he intended to serve France to the utmost of his power, his first care, was, to oblige the earl of Angus, the queen's spouse, to quit the kingdom, deeming him one of the king of England's principal adherents, and, yet, the earl took refuge in France.

The progress of the reformation in Germany. Sleidan.

Whilst the Christian princes were all employed in their temporal concerns, the reformation made great progress, in Germany, by means of Luther's writings, which were read with great eagerness. Luther was satisfied, at first, with attacking the sale of indulgences, then the indulgences themselves, and the pope's power to grant them. This naturally led him to examine the grounds of the papal authority; and, being persuaded there was nothing to support it, in scripture, he wrote upon that subject, without any regard to the Roman pontiff. He attacked, likewise, in his writings, the celibacy of priests, monastick vows, and private masses. Tho' at the time I am now speaking of, viz. the beginning of the year 1521, he had preached and wrote against the pope, but three years, he had gained many followers, and still more enemies, not only by his novel opinions, but also by his sharp and satyrical stile, wherein he threw off all ceremony, with respect to the church of Rome. The book that made most noise, was entitled, Concerning the Babylonish Captivity. In the book the popes were not spared.

In the several answers which appeared, as well against this as the other books of Luther, the decretals of the popes, and the works of Thomas Aquinas, were urged in favour of the the papal power. This gave him occasion, in his answers to redicule those, who in defence of the papal authority, alledged the decisions of the popes themselves, and the testimony of Thomas Aquinas, who was canonized for carrying the pope's authority as high as possible. Besides, he did not shew much regard for that author's writings; which, probably, was the chief thing that incensed Henry VIII. against him. As Henry had much studied the works of Thomas Aquinas, and from thence, properly, had acquired all his theological knowledge, he could not bear to see his favourite author thus contemned. He thought himself, therefore, a match for Luther, and able to confute his writings; but, as Leo X, had by a bull, expresly forbid the reading of his works, and, an answer necessarily supposed the perusal, cardinal Wolsey applied to the pope for a power, to permit such to read them, as desired it, with intent to confute them. This was granted him, by a brief, dated the 17th of April, 1521, the pope little thinking who the person was, that was going to support his cause.

Henry VIII's book against Luther, presented to the pope. Herbert.

Henry finished, in September, his book, against Luther, entitled, Concerning the seven Sacraments. He defended indulgences, papal authority, the number of sacraments, and other articles, combated by Luther, proceeding upon Thomas Aquinas's principles, as upon undeniable truths. Very probably, he was assisted by cardinal Wolsey in composing this work, which was presented to the pope in full consistory. Leo X, who was still living, received it with great joy, and spoke of it in the highest strains of flattery, making no scruple to compare it to the works of St. Augustine and St. Jerom. This is no wonder. A book composed by a great king, in defence of the papal authority, could not be too much esteemed by a pope. A few days after, Leo assembled the cardinals, to consult with them, after what manner he should requite the king of England's service to the church. After a long debate, they resolved, at last, to honour that monarch with the glorious title of Defender of the Faith. In consequence of this resolution, the pope ordered a bull to be drawn, conferring that title on Henry, and all the kings of England, his successors. I shall not repeat here, the magnificent encomiums the pope gave the king, in this bull, and, in a letter of thanks for his book. It may easily be imagined, he spared not the most extravagant expressions to flatter a prince, who was so fond of being flattered, and of whom he stood in need, his nuncio being then, at Calais, negotiating with cardinal Wolsey, a league against France.

1522. Henry's reasons for making war upon France.

I have already spoke of this league, which was really concluded at Bruges. Henry founded his joining with the emperor, upon Francis's having been the aggressor, by encouraging Robert de la Mark to take arms. But besides that, Francis denied he was concerned in that undertaking, and had even obliged Robert to desist, it was evident the emperor had prevented him, by joining in a league with the pope, tho' their league was not so soon made known. The secret attempts upon Como, Milan, Genoa, and the open war in the Milanese, by which the king of France lost that 1522. duchy, were clear evidences, that the league was concluded before Robert de la Mark's affair. Henry pretended, alſo, to have againſt Francis, another cauſe of complaint, which, however, had no better foundation; viz. that contrary to his promiſe, he had permitted the duke of Albany to return into Scotland. But if it is conſidered, that the duke arrived not in his own country, till the 30th of October, that the league of Bruges was ſigned, the 24th of November, it will be eaſy to perceive the league was already reſolved, before Henry could know that the duke of Albany was returned into Scotland. But, tho' upon the firſt notice, he had taken a haſty reſolution to join with the pope and the emperor, was that a juſt cauſe to proceed to a war, which would, probably, ruin France? The truth is, theſe were only pretences to cover the injuſtice of a war, undertaken by Henry for the cardinal's intereſt, and, perhaps, without knowing himſelf the real motives of that miniſter's proceedings.

Henry ſends to the duke of Albany, to go out of Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert.

In the interim, Henry perceiving the duke of Albany would embarraſs him, if he continued in Scotland, attempted a ſecond time to drive him from thence. To that purpoſe, he ſent Clarenceux, his herald, with orders to upbraid him, with breach of promiſe, and with returning into Scotland, to marry the queen dowager, and deprive the young king of the crown. The pretended reaſon of this laſt charge, was, that the queen dowager being deſirous to have her marriage with the earl of Angus annulled, the duke of Albany had ſeconded her ſuit, at the court of Rome. The duke replied, he was returned into Scotland, by the invitation of the great men; that he had never done any thing to give occaſion to ſuſpect him of aſpiring to the crown, neither had he ever any ſuch thought, that, indeed, he had countenanced the queen's ſuit, but without any deſign to marry her, having a wife of his own.

He writ to the parliament upon the ſame account.

The parliament's anſwer. Act. Pub.

Henry was not ſatisfied with ſummoning the regent, but ſent, alſo, a letter to the parliament of Scotland, containing the ſame accuſations againſt the duke of Albany, and a charge to the ſtates, to expel him the kingdom. The ſubſtance of the parliament's anſwer was; that what had been reported to his majeſty, concerning the duke of Albany's return into Scotland, to take forcible poſſeſſion of the king's perſon, was utterly falſe; that the duke did nothing with regard to the king, that could breed the leaſt ſuſpicion, ſince he did not ſo much as offer to change any of his domeſticks, without the conſent of the ſtates; and, that it was with the queen's advice and conſent, that they had taken care of the guardianſhip and education of the king; that they could not believe the duke had ever intended to put away his wife, and marry the queen, or, that the queen had any thoughts of eſpouſing the duke; that, as for the treaty with the king of France, to hinder the duke of Albany's return into Scotland, it was never communicated to them, neither had they any knowledge of it; that they could not help thinking ſuch a treaty very ſtrange, ſince they rather imagined, his majeſty ſhould have ſollicited the duke to return and defend the king, his nephew, againſt his rebellious ſubjects, whereas they ſaw, with grief, it was he who fomented the rebellion. That, if it continued thus, they did not ſee how it was poſſible to keep a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms. That, however, if he would be pleaſed to ſend away the biſhop of Dunkeld from his court, and without interpoſing in the affairs of Scotland leave to the regent and ſtates, the care of governing the kingdom, a truce might be concluded, till the ambaſſy that was to be ſent to him, was ready. But that, in caſe, he would have no truce, unleſs they expelled the regent, they would endeavour to defend themſelves in the beſt manner they could. 1522.

The queen of Scotland's letter to the king, her brother. Herbert.

Queen Margaret, to whom the king, her brother, had likewiſe wrote upon the ſame ſubject, ſent an anſwer, ſharply expoſtulating with him, for giving ear to the report concerning her mariage with the duke of Albany. She freely owned, it was with her conſent and advice that the duke was recalled, adding, if he had not been ſo unkind a brother, ſhe ſhould have had no occaſion to ſeek the protection of a ſtranger.

Henry finds means to avoid a war with Scotland. Buchanan. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Henry could not expect any other anſwer, ſince he was conſcious to himſelf, that his accuſations againſt the regent of Scotland, were only affected pretences, to complain indirectly of the king of France. He ordered, however, the lord Dacres to march into Scotland, with 500 men, and proclaim on the borders, that if the Scots made not peace with him, by ſuch a time, it ſhould be to their peril. But he did not ſupport this bravado; for his ſole view, was to furniſh his party, in Scotland, with a pretence to refuſe to ſerve the regent, in caſe he attempted to make a diverſion, in England, in favour of France. And, in this he was not diſappointed; for, in October following, the regent of Scotland raiſing an army to make an inroad into England, was no ſooner come to the borders, but many of the lords refuſed to attend any farther, alledging, they were unwilling to engage the kingdom in an unneceſſary war with England. The oppoſition the duke of Albany found in his army, convincing him he ſhould be able to do nothing conſiderable, he propoſed a truce, which the Engliſh gladly accepted; for Henry's view, was only to terrify the Scots with a dread of the ſucceſs of a war with England, during the minority of their king. So, the duke of Albany ſeeing it was not in his power to ſerve France, as he deſired, returned about the end of October, to Paris, in order to take freſh meaſures with the king. Thus, Henry attained his ends, in avoiding a rupture with Scotland, as a war with that kingdom could not but extremely incommode him, in his preſent circumſtances.

Francis calls upon Henry to aid him againſt the emperor. Act. Pub.

In the interim, Francis I, having had ſome intelligence of what paſſed, at Bruges, between the emperor and the cardinal, and deſiring to convince Henry, how directly contrary to the league of London, his proceedings 1522. ings were, ſent him letters patent, inſerting the article of the treaty, whereby they were engaged mutually to aſſiſt one another. Then he recited what the emperor had done againſt him, as well in Italy, as in Champagne and Flanders, and ſummoned him to perform the treaty he had ſolemnly ſworn. Henry, in anſwer, ſent a herald to proclaim war againſt him, alledging, he was obliged to it by the ſame treaty of London, becauſe Francis had firſt attacked the emperor, and moreover, had diſappointed him, with reſpect to the duke of Albany. Thus, war was once more declared between France and England, upon very frivolous, not to ſay unjuſt occaſions. But Wolſey had the art of perſuading the king, his maſter, to whatever he pleaſed.

Henry proclaims war. Hall. Stow.

A tax impoſed on England. Herbert.

Henry having without cauſe proclaimed war againſt France, did not dare to call a parliament to demand a ſubſidy; for he could alledge neither any juſt cauſe, nor any neceſſity for undertaking a war deſtructive to the Engliſh merchants. However, money muſt be raiſed, and it was the cardinal's buſineſs, who had embarqued him in the war, to find means. The expedient he thought moſt proper, was, to order the ſheriffs to ſend a liſt of the names of all above 16 years old, with an exact account of what each perſon was worth in land, ſtock, moveables, and money. This was ſuch a ſurvey, as was, formerly, taken, in the reign of William the Conqueror, and had given ſo great cauſe of complaint to the nation. This was followed by a general loan of the tenth of his lay-ſubjects, and a fourth of the clergy, according to the true value of their eſtates, beſides 20,000 pounds, which the king borrowed of the city of London, in particular. Thus, one injuſtice commonly draws on another; for, this war was manifeſtly unjuſt, and became ſtill more ſo, by the means employed to maintain it. Theſe kinds of involuntary loans, to which certain kings of England have ſometimes forced their ſubjects, are a manifeſt violation of the privileges of the people, and tend directly to arbitrary power. If the king may oblige his ſubjects to furniſh him with money, when he ſhall think neceſſary, tho' it be by way of benevolence, or loan, it may be aſſured, he will very ſeldom, or, perhaps, never think himſelf obliged to call a parliament. It is true, Henry was neither the firſt nor laſt, that uſed this extraordinary method to raiſe money; but, tho' he was ſo fortunate as to receive no prejudice by it, ſome of his ſucceſſors, who were pleaſed to imitate him, were not ſo happy.

Murmurings againſt the cardinal.

This general loan made a great noiſe over all the kingdom; for every one openly exclaimed againſt the cardinal, who was the author; but he little regarded the people's clamours, becauſe he was ſupported by the king. However, tho', at firſt, he had given orders to exact loans with the ſame rigour, as if they had been a tax impoſed by the parliament, he met with ſo many obſtacles, that he was apprehenſive of raiſing, in the kingdom, commotions, not to be appeaſed at his pleaſure; ſo, the tax was levied much more gently, than at firſt was intended. This cauſed ſo great a miſtake in the cardinal's calculation, that the king was forced, at laſt, to recur to the uſual method of a parliament, to maintain the war, as we ſhall ſee preſently. The London merchants were the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of the levying this tax. They were required to declare upon oath, the real value of their effects; but they firmly refuſed it, alledging, it was not poſſible for them to give an exact account of their effects, part whereof, was in the hands of their correſpondents in foreign countries. At length, by agreement, the king was pleaſed to accept of a ſum, according to their own calculation of themſelves. 1522.

The London merchants oppoſe the tax.

Cardinal Wolſey's concern, at not ſucceeding in this affair, according to his wiſh, was not comparable to his trouble, at being diſappointed in another, which touched him more nearly, and for which, he had ſpared neither money nor pains; I mean his election to the papal dignity, of which he thought himſelf ſecure. Leo X. dying, the beginning of December, laſt year, when his obſequies were over, the cardinals entered the conclave, where they were not a little embarraſſed, concerning the election of a new pope. Julio, cardinal de Medici, aſpired to the papacy, and had many votes for him; but the emperor's party, and ſome cardinals gained by Wolſey, openly oppoſed the election of Julio. In the interim, as it is required to have two thirds of the voices to be choſen pope, if the cardinal de Medici had not enough for himſelf, he had, however, enough to exclude any other; and, this long detained the cardinals in the conclave. Tho' the emperor had promiſed Wolſey his intereſt, he intended not to keep his word; for his deſign was, to cauſe Adrian Florentio, biſhop of Tortoſa, native of Utrecht, and formerly his preceptor, to be choſen, reckoning, when he ſhould be pope, he would be entirely devoted to him. But this affair was managed ſo artfully, and withal ſo privately, that the cardinals of his party, without diſcovering their intent, were ſatisfied with breaking the cardinal de Medici's meaſures, till an opportunity offered to carry their point.

The cardinal is diſappointed of his hopes of the papacy.

In the interim, Wolſey left no ſtone unturned. As he built all his hopes upon the emperor's intereſt, he wrote to him, to put him in mind of his promiſe, repreſenting the advantages to have a pope at his devotion. At the ſame time, he ordered Pace, who was then at Venice, inſtantly to repair to Rome, and do him what ſervice he could. The emperor was very much embarraſſed in relation to Wolſey; for he had promiſed to uſe all his intereſt in his favour, tho' nothing was farther from his thoughts. It was his intereſt to have a pope at his devotion; but he knew cardinal Wolſey too well, to imagine ſuch a pope would be guided by his counſels. It was, therefore, neceſſary, in order not to loſe Wolſey's friendſhip, to cauſe Adrian to be choſen without the emperor's appearing to be concerned in the election. As he had gained that miniſter to his intereſt, ſolely by the promiſe Herbert.

1522. miſe of procuring him the papacy, he could not doubt, that if he ſaw himſelf deceived, he would turn his maſter againſt him; wherefore, the emperor concealed his deſigns, and was ſo faithfully ſerved in the conclave, that they could not be diſcovered; neither had Adrian ever one vote in the daily ſcrutinies. In the interim, he kept cardinal Wolſey in hopes, and threw upon the cardinal de Medici's faction, the obſtacles which occurred in the performance of his promiſe. At laſt, when they that were in the emperor's ſecret, and managed his affairs in the conclave, were ſecure of a ſufficient number of votes, one day as the cardinals were met to make a ſcrutiny, ſome one propoſed cardinal Adrian, biſhop of Tortoſa, then in Spain. He enlarged upon the great qualities of that cardinal, and the advantages which would accrue to the church, by his promotion. Whereupon, they, who were of the party, voted, one after another, for Adrian, as if they had been inſpired, and, perhaps, without knowing one another's deſign, ſo dexterouſly had the buſineſs been managed. The reſt that were not in the ſecret, ſeeing two thirds of the voices for Adrian, voted the ſame way, leſt a fruitleſs oppoſition might turn to their prejudice. Thus, the election was made with unanimous conſent, and paſſed for a miraculous inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. It is not likely that Wolſey was ſuch a dupe, as to believe the emperor was not concerned in Adrian's election, ſince the ſame was ſo plain. The new pope, who aſſumed the name of Adrian VI, had been his preceptor, and upon his recommendation, was made cardinal, and was now regent, in Spain; beſides, there is no likelihood, that the cardinals would have thought of chuſing a Barbarian, for that's the honourable appellation the Italians beſtow on thoſe that are not of their nation, if the election had not been managed by the emperor. However this be, Wolſey ſhewed no reſentment, whether he waited for an opportunity to be openly revenged, or thought proper to keep fair with the emperor, againſt another vacancy; for it was probable, there would be one very ſoon, the new pope being old and infirm. Adrian VI. was elected in January, 1522, but it was Midſummer before he came to Rome.

Adrian VI. choſen pope. Hollingſh.

The emperor ſets out for Spain, and goes by England. Hall.

The emperor having made a pope, at his devotion, and ſettled his affairs in Flanders and Germany, reſolved to return into Spain, where his preſence was neceſſary; but, as he had cauſe to fear ſome change, at the court of England, on account of what had paſſed in the late conclave, he thought proper to viſit Henry in his way. This viſit was neceſſary, as well to confirm with that prince the articles agreed on, at Bruges, as to try to preſerve cardinal Wolſey's friendſhip, without which, he could not expect to preſerve the king's. He landed the 26th of May, at Dover, where the cardinal waited on him with a magnificent train, and Henry came himſelf two days after; from thence, he conducted the emperor to Greenwich, and then to London, where he was received with all the honour and reſpect uſual on ſuch occaſions. The cardinal legate forgot not to ſhew his grandeur, by ſaying high-maſs, before the two monarchs, aſſiſted by ſeveral biſhops, and ſerved by dukes. As he had reſolved to hide his reſentment, the emperor had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his reception, and found a ready compliance with all his deſires. After ſome ſtay, at London, the king invited him to Windſor, where he was inſtalled knight of the Order of the Garter, into which his brother Ferdinand, alſo, had been admitted the 23d of the foregoing April. This done, the two monarchs received the ſacrament together, and ſwore to the treaty of Bruges. 1522.

He ſigns with Henry the treaty of Bruges. Herbert.

The preamble of the treaty ran, that the emperor and king of France had referred their differences to the arbitration of the king of England, who had ſent the cardinal of York to Calais, to decide them; that in theſe conferences it was long debated, to know, which of the two monarchs had been the aggreſſor, and after mature deliberation, the cardinal had declared, it was the king of France, as well by means of Robert de la Mark, as by invading Navarre; that, therefore, the king of England was obliged by the treaty of London, to aſſiſt the prince attacked, againſt the aggreſſor; that, moreover, he had himſelf cauſe to complain of the king of France, for breach of promiſe, in ſending back the duke of Albany into Scotland, and for diſcontinuing the payments of the ſums due to him. Upon all theſe accounts, Charles and Henry deeming themſelves free and clear from all engagements, with the king of France, had reſolved to contract a ſtrict alliance, and ſeal it with a marriage between the emperor and the princeſs Mary, Henry's daughter, upon the following terms. Of theſe terms I ſhall recite ſuch only as may be of ſervice to the ſequel of the Hiſtory. Thoſe concerning the marriage were to this effect:

Articles of the treaty. Herbert.

That the emperor ſhould eſpouſe, by proxy, Mary, daughter to Henry, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be 12 years old.

That her dowry ſhould be 400,000 crowns, out of which, ſhould be deducted, what the emperors Maximilian and Charles had borrowed of the king of England.

That, in caſe the marriage ſhould not be accompliſhed, by the emperor's fault, he obliged himſelf to pay 400,000 crowns to the king of England, who bound himſelf in the ſame ſum, to the emperor, in caſe the marriage was hindered, on his part.

The terms of the league were;

That before the end of May, 1524, the emperor ſhould enter France on the ſide of Spain, and the king of England in Picardy, each with an army of 30,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe.

That they ſhould make neither peace nor truce, without a mutual conſent.

That if any places ſhould be conquered upon France, they ſhould be reſtored to him of the two allies, who had a right to them; and to prevent all diſputes, each ſhould declare his pretenſions before the firſt of May, 1524.

That if the king of England intended to ſubdue Scotland, or reduce Ireland to an entire obedience, or the emperor to recover Gueldres, or 1522. of Friesland; if the Scots invaded England, or the duke of Gueldres made war upon the emperor; in all these cases, the two monarchs should be bound to assist one another.

That they submitted to the spiritual jurisdiction of the cardinal of York, as legate, and required him to pronounce the sentence of excommunication against him of the two, that should first violate the treaty.

That the treaty should be kept private, so that the common enemy might have no knowledge thereof.

That the pope should be intreated to enter into the league, as a principal contractor, and reputed as such, provided he accepted it within three months.

That the Venetians should be, likewise, admitted, provided they renounced their alliance with France.

That the two monarchs should use their utmost endeavours, to persuade the Switzers to forsake the French, or, at least, to be neutral.

The same day the treaty was signed, the emperor signed also letters patent, promising to pay Henry whatever was due to him from Francis, in case Francis, on account of the present league, should refuse to continue the payments, to which he was obliged.

The emperor's bounty to Wolsey. Act. Pub.

But cardinal Wolsey had not waited to do his own affairs, till the king's were finished; for, on the eighth of June, the emperor, by letters patent, engaged to pay him the pension of 12000 livres, which the king of France gave him for the bishoprick of Tournay. Some days after, he obliged himself to pay him a pension of 2500 ducats, till the like pension was assigned him, upon the vacant churches, in Spain, in lieu of that he received out of the bishoprick of Badajos, which the emperor desired to discharge. But the emperor's bounties to cardinal Wolsey, were amply recompensed, by a great sum lent him, by the king, before his departure.

The emperor makes the earl of Surrey admiral of his fleet. Hall.

During the emperor's stay, in England, which was about five weeks, he so won the affection of the whole court, by his civilities, caresses and presents, that he was almost sure of leaving none but friends about the king. He gained the good-will of the English, chiefly, by constituting the earl of Surrey, admiral of his fleet. The commission was drawn, whilst the emperor was at London, before his journey to Windsor. As he was to make some farther stay, in England, the earl of Surrey, taking with him both the English and Flemish fleets, made two descents into France, and carried away a rich booty. Then he returned, and conveyed the emperor to Spain.

The affairs of Italy. Herbert.

I must now briefly relate the success of the wars, which were waging in several places. The death of Leo X, had put the affairs of the allies, in Italy, in a very ill situation. The troops of the church and of Florence, had relinquished the army, immediately, after the news of the pope's death. Besides that, Prosper Colonna receiving no more supplies of money, either from Rome, or the emperor, was forced to disband most of his remaining troops, and to keep but what was absolutely necessary for the defence of Milan. In the interim, the emperor ordered a levy of 6000 Landsquenets, which Francesco Sforza, and Hieronimo Adorno, a Genoese, were to lead into Italy. Soon after, Lautrec received a reinforcement of 6000 Switzers, which rendered him superior to the allies, and yet he could not hinder the Landsquenets from joining the emperor's army. His only refuge was, to try to bring the Imperialists to a battle, and for that purpose he besieged Pavia; but Prosper Colonna found means to throw succours into the place, without running any risque; whereupon Lautrec, despairing of success, raised the siege, and encamped at Monza, and Colonna, who was afraid for Milan, posted himself at Bicocca, a country seat with a large park, capable of being easily fortified, being surrounded with a deep ditch. Here Colonna intrenched himself in such a manner, that he could not be attacked, without rashness. Lautrec had no inclination to attack che Imperialists in this post, but could not possibly help it. His Switzers would have money, and he had none to give them, Louisa of Savoy, the king's mother, having applied to other uses, the 400,000 crowns designed for the army in Italy. In the interim, the Switzers pressed their general, either to give them money, or lead them to battle, else they were resolved to return home. This put him, at length, upon assaulting the camp, at Bicocca, where he was repulsed with great loss; after which, the Switzers quitting him, he was constrained to repass the mountains, not being able to withstand the Imperialists. Presently after Colonna became master of Genoa. This rich City being taken by surprise, whilst a capitulation was negotiating, was miserably sacked. In short, Francis had nothing left in Italy, but the castles of Milan and Cremona, and even these were very closely blocked up.

The Spaniards raise the siege of Fontarabia. Mezerai.

In othet parts, where the war was carrying on, during this campaign, France was more prosperous. After admiral Bonnivet had taken Fontarabia, the Spaniards invested that place, and continued the siege, without being able to accomplish their enterprise. At last, marshal de Chabanes being sent into Bearn, to command the French army, in the room of marshal de Chatillon, who was dead, raised the siege, and appointed one Frauget, governor of Fontarabia, who afterwards behaved very ill.

The Imperialists and English do no great matters in Picardy. Hall. Hollingsh.

In Picardy and Champagne, the Imperialists and English having joined their forces, performed nothing of moment. The two armies, commanded by the count de Bure for the emperor, and by the earl of Surrey for the king of England, were so superior to those of France, that the duke of Vendome, who commanded in Picardy, was not able to resist them; so, having furnished the towns with ammunition, he contented himself with incessantly annoying them, with a small body of troops. In September, the two generals besieged Hesdin, but after having been five or six weeks before the town, were forced to re-

1522. tire. From thence they marched to Dourlens, and finding the place deſerted, and the gates pulled down, ſet fire to it. Then, intending to approach Corbie, in October, the bad weather, and the care the French had taken for the defence of the place, hindered their undertaking the ſiege. After that, the Imperialiſts retired into Artois, and the Engliſh returned home.

Francis's fault in leaving Lautrec without money.

Thus all the efforts of the emperor and the king of England, would have done Francis no great miſchief this campaign, if he had not himſelf been the cauſe of his ill ſucceſs in Italy, by neglecting to find the Switzers money. Indeed, if Lautrec had not been forced to attack the Imperialiſts, at Bicocca, probably, he would have been maſter of Milan before the end of the campaign. Charles V. then perceived, that to gain any conſiderable advantages upon France, much greater efforts were to be uſed, and for that reaſon continued to careſs cardinal Wolſey, in order to ſecure the king his maſter's aſſiſtance. In the Collection of the Publick Acts, there is a lettet of his to the cardinal, full of obliging expreſſions, plainly denoting his want of him. "I return you "thanks, ſaid he to him, for the good affec-"tion you have always ſhewn me, deſiring "you to continue it, as I firmly believe you "will, for you are ſenſible, that I place my "whole confidence in you. Again, I intreat "you to give the ſame credit to my ſaid am-"baſſadors, as to my ſelf, and ſhew yourſelf, "on this occaſion, as I take you to be, my good "and faithful friend, for I ſhall have a grate-"ful remembrance of it."

1523. The cardinal demands of the clergy a ſubſidy for the king. Herbert.

The extraordinary method uſed by the cardinal to raiſe money, having been very diſagreeable to the Engliſh, he judged it more proper to proceed, for the future, in the uſual way; and, therefore, the king aſſembled a parliament the 15th of April, 1523. The convocation meeting at the ſame time, according to cuſtom, the cardinal reſolved to eſtabliſh a good preſident, in favour of the king, by exacting from the the clergy a conſiderable ſubſidy. His character of legate, gave him ſuch an intereſt with that body, that he was almoſt ſure of obtaining whatever he was pleaſed to demand; but to find leſs difficulties, he removed, on divers pretences, ſome of thoſe from whom he feared to meet oppoſition, and gained others by promiſes or threats. Matters being, thus, ordered, he demanded of the clergy a ſubſidy of one half of their annual revenues, payable in five years. Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and a proctor of the inferior clergy, one Philips, would have oppoſed this exaction; but the cardinal treated them in ſuch a manner, as diſcouraged the reſt from ſupporting them; ſo the ſubſidy was granted, tho' the clergy privately murmured, that the pope's legate, who ought to maintain their rights, was the firſt to violate them.

He receives a mortification in the houſe of commons. Stow.

This affair being thus ended, with reſpect to the clergy, the cardinal repaired to the houſe of commons, where he made a long ſpeech, endeavouring to ſhew the neceſſity of the war the king had undertaken, by aggravating the pretended injuries he had endured from the king of France. He concluded with demanding, a ſubſidy of the fifth part of the goods of every lay ſubject, to be paid in four years. This demand cauſed warm debates among the commons; for ſeveral repreſented, that if the kingdom was actually invaded, hardly could the king require ſuch a ſubſidy, much leſs for a war wantonly undertaken, and rather for the intereſt of the emperor than of England. However, as the court party were very numerous in the houſe, it was reſolved to grant the king a ſubſidy, which was but one half of what was demanded. The cardinal, who was uſed to be complied with, was extremely offended at the oppoſition of the commons. He went again to the houſe, and told them, "He "deſired to reaſon with thoſe who oppoſed "his demands;" but the commons anſwered, by their ſpeaker, "That it was the order of "that houſe to hear, and not to reaſon, but "among themſelves." At this reply, the cardinal withdrew, extremely mortified, perceiving he could only prejudice the king's affairs, in attempting to treat the commons with the ſame haughtineſs he treated the reſt of the world. His ſollicitation, however, had ſome effect, ſince there was an addition made to the ſubſidy. 1523.

An act of attainder againſt the duke of Buckingham. Herbert.

Beſides this affair, for which, properly, the parliament was called, nothing remarkable paſſed in this ſeſſion, except an act of attainder againſt the late duke of Buckingham, who had been condemned by a ſentence of his peers. As all the world was ſatisfied, this ſentence had been procured by indirect and irregular methods, and the cardinal publickly accuſed of having ſacrificed that lord to his vengeance, he had the intereſt to obtain this act, in order to divert the blame thrown upon him. But withal, the parliament ſhewed, that the act was paſſed out of mere condeſcenſion, ſince by another, Henry Stafford, ſon to the deceaſed, was reſtored to his eſtate and honours. A ſtatute was made alſo this ſeſſion, impowering the king, for his life, to repeal all attainders of high treaſon, by his letters patent under the great ſeal.

The character of Wolſey.

Theſe were the firſt attempts made in this reign, to render the king maſter of the debates of the parliament. Cardinal Wolſey was the firſt author, and unfortunately for the ſubjects, the king too well improved his miniſter's inſtructions. Such favourites as this have but too much cauſe to fear the parliament, and, therefore, ſtrive, to the utmoſt of their power, to leſſen its authority, by enlarging that of the ſovereign, who ſupports them. But their labour is in vain; very few fail, at laſt, of falling into the hands of that authority, they have endeavoured to deſtroy. Wolſey is one of thoſe who have the moſt openly abuſed their favour, not only againſt the nation's, but alſo the king's intereſt, which was much leſs dear to him than his own. He was never contented with eſtates or honours. The 24th of March, this year, he procured for himſelf, the biſhoprick of Durham, one of the 1523. the richeſt in the kingdom, in lieu of Bath and Wells, which he was willing to reſign. Two months after, Adrian VI, prolonged his legateſhip for five years, after the expiration of the term granted by Leo X. Thus, eſtates and honours were inceſſantly heaped upon him, without, however, any poſſibility of ſatisfying his greedineſs. Indeed, he carried his deſires much higher, ſince he ſtill aſpired to the papacy, Adrian's age and infirmities giving occaſion to think his pontificate would not laſt long. He ſtill expected to be raiſed to that high dignity, by the emperor's means, and, therefore, forgot nothing to preſerve his favour. To this, doubtleſs, muſt be aſcribed the honourable reception given this year, to Chriſtiern, king of Denmark and Sweden, who had married the emperor's ſiſter. This prince having by his cruelties rendered himſelf odious to his ſubjects, and for that reaſon been expelled his dominions, arrived, in England, about Midſummer, with his queen, and was received as a king unjuſtly oppreſſed, and not like one that had, by his barbarities, drawn his misfortunes upon himſelf. Henry was not contented to do him all poſſible honour, but, moreover, renewed with him the treaty of alliance between England and Denmark, as if that prince had ſtill been in poſſeſſion of his dominions.

This was the fruit of cardinal Wolſey's intereſted counſels, who never regarded either honour or juſtice, in gratifying his paſſions. He expected every thing from the emperor, and, therefore, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to increaſe that monarch's power, that he might be better able to perform his promiſe. It was not the cardinal's fault that France was not utterly ruined; at leaſt, he formed, this year, in conjunction with the emperor, projects tending to the entire diſſolution of that antient monarchy.

A Project againſt France, founded on the conſtable of Bourbon's rebellion. P. Daniel.

Tho' by the treaty of Bruges, ratified by the emperor and Henry, at Windſor, they were not to enter France till 1524, an opportunity which offered cauſing them to take other meaſures, they reſolved to anticipate their expedition, and invade the king of France in three different places. The emperor was to have a ſtrong army, on the frontiers of Spain, to become maſter of Fontarabia and Bayonne; Henry was to employ his forces in Picardy, jointly with thoſe of the Low-Countries; and the conſtable of Bourbon, who had ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by the emperor, or, perhaps, by his own offer, was to make an inroad into Burgundy. As moſt of the events of the following years, turn upon that prince's diſguſt, it will be requiſite, briefly, to mention the reaſons.

Cauſes of the conſtable's diſguſt. Mezerai.

The duke of Bourbon, prince of the blood royal of France, had received the conſtable's ſword ever ſince the firſt year of Francis I. He had all the quallifications neceſſary for that high poſt. Perhaps he had too much merit, ſince, if we believe Mezerai, Louiſa of Savoy, mother to Francis, wiſhed to have him for her husband. But as he feigned not to underſtand what ſhe deſired, he made her his irreconcileable enemy. From that time, he perpetually received mortifications from the king, over whom the ducheſs, his mother, had too great an aſcendant. The firſt mentioned in Hiſtory, was, when, in 1521, the king commanding the army in perſon, gave the conduct of the van to the duke of Alenſon, contrary to the prerogative annexed to the office of conſtable. But this was nothing in compariſon of another, which, however, is related in the Hiſtory of France only upon uncertain reports. The king telling the conſtable, he ſhould be glad to marry him to the ducheſs, his mother, received an anſwer ſo injurious to the ducheſs, that he gave him a box on the ear. This fact is not, perhaps, ſufficiently atteſted; but, however, it is certain, the ducheſs's affection for the conſtable turned to hatred. From thenceforward, he was looked upon with an evil eye, at court, and no more truſted with the command of the king's armies. This was ſufficient to give him great diſguſt. But his enemy not being ſatisfied with theſe mortifications, which ſeemed to her too ſlight a revenge for her contemned love, commenced a ſuit againſt him, for his whole eſtate. The cauſe was naturally to be tried by the parliament of Paris; but the ducheſs put it into the hands of the chancellor and ſome other commiſſioners, her creatures, which convinced the conſtable that his ruin was determined; ſo, perceiving no way to avoid ſo fatal a blow, his deſpair cauſed him to throw himſelf into the emperor's arms. A Flemiſh lord was the manager of this negotiation, wherein the king of England interpoſed, as being equally concerned with the emperor to create troubles in France. It is hard to know exactly when this negotiation began; but we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts of England, the treaty was advanced the 17th of May, 1523. We ſee there, Henry's commiſſion to Richard Sampſon and Richard Jerningham, to treat with the duke of Bourbon, in order to draw him into the league. This commiſſion empowered the envoys alſo to receive of the ſame prince, a promiſe or engagement to own Henry for king of France, to do him homage, and ſwear fealty to him. It cannot be inferred from hence, that the conſtable entered into any ſuch engagement, but only, that Henry intended to draw him into it. However this be, by the treaty made by the duke, with the two monarchs, after the conqueſt of France, he was to have, for his part, Provence, to be erected into a kingdom, and was to marry Leonora, the emperor's ſiſter, widow of Don Emanuel, king of Portugal. The duke was to bring into the field an army of his friends and vaſſals, to whom the emperor promiſed to join 7 or 8000 men. This army was to act in the bowels of the kingdom, whilſt the emperor and Henry invaded Bearn and Picardy.

Francis prepares to go into Italy. Guicciard.

In the interim, Francis I, ignorant of the deſigns of his enemies, was ſolely employed in preparing to recover the duchy of Milan, where he intended to command his army, in perſon. He haſtened his preparations the more, becauſe the Venetians were ſtrongly ſollicited to join with his enemies, on pretence, that 1523. that he amuſed them with the vain hopes of ſeeing them ſpeedily, in Italy, with a powerful army; but notwithſtanding all his diligence, it was not poſſible to avoid that misfortune. The Venetians ſeeing no French army arrive, and dreading to be expoſed to the emperor's indignation, entered, at laſt, into the league againſt France, about the end of July.

Adrian ſuffers himſelf to be deceived by the enemies of France. Guicciard.

On the other hand, pope Adrian VI, laboured with all his power to procure a truce between the Chriſtian princes, fancying, after, that there would be no difficulty to unite them together in a war againſt the Turks; but as his genius was mean, and very different from that of Leo X, and Julius II, his predeceſſors, inſtead of making the princes ſubſervient to his deſigns, he was himſelf, without knowing it, inſtrumental to thoſe of others. The emperor told him, he heartily deſired the truce, but intimated the neceſſity of its being for ſome time, in order to reap the intended advantage. He thereby laid an invincible obſtacle in the way, becauſe the king of France being lately diſpoſſed of the duchy of Milan, would never hearken to a long truce, which would afford his enemies time to ſecure their conqueſt. That monarch's oppoſition, gave the emperor and the king of England occaſion to engage the pope to proceed farther, by hinting to him, that after the example of ſome of his predeceſſors, he ſhould exert his apoſtolick power, which no Chriſtian prince would preſume directly to oppoſe. Pleaſed with theſe hopes, Adrian publiſhed a bull, dated the 30th of April, enjoining, by vertue of the power committed to him by God, a three years truce between all Chriſtian princes, under pain of excommunication and interdict, againſt thoſe that ſhould refuſe to obſerve it. But the king of France diſregarding ſuch a truce, continued his preparations for the Milan expedition, and ordered his troops to march towards Italy. Then the pope was told, that Francis alone, by his non-compliance and obſtinacy, hindered the Chriſtians from joining their forces againſt the Turk. By theſe ſecret practices, the good pope was gradually brought to conclude a league againſt France, with the emperor, the king of England, Ferdinand, archduke of Auſtria, the emperor's brother, the duke of Milan, the Genoeſe, and the Florentines. This league was ſigned the 3d of Auguſt, a few days after the Venetians had deſerted France.

Francis is induced by the affected careleſſneſs of his enemies, to paſs into Italy.

Italy ſeemed, by this league, to be ſecured from all invaſions; and, indeed, Proſper Colonna, who commanded in Milan, ſo little expected to be attacked, that he neglected to take neceſſary meaſures for the defence of that duchy. In the interim, Francis purſued his project, and the more, as he heard there were no preparations at Milan. The emperor ſeemed wholly to neglect the defence of that ſtate, on purpoſe to draw Francis into Italy, reckoning that his abſence would promote the duke of Bourbon's deſigns; nay, it is ſaid, that to induce Francis to abſent himſelf from his kingdom, Henry had cauſed him to be privately told, there was no danger from him that year, in Picardy.

1523. He ſets out for Lyons. Du Bellay.

Affairs being in this ſituation, Francis departed for Lyons, in order to paſs into Italy. In the interim, the emperor was preparing an army, in Spain, to beſiege Fontarabia and Bayonne; but this army was raiſed very ſlowly, becauſe it was not to act, till Francis was engaged in the war of Milan. On the other ſide, the count de Bure, his general, in Flanders, remained quiet, waiting to join the Engliſh, who the better to deceive the king of France, were not to land at Calais, till the end of September. In ſhort, the emperor ordered 8000 Landſquenets to march in ſmall diviſions, into Franche Comte, who were to join the duke of Bourbon as ſoon as he was ready. Upon that prince's revolt, the allies built all their hopes, imagining that Francis being in Italy, France, thus, unexpectedly invaded, in ſo many places, at once, would make no great reſiſtance. Theſe hopes were the better grounded, as Francis having no intelligence of the duke of Bourbon's plots, had no troops at all in Burgundy, few in Guienne and Bearn, and Picardy was in an ill ſtate of defence.

The conſtable feigns ſickneſs at Moulins.

In the interim, the conſtable, not to be obliged to attend the king, pretended to be ſick at Moulins; but Francis, whilſt on the road to Lyons, happened to be informed by two of the conſtable's ſervants, that their maſter held private correſpondence with the emperor. Surpriſed at the news, he turned out of his way to go to Moulins, where he told the duke, who ſtill feigned to be ſick, what had been diſcovered to him. The duke freely owned, the emperor had ſounded him by the count de Rœux, but that he had refuſed to hearken to his propoſals; that he deſigned to inform his majeſty of it, but being prevented by his illneſs from coming to court, he durſt not truſt any perſon with the ſecret. Whether the king believed what the conſtable ſaid, or thought he could not arreſt him in his own territories, he was contented with ordering him to follow him to Lyons. The duke ſet out, indeed, as if he had intended to follow the king, being carried in a litter, on pretence of his ſickneſs, and travelling by very eaſy journeys; but upon notice, that two of his confidents were arreſted at court, he privately withdrew from his attendants, and taking with him only Pomperan, one of his gentlemen, he eſcaped through by-ways, and ſafely arrived, at Trent, in Germany.

The king ſtays in France, and ſends Bonnivet to Italy. Guicciard.

The conſtable's flight convincing the king, that there was ſome grand plot in France, to be executed, during his abſence, he relinquiſhed his deſign of going into Italy, and contented himſelf with ſending his army under the conduct of admiral Bonnivet, who paſſed the Alps about the end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September. About the ſame time the emperor aſſembled his army, in Spain, the Landſquenets arrived in Franche Comte, and the Engliſh landed at Calais, to act in Picardy, in conjunction with the Flemings. It will be abſolutely neceſſary, briefly, to relate what paſſed 1523. passed during this campaign, in these four several places.

The campaign in Italy. Guicciard.

The castle of Milan, where Lautrec had left a garrison, surrendered the 14th of April; so the French had no place of importance in the Milanese, except the castle of Cremona, which too was so closely blocked up, that there was no likelihood of its holding out long. On the other hand, as France could expect no farther assistance from the Venetians, and as all the rest of Italy was joined in a league against her, Prosper Colonna, who commanded in Milan, did not doubt, that the king would desist from his design of carrying war into the Milanese. For that reason, he had neglected to repair the fortifications of the capital city, which were in an ill state, the ramparts being fallen down in several places; however, upon advice, that admiral Bonnivet was going to pass the Alps, he drew together all his forces, to try to defend the passage of the Tesin; but he came too late. The French had made such speed, that he was forced to retire to Milan, in the utmost disorder; nay, he resolved to abandon that city, if, by an unaccountable negligence, they had not given him some days time to repair the works. He had but 15000 men, with which he could not expect to defend, against an army of above 40,000, so large a city, which, also, was open, in several places. However, as he had learnt, by long experience, that it must not always be thought, the enemies will do what is most for their advantage, he never ceased repairing the places, which wanted it most, deeming he could but withdraw, at last, in case the French were as expeditious as they ought to have been. If Bonnivet had marched directly to Milan, he would have found the gates open; but after taking Novarra and Vigerano, and passing the Tesin, without opposition, he preposterously imagined, a few days more or less, would signify nothing; so having lost, to no purpose, four or five days, he gave the emperor's general time to put Milan in a posture of defence. At last, approaching the city, when it was too late, he found it incapable of being attacked, by the good management of Colonna. Whereupon, he resolved to encamp at Chiaravalla, in hopes of cutting off the provisions of Milan, and of having the Imperialists at his mercy; but he took his measures so ill, that after persisting in his design, till the end of November, he was forced himself to remove from Milan, for want of provisions. All he did, during that time, was, to relieve the castle of Cremona, reduced to the last extremities. Such was the success of Bonnivet's campaign, which might have been more glorious for him, and more advantageous for the king, his master, had he taken juster measures, and improved his superiority. Colonna died shortly after, and Lanoy, viceroy of Naples, took the command of the imperial army. The season was so far advanced, that nothing remarkable passed in those parts, till the end of the year, when the duke of Bourbon came and took the command of the emperor's troops, not without Lanoy's great disgust, who unwillingly resigned his post to a foreigner.

The campaign in Bearn. Herbert.

The allies, as I said, were resolved not to invade France, till September, because it was to be presumed, the king would then be employed in Italy; for which reason, it was the beginning of that month, before the emperor assembled his army, in Spain. Lautrec, who commanded in Guienne, hearing the Spaniards were drawing together, hastened to the frontiers, to provide for the defence of Bayonne and Fontarabia, which were most exposed. Frauget, an officer of note, was governor of Fontarabia, having been left there the last year, by marshal de Chabanes. Lautrec relying upon Frauget's bravery and experience, left him in the same post, after having re-inforced the garrison, and laid in some ammunition. After that, he did not question, the place would be able to maintain a long siege. These precautions being taken, with regard to Fontarabia, he repaired to Bayonne. He was no sooner arrived, than the Spanish army appeared before the walls, supported by a Fleet, which threw the inhabitants into great consternation, the town being weak towards the sea; but Lautrec so managed it, that the Spaniards were disappointed, tho' they had expected to carry the place without opposition. Therefore, perceiving that the siege would employ them too long, they suddenly raised it, and invested Fontarabia, which was basely surrendered, by Frauget, in very few days. He was like to have lost his head, for a fault of that consequence; but tho' he preserved his life, he saved not his honour, being publickly degraded.

The campaign in Champagne. Bellay.

The emperor was not so successful in Burgundy and Champagne. Lamothe of Noyers, the duke of Bourbon's officer, was gone, some time since, into Germany, to conduct into Burgundy, count de Furstemberg, who, with 7 or 8000 Landsquenets, was to join there the duke of Bourbon. Tho' this project seemed to be frustrated by the duke's flight, count de Furstemberg, however, entered Champagne with his army, and, immediately, took Coiffy and Monteclair, small places, which made no great resistance; but the duke of Guise, who commanded in that province, knowing Furstemberg had no cavalry, assembled all the nobles of the country, and forming some squadrons, closely followed the Germans. Furstemberg finding himself too weak, in the heart of the enemy's country, and having no horse to oppose to those of the duke of Guise, resolved to retire into Lorrain. However, he could not make his retreat, without receiving a terrible cheque near Neufchatel, where the duke of Guise defeated the best part of his troops.

The campaign in Picardy. Hall.

Whilst the war was carrying on, in Italy, Bearn, and Champagne, Henry embarqued his troops, commanded by the duke of Suffolk, who landing at Calais, joined the count de Bure, the 20th of September. These two bodies made together, an army of 25 or 30,000 foot, and about 6000 horse. The duke de la Trimouille, who commanded in 1523. that country, was ſo inferior, in number of troops, that he durſt not keep the field. All he could do, was, to throw ſuccours into the places moſt expoſed, and ſpeedily inform the king of what paſſed in thoſe parts. Francis I, being then at Lyons, was extremely embarraſſed, to withſtand ſo many unexpected invaſions. It is ſaid, that deceived by falſe advices from England, he hap been in hopes Picardy, for this year, would be unmoleſted, and yet, he ſaw it was there his enemies intended to make their greateſt effort. In this perplexity, he immediately diſpatched the duke of Vendome, with all the troops he could aſſemble, both to defend Picardy, and ſecure Paris, where he did not queſtion, the alarm was very great. Indeed, the duke of Suffolk, and the count de Bure, paſſing by Terouenne, Heſdin, and Dourlens, had taken Roye and Montdidier, and were advanced as far as Corbie; but the news of the duke of Vendome's march, cauſing them to be more circumſpect, they thought proper to proceed no farther, and the rather, becauſe the ſeaſon began to be very incommodious, and they were afraid of being engaged between the dukes of Vendome and la Trimouille. Theſe conſiderations, induced them to think of retreating. In their return, they became maſters of Bouchain, the governor whereof brought him the keys, tho' they had no thoughts of attacking the place; then leaving an Engliſh garriſon in Bouchain, they retired into Artois; but preſently after, the French recovered that town. Thus, the progreſs of the confederate army, was not ſo great as Francis had reaſon to fear. Had the army taken the field ſooner, he would have been greatly embarraſſed; but, as I ſaid, the hopes the emperor, and the king of England, had conceived of the duke of Bourbon's undertaking, was the cauſe of their not beginning the campaign in any place, till about the end of September.

The death of Adrian VI. Guicciard.

When Adrian VI, came into the league, he had no deſign to ruin France, in order to compel Francis to wage war with the Turks, but he had been told, it would be a certain means to oblige that prince to conſent to the truce. In the interim, without the pope's knowing any thing of it, the emperor and Henry had combined to invade France, and divide it between them. Probably, if he had lived to the end of this year, he would have ſeen, that their deſigns did not correſpond with his, but he died about ſix weeks after ſigning the league againſt France. He was a good man, of a character very different from thoſe of his predeceſſors; for, inſtead of thinking to enlarge the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, by unjuſt confiſcations, he had given the duke of Urbino the inveſtiture of his duchy; he had done the ſame by the duke of Ferrara, knowing that the former popes had quarrelled with theſe princes, only to gratify their deſire of inriching their own relations; and he would have even reſtored Modena and Reggio, to the duke of Ferrara, if the clamours of his council, who could not underſtand, that juſtice ought to be the foundation of policy, had not prevented him. He thought likewiſe of reforming the court of Rome, but death ſuffered him not to execute his deſign. All theſe proceedings, ſo remote from thoſe of his immediate predeceſſors, who had uſed the courtiers, and people of Italy, to ſee the popes purſue the looſe maxims of temporal princes, cauſed it to be ſaid, that he was indeed an honeſt man, and a good Chriſtian, but an indifferent pope. Accordingly, the Italian writers, ſpeak of Adrian VI, in terms, importing no great eſteem for him. 1523.

Cardinal Julio de Medici, miniſter to Adrian VI.

The beginning of this year, cardinal Julio de Medici, who retired to Florence upon the death of Leo X, returned to Rome, and was very civilly received. In a ſhort time, he gained the good-will of the pope, to ſuch a degree, that he ſupplanted the cardinal of Volterra, the prime miniſter, and cauſed him to be committed to the caſtle of St. Angelo. From thenceforward, he had the ſole management of the pope's affairs, gaining more and more his eſteem, by putting on the devout, and expreſſing a great zeal to unite all the Chriſtian princes againſt the Turk. By this artifice, he led him to publiſh the bull for a trienial truce, and, at length, to ſign the league againſt France. A miniſter like this, was, doubtleſs, too politick for ſuch a pope. Adrian VI, died the 14th of September, at the very time the armies began to take the field. Had he lived any longer, he would, without doubt, have perceived, the league he had imprudently engaged in, was by no means proper to procure the union, he ſo much deſired among the Chriſtian princes.

Cardinal Wolſey endeavours to obtain the papacy. Burnet.

Cardinal Wolſey, having notice of the pope's death, wrote to the king, to inform him of it, deſiring his aſſiſtance and protection. Next day he wrote to him again, praying him to recommend him to the emperor, by a letter under his own hand. He flattered himſelf, that the emperor would have a grateful ſenſe of his late ſervice, in cauſing the king, his maſter, to declare againſt France, and would now, at leaſt, keep his word with him, ſince he had no preceptor to be elected, as in the former conclave. But if the Italian hiſtorians are to be credited, the emperor little thought of procuring him the papacy, and the conclave much leſs, who met preſently after Adrian's deceaſe. Of the 39 cardinals which were in the conclave, Julio de Medici had 15 or 16 at his devotion, beſides three, who had promiſed not to be againſt him, if he was like to ſucceed in the conclave; ſo that he had only ſeven or eight to gain, in order to have two thirds of the voices. But this was not eaſy; for cardinal Colonna, his adverſary, was at the head of a much more numerous party, who would have infallibly carried it, if the cardinals of that faction could have as readily united in chuſing a pope, as in preventing the election of Julio. This made the conclave hold 50 days. As for Wolſey, if he had any cardinals for him, they could not be many, ſince he had againſt him the French party, and the emperor's adherents were the ſame

1523. ſame with thoſe of Julio de Medici. In ſhort, Colonna's faction not agreeing upon the choice of a pope, becauſe the head would have one elected diſagreable to his friends, his indignation at their obſtinacy, cauſed him to be reconciled with the cardinal de Medici. Guicciardini ſays, Julio gave him a promiſe under his hand, to make him his vice-chancellor, and preſent him with his palace, one of the moſt magnificent in Rome. Be this as it will, Colonna giving him ſeven or eight votes, which were at his diſpoſal, there was no farther obſtacle to his election. It being reported in the conclave, that the cardinal de Medici would be elected the next ſcrutiny, moſt of the cardinals ſtayed not till day appeared, but went and made their court to the perſon who was ſoon to be their maſter. Their example drew in the reſt, who finding it not in their power to hinder the election, were willing alſo to ſhew, they freely concurred. So, that very night, between the 18th and 19th of November, all the cardinals went and paid obeyſance to the new pope, and next morning his election was confirmed by a ſolemn ſcrutiny, wherein he had all the voices. Thus, it is that the Holy Ghoſt influenced the cardinals in the choice of a pope, who, contrary to their intention, was to be the cauſe of the Roman church's receiving the deepeſt wound ſhe had ever received. The new pope aſſumed the name of Clement VII, on account of St. Clement's day, which was to be very ſhortly ſolemniſed. He was natural ſon of Julian de Medici, uncle to Leo X; but this defect of birth, tho' contrary to the canons, was not conſidered. Leo X, who made him cardinal in the beginning of his pontificate, took care to have it legally atteſted, that Julian promiſed his mother marriage; ſo, taking for granted, that a bare promiſe was equivalent to a marriage, he declared Julio legitimate. Alexander VI, took the ſame courſe, when he made Cæſar Borgia, his baſtard ſon, cardinal. He produced witneſſes, who depoſed, that Cæſar was born of a married woman, whence it was inferred, the child was to be deemed the husband's ſon. In this manner did the vicars of Jeſus Chriſt abuſe laws divine and human, to gratify their paſſions.

Wolſey hides his diſguſt.

The news of Clement's election was a great mortification to Wolſey, who, ſince the promotion of Adrian VI, had expected to be pope upon the firſt vacancy. He muſt have been extremely incenſed with the emperor, who had twice deceived him. So, it may be aſſured, conſidering his violent temper, he reſolved from that moment to be revenged; but as he could not execute this reſolution, without his maſter's aſſiſtance, he was to take care not to diſcover, that he acted from a motive of revenge; otherwiſe he would have run the riſque of being diſappointed. He concealed, therefore, under the mask of a feigned moderation, the reſentment he harboured in his breaſt, and contented himſelf with telling the king, that ſeveral had voted for him in the conclave, but his abſence had turned to his prejudice, and the ſituation of the affairs of Italy cauſed the cardinals to chuſe Julio de Medici. A few days after, the king's ambaſſador, at Rome, had orders to notify to the new pope, the king's and Wolſey's joy at his promotion. At the ſame time, Wolſey deſired the continuance of his legateſhip, affirming, that by reaſon of the king's prerogative, it was not worth to him 1000 ducats a year. Clement VII. was entirely of the emperor's party, and knowing of what conſequence the king of England's aſſiſtance was at the preſent juncture of affairs, in Europe, gladly embraced the opportunity to gratify cardinal Wolſey, and make him his friend, by whoſe means he might gain the favour of the king, his maſter. In this diſpoſition, he granted the cardinal more than he deſired; for, by a bull of the 9th of January, 1524, he gave him the legantine power for life. This is the firſt and, perhaps, the only inſtance of a perpetual legateſhip.

Wolſey becomes every day more proud.

Wolſey was now raiſed to the higheſt point of grandeur that a ſubject can aſpire to; for he was archbiſhop of York, biſhop of Durham, abbot of St. Albans, cardinal legate a Latre for life, lord chancellor of England, prime miniſter and favourite, careſſed by the emperor, reſpected by the pope, regarded by all the princes of Europe, with almoſt an abſolute power in England, where nothing material was tranſacted, either in ſpirituals or temporals, but by his ſole direction. It is eaſy to ſee, ſo many advantages were but too capable of rendering him proud and inſolent. He looked upon the king's ſubjects as ſlaves, and unfortunately for them, inſpired the king, by degrees, with the ſame principles, and inſinuated to him, that he ought to conſider the parliament only, as an inſtrument to execute his will. Theſe inſinuations were but too effectual, as will be ſeen in the ſequel. In order to render him independent of the parliament, he perſuaded him to exact from his ſubjects, at once, the ſubſidy given by parliament, and payable in four years. Every one aſcribed to the cardinal this illegal proceeding, which eſtabliſhed a very dangerous precedent; but he little regarded the complaints of the people, ſince he was ſecure of the king's countenance, and the pope's protection.

He forms the project of founding two colleges. Herbert. Stow.

He undertook this very year, a thing he would never have ventured upon, had he not been fully ſatisfied, that the pope could not be without the king's aſſiſtance; and that was, to cauſe ſeveral religious houſes to be ſuppreſſed, to appropriate the revenues to two colleges, which he intended to found at Oxford and Ipſwich. If the pope had reaped any advantage, his conſent would not have been very ſtrange; but that he ſhould agree to the ſuppreſſion of ſeveral monaſteries, to gratify a private perſon, is what could hardly be expected, and, perhaps, had never happened. Accordingly, the pope would never have granted it, had not the ſatisfying the paſſion of his ambitious miniſter, been abſolutely neceſſary to his 1523. his deſigns. The cardinal's project, was, to found a magnificent college, at Oxford, by the name of Cardinal-College, wich was to conſiſt of 186 perſons, with ſalaries. The other college was to be founded, at Ipſwich, theplace of his birth, but only for grammar, andto qualify, young ſcholars for his college, at Oxford; but as theſe projects were not accompliſhed this year, I ſhall ſpeak of them on another occaſion, and cloſe the year 1523, with an account of what paſſed in Scotland, where affairs were no more undiſturbed than elſewhere.

Henry forms deſigns deſtructive to Scotland. Buchanan.

Henry being engaged in a war with France, juſtly dreaded the diverſion the Scots might make on the frontiers. On the other hand, the king of Scotland's minority frequently tempted him to become maſter of that kingdom, after the example of Edward III, his predeceſſor, who diſpoſſeſſed the king, his nephew, at a like juncture. The factions, in Scotland, increaſing his hopes, he never ceaſed to foment them by means of his adherents, who were very numerous, becauſe he had wherewithal to give penſions. He uſed for pretence, his being obliged by nature, to take care of the king his nephew's concerns, who was not of age to diſtinguiſh what was advantageous, from what was prejudicial; ſo, as an affectionate uncle, he did his endeavour to remove the duke, of Albany, under colour there was danger of that prince's ſeiſing the crown. He knew he ſhould never accompliſh his deſigns, ſo long as Scotland was guarded by ſuch an Argus. The queen, his ſiſter, had made him very uneaſy in joining with the regent, becauſe he was thereby deprived of all pretence of ſaying, the king was in danger. Indeed, it was not likely, as the parliament of Scotland wiſely intimated in their anſwer, that the queen ſhould join with the regent, to deſtroy the king, her ſon. Henry, however, to give ſome colour to this accuſation, was pleaſed to ſuppoſe, the queen, his ſiſter, deſigned to marry the duke of Albany; but finding, at laſt, this ſuppoſition had not the deſired effect, he had recourſe to another expedient, which was, to gain his ſiſter, by promiſing to procure her the regency. That done, he preſſed yet more earneſtly, the parliament of Sotland, to remove the duke of Albany, and confer the regency on the queen. But, to render his inſtances more effectual, he reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to hinder the duke's return into Scotland. To that end, he ſent out a fleet to take him in his paſſage; and, at the ſame time, he ordered the earl of Surrey to march into Scotland, to ſhew the Scots what they were to expect, in caſe they did not give him ſpeedy ſatisfaction. The Scots being without a leader, and unprepared againſt this invaſion, ſuſtained great damages, during the campaign. The earl of Surrey took Jedworth, and carried fire and ſword into the country, without meeting any oppoſition. In the interim, Henry's adherents ceaſed not to cry, that a peace muſt be made with England, ſince it was the only way to ſave Scotland from utter deſtruction. Henry ſupported them, by offering to the king, his nephew, his only daughter Mary, in marriage, and magnifying the advantages the Scots would receive from this alliance, but withal, he required of them, that they ſhould break all their engagements with France. It was, however, very unlikly, he ſhould ſeriouſly think of giving his daughter to the king of Scotland, ſince ſhe was affianced to the emperor, and he ſtrictly united with that prince; beſides, ſuch a marriage would have been of no advantage to himſelf, or the nation. To this the oppoſite party anſwered, the king of England ſought to diſengage Scotland from France, only the more eaſily to ruin the kingdom, and that to make an alliance with England, by abandoning France, was the ready way to be ſlaves to the Engliſh; that this was not the firſt time the kings of England, by ſuch marriages, had attempted to become maſters of Scotland, and the worſt was to be feared from neighbours, who had ever aſpired to the poſſeſſion of all Great-Britain. In a word, the deſtroying with fire and ſword a country, whoſe friendſhip was courted, was a ſtrange way of deſiring an alliance, and propoſing a marriage. All theſe reaſons were anſwered by the other party. But it tended only ſo to augment diſorder and confuſion among the Scots, that it was impracticable for them to come to any reſolution. In the interim, Henry, who only intended to terrify them, by making them feel the effects of his arms, ordered the earl of Surrey to quit Scotland, and return into England; but he had ſcarce ſent his men into winter quarters, when the Scots made inroads on the borders of England, which obliged him to march a ſecond time into Scotland, where he became maſter of Jedburrough. 1523.

He invades Scotland. Hall. Buchanan.

The duke of Albany deceives the vigilance of the Engliſh, and goes to Scotland. Buchanan. Hall.

In the interim, the duke of Albany hearing what paſſed in Scotland, burned with deſire to repair thither, to appeaſe by his preſence, the troubles cauſed by the king of England's adherents, and to ſtrengthen the French party, which was in danger of being ſurmounted by the other. Francis I, had granted him an aid of 3000 foot and 200 men, at arms, to enable him to make a diverſion upon Henry, from that quarter; but it was not poſſible to tranſport theſe troops into Scotland, whilſt the Engliſh fleet kept the ſea, to hinder their paſſage; wherefore, policy was to be recurred to. For that purpoſe, he feigned to deſiſt from his deſign of going into Scotland, and ſent his troops into quarters, remote from the coaſt, with orders, however, to be ready to march upon the firſt notice. The tranſport-ſhips were likewiſe ſent away to certain ports, from whence they were ordered to ſail to the appointed rendezvous, the moment they heard from the duke. This ſtratagem deceived the Engliſh admiral, who being informed, by his ſpies, that the duke of Albany was returned to court, and had diſmiſſed his troops and veſſels, thought there was nothing more to fear this year, and ſo returned with the fleet into England. The duke was no ſooner informed of it, but he aſſembled his troops and ſhips, and embarquing about the middle of September, arrived

in 1523. Scotland, the 24th, the ſame day the earl of Surrey became maſter of Jedburrough.

He marches with an army to the borders. Buchanan.

The regent's arrival revived the courage of the French party, who began to be extremely diſmayed, and drew from the king of England ſeveral perſons who had only favoured him out of fear. Some time after, the regent ſummoned the nobility to Edinburgh, and endeavoured to convince them, that the kingdom would be in great danger, unleſs the king of England's deſigns were timely and vigorouſly oppoſed. But all his eloquence was not capable of cauſing a change of opinion, in thoſe who preferred Henry's penſions to all the arguments that could be alledged. However, he aſſembled an army, and advanced towards the borders, where he arrived the 22d of October; but when he came to march into England, he met with the ſame obſtacles that had ſtopped him the laſt year. That is, the generals and officers of the Engliſh party refuſed to follow him, maintaining, it was manifeſtly againſt the intereſt of Scotland to provoke the Engliſh, and, therefore, it was ſufficient to be upon the defenſive. They added, if the deſign was to ſerve France, it could not be done better, than by keeping an army on the frontiers, which would oblige the Engliſh to have the like in thoſe parts; but in the preſent circumſtances of Scotland, it was too much to hazard a battle, the loſs whereof would prove the ruin of the kingdom. In ſhort, the regent ſeeing it was in vain to perſuade them to follow him, ordered Werk-caſtle to be aſſaulted by the French troops; but they were vigorouſly repulſed. In the interim, upon notice of the earl of Surrey's approach, at the head of a numerous army, he did not think proper to expect him, but choſe to retire. Indeed, it would have been too dangerous to give battle, with an army wherein the Engliſh had ſo many favourers. The ſeaſon being no longer proper for one or other to keep the field, the earl of Surrey, content with having ſtopped the Scots, ſent his troops into winter quarters, and the regent followed his example.

Progreſs of the reformation. Sleidan.

Whilſt the flames of war were kindled, in almoſt all parts of Europe, the reformation made great progreſs in Germany, and began even to ſpread in Switzerland, France, and England. In the beginning of this year, the canton of Zurick, moved by the preaching of Zuinglius, renounced divers articles of religion they had hitherto profeſſed, tho' Zuinglius and Luther differed about the euchariſt. Many, likewiſe, in France and England, began to diſlike a religion, that ſeemed to be founded more upon the pope than upon Jeſus Chriſt. Adrian VI, hearing of the daily progreſs of Luther's doctrine in Germany, diſpatched a nuncio to the diet of Nuremberg, to exhort the German princes to deſtroy Luther and his followers. However, he confeſſed in a letter to them upon the ſame ſubject, that many abuſes and diſorders were crept into the church, throwing the blame upon thoſe who had governed before him; but he ſaid, to reform all, at once, would be the way to ſpoil all, and therefore it was neceſſary to proceed by degrees, in this reformation. Luther having ſeen this letter, publiſhed it in German, with notes of his own, wherein he ſaid, among other things, that the degrees the pope mentioned were ſo large, that there was 100 years interval between each of them. On the other hand, the diet taking advantage of the pope's confeſſion, demanded a free council, in Germany, where every one ſhould be obliged, upon oath, to ſpeak his real opinion, and that numberleſs abuſes, under which Germany had ſo long groaned, ſhould be reformed. 1523.

Luther anſwers the king of England's book. Sleidan.

In the interim, Luther ſtill continued to write in defence of his doctrine. Among other things, he publiſhed an anſwer to the king of England's book, wherein he uſed no ceremony. This behaviour obliged Henry to complain of him, to the princes of the houſe of Saxony. At the ſame time he exhorted them to hinder the publication of Luther's German bible, for fear the tranſlation ſhould be prejudicial to the truth; but his letter had no great effect.

1524. Affairs of Italy. Guicciard.

The progreſs of the reformation was not yet conſiderable enough, to be regarded by the chief ſovereigns of Europe, whoſe thoughts were wholly intent upon war. Clement VII. refuſed to renew the league, tho' himſelf had engaged his predeceſſor in it, and declared he would ſtand neuter. This declaration, at firſt, extremely embarraſſed the duke of Bourbon, becauſe the emperor not having provided for the payment of his troops, it was not poſſible for the duke to ſatisfy them, ſince the pope and the Florentines withdrew their uſual ſubſidies. He found means, however, to draw ſome money from the inhabitants of Milan, and, at laſt, perſuaded the pope to give him 20,000 ducats, and cauſe the Florentines to furniſh him with 50,000 on condition of ſecrecy.

Not long after, the duke of Bourbon receiving a ſupply of 6000 Landſquenets, and the Venetian army, commanded by the duke of Urbino joining him, he took the field with 35000 men. In the interim, Bonnivet was greatly embarraſſed; for he had not above 20,000 men, having loſt the reſt of his army by death or deſertion, during the laſt campaign; but what was worſe, he had no money to pay his troops. This was a common misfortune to both ſides. It is true, he expected 10,000 Switzers, and 5000 Griſons, but foreſaw they would be of little ſervice, becauſe he had not wherewithal to content them at their arrival. This made him reſolve to go in queſt of the Imperialiſts, and give them battle; but as they were informed of his condition, they determined to avoid it, tho' they were ſuperior in number, in expectation of diſperſing his army without engaging. And, indeed, the 5000 Griſons, who were coming to join the admiral, and were advanced as far as Bergamo, not receiving the money promiſed them, immediately returned. As for the 10,000 Switzers, they arrived, indeed, at Ju ea, and even advan-

1524. ced to the banks of the Sefia; but it was not poſſible to perſuade them to continue their march, for want of money to pay them. In the interim, the Imperialiſts became maſters of ſeveral ſmall towns, which very much annoyed the French camp, and, at laſt, forced the admiral to retire to Novarra; and, in the mean time, the caſtle of Cremona, which the French had hitherto kept, ſurrendered to the Imperialiſts.

The French army repaſs the Alps. Bellay.

Bonnivet, finding, that the Griſons were returned; that the Switzers would not ſtir without being ſecure of their pay; and that his men deſerted in great numbers, reſolved, at laſt, to re-paſs the Alps. As ſoon as the duke of Bourbon had notice of his march, he purſued him with all ſpeed, to compel him to a battle. There were even between the two armies, ſeveral ſharp skirmiſhes, in one of which the brave Bayard was ſlain; but notwithſtanding all the efforts of the Imperialiſts, Bonnivet retreated in good order. When the French had re-paſſed the mountains, the places they ſtill had in the Milaneſe, ſurrendered, by capitulation, to the Imperialiſts.

The emperor's and Henry's deſigns upon France. Herbert.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, but the emperor and the king of England thought of means to invade Francis, in his own kingdom. They had expected great matters from the duke of Bourbon's revolt, but hitherto it was not poſſible to make any uſe of it, becauſe the conſpiracy was diſcovered too ſoon. The affairs of Italy having proſpered beyond expectation, they reſolved to make uſe of the duke of Bourbon to carry war into France, imagining, if he could have ſome conſiderable advantage, he would cauſe the kingdom to rebel. The duke himſelf fed them with theſe hopes, becauſe that was the thing which rendered him conſiderable. He would have been glad to act in ſome place near his own territories, from whence he expected great ſupplies; but it was thought more proper, that he ſhould enter Provence with an army, by reaſon he could eaſily be aſſiſted by the Spaniſh fleet, which kept at Genoa; whereas by engaging in the middle of the kingdom, the fleet would be of no ſervice. This reſolution being taken, Henry readily promiſed to find the duke 100,000 crowns a month, on condition, that after the firſt month, he ſhould be free to diſcontinue the payment, provided he acted himſelf in Picardy, at the head of a royal army, from the 1ſt of July, to the end of December.

The duke of Bourbon marches into Provence. Guicciard.

Tho' the emperor had put the duke of Bourbon in hopes, he would lend him all his army, in Italy, for this expedition into Provence, he could not, however, diſpenſe with leaving a good part at Milan, and other places of that duchy, under the command of Lanoy, viceroy of Naples. On the other hand, the Venetians withdrew their troops, becauſe they had promiſed by their private treaty only to defend the Milaneſe. So, the duke of Bourbon began his march, the 24th of June, much weaker than he expected *, and entered Provence the ſecond of July. He preſently became maſter of Aix and ſome other places, and, at laſt, came before Marſeilles, the taking whereof was the chief end of his expedition. But a few days before, Renzo de Ceri, an Italian captain, in the French ſervice, had entered with a ſtrong garriſon. Whereupon the duke found he ſhould meet with more reſiſtance than he had imagined; but, however, he opened the ſiege. 1524.

Francis I. flies to its relief.

In the interim, Francis I. having intelligence of Bourbon's march, ordered his forces to be aſſembled, and ſome troops ſent to Avignon, for fear the enemy ſhould ſeize it. There he reſolved to aſſemble his army, and came himſelf to command, in perſon. It is needleſs to ſpeak either of the ſiege of Marſeilles, or of the king's great diligence in aſſembling his troops. It ſuffices to ſay, in a word, that the very day he departed from Avignon, in order to fight the Imperialiſts, viz. the 10th of September, the duke of Bourbon raiſed the ſiege of Marſeilles, and retired into Italy. Whilſt the king was at Avignon, he received the news of the queen's death, who died, at Blois, in July.

The king marches into Italy another way. Guicciard.

The duke of Bourbon's retreat, entirely changed the face of affairs. Francis I, who had been in danger of loſing Provence, ſaw himſelf at the head of an army, of above 40,000 men, ready to be employed in any important undertaking; ſo, perceiving that the the Imperialiſts took a great compaſs to retire into Italy, he reſolved to improve that advantage, and the ſuperiority of his army, to recover the Milaneſe. This reſolution being taken, he began his march, and tried to reach Milan before them. On the other hand, the duke of Bourbon having notice, that the king was taking the ſhorteſt road to Milan, made incredible ſpeed not to be prevented, perceiving, that thereon would depend the preſervation of the duchy. Thus the two armies marching by different routs, arrived the ſame day, one at Albe, the other at Vercelli. A few days after the duke of Bourbon joined the viceroy of Naples, at Pavia.

Henry alters his deſigns and forſakes the emperor. Herbert.

Whilſt the imperial army was in Provence, the court of England was otherwiſe diſpoſed than before, and ſeemed too intend, to follow new maxims. Henry made no diverſion in Picardy, tho' he had paid but one month of the ſubſidy he was to give the duke of Bourbon. This was ſufficient to create ſuſpicions in the emperor, which were confirmed by Henry's unſeaſonable demand of the money lent him, at his departure from England. He could not believe, Henry would demand his money at ſo improper a time, inſtead of performing his own engagements, unleſs he intended to ſeek an occaſion of quarrel. His uneaſineſs ſtill increaſed, upon advice from his ambaſſador, in England, that a perſon was come from France to London, from the ducheſs of Angouleme, regent of that kingdom, and had long and frequent

1524. frequent conferences with cardinal Wolſey. All this, added to the cardinal's revengeful temper, whom he had vainly amuſed with hopes of the papacy, made him juſtly apprehenſive, that the king of England was thinking to abandon him, and join with his enemy. However, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, there was no other meaſure to take, ſince all depended on the ſucceſs of the war, which was going to be renewed, in Italy, where his generals were not a little embarraſſed.

The Imperialiſts abandon Milan. Guicciard.

As ſoon as the duke of Bourbon, and the viceroy of Naples were joined, they conſulted upon what was to be done at ſo ill a juncture. At firſt, they reſolved to leave ſtrong garriſons in Pavia and Alexandria, and take refuge in Milan; but the plague had made ſuch ravage in that city, every thing there was in ſo great confuſion, and money and proviſions ſo ſcarce, that they were forced to deſiſt from their deſign and abandon Milan. So, having well ſtored Pavia and Alexandria, they withdrew to Soncino, where Franceſco Sforza alſo repaired with them.

The French enter the city.

In the interim, Francis I. continuing his march towards Milan, and hearing the Imperialiſts were retired, cauſed his troops to enter the city, and ordered the caſtle to be inveſted. If, inſtead of going to Milan he had marched directly to the Imperialiſts, who were little able to withſtand him, he would have infallibly diſperſed them; but Bonnivet's unfortunate advice, induced him not only to march to Milan, which muſt have fallen into his hands, if he had defeated, or routed the Imperialiſts, but alſo to reſolve to beſiege Pavia. When he appeared before that place, the generals of the Imperialiſts began to take courage, in expectation, that the length of the ſiege, and the winter ſeaſon, would afford them time to take ſome meaſures. In the interim, they ſpeedily ſent for a ſupply of 10,000 Germans. The pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines failing them all at once, upon the French king's coming into Italy, their only refuge was the length of the ſiege of Pavia, which began, in November.

The pope treats privately with the king. Herbert.

Clement VII, who in the late pontificate, had openly declared againſt the king of France, being in great perplexity, ſent a nuncio to the two armies, to procure a truce; but not ſucceeding, he made his peace with the king of France; moreover, he propoſed to him the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples, and concluded with him a private treaty, promiſing free paſſage to the French troops.

Francis ſends a detachment to Naples. Bellay.

Soon after, Francis detached 5 or 6000 men, commanded by the duke of Albany, who had left Scotland the beginning of the Spring, with orders to march towards Naples. As they were neceſſarily to paſs through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, Clement VII. pretended, for ſome time, to oppoſe it, to make believe it was againſt his will. When the French were in the middle of his dominions, he publiſhed his agreement with the king of France, as if newly made, and ſent the emperor notice, excuſing himſelf on the neceſſity and conſtraint he was under. Tho' the emperor was very flegmatick, he could not help ſhewing, on this occaſion, an extreme reſentment againſt the pope. He ſaid, it was ſolely at the inſtance of Leo X, that he had undertaken the defenſe of Italy; that Clement himſelf had preſſed Adrian VI, to ſign the league, and now he was become pope, forſook him in his greateſt need, and left him to proſecute alone a war kindled by himſelf; that, however, he hoped to come off with honour, and to the confuſion of thoſe who ſo baſely deſerted him. The event ſhewed, however, the pope had done him ſignal ſervice, in perſuading his enemy to carry war into the kingdom of Naples, ſince he thereby cauſed him to divide his forces; but it is uncertain whether the pope had any ſuch intention.

Another accident, farther contributed to deprive Francis of his great ſuperiority over his enemies. Renzo de Ceri, who defended Marſeilles, having received the king's orders to embarque 10,000 men on the gallies, and join the duke of Albany, who expected him in Tuſcany, took Savona in his way. This ſucceſs, which ſeemed very advantageous for Francis, turned to his real misfortune, as it put him upon ſending a freſh detachment to Savona, commanded by the marqueſs of Saluzzo, to take againſt Genoa what advantages ſhould offer. The two detachments for Naples and Savona, ſo weakened the French army, that the Imperialiſts no longer feared to take the field, in order to prolong the ſiege of Pavia, till the arrival of the German ſuccours, which the duke of Bourbon himſelf was gone to haſten. And, indeed, within a few days Peſcara became maſter of Caſſano, a poſt very convenient for his purpoſe. With this event, ended the year 1524; but before I proceed to the next, it will be neceſſary, briefly, to mention what had paſſed this year, in Scotland.

Francis ſends another detachment to Savona. Guicciard.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

The duke of Albany returning into France, in May, the queen dowager and the earl of Arran of the houſe of Hamilton, adviſed the young king, who was between 13 and 14 years old, to aſſume himſelf the reins of the government. This advice was very intereſted, but James was yet too young to perceive it. He followed it, and ſummoning the ſtates, declared the authority of the regent was ended, and for the future all orders were to be received from the king himſelf. After that, the queen and the earl of Arran governed, in the king's name. This change was not made with univerſal approbation. The earls of Lenox and Argyle, concerned to ſee the earl of Arran in poſſeſſion of the government, under colour of the king's anticipated majority, ſent for the earl of Angus from France, to ſupport themſelves by his intereſt, becauſe he was entirely fallen out with the queen, his wife. Upon that lord's arrival, they combined with him, and on pretence of freeing the king from the pretended captivity, the queen and the earl of Arran held him in, levied troops, and took Sterling, after which they marched to Edinburgh, where the king was. At their approach, the queen and the earl carried the king into the caſtle, but as they had not taken care to lay in proviſions, 1524. visions, were forced in few days, to deliver the king to the three lords, who assumed the title of regents. Thus, the king was again put in guardianship, under these three lords, who agreed to rule in turns, four months each. The earl of Angus began, and as he was in the king of England's interest, sent ambassadors to treat of the king of Scotland's marriage with the princess Mary, according to Henry's own scheme. To facilitate this negotiation, the truce which was to expire the 1st of December, was prolonged to the 26th of January, 1525.

Clement confirms Henry's title of Defender of the Faith.

As England was very quiet during the whole year 1524, the affairs of that kingdom will not take me up long; I shall only observe, that Clement VII, finding himself in a very ill situation, between the emperor and the king of France, shewed great regard for the court of England, whose assistance, he thought, he might want. To that purpose, he confirmed the king's title of Defender of the Faith, conferred on him by Leo X, and, to please cardinal Wolsey, suppressed St. Frideswid's priory in Oxford, on the ground whereof the cardinal intended to build his college, and appropriated the revenues to the new foundation; but as this was not sufficient for the maintenance of the college, the cardinal procured powers to visit all the religious houses, notwithstanding their immunities, and particularly those of the Franciscans, who pretended to be exempted. This was to make a certain list of such as might be suppressed, in order to transfer the revenues to his colleges. The bull which gave him these powers, was dated the 21st of August. On the 11th of September following, the pope granted him another bull, empowering him to suppress as many monasteries as he pleased, to the value of 3000 ducats a year, for the same use.

Cardinal Campejus made bishop of Salisbury. Act. Pub.

In the beginning of December, cardinal Laurentius Campejus, who had been the pope's legate, in Germany, was made bishop of Salisbury, with the king's consent. We must now return to the siege of Pavia, to behold an event, which made a very great alteration in the affairs of Europe, wherein England was deeply concerned *.

1525. Bellay. Mezerai.

Francis I, still persisted in this siege, tho' without making much progress, because of the rigour of the season, and the imperial army, which being posted at Cassano, annoyed his convoys very much; besides, he had made three detachments, one to besiege the castle of Milan, another for Naples, and a third for Savona. On the other hand, the duke of Bourbon came from Germany, about the end of January, with a supply of 10,000 foot, and 1000 horse, which made the imperial army 22,000 strong. As the generals wanted money, and for that reason were not sure of hindering the army from disbanding, they resolved to attempt the relief of Pavia. To that end, they began to march the 3d of February, towards the town, bent to improve what opportunities should offer; but, as the camp of the besiegers was strongly intrenched, they waited three weeks before they executed so dangerous a resolution, which might be attended with terrible consequence. In the interim, the Grisons having recalled their 6000 men, in the French service, and these troops departing, notwithstanding all the king's endeavours to detain them, the duke of Bourbon thought he should no longer defer attacking the enemy's camp. This resolution was executed the even of St. Matthias, with a success very fatal to Francis, since his army was routed, and himself unfortunately taken prisoner. 1525.

The French are attacked, and their king made prisoner. Guicciard.

The success of this battle filled all Europe with consternation and dread. The emperor was without a rival, and in condition to overrun Italy, with his victorious army, whilst the king of England, his ally, had it in his power to give France a mortal wound, on the side of Picardy. Consequently, the balance of Europe being taken away, the sovereigns, for the most part, had great reason to dread falling, at last, into slavery. The Venetians alone, perfectly knowing the danger, proposed to the pope, a league against the emperor, not questioning the king of England would also join in it, because it was his interest. This league added to the forces France could still bring into the field, and the supplies which might be received from the Switzers, by paying them well, would have been sufficient to keep the emperor in awe, if it could have been speedily concluded; but the pope preferring his own interest, to that of Europe, in general, hastened his treaty with the viceroy of Naples, who acted in the emperor's name. By this treaty, the emperor, among other things, was to give the investiture of Milan to Francesco Sforza. There were also three separate articles concerning the pope, in particular, viz. 1. That the inhabitants of the Milanese should furnish themselves with salt, from the pope's territories. 2. That the emperor should compel the duke of Ferrara to restore to the church, the town of Reggio, seized after Leo X's death. 3. That the pope should have the disposal of the benefices in the kingdom of Naples. By this treaty, which was of no force, till ratified by the emperor, the politick viceroy found means to cause to vanish, or, at least, to defer the project of league against the emperor, proposed by the Venetians, and to render the other powers jealous of the pope. This was the greatest service he could possibly do his master, on this occasion.

The emperor's generals at a loss.

In the interim, the emperor's generals were greatly embarrassed, after so glorious a victory, for want of money to pay their troops. They had, indeed, received 100,000 ducats from Florence, but that not sufficing to pay the arrears of the army, and maintain the soldiers afterwards, they were forced to disband the best part of the troops, when by the treaty with

1525. with the pope, they were ſure of having no league to fear; beſides, Triulzi, who was beſieging the caſtle of Milan, had now repaſſed the Alps, and the duke of Albany was only thinking of retiring into France, with his army. This diſbanding of troops would have been of very great conſequence to the emperor, whoſe intereſt it was to prevent, by his moderation, the meaſures which the alarmed ſtates of Italy might take againſt him, if his generals had proceeded accordingly; but proſperity cauſing them to be wanting in policy, they treated the ſtates of Italy, and eſpecially the Venetians, with a haughtineſs, that gave them occaſion to think their liberty in danger, and made them reſolve to uſe all poſſible endeavours, to avoid the threatened ſlavery.

The emperor's moderation at the news of the victory of Pavia. Guicciard.

The emperor could better diſſemble his ſentiments. He received the news of the victory of Pavia, and the French king's captivity, with great moderation, forbidding any demonſtrations of joy, and ſaying, Chriſtians ought to rejoice only for victories over Infidels. He ſeemed to ſympathiſe with Francis's misfortune, and, as I may ſay, to put himſelf in his place, by acknowledging it to be a mere chance, and no prince, how brave ſoever, exempt from the like accident. Soon after, he called his council, to debate what was to be done with the priſoner. His confeſſor, who ſpoke firſt, was for releaſing him, without terms. He repreſented to him, that by ſuch a generous action, he would not only acquire immortal fame, but alſo make the king of France his real friend, who, not to be out done in generoſity, would, doubtleſs, ſtrive to expreſs his gratitude; that with his help, he would give law to Germany and Italy, without being obliged to demand the aſſiſtance of other inferior princes. But the duke of Alva anſwered all theſe arguments, and concluded it was beſt to reap from this victory, all the advantages it could naturally procure; and the emperor embraced his opinion. This plainly ſhews, that his pretended moderation was but a diſguiſe, to hinder the princes of Europe from being alarmed, and concerting meaſures to oppoſe the execution of his ambitious deſigns.

The emperor offers terms for Francis's liberty. P. Daniel.

To continue this diſguiſe, he ſent the count of Beaurain into Italy, with certain terms, on which he was willing to releaſe his priſoner. He was very ſure Francis would not accept them; but it was his intereſt, to make the world believe, it was not his fault, that the French king was not releaſed. Wherefore, it was every where induſtriouſly reported, that the emperor had ſent the king very reaſonable terms; but great care was taken not to publiſh them. Among other things, he demanded, for himſelf, the duchy of Burgundy; moreover, he had a mind to join to the duke of Bourbon's territories, Provence and Dauphine, and erect the whole for that prince, into a kingdom, independent of the crown of France. Laſtly, he demanded, that Francis ſhould give the king of England entire ſatisfaction, concerning what was due to him. The firſt of theſe conditions, in juſtice and equity, contained nothing ſtrange. King Lewis XI. took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Burgundy, after the death of the laſt duke, under colour of a title which was conteſted, and of which, however, he made himſelf judge. It could not, therefore, be taken ill, that the emperor ſhould demand reſtitution of what was wreſted from Mary of Burgundy, his grandmother, at leaſt, till the cauſe was legally decided. But what was ſurpriſing, and very hard in the emperor's propoſals, was, his deſire to eſtabliſh, in the heart of France, an independent kingdom, to gratify a rebellious ſubject, the prime author of the king's misfortune. Probably, he inſiſted on this article only to make the firſt paſs the better, or to give occaſion for a rupture. Francis I, rejected theſe conditions with the utmoſt indignation, and ſwore, he would rather be a captive all his life, than accept them *. But he offered, in his turn, conditions which he thought very advantageous to the conqueror, viz. that he would marry Leonora, queen dowager of Portugal, the emperor's ſiſter, and give the duke of Bourbon, his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Alenſon, who had lately loſt the duke, her husband; that he would agree to hold the duchy of Burgundy, as the queen dowager's dowry, and leave it to their male heirs; that he would reſtore the duke of Bourbon, all his confiſcated eſtates; that he would renounce all claim to Naples and Milan; that he would ſatisfy the king of England concerning what was due to him; laſtly, that he would pay the ſame ranſom as king John, when taken priſoner at the battle of Poictiers. But the emperor was not ſatisfied with theſe offers. He ſtill inſiſted, that the duchy of Burgundy ſhould be reſtored to him without condition; moreover, he affirmed, that Francis had no right to Naples and Milan, and, therefore, his offer to relinquiſh it, was needleſs and chimerical.

Great conſternation in France. Guicciard.

It was not without reaſon that the emperor perſiſted in his demands. It is eaſy to judge the conſternation of France, after the loſs ſhe had lately ſuſtained. The king was a captive, and almoſt all her generals taken, or ſlain, in the battle of Pavia. The kingdom being exhauſted by continual wars under this and the former reigns, was deſtitute of men and money. The Switzers were diſheartned. The canton of Zurich, which had refuſed to furniſh the king with troops for the war, was ſtill in the ſame diſpoſition from a principle of conſcience. Zuinglius, who had great intereſt in that canton, perſuaded the ſenate, that to barter the blood of their citizens for money, and ſerve the ambition of princes, was an infamous thing; but tho' all the cantons had been equally inclined to find troops, it was well

* When the articles were preſented to Francis, he was ſo diſpleaſed at them, that he is ſaid in a fury to draw his dagger and cry, "It is better for a king of France to die thus." Upon which, Hernando de Alenſon, who was preſent, haſtily took the dagger from him. Herbert.

1525. known, they would not do it without being paid; and to procure the money was no eaſy thing. On the other hand, there was reaſon to fear, the king of England would improve this opportunity, to invade France thro' Picardy, whilſt the emperor attacked the provinces bordering upon Spain. In fine, there was nothing to be expected from Italy, ſince the pope had made his peace with the emperor, it being impoſſible the Venetians would alone maintain the war, for the ſake of France. Thus, was ſeen, on all ſides, juſt cauſe of alarm. Certainly, had the emperor and Henry renewed their league, and vigorouſly attacked France, that kingdom in its preſent ill circumſtances, muſt have been ruined. But at the time the regent, and all true Frenchmen, were under theſe apprehenſions, a ray of hope appeared, which hindered their courage from ſinking entirely. The pope and the emperor could not agree together, tho', outwardly, they ſeemed willing to unite. The Venetians were inclined to join in a league with the other ſtates, to oppoſe the emperor's progreſs. In ſhort, the king of England, inſtead of taking advantage of the king of France's misfortune, generouſly took his part. On the other hand, Franceſco Sforza, ſeeing himſelf, as it were, the emperor's ſlave, ſtrove to throw off this yoke, and, tho' he miſcarried, his attempt, however, produced a good effect, as it ſhewed the emperor the diſpoſition of the princes, who entered into this plot, which it will be neceſſary to explain, in order to give a diſtinct idea of the affairs of thoſe times, wherein England was concerned; but firſt it muſt be ſeen what became of the captive king.

Francis I. is carried into Spain. June. Guicciard.

The unfortunate priſoner was kept, in the caſtle of Pizzighitone, till Eaſter, but with ſo much uneaſineſs on the part of the Imperialiſts, that they durſt not remove their troops from that quarter, for fear of his being reſcued. At laſt, Lanoy hearing, the Venetian ambaſſador, at Rome, had frequent conferences with the pope, was afraid ſome plot was forming, to deliver the priſoner; wherefore, without imparting his deſign to the duke of Bourbon, whom, perhaps, he miſtruſted, he reſolved to convey him into Spain; but this was difficult, ſince he had no naval force, and the French gallies were at ſea. To remove this obſtacle, he inſinuated to the king, that the only way, ſpeedily, to obtain his liberty, was, to confer, in perſon, with the emperor; that, as the emperor was a generous prince, and had ſhewn a concern for his misfortune, their interview could not but produce a good effect, and promote a ſpeedy peace. Francis agreed to it, full of hopes, that he ſhould do more himſelf, in two or three conferences with the emperor, than his miniſters, in many months. He even lent the viceroy his gallies, to carry him into Spain, where he arrived about the middle of June.

He is ſhut up in the caſtle of Madrid. Guicciard.

He flattered himſelf, he ſhould be treated in Spain, as king John was in England; but at his arrival, he had the mortification to be confined in the caſtle of Madrid, where the emperor, inſtead of treating with him, in perſon, did not ſo much as pay him a viſit; and all he could obtain, was, a ſafe-conduct for his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Alenſon, who came to Madrid, in September. She was empowered by the regent, her mother, to negotiate with the emperor; but, at laſt, ſhe was forced to return, and nothing obtained. When ſhe came to Madrid, ſhe found the king, her brother, ſo ill, that his recovery was deſpaired of; and, as there was no room to doubt, that his grief, at ſeeing his liberty ſo remote, occaſioned his illneſs, the emperor poſted from Toledo to Madrid, to viſit and comfort him, in the apprehenſion of loſing, by his priſoner's death, the advantages he expected from his captivity. He put him, therefore, in hopes of his deliverance, in the two viſits he made him, tho', in general terms, which, however, produced the deſired effect, ſince the king recovered his health; but when, after his recovery, he would have renewed the negotiation, he quickly perceived, he was farther from his deliverance, than he imagined. The emperor ſtill inſiſted upon the reſtitution of Burgundy, and when the king offered to eſpouſe the princeſs Leonora, and hold that duchy as her dowry, Charles excuſed himſelf, as having promiſed to give the queen, his ſiſter, in marriage, to the duke of Bourbon. It was no ſmall mortification to Francis to ſee one of his ſubjects preferred before him; but what troubled him ſtill more, was, that he ſaw it to be only a pretence to retard the concluſion of the treaty. So, in the deſpair the emperor's rigour threw him into, he gave the ducheſs of Alenſon a writing under his hand, whereby he conſented, and even ordered, that the ſtates of France ſhould crown the dauphin, his ſon. This, in France, is called the Edict of Madrid. But the parliament of Paris thought not fit to record it, either becauſe it was againſt the laws of the realm, or they deemed ſuch an imperfect edict to be of no authority, ſince the king was not free. It may be, Francis thereby, deſigned to let the emperor ſee, that inſtead of having a king in his power, he ran the riſque of having only a prince, without dominions.

The emperor deals deceitfully with the pope. Guicciard.

Whilſt the emperor amuſed his priſoner, in Spain, he acted with no greater ſincerity, with the pope, who did not know what to think of his proceedings. The victorious monarch had courted him very earneſtly; but, after making a treaty with him, by the viceroy of Naples, he long delayed to ratify it, and, at laſt, had ſent his ratification without including the three ſeparate articles. He ſaid, that as to the duke of Ferrara, he could not oblige him to deliver Reggio to the pope, being a fief of the empire. As to the ſecond article, whereby the emperor was bound to oblige the inhabitants of the Milaneſe, to take their ſalt of the pope's ſubjects, he ſaid, that concerned only the duke of Milan, and for his part, he could not promiſe for others. That for the benefices of Naples, he could not agree to that article, unleſs a limitation was added, which rendered it of no effect, viz. that what had been practiſed in the reigns of the former kings of Naples, ſhould be conformed to. The pope 1525. pope finding, the emperor refuſed to ratify theſe three articles, would not accept of the ratification, and they both remained upon the ſame terms, as before the treaty; but the emperor had obtained his deſires, ſince he had obſtructed the league which was projecting againſt him, in rendering the pope ſuſpected by the reſt of the ſovereigns.

The emperor offers the inveſtiture of Milan to Sforza, on a condition not to be performed. Guicciard.

There was another thing which ſhewed the emperor's inſincerity, viz. having ſent the inveſtiture of Milan to Franceſco Sforza, he clogged it with the condition, that Sforza ſhould pay him 1,200,000 ducats, in recompence for his charges, in keeping that duchy for him; and, as it was evident, Sforza could not poſſibly perform this condition, it was no leſs ſo, that the emperor only ſought a pretence, to continue maſter of Milan. Theſe things alarmed the pope, who heard, beſides, that the council of Spain was not favourable to him; and, indeed, ſome of the emperor's miniſters had adviſed him, to chaſtiſe the pope for joining with France, at ſo critical a juncture, and compel him to reſtore Modena to the duke of Ferrara, and Bologna to the Bentivoglio's.

The Venetians endeavour to form a league againſt the emperor. Guicciard.

On the other hand, the Venetians ſeeing there was no likelihood, that the emperor really intended to reſtore Sforza, could not but be alarmed at his keeping the duchy of Milan; wherefore, they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the pope, and the king of England to join with them and France, againſt the emperor, well knowing, that otherwiſe, all Italy would fall under the dominion of the houſe of Auſtria. A letter of Andrea Gritti, their doge, to cardinal Wolſey, of the 31ſt of March, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſhews, that theſe able politicians had formed this project ſhortly after the battle. The letter, indeed, is only an ambaſſador's credentials, who had orders to treat with the king upon a very important affair; but, at ſuch a juncture, this great affair could be only the league they were projecting.

The pope continues undetermined.

In the interim, the pope was extremely embarraſſed; for, in attempting to manage too artfully, he had made ſo many falſe ſteps, that he knew not which way to turn; which is frequently the caſe of thoſe, who, quitting the great road, walk through by-ways. Clement VII, could not reſolve either to be ſatisfied with the emperor's offers, or enter into a league againſt him. In this uncertainty, he choſe to follow the example of Leo X, and Julius II, his predeceſſors, that is, to treat with the emperor and his enemies, at the ſame time, in order to be determined by the events, in what would be moſt advantageous. To that end, whilſt he was treating, at Rome, with the Venetians, he ſent cardinal Salviati to Spain, to negotiate with the emperor, putting into his hands a diſpenſation, deſired by that monarch, to marry his niece Iſabella of Portugal; but the diſpenſation was not to be delivered to the emperor, till after the concluſion of the treaty.

Sforza is kept in ſervitude by the Imperialiſts. Guicciard.

The affairs of Italy, being in this ſituation, another accident happened, which plainly ſhewed, the emperor only ſought to amuſe all the ſovereigns, by a feigned moderation, whilſt, in truth, he was ſolely thinking of extending his dominions. His league with Adrian VI, and the reſt of the ſtates of Italy, was founded upon Franceſco Sforza's reſtoration to the duchy of Milan; and, as this was the common intereſt of Italy, ſo was it, likewiſe, the only bond, by which the emperor had found means to unite all the potentates againſt France, then in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe. That league had ſucceeded according to the deſires of the allies; for the French were driven out of Italy, and Sforza reſtored; but tho' the emperor had pretended to give him the inveſtiture, he had not yet done it, becauſe Sforza was not able to pay the 1,200,000 ducats he demanded. He was made to hope he ſhould obtain more moderate terms, but that was only to amuſe him, and remove his as well as the pope's and Venetians ſuſpicion, that the emperor intended to keep the duchy for himſelf, or give it to his brother, the archduke Ferdinand. 1525.

The emperor lays a ſnare for Sforza, in order to diſpoſſeſs him. P. Daniel.

What was then but a bare ſuſpicion, ſoon became a certainty; for the duke of Bourbon going into Spain, to take care of his concerns, Ferdinand d' Avalos, marqueſs of Peſcara, was commiſſioned by the emperor to command in Italy. Soon after, Peſcara affected to appear very diſſatisfied, and openly to complain of the emperor's ingratitude. He carried his diſſimulation ſo far, that, at laſt, he inſpired Jeronimo Morone, the duke of Milan's chancellor, with the boldneſs to ſound him, to ſee whether by his means, the Spaniards might be driven out of the Milaneſe. Peſcara harkened to his inſinuations, had ſeveral conferences with him, and managed ſo dextrouſly, that he engaged Morone to cauſe the duke himſelf, to ſpeak to him about the affair. Morone's project, was, to kill all the Spaniards in the duchy of Milan, and make Peſcara king of Naples. As this could not be effected without a foreign aid, Peſcara propoſed to engage in the plot, the pope, the regent of France, and the Venetians. Accordingly, theſe three powers came into it, and promiſed their aſſiſtance. When matters were almoſt ripe, Peſcara received the emperor's orders to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Milan entirely. He began with ſeizing Morone, and then conſtrained the duke, who was not able to reſiſt, to reſign the city of Milan, and all the reſt of the towns, in his poſſeſſion; only the caſtle of Milan, Sforza would not deliver, which was, therefore, immediately, beſieged. Thus, the emperor had a plauſible colour to render himſelf maſter of the duchy, and the pope and Venetians could not complain of his puniſhing Sforza's treachery, ſince there were evident proofs, that they themſelves were concerned in the plot.

The Venetians inſiſt upon Sforza's reſtoration. Guicciard.

The artifice practiſed by the emperor, to ſeize the Milaneſe, ſerved only to confirm the Venetians in their reſolution, to hazard all, to hinder that duchy from remaining in the hands of the houſe of Auſtria. Without troubling themſelves to juſtify their conduct, they plainly told the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who preſſed them to join with the emperor, that Sforza's reſtoration was a preliminary they would 1525. would never depart from. If Clement VII, had ſhewn the ſame reſolution, the emperor would have been ſomething embarraſſed; but the pope, by acting too politickly, ſuffered himſelf to be deceived, as he had been before. He had a legate, in Spain, who was treating with the emperor, whilſt himſelf was negotiating, at Rome, with the French and Venetian ambaſſadors, a league againſt that monarch. He impatiently waited the ſucceſs of his legate's negotiation, and, as the concluſion was long delayed, he appointed a day to ſign a league with France and Venice; but in the interval, receiving advice, that his treaty was concluded, at Madrid, he would hear no more of the league. Soon after, the emperor ſent him by an expreſs, the treaty concluded, in Spain, which he found ſo equivocal and ambiguous, that he refuſed to ratify it. The Spaniſh ambaſſador pretending to be himſelf ſurpriſed at the ambiguities of the treaty, ſtrenuouſly maintained, they were undeſigned, and told the pope, he might draw the treaty as he pleaſed, and engaged to have it ſigned by the emperor within two months. This delay was only to hinder the pope from entering into the league, during that time, and Clement ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the aſſurance wherewith the ambaſſador ſpoke. This was tranſacted in December, 1525, and, in the ſame month, died Peſcara.

Henry thinks of ſiding with France. Hollingſh.

Thus, having ſhewn the ſituation of affairs in Italy, we muſt ſee what paſſed at the court of England, where was no leſs caballing, than at Rome and Venice, ſince it was then really debating to preſerve the balance of Europe, which leaned a little too much to one ſide. The equallity between the two houſes of France and Auſtria, was properly, what made England conſiderable, and conſequently, was an advantage not to be neglected; but there were other reaſons that incited Henry to forſake the emperor, and join with France. Tho' the treaty of Bruges, or Windſor, ſeemed to have inſeparably united the emperor and Henry, it is, however, certain, they were not pleaſed with one another, becauſe each was deſirous to make their union ſubſervient to his own affairs, without any regard to his ally. Probably, cardinal Wolſey, who was very angry with the emperor, did not a little contribute to diſpoſe his maſter to a rupture.

The emperor and Henry are diſſatisfied with one another.

Cauſes of their falling out. Guicciard.

The princeſs Mary, Henry's daughter, was affianced to the emperor, and yet the king, her father, had offered her to the king of Scotland. On the other hand, the emperor had not ſcrupled to conclude his own marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, as if he had not been engaged to Mary, and from hence, theſe two monarchs ſhewed they had very little regard for one another. Charles hearing that Henry was treating of a marriage, between his daughter and the king of Scotland, took that occaſion to throw upon him the rupture of his marriage. In March, he ſent into England the lord Buren, and the preſident of the council of Mechlin, to require the king to ſend him, immediately, the princeſs, pay down the covenanted dowry, and purſuant to their league, enter Picardy with a powerful army, as he ſhould have done the laſt year. It was eaſy for Henry to perceive, the emperor ſought only to juſtify himſelf, without any intention to accompliſh his marriage with Mary, and this way of proceeding was not very proper to preſerve a good underſtanding. But on the other hand, the emperor, had no leſs reaſon to complain of him.; for Henry had promiſed to find 100,000 crowns a month for the duke of Bourbon's expedition into France, or to make a powerful diverſion in Picardy; but after ſetting the affair on foot, by the firſt monthly payment, he had ſtopped there, without making any attempt againſt France; nay, he demanded the money due to him, when he knew the emperor was not able to pay him. This proceeding, ſeemed to demonſtrate, he only ſought a pretence. Moreover, the emperor was informed, that in October laſt, when Francis I, was marching into Italy, a perſon without character, came to London, from the regent, and had ſeveral conferences with cardinal Wolſey. But then, Charles had promiſed to invade France on the ſide of Spain, without having done any thing towards it, and yet he took it very ill, that Henry ſhould diſappoint him. Thus, theſe two monarchs, who were thought ſo ſtrictly united, and whoſe union made France and Italy tremble, were, in reality, eſtranged from one another, and ready to quarrel. In all appearance, the conferences of the perſon from France, with cardinal Wolſey, had taken effect; beſides, the cardinal, who was very revengeful, muſt have been extremely incenſed with the emperor, for deceiving him twice, after a poſitive promiſe to help him to the papacy.

Henry ſhews a regard for France. Herbert. Hall.

It was in the beginning of March, that the emperor's two ambaſſadors diſcharged their commiſſion; but, before they had received an anſwer, the news of the battle of Pavia, and the taking of the king of France reached England, by a letter from the governeſs of Flanders, with another from Lanoy, written on the very day of the battle. As the court of England then ſtood inclined, this news was by no means agreeable; nevertheleſs, as it was yet neceſſary to diſſemble, Henry ordered a ſolemn maſs to be celebrated, at St. Paul's, where he was pleaſed to be preſent, in perſon, without, however, cauſing Te Deum to be ſung. His view, was, to make the emperor's ambaſſadors believe, it was on account of the victory, and alſo to ſhew a regard for France, by avoiding to expreſs any joy at her misfortune.

Henry adviſes with his council about the courſe he ſhould take.

Some days after, the council was aſſembled to conſider, what was to be done at this juncture. The queſtion was, whether this opportunity ſhould be embraced to make conqueſts upon France, in proſecuting the king's title to that kingdom, or whether it was more expedient to aſſiſt and preſerve France entire, and oppoſe the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria. As to the firſt point, it is certain, if on this occaſion, England had ſtrictly united with the emperor, and made vigorous efforts on the ſide of Picardy, France, in her preſent condition, would have been irrecoverably loſt; for,

1525. for, inſtead of being able to withſtand the arms of theſe two powerful enemies, it was not poſſible for her to reſiſt the emperor, without the king of England's aſſiſtance. But on the other hand, it was conſidered, that France could not be ruined, without rendering the emperor too powerful; that he was already in poſſeſſion of Spain, and had alſo an eye upon Portugal, by marrying his niece Iſabella, as it was publickly reported; that his late victory, in Milan, gave him ſuch a ſuperiority in Italy, that, probably, the pope and Venetians would not be able to make head againſt him; that he poſſeſſed almoſt all the Low-Countries, with large and rich provinces in Germany; not to reckon the imperial dignity, which was become as hereditary in his family; that if by a powerful diverſion, an opportunity was given him to conquer the French provinces, bordering upon Spain and Italy, the moſt the king could expect, was, to ſhare France with him; but it was to be feared, that, afterwards, the emperor would become his enemy, and the more formidable, as there would be no proportion between their forces, nor any ſtate in Europe capable of ſupporting the weakeſt; that, therefore, ſuppoſing the king had, in France, all the ſucceſs he could wiſh, in aggrandiſing himſelf in that kingdom, he would only be involved, for the future, in an unequal war with the emperor, who very probably would never be ſatisfied, till he had diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their conqueſts; that what had paſſed between Lewis XII, and Ferdinand, in reſpect of the kingdom of Naples, was a clear evidence, how difficult it is for ſuch partitions long to ſubſiſt; that upon all theſe accounts, it was more for the intereſt of England, to make a vigorous effort to ſupport France, and enable her to be always a balance to the power of the houſe of Auſtria; that the happineſs and glory of England conſiſted, in the equallity between the king of France and the emperor, ſince thereby England was always in condition to remain arbiter of Europe, and make herſelf courted by both ſides; that there was no other way to cauſe trade to flouriſh, wherein conſiſted all her ſtrength, and without which the Engliſh could never hope to render themſelves formidable; that if, on the contrary, it was reſolved to compleat the deſtruction of France, and a war ſhould afterwards happen with the emperor, of which, there was great probability; at once would be loſt the trade with France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, Germany, which would quickly reduce England to extreme poverty; that, at leaſt, it would thereby be out of their power, to have land and ſea forces ſufficient to balance the emperor's power. In ſhort, if France come to be devided between the emperor and the king, Scotland would certainly join in alliance with the emperor, and continue to annoy England by frequent diverſions, as ſhe had always done, in favour of France. To theſe conſiderations, another of greater weight was added, viz. that a league with the emperor to conquer France, was not the ſame thing, as one with the regent, in defence of that kingdom; that in the 1525. firſt, the emperor's ſole view would be to make the Engliſh forces ſerve to enable him to puſh his conqueſts elſewhere; but, at the ſame time, he would oppoſe directly or indirectly the king's increaſe of power; that this was the uſual policy of princes, when they joined with thoſe weaker than themſelves; that it could be the leſs doubted, that the emperor would follow this maxim, as even before the battle of Pavia, he had ſhewn, that he conſidered the king only as his inſtrument to promote his deſigns, in Italy; but if the king joined with France, the two allies having the ſame view, would, as is uſual in defenſive leagues, act unanimouſly; that on the other hand, in the preſent juncture, France not being able to ſupport herſelf without the aſſiſtance of England, would readily accept what terms ſhould be impoſed upon her, which was an advantage more real and certain, than any to be expected from the invaſion of that kingdom. In a word, nothing could be more glorious for the kingdom, than to relieve France in her diſtreſs, and free her captive king, that by ſo doing, he would truly acquire the title of arbiter and deliverer of Europe, and make of the king of France a friend, who, probably, would eternally remember ſuch a favour.

Theſe were the reaſons that induced the king and council, to take part with France. They were perfectly agreeable to the king's and the cardinal's inclinations, and to the meaſures they had now began to take. The only buſineſs, was, to ſeek a pretence to break with the emperor, by throwing upon him the blame of the rupture. This is a thing, to which princes are very attentive; for when they wage never ſo unjuſt wars, they would perſuade the world, that juſtice and equity are on their ſide, without any motive of envy, jealouſy, ambition and avarice. The war Henry was meditating againſt the emperor, was, as we have ſeen, wholly founded upon policy; and that would have been ſufficient to juſtify it; but he choſe rather to ground it upon the pretended injuries received from the emperor. The reaſon of this conduct is evident; for it ſeldom happens, that policy and equity agree, and Henry, like moſt princes, had rather be counted a great politician, than an honeſt man. However this be, the reſolution being taken to ſupport France, Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of London, and Sir Robert Wingfield, were ſent into Spain to demand of the emperor ſeveral things, which it was known he would not grant. Firſt, that as the war was made at a common charge, it was reaſonable the king of England ſhould partake of the fruits of the victory of Pavia; that, therefore, purſuant to their alliance, it ſhould be ſtipulated in the treaty with the captive king, that Henry ſhould be reſtored to what belonged to him in France. Secondly, that if this could not be obtained by fair means, the emperor, according to the treaty, ſhould prepare to invade France from Spain, whilſt the Engliſh acted in Picardy, and that the war ſhould not ceaſe till the king of Henry reſolves to ſupport France.

1525. England had acquired all that belonged to him; that the emperor ought to be the readier to aſſiſt the king of England, in obtaining his deſires, becauſe by his marriage with the heireſs of England, all theſe acquiſitions would finally devolve to him. Thirdly, that as it was ſaid in the treaty of Windſor, the two allies ſhould mutually deliver all uſurpers upon each other's right, Henry required, purſuant to that article, that the king of France ſhould be delivered to him, the ſame day the princeſs Mary was conſigned to the emperor.

The emperor anſwers in general terms.

Theſe demands were for the moſt part of ſuch a nature, that the emperor eaſily perceived, that Henry only ſought a pretence to break with him. Indeed, he could not receive the princeſs Mary, ſince he was determined to marry Iſabella of Portugal, and much leſs would he deliver the captive king, and ſo part with the advantage he expected from his victory. Having, therefore, framed his anſwer, in general terms, denoting his unwillingneſs to grant what was demanded, he afforded Henry the pretence he was ſeeking to join with the regent of France. When this reſolution was divulged, the court of England took care to publiſh the reaſons of the rupture, with the emperor. They were briefly theſe, That the governeſs of the Low-Countries, inſtead of providing for the war, her quota of forces, had privately treated with France; that the Flemings had broken the treaty of commerce, in ſeveral articles; that the emperor had not paid the king the ſums due to him; that in the terms, on which he had offered to releaſe the king of France, he had very negligently, and in general, only mentioned Henry's right, as a thing of little moment; that he was now treating of his marriage with the princeſs of Portugal, in contempt of the princeſs Mary, to whom he was contracted; and laſtly, that the Turks being about to invade Chriſtendom, it was neceſſary that all Chriſtian princes ſhould join their forces againſt them, which could not be done without a general peace; but this peace could not be effected, whilſt the emperor remained in arms to aggrandize himſelf at the expence of other princes. Theſe are the reaſons alledged, in vindication of the king's conduct; but the true reaſon, was, the juſt jealouſy with which the emperor's power inſpired England, and the reſt of Europe. Henry, however, did not think proper to proclaim war againſt the emperor, being unwilling by ſo raſh a ſtep, to prejudice his intended treaty with France; for he contented himſelf with ordering his ambaſſadors, in Spain, to intercede in his name, in behalf of the captive king, tho' he expected little from this interceſſion. In the interim, he acquainted the regent of France, that if ſhe would ſend ambaſſadors to treat with him, there might follow a treaty, advantageous to the king, her ſon, and to both kingdoms. The regent, immediately, appointed Jean-Joachim de Paſſau, lord of Vaux, the ſame that had begun the negotiation with cardinal Wolſey, and Jean Brinon, preſident of Roan. Their commiſſion was dated, at Lyons, June the 9th.

Whilſt the treaty between France and England was negotiating, at London, Henry, knowing how it would end, committed the raiſing of money to cardinal Wolſey's care. The moſt natural way was to apply to the parliament; but Wolſey was too haughty to expoſe himſelf to a refuſal, or conteſt with the houſe of commons, as it had once before happened; ſo, reſolving to uſe a ſpeedier means, and more agreeable to his temper, he granted commiſſions, in the king's name, to levy, throughout the kingdom, the ſixth part of every lay-man's goods, and the fourth of the clergy's. Theſe commiſſions were no ſooner publiſhed, but the nation was in a great fermentation; for this method of raiſing money, was univerſally deemed a manifeſt breach of Magna Charta, and an incroachment of ſo great conſequence, that there was like to have been a general rebellion. The king being informed of it, immediately, iſſued out a proclamation, diſavowing theſe commiſſions, which had been publiſhed, in his name, and declaring, he would exact nothing of his people by force, nor demand any thing, but by way of benevolence, as practiſed in the reign of Edward IV. But it was quickly perceived, this was only an artifice to extort, under another name, what the people refuſed to give by force. For, the benevolence demanded, afterwards, by the king, was, almoſt, equal to what was, at firſt, required, by way of authority. The Londoners being taxed firſt, the magiſtrates excuſed themſelves, as benevolences were aboliſhed by Richard III. The cardinal exclaimed againſt it, as if it had been the moſt extravagant aſſertion in the world; for, he told them, Richard III. was a tyrant and uſurper, and, therefore, laws made in his reign, could not limit the ſovereign's power. This argument having no great effect, he ſent for the chief of the common council of the city, one by one, to intimidate them, deſiring, at any rate, to compaſs his ends, without being obliged to call a parliament; but whilſt he was, thus, employed, there was an inſurrection near London, which, probably, would have drawn in the whole kingdom, if a timely ſtop had not been put to it. The ſpeedy courſe that was taken to diſperſe the ſeditious, ſucceeded as the court could wiſh; for they who had taken arms, ſeeing themſelves not yet ſufficiently ſupported, ſubmitted to the king's mercy, and ſome of the ring-leaders were impriſoned. The king finding how the nation ſtood affected, thought proper to ſatisfy them, by ſhewing he was not concerned in the violent proceedings of his miniſter; wherefore, he declared, in full council, that his intention was not to puniſh any perſon for this commotion. The cardinal perceiving, the king threw all the blame upon him, vindicated himſelf as well as he could, without accuſing the king, alledging, he had the judges opinion for what he had done. If ſuch an excuſe were admitted, it would be no longer neceſſary for a king of England to apply to the parliament for money; for the judges being appointed by the king, it would not 1525. not be difficult for him, to have their opinion on his ſide. But tho' there have been judges ſo hardy, as to decide points of this conſequence, as in the reigns of Richard II, Charles I, James II, very few eſcaped the puniſhment due to their preſumption; for the parliament never intended, that the privileges of the nation ſhould depend upon the deciſion of the judges. The council finding the king was not inclined to ſupport what the cardinal had done, and, on the other hand, not daring to come upon the cardinal himſelf, thought fit to throw all the fault, without naming any perſon, upon thoſe that had given the king wrong information, and to releaſe the priſoners, after a ſevere reprimand. Purſuant to this reſolution, the priſoners being brought before the council, the cardinal ſharply rebuked them, aggravating the heinouſneſs of their offence, and, adding, that the king was pleaſed to grant them his pardon, provided they would find ſureties for their good behaviour, for the future; but the priſoners replying, they could find none, the cardinal and duke of Norfolk ſaid, they would be bound for them; whereupon they were diſcharged.

Henry receives ſeveral complaints againſt the cardinal. Hall.

When the king had diſcovered, that he approved not all the cardinal's actions, people ventured more boldly to complain of his conduct. The truth is, he oppreſſed the nation, and more eſpecially the clergy, in a ſtrange manner. The inſtrument of his oppreſſions, was one Allen, his chaplain, who kept no meaſures, well knowing his maſter's protection would not fail him, on occaſion. In the interim, how great ſoever the cardinal's power was, a private perſon ventured to commence a ſuit againſt Allen, and proſecuted him ſo vigorouſly, that, at laſt, the affair came to the king's knowledge, who was informed, at the ſame time, of ſeveral other complaints of the people. He had, hitherto, fancied, there had never been in England ſo mild a government as his, being ignorant of the ill uſe Wolſey made of his authority. This information threw him into ſo terrible a rage, that the cardinal was like to have been entirely out of favour; and, it was not without the utmoſt ſubmiſſion, that he appeaſed the king's anger, ſhewing him withal, his laſt will, wherein he had made him his heir. This he did, to intimate, that he was labouring for him, and that the outrages he committed, were only to increaſe the inheritance the king was one day to enjoy. Nothing can more fully expreſs the king's ſentiments concerning him, than his letter to the cardinal, after having pardoned him. A fragment whereof, inſerted by lord Herbert, in his Hiſtory, is as follows:

The king's letter to the cardinal. Herbert.

"AS touching the matter of Wilton, ſeeing it is in no other ſtrain than you write of, and you being alſo ſo ſuddenly (with the falling ſick of your ſervants) afraid, and troubled; I marvel not, that it overſlipped you as it did. But it is no great matter, ſtanding the caſe as it doth; for it is yet in my hand, as I perceive by your letter, and your default was not ſo great, ſeeing the election was but conditional; wherefore, my lord, ſeeing the humbleneſs of your ſubmiſſion, and tho' the caſe were much more heinous, I can be content for to remit it, being right glad, that according to mine intent, my monitions and warnings have been benignly and lovingly accepted, on your behalf, promiſing you, that the very affection I bear you, cauſed me thus to do. As touching the help of religious houſes to the building of your college, I would it were more, ſo it be lawfully; for my intent is none, but that it ſhould ſo appear to all the world, and the occaſion of all their mumbling might be ſecluded and put away; for, ſurely there is great murmuring of it throughout all the realm, both good and bad. They ſay not that all that is ill-gotten, is beſtowed upon the college, but that the college is the cloak for covering all miſchiefs. This grieveth me, I aſſure you, to hear it ſpoken of him, which I ſo entirely love; wherefore, methought I could do no leſs, than thus friendly to admoniſh you. One thing more I perceive by your own letter, which a little, methinketh, toucheth conſcience, and that is, that you have received money of the exempts for having of their old viſitors. Surely, this can hardly be with good conſcience; for, and they were good, why ſhould you take money? and if they were ill, it were a ſinful act. Howbeit, your legacy herein might, peradventure, apud Homines, be a cloak, but not apud Deum. Wherefore, you, thus moniſhed by him, who ſo entirely loveth you, I doubt not, will deſiſt, not only from this, (if conſcience will not bear it) but from all other things which ſhould tangle the ſame; and, in ſo doing, we will ſing, Te laudant angeli atque archangeli, Te laudat omnis ſpiritus: And thus an end I make of this, tho' rude, yet loving letter, deſiring you as benevolently to take it, as I do mean it, for I enſure you, (and I pray you think it ſo) that there remaineth, at this hour, no ſpark of diſpleaſure towards you, in my heart. And thus, fare you well, and be no more perplext. Written with the hand of your loving ſovereign and friend,

HENRY R.

The cardinal removes from court thoſe whom he ſuſpects.

This letter ſhews the king was informed of ſeveral of the cardinal's miſdemeanours; but he did not yet thoroughly know him, his affection for him combating in his heart, the heinouſneſs of his proceedings, and making him believe, that his faults were the pure effects of his great zeal for the founding of his college. Had he not been, thus, prepoſſeſſed in his favour, he might have been more fully informed; but it was very dangerous to ſpeak directly againſt a favourite, to whom the king ſtill ſhewed ſo great kindneſs. In the interim, the cardinal finding by this inſtance, what his enemies would be capable of doing againſt him, if they had the king's ear, was very 1525. very careful to remove from court, all he ſuſpected. At the ſame time, he ſtrove to preſerve the king's love and eſteem, by all ſorts of condeſcenſions. He had now built, at Hampton-Court, a ſtately palace, which outſhone, in beauty, all the king's houſes; but what had lately happened, convincing him, it might breed a jealouſy in the king, he made him a preſent of it, as if from the very firſt he had intended to build it for him. He meant to inſinuate, by this preſent, that he heaped up riches purely for his ſake, which ſucceeded accordingly; for the king had the ſame confidence in him, as before, which the murmurs of the people ſeemed to have ſomething altered. This year he obtained the king's letters patent for founding his college, at Oxford.

Henry, the king's natural ſon, made duke of Richmond. Act. Pub. July 16.

About the ſame time, the king created Henry Fitz-Roy, his natural ſon, duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and high-admiral of England, tho' he was but ſix years old; and, as he had no legitimate ſon, he was extremely fond of this baſtard, whom he had by the lady Elizabeth Blunt.

Negotiation with the French ambaſſadors.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the cardinal was employed in treating with the French ambaſſadors. The beginning of June, the regent had ſent general full powers to her two ambaſſadors; but in the courſe of the negotiation, they found they ſhould have occaſion for more particular powers, to ſettle the ſums due from the king of France to the king of England, and which, conſiſting of ſeveral articles, were to be put into one, according to Henry's intention. Theſe new powers were diſpatched the 16th of Auguſt. Upon ſuch an extraordinary occaſion, the French ambaſſadors had properly nothing to do but to comply with the king of England's pleaſure. Their view being to diſengage him from the emperor, and cauſe him to join with the king, their maſter, there was no diſputing upon the terms; but it muſt be confeſſed, that on this occaſion, Henry behaved with uncommon generoſity. Tho' he might have demanded towns, and even provinces, in return for the friendſhip he was pleaſed to contract with Francis I, and for the charges he was going to be engaged in, he contented himſelf with ſecuring, by new treaties, the ſums that were juſtly due to him. Theſe treaties being ready, were ſigned at Moore, a houſe of the king's *, on the 30th of Auguſt.

* In Hertfordſhire.

Treaty of Moore, divided into ſeveral treaties. Act. Pub. Herbert.

The firſt, contained a defenſive league between France and England, againſt all powers ſpiritual or temporal, that ſhould invade either of the two kingdoms. The allies of the two kings were included, by name, in the league, but with the limitation, that this article was not to be underſtood of thoſe, who had uſurped any thing upon either of the two principal contractors, ſince the league concluded, at London, October the 1ſt, 1518. Hence the emperor, who had lately conquered the duchy of Milan, was excluded. Moreover, Henry engaged to uſe his beſt endeavours, to procure the liberty of Francis.

The ſecond treaty concerned the payment of the ſums due to Henry, from the king of France, viz. 1. By a treaty of the 7th of Auguſt, 1515, 1,000,000 of crowns of gold. 2. By another of the 12th of January, 1518, for reſtitution of Tournay, 500,000 crowns of gold. 3. By another of the ſame date, 23000 livres Tournois. 4. By another of November the 13th, 1520, 462,000 crowns. For all theſe ſums, the regent bound herſelf in the king her ſon's name, to pay Henry 2,000,000 of crowns of gold, 35 pence Tournois each, which being reduced to crowns de ſoleil, of 38 pence, amounted to the ſum of 1,894,736 crowns, and 32 pence Tournois. This ſum was to be paid at ſeveral times, viz. 47,368 crowns, within 40 days after the date of the treaty; the like ſum on the 1ſt of November next, and the ſame every ſix months, till the whole was paid. This made in all 40 payments, conſequently the whole ſum muſt be paid in 20 years. 1525.

It was farther agreed, by the ſame treaty, that, if Henry died before he had received the 2,000,000, the arrears were to be paid to his heirs and ſucceſſors; but, in caſe he out-lived the payment of the whole, he ſhould receive, during life, an annual penſion of 100,000 crowns, to ceaſe at his death.

To ſecure the performance of the treaty, the regent was to ſwear to it ſolemnly, before the Engliſh ambaſſadors, and Francis I, was to ratify and ſwear to it, immediately, after his return into France; moreover, Henry had for ſecurity, the cardinal of Bourbon, the dukes of Vendome and Longueville, the earls of St. Paul, Maulevrier, Brienne, the lords of Montmorency, Lautrec, and Breze, the cities of Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Toulouſe, Amiens, Bourdeaux, Tours, and Rheims.

It muſt be obſerved, that in the ſum of 2,000,000 of crowns due to Henry, there was no deduction of what he had received from Francis I, from the year 1515, to their rupture. This was all the advantage Henry made, which was not very great, conſidering how little punctual the king of France was in his payments.

By a third treaty, the regent engaged to pay to Mary, Henry's ſiſter, queen dowager of France, all the arrears of her dowry, at ſeveral payments, viz. 5000 crowns within 40 days after the date of the treaty, and a like ſum every ſix months, till the whole was diſcharged; moreover, ſhe promiſed to let her enjoy her dowry, for the future.

There was alſo a fourth treaty, which ran, that the king of Scotland ſhould be reckoned in the number of the allies of France, but on condition the Scots committed no act of hoſtility againſt England, after the 25th of December next.

Laſtly, by a fifth treaty, it was agreed, that the court of France ſhould conſent, neither directly, nor indirectly, that the duke of Albany ſhould return into Scotland, during the minority of James V.

All theſe ſeveral treaties, which properly were only different articles of one and the ſame treaty, were ratified and ſworn by the regent of 1525. of France, and confirmed by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, and Bourdeaux; and the lords and cities, that were to be ſecurities, gave their bonds. Finally, Francis I, ſent a ratification under his own hand, and dated the 27th of December.

A grant of the regent to the cardinal. Act. Pub.

But after having done the king's affairs, the cardinal forgot not himſelf; for there is, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the regent's bond of the 18th of November, to pay the cardinal the arrears of the penſion granted him, in lieu of the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Tournay, being four years and a half, amounting to the ſum of 29,793 crowns of gold de ſoleil; moreover, ſhe declared, that for ſeveral other weighty reaſons, there was due to the cardinal 100,000 crowns of gold, theſe two ſums making together, 121,898 crowns de ſoleil, were to be paid in ſeven years, by half-yearly equal payments.

The regent takes heart.

The defenſive league between France and England, being, thus, concluded and ſigned, the regent began to be a little more at eaſe, and better able to diſpute upon the terms of the king, her ſon's liberty; beſides, ſhe had reaſon to hope, the king of England's declarations would help to determine the pope and Venetians, whoſe fears alone hindered them from forming a league againſt the emperor; and, indeed, it will, hereafter, be ſeen, they altered their meaſures, upon hearing what the king of England had done. In the interim, the emperor receiving advice of the treaty of Moore, recalled his ambaſſadors, who were ſtill in England, and Henry did the ſame, with regard to his, in Spain. Soon after, Charles concluded his marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, by vertue of a diſpenſation brought him by cardinal Salviati, who delivered it to him, after the concluſion of the forementioned treaty.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Whilſt the affairs of Europe took a new turn, by the effects of the battle of Pavia, and the French king's captivity, there was no other alteration in thoſe of Scotland, except, that the earl of Angus, who was to hold the adminiſtration but four months, did not think fit to reſign, when his time was expired; whereupon the earl of Argyle withdrew, greatly diſſatisfied, but the earl of Lenox, tho' likewiſe diſpleaſed, ſtill remained at court. In the interim, the queen and the earl of Arran, who had been diſpoſſeſſed, were not unmindful of their affairs; for the earl of Lenox's diſcontent giving them room to hold intelligence with him, they perſuaded him to inſtill into the king a deſire, to be freed from the earl of Angus; but as there was occaſion for great precaution to deceive that lord's vigilance, it was not till the next year, that the king found an opportunity to attempt the execution of his deſign.

A truce between England and Scotland prolonged. Act. Pub.

In the beginning of the year, the court of Scotland had ſent an ambaſſy to England, at the head whereof was the earl of Caſſils, to treat of the king's marriage with the princeſs Mary; but as ſeveral difficulties occurred, the truce, which was to expire the 26th of January, was prolonged to the 23d of March, to give the earl of Caſſils time to take a journey to Scotland, for new inſtructions. In the interim, it was not poſſible to conclude any thing, becauſe, in all appearance, Henry had no intention to give his only daughter and heir, to the king of Scotland; for, indeed, it does not appear, what advantage could be reaped by this marriage; beſides, as he then intended to join with France, it was no longer his intereſt to manage the Scots. 1526.

1526. Negotiations at Rome. Guicciard.

Before the treaty of Moore was concluded, the emperor had a great advantage, in his negotiations, at Rome and Madrid; for, by reſtoring Sforza to Milan, he was almoſt ſure the pope and Venetians would abandon France, and, by deſiſting from his demand of the duchy of Burgundy, he could be certain Francis would readily reſign Milan, and not trouble himſelf much with the concerns of Italy; but he could not reſolve to do either, and that made the negotiations ſo tedious. After the treaty of Moore was ſigned, the ſtate of his affairs was changed; for the pope was grown more courageous, and finding himſelf deceived by the emperor, who in a ſecond ratification of their treaty, left the reſtoration of Sforza in a ſtate of uncertainty, plainly told him, that without the reſtitution of the Milaneſe, there was no peace to be expected. The emperor had alſo reaſon to fear, that Francis I, ſeeing himſelf like to be ſo well ſupported, would be ſtill more incompliant with reſpect to Burgundy; ſo, perceiving there was no way to prevent a league, which was going to unite ſo many princes againſt him, he was in great perplexity. There was a neceſſity of ſpeedily reſolving either to maintain, without any ally, the impending war, or to make peace with France. Both were equally perplexing. In chuſing, war, he knew not where to find money, and in making, with his priſoner, a forced peace, he could not expect to reap from his victory, the advantages he propoſed. Happily for him, Francis, tired of his captivity, freed him from this perplexity, by offering to reſign the duchy of Burgundy, which had hitherto been the main obſtacle to a peace. After that, the emperor readily and ſeriouſly treated with him, whereas before he had only amuſed him. Soon after, they concluded together the famous treaty of Madrid. The chief articles, to which Francis ſubmitted, were theſe; beſides many others, which it would be needleſs to recite.

Treaty of Madrid. Jan. 14.

That the king of France ſhould marry queen Leonora, the emperor's ſiſter, and have with her 200,000 crowns of gold.

That Francis ſhould be releaſed, on the 10th of March, and the ſame day ſhould deliver to the emperor, his two ſons, in hoſtage.

That he ſhould reſign to the emperor, the duchy of Burgundy, in full ſovereignty.

That he ſhould deſiſt from the homage, the emperor owed him for Flanders and Artois.

That he ſhould renounce all claim to Naples, Milan, Aſti, Tournay, Liſle, and Heſdin, &c.

That he ſhould perſuade Henry d' Albret to reſign the kingdom of Navarre to the 1526. emperor, or, at leaſt, ſhould give him no aſſiſtance.

That within 40 days, he ſhould reſtore the duke of Bourbon, and all his party, to their eſtates.

That he ſhould reſtore Philibert de Chalons, prince of Orange, and Michael Antonio de Saluzzo, to their principalities.

That he ſhould give no ſort of aſſiſtance to the duke of Guelders, and after that prince's death, ſhould uſe his beſt endeavour, to cauſe his towns to fall into the emperor's hands.

That he ſhould pay the king of England 500,000 crowns, which the emperor owed him.

That when the emperor went to Italy, to receive the imperial crown, he ſhould lend him 12 gallies, four large ſhips, and a land army, or 200,000 crowns, inſtead of the army.

Laſtly, he promiſed upon the word and honour of a prince, to execute all theſe articles, or, in caſe of non-performance, to return priſoner into Spain.

The ſtate of the emperor's affairs at the time of the treaty of Madrid.

If Francis had not been ſo haſty, to offer the duchy of Burgundy, he would, probably, have ſaved himſelf many troubles, and avoided reproaches, which much concerned his honour. At the time, the treaty of Madrid was concluded, Charles was under very great perplexities; for beſides thoſe already mentioned, he knew that the princes and hans-towns of Germany, that had embraced Luther's doctrine, began to take meaſures, to ſecure themſelves from the calamities they were daily threatened with. To this was added, the dread of a Turkiſh invaſion, in Hungary, which greatly concerned the emperor, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Auſtria. So, in all likelihood, if Francis had not been ſo haſty, the emperor would have rather deſiſted from Burgundy, than been expoſed to ſo many enemies at once. Theſe were the real motives that obliged him to haſten the concluſion of the treaty of Madrid, contrary to the inſtances and oppoſition of many of his counſellors, who repreſented to him, that he would be infallibly diſappointed. His chancellor even refuſed to ſign it, but as he believed he had ſtrong reaſons to run that hazard, he abſolutely concluded, in a belief, that it was the ſole means to prevent the league againſt him. Whatever happened, he hoped to be free, at moſt, by reſtoring Sforza to Milan, which, however, he did not intend to do, but at the laſt extremity. In the interim, by reſolving to inſiſt upon that article, he rendered all his meaſures ineffectual; he loſt his priſoner, without obtaining Burgundy, or preventing the league; in ſhort, after ſuſtaining many attacks, he was, as will be ſeen, forced to part with the duchy of Milan. But where is the prince, let his abilities be never ſo great, that can foreſee all the conſequences of his own policy? When Charles V, ſigned the treaty of Madrid, he imagined to do a very advantageous thing. Indeed, Francis would have dearly purchaſed his liberty, if, when he ſigned the treaty, he had really intended to keep it; but it is too manifeſt, that when he gave his word, he deſigned to break it, ſince he had no ſooner ſet foot in his own dominions; but he refuſed to ratify the treaty. This was ſo little expected by the emperor, that, immediately, after the concluſion of the peace, he wrote to the pope, that tho' he had promiſed to reſtore Sforza to Milan, it was, however, on condition, that Sforza cleared himſelf of the crime of felony and treaſon, laid to his charge; adding, that ſince the princes of Italy wiſhed, he would not give the duchy of Milan to the archduke Ferdinand, his brother, he would preſent it to the duke of Bourbon, in caſe Sforza was found guilty. Clement VII, being informed of the conditions of the treaty of Madrid, preſently gueſſed, that Francis had accepted of them only to obtain his releaſe, without intending to perform them. In this belief, he ſtill inſiſted upon Sforza's reſtoration, without terms, being willing, before he engaged with the emperor, to ſee what the king of France would do. The ſenate of Venice being of the ſame mind, not a little contributed to keep the pope in his reſolution. 1526.

Francis arrives in his dominions. Hall. Act. Pub.

What theſe ſubtle politicians had foreſeen, came to paſs; for Francis was no ſooner arrived in his own territories, but he mounted a Turkiſh horſe, and rid full ſpeed to St. John de Luz, from whence he went, next day, to Bayonne; and the 17th of March, he ſigned bonds to the king of England, for the ſums in which his mother, the regent, had engaged him. By the way, the hiſtorians place this prince's deliverance, on the 18th of March, and yet theſe bonds are dated, at Bayonne, the 17th of the ſame month. When he came to Bayonne, Lanoy, who accompanied him, as ambaſſador, prayed him to ratify the treaty of Madrid; but the king told him, that having exceeded in the treaty, the power of a king of France, in granting the duchy of Burgundy to the emperor, he muſt proceed to the performance by fair means, and endeavour to obtain the conſent of the Burgundians, and the approbation of the reſt of his ſubjects; that, however, he deſigned to execute the treaty, but wanted a little time to prepare for it. This anſwer might have ſufficiently ſhewn the ambaſſador, what the king intended. He followed him, however, to Bourdeaux, where the king's firſt care was to ratify the treaty concluded, at Moore, with the king of England. From Bourdeaux he came to Cognac, where he made ſome ſtay, with the viceroy of Naples, ſtill in his train, who preſſed him, from time to time, to ratify and execute the treaty of Madrid, or return to Spain, according to his oath. To this the king, to be excuſed, alledged three reaſons, which were far from being ſatisfactory to the ambaſſador. The firſt was, that it was not in his power to reſign Burgundy, becauſe the kings of France not being proprietors of their dominions, it was not lawful for them to alienate any part. The ſecond, that he was compelled to ſign the treaty of Madrid. The third, that by his coronation oath, he had ſworn not to alienate any part of his kingdom, and this oath annulled 1526. annulled that which he had taken at Madrid. The ambaſſador anſwered to the firſt, that tho' he could not alienate any of his provinces, that was not to be underſtood of dominions unjuſtly acquired by the crown of France, as was the duchy of Burgundy. To the ſecond he replied, that it was left to his choice, either to remain in the ſtate the chance of war, and the will of God had thrown him into, or to be freed by a treaty; that he had even ſollicited it, and it was difficult to conceive, wherein the force he complained of conſiſted. To the third he ſaid, that when the king ſwore to the treaty of Madrid, he was not ignorant of his coronation oath, and, probably, did not believe the ſecond contrary to the firſt; that if it was otherwiſe, there would be reaſon to think, he had intended to impoſe upon the emperor's eaſineſs. Without examining, here, either the king's reaſons, or the ambaſſador's anſwers, it ſuffices to ſay, in a word, the king was already reſolved.

The pope's and Venetian ambaſſadors, go to the king at Cognac.

The pope, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, plainly foreſeeing, Francis would ſcruple to execute the treaty of Madrid, had ſent ambaſſadors to him, who found him, at Cognac. They were received with great civilities, and the king, immediately, entered into treaty with them, concerning a league againſt the emperor. The league was concluded, indeed, at Cognac, the 17th of May, between the pope, the king of France, the duke of Milan, and the Venetians; but it was not publiſhed till a month after, Francis pretending he could not ratify it, till he had ſeen, the ratifications of the other allies. The viceroy of Naples, having ſome notice of it, ſummoned the king, for the laſt time, to execute the treaty of Madrid. Whereupon Francis told him plainly, it was not in his power to reſign Burgundy, tho' he had promiſed it; but to ſhew him, he deſired to live in friendſhip with the emperor, his maſter, he offered to give him 2,000,000 of crowns of gold, as an equivalent for Burgundy, and punctually to perform the reſt of the treaty.

Francis offers 2,000,000 of crowns in lieu of Burgundy.

The emperor will abate nothing.

Thus, the emperor's meaſures were entirely broken. He had the king of France no longer in his power, and yet, was not leſs obliged to ſuſtain the efforts of the league, newly concluded againſt him; not to mention the king of England, who, probably, would one time or other, act offenſively. His whole refuge conſiſted in having the king of France's two ſons, in hoſtage; but his embarraſſment was not capable of making him yield on this occaſion; for he choſe to run all hazards, rather than conſent to the leaſt alteration of the treaty of Madrid. His reſolution being notified to Francis, the league was publiſhed, at Cognac, the 11th of June. Two things haſtened the concluſion of this league. The firſt, that the caſtle of Milan, beſieged by the Imperialiſts, being hard preſſed, wanted a ſpeedy relief, and the pope and Venetians durſt not ſend their troops into the field, before they were aſſured of the league with France. The ſecond, that the king of France deſigning to offer the emperor 2,000,000 of crowns in lieu of Burgundy, he believed this offer would meet with a readier acceptance after the concluſion of the league. It is certain, this was his ſole view; and, if his offer had been accepted, he would never have ratified the league of Cognac. Nay, after the league was publiſhed, neither himſelf nor the king of England, ever made any conſiderable effort againſt the emperor, their intent being only to frighten him, and obtain the reſtitution of the two hoſtages, upon reaſonable terms. Thus, for once, the Italians were the dupes of the French and the Engliſh, which deſerves notice, as a thing very uncommon. In the interim, Francis and Henry, to continue their game, made a new treaty, promiſing, never to make peace with the emperor, unleſs he would reſtore the hoſtages, and pay Henry what he owed him; but this treaty, obliged obliged them not to take arms, to procure each other the ſatisfaction they demanded. 1526.

The pope's and the Venetians army take the field. Guicciard.

The pope and the Venetians relying on the aſſiſtance of France and England, ſent their troops into the field, commanded by the duke of Urbino, who ſuffered the caſtle of Milan to be taken, and cauſed an attempt upon Genoa to miſcarry, for want of ſending the allies a ſupply of 1500 men. Guicciardini inſinuates, in ſeveral places, that the duke acted but faintly againſt the emperor, who was very weak in Italy, and that the duke of Bourbon, who was returned to Milan, would, if the leaſt preſſed, have been infallibly conſtrained to abandon the city.

The Colonna's make war upon the pope. Guicciard.

Whilſt the duke of Urbino indirectly favoured the emperor, the duke of Seſſa, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, at Rome, and Hugo de Moncada, who commanded, at Naples, in the viceroy's abſence, ſupplied, other ways, the weakneſs of the Imperialiſts, by exciting the Colonna's to make war upon the pope, whilſt his troops were in the duchy of Milan. This unexpected invaſion, which the pope could aſcribe only to the ſollicitations of the emperor, or his miniſters, cauſed him to reſolve to ſend into the kingdom of Naples, the army, under the command of the duke of Urbino, in the Milaneſe, and, to that end, he obtained the conſent of the Venetians. But the duke of Seſſa, to avoid the invaſion, the kingdom of Naples was threatned with, ſo ordered it, that the Colonna's gave the pope all the ſatisfaction he deſired. The agreement was made at Rome, the 22d of Auguſt, and the duke of Urbino was countermanded.

They enter Rome on a ſudden. The pope flies to the caſtle of St. Angelo. Guicciard.

But about a month after, when the pope leaſt expected it, the Colonna's, with 5 or 6000 men entered Rome, in the night, between the 19th and 20th of September, and ſo alarmed the pope, that he retired in a fright, to the caſtle of St. Angelo. As he was not very ſafe in that caſtle, where he had nothing to maintain a ſiege, Moncada went to him, and repreſenting the danger he was in, and that, beſides, Rome was going to be plundered, he perſuaded him to make a ſeparate truce with the emperor, for four months. This was more than the emperor wanted, who had now ordered levies to be made in Germany, and was

1526. was about to ſend back Lanoy to Naples, with a good body of Spaniſh troops. When the truce was ſigned, the pope's forces, which ſerved under the duke of Urbino, were recalled to Rome.

Clement VII. feigns to intend to go to Spain. Guicciard.

In the interim, the pope was extremely ſurpriſed at Francis's ſlowneſs, who, tho' principal author of the league, made yet no effort to oblige the emperor to reſtore his ſons. The king of England's indolence aſtoniſhed him no leſs, becauſe not knowing that the league concluded at Moore, was only defenſive, he had imagined the two kings were to attack the emperor, with all their forces. So, to excite them, by raiſing their jealouſy, he declared, he intended to go into Spain, and concert means with the emperor, to procure the peace of Europe. This declaration very much confounded the French and Engliſh ambaſſadors; for they were afraid there was ſome hidden myſtery, in ſo extraordinary a journey, and, therefore, uſed their beſt endeavour to diſſuade the pope from it. But Henry uſed a more effectual means, viz. a preſent of 30,000 ducats, which entirely diverted the pretended deſign of this journey.

The pope breaks the agreement with the Colonna's. Guicciard.

Soon after, Clement VII. broke his agreement with the Colonna's, and ordered the troops, he had ſent for to Rome, to march into their territories, having excommunicated them, and deprived Pompeo Colonna of the cardinalate. He affirmed, that his treaty with them was void, becauſe he was forced to it. He thereby juſtified, in ſome meaſure, Francis's proceedings, whom, on the ſame pretence, he had abſolved from his oath, at Madrid.

Frondſperg marches to Italy. Bellay.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, at Rome, the baron de Frondſperg was marching from Germany towards Italy, with an army of 13 or 14000 men, raiſed for the emperor's ſervice. Whereupon, the duke of Urbino, who kept the duke of Bourbon, as it were beſieged, in Milan, quitted the neighbourhood of that city, under colour of oppoſing the paſſage of the Germans. In the interim, the pope was not a little embarraſſed; for the truce was ſoon to expire; Frondſperg was marching to Italy, and the viceroy of Naples was now in the iſland of Corſica, leading to Naples a ſtrong reinforcement of Spaniards. In the mean time, the king of France was making no preparations to ſupport his allies, and the king of England ſhewed the ſame remiſſneſs. In the interim, Frondſperg, ſtill continuing his march, arrived in the Mantuan, where the prince of Orange came to join, and ſerve under him, as a volunteer. Afterwards, about the middle of December, he repaired to the borders of the Milaneſe, the duke of Urbino not being able or willing to oppoſe his march. Here he expected the duke of Bourbon, who was to come and join him; but was not yet in condition to execute that deſign. The difficulty ſprung, from his having no money to pay his troops, who poſitively refuſed to go out of the city, before they had receivd their arrears, and even threatened to ſack the town. There was no other way to hinder them from executing their threats, than to take the plate belonging to the churches. This ſerved to pay part of what was due to the troops, who had ſcarce received any thing ſince the battle of Pavia, ſo deſtitute of money was the emperor. The duke of Bourbon made uſe of another expedient to increaſe his treaſure; and, that was, to cauſe the chancellor Morone to be condemned to die, who, to redeem his life, gave him 20,000 ducats. He afterwards became one of his chief counſellors. 1526.

Lanoy arrives at Naples, He amuſes the pope. P. Daniel.

Whilſt the duke of Bourbon was employed in raiſing money, Lanoy, who was come to Naples with a body of Spaniſh troops, amuſed the pope with negotiations, tending only to hinder him from taking ſure meaſures, by putting him in hopes of a ſpeedy agreement with the emperor. Theſe hopes, however, became more and more remote, after Frondſperg's arrival. Whilſt Milan was in danger, the emperor had intimated to the pope, that if he deſired Franceſco Sforza to be brought to his tryal, it was only to ſave the honour of the empire, and he would give the judges private orders to declare him innocent; but after the arrival of the Germans, he demanded ſuch a pecuniary reparation, that Sforza was by no means able to raiſe the ſum required. Wherefore, the emperor pretended that the pope, the Ventians, and the Florentines ſhould be his ſecurities.

Francis deceives the pope and Venetians. Guicciard.

The pope and the Venetians had expected, that, immediately, after the concluſion of the league of Cognac, Francis would ſend a ſtrong army into Italy, and with the king of England, make a powerful diverſion upon the borders of Spain and Flanders. But, as we have ſeen, they were very much miſtaken; for Francis had concluded the league only to frighten his enemy, and in hopes it would cauſe him to accept of the offered equivalent. He was deſirous to avoid a war, and even thought himſelf ſoſur of ſucceeding, by that means, that he had made with the king of England, no treaty to oblige them to take arms, unleſs they were attacked. Thus, Henry knowing the king of France's diſpoſition, took care to go no faſter than he. Expreſſes and envoys from the pope and the Venetians frequently came to the two courts, to ſollicit them to war, but it was to no purpoſe. On the contrary, even after the pope and the Venetians had ſolemnly declared war againſt the emperor, Francis ſent the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux to make him again the ſame offer of 2,000,000 of crowns in lieu of the duchy of Burgundy; but the emperor rejected it with diſdain, and charged the ambaſſador to tell his maſter, he had acted like a knave and a villain, and ought not to have forgot their laſt converſation. Probably, the ambaſſador thought not proper to diſcharge ſo ungrateful a commiſſion. This, afterwards, occaſioned a miſtake, which was not favourable to the king of France.

Wolſey obtains grants for his college. Act. Pub.

Whilſt Italy, France, and Spain were in agitation, Henry lived peaceably in his kingdom, and the cardinal, his favourite, was wholly employed about his college, at Oxford, for which, he inceſſantly obtained freſh grants from the pope and the king. The pope durſt not refuſe him any thing, at a time when he thought 1526. thought he wanted his credit, to incline the king, his master, to war; and Henry was always ready to give him marks of his affection, by confirming whatever was granted by the pope. This condescension of the pope and the king, proved fatal to several little monasteries, which were suppressed by the cardinal, and the revenues applied to his college.

The pope endeavours to persuade Henry into the league of Cognac.

Ever since the publishing of the league of Cognac, the pope and Venetians had used their constant endeavours, to persuade Henry not only to come into it, but declare himself protector. It is easy to guess with what view they paid him this deference; for they hoped to find him the same as formerly, ever ready to be ensnared, and to lavish away his mony for the affairs of others. There are, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, several credentials of the Venetian ambassadors, addressed to the king, the queen, and the cardinal, probably, to press the king to come into this league. There is, likewise, Clement VII's commission to Hubert Gambara and Giovanni Baptista Sanga, to treat with Henry. In this commission, the pope said, that the circumstances of the times forcing the allies to conclude a league, without the king of England's participation, they had, however, agreed, to declare him protector. Wherefore, he empowered his two envoys to treat with that monarch, upon his entering into the league, and to change or alter the articles, as should be agreed with him, nay, to annul it entirely, if it was thought necessary, and conclude another. Moreover, he gave them powers too settle with him, the pension which was to be adjudged to him, as protector of the league, if he would please to accept of the title; but this pension, as appears elsewhere, was to be raised upon the duchy of Milan and the kingdom of Naples, after they were conquered. Thus, upon the hopes of an imaginary pension, the pope meant to persuade Henry to declare war with the emperor, and consequently to draw him into very great and real expences. But for once, Henry would not be his dupe; for he knew, by experience, what it was to join with the popes for the Italian affairs.

The battle of Mohatz, in Hungary. Guicciard.

This year was fought the famous battle of Mohatz, in Hungary, between Lewis II, king of that country, and Soliman, emperor of the Turks. Lewis lost the day, and was drowned, in a morass *. The death of this prince was a fresh source of calamities for Hungary. Ferdinand of Austria, the emperor's brother, who had married Lewis's sister Ann, pretended to the crown of that kingdom, and had for competitor John de Zapol, wayvode of Transilvania. They were both elected by two different parties; but John put himself under the protection of Soliman, who caused him to be crowned at Buda, whilst Ferdinand was taking measures to prosecute his right.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

The affairs of Scotland still remained, in the same situation, except, that in the course of this year, the queen's and earl of Arran's or Hamilton's faction, attempted to take away the king's person, from the earl of Angus; but the attempt miscarrying, the earl was severely revenged of the persons concerned.

1526.

Francis and Henry deceive the expectations of the pope and Venetians. Guicciard.

The pope and Venetians had begun the war, in Italy, in the sole expectation, that Francis would send thither a powerful army, and the king of England make a diversion from the Low-Countries, or, at least, according to custom, furnish money for maintaining the war. The easiness wherewith he had been amused in the former wars, caused his money to be relied on, as a sure aid, tho' when a peace or truce was made, his interests were not thought of. But the scene was changed; for Henry, grown more wise by experience, was no longer willing to find money for the affairs of others; besides, the treasure left him by the king, his father, being long since exhausted, he could raise money only by means of the parliament, who always framed difficulties, or made him purchase their subsidies, with some extraordinary favours. So Francis not finding in him the same dispositions as formerly, feared to engage too far, before he was secure of his assistance. He perceived, he was no longer inclined to favour the emperor as before; but that did not suffice; for it was also necessary, to persuade him to join in the league of Italy, otherwise the whole charge of the war must have fallen upon France, which was, however, drained of men, money, and generals. For this reason, his view was to induce the emperor, through fear of the league, to accept the equivalent offered him for Burgundy, and to continue the war in Italy, only till that prince was resolved, or the king of England entirely engaged. To that end, he made the pope and Venetians large promises, to hinder them from being impatient, but performed them very ill. A small body of troops levied in Italy, commanded by the marquess of Saluzzo, was, hitherto, all that he contributed for the league, whereof he was himself the author and head. In the interim, the pope was extremely uneasy at seeing the slowness, or rather coldness of the two monarchs, on whom he relied. Indeed, he had no cause to complain of Henry, who had made him no promise, and yet he ceased not earnestly to press him to undertake the defence of the church, as if the church could have not subsisted, if the emperor remained master of Milan; but he received only general answers, Henry being unwilling to engage in the affairs of Italy, where he could reap no advantage. In the mean time, the pope was at an expence which threw him into great streights; for which reason, he privately continued, with the viceroy of Naples, a negotiation, with intent to hasten or retard it, according to the proceedings of the kings of France and England. In this he acted agreeably to his real temper, which made him consider the having always two strings to his bow, as the surest maxim of policy; but he was always so unfortunate as to

* Lewis, with an army of 20,000, engaged 300,000 Turks. By his defeat and death, most part of Hungary was lost, with the lives of 200,000 Hungarians, who were cut off by the Turks, in the following rencounters. This Lewis, was born without a skin, had a beard at 15 years of age, at 18 his hairs were gray, and he was drowned in his 20th. Heylin.

1527. reap from his artifices, fruits contrary to his hopes. As his ſole view was to hinder the emperor from keeping the duchy of Milan, to that end it was, that he would have the kings of France and England make conſiderable efforts; after which, he would not have ſcrupled to forſake them, provided the emperor had ſatisfied him upon that article. Francis was in no better diſpoſition with regard to his allies; for his view was to recover his ſons out of Spain; and, could he have ſucceeded by treating alone with the emperor, he would have little regarded the concerns of the pope and Venetians. As for the republick of Venice, it was of great conſequece to her, that the emperor ſhould not remain maſter of the Milaneſe, and her expences to hinder it, was nothing in compariſon of the prejudice ſhe would have received, if the emperor had peaceably held that duchy. So, never ceaſing to ſollicit the kings of France and England, ſhe continued the war, tho' faintly, in expectation that theſe two monarchs would bear the greateſt part of the charge. The negotiations which the pope ſtill continued with the viceroy of Naples, afforded the Venetians a plauſible reaſon, not to exert themſelves, becauſe they were afraid, his inconſtancy would render all their endeavours ineffectual. The emperor, on his part, was no leſs embarraſſed. As he had but little money, a vigorous war muſt have annoyed him very much; and, therefore, finding the king of France made no great efforts, he did not haſten the ſending of freſh ſupplies into Italy, for fear of raiſing the attention of his enemies; beſides, ſince Frondſperg's arrival with the German troops, he thought himſelf ſtrong enough to keep the duchy of Milan, which was then his chief view. Such was the diſpoſition of theſe potentates, in the beginning of the year 1527. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in Italy, during this year, becauſe it ſerves for foundation to all the events ſpoken of hereafter.

The duke of Bourbon is without money, and at a great loſs. Guicciard.

The duke of Bourbon was under inconceivable difficulties, for want of money to pay his troops. After frequent exactions upon the inhabitants of Milan, he ſaw no way to maintain his army any longer, without danger of cauſing a general revolt in that great city, which was reduced to deſpair. On the other hand, the Germans brought into Italy, by Frondſperg, had received no pay ſince their liſting; therefore, it was neceſſary, either to pay them what was due, or furniſh them wherewithal to make themſelves amends, in ſome other place, or reſolve to ſee the army disband, on which the emperor wholly relied. To ſatisfy the troops, there was no other way but to lead them into the territories of the church, of Florence, or of Venice. But the Venetian towns were too well provided, to afford any hopes of booty from thence; eſpecially as the duke of Bourbon had no artillery; beſides, very likely, he was ſure the duke of Urbino would not oppoſe his deſigns, provided he did not moleſt the republick. So, determining to maintain his army upon the pope's territories, he left 7 or 8000 Germans, at Milan, under the command of Antonio de Leva, and went and joined Frondſperg in the Plaiſantin, where he ſtayed ſome time, to raiſe contributions. 1527.

A war between the pope and viceroy of Naples.

Before the duke of Bourbon departed from Milan, the viceroy of Naples had brought an army upon the borders of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, to make a diverſion, and force the pope to recall the troops he had ſent to the duke of Urbino, ſince the expiration of the truce. The approach of this army, had obliged the pope to raiſe troops to defend his dominions, not having thought proper to recall thoſe in Lombardy. Hence he ſaw himſelf engaged in an unuſual expence. Hitherto, the popes had found means to wage war at the charge of others, and Clement VII. had been in hopes to do the ſame. He had granted Francis a tenth upon the clergy of France, which he was to divide with him; beſides that, Francis had promiſed to find 40,000 crowns a month for the league, and 20,000 for the pope, in particular. But of all this, he had yet paid but 10,000 crowns. Thus, the pope ſaw himſelf over-burdened, without knowing how to get clear of this incumbrance, ſince it was no leſs difficult to raiſe money, than dangerous to make a ſeparate peace, in ſuch a juncture. In the interim, Henry VIII, being informed of his neceſſities, and fearing he would relinquiſh the league, ſent him 30,000 ducats, which helped to comfort him a little, and keep him in the reſolution to continue the war.

A truce between the pope and viceroy. Herbert.

It is needleſs to give the particulars of this war, between the pope and the viceroy of Naples. It ſuffices to obſerve, that whilſt it laſted, the pope receiving advice of the duke of Bourbon's march, concluded a truce with the viceroy. He had ſtrong reaſons for taking this courſe; for he was not only burdened with the maintenance of two armies, but alſo ſaw himſelf daily more remote from his hopes, with reſpect to France and England. Francis performed nothing of what he had promiſed, and Henry ſhewed no great inclination to come into the league. On the other hand, the duke of Urbino's proceeding, who commanded the army of the allies in the Milaneſe, daily grew more ſuſpicious; beſides, Florence was in danger, and the pope unſafe in Rome itſelf. The conditions of the truce were:

Guicciard.

That it ſhould laſt eight months, that the pope ſhould pay 60,000 ducats to the duke of Bourbon's army; viz. 40,000 on the 21ſt of the preſent month, and the reſt within eight days; and, that the imperial army ſhould march out of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. The truce being publiſhed, the pope disbanded all his troops, except 2000 foot, and 200 horſe, and laid up his gallies, before he knew the duke of Bourbon's intentions, who was in the midſt of his march to Bologna.

The duke of Bourbon's march.

The duke's troops conſiſted of 5000 men at arms, making about 2000 horſe, 13 or 14000 Germans, 5000 Spaniards, 2000 Italian Foot, and a good number of light horſe of the ſame nation. This army departed from 1527. from about Piacentia, in February, without money, proviſions, waggons, artillery, and ſubſiſting only by means of the contributions raiſed upon their rout. The duke not being able to enter Bologna, by reaſon Saluzzo had thrown himſelf in with 12000 men, ſtayed ſome time in the Bologneſe, where his army made a prodigious booty. Here he was informed of the concluſion of the truce, to which he would not conſent, becauſe the ſum he was to have, was not ſufficient to pay what was due to his troops. Whereupon the viceroy of Naples, who was at Rome, came to Florence, where the duke ſent an officer to confer with him. As the viceroy's intention was to cauſe the duke of Bourbon to accept of the truce, in order to ſend the imperial army into the ſtate of Venice, he agreed with the meſſenger, that the duke ſhould withdraw in five days; that 80,000 ducats ſhould be paid him down, and 60,000 ſome day in May. The pope hearing of this new agreement, disbanded the 2000 men he had kept, to be eaſed of the charge; but the duke of Bourbon, whether he had intended to deceive the viceroy, or could not reſtrain his army, after feigning to attack Florence, ſuddenly took the rout to Rome, leaving far behind him the army of the pope and Venetians, who had thrown themſelves into Florence.

The pope's diſtreſs. Guicciard.

Great was then the alarm at Rome; for the pope ſeeing himſelf without troops and money, knew not what courſe to take. In this diſtreſs, he committed the defence of Rome and himſelf, to Renzo de Ceri, who made him hope, that with an army, raiſed within the walls, he would ſecure the city from being inſulted. The pope truſting to his general's promiſes, would neither leave Rome himſelf, to provide for his ſafety, nor ſuffer any thing to be carried from thence.

The duke of Bourbon comes before Rome. Guicciard. Bellay.

In the interim, the duke of Bourbon purſuing his march, without meeting any obſtacle, appeared before Rome, on the 5th of May. The ſame day, pretending a deſign to proceed to Naples, he ſent a trumpet to the pope, to deſire a paſſage, which being refuſed, next morning at break of day, he approached the ſuburbs, by means of a very thick miſt, and ſtormed a breach which they had not had time to repair. But in the beginning of the aſſault, his thigh-bone was broke with a muſket-ſhot, of which he, immediately, died. The prince of Orange, who was near him, throwing a cloak over his body, continued the aſſault. At length, after two hours' reſiſtance, the breach was forced, and the Imperialiſts entered the ſuburbs. Whereupon the pope withdrew to the caſtle of St. Angelo, accompanied by 13 cardinals, all the foreign ambaſſadors, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction. In the interim, the Imperialiſts were employed in becoming maſters of the Tyber, which was not difficult, conſidering the conſternation the whole city was in. The pope might ſtill have withdrawn from the caſtle of St. Angelo, and ſecured his perſon; but by a ſtrange blindneſs, upon news of the duke of Bourbon's death, he was obſtinately bent, without any juſt reaſon, to ſtay in a place where he had neither proviſions, nor ammunition, nor a garriſon ſufficient to defend it. So many hiſtorians have deſcribed the ſacking of Rome, that it is needleſs to inſiſt on it here; for the reader may eaſily conceive, what the deſire of plunder may cauſe an ill-diſciplined army without a general, like this, to commit. Some hiſtorians have been pleaſed to caſt the whole blame of the rapine and cruelty committed on this occaſion, upon the Proteſtants in Frondſperg's troops; but moſt have made no ſuch diſtinction, agreeing, that the Spaniards ſhewed no more regard for the holy city, than the Germans. 1527.

He ſtorms the city

He is ſlain.

The ſacking of Rome. Guicciard.

If the army of the allies had cloſely followed the Imperialiſts, they might have fallen upon them, whilſt moſt intent upon the plunder, and probably, with ſucceſs; but, if we may believe Guicciardini, the duke of Urbino ſo ordered it, that the army came not before Rome, till the end of May, and then raiſed ſo many objections againſt attempting the relief of the caſtle of St. Angelo, that the generals agreed to leave the pope to come off as well as he could. The allies retiring the firſt of June, Clement capitulated the 6th, having ſent for the viceroy of Naples to treat with him; but the army, having choſen the prince of Orange for general, had no great confidence in the viceroy, neither would be guided by his counſels. The pope, therefore, was forced to ſign with the prince of Orange, and the chief officers of the army, the following capitulation:

The over-ſight of the allies. Hall.

The pope capitulates.

The articles of the capitulation.

That the pope ſhould pay the army 400,000 ducats, viz. 100,000 down, 50,000 in 20 days, and 250,000 within two months, aſſigning for that purpoſe, a tax upon the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

That he ſhould deliver into the emperor's hands, the caſtle of St. Angelo, Civita Vecchia, Oſtia, Citta Caſtellana, Parma, Placentia, and Modena.

That the pope, with the 13 cardinals, ſhould remain priſoners in the caſtle of St. Angelo, till 150,000 crowns were paid, and then ſhould be conducted to Naples or Gaeta, there to wait the emperor's pleaſure.

That the chevalier Gregoria Caſſali, the Engliſh ambaſſador, Renzo de Ceri, and all the reſt that were retired to the caſtle, except the pope and the 13 cardinals, ſhould be at liberty to go where they pleaſed.

That the Colonna's ſhould be abſolved from all cenſures.

That when the pope ſhould go from Rome, he ſhould leave a legate, and the court of the Rota.

The pope remains a priſoner.

The capitulation being ſigned, captain Alarcon, the ſame that had the cuſtody of Francis I, when a priſoner, entered the caſtle of St. Angelo, with three companies of Spaniards, and as many of Germans, and ſtrictly guarded the pope and cardinals. During the confuſion cauſed by the pope's impriſonment, the duke of Ferrara became maſter of Modena, the Venetians took Ravenna and Cervia, Sigiſ-

1527. mund Malateſta ſeized Rimini, and the Florentines expelling the pope's legate, recovered their liberty.

The imperial army becomes uſeleſs. Guicciard.

Some time after, all the troops which were in the kingdom of Naples, repaired to Rome to ſhare in the booty, and glean what the avarice of the Spaniards and Germans had left. The imperial army, then at Rome, conſiſted of 12000 Germans, 8000 Spaniards, and 4000 Italians; but the plague which preſently after raged among the troops, ſo diminiſhed them, that it is ſaid, when they came to go upon action, there was not 10,000 men able to bear arms. In the interim, the eager deſire of plunder, cauſed the emperor's affairs to be ſo neglected, that the army remained unſerviceable, till the end of the year; whereas Bologna and the towns of la Romagna might have been taken, which would have rendered the emperor invinceable in Italy; beſides, this negligence gave Francis time to ſend troops into thoſe parts, of which he would never have thought, if the emperor's generals had reaped from the taking of Rome, and the pope's captivity, the advantages they might have naturally expected, for the ſervice of their maſter. It is time now to ſpeak of the affairs of England, the recital whereof has been interrupted by the relation of this year's events in Italy, becauſe it was abſolutely neceſſary for the underſtanding of the ſequel.

Henry reſolves to make a league offenſive and defenſive with France. Herbert. Hollingſh.

Since Francis had refuſed to execute the treaty of Madrid, he had never ceaſed to preſs Henry to come into the league of Cognac; but whether Henry perceived that prince's views, or hoped, by managing the emperor, to make himſelf umpire of the peace, he had kept within the bounds of the defenſive league concluded, at Moore. At length, finding, that, probably, the pope and Venetians could not long maintain the war, he was afraid, the emperor would become maſter of all Italy, and with that increaſe of power, grow too formidable to Europe. Indeed, it was eaſy to ſee, that to diveſt him of the ſuperiority he was going to acquire upon France, England would one day be forced to make greater efforts than were neceſſary to hinder his attaining it. Theſe conſiderations were farther corroborated, by the inſtances of cardinal Wolſey, whom Francis had taken care to gain to his intereſt, otherwiſe all theſe reaſons, probably, would have been ineffectual. So about the end of the laſt year, Henry, had ſent to Paris, Sir William Fitz-Williams, to acquaint the king of France, that he was ready to join in an offenſive league with him, and give him the princeſs Mary, his daughter, in marriage. Francis gladly embracing the propoſal, the treaty was begun at Paris, by the biſhop of Bath and Wells, the Engliſh ambaſſador in ordinary, and Fitz-Williams; but as ſeveral difficulties occurred, which depended upon the king of England's determination, Francis thought it more proper to ſend ambaſſadors to London, and conclude it there. He made choice for that purpoſe of Gabriel d' Aigremont, or de Gramont, biſhop of Tarbe, and the viſcount of Turenne, with whom were joined, the firſt preſident of Roan, and the lord de Vaux, who were already in England. Theſe ambaſſadors concluded with cardinal Wolſey, appointed commiſſioner to negotiate with them, three treaties, which were ſigned the 30th of April, 1357, when the duke of Bourbon was marching to Rome. 1527.

Several treaties. April 30. Act. Pub.

The firſt treaty ran:

That the two kings ſhould jointly ſend ambaſſadors to the emperor, with offers concerning the ranſom of the two hoſtages, and to demand the payment of what was due to the king of England.

That, if he rejected the offers, or gave no anſwer within 20 days, the two kings ſhould proclaim war againſt him.

Another article of this treaty contained, a mutual engagement for the marriage of Francis, or his ſon, the duke of Orleans, with the princeſs Mary, at the king of France's choice, and upon ſuch terms as ſhould be agreed on, when the time came. Probably, this treaty was to be made publick, in order to induce the emperor to deſiſt from his claim to Burgundy, and be ſatisfied with the offered equivalent.

By the ſecond treaty, it was agreed:

That, in caſe the emperor rejected their propoſals, or deferred his anſwer, all commerce ſhould be forbidden with his ſubjects, by the two kings, allowing them, however, 40 days to withdraw their effects.

That the two kings ſhould make war upon the emperor in the Low-Countries, with an army of 30,000 foot, and 1500 men at arms, and that two thirds of the foot, and all the horſe, ſhould be furniſhed by the king of France.

That they ſhould equip a fleet, with 15000 men, whereof the king of France ſhould find 10,000.

That, if the king of Portugal, or any other prince or ſtate, ſhould join with the emperor, they ſhould be declared enemies to both the kings.

That the pope and Venetians ſhould be deemed included in the league, provided, they continued the war, in Italy.

That the king of France ſhould endeavour to perſuade the king of Navarre, the duke of Gueldres, and Robert de la Mark, to make war upon the emperor.

That the two kings ſhould uſe their joint endeavours to encourage John de Zapol, to proſecute his right to the crown of Hungary, in caſe he had not already made an alliance with the Turk, in order to keep the emperor's brother Ferdinand employed in thoſe parts.

That the league ſhould be notified to the princes of Germany, and the two king's endeavour to prevent their aſſiſting the emperor.

The ſubſtance of the third treaty was:

1. That this treaty ſhould not derogate from that of Moore, which remained in force.

2. That there ſhould be perpetual peace between Francis and Henry, and their reſpective ſubjects.

3. That

1527. 3. That neither of them ſhould give aid, or advice, to any perſon whatever, that ſhould attack the dominions of the other.

4. Henry renounced, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, all right and title to the kingdom of France, and, in general, whatever Francis now poſſeſſed.

5. In conſideration whereof, Francis bound himſelf, and ſucceſſors, to pay to Henry's ſucceſſors an annual penſion, for ever, of 50,000 crowns, at two payments; viz. on the 1ſt of May, and the 1ſt of November, and that the payment of the penſion ſhould commence, on the firſt of thoſe two days, which ſhould happen after Henry's death, without deduction of what ſhould remain to be paid after Henry's deceaſe, of the 2,000,000 ſtipulated by the treaty of Moore.

6. Moreover, Francis bound himſelf to give yearly to Henry, 15,000 crowns worth of ſalt of Bruage, beſides the fore-mentioned 50,000 crowns.

7. That, to prevent the objection which might hereafter be made, "That a king can't "bind his ſucceſſors," the two kings ſhould cauſe the treaty to be confirmed by the ſtates of their realms, and held as a perpetual and inviolable law.

8. That the treaty ſhould be approved and confirmed, by the archbiſhops, biſhops, princes, dukes, earls, barons, and other great men of the two kingdoms, whoſe names were inſerted in this article, under forfeiture of all their goods; and by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, Roan, Bourdeaux, as well as by all the courts of juſtice, in England.

Alterations in the ſecond treaty, on account of the ſacking of Rome. Herbert.

The news of the ſacking of Rome, and the pope's captivity, arriving ſhortly after the concluſion of theſe treaties, the two kings thought fit to alter the article of the ſecond, concerning their carrying war into the Low-Countries, and to agree to act only in Italy; but as the Engliſh troops could not be tranſported into Italy, without great difficulties and loſs of time, they agreed, that the king of France ſhould undertake the war alone, for a certain ſum, which Henry was to pay him monthly, till the end of October. This laſt treaty was ſigned the 29th of May, about three weeks after the taking of Rome.

Henry's demands upon the emperor. Hall. Stow.

In conſequence of the firſt of the three treaties of April the 30th, Henry ſent Sir Francis Pointz, into Spain, to demand of the emperor, that as, by their former treaties, the war with France was carried on at a common charge, he would give him half the booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two hoſtages received from the French king. Pointz was accompanied with Clarenceux, king at arms, but incognito, that he might be ready to do his office, when there ſhould be occaſion. The emperor eaſily perceived the king of England ſought only a pretence of quarrel; but as it was his intereſt to prolong the time, he told the ambaſſador, he would ſend his anſwer to the king, his maſter, by an expreſs.

Lautrec marches to Italy. Guicciard.

While the ambaſſador was on his way to Spain, Francis and Henry hearing what had paſſed in Italy, thought proper that cardinal Wolſey ſhould go and confer with Francis, at Amiens, in order to concert meaſures agreeable to the ſituation of affairs. Soon after, Francis ſent Lautrec with the forces deſigned for Italy. 1527.

Wolſey confers with the king of France. Herbert. Hall.

Cardinal Wolſey departing from court, the third of July, arrived at Calais the 11th, from whence he went to Abbeville, and ſtayed till Francis came to Amiens. He was received at his entrance into the French territories, with the ſame reſpect as would have been paid to the king of England. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Francis's letters patent, empowering the cardinal, "his dear-"eſt and great friend," to releaſe the priſoners, wherever he came, what crimes ſoever they were guilty of, except high-treaſon, rapes, coining, ſacrilege, and the like, and to grant them a pardon by his letters patent.

The emperor's memorial as to a peace.

Whilſt the cardinal was at Abbeville, he received a memorial from the emperor, containing his anſwer to the king of France's offers to the viceroy of Naples. He had, as was obſerved, rejected theſe offers, at firſt, with diſdain, and refuſed to hear them mentioned; but the ſituation of his affairs being altered, by the league between France and England, he believed it would be better to end all differences, by a peace, than run the riſque of maintaining the war alone, againſt ſo many powerful enemies. It was, therefore, in order to procure a peace, that he ſent this anſwer to the cardinal, wherewith he imagined to have reaſon to hope, the king of France and Henry would be ſatisfied.

As this memorial is very proper to illuſtrate the Hiſtory of thoſe times, it will not, doubtleſs, be unacceptable to inſert the ſubſtance thereof.

"The emperor began with proteſting, that "by what he offered in this memorial, he "meant not to derogate from the treaty of "Madrid, but in the points only which were "contrary to it. He added, that as to the "hoſtages, the king of France was not igno-"rant of the reaſon of their being in Spain, "and had it in his power to recover them. "Then he ſet forth the offers made by Francis "to the viceroy of Naples, containing the four "following articles.

The king of FRANCE's offers to the emperor.

"I. That he would execute the treaty of "Madrid, provided Franceſco Sforza was re-"ſtored to the duchy of Milan.

"II. That he would give the emperor, in "lieu of Burgundy, 2,000,000 of gold payable, "viz. a good ſum in hand, when queen Leo-"nora ſhould be delivered to him, and the "reſt, at a day to be appointed, and then his "ſons ſhould be reſtored; unleſs the emperor "had rather have the whole ſum at once, and "deliver, at the ſame time, the queen and the "two hoſtages.

"III. That he would pay the king of Eng-"land what was due from the emperor.

1527. " IV. He demanded, that the emperor " ſhould increaſe queen Leonora's dowry, in " proportion to the ſum he was to receive, " ſince he could do it without any charge to " himſelf.

The EMPEROR's anſwer.

" The emperor anſwered to theſe four arti- " cles, by the eight following declarations:

" I. That what ſhould be agreed upon, " ſhould not be prejudicial to the treaty of " Madrid, except in ſuch things as ſhould be " altered, by mutual conſent.

" II. That the emperor's right to Burgun- " dy ſhould remain entire, as before the trea- " ty of Madrid.

" III. That all the articles of the treaty of " Madrid, except ſuch as were mentioned in " theſe offers, ſhould remain entire.

" IV. The emperor, in his 4th declaration " ſaid, that he hoped the king of England, and " the lord cardinal would cauſe the ſum of " 2,000,000 of gold, offered by the king of " France, to be augmented. However, if that " could not be, it ſhould be underſtood, that " this ſum was over and above what the em- " peror owed the king of England, as well " for money lent, as for the indemnity he had " undertaken to diſcharge, which ſums the " king of France had taken upon himſelf, in " the treaty of Madrid. Beſides, likewiſe, the " reſtitution of the late Mr. de Bourbon's " eſtate, it being reaſonable, that his heirs " ſhould partake of the benefit of the treaty. " Item, That the king of France ſhould punc- " tually perform all the reſt of the articles con- " cluded on his part, in the treaty of Ma- " drid, before his ſons left Spain; the empe- " ror not being able, after what had paſſed, " to take any ſecurity, if the hoſtages remain- " ed not in his power, till the treaty was fully " executed.

" V. That purſuant to the treaty of Ma- " drid, what ſhould be agreed upon, ſhould " be ratified by the ſtates-general of France, " and approved by the parliaments; or, if " that could not be done, by the ſtates gene- " ral, it ſhould, at leaſt, be ratified by the " ſtates of each province.

" VI. The emperor, declared, that he " could not ſend the queen, his ſiſter, to " France, till every thing was accompliſhed, " and then the queen and the hoſtages ſhould " be ſent together.

" VII. That, as for the duke Sforza, the " emperor would appoint impartial judges to " decide his affair, and if he was found guilty " of no crime, for which he deſerved to be " deprived of his duchy, he ſhould be reſto- " red; but if he was condemned, the ſtate " of Milan ſhould remain in the emperor's " diſpoſal, according to juſtice and equity.

" VIII. That the king of England ſhould " be guarantee of the future treaty, and by " his letters patent engage to aſſiſt, at his " own charge, with a certain number of " troops, him, of the two parties, that ſhould " keep the treaty, againſt him that ſhould " not obſerve it.

" Beſides theſe eight conditions, which the 1527. " emperor called declarations, he demanded, " moreover, in his memorial, that the king " of France ſhould ſatisfy him for the expen- " ces of the leagues he had made with him, " and of which he was the ſole author, em- " powering the king of England to ſettle the " ſum.

" Finally, he ſaid, that he did not que- " ſtion, the king of England, who perfectly " knew what had paſſed between the two par- " ties, would not cauſe the king of France's " offers to be increaſed, and that the lord le- " gate, whom the emperor always looked up- " on as his good friend, would alſo endeavour " the ſame, to the utmoſt of his power; that, " however, he was ſo inclined to peace, that " if the king of England deſired, he ſhould " make any farther conceſſions, than what " were contained in the eight foregoing decla- " rations, he would do more for his ſake than " for any prince in the world. That he " ſhould be very glad, all the potentates of " Europe knew how much he valued his " friendſhip, and aſcribed to him the whole " glory of procuring a peace. This memo- " rial was dated at Valladolid the ------ of " July, 1527.

A remark on this memorial.

If this anſwer of the emperor be cloſely examined, it will be manifeſt, that he ſimply and abſolutely accepted of the French king's offers, under terms denoting, it was he that gave, rather than received law, and by his declarations, only, obviated all poſſible cavils. As to what he farther demanded, it was under ſuch reſtrictions, that he ſeemed willing to ſtand to the king of England's determination, which, at ſuch a juncture, was the ſame thing as to depart from his demands. There was but one ſingle point concerning which he could not reſolve to ſubmit; viz. the duke of Milan's affair; but this was a point newly propoſed by the king of France, and which had no relation to the treaty of Madrid, where nothing like it was to be found. However, it is plain, if that had been the only obſtacle to a peace, he would alſo have granted it, ſince he reſerved a way to come off with honour; viz. by cauſing Sforza to be declared innocent, in the manner he had himſelf propoſed to the pope. Perhaps Francis would have accepted the peace, on the terms offered in the memorial, if the emperor had come to that reſolution at firſt; but ſince he had made theſe offers to the viceroy of Naples, the face of affairs was very much altered, as he had entirely gained Henry to his intereſt, and as, after the taking of Rome, it was to be feared the emperor would become maſter of all Italy. In the interim, the emperor's offers, which were, in effect, the ſame Francis had made to the viceroy of Naples, were either to be accepted or rejected; but as it was not Henry's buſineſs to return an anſwer, ſince the affair did not directly concern him, he only ſent the memorial to Francis, who no longer deſiring to make peace, diſengaged himſelf in this manner. He demanded, in the firſt place, that Sforza ſhould be reſtored without condition.

1527. tion. Secondly, that his ſons ſhould be delivered before he recalled his forces from Italy, where Lautrec was now arrived, offering to depoſite 300,000 ducats in the hands of the king of England, for ſecurity of his word. There could not be a plainer evidence of his little deſire to execute the treaty of Madrid, tho' the ſame terms only were demanded, as were offered by himſelf, preſently after his deliverance. He meant, after having withdrawn his hoſtages, to have the execution of the treaty in his own power, under colour of offering to depoſite for ſecurity 300,000 ducats in the hands of a prince devoted to him, and who, by a private treaty, was engaged to make his intereſt his own. The emperor, unwilling to be, thus, inſnared, offered on his part, to depoſite the ſame ſum in the hands of the king of England, for pledge, that the hoſtages ſhould be reſtored; but his offer being rejected, the affair ſtopped there, and war was only thought of. In the interim, the emperor deſiring to let all the world ſee, it was not his fault that a peace was not concluded, gave the ambaſſadors of England, of the pope, and of the Venetians, the ſame anſwer he had ſent to cardinal Wolſey. They all ſeemed very well ſatisfied, and ſaid, their maſters would, doubtleſs, accept a peace on theſe terms, and ſend orders to conclude it: but they knew not that the kings of France and England had altered their minds, and taken new reſolutions.

Francis's conference with Wolſey.

If Francis and cardinal Wolſey were to confer together, at Abbeville, it was not to ſeek means to make peace, but rather to take meaſures, on ſuppoſition, that a war with the emperor was infallible. Francis being come to Abbeville, the firſt of Auguſt, the cardinal waited on him, and after conferring together, they concluded, on the 18th, three treaties, which, properly, were only ſupplements, explanations, and reſtrictions of the three foregoing ones.

Three new treaties. Act. Pub.

By the firſt it was agreed:

I. That, as he had left it to the king of France's choice, to marry the princeſs Mary, or leave her for the duke of Orleans, his ſecond ſon, the duke ſhould eſpouſe the princeſs when they ſhould be both of age; that then, and not before, ſhould be ſettled the marriage articles concerning the dowry, the education of the duke of Orleans, in England, and the like; moreover, that, whether the marriage ſhould be conſummated, or the two monarchs think fit to diſpoſe of their children otherwiſe, their friendſhip ſhould remain firm and inviolable, the marriage being only to be conſidered as a ſupplement to the treaties of the 30th of April, and not as part of thoſe treaties.

II. That the treaty concluded, at Moore, ſhould remain in full force.

III. That the project of the interview of the two kings, ſhould be laid aſide, on account of the ſeaſon and circumſtances of affairs.

IV. As by the treaty of the 29th of May, it was agreed, that the king of England ſhould contribute a certain ſum for the war of Italy, it was concluded by this, that in caſe the emperor accepted the offers the two kings ſhould make him, by their ambaſſadors, the ſaid contribution ſhould ceaſe, without any prejudice to the treaty of peace; but if he rejected them, the treaty of league offenſive and defenſive, ſhould ſubſiſt, on condition, that during this campaign, the king of England ſhould be deemed to have diſcharged his part of the treaty, by his contribution for the war with Italy. 1527.

V. That the king of England ſhould form no demands upon the king of France, on pretence of his charges for the war of Italy.

VI. That to prevent all diſputes, without examining the number of troops, which the king of France maintained in Italy, the king of England ſhould pay for the month of June laſt, 20,000 crowns, for the month of July laſt, 30,000 crowns, and 32,222 for each of the three following months. On condition, however, that if in theſe three laſt months, the Engliſh commiſſaries found in the army of Italy, a leſs number of troops, than what the king of France was to maintain, the contribution ſhould be leſſened, in proportion; moreover, if a peace was made during theſe three laſt months, the contribution ſhould ceaſe the day the peace was concluded.

By the ſecond treaty, which concerned only trade, Francis promiſed to give the Engliſh merchants ſuch privileges, as ſhould be agreed upon hereafter.

By a third treaty the two kings were bound:

Firſt, not to conſent to the calling of a general council, during the pope's captivity.

Secondly, To receive no bull, or mandate, from the pope, till he was releaſed.

Thirdly, That till the pope ſhould reſume the government of the church, whatever ſhould be determined, in England, by the cardinal legate, aſſiſted by the principal members of the clergy, and in France, by the clergy of the Gallican church, ſhould be punctually executed.

Wolſey returns to England. Act. Pub

Theſe treaties being concluded, Francis I. ratified them, and ſwore to the obſervance before he left Abbeville. Cardinal Wolſey did the ſame thing in his maſter's name, by vertue of his full powers and title of vicar-general, which he had received on this occaſion; after that, he returned into England to give the king an account of the ſucceſs of his negotiation.

Henry's freſh demands upon the emperor.

Henry being reſolved to proclaim war againſt the emperor, but willing to conceal the real motives, demanded of him, by his ambaſſadors, four things, which he knew could not then be performed. The firſt was, that he ſhould pay what was borrowed of him, or of his father, king Henry VII. The ſecond, that he ſhould pay him the 500,000 crowns, to which he was obliged, in caſe he married not the princeſs Mary, to whom he was affianced. The third, that according to the tenor of their treaty, he ſhould ſatisfy him for his penſion from the king of France, whereof there was now due four years and four months. The fourth, that he ſhould releaſe the pope, and ſatisfy him for all the damages cauſed by his troops.

1527. troops. The emperor anſwered the ambaſſadors, firſt, that he had never denied his being debtor to the king of England; but was ſurpriſed he ſhould, at this juncture, inſiſt ſo much upon payment; that, at leaſt, when the money was required, the obligations ſhould be offered to be reſtored. Secondly, that he would write to the king, their maſter, to acquaint him, why he did not think himſelf liable to the penalty of the 500,000 crowns, for not conſummating the marriage. In the third place, that orders, were ſent into Italy to ſet the pope free. He ſaid nothing concerning making ſatisfaction for the penſion, becauſe, probably, he conſidered it as included in the article of the debts, to which he owned himſelf bound, as, indeed, nothing was more reaſonable.

An aſſembly of the chief men of France. Mazerai.

The emperor's anſwers were not capable of ſatisfying Henry, who only ſought an occaſion of quarrel. On the other hand, Francis having called together the chief men, that is to ſay, properly, perſons devoted to him, declared to them, all the ſteps he had made towards a peace with the emperor; and it may eaſily be gueſſed, he was not very careful to explain what the emperor might alledge againſt him. Having repreſented the matter as he pleaſed, he ſaid, he was ready to return into captivity, if it was judged, that he was obliged, in honour or conſcience. The aſſembly unanimouſly replied, that his perſon belonged to the realm, and it was not in his power to diſpoſe of it, according to his pleaſure; that, moreover, he could not alienate the provinces of the crown, but if the emperor would accept of a ranſom for the two princes, in hoſtage, they offered the king 2,000,000 of gold to redeem them. A man muſt have voluntarily ſhut his eyes, not to ſee what was the deſign of this farce, entirely managed by the court. In the interim, the king believing, after this deciſion, that he might, with a ſafe conſcience, go to war with the emperor, thought only of means to recover his ſons, by force of arms. However, he ſtill hoped, the dread of a war would induce the emperor to mitigate the treaty of Madrid. This was not now with reſpect to Burgundy, ſince he could not be ignorant, that the emperor had accepted the offered equivalent; but he was in hopes, by means of the war, to procure a new treaty, which ſhould annul that of Madrid. Thus, many princes play with their words and oaths, and ſeek to blind themſelves, or, at leaſt, the publick, whilſt none about them dare to tell them the truth. The emperor kept his word no better, with regard to the duchy of Milan; and Henry VIII, ſcrupled not to break his league with the emperor, as he had before violated that with Francis. Princes never want excuſes when they have a mind to break a treaty; but the publick is not always impoſed upon, tho' frequently they appear ſo to be. Probably, the ſovereigns themſelves are not ſo blind, but they ſee the irregularity of their conduct, tho', countenanced by the diſſimulation of the publick, they affect the great ſecurity; but the time comes, at laſt, when poſteriy, leſs prepoſſeſſed, does juſtice to all the world, and calls things by their proper name. 1527.

Francis, willing to preſerve the friendſhip, newly contracted with Henry, ſent him the Order of St. Michael*, by Ann de Montmorency, one of the knights. This lord had power to diſpence with Henry's oath, in whole, or in part, as the new knight ſhould think fit, or even to be contented with his bare word. Henry was pleaſed to ſwear to obſerve all the ſtatutes of the order of St. Michael, which were not contrary to thoſe of the Garter, or any other Order he had already received, Then he ſent the Order of the Garter to Francis, by Arthur Plantagenet, viſcount Liſle, natural ſon to Edward IV, and Francis took the uſual oath of the Order, with the ſame reſtrictions. The French ambaſſador, who arrived, in England, about the end of October, was received with ſuch magnificence, that Du Bellay, who accompanied him, aſſures us, he had never ſeen the like. The Engliſh ambaſſador was received in the ſame manner, in France, there having ever been between Francis and Henry, an emulation, which frequently threw them into needleſs expences. But it was moſt inconvenient for Francis, by reaſon of his continual wars with the emperor, wherein Henry was no farther engaged than he pleaſed; nay, he paid the very contribution for the war of Italy, by way of deduction for the ſums owed him by Francis, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Thus, Francis was forced to diſburſe all the money employed in that war, of which I muſt now relate the ſequel.

Francis and Henry ſend one another their order of knights of St. Michael and the Garter. Act. Pub.

The affairs of Italy. Guicciard.

Clement VII, was ſtill confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo, till he could pay the ſums exacted upon him. As he had but little money, he could only pay part of what he had promiſed, and, therefore, his captivity was longer than he expected, at firſt; they, in whoſe cuſtody he was, not being willing to truſt to his word. The emperor had not advice of the ſacking of Rome, and the pope's impriſonment, ſooner than the beginning of June, and it was above a month before he came to any reſolution. As he did not queſtion this affair would make great noiſe in the world, he was willing to ſee, before he determined what to do, how the kings of France and England would take it, in order to proceed accordingly. The 2d of Auguſt, he wrote to Henry, to excuſe himſelf, concerning the outrages commited by his troops at Rome, and the violence exerciſed upon the pope's perſon, wherein he proteſted, he was not concerned. At the ſame time, he asked his advice, about what was to be done, on this occaſion, as if he ſtill deemed him his good friend and ally; but it was only to gain time, till he received Francis's anſwer to the memorial, ſent to cardinal Wolſey. On the other hand, the pope, tho' narrowly watched had found means to write to Henry, and cauſe the 13 cardinals, who were confined with him, to do the ſame, deſiring his protection, and entreating

1527. entreating him to uſe his beſt endeavours, to free them from their unhappy condition. Henry, upon receipt of theſe letters, ſent orders to his ambaſſadors, in Spain, to demand of the emperor the pope's and cardinals liberty; to which the emperor anſwered in general terms, that he would do what lay in his power for the king of England's ſatisfaction. In the interim, he was thinking of conveying the pope into Spain, in expectation of making a better bargain with him, than if he left him in Italy. Of this cardinal Wolſey informed Henry, by a letter from Abbeville, of the 29th of July.

The emperor tries to ſet Francis and Henry at variance.

It is certain, Henry's inſtances, in the pope's behalf, greatly embarraſſed the emperor; for he found, that Francis and Henry would not fail to join their counſels and forces againſt him, under colour of labouring for the pope; and this union could not but break all his meaſures, with reſpect to his affairs, in Italy. He believed, therefore, that before all things, he ſhould try to divide them, by ſowing jealouſies and ſuſpicions between them. One of his expedients, to this end, was, to propoſe to the cardinal, a marriage between the duke of Richmond, natural ſon of Henry, and Iſabella, princeſs of Portugal, with whom he offered, in dower, the duchy of Milan. The cardinal acquainted the king with it, by a letter of the 31ſt of July, telling him withal, that the offer was not much to be relied on, but, however, it was proper to ſeem to liſten to it, becauſe it was neceſſary ſtill to preſerve ſome correſpondence with the emperor. This related, without doubt, to the affair of the divorce, which I ſhall preſently ſpeak of; for, by a letter of the 1ſt of Auguſt, the cardinal informed the king, it was reported in Spain, he intended to divorce the queen; but that it was requiſite to ſend orders to his ambaſſadors, at Madrid, to ſtifle the rumour as much as poſſible. That to this end, they might ſay, it had no other foundation than the biſhop of Tarbe's ſcruples, concerning the princeſs Mary's marriage with the duke of Orleans, as if there was room to queſtion the princeſs's legitimacy. The emperor, alſo, uſed another way to divide Francis and Henry, by trying to gain cardinal Wolſey by advantageous offers. But for once, he could not ſucceed; whether Wolſey was now too far engaged with Francis, or was bent to be revenged of the emperor, who had twice deceived him, or whether the buſineſs of the divorce was now reſolved, in which caſe, it was not poſſible for him to promiſe to eſpouſe the emperor's intereſts.

Francis joins in a league with the Venetians. Guicciard.

When Francis heard of the ſacking of Rome, he perceived it was time to lay aſide artifice, and neceſſary to ſend a powerful aid, into Italy, otherwiſe the Venetians would infallibly conclude a peace with the emperor. Indeed, it was not likely, they could, or would, bear alone the burden of the war; wherefore, his firſt care was to make a new treaty with them, to bring each into the field 10,000 men, and levy 10,000 Switzers, at a common charge. The Venetians deſired nothing more, than to be ſupported by France, becauſe they juſtly dreaded, that the army, which had ſacked Rome, would be employed againſt them. Indeed, if the duke of Bourbon had been alive, or the viceroy of Naples able to influence the army, the Venetians would, undoubtedly, have been attacked, being the only enemies the emperor had, in Italy; but happily for them, the imperial troops being wholly intent upon the plunder of Rome, without thinking of any other undertaking, the plague which broke out among them, ſwept away two thirds of the ſoldiers. In a word, the diſtemper deſtroying them by heaps, they left Rome, and diſperſed themſelves in the neighbouring country; after which, having ſacked Terni and Narni, and extorted money from Spoleto, the Germans parted from the Spaniards, and returned to Rome. Thus, diſcord ariſing in the army, which ill obeyed the prince of Orange, tho' they had choſen him for general, they projected nothing to improve their victory, for the emperor's advantage. On the contrary, by their negligence, they gave Francis time to ſend troops into Italy, under the command of Lautrec, who was declared general of the league, he had newly concluded with the Venetians. As for the duke of Urbino, he continued in the Milaneſe, with part of the Venetian army. 1527.

Lautrec arrives in Piedmont.

Lautrec arrived in Piedmont, in July, with part of the army he was to command; the marqueſs of Saluzzo was ordered to join him with his Italians, and the Switzers were to come preſently after. Whilſt he was employed in conqueſts of little moment, waiting the junction of all his forces, Adrea Doria, who had quitted the pope's ſervice, and commanded the French gallies, to which he had joined eight others of his own, found means to reduce the city of Genoa, under Francis's dominion. This was a good opening of a campaign, which ſeemed to promiſe an advantageous ſucceſs, in the reſt of the war, eſpecially, as Lautrec, after aſſembling his whole army, conſiſting of 25,000 men, became maſter of Vigevano, Alexandria, and Pavia. Sforza and the Venetians earneſtly preſſed him to beſiege Milan; but he ſhewed them poſitive orders to march to Naples. The king of France took care not to employ his army to conquer the duchy of Milan, which by the treaty of league, was to be reſtored to Sforza, after which, the Venetians would give themſelves but little trouble to accompliſh his attempt upon Naples; beſides, he ſtill hoped, that by conſenting, the emperor ſhould keep Milan, he might recover his ſons, whereas in reſtoring Sforza he ſhould deprive himſelf of that means. Lautrec, therefore, began his march to the kingdom of Naples, but with ſuch flowneſs and affected delays, that it was evident, he had private orders not to make too much haſte; and, indeed, it was at the time that Francis expected the emperor's final anſwer, to the offers made him by his and Henry's ambaſſadors. Lautrec long halted, at Parma, and Placentia, which had opened their gates to 1527. him. In the interim, the duke of Ferrara joined with France, as well on account of Lautrec's march, who might have eaſily ravaged his country, as of Francis's offer to give in marriage to his ſon Hercules, Renee of France, ſecond daughter of Lewis XII. The duke of Mantua preſently after followed his example.

Negotiation for the pope's liberty. Guicciard.

In the interim, the emperor ſeeing the ill effects of the pope's captivity, had diſpatched the general of the Order of St. Francis, to the viceroy of Naples, with orders to releaſe the pope. The general finding the viceroy ſeized with a diſtemper, whereof he died in a few days, delivered the orders to Hugo de Moncada, to be executed. The emperor had given general inſtructions, that the pope ſhould be bound to pay the arrears due to the army, and give ſecurity, after having his liberty, to forſake the league; but as it was not eaſy for the pope to find pledges, or the money neceſſary to pay the army, the negotiation was prolonged. In the interim, he continually ſollicited Lautrec, by private meſſengers, to approach Rome, in order to facilitate his deliverance; but Lautrec had poſitive orders which hindered him from making haſte, and, yet his march, tho' ſlow, was of good ſervice to the pope. Moncada ſeeing the kingdom of Naples was going to be invaded, and that it was not poſſible to lead thither the imperial army, which was at Rome, without giving them money, concluded, at laſt, a treaty, with the pope, to this effect:

A treaty for the pope's deliverance. Herbert.

I. That the pope ſhould not oppoſe the emperor, in the affairs of Naples or Milan.

II. That he ſhould grant the emperor a Cruſade, in Spain, and a tenth in the reſt of his dominions.

III. That the emperor ſhould keep Civita Vecchia, Oſtia, Citta Caſtellana, and the caſtle of Furli.

IV. That the pope ſhould pay down to the German troops, 60,000 ducats, and 35,000 to the Spaniards.

V. That in a fortnight after, he ſhould pay them another certain ſum, and within three months, all the reſt that was due to the emperor, amounting to above 350,000 ducats.

VI. That till the two firſt payments were made, the pope ſhould be conducted to ſome ſafe place out of Rome, and give hoſtages.

The pope eſcapes to Orvieto.

The treaty being ſigned, and the cardinals of Ceſis and Orſino delivered, in hoſtage, it was agreed, that on the 10th of December the pope ſhould be taken out of the caſtle of St. Angelo, and conducted to a place appointed; but as he was afraid of a longer confinement, becauſe he was unable to perform the treaty, he eſcaped, in diſguiſe, the night before, and ſhut himſelf up in Orvieto.

When Lautrec heard that the pope was at liberty, he reſtored to him the city of Parma, and marched to Bologna, where he ſtayed three weeks, expecting freſh orders from the king. Some days after, he received a letter from Clement VII, acknowledging himſelf indebted to him for his liberty, intimating withal, that having been forced to grant the Imperialiſts whatever they required, he did not think himſelf obliged to perform his engagements. 1527.

The beginning of Henry's divorce.

It was whilſt the pope was priſoner, in the caſtle of St. Angelo, that Henry's divorce was ſet on foot; a momentous affair, if ever there was one, as well in itſelf, as on account of the parties concerned, and chiefly for its effects. It was not yet 30 years ſince Lewis XII. put away his wife, without an difficulty, or much noiſe in the world. Henry VIII, had a mind to attempt the ſame thing, and tho' ſupported with much more plauſible reaſons, he met with inſuperable obſtacles, not to be ſurmounted, without an extraordinary method, which gave occaſion to the eſtabliſhment of the reformation in England. This effect diſtinguiſhed Henry VIII's divorce, from ſo many others, which are but ſlightly mentioned by hiſtorians. The writers upon this ſubject, being either Catholicks or Proteſtants, have conſidered it variouſly. The Catholicks have drawn arguments from thence, againſt the reformation in England, and repreſented Henry's divorce, as the next and immediate cauſe of the change of religion; whereas the Proteſtants affirm, it was only the occaſion. Three Engliſh authors, eſpecially, have wrote the Hiſtory of this divorce, beſides many others of the ſame nation, or foreigners, who have ſpoke of it in their works. Sanderus, or rather Sanders, author of the Origin and Progreſs of the Engliſh Schiſm, makes it his buſineſs to deſame Henry, and ſhew, that the reformation in England, which he terms ſchiſm, entirely ſprung from Henry's paſſion for Ann Bullen. He fancied by that, to give a mortal wound to the reformation, and cauſe the world to think, that a ſuperſtructure raiſed on ſuch a foundation, could not be the work of God. The lord Herbert, in his Hiſtory of Henry VIII, contents himſelf with a bare recital of the events of this reign, whereof the divorce is one of the principal, without many reaſonings, leaving his readers to make inferences from the facts he relates. Doctor Burnet intending to write the Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, made it his chief aim, in ſpeaking of Henry's divorce, to ſhew, that tho' it occaſioned the reformation, it was only by accident. For this reaſon, he has endeavoured to refute the palpable falſhoods aſſerted by Sanders, in his Hiſtory. He has ſucceeded ſo well, that no ſincere man can, for the future, acknowledge Sanders for a writer worthy of credit.

The ſequel of my Hiſtory obliges me to ſpeak, in my turn, of this famous divorce. I ſhould be inclined to refer the reader to the forementioned excellent Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, known to all the world, and to which it is difficult to make any additions; but it would not be reaſonable to oblige the readers, to remember what they have read in that Hiſtory, or to peruſe it again. Wherefore I ſhall chuſe, in purſuing the thread of my Hiſtory, to relate this event, which is as the hinge whereon do turn numberleſs other things, which that illuſtrious author had occaſion only to mention, but which I muſt more fully explain, becauſe our ends are different.

1527. ferent. His view, in ſpeaking of Henry VIII's affairs with the pope, the emperor, and the king of France, was to illuſtrate the Hiſtory of the Reformation, and mine is, not to meddle with the affairs of religion any farther, than they relate to the other events of this reign.

Henry reſolves to divorce queen Catharine. Stow. Hall. Herbert.

Henry had been married 18 years, to Catharine of Arragon, and by her had three children, whereof one was living, when he formed the deſign of putting her away. He alledged, as the principal reaſon, his ſcruples for marrying his brother's widow; but, as it is pretended, theſe ſcruples troubled him not, till he was in love with Ann Bullen, one of the queen's maids of honour, it is inferred, that his doubts concerning the validity of his marriage, ſprung from this new paſſion, and without that, would never have exiſted. Accordingly, ſome labour to ſhew his divorce had no other foundation, than his love for that lady. Others again endeavour to prove, that his love and his ſcruples, were independent of each other. For my part, I ſhould think it needleſs to accuſe or juſtify Henry, with regard to the concerns of religion, if there was not ſome neceſſity to illuſtrate this matter with reſpect to the Hiſtory. By illuſtrating, I mean, ſhewing the impoſſibility of giving a certain judgment about it; but, before all things, it is neceſſary to deſcribe the perſon, who, as it is pretended, was the prime cauſe of the king's divorce, and of all the conſequences thereof.

An account of Ann Bullen. Herbert.

Ann Bullen was of a good, tho' not a noble family. Sir Thomas Bullen, her father, married a ſiſter of the duke of Norfolk, and by her had Ann, born, according to Cambden, in 1507, about two years before Henry VIII's acceſſion to the throne. Thomas Bullen, her father, was twice ambaſſador to France, firſt, in 1515, and again, in 1527. He was was made viſcount Rochford in 1525, and, afterwards, earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond. Ann, his daughter, being but ſeven years old, was carried into France, in 1514, when Mary, the king's ſiſter, went and conſummated her marriage, at Abbeville, with Lewis XII. That queen being re-married ſoon after to the duke of Suffolk, and returning into England, Ann Bullen was left in France. It is pretended, ſhe then entered in the ſervice of Francis I's queen, tho' ſhe was but eight years of age; but it is ſaid in what quallity. It is certain, a girl of her age, was not capable of doing much ſervice. So it may be preſumed, her beauty, genteelneſs, or the livelineſs of her wit, made queen Clande deſirous to keep her about her. Cambden affirms, ſhe retained her in her ſervice, to the day of her death, which happened in July, 1524, and ſays not that Ann ever took a journey into England all that time; but Du Tillet, and Du Pleix, French authors, pretend, ſhe came over in 1522. The lord Herbert ſays the ſame thing, but, without citing any particular author, contents himſelf with ſaying, it appears in Hiſtory. Cambden affirms, Ann remained in France, not only till queen Claude's death, but that, after ſhe had loſt her miſtreſs, ſhe was taken into ſervice, by the ducheſs of Alenſon, Francis's ſiſter; however, he does not ſay when ſhe quitted it. Others ſay, Sir Thomas Bullen brought his daughter to England, when he returned from his ambaſſy. His ambaſſy of 1515, can't here be meant, ſince it is unanimouſly agreed, that Ann was in queen Claude's ſervice, after queen Mary's departure, and continued ſeveral years, in the court of France. It muſt, therefore, be his ambaſſy of 1527. But it is likely, Bullen was not ſent to France, till September, 1527, ſince his ſole commiſſion was to ſee the treaty of the 30th of April, of the ſame year, ſworn to, which Francis had not ratified ſooner than the 18th of Auguſt, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. But as, before his departure, the affair of the divorce was already commenced, it may be affirmed, the king's love for his daughter was later than his reſolution concerning the divorce, if it be true, that Ann returned to England, with her father, about the end of the year 1527. Indeed, it may be objected, that two French authors aſſert, that Ann went over to England, in 1522, and, that it was then the king fell in love with her. But it may be replied firſt, that it is very ſtrange, theſe two hiſtorians, who wrote long after the fact, ſhould meet with memoirs of the journey of a maid of honour, and the more, as they cite nothing to ſupport their teſtimony. Secondly, ſuppoſing it were ſo, they do not ſay Ann ſtayed in England. Conſequently, they deſtroy not Cambden's teſtimony, who affirms, Ann ſerved queen Claude, till 1524, and afterwards the ducheſs of Alenſon. But, if it be true, that Ann took a journey into England, in 1522, and the king then fell in love with her, it cannot be ſuppoſed ſhe returned to France, becauſe the rupture between the two crowns happening that year, it is not likely, that in time of war, an Engliſh woman ſhould go and ſerve a queen of France; beſides, if the king was then in love, he would have ſuffered Ann to depart the kingdom? Cambden, therefore, or the two French authors, muſt have been miſtaken. This is a difficulty not eaſily to be ſolved.

Cambden. Burnet.

But there is a fact, which paſſes for certain, viz. that Ann Bullen being 20 years old, was taken into queen Catharine's ſervice, as maid of honour. Now this muſt have been, in 1527, ſince ſhe was born in 1507. Accordingly, this is the time to which the beginning of the king's love may moſt properly be fixed. But ſtill this is only conjecture, which were it well grounded, would be a ſufficient proof, that, the king's divorce was not an effect of his paſſion, ſince it was reſolved before the end of the year 1526. My view in this inquiry, is to ſhew, that the time of Ann Bullen's return into England, is very uncertain, and the beginning of the king's affection no leſs ſo. How then can it be ſo boldly affirmed, as it is by ſome, that love for Ann Bullen inſpired the king, with the thoughts of annulling his marriage with Catharine? We muſt now ſee, whether whether it be easier to discover the time when Henry resolved to sue for his divorce.

1527.

At what time Henry resolved to sue for his divorce. Burnet.

When Henry VII. concluded his son's marriage, with Catharine, prince Arthur's widow, archbishop Warham told him plainly, it was contrary to the law of God, which the pope could not dispence with. The king, without doubt, was touched with this remonstrance; for, the very day, the prince, his son, entered into his fourteenth year, he caused him to make against his marriage, a secret protestation, tho' before trusty witnesses, declaring, he was constrained to give his consent. After that, the king on his death-bed, strictly charged the prince not to consummate his marriage with Catharine. Notwithstanding all this, Henry VIII, being come to the crown, espoused the princess, contrary to Warham's opinion, to which he preferred the bishop of Winchester's. He had by her three children, two sons and a daughter, of whom, the sons died soon after their birth. He afterwards affirmed, that he considered the untimely death of his two sons, as God's curse on his marriage, especially, when he saw the queen had done breeding. It happened, afterwards, that Charles V, who was affianced to the princess Mary, refused to marry her, upon the council of Spain's questioning the princess's legitimacy. After that, when a marriage was treating between Mary and king Francis, or the duke of Orleans, the bishop of Tarbe, the French ambassador, made the same objection, maintaining, that the princess could not be deemed born in wedlock, notwithstanding Julius II's dispensation.

All these things were more than sufficient, to raise scruples in the king's mind, concerning his marriage; but tho', in an assembly of lords, which he afterwards called, to inform them of his reasons for a divorce, he affirmed, the bishop of Tarbe's objection inspired him with the first thoughts of inquiring into the matter, it appears however, that his scruples began sooner; for, in a letter, afterwards, to Grinæus, he told him, he had abstained from the queen, ever since the year 1524.

But supposing it could be discovered, at what time Henry began, either of himself, or by the suggestion of others, to be troubled with these scruples, it would signify nothing with respect to his resolution, concerning the divorce, which, in all appearance, was taken much later. Polydore Virgil says, Longland, bishop of Lincoln, the king's confessor, laboured to persuade him of the necessity of the divorce, by cardinal Wolsey's order, but mentions not the time. All the historians affirm, the king had recourse himself, to Thomas Aquinas's works, to clear his doubts, and caused the bishops to be consulted upon that head; but none of them say, at what time this was done. It is well known, secretary Knight was dispatched to Rome about this affair, in July, 1527, but then the rumour of the king's meditating a divorce, had already reached the court of Spain, as appears in the cardinal's letter to the king, from Abbeville. It is also very probable, that before he engaged in this affair, Henry had considered of it some time before; for, it is scarce to be supposed, a resolution of this nature, can be taken lightly, or when taken, immediately, executed, without thoroughly weighing the difficulties, or waiting a favourable juncture. Henry said himself, that the bishop of Tarbe bred the thought of annulling his marriage; but if it be true, as some affirm, that the bishop spoke only as directed by cardinal Wolsey, it may be presumed, the project of the divorce was formed some time before, and this ambassador made to speak only, to have an excuse to commence the affair. This is what seems to me, extremely probable. Indeed it is not likely the ambassador, after, thus, questioning Mary's legitimacy, would have concluded the marriage of the king, his master, or of the duke of Orleans, with that princess, had he not acted in concert with the court of England. These then are my thoughts, which I submit to the reader's judgment.

A conjecture upon this subject.

Ever since Francis was freed from his captivity, he had never ceased to press Henry to join with him, in an offensive league against the emperor; but Henry had constantly excused himself, without even suffering him to entertain the least hopes, in that respect. However, lord Herbert affirms, that about the end of the year 1526, Henry, of his own accord, sent an ambassador to France, to propose this league, so eagerly desired by Francis, and to offer him his daughter Mary, in marriage. This proceeding, gives occasion to believe, he had now resolved upon the divorce, and foreseeing how much the emperor would oppose it, intended so to embarrass him, as to oblige him to court his friendship. Upon this supposition, it may naturally be conjectured, that he proposed the marriage of his daughter, with the king of France, only to convince the emperor, that he really designed to be strictly united with France; but, at the same time, it is very likely, he informed Francis of the obstacle, which would occur in the execution of this pretended project, viz. the divorce of the princess's mother, which he was meditating. This conjecture, is confirmed by the coldness wherewith these two monarchs treated of the marriage. In the first place, Henry left it to the king of France's choice, to have Mary himself, or to leave her to his second son, as if this alternative were the same thing. In the next place, when Francis declared he would leave Mary to the duke of Orleans, the treating more fully concerning the marriage, was deferred to another time. In the third place, in the treaty, Francis and the cardinal concluded at Abbeville, they took care to insert this clause; "That tho' the "marriage should not be effected, the treaty, "however, should subsist." In fine, tho' Knight was now at Rome, or on his way thither, when the treaty of Abbeville, was concluded, it does not appear Francis ever complained to Henry, that he had offered him a princess, whom he was labouring to bastardise, in prosecuting his divorce with the queen, her mother. On the contrary, he assisted him to the 1527. the utmoſt of his power to obtain his deſires; but he muſt have looked upon the offer, as an affront, had they not underſtood one another. If this conjecture has any foundation, it may be inferred, that the reſolution concerning the divorce, was taken, at leaſt, about the end of the year 1526, tho' the execution was deferred till the middle of the next year; but, in that caſe, it would, therefore, be true, that the king had reſolved upon the divorce, before his paſſion for Ann Bullen, who, in all appearance, returned not into England ſooner, than October, 1527.

From what has been ſaid, it may be gathered, that to affirm, with any probability, that Henry's paſſion for Ann Bullen, was the cauſe of his divorce with Catharine, theſe queries muſt be decided, in favour of that opinion. At what time did Ann Bullen return into England? When did the king's love for her firſt begin? When was it, that he came to a reſolution, concerning his divorce? But upon all theſe queſtions, conjectures only, as I have obſerved, can properly be formed. Thus much is certain, that between the reſolution about the divorce, and the beginning of the king's love, was no great diſtance of time. There we muſt ſtop. But it is going too far, to ground upon this nearneſs, as a certain fact, that Henry undertook the proſecution of his divorce, with Catharine, on purpoſe to marry Ann Bullen. I ſay, moreover, that tho' there was no difficulty about the times, and they exactly correſponded, yet as to what paſſed in the king's breaſt, it would be only conjecture.

I have enlarged a little, on this point, becauſe the illuſtrious author of the Hiſtory of the Reformation, ſeems to leave it ſomething in the dark; beſides, I thought it requiſite to curb the over-confident, by informing the readers of what is true, and what doubtful in the matter. We ſee it in many Hiſtories, and hear it, every day, poſitively affirmed, as if there was no difficulty, that Henry's love for Ann Bullen, was the ſole cauſe of his divorce with Catharine of Arragon, tho', as I have ſhewn, it can only be ſaid by conjecture, and the conjecture itſelf, does not countenance that notion. Not that Henry VIII. is to be conſidered, as a prince incapable of being miſled by his paſſion, even to the ſacrificing Catharine of Arragon to Ann Bullen. Why ſhould he have been more ſcrupulous with reſpect to Catharine, than he was with regard to Ann herſelf, whom he made no difficulty to ſacrifice to a third wife, as will hereafter be ſeen. He was a prince of an impetuous temper, who could bear no oppoſition to his will; for, the flatteries of his ſubjects, and the extravagant praiſes, continually beſtowed on him, by the ſovereigns, who ſtood in need of him, had poſſeſſed him with ſuch a conceipt of his own merit, that he imagined his actions ought to have been the ſtandard of good ſenſe, reaſon, and juſtice. Therefore, when it is ſaid, his love for Ann Bullen cauſed him eagerly to puſh the affair of his divorce, of which otherwiſe the difficulties would, perhaps, have diſcouraged him, nothing is affirmed repugnant to his character; only care muſt be taken, not to aſſert for an undoubted truth, what is but a bare conjecture. 1527.

Motives of the divorce alledged by Henry. Burnet.

Be this as it will, without dwelling longer upon the king's ſecret motives, and endeavouring to diſcover his thoughts, which lie hid from human eyes, let us content our ſelves with what he publiſhed himſelf. In the firſt place, he ſaid, he was troubled in conſcience for his marriage with Catharine, and, indeed, he had but too much reaſon. The wonder is, that he had not theſe ſcruples more early. He had married his brother's widow, and found it forbidden by the law of Moſes. It is true, he had the pope's diſpenſation; but he could not be ignorant, that many learned divines were of opinion, that the pope could not diſpenſe with the laws of God. This was ſufficient to give him very juſt ſcruples. As ſoon as theſe doubts had poſſeſſed him, he was willing to clear them, and found in Thomas Aquinas what he had, perhaps, inattentively read many times; firſt, that the Levitical laws are moral and eternal; ſecondly, that the pope cannot diſpenſe with the laws of God, becauſe, to diſpence with a law, one muſt be ſuperior, or equal, to the law-giver. This deciſion of a divine, for whom he had a great eſteem, confirming his ſcruples, he deſired archbiſhop Warham, who had formerly declared againſt the marriage, to conſult the biſhops of England upon this occaſion. Some ſay, that Longland, his confeſſor, cheriſhed his doubts, by the private orders of cardinal Wolſey, which is not improbable. The queen was aunt to the emperor, with whom Wolſey had reaſon to be diſpleaſed; beſides, the favourite loved not the queen herſelf, becauſe ſhe could not help ſhewing, how much ſhe was offended, that a biſhop, a cardinal, a legate of the holy ſee, ſhould lead ſo ſcandalous a life. However this be, ſoon after the archbiſhop preſented to the king, a writing, under the hands and ſeals of all the biſhops, wherein they condemned his marriage, as contrary to common decency, and the law of God. Only Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, refuſing to ſet his hand, it is ſaid, the archbiſhop made another write his name, unknown to him. But the biſhops were not the only perſons of this opinion; for, ſince Luther's works began to appear, many people in England were put out of their former high conceipt of the papal power. As, therefore, the validity of the king's marriage, was wholly founded on Julius II's diſpenſation, it was publickly diſputed, whether the diſpenſation could authoriſe a marriage ſo notoriouſly repugnant to the law of God; nay, many who were otherwiſe ſtrongly attached to the court of Rome, could not reliſh the doctrine of the pope's diſpenſing with the divine laws. All theſe things conſpired, either to breed or confirm the king's ſcruples.

Reaſons of ſtate alledged by the king. Burnet.

But it was not only ſcruples of conſcience that Henry alledged to juſtify his deſign; for he pretended, that tho' he were regardleſs of his 1527. his ſalvation, or able to overcome his ſcruples, the good of his people required the prevention of an inconvenience, which was eaſily to be foreſeen. He had but one daughter, and very likely ſhould have no more children, if his marriage were not annulled; therefore, if, after his deceaſe, the validity of his marriage with Catharine, ſhould come to be queſtioned, he foreſaw England would again be involved, on account of the ſucceſſion, in troubles, from whence ſhe was but juſt freed. Mary, his daughter, the king of Scotland, his nephew, the queen dowager of France, could equally pretend to the crown, upon very plauſible reaſons. Mary could alledge the pope's diſpenſation, againſt ſuch as ſhould charge her, with her being born of an unlawful marriage; the king of Scotland, who was next heir after her, could maintain, the diſpenſation was not valid; and the queen dowager, the king's ſiſter, could alledge, that the firſt was illegitimate, and the ſecond, a foreigner. Theſe ſeveral claims might eaſily kindle a civil war in England, where it was but too viſible, that each would find adherents, not to mention the foreign ſuccours they might be ſupported with. Henry, therefore, imagined, there was but one way to prevent this danger, viz. by annulling his marriage, and taking another wife, by whom, with God's bleſſing, he might have ſons. He to whom the ſecrets of all hearts are open, can only know for certain, whether this thought was inſtilled into him by the danger he foreſaw, by his averſion to the queen, or by his love for Ann Bullen. But, however this may be, independently of the ſeveral motives aſcribed to him, it is certain, there was great danger of the kingdom's being one day expoſed to a civil war, if the king remained till death, in his preſent ſtate, and he ſaw no other way to come out of it, than by annulling his marriage. It is true, he foreſaw great oppoſition from the emperor, the queen's nephew, who was then very powerful; but, on the other hand, as that monarch had himſelf ſhewn, on this occaſion, ſcruples, which hindered him from eſpouſing Mary, Henry hoped, he would not obſtinately maintain what he had himſelf queſtioned. Beſides, the juncture ſeemed very favourable for his purpoſe; for the pope, who was priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo, ſeemed to have no other reſſource, to be reſtored to his former ſtate, than the aſſiſtance of France and England, and Henry did not queſtion, that Francis, who ſtood in need of him, would promote his proceedings, to the utmoſt of his power. As to the reſt, he never doubted the pope's authority, reckoning, that Clement VII. could revoke a diſpenſation, granted by Julius II; nay, cardinal Wolſey warranted the ſucceſs of the affair, whether he had already gained the pope, or imaginad, that Clement, in his preſent circumſtances, could deny the king nothing. So, it was reſolved the ſuit ſhould be moved in the court of Rome, to cauſe the marriage to be annulled.

The beſt reaſon that could be alledged, was, that Julius's diſpenſation was contrary to the divine law, and that alone ought to have been ſufficient; but it would have been imprudent to begin with diſputing the prerogative of the Roman pontiffs, when a favour was to be asked of the court of Rome. Recourſe, therefore, was to be had, to another expedient, which was, to find nullities in Julius's bull, and ſhew, it was procured by falſe ſurmiſes, and untrue ſuggeſtions, which rendered the bull revocable, even according to the rules of the court of the Rota. This was not very difficult; for the bull was grounded upon Henry's and Catharine's requeſt, ſetting forth, that their marriage was neceſſary to preſerve peace between England and Spain. Here were found two reaſons for revoking the bull. The firſt, that Henry being then but 12 years old, could not be deemed to have any political views, whence it was inferred, that the requeſt was not his own. The ſecond, that the ſuggeſtion was falſe, ſince, as matters then ſtood between Spain and England, the marriage was not at all neceſſary, for the preſervation of peace between the two crowns, and conſequently Julius II, had been ſurpriſed. Another nullity was found, as the bull having no other foundation than the maintenance of peace and union between Henry VII, and the king and queen of Spain, this reaſon ceaſed, when the marriage was conſummated, ſince Henry VII. and Iſabella were now dead. In fine, it was alledged, that Henry VIII, having proteſted againſt his marriage, before conſummation, thereby renounced the liberty granted him by the bull, and, therefore, another bull was neceſſary to render the marriage valid. But all theſe reaſons were produced only, to afford the pope a pretence to revoke Julius's diſpenſation; for, if the contrariety of the diſpenſation to the divine law, was not the real foundation of ſuing for the divorce, nothing would have been more eaſy for the pope, than to quiet the king's conſcience, by confirming whatever had been done, by a new bull.

1527. Reaſons to be laid before the pope. Burnet.

In the interim, as the pope's compliance was not doubted, in his preſent circumſtances, the king ſent doctor Knight, ſecretary of ſtate, to Rome, to deſire him to ſign four inſtruments, drawn in England. The firſt was, a commiſſion to cardinal Wolſey, to try and decide the affair with ſome Engliſh biſhops. The ſecond was a bull decretal, declaring the king's marriage with Catharine void, becauſe Arthur's, with the ſame princeſs, was conſummated. By the third, the pope granted the king a diſpenſation to marry another wife. By the fourth, he promiſed never to repeal any of the three foregoing acts.

Knight is ſent to Rome about the divorce. Burnet.

Knight departed from England, in July, about the time the cardinal began his journey to confer with the king of France. But as the pope was priſoner, and guarded by a Spaniſh captain, it was impoſſible for Knight to have an audience. However, he found means to convey to him a memorial, containing the ſum of his commiſſion, to which the pope returned a favourable anſwer. He made believe, he would grant whatever the king deſired, tho' the 1527. the emperor had already required him, by the general of the Franciſcans, not to do any thing in that affair, without communicating it to his miniſters. By the way, this ſhews, Henry had reſolved long before to ſue for his divorce, ſince the emperor had time to hear of it, and ſend to the pope. As it was not practicable for Knight to treat with the pope, in perſon, the matter was carried no farther, at that time. At length, the news of the pope's going to be releaſed, reaching England, cardinal Wolſey wrote to Sir Gregory Caſſali, the king's ordinary ambaſſador, at Rome, to order him to join with Knight, and preſs the pope to grant the king's requeſt. This letter was worded, in very ſtrong terms, and ſhewed the cardinal's deſire, that the divorce ſhould be effected. It was dated the 5th of December, 1527, the cardinal not yet knowing, that the pope had made his eſcape, the 9th of the ſame month.

Knight and Caſſali talk with the pope. Burnet.

Clement VII, being retired to Orvieto, Knight went and talked with him about the affair. The pope owned, he had received his memorial, and promiſed again to do all that lay in his power, for the king's ſatisfaction, but prayed him not to be too haſty. His circumſtances then were ſuch, that he did not yet know, whether he ſhould want the king of England, or whether the emperor would agree with him; wherefore, he deſired to gain time, in order to proceed as ſhould beſt ſuit with his intereſt. But for that reaſon, and becauſe the king's orders were urgent and poſitive, Knight would not delay his negotiation. He earneſtly preſſed the pope, who promiſed, at laſt, to ſign the acts, on condition no uſe ſhould be made of them, till the Germans and Spaniards were departed out of Italy. Knight willingly accepted of the condition, imagining, when the inſtruments, ready ſigned, were in the king's hands, he would uſe them when he pleaſed. But the pope was not eaſily to be deceived; for whilſt he feigned to have no other view than to ſatisfy the king, he was only contriving to gain time, being ready to ſacrifice him, if he found it for his advantage. He uſed, therefore, all his art, to prolong the affair, by means unſuſpected by the king. To this end, he told Knight, that before the inſtruments were executed, he ſhould be glad to talk with the cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor.

He promiſes to do what the king deſires.

But he finds means to delay the performance of his promiſes. Burnet.

The pope having, thus, engaged, Knight and Caſſali fancied they had no more to do, than to prepoſſeſs in the king's favour, the cardinal, whom the pope intended to conſult. They were at no great pains to ſucced, ſince, beſides 10,000 ducats which they had in hand, to reward ſuch as ſhould do them ſervice, they were empowered to make what farther promiſes, they ſhould think fit, in the king's name. The cardinal examining the inſtruments ſent from England, found very great faults, particularly in the legate's commiſſion, and took upon him to draw one more perfect; Which done, Knight and Caſſali waited on the pope, and preſſed him to ſign. He did not abſolutely refuſe, but ſaid, the emperor having required him not to act in that buſineſs, without imparting it to him, it was neceſſary to find ſome expedient, to excuſe ſo haſty a proceeding; that, therefore, it would be proper to cauſe Lautrec to march towards Orvieto, and preſs him, in his maſter's name, to give the king of England ſatisfaction. Lautrec being then at Bologna, to get him to march to Orvieto, there would have been occaſion for orders from the court of France, which would have taken up much time. Wherefore Henry's agents rejected the expedient, their view being to finiſh the affair before the emperor had notice thereof. At laſt, the pope, finding himſelf extremely preſſed, delivered to them the commiſſion for cardinal Wolſey, with the bull of diſpenſation for the king, and promiſed to ſend into England the bull decretal, to null the marriage. But here the pope uſed an artifice, which the agents, perhaps, did not ſufficiently conſider; for he dated theſe two inſtruments, from the time he was priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo. So, when the king had them in his power, he did not think fit to make uſe of them, leſt it ſhould be objected, that the pope had granted them only with deſign to obtain his liberty, by the aſſiſtance he expected from England; beſides, all acts executed by a priſoner, may be deemed void, whereof the treaty of Madrid was a late inſtance. Thus, how urgent ſoever the king was to end the affair, he found, at the cloſe of the year 1527, that he had yet made no progreſs. 1527.

1528. The pope reſolves to keep fair with the emperor.

Clement VII, had time, during his captivity, ſeriouſly to reflect upon his paſt conduct, which had been very unſucceſsful, becauſe he had ſwerved from the maxims of his moſt able predeceſſors. He had prepoſterouſly engaged in a war with the emperor, whereas Alexander VI, Julius II, and Leo X, after ſowing diſſention among the princes, left them, for the moſt part, to decide their quarrels, and then ſided with the ſtrongeſt, or if they engaged in a war, it was commonly at other people's expence. But for once, Clement VII, after draining his treaſure in maintaing an army, had loſt Florence, Parma, Reggio, Rome itſelf, with the beſt part of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and ſeen himſelf captive and ranſomed. This was ſufficient to make him wiſer, and take another courſe. As ſoon as the ambaſſadors of France, England, and Venice, ſaw him ſecure, at Orvieto, from the outrages of the Imperialiſts, they preſſed him to declare againſt the emperor. They thought, if he could not aſſiſt the league with temporal arms, he might at leaſt, by means of his ſpiritual, embroil the common enemy, whom he ſeemed to have no reaſon to regard. But he himſelf conſidered this affair in a different light; for having learned, by ſad experience, that he had been the dupe of his allies, he reſolved to be no longer guided by their intereſted counſels. So, without diſcovering his thoughts, he only told them, that his joining in the league, would only draw upon him freſh miſchiefs, without procuring them any advantage; that beſides, it was neceſſary, for the benefit of Chriſtendom, there ſhould be a mediator to labour to procure peace, and that was all he could do,

in

1528. in the ſtate he was reduced to. Nevertheleſs, he intimated to them, that he might take other meaſures, if Lautrec appaoached to oblige the emperor's troops to abandon Rome. This, indeed, was his ſole view, to free the eccleſiaſtical ſtate from that foreign army, in order to be able to act moſt agreeably to his intereſt.

Lautrec marches towards Naples. Guicciard. Hall.

At laſt, Lautrec departing from Bologna, the 9th of January, took the road to Naples, having firſt ſent the prince of Vaudemont and la Trimouille to the pope, to preſs him to declare. But Clement found means to excuſe himſelf, without, however, a poſitive denial; for he ſaw, as I may ſay, all Europe in motion, and was willing to wait the ſucceſs of the war, in order to take juſter meaſures than before. So, it was not poſſible, by any means, to bring him to a declaration. He only made believe, that if Francis and Henry would cauſe Ravenna and Cervia to be reſtored to him, he would join with them. This was an advantage he would willingly have reaped from their inſtances, without being debarred from finding ſome other evaſion, to prevent his declaring after the recovery of theſe two places. In the interim, he was thinking how to treat ſecretly with the emperor, from whom he had greater expectations, than from his allies; for, indeed, his chief view, being to reſtore the houſe of the Medici to the government of Florence, he perceived, that he could not accompliſh it, without the emperor's help, ſince the allies were concerned to ſupport the Florentines, who were become parties in the league. But it would have been imprudent in him to declare for the emperor, when that monarch was weak in Italy, and ſo powerful an army was marching to invade the kingdom of Naples; wherefore, it was neceſſary for him to wait, till the event of the war enabled him to reſolve with ſafety. This was the true reaſon which obliged him to uſe many artifices, to try to diſpleaſe neither the emperor, nor the king of France, nor the king of England. If, inſtead of unadviſedly engaging in a war, he had before taken this courſe, he might have ſold his favours, at any rate; at leaſt, he would not have had the mortification to be a captive in Rome itſelf.

Francis and Henry proclaim war againſt the emperor. Hall. Guicciard.

But tho' the pope refuſed to declare, the kings of France and England were not the leſs eager, in the purſuit of their projects; for, on the 21ſt of January, 1528, their ambaſſadors, in Spain, demanded the emperor's leave to retire, and next day Clarenceux and Guienne, heralds, one of England, the other of France, proclaimed war againſt him. This was done with great ſolemnity, the emperor being ſeated on his throne, and attended by all his grandees. He anſwered each in particular, but in a very different manner. Speaking to the Engliſh herald, he made uſe of civil and honourable terms, denoting, he was not at all pleaſed with having the king, his maſter, for an enemy. He complained, however, that Henry had uſed him ill, in deſigning to give him in marriage a princeſs, whom he propoſed to baſtardiſe, ſince he was ſuing to be divorced from the queen, her mother; but he threw all the blame, on the boundleſs ambition of cardinal Wolſey. He ſaid, the cardinal would have obliged him to employ his arms, in Italy, to make him pope, and thought himſelf injured, becauſe he would not diſturb the peace of Chriſtendom for his ſake. As for the ſums, of which Henry demanded payment, he denied, he had ever refuſed to diſcharge the debt; but added, that the Engliſh ambaſſadors, not having brought with them the original obligations, nor even a power to give him a diſcharge, Henry was in the wrong to complain. As to the indemnity he demanded, he knew the king of France had taken it upon him, in the treaty of Madrid. As for the penalty of 500,000 crowns, in caſe he refuſed to marry the princeſs Mary, he anſwered, it was not his fault; that he had demanded her of the king, her father, by ambaſſadors, ſent on purpoſe, and that Henry had refuſed to ſend her; that, beſides, before that time Henry had offered her to the king of Scotland; in ſhort, that he could not lawfully claim that ſum, before he had proved that he had himſelf performed all the articles of the treaty of Windſor. Such was the emperor's reply to the declaration of war, made by Henry's herald. In his anſwer to the French herald, he ſpoke not with ſo much regard and caution; for he plainly accuſed Francis of breach of faith, and charged the herald to put him in mind of the meſſage he ſent him, by the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, his ambaſſador, "That it would be better for them to "decide their quarrel by ſingle combat;" but that he had not received any anſwer; probably, the ambaſſador had not thought fit to deliver that meſſage to the king, ſince he ſeemed extremely ſurpriſed, when he heard it from the herald's mouth. In a few days, he ſent the ſame herald to the emperor, with a challenge under his own hand, wherein he gave him the lie in form, and required him to aſſure him the field, to fight hand to hand. The challenge was dated March 28, 1528. The emperor ſent his anſwer, by one of his heralds, who was charged to tell him, by word of mouth, very diſagreeable things. The herald coming to Paris, could not obtain leave, without great difficulty, to put on his coat of arms, when he entered the city. The king expected him on his throne, ſurrounded with a great number of princes and lords; but he had ſcarce began to ſpeak, before the king interrupted him, and demanded, whether he had brought the ſecurity of the field. The herald deſired leave to proceed with what he had to ſay from the emperor; the king refuſed to hear him, ſaying, he had required only the ſecurity of the field, and that all the reſt was to no purpoſe. Thus, ended this affair, which had now made great noiſe. The two monarchs gave publick marks of their courage, by their mutual challenges, and yet there was no great labour required to prevent them from deciding their quarrel in a way, ſo uncommon to great princes.

Hugo de Mendoſa, the emperor's ambaſſador, at London, hearing what had paſſed in Spain, 1528. Spain, would have retired; but cardinal Wolſey ſent him word, that Clarenceux had exceeded his inſtructions, in proclaiming war againſt the emperor, and ſhould be puniſhed at his return; whereupon the ambaſſador ſent an expreſs, to inform the emperor of what the cardinal had ſaid. Clarenceux, who was ſtill in Spain, ſurpriſed that he ſhould be made accountable for what he had expreſs orders, demanded, and obtained an authentick copy of the ambaſſador's letter. Upon his arrival, in England, he waited on the king, before he ſpoke with the cardinal, and ſhewed him the letter, with three others, wrote with the cardinal's own hand, whereby he gave him expreſs orders to declare war againſt the emperor. Henry, aſtoniſhed at his miniſter's preſumption, fell into a great paſſion with him, before the whole court; nay, he would, perhaps, have entirely diſgraced him, had he not been with-held by the conſideration of the affair of the divorce, where he could not proceed without him. He made him, however, undergo a terrible mortification, by cauſing this affair to be examined in the council. This inquiry would, doubtleſs, have been fatal to the miniſter, if the king had been pleaſed to purſue it; but he was contented with the cardinal's proteſtation, that he thought to have acted agreeably to his majeſty's intentions.

Bold act of Wolſey, which drew on him the king's anger. Herbert. Hall.

The cardinal aſſembles the great men, and tries to juſtify the war againſt the emperor. Hall.

The emperor's anſwer to Clarenceux, being made publick, in England, by the Spaniſh ambaſſador's means, the cardinal was afraid it would cauſe ill effects among the people, conſidering the weakneſs of the motives alledged by the king, for undertaking the war. For this reaſon he aſſembled, in the ſtar-chamber, all the great lords, then at court, to whom he made a ſpeech, aggravating, as much as poſſible, the injuries, the king had received from the emperor, and his reaſons to demand ſatisfaction, by arms. But let him ſay what he would, tho' every one outwardly applauded him, what the emperor ſaid to the herald, that the war was cauſed only by the cardinal's private diſcontent, made deeper impreſſion, than all the arguments the miniſter could alledge. The people openly exclaimed againſt a war, which was going to ruin the kingdom, to gratify the favourite's paſſion; nay, ſome went farther than murmurs; for, as the trade with the Low-Countries was interrupted, by the declaration of war, and the merchants would buy no more cloth which they could not vend, the clothiers riſe in arms. Whereupon the cardinal ordered the merchants to buy the cloths as uſual, threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to buy them himſelf, and ſell them to the foreigners. But they made a jeſt of this threat, and continued obſtinate, reſolving not to render themſelves liable to inevitable loſſes, for his ſake. An ambaſſy from the governeſs of the Low-Countries to the king, whilſt theſe things were in agitation, freed the cardinal from his embarraſſment. The ambaſſadors acquainting him, that if the king pleaſed to conſent to a truce, with the Low-Countries, for the mutual benefit of trade, the governeſs would readily agree to it; this overture being debated in council, it was reſolved, notwithſtanding the French ambaſſador's oppoſition, to agree to a truce for eight months, which was ſigned the 8th of June. 1528.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the affairs of Italy were in ſuch a ſituation, as gave Francis room to expect Lautrec's expedition, in the kingdom of Naples, would be crowned with ſucceſs, tho', afterwards, it ended very unfortunately for him. Lautrec going from Bologna, the 9th of January, arrived the 10th of February, on the borders of Naples, and marching into Abruzzo, became maſter of that province, and, afterwards, of part of Apulia. It was not without extreme difficulty, that the prince of Orange obliged the Imperialiſts to quit Rome, where, for 10 months, they had exerciſed all ſorts of rapine and violence. Tho' the imperial army went not from Rome, till the 17th of February, they got before Lautrec, who had taken a longer way, in order to procure money, which he wanted exceedingly, the king of France, according to cuſtom, not having ſent him what he had promiſed. The Imperialiſts being poſted at Troya, he offered them battle; but as they thought proper to retire to Naples, purſued his march, and arrived in the beginning of May, before that capital, which he beſieged in form, purſuant to his orders. Sixteen French gallies, commanded by Andrea Doria, eight more under the conduct of Philippino Doria, his nephew, with 22 from Venice, were to block up Naples, by ſea, whilſt Lautrec, with 30,000 men beſieged the city by land, but when he opened the ſiege he had only Philippino's eight gallies. Thoſe of Venice came very late, and Andrea Doria, who was diſpleaſed with Francis, and had thoughts of entering into the emperor's ſervice, detained the 16 gallies, at Genoa, under divers pretences. In the interim, a ſea-fight between Philippino and the Imperialiſts, wherein Moncada was ſlain, and the marquiſs del Vaſto taken priſoner, made Lautrec hope he ſhould reduce Naples, by famine, tho' himſelf wanted all things in his camp; and his hopes were increaſed, by the arrival of the 22 Venetian gallies, which joined thoſe of Philippino. The buſineſs now, was, to ſee who could bear famine longeſt, the beſiegers or the beſieged, who were equally in want of proviſions; but the French had, beſides ſcarcity, a very great diſadvantage, as the plague made terrible ravage among them, and continually diminiſhed their number. At length, Andrea Doria having agreed with the emperor, recalled his nephew Philippino, with his eight gallies. Soon after, the Venetian gallies being obliged to go upon the coaſt of Calabria, to provide themſelves with biskets, the beſieged took that opportunity to convey into the city abundance of proviſions, whilſt Lautrec remained in a very bad condition, without victuals or money, and with an army grievouſly afflicted with the plague. Moſt of his general officers were dead, or ſick, and to compleat the misfortune, he was himſelf ſeiſed with 1528. with the peſtilence, which carried him off the 16th of Auguſt. The marqueſs of Saluzzo, who took upon him the command of the ruined army, reſolving, at laſt, to raiſe the ſiege, with great difficulty retired to Averſa, where he was, immediately, beſieged, and, in few days, forced to capitulate, ſurrendering himſelf, with all the principal officers of his army, into the hands of the Imperialiſts. Thus, the fine army Lautrec had led before Naples, was entirely diſperſed. Moreover, France had lately loſt Genoa, taken by Andrea Doria, in the emperor's name, after which, according to his agreement with that monarch, he reſtored his country to liberty, and eſtabliſhed a government, which ſtill ſubſiſts to this day. Thus, the affairs of Italy, which in the beginning of the year had ſo promiſing an aſpect for Francis, were ſo entirely altered, that he had ſcarce any thing left in that country.

Continuation of the divorce. Burnet.

The knowledge of what paſſed, in Italy, this campaign, will be of no little ſervice to diſcover the motives of the pope's conduct, in the affair of the divorce. Henry deemed the affair ended, when he heard the pope had left it to cardinal Wolſey's deciſion; but when, after much difficulty, he had obtained this commiſſion for the cardinal, with a bull decretal, declaring the marriage void, and a diſpenſation to marry again, he found, however, there was yet nothing done. The commiſſion was dated from the caſtle of St. Angelo, whilſt the pope was a priſoner, which rendered it entirely null, and conſequently there was a neceſſity of renewing it; and the decretal had no clauſe to hinder the pope from revoking it, if he pleaſed. In fine, the diſpenſation was only conditional, in caſe the king's marriage with Catharine ſhould be declared void; beſides, there were certain reſtrictions inſerted, leaving the pope at liberty to repeal it. For inſtance, he granted the diſpenſation, "as far as might be without "offending God. Notwithſtanding any pro"hibitions of the divine law, or other conſti"tutions and ordinances whatever, to the "contrary, as far as the authority apoſtolical "reached*." Henry was not a little concerned to ſee, that he could not uſe theſe bulls, without being liable to be moleſted. Nevertheleſs, in the belief, that all this was owing to inadvertency, he ordered Sir Gregory Caſſali, his ambaſſador, at Rome, to demand bulls leſs liable to diſpute. Caſſali ſpoke of it frequently to the pope, but could obtain no poſitive anſwer; only the pope finding himſelf preſſed, told him, as a ſecret, that he adviſed the king to proceed, and get his marriage annulled, by vertue of the commiſſion given the legate, but with as little noiſe as poſſible, and marry the woman deſired. He grounded this advice upon its being much eaſier to confirm a thing when done, than to permit him to do it. He charged Caſſali, however, not to let the king know, this ſuggeſtion came from him. Henry looked upon this advice, as a ſnare laid for him by the pope; for he conſidered, that it was not poſſible to have ſuch a cauſe tried without noiſe, ſince it was neceſſary the queen ſhould be heard, otherwiſe the ſentence would be evidently void. In the next place, had he done what he was adviſed to, he would have been entirely at the pope's mercy, who, according to the opinion of the canoniſts, might have refuſed to confirm the legate's ſentence, as well as the conſequent marriage. So, the affair being taken into conſideration, it was thought more proper to apply directly to the pope, for new bulls. According to this reſolution, the king ſent Stephen Gardiner, cardinal Wolſey's ſecretary, and Edward Fox, to manage the affair. Their inſtructions were to demand for the cardinal, a new commiſſion, appointing him judge of the cauſe, with powers to null the king's marriage, if he thought proper, and yet to declare his daughter legitimate; to preſs the pope to give him a promiſe under his hand, not to revoke the legate's commiſſion; to demand a bull decretal to null the king's marriage, and a diſpenſation to eſpouſe another wife, without any reſtriction. In ſhort, the envoys had orders to acquaint the pope, that the divorce was not adviſed by the cardinal, and to diſplay the extraordinary merit of the lady the king intended to eſpouſe. This was Ann Bullen, as may eaſily be gueſſed, ſince the king no longer concealed his love for her. It was very proper to tell the pope, that the cardinal was not author of the counſel, which had induced the king to ſue for a divorce, ſince he was required for a judge; and yet the letters he ſent by Gardiner and Fox, and which are in the Hiſtory of the Reformation, clearly ſhew, he was infinitely deſirous the thing ſhould ſucceed. Finally, it appears that the king was ſtill willing to have ſome condeſcenſion for the queen and the emperor, her nephew, ſince he required, that the legate ſhould have powers to declare Mary legitimate. Perhaps too, this was an effect of the love he had for her.

The pope's artful management. Herbert.

When Gardiner and Fox came to Orvieto, Lautrec was marching to Naples; but his progreſs was yet ſo inconſiderable, that it was difficult to judge of the ſucceſs of his undertaking, eſpecially, as the Imperialiſts were now departed from Rome, in order to oppoſe his paſſage; nay, it was likely, there would be a battle, and as the event was doubtful, the pope took care not to incur the emperor's reſentment, in caſe his arms were victorious. So, to gain time, he ſent the king a letter, in cypher, as if he meant to acquaint him with a ſecret, and yet it was not poſſible to diſcover his intention. This letter not being very welcome, the envoys had orders to inſiſt upon their demands, but, at that time, the face of affairs was ſomething changed; for Lautrec had now made conqueſts, in the kingdom of Naples, and the prince of Orange, unable to ſtop his march, was retired to the metropolis, which, probably, was going to be inveſted. It would, therefore, have been ve-

1528. ry imprudent to diſoblige Henry, when the king of France, his ally, was upon the point of becoming very powerful, in Italy. So, Clement being greatly embarraſſed, in ſo nice a juncture, had recourſe to his uſual artifices, to try to gain time. He feigned to deſire nothing ſo ardently, as to ſatisfy Henry, tho' he was reſolved, in his own mind, to do nothing effectual in his favour. His view was, to become maſter of the affair of the divorce, and prolong it, till the events of the war ſhould determine him, to content either the emperor or the king. The intereſt of his houſe required, that he ſhould manage the emperor, becauſe it was by his means that he hoped to reſtore the Medici's to Florence; and that of his ſee was no leſs important. Henry demanded, that he ſhould revoke a diſpenſation granted by a pope, his predeceſſor, upon the ſuppoſition, that this pope had not power to grant it, that is, properly ſpeaking, that he ſhould declare the Roman pontifs had, hitherto, aſſumed a prerogative which belonged not to them. This was a very difficult ſtep to be taken, at a time when great part of Germany had thrown off the pope's dominion, and nothing was every where heard, but complaints and murmurs againſt the exorbitant power they had uſurped. So, Clement's real deſign was, to amuſe the king with hopes, he would conſent to his divorce, till it was in his power to oppoſe it with ſafety. There is no occaſion to look for other myſteries in the pope's conduct, as will more plainly appear in the ſequel. As for the arguments and authorities alledged on both ſides, with reſpect to the main point in queſtion, from the holy ſcriptures, the fathers, and the canons, they were only ſo many amuſements, which were extremely ſubſervient to the pope's deſigns, but made little or no impreſſion upon him.

The pope gives Wolſey a new commiſſion. Act. Pub. Burnet. Herbert.

Clement VII, being in this diſpoſition, ſcrupled not, outwardly, to grant the king whatever he required; for on the 13th of April, 1528, he ſigned a bull, appointing cardinal Wolſey, judge of the cauſe, jointly with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or any other Engliſh prelate he ſhould think fit to chuſe, and gave him as ample powers as the king deſired. But, beſides the above mentioned inconveniencies in the decretal and diſpenſation, the king's council found two in cardinal Wolſey's new commiſſion. The firſt was, that there was no clauſe to hinder the pope, from revoking it. The ſecond, that to appoint for ſole judge of the cauſe, a cardinal devoted to the king, and actually his prime miniſter, would be a manifeſt nullity. Theſe conſiderations obliged the king to deſire the pope, that he would join another legate with cardinal Wolſey, and poſitively promiſe not to revoke the commiſſion. As, when this was demanded, Lautrec was now before Naples, and it was not doubted, he would become maſter of the city, as well as of all the reſt of the kingdom, the pope granted whatever was deſired. He appointed, therefore, by a bull, dated at Orvieto, the 6th of June, Thomas Wolſey, cardinal of York, and Lorenzo Campegio, cardinal biſhop of Salisbury, for his legates a latere, giving them the ſame powers he had granted to Wolſey alone, appointing them his vicegerents in the affair of the divorce, and committing to them his whole authority. He gave, likewiſe, the 13th of July, the promiſe under his hand, deſired by the king. In a word, he delivered to Campegio a decretal, nulling the king's marriage, expreſſed in the very terms, which had as it were been dictated to him. It ſeemed Henry could deſire nothing more; but all the artifices of the court of Rome were not yet known, in England; for the pope only intended to gain time, in order to ſee the iſſue of the Naples expediton. To that end, he always placed ſome interval between his favours to the king; for Wolſey was made ſole judge in the affair of the divorce, the 13th of April; Campegio was, in a conſiſtory, declared his aſſociate, about the end of the ſame month; but the bull was not drawn till the 6th of June; and his promiſe not to revoke the commiſſion, was not ſigned before the 23d of July. In all appearance, the decretal was not drawn, till Auguſt, nor did Campegio begin his journey, till after Lautrec's death, or, perhaps, after the raiſing the ſiege of Naples; that is, when the pope was no longer in dread of France, and it was more neceſſary than ever to manage the emperor. So, it may almoſt be affirmed, that when Campegio departed from Rome, the pope was reſolved not to grant the divorce. However, it was requiſite, he ſhould ſtill ſeem willing to ſatisfy Henry, in order not to be delivered to the emperor's mercy, with whom he was determined to agree, and nothing was more capable to procure him advantageous terms, than his ſeeming union with France and England. This was moſt certainly, the ſecret of the pope's policy, and the real motive of all his artifices in this affair. In purſuance, therefore, of the reſolution he had taken, he gave the following inſtructions to his legate. Firſt, to prolong the affair as much as poſſible. Secondly, not to give ſentence upon the divorce before the reception of his commands, in writing. Thirdly, he expreſly enjoined him not to ſhew the bull to any perſon but the king and cardinal Wolſey, nor to part with it out of his hands, without his order, upon any pretence whatever.

Another commiſſion for Wolſey and Campegio. Act. Pub.

Inſtructions to Campegio.

Campegio departing with theſe inſtructions, arrived not in England, till October, ſix or ſeven months after he was appointed legate. Whilſt he was on the road, the emperor's miniſters, at Rome, raiſed a freſh obſtacle to the divorce, by the pretended diſcovery of a brief of Julius II, confirming the bull of diſpenſation for Henry's marriage with Catharine. But there was this difference between the bull and the brief, that the pope in the bull ſaid, "the "marriage was, perhaps, conſummated;" whereas in the brief the word "perhaps" was omitted. They inferred from thence, that Julius II. was not ſurpriſed, ſince he looked upon Catharine's firſt marriage, as conſummated. But this brief, of which they only gave an authentick copy, without ſhewing the original to the king's 1528. king's miniſters, was, probably, propoſed ſolely to cauſe time to be loſt in examining it; for, there were two reaſons, among many others, which manifeſtly proved it to be a forgery. The firſt was, that this brief granted, at Catharine's requeſt, ſuppoſed that princeſs's marriage with Arthur, to have been conſummated, and yet ſhe had ſworn the contrary; and upon that, her agents had grounded the validity of Julius's diſpenſation. The ſecond reaſon was ſtill more ſtrong, viz. that the brief was dated the 26th of December, 1503. Now, as in the date of the briefs, the court of Rome begins the year, the 25th of December, being Chriſtmaſs-day, this date anſwered to the 26th of December, 1502, of the common year, that is, 10 months before Julius II. was pope.

Proofs of its being a forgery.

Campegio being arrived in England, began his legateſhip, with gravely exhorting the king to live in good underſtanding with the queen, and deſiſt from a farther proſecution of this matter. This was taken very ill from a legate, who was thought to be ſent into England, to judge the cauſe in favour of the king. After that, he talked the quite contrary to the queen, endeavouring to perſuade her, that ſhe ought to comply with the king's deſire, and even intimated, it would be in vain to oppoſe it. But whether the queen was told beforehand what ſhe was to ſay, or naturally ſpoke her own thoughts, ſhe anſwered, ſhe was the king's wife, and would be ſo, till parted from him by the pope's ſentence. Campegio not being able to prevail with the king or queen, affirmed, he could not proceed without freſh orders, as if his whole commiſſion was only to make theſe exhortations. But it was ſix months before his inſtructions arrived. In the interim, he kept the king in hopes of obtaining his deſires, and even inſinuated, that he was himſelf ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe. To amuſe him the better, he ſhewed him the bull he had brought with him, and gave the cardinal, his collegue, a ſight of it alſo; but when he was preſſed to ſhew it to ſome lords of the conncil, he anſwered, he had very poſitive orders to let no perſon ſee it, but the king and Wolſey. Henry ſurpriſed and angry at ſuch a proceeding, complained of it to the pope, who, inſtead of blaming his legate, replied, he had done very well to follow his orders; that the decretal was granted on condition, it was ſhewn to none but the king and cardinal Wolſey, and on purpoſe to prevent Wolſey's ruin, which otherwiſe, he was told, would be infallible; that in fine, the bull was not to be publiſhed, unleſs the legates gave ſentence for the king.

Campegio exhorts Henry to keep Catharine, Burnet.

and Catharine to deſiſt from her marriage. Herbert.

Whilſt Campegio amuſed Henry, in England, the pope was taking meaſures to conclude his treaty with the emperor, and ſeeking pretences to leave the kings of France and England, whom he no longer feared, ſince the Naples expedition had miſcarried; for he complained, that theſe two monarchs had diſappointed him, in not cauſing Ravenna and Cervia to be reſtored to him according to their promiſe; thereby inſinuating, that it was not to be thought ſtrange, he made no haſte to ſatisfy Henry, ſince that prince had neglected to do him juſtice, by the Venetians. He would feign have had it believed, that the affair of the divorce was retarded ſolely on that account, and was very deſirous to have theſe two places, in his power, before he concluded with the emperor; but, what caution ſoever he uſed, his negotiation in Spain, could not be ſo private, but Francis and Henry had ſome intelligence of it. They complained to him by their ambaſſadors, but he conſtantly denied he intended to depart from his neutrality. In the interim, under colour of removing theſe groundleſs ſuſpicions, he diſpatched into England, one Campana, to give the king freſh aſſurances of hisgood intentions, but withal, ſent by him expreſs orders to cardinal Campegio, to burn the bull decretal, and defer the ſentence of the divorce as long as poſſible. Campegio, immediately, obeyed the firſt of theſe orders, and as for the ſecond, never ceaſed finding freſh pretences to retard the proceedings.

The pope reſolves to agree with the emperor. Guicciard.

At laſt, Henry tired to ſee ſo many affected delays, and perceiving they came from the pope, ſent, about the end of the year, Sir Francis Brian and Peter Vannes, to Rome, to diſcover the true cauſe. They had likewiſe ſeveral other commiſſions, firſt, to ſearch the pope's records for the pretended brief of Julius II. Secondly, to propoſe, as of themſelves, ſeveral expedients, ſpeedily, to end the affair of the divorce, and to conſult, under feigned names, the canoniſts of Rome, whether they were practicable. Thirdly, in caſe they ſaw the pope over-awed by the emperor's menaces, they had orders to offer him a guard of 2000 men. Laſtly, if this had no effect, they were to balance the emperor's threats, with others from the king. They found the pope in a real or pretended fright, at the emperor's miniſters menaces to have him depoſed for a baſtard. His reply, therefore, to the offer of the 2000 men for a guard, was, that it would not be capable of ſecuring him, but rather render him more ſuſpected. He took care not to put himſelf in the king's power, when he was thinking to break entirely with him. The two envoys ſeeing, the pope leaned to the emperor's ſide, plainly told him, at laſt, "That if he "continued to deny the king, their maſter, the "ſatisfaction he demanded, he might be aſſured England would be loſt to him. That the "Engliſh were already but too much diſpoſed "to withdraw their obedience from the holy "ſee, and upon the leaſt encouragement from "the king, would openly publiſh what they "yet kept concealed, in their hearts; that the "king, their maſter, and the king of France, "were powerful and very ſtrictly united, and, "therefore, the pope would run a great riſque, "if he ſhould cauſeleſly make theſe two monarchs his enemies; that tho' the Naples expedition had miſcarried, he could not be ſure "it would be the ſame with thoſe that ſhould "be hereafter undertaken; nay, it was eaſy to "ſee, by the dangerous ſtate of the emperor's "affairs, what might happen another time. "That, if out of exceſſive condeſcenſion for Vannes and Brian ſent to Rome.

1528. "the emperor, he dealt ſo unjuſtly by the "king of England, as to refuſe him what even "equity and the law of God required, he "muſt likewiſe expect no favour or regard, "when affairs ſhould be altered; that he "ought to conſider, the king of England had "engaged in this war to free him from capti-"vity, and if, inſtead of making a greatful "return, he ſhould join with his enemy, all "Chriſtians would abhor his ingratitude." All this was not capable to divert the pope from his deſign, and yet he would be thought unreſolved; for he anſwered, with a ſigh, that he was between the hammer and the anvil, and, which way ſoever he turned, ſaw nothing before him but dangers; and, therefore, he placed all his hopes in the protection of God, who would not forſake his church; that, as to the reſt, he had done for the king of England more than could be reaſonably expected, in committing the tryal of his cauſe to two legates, who were both devoted to him; that not content with this, he ſtill preſſed him to do more, and to diſregard the cuſtomary rules of the church on the like occaſions, and publickly ſacrifice to him, the emperor, the archduke, his brother, queen Catharine, the honour, dignity, and intereſt of the holy ſee; that this was asking too much, and the king ſhould, at leaſt, ſuffer the affair to be decided by the legates, appointed for that purpoſe; that it was not his fault, if matters were delayed, and in caſe it was owing to Campegio's negligence, he had acted contrary to his orders. This reply, was a plain indication of the pope's thoughts. Accordingly, the envoys told the king, nothing was to be expected from the pope, and that the only way was to cauſe the legates to give a ſpeedy ſentence. The truth is, the pope was now reſolved to agree with the emperor; and if he ſhewed any farther regard for Henry, it was only to avoid an open rupture with him, for fear the emperor ſhould take advantage of it, in the treaty they were concluding.

Expedients propoſed by the king. Burnet.

The expedients Brian and Vannes were commiſſioned to propoſe, were, 1. Whether, if the queen vowed religion, the king ſhould have liberty to marry again? 2. Or, if the king ſhould vow religion as well as the queen, whether the pope would diſpence with his vow, and allow him to take another wife, whilſt the queen was alive? 3. Or, whether the pope would grant him a diſpenſation to have two wives? But it does not appear how theſe points were decided. As for the brief produced by the imperial miniſters, there was not the leaſt trace of any ſuch thing among the pope's records, of which the Engliſh envoys had good certificates. In this manner paſſed the whole year 1528, at the cloſe whereof, the king found himſelf no more advanced than at the beginning, except, that he had ſtill ſome hope from Campegio, who all along, pretended to be entirely in his intereſt. It may be affirmed, that Francis, in neglecting to aſſiſt Lautrec, was the cauſe of the turn which the affair of the divorce took, ſince he thereby gave occaſion to the pope, to join with the emperor.

Whilſt the king was thinking of his divorce, cardinal Wolſey was very diligently employed in founding his colleges. As the pope made the king very uneaſy by his delays, he endeavoured to gratify him otherwiſe, in granting his favourite, whatever he deſired for his foundations. Among the Publick Acts of the year 1528, there are 10 or 12 bulls, as well for the ſuppreſſion of ſeveral ſmall monaſteries, as for other things concerning the two colleges, the endowment whereof the cardinal ſo paſſionately deſired. Wherefore, knowing how fair an opportunity preſented to obtain private favours from the pope, he forgot not to improve it. Had he ſtayed a year longer, he would have run great riſque of leaving the work unfiniſhed. 1528.

Several monaſteries ſuppreſſed for Wolſey's colleges. Act. Pub.

I have for ſome time been ſilent concerning the affairs of Sotland, becauſe there has been no occaſion to ſpeak of them; but as their ſituation was changed during the courſe of this year, it is neceſſary, briefly, to relate what had paſſed in that country. The earl of Angus, George Douglaſs, his brother, and their uncle Archibald, had ſtill the king's perſon in their power, and governed in his name. Queen Margaret, however, who had cauſed her marriage with the earl of Angus to be annulled, and was married again to Henry Stewart, had ſtill a powerful party in Scotland; but as her party could not act openly, without being liable to be deemed rebels, ſince the king was in the hands of the Douglaſſes, the queen made uſe of another expedient to accompliſh her deſigns. She perſuaded the king, her ſon, by ſome perſons about him, to make his eſcape, and retire to Sterling. The contrivance ſucceeded according to her wiſh; for James took his opportunity, and eſcaping from the earl of Angus, withdrew to Sterling, where it was publiſhed that the Douglaſſes ſhould be no longer acknowledged for regents, and withal, were forbidden the court. This order was notified to the earl of Angus, whilſt he was marching to recover the king's perſon. As he had but few troops, and was unable to enter Sterling by force, where ſeveral great men were come to the king's relief, he obeyed, and retired.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Soon after, the king called a parliament, at Edinburgh, the 3d of September, and came himſelf to hold it. The Douglaſſes, perceiving what was preparing againſt them, attempted to ſurpriſe Edinburgh, and become maſters of the king's perſon, with deſign to diſſolve the parliament; but being repulſed, they were forced to retire. Whereupon the parliament confiſcated their eſtates to the king; but they continued in arms, and made incurſions, even to the gates of Edinburgh.

A truce for five years between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

Henry being informed of what paſſed in Scotland, and fearing the young king might ſuffer himſelf to be prejudiced againſt him, thought it adviſeable to ſend ambaſſadors to make peace, ſince a war with Scotland could not but be very inconvenient, in his preſent circumſtances. But it was not poſſible to ſucceed; for a truce only for five years, was concluded at Berwick, and ſigned the 14th of December. It was agreed, by a ſeparate article, that the Douglaſſes might take refuge, in England, 1528. on condition they delivered to their ſovereign, the places they held in Scotland, and, in caſe they entered the kingdom, and committed any diſorders, Henry ſhould be reſponſible, as if done by his own ſubjects.

1529. How the pope and Francis ſtood affected to the emperor. Guicciard.

Since the pope had detemined to agree with the emperor, his feeding the allies with hopes, was only to obtain the better terms from that monarch. On the other hand, Francis ſuſpecting the pope's intentions, perceived, likewiſe, that a peace only would procure him his ſons, and, therefore, continued a ſecret negotiation with the emperor; but at the ſame time, he made great promiſes to the Venetians, Florentines, duke of Milan, and the pope himſelf, to let the emperor ſee, in caſe he did not make haſte and conclude, it would, perhaps, be too late when he deſired it. About the ſame time, the emperor had certain advice, that the Turks were making great preparations to invade Hungary, and penetrate even into Germany. So, finding that a diverſion in Italy might greatly embarraſs him, at ſuch a juncture, he was the more inclined to peace. Theſe diſpoſitions in the principal parties, could not in the end but produce the peace, which was univerſally expected with impatience. In the interim, the war was continued, tho' faintly, in the kingdom of Naples and the duchy of Milan, where the French and Venetians had kept ſome places; but it was eaſy to ſee that nothing deciſive would happen.

In the interim, the pope was wholly intent upon his own private affairs; for his view was not only to be reſtored to Florence, but alſo to become maſter of Peruſa and Ferrara, and recover Ravenna and Cervia, taken by the Venetians, during his captivity. Under pretence of uſing his intereſt, to procure a general peace, he had ſent a nuncio to Spain, to conclude a private treaty with the emperor. During the negotiation, the affair of the divorce was at a ſtand; for Clement VII, was fully reſolved to ſatisfy the emperor, and by that Henry daily loſt the hopes of ſucceeding in his purſuit. In the interim, a violent diſtemper, which ſeiſed the pope, in the beginning of the year 1529, had like to have very much changed the face of affairs. Cardinal Wolſey having notice of the pope's dangerous illneſs, had ſent an expreſs to Gardiner, to conjure him to neglect nothing that he thought capable of procuring him the papacy. Henry himſelf had wrote to ſeveral cardinals, in his behalf, and the king of France, who was not yet ſecure of a peace, had given him all thoſe of his faction. It is pretended, Wolſey would have been ſure of more than a third of the votes, in caſe the pope had died. Indeed, that was not ſufficient to make him pope; but it was enough to hinder any other from being ſo. This affair was even carried ſo far, that the king had ordered his ambaſſadors, at Rome, that if, notwithſtanding the cardinals of Wolſey's faction, another perſon ſhould be deſigned, they ſhould ſo manage, that theſe cardinals ſhould proteſt againſt the proceedings in the conclave, and then withdrawing to ſome ſecure place, ſhould themſelves come to a new election. 1529. I do not know, whether it would have been eaſy for the ambaſſadors to obtain ſo abſolute a reſignation, to the king's pleaſure. However, it is not ſtrange, that Henry ſhould be ſo very deſirous of procuring the papacy for his miniſter and favourite; but it is ſurpriſing, that a prince who was called Protector of the Church, and Defender of the Faith, ſhould not ſcruple, purpoſely, to endeavour to form a ſchiſm in the church, to gratify his paſſion. As for cardinal Wolſey, nothing in his conduct ought to be thought ſtrange; ſince it is certain, he was ready to ſacrifice every thing to his ambition. The pope's recovery put an end to all theſe cabals, which, however, could not be ſo private, but they came to his knowledge. This made him conſider Wolſey, as a dangerous rival, and capable of ſupplanting him, if an opportunity offered, by uſing for pretence, the defect in his birth.

The pope falls ill. Herbert.

The pope's management to put off the affair of the divorce. Burnet.

When Clement VII, was fully recovered, the proceedings for the divorce, continued upon the ſame foot as before. The pope gave hopes, the affairs ſhould be decided in England, for the king, by a ſentence of the legates, which he would himſelf confirm, to make it more authentick. His view was to gain time, and prevent the appearance of any miſunderſtanding between him and the court of England, before he had concluded his treaty with the emperor, becauſe it was a means to obtain better terms. To this end, and to hinder Henry from being impatient, he had put into Gardiner's hands, a brief, promiſing not to revoke the powers given the legates; but, beſides that the brief was expreſſed in ambiguous terms, he knew ſentence would not be paſſed without his poſitive orders. This management, which the pope continued with many artifices, afforded the king ſome hopes of gaining him to his intereſt. To ſucceed the better, he prevailed with the king of France, to ſend to the pope the biſhop of Bayonne, with orders, earneſtly, to ſollicit the deciſion of the affair. He could have wiſhed, that the pope of his own accord would have granted a bull to annul his marriage, and diſpenſe with his taking another wife, or, at leaſt, have given the legates ſuch a commiſſion, as it ſhould not be in their choice to judge otherwiſe, than in his favour. The pope, pleaſed at his being ſo intent upon his own projects, ſtill fed him with hopes of ſucceſs; but withal, he expreſſed great fear of what the emperor might do againſt him, and uſed that pretence to delay the favour, he ſeemed too intent to grant; in every thing elſe, he was always ready to content the king; for the biſhoprick of Wincheſter being vacant, by the death of Richard Fox, and Henry deſiring him to beſtow it on Wolſey, the bulls for that purpoſe were, immediately, diſpatched. It is true, they were rated at 15000 ducats; but Wolſey would give but 6000, alledging, he did not want them, ſince the king had already granted him the temporalities of the biſhoprick. This ſhews, in what ſpirit, he, thus, heaped upon him the church preferments. But herein, is nothing

1529. nothing ſurpriſing, ſince the pope himſelf made no ſcruple to own, in his bull, that he conferred this biſhoprick on the cardinal, to help him to bear the expence, to which he was obliged, by his rank.

The pope's pretence to delay the divorce. Burnet.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the emperor, haſtened, as much as poſſible, the concluſion of his treaty, with the pope, being reſolved to grant whatever he required, rather than give him occaſion to join with his enemies. Before the pope was aſſured of this agreement, policy required, he ſhould keep the emperor in fear, that the affair of the divorce would be determined to Henry's ſatisfaction; and, conſequently, it was his intereſt that the affair ſhould remain undecided, to let the emperor ſee, it depended on the ſucceſs of the negotiation, at Barcelona; but when he had juſt brought him to his own terms, he began inſenſibly to ſeek pretences to break his engagements with Henry. So, the reſtitution of Ravenna and Cervia was again moved, the pope feigned to believe, that if Henry had deſired it, he ſhould have had theſe two cities before now, and from thence took occaſion to be diſpleaſed. On the other hand, the emperor knowing the pope's intention, proteſted, in queen Catharine's name, againſt whatever ſhould be done in England, in the affair of the divorce, declaring, that ſhe excepted againſt the two legates, as one was notoriouſly devoted to the king, and the other, biſhop of Salisbury. The king's miniſters uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the pope to reject the proteſtation; but he anſwered, he could not, without ſhewing himſelf too partial to the king, ſince a proteſtation was no prejudice to the cauſe itſelf; that it would be a very ſtrange thing to refuſe a queen, the right of proteſting, which the meaneſt perſon could claim. All this added to many other circumſtances, and to certain advices, that the pope was treating with the emperor, took from the Engliſh miniſters, all hopes of prevailing with him; wherefore, they wrote to the king, that they were only amuſed, and if the proceſs was not ſpeedily decided in England, there was danger of its being brought to Rome. Whereupon, the king reſolved to proceed before the legates, and not ſuffer himſelf to be any longer amuſed by deceitful promiſes. In the interim, when the inſtrument whereby the pope had promiſed not to revoke the legates commiſſion, came to be examined, it was found to be worded in general or ambiguous terms, which left him at liberty to do what he pleaſed. So, to know whether he had acted with ſincerity when he ſigned that inſtrument, Gardiner was ordered to repreſent to him, that the paper, on which it was written, being wet by the careleſſneſs of the courier, and the words almoſt quite defaced, the king deſired he would ſign another; but Clement found ſome artifice to be excuſed. Wherefore, Henry, being ſatisfied there was nothing to be expected from the court of Rome, where the emperor's intereſt was too great, recalled Gardiner and Brian, and ſent Bennet to Rome, only to hinder, as much as lay in his power, the avocation of his cauſe. Bennet carried a letter from the two legates, directed to the pope and cardinals, wherein they ſaid, that the principal point in the cauſe they were to judge, conſiſted in knowing whether Julius's II. could grant a diſpenſation, or exceeded his power; that, ſince the ſole point was to decide concerning their authority of the head of the church, they conceived it to be beyond their commiſſion, and, therefore, were of opinion, the pope would do well to avocate the cauſe; that they doubted not, the king would conſent to it, provided he had ſome aſſurance it ſhould be decided, in his favour. It is hard to conceive what could induce cardinal Wolſey to ſign ſuch a letter, ſo directly contrary to the king's intereſt; for, tho' the legates ſeemed to ſuppoſe his conſent, it was evident, the reaſon of the avocation ſubſiſted, whether the king conſented or not; and, conſequently, they afforded the pope a plauſible pretence to avocate the cauſe, which the king dreaded of all things. Was Wolſey deceived by Campegio, or did he ſacrifice his maſter's intereſt? It is difficult to believe either; and yet hiſtorians affirm, that one of the principal cauſes of his diſgrace, was a letter he had wrote to the pope, which came to the king's knowledge by Bennet's means, and it might very well be this. Indeed, he was inexcuſable, if he ſigned it without the king's approbation; and on the other hand, it cannot be conceived that the king ſhould be ſo blind, as not to ſee the conſequence of ſuch advice. 1529.

The legates ſit to hear the cauſe. Hall.

Tho' Campegio came to England, in October, laſt year, it was now the end of May, and nothing done towards the tryal of the cauſe, which brought him thither. The king, having ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed, by the pope, whoſe intereſt it was to gain time, had been ever in hopes of obtaining a bull to null the marriage, without being obliged to go thro' the uſual forms of a proceſs; but, at length, his agents convincing him, that his expectations were in vain, he reſolved to proceed before the legates. To this end, on the 31ſt of May, he granted them a licenſe, to execute the pope's commiſſion. They met the ſame day, and appointed aſſiſtants to examine the papers and evidences. From the very firſt ſeſſion, it appeared, that Campegio intended to prolong the proceſs, ſince after the commiſſion was read, he ordered the king and queen to be cited to appear the 18th of June. This was too long a term, if there had been any deſign to diſpatch the affair, eſpecially as the parties were in London itſelf, or in one of their palaces near the city. Tho' Wolſey was the ſenior cardinal, he let Campegio preſide, to ſhew he intended to act without partiality; ſo, from the firſt day to the laſt, Campegio did all, without Wolſey's ever appearing to oppoſe the affected delays of his collegue, between the ſeſſions. I ſhall not enter any farther into the particulars of this famous proceſs, which may be ſeen at large, in the excellent Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, known to all the world, but content myſelf with relating, in general, the moſt remarkable circumſtances.

Henry reſolves to try his cauſe before the legates.

In

1529. In the ſecond ſeſſion, the queen's proctors excepted againſt the two legates; but the exception not being deemed valid, ſhe had a farther day given her, to the 21ſt. On that day, the king and queen appeared in perſon; but the queen, without ſaying any thing to the legates, went and kneeled down before the king, and made a very moving ſpeech, concluding, with imploring his juſtice and pity, after which, ſhe withdrew, and would never more appear, nor ſuffer any perſon to defend her cauſe*. As ſoon as ſhe was retired, the king declared, he was very well pleaſed with the queen, and in ſuing to be divorced from her, acted ſolely from a motive of religion and conſcience; adding, that his ſcruples concerning his marriage, ſprung from thoſe of the biſhop of Tarbe, and were confirmed by the opinion of all the biſhops of England. The archbiſhop of Canterbury confirmed what the king ſaid, concerning the biſhops; but Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, denied, he ever ſet his hand to the writing, which was preſented to the king. In the interim, the queen was cited again for the 25th of June, but inſtead of appearing, ſhe ſent in her appeal to the pope, in form, from whatever had been or ſhould be done hereafter; nevertheleſs, ſhe was declared contumacious. The ſame day, the proceſs was reduced to twelve articles, upon which witneſſes were to be examined. The principal article was, prince Arthur's conſummation of his marriage with Catharine, which the queen had denied with an oath, and which, notwithſtanding, was proved by the teſtimony of ſeveral perſons, as far as a thing of that nature can be. Theſe proofs conſiſted in the age, health, and vigorous conſtitution of the prince, and in his diſcourſes next morning, after the nuptials; ſo that Arthur, or Catharine, muſt not have ſpoken the truth, the one out of vanity, or the other out of intereſt †.

The pope receives news of the concluſion of his treaty with the emperor. Herbert.

Whilſt the tryal was proſecuting in England, the emperor's miniſters were earneſtly preſſing the pope to avocate the cauſe to Rome, and Henry's as vehemently ſolliciting the contrary. What is more, both ſides threatened to depoſe him, on account of his being a baſtard. The pope feigned to be terrified by theſe threats, and this ſeeming fear to declare for either, afforded him a pretence to remain undetermined, till he received advice of the concluſion of his treaty, with the emperor. At length, the agreeable news being come, he reſolved to avocate the cauſe, before the publication of the treaty, leſt it ſhould be thought to be one of the ſecret articles. Weak precaution, to efface or prevent ſuch a ſuſpicion. 1529.

Conditions of the treaty. Guicciard.

The ſubſtance of this treaty, which was ſigned at Barcelona, the 29th of June, was, that the emperor ſhould reſtore the family of the Medici to Florence, on the ſame foot as formerly; that he ſhould cauſe Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to the pope; that he ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Modena and Reggio, ſaving the rights of the empire; that he ſhould aid him to become maſter of Ferrara; that Franceſco Sforza ſhould be reſtored to Milan, if innocent, but if guilty, the emperor ſhould not diſpoſe of the duchy to any prince the pope ſhould diſlike; that the pope and emperor ſhould employ their temporal and ſpiritual arms againſt the hereticks of Germany; that Alexander de Medici ſhould eſpouſe Margaret, the emperor's natural daughter; that the pope ſhould grant the emperor a fourth of the eccleſiaſtical revenues in his dominions, to wage war with the Turks; that he ſhould abſolve all that were any way concerned in the taking and ſacking of Rome. What greater advantages could the pope have expected, ſuppoſing he had been victorious in the late war? But the emperor believed he could not purchaſe the pope's friendſhip too dear, who might ſtill have greatly embarraſſed him, if he had joined with France, England, and the republick of Venice.

The pope avocates the cauſe to Rome.

The pope having concluded his treaty with the emperor, told the Engliſh ambaſſadors himſelf, on the 9th of July, his reſolution to avocate the canſe to Rome. They uſed all poſſible endeavours to diſſuade him from it, repreſenting to him, that the holy ſee was going irrecoverably to loſe England. But it was all to no purpoſe; for, by his late treaty, with the emperor, the family of the Medici was to be reſtored to the government of Florence; which alone was ſufficient to outweigh, in his mind, all the dangers, to which he expoſed the holy ſee; ſo great was his affection for a family, from whence he was deſcended, tho' not born in wedlock. So, the 15th of July, he ſigned the bull of avocation; and the next day, he notified it to Caſſali, the king's ambaſſador, in ordinary, and to Bennet, who had been ſent to him laſt. He alledged, in excuſe of the avocation, ſeveral reaſons which might have been of ſome weight, in the beginning of the proceſs, on ſuppoſition he had been entirely impartial, but which had loſt all their force, after all his pro-

* When the king and queen were called on, the king anſwered, here; but the queen riſing from her ſeat, kneeled down and ſaid to the king, "She was a poor woman, and a ſtranger in his dominions, where ſhe could "expect neither good counſel, nor indifferent judges; ſhe had long been his wife, and deſired to know wherein "ſhe had offended him; ſhe had been his wife 20 years and more, and had born him ſeveral children, and "ever ſtudied to pleaſe him, and proteſted he had found her a true maid, about which ſhe appealed to his own con-"ſcience. If ſhe had done any thing amiſs, ſhe was willing to be put away with ſhame. Their parents were "eſteemed very wiſe princes, and no doubt had good counſellors, and learned men about them, when the match "was agreed; therefore, ſhe would not ſubmit to the court, nor durſt her lawyers, who were his ſubjects, and "aſſigned by him, ſpeak freely for her. So ſhe deſired to be excuſed till ſhe heard from Spain." That ſaid, ſhe roſe up, and making the king a low reverence, went out of court. Her council were the biſhops of Rocheſter and St. Aſaph, and Dr. Ridley. Burnet.

1529. ceedings, and the concluſion of his treaty with the emperor. Three days after, he diſpatched a meſſenger with the bull of avocation into England, where proceedings were very dilatory, by the artifices of cardinal Campegio, who preſided in the affair.

The queen, who was cited for the 25th of June, not appearing that day, ſhe had farther time given her, to the 28th, and was ſummoned again to appear, by the biſhop of Bath and Wells, tho' in vain. On the 28th, ſome depoſitions were read, after which the ſeſſion was adjourned to the 5th of July, when, by reaſon of certain holidays kept at Rome, the ſeſſion was deferred till the 12th. The court met again on the 12th, the 14th, the 17th, the 21ſt, and the 23d; and, as there was nothing more to do but to pronounce the ſentence, every one thought all would be ended this laſt ſeſſion; but people were ſtrangely ſurpriſed, when cardinal Campegio was heard to adjourn the court to the 1ſt of October. He alledged for reaſon, that it was the time of the great vacation at Rome, and he was, indiſpenſably, obliged to comply with that cuſtom.

Continuation of the proceſs. Burnet.

Thus, did that legate, who was in the pope's ſecrets, amuſe the king, in the ſame manner as the pope had amuſed him at Rome, near two years, ever ſince the affair was begun. Henry was as much enraged as ſurpriſed, at the proceedings of the legates, but diſſembled both his ſurpriſe and reſentment. Soon after, he plainly perceived to what all theſe affected delays tended, when he came to know, that notwithſtanding his engagement, the pope had avocated the cauſe. The bull of avocation being arrived, he would not ſuffer it to be notified to him, but intimated to the legates, that he was content they ſhould obey the pope's orders. It was not without reaſon, that he would not have the bull notified to him; for he was cited therein, to appear at Rome, within 40 days, which he could not have done, without acting contrary to the laws of the land, which prohibited to obey ſuch citations, and carry cauſes to a foreign court. Upon this foundation, it was, that he had always inſiſted, that the proceſs ſhould be determined in the kingdom; beſides that, cenſures were denounced againſt him in the bull, as againſt a private perſon, if he obeyed not the citation. Some time after, the pope made him a ſort of reparation, in revoking theſe cenſures by a brief, where he proteſted, they were inſerted contrary to his intention; but as to the citation itſelf, he only prolonged the day to Chriſtmaſs.

Remarks on cardinal Wolſey's behaviour. Herbert.

The figure cardinal Wolſey made, during the pretended judgment of the proceſs, was very extraordinary. Of all mankind he was the proudeſt and moſt haughty; he was ſenior cardinal to his collegue, and yet gave place to him in every thing, and ſuffered him to act as he pleaſed, without ever oppoſing his opinion. If the affair had ſucceeded according to the king's deſire, his conduct would, doubtleſs, have been praiſed; but, as every thing turned againſt the king, it was not poſſible for the cardinal to avoid the ſuſpicion of betraying his maſter's intereſts, or, at leaſt, of ſerving him very ill. Henry himſelf thought ſo, tho' he did not preſently ſhew it. On the other hand, Ann Bullen, who had ever believed the cardinal in her intereſt, was extremely ſurpriſed, when ſhe was informed of what had paſſed. The king had removed her from court, whilſt the legates were employed in the judgment of the proceſs, but ſhe was ſent for the moment the bull of avocation was arrived. It is pretended, ſhe did not a little contribute to confirm the king's ſuſpicions of the cardinal; for ſhe was perſuaded, if Wolſey had pleaſed, the affair would have taken another turn, but that he had altered his reſolution. Whether her opinion was well grounded, or the vexation to ſee herſelf ſtill ſo remote from her hopes, exaſperated her againſt the cardinal, ſhe looked upon him as an enemy deſerving her whole vengeance; ſo, finding the king diſpoſed to give ear to whatever was ſaid againſt his miniſter, ſhe neglected nothing that could help to ruin him; and, in this, ſhe was aſſiſted by ſeveral perſons of the higheſt rank, who had no reaſon to love that proud prelate.

The king is extremely uneaſy. Burnet.

It is eaſy to gueſs Henry's concern, to ſee himſelf, on a ſudden, ſo remote from his views. The pope had joined in league with the emperor, which was properly his party; Francis I, from whom he had expected a powerful aid, in caſe of need, had juſt concluded, at Cambray, a treaty with the emperor, whereby he engaged not to aſſiſt that prince's enemies; and, in a word, queen Catharine remained obſtinate, not to accept any expedient that might debar her from being his wife. On the other hand, Henry's love for Ann Bullen, which he had pleaſed himſelf with the hopes of gratifying, by a lawful marriage, helped not a little to increaſe his concern. He did not know which way to get rid of the queen, who by her obſtinacy, had very much leſſened that eſteem and affection he had always had for. With a mind full of theſe troubleſome thoughts, and uncertain what to determine, he reſolved to take a progreſs into ſome of his counties, to try to diſpel his melancholy.

Dr. Cranmer opens him a way to get over his troubles. Burnet.

During his journey, he lodged one night at Waltham, where Edward Fox and ſecretary Gardiner happened to lie at a gentleman's houſe, who had two ſons comitted to Thomas Cranmer's care. Cranmer was a doctor in divinity, who, having been profeſſor at Cambridge, had loſt his place upon being married. He had travelled into Germany, where he had read Luther's works, and embraced his doctrine, but with more moderation than was uſually ſeen, in the firſt diſciples of that reformer. Whilſt they were at ſupper, Cranmer being at table, with Fox and Gardiner, the converſation ran upon the affair of the divorce, and as the maſter of the houſe had informed the two courtiers of Cranmer's merit and capacity, they deſired him to give his opinion upon that ſubject. Cranmer, at firſt, modeſtly declined it, but they preſſed 1529. him ſo much, that he could not excuſe himſelf. So, after ſtating the queſtion, he ſaid, he ſaw no better way to extricate the king out of his difficulties, than to procure, in writing, the opinions of all the univerſities in Europe, and of the moſt eminent divines and civilians. That one of theſe two things would follow, either the univerſities and the learned would judge Julius II's diſpenſation ſufficient, or deem it invalid. That, in the firſt caſe, the king's conſcience would have reaſon to be eaſy, and in the ſecond, the pope would never venture to paſs ſentence, contrary to the opinion of all the learned and able men, in Chriſtendom. Fox and Gardiner reliſhing this advice, imparted it to the king, who, immediately, taking the author's meaning, cried out, in a tranſport of joy, "That he had got "the right ſow by the ear," an expreſſion, which in its coarſeneſs, ſhewed how much the king was pleaſed with the expedient. At the ſame time he ſent for Cranmer, who explaining more at large, what he had but juſt hinted at table, ſo gained his eſteem, that from that moment he was ordered to follow the court. This is the ſame doctor who will quickly be ſeen to make a conſiderable figure, in England, and lay the firſt foundations of the reformation in that kingdom.

Campegio returns to Rome. Herbert.

The king being returned from his progreſs, cardinal Campegio, whoſe commiſſion was revoked, took his audience of leave, as having no farther buſineſs, in England. Henry had ſo much command of himſelf, as to take no notice of his proceedings, and looked pleaſantly upon him; but juſt as the cardinal was going to embarque, the cuſtom-houſe officers ſearched all his baggage, under colour of looking for contraband goods. Probably, the king hoped to find the decretal bull, which he had ſeen in his hands, not knowing it was burnt. Campegio loudly complained of this inſult, and wrote to the king to demand ſatisfaction, as for an affront done to the legate of the holy ſee. Henry coldly replied, that his cuſtomers had done their duty, in executing orders long ſince eſtabliſhed, with regard to perſons going out of the kingdom; that he was ſurpriſed he ſhould talk of his being legate, when recalled, and much more, that being biſhop of Salisbury, he ſhould be ſo ignorant of the laws of the land, as to dare to aſſume that title, without his licenſe. Campegio perceiving by this anſwer, that the king intended not to give him ſatisfaction, thought himſelf very happy in being ſuffered to depart.

Cardinal Wolſey's fall. Burnet.

The cardinal had good reaſon to wiſh himſelf out of the kingdom; for, with what moderation ſoever the king behaved to him, he could not be ignorant, how angry he was, after ſeeing, ſome days before his departure, the courſe that was taking with his collegue, cardinal Wolſey. The 9th of October, the attorney general had preferred a bill of indictment againſt Wolſey, as guilty of breaking the ſtatute of Præmunire. The 17th of the ſame month, the king ſent and demanded the great ſeal, tho' it was given him for life; for which reaſon, the cardinal made ſome ſcruple to deliver it, but he obeyed a ſecond command, and in a few days the king gave the great ſeal to Sir Thomas More, a perſon univerſally eſteemed for his great integrity. The cardinal had no ſooner delivered the great ſeal, but the attorney general preferred other articles of impeachment againſt him. The king having given him leave to appoint attornies, to anſwer for him, he choſe two, who appeared for him, and proteſted in his name, that he did not know the obtaining of the bulls whereof he was accuſed, was contrary to the laws of the land, and prejudicial to the prerogative royal. As for the particulars wherewith he was charged, they ſaid, he confeſſed them, and caſt himſelf entirely upon the king's mercy. He was accuſed twice, as I ſaid, viz. on the 9th and 18th of October, and both times found guilty, and declared to be out of the protection of the laws. Probably, he was indicted firſt, for obtaining ſeveral bulls without the king's expreſs licenſe, and the ſecond time, for exerciſing, in England, the office of legate a latere, without the king's letters patent to that end, contrary to the intent of the law. 1529.

Inventory of the cardinal's goods. Hollingſh.

As ſoon as the cardinal was out-lawed, the king commanded him to leave York-Place, and retire to a country houſe, belonging to him as biſhop of Wincheſter. Then he ordered an inventory of all his goods to be taken, which contained immenſe riches *, acquired by many acts of injuſtice. It is ſaid, that of fine holland alone, there was found in his houſe, 1000 pieces. One may judge of the reſt by this pattern. Some time after, he cauſed a very humble petition to be preſented to the king, praying a protection for his perſon, without which, he ſaid, he was expoſed to the inſults of the meaneſt enemy that would abuſe him. The king granted it, November the 17th, with a power to anſwer for himſelf, in all actions, that ſhould be entered againſt him, for the future; moreover, he left him the archbiſhoprick of York, and the ſee of Wincheſter. It is difficult to account for the king's behaviour, with reſpect to the cardinal, ſince, at the very time he ſeemed moſt incenſed againſt him, he ſent him a certain ring, which was a token betwixt them, of the continuance of his affection. The cardinal, who was then on the road to his country houſe, near Wincheſter, was ſo tranſported with joy, at the ſight of the ring, that he alighted from his horſe, and fell upon his knees, in the dirt, to receive it. But his hopes were not long-lived; for his enemies, who had the king's ear, took ſo much pains to exaſperate him againſt him, that, at laſt, his affair was brought before the parliament.

Difference between the articles of the houſe, and the attorney general's indictment Hall.

Lord Herbert has inſerted, in his Hiſtory, the 44 articles of impeachment, preſented to the king, againſt the cardinal, by the houſe of lords, which differ much from thoſe preferred by Hales, the attorney general, either in the ſtar-chamber, or elſewhere. Hales had accuſed

* They were valued at 500,000 crowns. Burnet.

1529. accuſed him of breaking the ſtatute of Præmunire, and exerciſing the office of legate a latere, without the king's licenſe. Therein, he proceeded according to the tenor of the ſtatute of Præmunire, which ran, that no perſon ſhould be exempt from the penalty, but thoſe to whom the king ſhould be pleaſed to grant his letters patent. Now, as the cardinal had not taken care to have a licenſe in form, he was liable to the penalty, purſuant to the rigour of the law; but in the articles of the houſe of lords, there was no ſuch thing. And indeed, it would have been contrary to equity, to accuſe the cardinal of exerciſing the authority of legate, without the king's permiſſion, ſince the king was known to conſent to it, tho' not in the manner preſcribed by the law. The attorney general did well, to keep to the letter of the law, according to the duty of his office; but it would have been wrong in the houſe of peers, to take advantage of the want of a formality, to deſtroy one of their body; ſo, the articles exhibited by the lords, ran upon crimes which had no relation to the ſtatute of Præmunire. The cardinal was chiefly accuſed of abuſing his legantine power, contrary to his oath, when admitted to the exerciſe of his legateſhip; of unjuſt proceedings as chancellor; of making himſelf, on ſeveral occaſions, equal to the king *; of iſſuing out divers orders of moment without the king's knowledge; of acting arbitrarily on many occaſions, as if he was rather ſovereign than miniſter. All the reſt of the articles were of the ſame nature, and ran upon the ill uſe he had made of his power, as legate, chancellor, prime miniſter, and favourite. But I cannot paſs over in ſilence, a very extraordinary article, viz. that the cardinal knowing he had the great pox upon him, had the confidence daily to approach the king's perſon, frequently whiſpering in his ear, without fearing to infect him with his breath. Theſe articles being ſent down to the commons, Thomas Cromwell, member of parliament, and the cardinal's ſervant, ſo undertook his defence, as did him great honour, and was one of the principal cauſes of his future advancement. It is true, he pretended not to clear him of the crimes he was charged with, but only to ſhew he was not guilty of treaſon, as the houſe of peers aſſerted, wherein he ſucceeded to his wiſh.

Remarks on the peace of Cambray. Guicciard.

It is neceſſary, now, to ſpeak of the peace of Cambray, which was only mentioned by the way. The differences between Charles V, and Francis I, ſo concerned all Europe, that it was very difficult to underſtand the Hiſtories of the other ſtates, without a clear notion of the affairs of theſe two monarchs. Francis laboured, during the firſt part of the year 1529, to negotiate a peace with the emperor; for after his ill ſucceſs, in the war of Naples, he ſaw there was no other way to recover his two hoſtages. He knew the pope continued a ſecret negotiation, in Spain, and, that it lay in the emperor's power, to make peace with all the ſtates of Italy, by reſtoring Sforza to Milan. So, tho' France and England had made the greateſt efforts, probably, it would have ſerved only to haſten the peace of Italy. But the king of France was not even ſure of prevailing with Henry to act, who was ſtill deſirous to manage the pope and emperor, in hopes of obtaining their conſent to his divorce, rather by fair means than by arms; beſides, tho' he was bound to contribute large ſums for the war, he payed them only in paper, by acquittances of what was due to him from Francis; ſo, properly ſpeaking, this was no aſſiſtance to France, drained by the former wars of men and money. Francis had, therefore, no buſineſs to ſtand in ſuſpence; for it was neceſſary for him to make peace, at any rate. However, to obtain as good terms as poſſible, he amuſed the Venetians, the duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, with great promiſes, for fear they ſhould prevent him, and after they had made their peace with the emperor, his condition became worſe; for he told them, he was reſolved to lead, in perſon, a ſtrong army into Italy. He continued this management, till he had concluded the treaty of Cambray, wherein he left them all to the emperor's mercy. Probably, Henry was the only ally that knew his intentions. The emperor was not ignorant of the ſituation of the French king's affairs, and, doubtleſs, would have made it turn more to his advantage, had not the invaſion, the Turks were preparing againſt Hungary and Auſtria, and the commotions raiſed by the Proteſtants in Germany, made him deſirous to leave Italy in quiet; beſides, he ſaw, that a peace was the only way to break the ſtrict union of France with England. If theſe two monarchs had joined in the league, which the Proteſtants of Germany were projecting, for their common defence, they would have created him troubles, which might have broke all his meaſures. Theſe were the motives that inclined the emperor to peace, which, however, he made France purchaſe very dear. Charles and Francis being in the ſame diſpoſition, agreed together, by ſecret negotiations, upon the chief articles of the peace, the whole honour whereof they were pleaſed, however, to leave, in appearance, to the ladies. In July, Margaret of Auſtria, the emperor's aunt, and governeſs of the Low-Countries, and Loniſa of Savoy, ducheſs of Angouleſme, Francis's mother, repaired to Cambray, and ſigned, the 5th of Auguſt, a treaty, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

Chief articles of the peace of Cambray. Guicciard. Mezerai.

That the emperor ſhould renounce his demand, concerning Burgundy, his right to that duchy remaining, however, entire.

That the king of France ſhould pay him 2,000,000 of crowns of gold de ſoleil, for the ranſom of his ſons, and withdraw all his forces out of Italy.

That he ſhould reſign to him the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois.

That he ſhould reſtore to him the earldom

1529. of Aſti, with whatever he held in the duchy of Milan.

That he ſhould renounce all his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples.

That he ſhould marry queen Leonora, with whom the emperor, her brother, would give in dower, 200,000 crowns.

In ſhort, beſides ſeveral other private articles, he promiſed to reſtore the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon, to all that prince's forfeited eſtates.

Francis deceives his allies.

This treaty being ratified, it was ſome time before Francis durſt give audience to the ambaſſadors of Venice and Florence, becauſe he could not, without confuſion, hear their juſt reproaches; at laſt, he put them off with ſome poor excuſe and freſh promiſes, which he performed no better than thoſe before the peace. What was very ridiculous, even after the peace was concluded, the biſhop of Tarbe, his ambaſſador, at Venice, not having timely notice, ſtrenuouſly ſollicited the ſenate to ſupport the war, upon the hopes he gave them of a powerful aid.

Henry's generoſity to Francis. Herbert.

It was ſomething ſtrange too, that, Henry having proclaimed war with the emperor, by a herald, there ſhould be, however, no particular treaty between them. Henry was ſatisfied with an article inſerted in that of Cambray, whereby the king of France was bound to pay him the 290,000 crowns, due from the emperor, and redeem the rich flower-de-luce, pawned by the emperor Maximilian to Henry VII, for 50,000 crowns. He did more; for he generouſly forgave Francis the firſt ſum, and made a preſent of the ſecond to the duke of Orleans, his god-ſon. This ſhews, that, in making peace, Francis I, had not dealt with Henry as with the princes of Italy, but had convinced him of the neceſſity, he was under, to conclude it.

1530. The emperor goes to Genoa. Guicciard.

The emperor being agreed with Francis, upon the principal articles of the peace, departed from Barcelona before he received advice of the concluſion, and arrived the 12th of Auguſt, at Genoa, with 9000 men. The peace of Cambray being publiſhed ſoon after, the Venetians, duke of Milan, duke of Ferrara, and Florentines, whom the king of France had forſaken, ſaw no other refuge, than the emperor's clemency, who had it in his power to make them pay dear for their attachment to France. The diſcuſſion of their affairs being referred to a conference, which the emperor, was to have with the pope at Bologna, each ſent ambaſſadors to take care of their concerns. Here it was, that the emperor enjoined the Venetians to reſtore to the pope, Ravenna and Cervia, and to himſelf ſome places they ſtill held in the kingdom of Naples. Franceſco Sforza was reſtored to the duchy of Milan, on condition of paying to the emperor 400,000 crowns in hand, and 500,000 in the ſpace of 10 years, at 10 payments. The duke of Ferrara having offered to make the emperor arbiter and judge of his differences, with the pope, his offer was accepted, Clement VII, thinking nothing could be more for his advantage, than to ſubmit to the emperor's deciſion, who was now bound by the treaty of Barcelona, to procure him Modena and Reggio, and aſſiſt him to take poſſeſſion of Ferrara. As to the Florentines, it was not poſſible to reconcile them with the pope. They would not hearken to any agreement, unleſs they were aſſured of preſerving their liberty, being reſolved to defend it to the laſt drop of their blood. They offered, however, to purchaſe it with a ſum of money. But the pope, on his part, tendered them all ſorts of advantages, provided the family of the Medici were reſtored to Florence, upon the ſame foot as before the expulſion of the legate. The parties not agreeing, the emperor ordered the prince of Orange to beſiege Florence, and reſtore the Medici. 1530.

He promiſes to try to ruin the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

The emperor having ended his affairs in Italy, was impatient to return into Germany, where the affairs of religion began to give him diſturbance For ſome time, the Proteſtants had inſiſted, continually, upon a free council in Germany, which was poſitively promiſed, tho' never intended. During the late war, the emperor had all along amuſed them with the hopes of granting this council; but no ſooner was the peace concluded, than in his conference with the pope, at Bologna, he promiſed him to do his utmoſt to reduce them, without a council. In the interim, the Proteſtants knowing his deſign, by his threatening anſwer to their envoys, after the concluſion of the peace, were thinking of joining in a league, for their common defence; and this made the emperor uneaſy, and obliged him ſpeedily to finiſh his affairs, in Italy, in order to ſettle thoſe of Germany. Before his departure from Bologna, he received the imperial crown, at the pope's hands, the 24th of February, 1530, on St. Matthias's day, which was his birth-day, and which, on ſeveral occaſions, had been very fortunate to him. He ſet out, at length, from Bologna, on the 22d of March, 1530, for Germany, being attended by cardinal Campegio, who was to aſſiſt, from the pope, at the diet of Augsburg.

Siege of Florence.

The prince of Orange inveſted Florence, purſuant to the emperor's order, and was ſlain at the ſiege, which the Florentines deſperately maintained; at length, on the 10th of Auguſt, they were forced to capitulate, but, however, on expreſs condition, that they ſhould enjoy their liberty, leaving it to the emperor to ſettle the form of their government. But ſome days after, the adherents of the Medicis raiſing a tumult in the city, and finding themſelves ſupported by a great number of Spaniſh officers, who had entered, on divers pretences, Clement VII. was again put in poſſeſſion of the government. Then the emperor, without regarding the article of the capitulation, eſtabliſhed Alexander de Medici, his ſon-in-law, at Florence, on the ſame foot that his anceſtors had formerly been, and made the ſovereignty hereditary in his family.

Capitulation.

Francis's two ſons are releaſed. Guicciard. Mezerai.

The 1ſt of June, this year, Francis received his two ſons, who were hoſtages in Spain, upon paying the emperor 1,200,000 crowns in hand, and giving ſecurity for the reſt of the ſum;

1530. ſum; after that, he married Leonora, purſuant to the treaty of Cambray. Had he been obliged to find ready money to pay Henry what the emperor owed him, according to the tenor of the treaty, very probably, he would not ſo ſoon have recovered his ſons; but Henry proved a generous friend, who, to enable him to redeem them, freely gave him the emperor's bonds, to reſtore them to him, as well as the pawned jewel above-mentioned. Moreover, he renounced all demands of his charges, in aſſiſting him, which, according to Francis's confeſſion, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, amounted to the ſum of 512,222 crowns of gold ſol, 22 pence, ſix farthings, both in ready money and acquittances upon the 2,000,000 Francis owed him. He clogged this great generoſity but with one ſingle condition, that in caſe Francis violated the peace and alliance they had made together, he ſhould ſtill be accountable for all theſe ſums, to which Francis bound himſelf by letters patents.

By the execution of the treaty of Cambray, the king of France ſaw himſelf, at length, in profound tranquillity, tho' the late war had coſt him immenſe ſums, the loſs of Genoa and Milan, the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois, a year's captivity, numberleſs vexations, and, perhaps, ſomething of his honour and reputation. But it was not ſo with Henry; for after a vaſt charge to ſupport the intereſts of his ally, he was ſtill embarraſſed with the affair of the divorce, and in danger of a ſpeedy quarrel with the emperor. However, as he was naturally ſteady in his projects, all theſe obſtacles were not able to diſcourage him, and he reſolved to ſee the end of the affair, let what would be the conſequence. Thomas Cranmer being then very much in his eſteem, he ordered him to write upon the divorce, and the doctor did it with univerſal approbation; after that, he was commanded to accompany the ambaſſadors, ſent by the king to the pope and emperor, to try, for the laſt time, to find ſome expedient to end this affair, which ſo greatly embarraſſed him. Theſe ambaſſadors found the pope and emperor, at Bologna, and had audience of both. The pope ſhewed an inclination to content the king, but durſt not act without the emperor's conſent, who openly proteſted, he would never forſake the queen his aunt. Cranmer maintained his maſter's cauſe, with great warmth, which hindered not the pope from making him his penitentiary in England, to pleaſe the king, whom he ſtrove to oblige in things of little conſequence, whilſt he did nothing for him in the principal affair.

Henry purſues, at Rome, the buſineſs of the divorce. Herbert.

In the interim, Henry, according to Cranmer's advice, had ſent able and learned men into France, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, to conſult the univerſities concerning the divorce. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the opinions of the univerſities of Angers, Paris, Bourges, Orleans, Thouloufe, Bologna, Ferrara, Padua, all uniform, declaring, that Julius II's diſpenſation for Henry's marriage with Catharine, being contrary to the divine law, could not be deemed valid. It might be objected, that the determinations of the French univerſities were ſuſpicious, by reaſon of the ſtrict union, at that time, between Francis and Henry; but the ſame thing cannot be ſaid of thoſe of Padua and Ferrara, and ſtill leſs of that of Bologna, a city belonging to the pope. Dr. Burnet having largely handled this ſubject, thoſe who have a mind to examine the matter more fully, may conſult his Hiſtory of the Reformation. It will ſuffice to obſerve here, that the queſtion was, whether Henry's marriage with his brother's widow, was contrary to the law of God, and upon that ſuppoſition, whether the pope had power to grant a diſpenſation. The above named univerſities maintained, that ſuch a marriage was contrary to the law of God, with which the pope had not power to diſpenſe. Oxford and Cambridge being likewiſe conſulted, decreed the ſame thing, tho' not without great oppoſition from ſome of the members. It ſeems, at firſt, ſomething ſtrange, that the two Engliſh univerſities ſhould be more ſcrupulous in the matter, than the foreign; but the ſurpriſe ceaſes, when it is conſidered that theſe ſcruples aroſe, not from the queſtion itſelf, but from the conſequence, their determination might occaſion. Moſt of the members of the univerſities were furiouſly averſe to Luther's doctrine, which began to ſpread in England, and were afraid of countenancing it, by deciding againſt the pope; beſides, they ſaw that the king's marriage with Ann Bullen would follow, upon his divorce with Catharine, and this ſecond marriage they would have gladly prevented, becauſe Ann Bullen much inclined to the reformation, and expreſſed a very particular eſteem for Cranmer, whoſe preferment, for the ſame reaſon, they dreaded.

Oxford and Cambridge mane the greateſt ſcruples. Burnet. The reaſon of it. Burnet.

The ambaſſadors, who had been ſent into Italy, returning without effecting any thing, Henry, who till then had ſhewn great regard for the pope, reſolved to alter his behaviour towards him. He might have known, by experience, that Clement was to be gained only by his intereſt. It is certain, if, at firſt, he had proceeded with more vigour, and powerfully ſupported the war in Italy, the pope would never have thought of joining with the emperor. A good Engliſh fleet, in the Mediterranean, would have made Francis maſter of Naples, and ſaved the city of Genoa. The pope would thereby have been ſo kept in awe, that he would have been glad to have always the king of England for his friend. Inſtead of acting in this manner, Henry remained quiet during the whole campaign of 1528, ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed by the deceitful hopes given him, by the pope. So, the French were driven out of the kingdom of Naples, and the pope was at liberty to treat with the emperor, concerning the recovery of Florence, which he would never have thought of, had the French been ſuperior in Italy. Henry perceived his error, when it was too late to repair it, that is, after the pope was united with the emperor, and Francis bound by the treaty of Cambray. He was left alone to ſupport himſelf againſt the emperor and pope, and it was very happy

Moſt of the univerſities decides in favour of the king. Burnet. Act. Pub.

1530. for him, that the Turks and the Proteſtants of Germany ſo embarraſſed the emperor, as to hinder him from thinking of England. So, all means failing to accompliſh his deſign, but, what could be found in his own kingdom, he began, tho' a little too late, to make uſe of the inclinations of his ſubjects, who for the moſt part were not very fond of the pope.

The diſpoſition of the Engliſh to the popes, contrary to the intereſt of their kings.

We have ſeen, in ſeveral places of this Hiſtory, how, at all times, the Engliſh complained of the tyranny of the popes, and the remedies applied by the parliaments to this grievance. It is true, the private intereſt of the kings, rendered theſe remedies, in ſome meaſure, ineffectual, becauſe, as they frequently wanted the popes for their temporal concerns, the laws were not put in due execution. But that altered not the inclinations of the Engliſh; for the principles of the Lollards, were, ſtill, deeply imprinted in the minds of great numbers; beſides, Luther's books, whereof many were brought into England, had opened the eyes of multitudes; ſo that it may be affirmed, at the time I am ſpeaking of, the Engliſh, in general, had quite another notion of religion, than their anceſtors, eſpecially, with reſpect to the papal authority. The three laſt popes, Alexander VI, Julius II, and Leo X, had ſhewn ſo little piety and religion, in their conduct, and Clement VII, ſo cloſely followed their ſteps, that it was naturally inferred, it was impoſſible, Jeſus Chriſt ſhould have given the government of his church to ſuch vicars. Thus, the Engliſh were very ready to ſhake off the pope's yoke, if the king, for the ſake of his own private intereſt, had not ſupported the exorbitant power ſo long complained of. But Clement VII. had no ſooner joined with the emperor, than the king's intereſt became the ſame with the people's. To this chiefly are to be aſcribed all the changes mentioned hereafter.

A letter of the great men to the pope. Act. Pub.

Henry having reſolved to make the pope ſenſible of the danger of loſing England, if he continued any longer to favour the emperor, cauſed a letter, worded in ſtrong terms, to be ſent him by the great men of the kingdom, according to the example of their anceſtors, in the reign of Henry III. They plainly told him, "That the king's cauſe being their own, if "he continued to deny them what was abſo-"lutely neceſſary for their quiet, they were "reſolved to apply the remedy themſelves, "which was vainly expected from him." This was ſufficient to ſatisfy him, that the patience of the Engliſh was almoſt worn out, and they would not ſuffer themſelves to be curbed, or even amuſed any longer, by the court of Rome. Indeed, the letter had not the deſired effect; but, however, it ſhewed the pope the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, and how neceſſary it was to uſe them gently. Wherefore he returned the great men a very moderate anſwer, vindicating his conduct, with regard to the king, in the beſt manner poſſible. In the interim, he ſent for Sir Gregory Caſſali, the king's ambaſſador in ordinary, and hinted to him, that the affair might be adjuſted by means of a diſpenſation, for the king to have two wives.

The pope's anſwer. Herbert.

This we learn from the ambaſſadors' letter of the 18th of September, where, after aquainting the king with what the pope ſaid, he added, that the emperor's miniſters were alſo deſirous that the affair ſhould be ended by this expedient. But Henry was ſo aware of all the pope's artifices, that he took no notice of this overture. His reſolution was, either to have a bull to null the marriage, or to procure himſelf, at any rate, the ſatisfaction he required. And, therefore, fearing that the pope would unexpectedly ſend into England a bull of excommunication or interdict, he iſſued out a proclamation, forbidding, under ſevere penalties, to receive any bull from Rome, contrary to the prerogatives of the crown. His deſign was to bring the affair before the parliament and clergy, and after gaining theſe two bodies to his intereſt, to cauſe it to be determined in England, without regarding the pope's proceedings againſt him; but the difficulty was to prepoſſeſs the people in his favour. To this end, he ordered to be printed and publiſhed, an abſtract of the reaſons for the divorce, that theſe reaſons, being known to all the world, he might meet with leſs oppoſition in the parliament. This abſtract contained two principal points. The firſt was, that the king's marriage with Catharine, was contrary to the law of God. The ſecond, that Julius II, had not power to grant a diſpenſation for that marriage, and, conſequently, the diſpenſation could not render it lawful. As this affair was the ſpring of the great events which will hereafter occur, it will not be, perhaps, unacceptable to the reader, to ſee here the ſubſtance of the arguments alledged on both ſides.

A proclamation to forbid the receiving any bulls, Hall.

Henry publiſhes his reaſons for the divorce. Burnet.

It was ſaid for the king, I. That the Levitical law forbidding a man to marry his brother's wife, was not a poſitive precept, which bound only thoſe to whom it was given, but obliged all mankind without exception. That this evidently appeared, in its being found among many others, which forbid the crimes wherewith the Canaanites were polluted. Now, the Canaanites could not be polluted with crimes, forbidden only by a poſitive law given another nation.

II. Another argument was taken from what John the Baptiſt ſaid to Herod, in the New Teſtament, "It is not lawful for thee to take "thy brother's wife," becauſe St. John could allude only to the laws of Moſes, and conſequently owned them to be divine.

III. It was ſhewn from ſeveral paſſages of Tertullian, and writings of the popes, that the church always deemed the Levitical laws as parts of the univerſal law of nature, and all mankind. To this was added, the authority of divers ſynods, of the provincial Conſtantinopolitan general council, of the council of Conſtance, in the condemnation of Wickliffe, of many Greek and Latin fathers, and of ſeveral ſchoolmen.

IV. It was proved by the authority of the popes and councils, that a marriage is compleated by the mutual contract of the parties, tho' it be never conſummated; for that reaſon it was ſaid, Adonijah could not marry Abiſhag, who 1530. who had been his father David's wife, tho' David never knew her. That upon the ſame account, Joſeph could not put away Mary, without a bill of divorce; a clear evidence that their marriage was compleat, tho' not conſummated. Hence it was inferred, that tho' prince Arthur had not conſummated his marriage, it was not the leſs valid. But it was maintained, that it was as certain as a thing of that nature could be, that the marriage was conſummated. It was proved firſt, by violent preſumptions. Secondly, becauſe after Arthur's death, the princeſs, his widow, was ſuppoſed to be with child, and ſhe never ſaid any thing to the contrary. It is true, it might be objected that Catharine had ſince ſworn, ſhe was never known by that prince. But it was anſwered, the canon law forbids the taking of oaths, when there are ſtrong preſumptions to the contrary; beſides, the queen's oath could not be reckoned deciſive, ſince it was deſtroyed by the brief produced by her own advocates.

V. Julius's diſpenſation, being the ſole foundation on which the validity of the king's marriage was eſtabliſhed, it was ſhewn, by a croud of witneſſes, both antient and modern, "That the pope has not power to diſpenſe "with the laws of God;" nay, it was affirmed, that if he diſpenſed with the decrees of the church, it was uſurpation, and that ſeveral biſhops in England itſelf, had reſiſted the popes, when they would have aſſumed ſuch a liberty.

On the other ſide, the queen's advocates replied to theſe reaſons:

I. That the prohibitions, in Leviticus, were not parts of the moral law, ſince God himſelf had diſpenſed with them, in commanding the brother to marry his brother's widow. But of what nature ſoever the law was, if it were diſpenſed with, by Moſes, to the Jews, why might it not be as well done by the pope to the Chriſtians?

II. It was ſaid, the law, in Leviticus, againſt marrying the brother's wife, muſt be underſtood of not taking her while the brother was alive; for after he was dead, by another law, a man was commanded by God himſelf to marry his brother's wife.

III. The crime St. John Baptiſt reproached Herod with, might be adultery as well as inceſt, ſince according to Joſephus and Euſebius, Herod's brother Philip was alive when St. John ſpoke.

IV. The popes daily diſpenſed, contrary to the laws of God, with vows and oaths, without being cenſured; beſides, it was maintained, the pope was the only judge, whether the prohibition was moral or not.

V. It was alledged, the pope had granted the diſpenſation upon a very weighty conſideration, to keep peace between the two crowns of Spain and England.

VI. It was urged, that the marriage had ſubſiſted near 20 years, and never been thought invalid.

VII. Laſtly, It was ſaid, if there were any nullities in the bull of diſpenſation, the pope was the only competent judge of it.

1530. The king's advocates replied to theſe arguments, and were anſwered again, by the writers on the queen's ſide, both practiſing what is very common, on ſuch occaſions, that is, they evaded the force of the reaſons of the oppoſite party, by keeping to generals. I ſhall ſay no more of it. Thoſe that are curious to ſee the arguments on both ſides, may be ſatisfied, by reading the Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, where they are fully ſet forth. It will ſuffice to remark, that, in theſe ſorts of diſputes was ſpent the whole year 1530, Henry being very glad the people ſhould be thoroughly informed of the affair, before it was brought to the parliament.

Cardinal Wolſey's uncertain ſtate.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, cardinal Wolſey remained at his country-houſe, living betwixt hope and fear, without being able to form any probable conjecture of the king's behaviour towards him; for, tho' all his goods were ſeiſed, and that ſeemed to denote he intended to ſhew him no favour, yet he ſaw, from time to time, ſome rays of goodneſs ſhine upon him, which made him hope, that his maſter, who had loved him ſo well, would not be for ever inexorible; and, indeed, the 12th of February, the king granted him a general pardon of all his offences, of what nature ſoever. Among all the pardons in the Collection of the Publick Acts, there are none ſo full and particular as this. Then, the king came to an agreement with the cardinal, by which he left him the archbiſhoprick of York, with all its revenues and dependencies, except York-place. As to the ſee of Wincheſter and abbey of St. Albans, the king reſerved to himſelf the revenues, tho' he left him the titles; but the cardinal was bound to reſign theſe two benefices, when required. In conſideration whereof, the king aſſigned him 1000 marks ſterling a year, out of the biſhoprick of Wincheſter, with a promiſe to grant him the like penſion upon ſome other benefice, in caſe this was taken from him. Moreover, he gave him to the value of 6374 l. 3 s. 7 d. half-penny, in money and goods, part of thoſe belonging to the cardinal, which had been confiſcated. All the reſt remained to the king with his conſent, who owned it as a particular favour, that the king was pleaſed to leave him any thing. This was all he preſerved of the immenſe riches acquired, during his credit. But what afflicted him moſt ſenſibly, was, that his two colleges, founded with ſo much pains, and called by his own name, to be an everlaſting monument of his glory, were likewiſe confiſcated. He wrote to the king upon that ſubject, in a manner that perfectly ſhewed his extreme concern for that loſs; and even entreated Cromwell, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to hinder his two colleges from being involved in his ruin. But it was all in vain; for the king took poſſeſſion of all the lands belonging to them, and deprived them of the name of their founder, endowed them anew, in his own.

Act. Pub.

He has ſtill ſome hopes. Herbert.

Notwithſtanding all this, Wolſey had ſtill hopes, by reaſon of ſome marks of friendſhip, given him by the king, on certain occaſions; for, he had permitted him to remove to Richmond,

1530. mond, where he was nearer his perſon; moreover, hearing he was ſick, he ſent a lord to viſit him, in his name, and even cauſed Ann Bullen to write to him. But, at the ſame time that the compaſſion expreſſed for him by the king cheriſhed his hopes, it made his enemies apprehenſive of his return to court, and, therefore, they never ceaſed to exaſperate the king againſt him. In ſhort, as they could not ſee him ſo near the court, without fearing the revival of the king's affection for a miniſter, he had ſo paſſionately loved, they cauſed an order to be ſent him, to withdraw to his dioceſe of York. Very probably, Ann Bullen contributed moſt to his diſgrace, ſince none but a miſtreſs could poſſibly make the king forget ſuch a favourite. However this be, the cardinal being forced to ſubmit, began his journey to the north with a train, tho' not ſo large as uſual, during his proſperity, yet conſiſted ſtill of 160 horſe. He arrived about the end of September, at Cawood, where he ſtayed, according to the cuſtom of the archbiſhops of York, till things were ready for the ceremony of his inſtallment, which was to be performed in a month, with a magnificence, little ſuitable to his preſent condition. But whilſt he was preparing to enjoy in his archbiſhoprick, the ſmall remains of authority, which he imagined would be ſtill left him, he was arreſted by the earl of Northumberland, for high-treaſon. He would have inſiſted, at firſt, upon his privilege as cardinal; but the earl told him, that ſhould not hinder him from executing the king's orders. At the ſame time, his phyſician was ſeiſed, and ſent to London, with his legs tied to his horſe. It is not known to this day, whether the king had been prepoſſeſſed, that the cardinal had a deſign upon his life, which, however, is not very probable. Be this as it will, he ſet forward by eaſy journies to London, extremely concerned to think, he was going to appear as a criminal in a city, where he had before commanded with almoſt a ſovereign authority. But, in all likelihood, his grief turned to his advantage, as it threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, which conſtrained him to ſtop at Leiceſter-abbey, where he ended his days the 30th of November. Before he expired, he ſaid to the king's officer, who ſtood near his bed: "If I had ſerved God as "diligently as I have done the king, he "would not have given me over in my grey "hairs." But I do not know whether he had reaſon to boaſt of his zeal and diſintereſtedneſs, in the ſervices he had done the king. He added, ſpeaking to the officer, that if, as he thought him worthy, he ſhould ever be admitted to the king's council, he ſhould take care what he put in his head, for he would never be able to put it out again. This ſeems to intimate, he had counſelled the king to undertake the divorce, which afterwards he would have diſſuaded him from. And, indeed, he deſired the ſame perſon to tell the king, that he prayed him to call to remembrance, what had paſſed betwixt them, about the divorce, and hoped, that when he ſhould be leſs prejudiced, he would do him more juſtice. This ſhews, that he looked upon that affair, as the ſole cauſe of his diſgrace. Thus, died, this famous cardinal, the proudeſt and moſt haughty of men, and we may add, the moſt ambitious and moſt greedy of eſtates and honours. It is affirmed, that while he governed the king, he never gave him advice, without a view to his own intereſt. This alone would be ſufficient to obſcure all the fine quallities he might otherwiſe have, but which, in the main, amounted only to a great penetration, whereof he made an ill uſe. The king ſhewed a concern for his death; and yet, ſince he had ordered him to be arreſted for high-treaſon, very probably, his ruin was determined. Henry was of a temper to accompliſh whatever he undertook; which will plainly appear hereafter, in his extraordinary ſeverity to perſons, who, doubtleſs, were not ſo guilty as this favourite.

His death.

The king ſhews ſome concern for his death.

The affair of the divorce, and its conſequences, employing Henry during the reſidue of his life, it will for the future, be the principal thing I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak to the end of this reign; but as by the alterations introduced by this prince, his affairs led him to concern himſelf with the troubles of Germany, it is neceſſary, for the underſtanding of the ſequel, juſt to mention what paſſed in that country.

The affairs of Germany, as to religion. Sleidan.

The emperor's view in calling the diet of Augsburg, was rather to inflame than appeaſe the religious troubles. Since he made peace with France, and Italy was as it were ſubject to his yoke, he was forming vaſt projects; for he ſaw himſelf maſter of Spain, Italy, and the Low-Countries; his brother Ferdinand was now king of Bohemia, and had been elected king of Hungary. With theſe advantages, he hoped to be able to ſubdue the reſt of Europe. It was neceſſary to begin with Germany, where he had great power, as emperor and archduke of Auſtria, becauſe, if he once became abſolute in the empire, and could diſpoſe of the forces of the German princes, he imagined France and England would not be able to reſiſt him. The troubles cauſed by religion, in Germany, ſeemed to him a very ſpecious pretence to arm againſt the Proteſtants, judging, that after ruining them by the help of the Catholicks, theſe laſt would, in their turn, be eaſily ſubdued. I cannot be accuſed here, of aſcribing to this monarch deſigns he never really had, ſince it is notorious, that himſelf and ſucceſſors purſued, gradually, and, I may ſay, openly, the execution of the ſame project. The wars that afflicted Europe for more than a century, were ſolely excited by the boundleſs ambition of the houſe of Auſtria, whom the other ſovereigns were concerned to oppoſe.

The progreſs of the reformation. Sleidan.

Since Luther's preaching, in Germany, the reformation had made ſo great progreſs, that ſeveral princes of the empire, and many hans towns had openly embraced it. As they were accuſed of introducing many innovations in religion, in anſwer to that charge, they proteſted, their intent was only to adhere to the doctrine of the goſpel, and religion of the primitive 1530. tive church. And, therefore, they demanded, that a free council might be held in ſome city of Germany, where the religious differences might be calmly examined, by the word of God. But this was a method, which their adverſaries could not allow; for they ſuppoſed, as a thing certain, that the religion profeſſed before Luther's appearance, was the true religion, and being without ſpot, wrinkle, or the like, had no need of reformation; and, according to that principle, they thought the point was not to examine it at all, but to compel the recuſants or hereticks to conform. This was the conſtant maxim, long ſince followed by the Romiſh clergy, and which cauſed them to uſe fire and ſword, to extirpate thoſe they were pleaſed to term hereticks; but in the ſituation of Germany, at the time I am ſpeaking of, it was not eaſy to practiſe that maxim; for, it was not private perſons only, who declared againſt the Roman church, but cities, whole nations, and ſovereigns. So the zealous abetters of the old religion, were not in condition to reduce them by force; wherefore, they choſe to feed them with hopes of a free council, till the affairs of Europe were ſo diſpoſed, that it might be hoped to reduce them, by way of authority. Several diets had been held upon that ſubject, in Germany, where, contrary to the opinion of the court of Rome, the emperor and the Catholick princes had been obliged to conceal their ſentiments, and conſent to a toleration, which, however, left them at liberty to act another time, according to their real principles.

When Luther began to appear, the religious diſputes turned only upon the exceſſive abuſes of the papal power, and a few other points; then Luther had on his ſide almoſt all the lay princes of Germany, and many hans towns, each of which was a republick. From that time, he made new diſcoveries, and publiſhed them to the world; but he had not, upon all the articles, the ſame number of followers, as upon that of the papal authority; beſides, the emperor and the zealous Catholicks oppoſed, with all their power, the progreſs of the reformation. Care was taken to intimidate ſuch as inclined that way, or to continue them in the old religion, by promiſes, by places, by poſts, which did not a little help to confirm them in their firſt ſentiments. So for ſome years, the reformers uſed all poſſible endeavours to gain proſelytes, and the Romiſh clergy were as diligent to hinder their progreſs. In the interim, whilſt they ſtrove only in this manner, the reformation daily took root; which obliged the adverſaries to ſeek other means to prevent its growth, thoſe, hitherto, uſed, not proving very effectual.

In 1524, Charles V, coming to the diet of Worms, ſent for Luther, and after a hearing, baniſhed him the empire, with all his adherents, by a formal decree, in the diet's name. But ſome pretend, the diet was not concerned in the decree. The emperor, however, perſiſted to maintain it; but it ſeems the Germans conſidered it, not as obligatory. Next year, the diet, held at Noremberg, produced againſt the court of Rome, 100 grievances, of 1530. which they demanded the redreſs, by means of a free council.

Another diet, held at the ſame place, paſſed a decree, whereby it was reſolved to demand a free council, in Germany; but upon their diſſolution, the Catholicks aſſembled by themſelves, at Ratisbon, and ordered the decree of Worms to be executed.

In another diet, at Spires, in 1526, the emperor cauſed it to be declared, that he meant not that any reſolution ſhould be taken concerning the affairs of religion, but only concerning the method of executing the decree of Worms, till there ſhould be a general council. But as this council was yet very remote, the diet decreed, the emperor ſhould be prayed to procure a council in Germany, within a year, and, in the interim, every one ſhould ſo govern himſelf in point of religion, as to be able to give an account of his conduct to God and the emperor.

During theſe tranſactions, the war which the Turks had carried into Hungary, ſuſpended, for ſome time, the execution of Charles V's projects, againſt thoſe who had embraced the new religion, becauſe he wanted the aſſiſtance of all the German princes, as well Proteſtants as Catholicks; beſides, his war then with France, ſuffered him not to think much of the affairs of Germany. But in 1529, being upon the point of making peace with France, he thought he might talk in a higher ſtrain. He called a diet, at Spires, where it was ordered that thoſe who had, hitherto, obeyed the decree of Worms, ſhould continue to obſerve it, and the reſt that had not ſubmitted, ſhould make no innovations in religion, nor hinder their ſubjects from going to maſs. Againſt this decree, the electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the princes of Lunenburgh, made a ſoleme proteſtation, from whence all their party were called Proteſtants. The emperor, who was then in Italy, very roughly received the proteſtation, brought to him by deputies, and thereby obliged the Proteſtants to unite for their common defence, the emperor diſcovering by his words, that he had ill deſigns againſt them. In the diet, which was to meet at Augsburg, in April, 1530, but did not, however, aſſemble till June, he was reſolved to lay the foundation of his projected war againſt the Proteſtants.

At the opening of the diet, the emperor's chancellor made a long ſpeech, complaining, in his maſter's name, of thoſe who had, hitherto, endeavoured to alter the antient faith, and cardinal Campegio exhorted the Germans, to extirpate the errors that were crept into Germany. That done, the Proteſtants deſired, they might declare their belief before the diet. This was denied them, and they were made to take as a favour, the leave granted them to deliver their confeſſion of faith, in writing. The landgrave of Heſſe ſeeing ſo great partiality in the diet, withdrew, without taking leave; whereupon the emperor commanded the gates of Augsburg to be ſhut, ſhewing, he intended to uſe violence towards thoſe that 1530. remained in the city; but upon the elector of Saxony's remonſtrances, he ordered them to be opened. In ſhort, after many debates, he cauſed to be publiſhed, in the diet's name, a decree entirely againſt the Proteſtants, and which, upon the hopes he gave them of a general council, obliged them to deſtroy whatever had been done, in point of religion, to that day.

The diet ending, in this manner, the emperor ordered the archbiſhop of Mentz to aſſemble the electors, to proceed to the election of a king of the Romans, intending to cauſe his brother Ferdinand to be choſen. The Proteſtants ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this meeting, affirming, there was no occaſion to elect a king of the Romans, and demonſtrating the inconveniencies which would ariſe from his deſign, to render the imperial crown as it were hereditary to the houſe of Auſtria. In fine, ſeeing that, notwithſtanding their remonſtrances, it was deſigned to proceed to this election, they met at Smalcald, the 22d of December, 1530, and concluded a defenſive league againſt all who ſhould attack them, on account of religion. Then they made a formal proteſtation againſt the intended election of a king of the Romans, without their conſent. In this ſituation were the affairs of religion, in Germany, about the end of the year 1530.

1531. The emperor diſobliges the pope, in the affair of Ferrara. Guicciard.

After the emperor had quitted Italy, the pope's nuncio continually preſſed him to pronounce judgment upon the affair of the duke of Ferrara. The pope could not imagine but the judgment would be in his favour, conſidering the emperor's engagement with him, by the treaty of Barcelona. But whether the emperor had more fully examined the matter, or for ſome other reaſon, he gave ſentence, that Modena and Reggio belonged, of right, to the duke of Ferrara; but to ſatisfy the pope, he ſhould pay 100,000 ducats, for which the pope ſhould be obliged to give him the inveſtiture of Ferrara, as granted to his predeceſſors; and to begin to execute this ſentence, he delivered Modena to the duke. The pope, extremely diſpleaſed with a judgment ſo different from what he expected, refuſed to ſubmit to it, and in hopes of ſeiſing Ferrara, would not receive the 100,000 ducats offered him by the duke.

Francis I. ſtrives to gain the pope.

Clement VII, being, thus, incenſed againſt the emperor, had great inclination to be reconciled with the kings of France and England, imagining he ſhould be received with open arms. Indeed, Francis I. had unwillingly agreed to the treaty of Cambray, and ſolely becauſe there was no other way to recover his ſons; but ſince he had received them, he had been thinking how to retrieve what he had loſt by that treaty. To this end, he privately laboured to ſow jealouſies among the princes, by making them apprehenſive of the emperor's ambition, and promiſing them aſſiſtance. As ſoon as he was informed of the pope's diſcontent, he thought, nothing ſhould be neglected to gain him to his intereſt, at ſo favourable a juncture; wherefore, he propoſed a marriage between Catharine de Medici, daughter of the late duke Lorenzo, and the duke of Orleans, his ſecond ſon,; an honour to which the family of the Medici durſt never aſpire, if the king had not offered it himſelf. On the other hand, Henry knowing the union between the pope and the emperor was the ſole cauſe of the obſtacles in the affair of the divorce, did not queſtion, he ſhould eaſily effect his deſigns, if he could ſet them at variance. But two things hindered him from applying himſelf to that means. The firſt was, he could not truſt the pope; the ſecond, that he began to find his ſubjects much more inclined to ſhake off the papal yoke, than he had imagined, and, therefore, did not think himſelf under a neceſſity to depend upon the pope. If he had, at firſt, humbly addreſſed to the pope, it was, partly, becauſe he feared the people's prejudice, in favour of Chriſt's vicar; but when he found this prejudice, was not ſo ſtrong as he had believed, he never troubled himſelf about the pope's oppoſition. His kingdom being ſafe from invaſions by land, he had nothing to fear from any prince in Europe, provided his ſubjects were not terrified with the thunders of the vatican. But the Engliſh were not, in this reſpect, the ſame as formerly. Wickliffe had begun to enlighten them; the conduct of the late popes had increaſed their light; and Luther's books and followers had quite opened their eyes; for, ſince the ſpreading of the new doctrine in England, the pope's authority was ſo diſcredited, that the Engliſh, for the moſt part, wiſhed for a favourable opportunity, to throw off a yoke they had ſo long groaned under. This made the king reſolve to have his cauſe tried by the parliament and convocation. 1531.

He imparts the affair of the divorce to the parliament. Burnet.

The parliament meeting the 6th of January, the chancellor opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, declaring, that the king earneſtly wiſhed to annul his marriage, not from diſhoneſt motives, as ſome laboured to make his people believe, but for the peace of his conſcience, and the welfare of the kingdom, being unwilling to leave the ſucceſſion of the crown in danger of being diſputed. Then he cauſed a great number of books and treatiſes, written on that ſubject, with abſtracts of ſeveral authors, both antient and modern, to be brought, with the determinations of the univerſities of France, Italy, and England, which were all left upon the table, to be examined at leiſure. The king's deſign was alſo brought before the convocation, who declared, they were ſatisfied the king's marriage was contrary to the law of God. The king required no more at this time; for he had another important affair to debate with the clergy, which was to be decided before this was farther examined. Very likely, the convocation being informed of the king's intent, the more readily gave their opinion for him, as they perfectly knew how much they ſhould want his favour, in the buſineſs in hand, which was of the utmoſt conſequence.

Cardinal Wolſey had been accuſed, by the attorney general, of exerciſing, in England, his his legatine authority, without the king's ſpecial licenſe, and of diſpoſing, as legate, of ſeveral benefices, contrary to the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire. Hence it naturally followed, that thoſe who had owned his authority, and appeared in his courts, were equally liable to be indicted. By this means, all the clergy were in the ſame caſe, ſince there was ſcarce one but what had occaſion to apply to him, during the courſe of his legateſhip. So, after the king had procured of the convocation, an approbation of his proceedings concerning the divorce, he ordered an indictment to be brought into the king's bench, againſt all the clergy, for breaking the laws of the realm. He had, in this, a double view; the firſt, to draw a good ſum from the clergy; the ſecond, to humble that powerful body, and ſo leſſen their great credit with the people, who before had always ſeen them ſupported by the royal authority. He knew he ſhould meet with the greateſt oppoſition from the clergy, in the affair of the divorce; for that reaſon, he was very glad to put it out of their power to hurt him, by keeping them, as it were, in dependence, and by ſowing a kind of diviſion between the clergy and people, by the ſatisfaction theſe laſt would, probably, expreſs, at the diſgrace of the eccleſiaſticks, who had ever treated them with great haughtineſs. He thereby put the clergy under a neceſſity of recurring to the royal protection, and conſequently, of ſhewing leſs zeal for the intereſt of the court of Rome. This ſucceeded according to his expectation. In vain did the clergy plead, that the king himſelf had connived at the cardinal's proceedings; what had not been ſerviceable to Wolſey, was not capable of excuſing them that had owned his authority. So the court proceeded to a ſentence, that the clergy were all out of the king's protection, and liable to the pains in the ſtatute of præmunire. The people were extremely pleaſed, and, particularly, the favourers of the new religion, to ſee the clergy humbled to ſo great a degree. On the other hand, the clergy plainly perceived, that as the laity ſtood affected, it would be in vain, to reſiſt the king. They could expect no more aſſiſtance from Rome; for ſince the pope had quarrelled with the king, he had loſt all his power; and as the king ſhewed, he would no longer regard him, the thunders of the vatican were looked upon with contempt. The clergy, in this their ill ſituation, reſolved to purchaſe the king's favour, at any rate, finding they could no longer depend upon the people, who were much altered from what they were formerly. So the convocation of Canterbury, having debated upon the affair, reſolved to offer the king 100,000 pounds for a pardon; and, purſuant to this reſolution, ſome of their members were ordered to draw an act for that purpoſe. Probably, they who were charged with this commiſſion, were friends of the court, and had a mind to take this opportunity to give the king a prerogative, which none of his predeceſſors had ever enjoyed. Lord Herbert and Dr. Burnet affirm, the convocation reſolved to preſent a petition to the king, to pray him to accept of 100,000 l. but as this inſtrument is extant, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, it may now be ſpoken of with greater exactneſs. It was not a petition, but a publick act of the clergy, in form of letters patents, whereby they gave that ſum to the king. It was ſaid, in the inſtrument, that it was, firſt, in conſideration of his great merit; ſecondly, in teſtimony of the clergy's gratitude for the great benefits he had procured the catholick church, as well by his pen as his ſword; thirdly, for his zeal againſt the Lutherans, who were labouring to deſtroy the church of England, "of which the clergy acknowledged the king ſole protector, and ſupreme head;" and laſtly, in hopes he would be pleaſed to grant the clergy, and all their members, a pardon of all the offences committed againſt the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire.

Oppoſition to that title. Herbert.

When this inſtrument was read, in the convocation, many diſliked that the clergy ſhould be made to ſay, that they acknowledged the king for protector and ſupreme head of the church of England. Some imagined, it was inferred through inadvertency and exceſſive flattery, whereof the penners of the inſtrument had not conſidered the conſequence. Others ſaid, it was intended to ſurpriſe the convocation, by inſerting theſe words in the body of an inſtrument, which was only to grant a ſum to the king. They added, theſe ſame words, which ſeemed to be put in by accident, and without deſign, were, however, of very great conſequence, and as the convocation had not taken any reſolution upon that point, they were for razing them out. But on the other hand, thoſe who were in the ſecret, pretended the words could not be put out, by a formal reſolve, without diſpleaſing the king, and giving him occaſion to refuſe the offered compenſation. This cauſed ſuch debates, that they were forced to put off the deciſion of the affair, to the next day. It was not without reaſon, that ſeveral dreaded the conſequence, which might, very naturally, be drawn from theſe words, ſince it was evident, the clergy was thereby engaged to acknowledge the pope no longer head of the church of England, which could not have two ſupreme heads at once. This was, in effect, the king's intention, as well as their's who had penned or drawn the inſtrument, as plainly appeared the next day. Thomas Cromwell, with others of the king's council, going to the convocation, very clearly hinted, that the point in debate, yeſterday, was very agreeable to the king, and he could not but conſider the oppoſers as very diſaffected perſons. After ſuch a declaration, there was not one that durſt directly oppoſe it, eſpecially as the archbiſhop and ſeveral other prelates openly maintained, that the king was truly the ſupreme head of the church of England; ſo the act paſſed as it was drawn; only ſome moved to add this reſtriction, "as far as is conſiſtent with the law of "Chriſt." But it was not the king's intention 1531. on to leave a door for thoſe to eſcape, who ſhould hereafter diſpute his ſupremacy. The inſtrument being ſealed, the 22d of March, was preſented to the king, who very graciouſly accepted both the clergy's preſent, and his new title, of which he afterwards made great uſe. The convocation of the province of York reſolved likewiſe to give the king 18,840 pounds; but as they omitted in the grant, to acknowledge the king ſupreme head of the church of England, they were told, that their preſent would not be accepted, if they ſpoke not like the convocation of Canterbury; ſo the clergy of York province, were forced to inſert the ſame acknowledgment, in their inſtrument. In this manner the king procured, or rather extorted from the clergy, the title of ſupreme head of the church of England. It is certain, that tho' ſome freely gave it him, yet the major part were not of that opinion. This is evident from the methods uſed to obtain it. This acknowledgment was procured in the manner we have ſeen, by Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Cromwell, and ſome others, who verily believed there was no occaſion for the pope. Thoſe who flattered themſelves, at firſt, that the words were inſerted without deſign, in the inſtrument brought into the convocation of Canterbury, might have ſeen their error, if they had attended to another article in the ſame inſtrument, and which was alſo inſerted in that of the province of York, viz. that the clergy did promiſe, for the future, neither to make nor execute any conſtitution without the king's licenſe. This was, in other words, acknowledging the king for ſupreme head of the church of England. We ſhall ſee, hereafter, what uſe Henry made of this new title.

A pardon granted to the clergy.

The king being ſatisfied with the clergy, granted them a pardon in ample form; but when the pardon was brought into the houſe of commons, they refuſed to paſs it, unleſs the laity, who might have been guilty of the ſame offences, were alſo included. Henry offended at their oppoſition, ſent them word, he would be maſter of his own favours, and not ſuffer them to be forced from him. The king's reſolution terrified the commons, who to avoid his indignation, paſſed the pardon as it was, throwing themſelves upon his mercy as to what concerned the laity. Then the king, ſatisfied with their ſubmiſſion, granted to his temporal ſubjects a pardon like that to his ſpiritual. However, it ſeems, that the colleges and monaſteries were excepted, who not being included in the pardons, were forced to compound with the king, as we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The people rejoice at the clergy's diſgrace.

So far were the people from riſing, (as they would, doubtleſs, have done, had they been under the ſame prejudice with their anceſtors in the reigns of Henry II, and king John;) that on the contrary, joy was viſibly painted on their faces, being highly delighted to ſee the clergy humbled. Thus, that body, ſo formidable heretofore, inſtead of daring to reſiſt the king, were conſtrained to fly to his protection, becauſe they ſaw plainly, the people ſhewed no concern at their diſgrace, and they had no remedy elſewhere. 1531.

The pope diſſembles his ſentiments. Burnet.

When the pope heard what had paſſed in England, he was terribly embarraſſed. He ſaw Henry purſuing ſuch meaſures, as would, probably, be attended with ill conſequences. However, he durſt not venture to proceed haughtily, for fear of engaging in a quarrel, which he foreſaw would not be to his advantage. Beſides, his not being pleaſed with the emperor, he ſaw him upon the point of being fully employed by the Turks, and the German Proteſtants, at a time when France and England were in ſtrict union. So, perceiving no aſſiſtance ſpeedy enough, in caſe he ſhould attempt to exert his authority, he choſe to be ſilent, in expectation of a proper ſeaſon to act, or, at leaſt, to be reconciled to the king.

Henry tries in vain to bring the queen to conſent to the divorce. Burnet.

This affair being ended, Henry prorogued the parliament. Then, he ordered the determinations of the univerſities to be printed, with the opinions of the learned concerning his marriage, that againſt the next ſeſſion every one might be informed of the ſtate of the caſe, and of his motives to proſecute the divorce. In the interim, as in putting away the queen, his intent was to marry Ann Bullen, he paſſionately wiſhed, the queen would be perſuaded to conſent to the divorce, in order to avoid the inconveniencies which might ariſe from her obſtinacy. To that purpoſe, he ſent ſome biſhops and lay lords, earneſtly to preſs her, either to conſent to the divorce, or refer the deciſion of the affair to four prelates and four ſeculars; but, as ſhe could not be prevailed with, to deſiſt from her appeal to the pope, he ſent her word to chuſe where ſhe would reſide in any of his manors, and, the 14th of July, 1531, took his leave of her, at Windſor, intending never to ſee her more.

Three perſons burnt for religion. Herbert.

What had lately paſſed, in the parliament and convocation, encouraged the well-wiſhers to a reformation, in the church, to which they already ſaw ſome preparatives. For this reaſon, religious diſputes became more frequent and publick than formerly; but the king perceiving what inferences would be drawn from his firſt proceedings, was pleaſed to ſhew, that in throwing off the papal yoke, he deſigned not to ſtrike at the fundamental truths of religion; ſo, to fruſtrate thoſe who had any ſuch thought, he commanded the laws againſt hereticks, to be rigorouſly executed. This occaſioned the death of three Proteſtants, viz. Bilney, Bayfield, and Baynam, of whom the two firſt were burnt this year, and the other in the following April.

The affairs of Germany. Herbert.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, in England, the affairs of Germany were more embroiled; for, in the beginning of the year, Ferdinand of Auſtria, king of Bohemia and Hungary, was elected king of the Romans, notwithſtanding the proteſtation of the confederates of Smalcald, and crowned, a few days after, at Aix la Chapelle. This was in conſequence of a league concluded between the Catholick princes of Germany, in the foregoing November; but this league was offenſive, whereas that of Smalcald was only defenſive.

Never

1531. Never had the Proteſtants any deſign to force the conſciences of ſuch as differed from them in opinion. But the intent of the Catholick league, was, to compel the Proteſtants to return to the church, they had forſaken. Theſe laſt proteſted againſt Ferdinand's election, as unneceſſary, and contrary to the uſual forms; but their proteſtation had no effect.

The reſt of the year was ſpent in ſundry negotiations, wherein the emperor ſeemed to have no other view, than to adjuſt the religious differences, tho', in effect, his deſign was only to amuſe the Proteſtants, and hinder them from taking meaſures for their defence, when they ſhould be attacked; and, as they were not ignorant of his artifices, they wrote on that ſubject, to Francis and Henry, who returned them favourable anſwers, with a promiſe of aſſiſtance, in caſe it was attempted to oppreſs them. Not that theſe two monarchs deſired to countenance the reformation, but it was their intereſt to protect the German Proteſtants, becauſe their deſtruction could not but exceedingly increaſe the emperor's power. Indeed, this was one of the chief means whereby that prince intended to execute his vaſt deſigns.

1532. Francis tries to raiſe the emperor troubles.

Whilſt the emperor was forming projects, to become maſter of Germany, under pretence of ſupporting the intereſts of religion and the empire, Francis I. turned to all ſides, to try to create him troubles, capable of producing ſome change, which he might improve. His vexation to have been forced to ſign the treaty of Cambray, threw him upon earneſtly ſeeking means to repair his loſſes, and eſpecially to recover Genoa and Milan. To this end, he carreſſed or threatened the pope, according as he ſaw it proper to uſe one or other of theſe means, and put the Proteſtants of Germany, in hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance, in caſe they were attacked by the emperor; but, chiefly, he laboured to ſecure the king of England, becauſe he could be moſt ſerviceable to him. He confirmed him, as much as poſſible, in his reſolution to puſh the affair of the divorce, in order to keep him always at variance with the emperor and the pope. Sometimes he intimated to him, that if the juſtice due to him was obſtinately refuſed, he would join in a league with him, to withdraw their dominions from the tyrannical power of the court of Rome. Then, fearing he would agree with the emperor, he adviſed him ſpeedily to marry Ann Bullen, well knowing it would be a certain means to widen their breach; nay, he ſent a letter to the pope, wherein he appeared no leſs concerned than Henry himſelf, in the affair of the divorce. Among other things, he told him, that if out of complaiſance, or fear, he continued to be governed by the emperor, he muſt not think it ſtrange, that the king of England ſhould endeavour to procure, by extraordinary means, the juſt ſatisfaction he had ſo long expected, in vain; adding, that his intereſts were ſo ſtrictly united with Henry's, that he was indiſpenſibly obliged to aſſiſt, to the utmoſt of his power, a prince, of whom he gloried to be the perpetual ally. In a word, he prayed him to conſider, whether it was prudent to give thoſe who could not be compelled to obey, the opportunity and will to withdraw their obedience. But Clement ſeeing only the emperor's forces, in Italy, took care not to follow ſuch dangerous counſels. 1532.

The two kings finding, at length, it was impoſſible to gain the pope, reſolved upon an interview, to contrive means to break the emperor's meaſures; but they thought proper, firſt, to ſpread a report, they were going to make a new league, in order to frighten the pope, and hinder him from cloſing again with the emperor, from whom he was ſomething alienated by the buſineſs of Ferrara. Accordingly, they concluded a league, at London, ſigned the 23d of June; but it is manifeſt, this treaty, was made only with the fore-mentioned view, ſince it contained but two articles that could have reaſonably alarmed the pope or the emperor, had they been known to them. The firſt was, that in caſe the emperor ſeiſed the Engliſh merchants effects, in the Low-Countries, the king of France would do the ſame with regard to the emperor's ſubjects, the Germans excepted; nay, this article was guarded by ſo many reſtrictions, on the part of Francis, that it plainly appeared to be only a mere pretence to make a treaty. By the ſecond, if Henry was attacked by the emperor, Francis was to ſend him an aid of 500 lances, and if the king of France was invaded, Henry was to aſſiſt him with a body of foot, not exceeding 5000 men. As the publick was not acquainted with the particulars of the treaty, ſeveral reports were ſpread. Some ſaid, the two monarchs had agreed to join in the league of Smalcald, or, at leaſt, to ſend a powerful aid to the German Proteſtants. Others fancied, that as the Turks threatened Auſtria, and the emperor would be unavoidably obliged to lead his forces into that country, Francis would invade, at the ſame time, the duchy of Milan, and Henry carry war into the Low-Countries. All theſe reports, tho' uncertain, made the emperor very uneaſy, becauſe they were grounded upon very probable conjectures.

Francis and Henry try to frighten the emperor and pope. Burnet.

This interview of the two monarchs, between Calais and Boulogne, was not till October. They had, principally, two things in view. The firſt, to divert the blame thrown on them, by the emperor, in ſpreading over all Europe, that whilſt Chriſtendom was going to be invaded by the Infidels, they remained idle ſpectators of the danger, without offering the leaſt aſſiſtance to thoſe who were preparing to defend her. Their other view was, to keep the Italians and Germans in the expectation of a freſh war, for fear they ſhould become too compliant to the emperor's will. To effect their deſign, they gave one another letters patents, whereby they engaged, jointly, to raiſe an army of 80,000 men, to ſtop the progreſs of the Turks, and to lead the ſame either into Germany or Italy, as there ſhould be occaſion; but this pretended agreement, was never put into the form of a treaty. Du Francis and Henry's interview. Hall. Stow.

1532. Tillet ſpeaks of it, in his inventory of the treaties between France and England, by the name of letters of agreement; but there are no ſigns of it, in the Collection of the Publick Acts of England; wherefore, it is not probable, theſe two monarchs deſired to execute this pretended project, the ſole view whereof, was to juſtify them to the world, and inſpire the emperor and pope with terror. Doubtleſs, that was the reaſon of their affecting to publiſh it.

Francis's deſigns.

During the interview, Henry complained much of the pope, and Francis even improved upon him, in a long enumeration of the complaints he had received from the Gallican church, on account of the court of Rome's exactions. But this was only to amuſe Henry, ſince he was at that very time in ſecret negotiation with the pope, concerning the duke of Orleans, his ſecond ſon's marriage with Catharine de Medici. It manifeſtly appears by that prince's whole conduct, that his ſole view was to make Henry's friendſhip ſubſervient to gain the pope, in order to recover Genoa and Milan, which he had always in view; wherefore, he outwardly expreſſed a ſtrong attachment to Henry's intereſt. He even preſſed him not to ſtay for the pope's diſpenſation to marry his miſtreſs, who was preſent at the interview, having lately been made marchioneſs of Pembroke. Whilſt the two monarchs were together, they feaſted one another ſeveral times, a particular account whereof is needleſs in this place. Henry came to ſee Francis at Boulogne, and Francis returned his viſit at Calais. They parted the 30th of October to return, the one to Paris, the other to London; but by reaſon of the bad weather, Henry ſtaid ſome days at Calais, where it is ſaid, he privately married Ann Bullen. It is more probable, however, as ſome affirm, that it was not till the January following.

The Turks threaten Hungary.

During this whole year, the emperor was greatly embarraſſed. Soliman, emperor of the Turks, threatned to invade Hungary with a powerful army, which he accordingly did. Germany was in trouble, becauſe the Proteſtants, who had now been threatened, were taking effectual meaſures for their defenſe, and refuſed to acknowledge Ferdinand of Auſtria, for king of the Romans. On the other hand, the emperor was not ignorant of the pope's diſcontent, on account of the duke of Ferrara's affair, and that Francis and Henry were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to draw him off from his party, in order to diſturb Italy. Moreover, the Italians were quiet, only becauſe there was ſtill an imperial army in Italy, and no preparation in France to ſupport them, in caſe they attempted to hold up their head. In the interim, in the midſt of this ſeeming tranquillity, they eagerly wiſhed to ſee ſome revolution, to free them from their apprehenſions of the emperor's over-grown power. In fine, the interview of Francis and Henry exttremely troubled the emperor, apprehenſive as he was, that if Soliman proſpered in Hungary, they would embrace that opportunity to invade the duchy of Milan and the Low-Countries. It was neceſſary, therefore, to think, without loſs of time, of preventing the dangers which might proceed from all theſe quarters, and to begin with the moſt urgent affair, the ſatisfying of the Proteſtants, in order to have their aſſiſtance againſt the Turks. To that purpoſe, he came, the beginning of the year, to the diet of Ratisbon, where he found means to negotiate with the Proteſtants, an agreement, whereby no perſon was to be diſturbed on account of religion, till a council was called. He intended not punctually to perform this agreement, extorted from him by neceſſity. He received, however, this benefit by it, that all the princes and ſtates of Germany, as well Proteſtant as Catholick, furniſhed him with a powerful aid, which enabled him to aſſemble an army of 80,000 foot, and 30,000 horſe. 1532.

Charles obtains an aid.

He ſuſpects the king of France.

Whilſt this army was forming, the emperor, willing to ſound the king of France's intentions, ſent and deſired his aſſiſtance againſt the Turks; but received an unſatisfactory anſwer, which, added to the interview of the two monarchs, confirmed his ſuſpicion, that they were contriving ſomething againſt him; but Soliman haſtening his campaign, in Hungary, hindered him from thinking of means to prevent the miſchief he feared, from the two confederate kings. Indeed, the Turks not only advanced into Hungary, but even into Auſtria, with deſign to give him battle; but he wiſely avoided it, ſince, in loſing it, he would have been without refuge, and Auſtria, with part of Germany, would inevitably have fallen under the dominion of the Turks; whereas by ſtanding, as he did, upon the defenſive, with an army of above 100,000 men, he prevented them from making any conſiderable progreſs, and compelled them, at length, to return into their own country. As ſoon as he had certain advice that Soliman was upon his march to Conſtantinople, he departed for Italy, from whence he deſigned to return into Spain.

He confers with the pope at Bologna. Guicciard.

About the middle of November, he came to Bologna, where the pope waited to confer with him. As their deſigns were very oppoſite, there was not that harmony between them, as at their interview in the year 1529. The emperor thought only of ſecuring Italy, and preventing the king of France's return. The pope, on the contrary, wiſhed to keep him always uneaſy on that account, as well to render himſelf neceſſary, as to be freed from a ſtate of dependence. The emperor required the pope to call a council, in Germany, otherwiſe he ſaw no poſſibility of finding a lawful pretence to ruin the Proteſtants. But after what had paſſed at Conſtance and Baſil, the very name of a council was become ſo odious to the court of Rome, that Clement VII, could not reſolve to call one. He knew what had befallen John XXII, and Eugenius IV, and, therefore, had no mind to have his authority queſtioned. The emperor demanded, moreover, the pope's conſent to a league, he intended to form between all the ſtates of Italy,

to

1532. to which each ſhould contribute, in proportion, to its forces, in order to ſecure the country from all invaſion; that is to ſay, he would have, in Italy, an army maintained at the expence of others, and always ready to defend the duchy of Milan, in caſe Francis ſhould think of invading it. The pope approved of this project, not in order to keep Italy in its preſent ſituation, ſince it was very much to his prejudice, that the emperor ſhould remain ſo powerful there, but to have a pretence to be rid of the German and Spaniſh troops, who were a terror to the Italians. He foreſaw, that a league of ſo many parties, whoſe intereſts were different, would not long ſubſiſt, and that after it was broken, he ſhould himſelf become more neceſſary and conſiderable. He deſired only, that the Venetians ſhould come into the league, and bear their part of the charge. In ſhort, the emperor farther demanded of the pope, that he ſhould give his niece, Catharine de Medici, to the duke of Milan; his view being to engage him, for his niece's ſake, in the defence of the Milaneſe, for fear, in the end, Francis ſhould find a favourable opportunity to gain him to his intereſt. But Clement alledged, againſt this propoſal, his engagement with the king of France, who had done him the honour to demand Catharine for the duke, his ſecond ſon. He repreſented to the emperor, that he could not prefer the duke of Milan to the duke of Orleans, without making Francis his irreconcileable enemy, who would never forgive ſuch an affront. So their whole negotiation ended only in the projected league, in which the Venetians refuſed to be included; for they contented themſelves with promiſing the emperor, they would punctually perform their engagement, with reſpect to the duchy of Milan. In fine, the emperor having ſent for ambaſſadors from Milan, Ferrara, and Mantua, it was endeavoured for ſome time to ſettle the terms of the league; but the diſpute between the pope and the duke of Ferrara, very much retarded the concluſion, becauſe the duke would not come into the league before he was ſecure of peace at home. However, after great pains, the emperor prevailed with the pope to allow the duke an eight months reſpite. This affair was the reaſon the league could not be ſigned, till February next year.

How the Engliſh ſtood affected, as to religion.

Henry's proceedings againſt the clergy, and his diſpoſition, with regard to the pope, greatly encouraged thoſe who longed to ſee a reformation in the church. To conceive a right notion how the Engliſh ſtood affected, in this reſpect, it is neceſſary to know what the people's ſentiments were, concerning religion. It may be undeniably affirmed, that as to the reformation of the pope's exorbitant power, and the clergy's immunities, there was ſcarce an Engliſhman, if you except all or moſt of the eccleſiaſticks, but what heartily wiſhed it. It was now 300 years ſince the parliament firſt began to endeavour it, but without a perfect ſucceſs, becauſe it was contrary to the intereſt of the monarchs; but as for a reformation of doctrine, the well-wiſhers to it were very far from being the majority. 1532. These were not ſufficiently numerous to venture to propoſe it openly, eſpecially as they were not countenanced by the king; but when the pope's exceſſive authority, or the pride and riches of the clergy were exclaimed againſt, they boldly joined with the reſt of the people, without fear of being diſcovered, becauſe that was the ſentiment of all the people, or, at leaſt, of almoſt all the laity. But in expreſſing their zeal againſt the clergy, their view was to promote the reformation of doctrine, becauſe they knew the chief obſtacle would always proceed from the governors of the church. Here, therefore, they believed they ought to begin, in order to arrive at a thorough reformation. So, among thoſe that wiſhed to reduce, within due bounds, the papal power, and the clergy's immunities, there were, doubtleſs, many who had no farther views, and imagined the reformation would end there. Others, on the contrary, hoped, that after taking this firſt ſtep, it would be impoſſible to ſtop, wherein they had for warrant, what had happened in Germany. But they took care not to undeceive the others, for fear of cooling their zeal, by ſhewing them too ſoon the conſequences of the firſt ſtep, in the buſineſs of the reformation.

The commons are inclined to reduce the power of the clergy. Hall.

The parliament meeting the 15th of January, 1532, the commons were almoſt unanimouſly inclined to redreſs the grievances, ſo long complained of in vain, with reſpect to the papal power, and the eccleſiaſtical privileges. There had never been ſo favourable an opportunity; for, when formerly the parliaments were diſpoſed to make any attempt of this nature, the kings were unwilling to concur with them, becauſe the ſtate of their affairs permitted them not to break entirely with Rome. But the affair of the divorce, had put things on another foot. The king was diſſatisfied with the pope, and conſidered the clergy, both ſecular and regular, as ſecret enemies, by reaſon of their attachment to the court of Rome. So, his intereſt required, that the pope and clergy ſhould be humbled, and diviſion ſown between them and the people, knowing, that the former, could hurt him only, in proportion to their credit with the latter. As for what foreigners might do, he thought himſelf in no danger, ſo long as he remained ſtrictly united with France, and the more, as the emperor was then employed by his war with the Turks, and the troubles of Germany.

An addreſs propoſed to the king. Hollingſh.

All this being artfully inſinuated to the houſe of commons, they preſented an addreſs to the king, praying him to conſent to a reformation of ſundry grievances, occaſioned by the immunities of the clergy. The king replied, that before he gave his conſent to their requeſt, which ſeemed to him of great moment, he wiſhed to hear what the clergy had to ſay for themſelves. But under this ſhew of equity, his intent was to intimate to the clergy, how much they wanted his protection, ſince he could either promote or reſtrain the proceedings 1532. proceedings of the commons, as he pleaſed. Some time after, the parliament paſſed certain acts, which only glanced at ſome of the clergy's privileges, the people had moſt reaſon to complain of. But for that time, the reformation was carried no farther; nay, care was taken to make the eccleſiaſticks amends, by paſſing an act to releaſe them from the payment of annates, which was become a heavy burden. The act ran, that the kingdom was daily impoveriſhed by the great ſums paid to the ſee of Rome, for firſt-fruits, for palls, for bulls, &c. That ſince the ſecond year of the reign of Henry VII, 160,000 pounds had been paid to thoſe uſes, and that more was likely to be, ſhortly, exported, by reaſon many of the biſhops were very aged; that beſides, the annates were firſt introduced only as a contribution for the war againſt the Infidels, to which, however, they were never applied; and, therefore, it was enacted, that all payments of annates ſhould ceaſe for the future; that as for the bulls, there ſhould only be paid five pounds in the hundred, according to the clear annual value of the biſhopricks. That if, on account of this regulation, bulls ſhould be denied by the pope, the biſhop elect ſhould be preſented by the king to the archbiſhop of the province, for his conſecration; that in caſe the archbiſhop ſhould refuſe it, on pretence of want of palls, bulls, and the like, any two biſhops, appointed by the king, ſhould perform the office, and the biſhop ſo conſecrated acknowledged for lawful. Nevertheleſs, the parliament declared, it ſhould be in the king's power, to null or confirm the act within ſuch a time; and, if in this interval, he ſhould make an amicable compoſition with the court of Rome, it ſhould have the force and authority of a law; but if, upon this act, the pope ſhould pretend to vex the realm, by excommunications or interdicts, ſuch cenſures ſhould neither be regarded nor publiſhed, and, all interdicts notwithſtanding, the prieſts might lawfully, without any ſcruples of conſcience, celebrate divine ſervice as before.

Statutes againſt the clergy.

The boldneſs of a commoner. Hall.

In the interim, among the great number of repreſentatives, in the houſe of commons, there were ſeveral, who were entirely againſt a rupture with the pope. They perceived, however, it would infallibly follow upon the king's divorce; wherefore, they uſed all poſſible endeavours to prevent it. One Temſe, a member of parliament, was ſo hardy as to move, that the houſe ſhould go in a body, and addreſs the king to take his queen again. Henry hearing of this, ſent for Thomas Audley, the ſpeaker, and, in his perſon, ſeverely reprimanded the commons, for ſuffering a motion to be made concerning an affair, which fell not under their cognizance.

The king wills the commons to conſider the biſhops oaths. Burnet.

Some days after, the king ſent again for the ſpeaker, and told him, that having compared the oath taken by the biſhops to the pope, with that they took to the king, it ſeemed to him, they were but half ſubjects; and, therefore, he deſired the commons to examine the matter, and take care of the intereſt of the crown; but the plague which raged then, at London, and conſtrained the parliament to break up preſently after, hindered the commons from debating upon this affair, at that time. 1532.

The pope complains of the act aboliſhing the annates Burnet.

The power given the king, by the parliament, to aboliſh the annates, or make amicable compoſition with the pope, was a clear evidence, that the act had been procured by the intrigues of the court. The pope was extremely offended at it; but when he complained to the king's agents, he was told, he might have ſaved himſelf that vexation, and there was ſtill a remedy, ſince the king had power to repeal the act. This was an intimation, that he might depend upon it, the king would behave according as he had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his proceedings.

Thomas More reſigns the great ſeal. Hall.

Thomas More, who was lord chancellor, and a perſon of excellent judgment, foreſaw now, the king's proceedings would, in the end, produce a total rupture with Rome. He would have readily conſented, that ſome abuſes ſhould be reformed; but he found, as matters were managed, the reformation would go much farther than he deſired. He put a great difference between withdrawing entirely from the pope's obedience, and retrenching ſome of his uſurpations. So, being unwilling to be inſtrumental in the rupture, he reſigned the great ſeal, on the 10th of May. Some days after, the king made Sir Thomas Audley, lord keeper of the great ſeal, till the 20th of January, 1533, when he was made lord chancellor.

The emperor and Henry equally threaten the pope. Burnet.

Whilſt Henry uſed ſundry means, to ſhew the pope his danger, in obſtinately refuſing what he required, the emperor was no leſs ardently endeavouring to obtain a ſentence in favour of queen Catharine. The way theſe two monarchs applied to the pope, was not by humble intreaties, but by menaces, which had the greater effect, as he was naturally timorous, and ſlow to reſolve, upon things that required a ſpeedy reſolution. By theſe two oppoſite demands, he ſaw himſelf, indeed, between the hammer and the anvil, as he ſaid himſelf, in the beginning of the affair; and, on the other hand, he found by Henry's late proceedings, that England was going to be loſt to him, and his ſucceſſors. This conſideration, was very capable of putting him upon ſeeking expedients to content that monarch, without prejudice to the honour of the holy ſee. He would thereby, have preſerved a kingdom, which had been ever devoted to the popes, and from whence they had drawn large revenues. But on the other hand, the emperor had ſtill an army, in Italy, and was able to revenge his refuſal. Clement, of all things, feared the loſs of Florence, which the emperor could take from him with more eaſe than he had procured him the poſſeſſion. It is no wonder, therefore, if this fear, being the moſt imminent, prevailed. It would be a great miſtake, to aſcribe to this pope any motives of juſtice, equity, good, and benefit of the church, or religion; theſe things, for ſome time, had ſerved only for preambles to bulls.

1532. bulls. His own and his family's intereſt was the ſole rule of his conduct. So, finding himſelf extremely preſſed by the emperor, to paſs ſentence upon queen Catharine's appeal, he could no longer be excuſed from giving him ſome ſatisfaction. He declared, therefore, to the Engliſh agents, that having long expected, in vain, that their maſter would, of himſelf, return to the right way, he was obliged to cite him to Rome. Henry having notice of it, ſent, with all ſpeed, Edward Karne, doctor of law, with the new character of excuſator, to alledge the reaſons againſt a citation, to which the king of England could not be liable. Karne coming to Rome, in March, the pope ſcrupled to receive him as excuſator, a character whereof there was no precedent to be found in the chancery. However, he committed the examination of this title to a congregation, which made no haſte to give their opinion, that the excuſator might not have power, before he was acknowledged, to oppoſe the reſolutions already taken.

A new delay granted the king. Burnet.

At laſt, in a conſiſtory the 8th of July, it was reſolved, that, without examining Henry's reaſons for not appearing, in perſon, he ſhould be intreated to ſend to Rome a proxy, to defend his cauſe. In the interim, as the vacation, which was to laſt till the firſt of October, was then juſt begun, a delay till that time, was tacitly given the king. During this interval, the pope ſent him a brief to require him to ſend a proxy to Rome. At the ſame time he cauſed the following overtures to be made him; that the affair of the divorce ſhould be examined in any indifferent place, by a legate and two auditors of the Rota; which done, the pope himſelf would paſs ſentence. Secondly, that all the ſovereign princes of Chriſtendom ſhould agree to a truce of three or four years, within which time, the pope promiſed to call a general council. The king anſwered, by Sir Thomas Elliot, who was ſent on purpoſe, that he could not agree to a truce, without the king of France's concurrence. Secondly, that it was not a proper juncture to call a council. Laſtly, as for the affair of the divorce, being king of England, he was to take care of the prerogatives of the crown, and the laws of the realm, which allowed not, that any proceſs ſhould be tried in a foreign court; that beſides, the canons of the church expreſly decreed, that all matrimonial cauſes ſhould be judged, in the countries where the parties reſided.

The king proteſts againſt the citation. Act. Pub.

To theſe reaſons, he added, a proteſtation in form, declaring, that he was not obliged to appear at Rome, either in perſon, or by proxy, and tacked to this proteſtation, the determinations of ſome univerſities he had conſulted. However, he propoſed three things to the pope. Firſt, he required, that the cauſe ſhould be decided by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and two other biſhops, or elſe, by the whole clergy of the kingdom. But it muſt be obſerved, that the ſee of Canterbury had been vacant ſince Auguſt, by Warham's death, and, if the pope had cloſed with this propoſal, the king would have failed to fill the ſee with a prelate devoted to him. His ſecond offer was, that the cauſe ſhould be judged by four arbitrators, one to be named by the king, another by the queen, a third by the king of France, and that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be the fourth. In the third place, he propoſed, that the cauſe being judged by the archbiſhop, or by umpires, if the queen ſhould think fit to appeal from the ſentence, the appeal ſhould be brought before three judges, whereof he would name one, the pope another, and the king of France a third. The pope anſwered to theſe propoſals, that he ſaw the king would not recede from his pretended rights, and, therefore, it ſhould not be thought ſtrange, that he reſolved to preſerve his own.

All the obſtacles of the divorce come from the emperor.

However, it is certain, if the pope durſt have ſatisfied the king, he would gladly have done it, by reaſon of his fear to loſe England entirely. It was not the difficulties in the affair of the divorce, that hindered him from proceeding. Had they been much greater than they were, he would have readily overlooked them all; for, ſuppoſing the unlimited power aſſumed by the pope, it was as eaſy for Clement VII, to null Henry's marriage, as it was for Julius II, to grant a diſpenſation; but he had to manage the honour of his ſee, and the intereſt of the emperor, who threatened him, and was able to execute his threats. Had not the emperor been concerned in the affair, it would have been very eaſy to find an expedient to content the king, without prejudice to the papal authority. It was only to aſſure the king, the cauſe ſhould be decided in his favour, and he would have willingly agreed, that the pope ſhould have been the ſole judge. But the pope could give him no ſuch aſſurance, by reaſon of the emperor's oppoſition; and, therefore, Henry could not reſolve to put the affair into his hands, at the hazard of being caſt. Upon this account it was, that he propoſed infallible expedients to gain his cauſe; but on the other hand, the pope could not accept of theſe expedients, without injuring his dignity. Thus, the affair was ſolely retarded, by the emperor's interpoſition. Had it not been for him, the pope would have contented the king, and the king would have ſubmitted to the pope, and remained as before, an obedient ſon of the holy ſee. Hence, therefore, it may be inferred, that the king's proceedings, as well in the late parliament as afterwards, flowed not ſo much from his real opinion, that the papal authority was uſurped, as from his ſeeing no other way to be delivered from his preſent difficulties, than by denying it to be in the pope's power to do what Julius II. had done. It is, however, very likely, he was afterwards fully convinced of the truth of what he aſſerted, at firſt, only out of neceſſity. On the other hand, if the pope paſſed ſentence againſt Henry, as we ſhall ſee preſently, it was not from a belief that his marriage with Catharine was lawful, but ſolely to ſave the honour of the holy ſee, and through fear of, or complaiſance for, the emperor. And here, who can forbear admiring the ſecret ways of Pro-

1532. vidence, which rendered a reconciliation between the pope and the king impracticable, in order to produce an event, which was to be attended with ſo momentous conſequences for England.

Henry is cited to Rome. Herbert.

At length, the vacation being over, Henry was cited the fourth of October, to appear at Rome, either in perſon or by proxy, and Karne ſolemnly proteſted againſt the citation. What has been ſaid happened before the emperor's arrival, at Bologna. Clement VII, who was going, immediately, after the citation, to confer with that prince, promiſed Karne, that all proceedings ſhould be ſuſpended ſo long as the emperor was in Italy. This was all the favour Karne could obtain *.

The affairs between England and Scotland. Buchanan. Hall.

Whilſt Henry ſeemed wholly employed in the affair of his divorce, a quarrel aroſe between England and Scotland. Buchanan pretends, Henry willing to take advantage of his union with France, and imagining, Francis I, would ſuffer him to oppreſs king James, made inroads into Scotland, as if he intended to renew the war. He adds, that the only pretence of this rupture, was, that the Scots had ſpoken ſome injurious words againſt the Engliſh. Be this as it will, the king of Scotland being prepared for his defence, Henry thought not fit to purſue his deſign. He choſe rather to agree, that the difference, ſhould be decided by the king of France's mediation, who for that purpoſe ſent an ambaſſador to Newcaſtle. The king of Scotland was ſo offended with Francis for ſo coolly eſpouſing his cauſe, that he was going to join with the emperor; but, at length, all was happily adjuſted, and the two kings of England and Scotland remained friends as before.

1533. A league concluded at Rome, for the ſecurity of Italy. Guicciard.

It was not for Henry's intereſt to undertake a war againſt Scotland, when he was to prepare for his defence againſt the emperor. It was extremely probable, the pope had not engaged to judge queen Catharine's appeal, without being firſt aſſured, that the emperor, the queen's nephew, would execute the ſentence. This, indeed, was his deſign, but the troubles which came upon him, hindered his engaging in that enterpriſe. He reckoned, that the Italian league before-mentioned, would be a ſure defence for the duchy of Milan; but he ſoon perceived, he was himſelf the dupe of the politick pope. This league was, at length, ſigned at Bologna, the 24th of February, 1533, according to his wiſh. Every ſovereign that had dominions in Italy, the Venetians excepted, engaged to find a certain ſum, monthly, for the maintenance of an army, which Antonio de Leva was to command, as general of the league. The emperor's intention was, that the army ſhould conſiſt of his own troops, and be conſtantly maintained; but the deſign of the confederates was very different. They had conſented to the league only that the emperor, having nothing to fear for Italy, might withdraw all his troops; but they never meant, that the army, maintained at their expence, ſhould ſerve to keep them in ſubjection, which would neceſſarily be the caſe, if the army continued always on foot, under the command of the emperor's general. They repreſented to him, therefore, that the league being defenſive, it was not proper to continue an army without neceſſity, to ruin them in expences; but upon the firſt motion of the French, they would not fail to perform their agreements. What arguments ſoever the emperor alledged, it was not poſſible to bring them to what he deſired; wherefore, he was forced to be ſatisfied with their promiſes, becauſe he was not in condition to maintain an army, in Italy, at his own charge. Then he disbanded part of his troops, and ſent the reſt to Naples and Spain. He departed from Bologna, about the end of February, and came to Genoa, where he ſtaid ſome time; after which, on the 8th of April, he embarqued for Spain, extremely diſpleaſed with the pope, who through all his diſguiſes, could not help ſhewing his inclination to France. Indeed, he was now agreed with the cardinals of Tournon and Grammont upon an interview with Francis, and the marriage of Catharine de Medici, with the duke of Orleans. 1533.

The affairs of Germany. Herbert.

The ſtate of Italy was not the only thing that employed the emperor. He had, as was obſerved, promiſed the Proteſtants a free council in Germany; but tho' the word free was equally uſed by thoſe who demanded a council, and by him that promiſed it, they were far from meaning the ſame thing. The Proteſtants underſtood, by that word, that a council ſhould be held in Germany, where not only they might have free acceſs and full liberty to produce their reaſons, but alſo, that the points in diſpute ſhould be decided ſolely by the word of God. The emperor meant, on the contrary, to retain only an outward ſhew of the word, and by rendering his party ſuperior in the council, to cauſe matters to be ſo decided, that the Proteſtants ſhould be forced, either to revoke all their innovations, or reject the council's deciſions. In the latter caſe, which was moſt likely, the emperor plainly perceived, they would give him a pretence to attack them, which was the thing he intended. But in the execution of this deſign, a great obſtacle occurred; viz. a council, let it be what it would, was a terror to the pope. Tho' he knew the emperor demanded a council, not with intent to alter religion, yet he was afraid of being ſacrificed to the Proteſtants, if that monarch's intereſt required it; beſides, the ſtrict alliance between Francis and Henry made him uneaſy. In ſhort, he could not reſolve to call a council, without being ſure of managing it as he pleaſed; and this could ſcarce be expected, as matters then ſtood in Chriſtendom. Since his being on the papal throne, he had pleaſed neither the emperor, nor the king of France, nor the king of England, nor the potentates of Italy, and yet, of the ſubjects of all theſe ſovereigns was the council chiefly to conſiſt. He knew himſelf to be a baſtard, and that alone

1533. to be ſufficient to depoſe him, in caſe his enemies were ſuperior in the council. What had paſſed at Conſtance and Baſil, gave him juſt reaſon to dread that a council, held in a free city of Germany, might form the ſame deſigns. Upon all theſe conſiderations, when the emperor deſired him, at the conference of Bologna, to call a council, he forbore to give a poſitive anſwer; contenting himſelf with committing the examination of his requeſt, to certain cardinals, under pretence of being informed of the reaſons pro and con. The popes have a character to ſuſtain, which often throws them into great perplexity. In publick, they muſt make ſhew of a great zeal for God's glory, for religion, and for the good of the church, and withal, of a great diſintereſtedneſs for every thing, which, perſonally, concerns them; but, for fear what they, thus, profeſs, outwardly, ſhould be taken literally, they muſt, in private, undeceive thoſe who treat with them, and diſcover to them, that their own intereſt is the principal ſubject of the negotiation. So, what they ſay publickly, is always juſt and right, and ſeems to tend only to the greater glory of God; but, in the end, it is too frequently perceived, that religion ſerves only for a cloak to their temporal concerns. On the preſent occaſion, a general council ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary, to put an end to the troubles, cauſed by the religious differences, in ſeveral places, and, particularly, in Germany. The pope not only agreed upon a council with the emperor, but even feigned to wiſh it heartily. In the interim, as a council was contrary to his intereſts, reaſons, drawn from the good and advantage of religion, were to be found to reject it, or defer the convening. This was done by the commiſſioners, appointed to examine the emperor's requeſt. They drew a memorial, ſetting forth the neceſſity of a council, but ſhewing withal, the inconveniences of admitting the Proteſtants to diſpute upon matters already ſettled, and the uſeleſſneſs of the ſame council, if they were not admitted. This memorial being communicated to Francis, he anſwered to it, by another, demonſtrating, that the inconveniences mentioned in the firſt, ought not to hinder the calling of a council; moreover, he particularly chalked out the methods which were to be uſed, to baniſh all partiality. But this memorial was not acceptable to the emperor, becauſe a free council was not what he deſired, but a council that would afford him an opportunity and pretence to attack the Proteſtants of Germany; after which, he did not deſpair of bringing the Catholicks alſo under his yoke. Francis anſwered the emperor's reaſons againſt his memorial, but it was to no purpoſe; for, it was almoſt impoſſible that two princes, whoſe intereſts were ſo oppoſite, and who were ſo jealous of each other, ſhould agree in any point. Thus, the pope had his wiſh, ſince the calling of the council was deferred to a more proper ſeaſon. I muſt now ſpeak of what paſſed, in England, in the year 1533.

A ſeſſion of the parliament in England. Herbert.

Whilſt the pope and emperor were conferring at Bologna, Henry aſſembled the parliament the 4th of February. As, hitherto, the pope had not relaxed, in the leaſt, except that he had delayed the excommunication, wherewith he had menaced the king, it was deemed proper to proceed farther, and let him ſee, he was not at all feared. So, the parliament paſſed an act, expreſly forbidding all appeals to Rome, on pain of incurring a Præmunire. This was to convince the pope, there was no occaſion for him, ſince, at the very time that the point in queſtion, between him and the king was, to know whether the affair of the divorce ſhould be judged in England, people were forbid to carry their cauſes to Rome. But there was another reaſon which induced Henry to procure this act; viz. having heard that Francis was going to make an alliance with the pope, he imagined, that for the future, his friend would act but faintly in his favour; and, therefore, he was now determined to have his cauſe tried in the kingdom, without troubling himſelf any farther about the pope's proceedings againſt him. The archbiſhoprick of Canterbury being vacant by Warham's death, it was neceſſary to fill the ſee, that the ſentence might be given by the primate of England; wherefore, Henry had caſt his eyes on Dr. Thomas Cranmer, then in Germany. But, contrary to his expectation, he had found the doctor more averſe to accept, than others would have been eager to deſire that high dignity. It was ſix months before he could be perſuaded to take upon him that burden. In fine, his reluctance being conquered by the king's patience, he began his journey to London, tho' very ſlowly, in hopes the king might alter his mind. However, as a farther delay was directly contrary to the king's meaſures, Cranmer could no longer defer ſubmitting to his will. The king himſelf undertook to demand his bulls, which, tho' 11 in all, were rated at 900 ducats. The pope forbore of his own accord, to require the annates, foreſeeing they would be refuſed. To enable Cranmer to be at this charge, the king made him a preſent of the revenues of the archbiſhoprick, from the 9th of September laſt year. Theſe obſtacles being removed, there aroſe another much more conſiderable; Cranmer refuſed to take the uſual oath to the pope, believing he could not do it with a ſafe conſcience. In his firſt journey into Germany, he had read Luther's books, which entirely convinced him of the truth of many of the Proteſtant tenets, and particularly of the little foundation in ſcripture, for the ſpiritual power aſſumed by the pope over the whole church. Conſequently, he could not reſolve to ſwear an obedience, which in his opinion, was not due to him. In the interim, Henry conſidering Cranmer, as a perſon, who by his principles and reſolution could effectually ſerve him, in the deciſion of the affair of the divorce, of which he deſired to ſee the end, preſſed him ſo earneſtly to ſwear the cuſtomary oath, that he was prevailed with, at length, by an expedient propoſed to him; viz. to make a formal proteſtation againſt the oath he was to take. This is by no means one of his moſt commendable actions. He was, however, conſecrated the 13th of March, according to Burnet;

The convocation of Canterbury and York, decide the points about the divorce, for the king. Act. Pub.

This affair being ended, the king required the convocation of the province of Canterbury, to give their opinion upon theſe two points. Firſt, whether pope Julius's diſpenſation for the king's marriage with Catharine was ſufficient, and able to render ſuch a marriage valid? Secondly, whether it was ſufficiently proved, that Arthur had conſummated his marriage with Catharine? Whereupon, the convocation declared, on the 5th of April, that the pope had not power to diſpenſe contrary to the law of God, and the conſummation of Arthur's marriage was proved, as far as a thing of that nature could be. The convocation of York made the like deciſion, the 13th of May following.

Francis ſends de Bellay to London. Mezerai. Bellay.

Whilſt the clergy were employed in debtaing theſe points, Henry wrote to Francis, deſiring him to ſend a truſty perſon, to whom he might diſcover ſome things, which he would not make publick. Whereupon Francis ſent William de Bellay, lord of Langeais, ordering him to acquaint the king, that he had concluded a marriage between his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, and Catharine de Medici, and that the pope and himſelf were to meet at Marſeilles, to celebrate the nuptials; that, in ſuch a juncture, he believed his preſence would be very neceſſary, to negotiate his own affairs himſelf, with the pope; but, in caſe he did not think proper to be at the interview, he would do well to ſend ſome perſon on his part. Langeais being come to London, the king told him, that Clement VII, having obſtinately refuſed to appoint him judges, in England, he had determined, at length, to proceed; and, therefore, had already eſpouſed Ann Bullen, with a reſolution to have his marriage nulled by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. That, however, he would keep his ſecond marriage private, till May, to ſee what the king of France could do with the biſhop of Rome (for ſo he called the pope;) but, if he could obtain nothing, his deſign was to withdraw himſelf wholly from the papal authority. He imagined then, the pope and Francis would meet in May, but it was not till October. He told Langeais farther, that he had compoſed a treatiſe upon the incroachments of the biſhops of Rome, and the prerogatives of ſovereign princes; but would not publiſh it, till he ſaw no hopes of a reconciliation.

Henry makes his marriage publick.

A remark on that ſubject.

Soon after, the king's marriage with Ann Bullen was made publick, which, certainly, was very wrong. Since the king was reſolved to have his firſt marriage nulled, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he ſhould have ſtaid till the ſentence was pronounced. All that can be ſaid, in excuſe of this irregular conduct, is, that the new queen was four months gone with child, and her breeding could hardly be concealed any longer; but, notwithſtanding this, the king might have cauſed his firſt marriage to be nulled a little ſooner, or the ſecond, to be publiſhed a little later, ſince there was but a month between the publication, and the ſentence. However this be, Henry deſpairing to prevail with the pope, and not much fearing him, thought to have no farther regard either for him or the publick, being almoſt aſſured of ſucceeding in whatever he undertook, conſidering how the people ſtood affected. In a word, being fully determined to end the affair, he ſo ordered, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury demanded his leave to ſummon queen Catharine. Before he came to this extremity, he tried more than once, to perſuade the queen to conſent to the divorce; but all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he granted the archbiſhop the leave he deſired. The queen was, therefore, cited to appear, at Dunſtable, in the neighbourhood of the place where ſhe reſided, the 20th of May; but as ſhe refuſed to appear, the archbiſhop gave ſentence the 23d of the ſame month, declaring the king's marriage with Catharine null, as being contrary to the law of God. On the 28th, at Lambeth, by another ſentence, he confirmed the king's marriage with Ann Bullen, and on the firſt of June the new queen was crowned. 1533.

Cranmer cites the queen, and upon her not appearing pronounces ſentence, Act. Pub. and confirms the king's ſecond marriage.

Thus, ended this famous proceſs, the iſſue whereof afforded no leſs matter for divers reflections, than the beginning, every one reaſoning, as ſwayed by prejudice or intereſt. Thoſe who were againſt the king, took notice of his error, in eſpouſing a ſecond wife, before his firſt marriage was legally diſſolved. Moreover, they ſaid, that of all the prelates in England, Cranmer was the laſt that ſhould have been choſen for judge, ſince he had ſo openly declared againſt the firſt marriage. That his partiality was apparent, not only in his haſte to give ſentence, but alſo in his confirming the king's ſecond marriage, which had been conſummated, whilſt the firſt ſtill ſubſiſted.

Reflections on the king's conduct. Burnet.

Reaſons alledged for the king.

Thoſe who were for the king, affirmed, the ſentence was but a mere formality, which rendered not the marriage void, but only declared it ſo. That it ſufficed, the ſentence was conformable to the determinations of the Engliſh clergy, and all the univerſities, in Europe, and to the ſentiments of the pope himſelf, who would have nulled the marriage, had he not been biaſſed by worldly conſiderations. They juſtified Cranmer, by alledging, that having changed his character, ſince his declaring for the divorce, that declaration ought not to hinder him from being judge, no more than a lawyer when he comes to ſit on the bench, is debarred the trying of cauſes in which he formerly gave counſel. That tho' there were ſome default, in the form, it could not be denied, the ſentence was juſt, in itſelf, which was ſufficient to quiet the king's conſcience, who alone was concerned in the affair. As for the new queen, no fault could be found with her conduct, ſince ſhe proved not with child, till after her marriage, whether the king eſpouſed her in November laſt year, or, in the January following. As for queen Catharine, it could not be thought ſtrange, that ſhe ſhould maintain the validity of her ſecond marriage; but it was juſtly wondered at, ſhe ſhould ſo obſtinately deny the conſummation of the firſt,

1533. which was proved by all poſſible evidence. But as moſt people were then biaſſed on one ſide or other, we are not to judge of this affair, by what was publiſhed in thoſe days, but by reaſon and equity; let us, therefore, briefly conſider it in that view, independently of the prejudices cauſed by the conſequences. It will not, perhaps, be unacceptable to the reader, to ſee here a ſhort recapitulation of the conduct of the chief actors in this ſcene. I ſhall confine myſelf to this, without fully examining the proceſs, which is not ſo much the buſineſs of a hiſtorian, as of a divine or civilian.

Remarks upon the proceſs of the divorce, and the conduct of the principal parties.

Upon the king.

It is almoſt impoſſible to know, poſitively, whether Henry, when he undertook the affair of the divorce, was convinced, that his marriage was contrary to the law of God, or, at leaſt, really troubled in conſcience, upon that account; all that can be ſaid in his favour, is, that he himſelf affirmed as much, and none but the ſearcher of all hearts can know, whether he thought as he ſpoke. It cannot be denied, that the ſole conſideration of ſuch a marriage, is, of itſelf, capable of breeding ſuch ſcruples, eſpecially, as the king's might be confirmed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury's, and the biſhop of Lincoln's, his confeſſor; but, on the other hand, it may be conjectured, from ſeveral circumſtances, that it was only a pretence to put away Catharine, and marry Ann Bullen. In the firſt place, he had lived 18 years with the queen, without ſhewing any ſcruples. In the ſecond place, if he was not in love with Ann Bullen, when his ſcruples firſt ſeiſed him, it cannot be denied, he was very much ſo, when he moſt ardently preſſed the affair of the divorce; ſo it may be conjectured, that his love might turn into belief, what, at firſt, was only a doubt. In the third place, very probably, it was cardinal Wolſey that inſpired, by himſelf, or another, the king with theſe ſcruples, to be revenged of the emperor and the queen. This bold and daring miniſter imagined, either the affair would eaſily ſucceed, conſidering his great credit at the court of Rome, or, in caſe of oppoſition, it would be no more difficult on this than on ſeveral other occaſions, to cauſe the king to alter his mind; but Henry's love unexpectedly happening, Wolſey found he had taken wrong meaſures. Beſides, the determinations of the univerſities did not a little contribute, without doubt, to confirm the king in his opinion. However, without farther inquiry, whether Henry was ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe, let us conſider, in few words, how he behaved in ſo nice an affair. He ſuppoſed, that Julius II. could not grant a diſpenſation for his marriage, and conſequently the marriage was void of it ſelf; and yet, he thought he wanted Clement VII's bull to declare it ſo. Herein was a contradiction, which could not but greatly embarraſs him; for, if Julius's diſpenſation was null by the law of God, it was needleſs to revoke it; and, if a revocation was neceſſary, conſequently it was good till revoked. Thus, Henry was bound, till the pope ſhould pleaſe to decide the point. Wherefore, when Cranmer had given him another notion of this affair, by intimating to him, that, independently of the power aſſumed by the pope, the chief thing was to be aſſured of the right, by the opinions of the learned, he cried out in a tranſport of joy, "he had got, at laſt, the "right ſow by the ear;" that is, he found in Cranmer's advice, a ſolution of the difficulties, he could not get clear of, in following the doubtful principle of the pope's power, becauſe its extent was not ſettled. He reſolved, therefore, to procure the opinions of the univerſities; but, at length, weighing the conſequences of a rupture with Rome, he reſumed the firſt way, and applied again to the pope. By this he wronged his cauſe very much; for, in taking the pope for judge, it was no longer in his power to limit the authority he was willing to acknowledge; but he was excuſable, ſince it was hardly poſſible to throw off, at once, his prejudice, with reſpect to the papal power, whereof he had not, at firſt, ſo clear an idea, as afterwards. Then, finding the pope acted only from worldly conſiderations, which hindered him from giving him the ſatisfaction he required, he returned to the way he had left; ſo, proceeding upon his own conviction, and the determinations of the univerſities, he cauſed his marriage to be declared null, without regarding the pope's authority, which he was reſolved to forſake. I omit the reaſons he alledged to prove the neceſſity of his divorce, That of conſcience was, doubtleſs, the beſt, if ſincere. That relating to the uncertainty of the ſucceſſion was proper to demand a ſentence. but not to ground the divorce upon, becauſe the divorce ſuppoſed the marriage void, which was to be judged.

A remark on the pope.

Let us now conſider the pope's conduct, where we find nothing ſavouring of Chriſt's vicar. Clement VII. never examined the caſe, by the maxims of religion, juſtice, or equity, but always with regard to his own or family's intereſt. If he had attended to what religion required, he would have examined, whether Henry's marriage was contrary to the law of God, and whether, in that caſe, a pope had power to grant a diſpenſation. If he had been convinced, that Julius II. aſſumed a right, which belonged not to him, he ſhould have readily granted Henry the bull he demanded; but, if, on the contrary, he was perſuaded, the marriage was agreeable to the divine law, or not being ſo, it was in the power of a pope to grant a diſpenſation, he would have confirmed it, and tried to remove the king's ſcruples, without ſeeking ſo many evaſions; which was the duty of a pope. But inſtead of acting in this manner, he conſidered only what good or hurt might accrue to him, from the king's demand, independently of the juſtice or injuſtice of the thing. Whilſt he was priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo, or fugitive at Orvieto, and thought he ſtood in need of Henry, he poſſitively promiſed to content him. Afterwards, he only amuſed him, till, by the emperor's means, he had recovered Florence. As ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion of that ſtate, which he had ſo much deſired, he avocated the proceſs to Rome, but, in all appearance, 1533. with intent never to decide it, if he could help it; becauſe, whilſt the two parties remained uncertain of the deciſion, he made himſelf neceſſary to both. Can it, therefore, be ſaid, there was any ſign of juſtice or religion in his proceedings? Certainly, if Henry was to blame, as it is pretended, to feign ſcruples, on purpoſe to gratify his paſſion, Clement was no leſs ſo, not to try to reclaim him before the affair was began, or to content him, in caſe his ſcruples were well grounded. Tho' Henry had acted only through paſſion, which is, however, very uncertain, he would have been much more excuſable than the pope, who, in the poſt he filled, ought to have proceeded upon very different principles.

Remarks on the emperor.

As for the emperor, he undoubtedly acted, in this affair, from motives of honour, intereſt, and policy, without juſtice or religion being concerned in his proceedings. He looked upon the queen of England, his aunt's divorce, as a diſhonour, which added to his intereſt to create Henry troubles, who was in ſtrict alliance with France, was but too capable of inducing him to obſtruct it, to the utmoſt of his power.

On queen Catharine.

As for queen Catharine, very probably, ſhe acted with ſincerity. As ſhe believed the pope's authority unlimited, ſhe thought herſelf the king's lawful wife, and in that belief, did not think herſelf obliged to reſign her right to another, on pretence of the king her husband's ſcruples, which, in her opinion, were groundleſs; beſides, ſhe could not own her marriage null, without greatly injuring her daughter, the princeſs Mary. Tho' ſhe had been convinced her marriage was not lawful in itſelf, ſhe believed the pope had power to render it valid, being ready, however, to ſubmit to the ſame authority as ſoon as it ſhould be declared. Nevertheleſs, ſhe may be juſtly ſuſpected of having taken a falſe oath, to make her cauſe better.

On Ann Bullen.

Much has been ſaid againſt Ann Bullen; but without inſiſting upon Sander's invectives, which have been ſufficiently refuted *, ſhe can be charged, before marriage, but with one ſingle fault, viz. her yielding to the king, before his marriage with Catharine was nulled. But it was very difficult for a young lady of her rank, to have reſolution enough to reſiſt the temptation of being a queen, if ſhe could be ſo lawfully, as it is likely the king made her believe. However, it cannot be ſaid, ſhe yielded to the king's deſires before her marriage; for he eſpouſed her, at the lateſt, in January, and ſhe was not brought to bed till September; ſo there is nothing in that which can give occaſion for any ſuſpicion.

As for the reſt, who were concerned in this affair, as the cardinals, and the king's, and the emperor's miniſters, it may be affirmed, they acted only from worldly views, without any regard to religion. 1533.

On the pope's, the king's, and the emperor's agents.

It cannot be ſaid, the univerſities of France and England, decided the queſtions propoſed, with entire freedom, ſince it is known what an influence ſovereigns have upon the actions of their ſubjects, when they are concerned. As to the univerſities of Italy, both parties accuſed one another of having corrupted them, the one by money, and the other by menaces. As for the Engliſh clergy, they had lately received ſuch a check, that they had reaſon to dread giving the king a freſh occaſion of anger. But it cannot be thence inferred, that they decided contrary to their ſentiments, ſince it often happens, the truth is not oppoſite to our intereſt. The ſame may be ſaid of Cranmer, who being now tinctured with Luther's doctrine, could not look upon Julius's diſpenſation as capable of rendering a marriage valid, which in itſelf, was null and repugnant to the law of God. Indeed, he may have earneſtly embraced this opportunity, to give a mortal wound to the papal authority, in order to promote the reformation; but it cannot be affirmed, that he acted againſt his knowledge, in pronouncing the ſentence of divorce; at leaſt, his whole behaviour was directly oppoſite to ſuch obliquities.

On the univerſities.

On Cranmer.

By what has been ſaid, it may be eaſily perceived, that in this affair, which was properly a caſe of conſcience, very few of the actors had any but political views, without much regard to the precepts of religion. Nevertheleſs, God who directs all the actions of men, without their knowing very often themſelves to what they may tend, drew from the proceedings of Henry, Clement, and Charles, the end he deſigned, that is, the reformation of the church of England, as will be ſeen in the ſequel. If any one deſires fully to examine the caſe of Henry VIII's divorce, he would do well to caſt off all prejudice, and take care not to be miſled by the authors who have wrote on this ſubject; but, if a man is contented with examining it hiſtorically, he is to conſider only the political views of the principal actors.

Catharine remains inflexible. Burnet.

The ſentence of divorce being made publick, Henry took care to acquaint Catharine with it, by the lord Mountjoy, who tried, in vain, to perſuade her to ſubmit; for ſhe ſtill remained inflexible, affirming, ſhe would be the king's wife, till the pope had nulled the marriage. This anſwer being brought to the king, he ordered her to be ſtiled

* Sanders, has aſſured the world, that the king liking her mother, ſent her husband, Sir Thomas Bullen, ambaſſador to France, and, in his abſence, begot Ann Bullen upon his wife. At his return, he ſued a divorce againſt her, in the archbiſhop's court; but the king letting him know ſhe was with child by him, he was, upon the king's deſire, reconciled to his wife. Thus, Ann Bullen, tho' ſhe went under the name of Sir Thomas's daughter, yet was of the king's begetting. As he deſcribes her, ſhe was ill-ſhaped and ugly, had ſix fingers, a gag-tooth, and a tumour under her chin. At 15 years of age, he affirms, both her father's butler and chaplain lay with her; and when in France, ſhe led ſuch a diſſolute life, that ſhe was called the Engliſh Hackney. That the French king liking her, ſhe was called the King's Mule. But returning to England, ſhe gained the king's affection by the appearance of a ſevere virtue, with which ſhe diſguiſed herſelf. The ſame author adds, that the king had likewiſe enjoyed her ſiſter, with a great deal more to the diſgrace of this lady and her family. Hence we may ſee to what a height of rancour and malice bigotry and blind zeal in religious matters, are capable of carrying a man! Burnet.

Soon after, he notified his divorce, and new marriage, to all the ſovereigns, and particularly to the emperor, who coldly told the Engliſh ambaſſador, he would conſider what he was to do in the caſe.

The pope nulls the archbiſhop's ſentence. Herbert.

The news of the king's marriage, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſentence, having reached Rome, the pope was extremely angry with Henry, and the more, as a copy of his book, againſt the papal authority, had now appeared, in Rome itſelf. The cardinals of the imperial faction improving this occaſion, very earneſtly preſſed him to give ſentence againſt the king, remonſtrating to him, that if he reſented not ſuch an affront, the authority of the holy ſee would be at an end. Theſe remonſtrances produced their effect; for the pope nulled the archbiſhop's ſentence, and declared, that the king, himſelf, was liable to excommunication, unleſs, by September next, he reſtored the cauſe to its former ſtate. He contented himſelf, for this time, with only menacing him, becauſe he did not yet deſpair of reclaiming him, by the king of France's means, with whom he was going to confer, at Marſeilles.

The pope's deſign in the interview of Marſeilles.

The pope's aim, in this interview, was, firſt to celebrate the nuptials between Catharine, his niece, and the duke of Orleans. In the next place, to deviſe with Francis ſome expedient, to adjuſt his differences with the king of England, or, if that could not be done, to diſengage Francis from Henry's intereſt. Francis wiſhed, with all his heart, that ſome way might be found to reconcile them, becauſe he hoped to join in a league with both, the more eaſily to recover the duchy of Milan. Henry had uſed his utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade him from this interview, being apprehenſive it would produce between Francis and Clement an union, which could not but be to his prejudice. He had ever reckoned, that Francis would act in concert with him, to frighten the pope, and that their threats would induce him, at laſt, to give him the ſatisfaction he required; but perceiving he could not prevail, he had publiſhed his marriage. From that time, he was fully bent to widen the breach with Rome, unleſs the pope and the king of France ſhould find, during their interview, ſome ſatisfactory expedient, for which he was very willing to wait. In the interim, he ſent the duke of Norfolk in ambaſſy to Francis, with orders to accompany him to Marſeilles, and ſee whether there was yet any hopes of agreement.

The duke of Norfolk coming to the French court, the 1ſt of July, waited upon the king, who was then on his journey to Marſeilles, intending, however, to make ſome ſtay in Languedoc, before he went to the congreſs. He accompanied him ſome time, but hearing, the beginning of Auguſt, what was done at Rome, againſt the king, his maſter, would have returned, imagining his preſence would be of little ſervice, at Marſeilles. Nevertheleſs, at the king of France's ſollicitation, he contented himſelf with ſending the lord Rochfort for freſh inſtructions from the king, who, immediately, recalled him. However, Francis ſo artfully managed Henry, that he perſuaded him to ſend ſome perſon to Marſeilles, to be a witneſs of what ſhould paſs at the interview. Henry made choice of Stephen Gardiner, Sir John Wallop, and Sir Francis Brian, with Edmund Bonner, a very proper perſon to execute the orders he gave him.

The duke of Orleans's marriage.

The pope and Francis met at Marſeilles, the beginning of October, and within a few days, the duke of Orleans conſummated his marriage with Catharine de Medici. This affair being ended, Francis ſollicited the pope, in behalf of the king of England, and prevailed with him, at laſt, to give Henry entire ſatisfaction; but, to ſave the honour of the holy ſee, he would judge the cauſe himſelf, in a conſiſtory, from which the cardinals of the emperor's faction ſhould be excluded. Thus far, all went very well; but Bonner, to whom, doubtleſs, it was not thought fit to diſcover this ſecret, demanding an audience of the pope, acquainted him with the king his maſter's appeal to the next general council, from the ſentence given, or to be given againſt him. The pope told him, before he declared himſelf, he would adviſe with the cardinals that were with him. Some days after, having ſent for Bonner, he gave him for anſwer, that, according to the opinion of the cardinals, the appeal was unlawful. Bonner, without, being ſurpriſed at this reply, acquainted him, in the ſame manner, with the like appeal of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, from the ſentence which nulled his judgment for the divorce. This put the pope into ſuch a rage, that he talked of throwing Bonner into a cauldron of melted lead. Guicciardini affirms, Francis was ſo offended with Bonner's inſolence, that he offered the pope to do all that lay in his power, to procure him ſatisfaction for this affront. But if this be true, it was only a mere compliment.

The biſhop of Paris is ſent to Henry, with freſh expedients. Herbert.

Clement departed from Marſeilles, the 12th of November, as much pleaſed with Francis, as he was diſſatisfied with Henry. In the interim, Francis not deſpairing, yet to adjuſt this affair, ſent into England John de Bellay, biſhop of Paris, to propound new expedients to the king. This prelate, who had reſided, ſome time, at the court of England, as ambaſſador, wrought ſo with Henry, that he perſuaded him, at length, to agree to an expedient he propoſed to him. So, pleaſed with having obtained more than he durſt have expected, he very readily undertook to carry the good news, himſelf, to the pope, tho' it was then in the depth of winter; and he found the pope inclined to do what he could, to end the affair amicably, and drew from him a poſitive promiſe, that the cauſe ſhould be judged, at Cambray, by ſuch as Henry ſhould have no reaſon to except againſt. But Clement, not truſting entirely to a verbal promiſe, deſired to have it under the king's own

1533. own hand, that he approved of what was concerted; moreover, to avoid all delays and evaſions, he fixed the day for the return of the courier, who was to be ſent into England.

This weighty affair being, thus, upon the point of concluſion, the emperor's agents were very urgent with the pope, to revoke his engagement; but he told them he had given his word. However, they repeated their inſtances with ſuch earneſtneſs, that, at length, they got him to promiſe, if Henry's anſwer came not by the time appointed, he ſhould think himſelf diſengaged. The courier not returning on the day appointed, the Imperialiſts preſſed the pope to give ſentence againſt Henry, repreſenting to him, that he was amuſed, and threatning him with the emperor's reſentment. In ſhort, they ſo ardently ſollicited him, that tho' the biſhop of Paris only deſired a delay of ſix days, he could not obtain it. The pope, frighted by the threats of the Imperialiſts, was ſo entirely devoted to them, that what ſhould have been done, according to the uſual forms, in three conſiſtories, was done in one. In a word, the pope, without ſtaying for an anſwer from England, publiſhed a ſentence, declaring Henry's marriage with Catharine good and lawful, and requiring him to take his wife again, with denunciation of cenſures, in caſe of diſobedience. Two days after came the courier, with full powers for the biſhop of Paris, as the pope had deſired. Several cardinals moved to revoke what had been done; but the emperor's party preſſed him ſo cloſely, that the motion was rejected. Thus, the pope, who had amuſed the king for ſix years, by affected delays, could not be perſuaded to grant him ſix days, and by this precipitation, was the cauſe of the Romiſh church's loſs of the kingdom of England.

The pope publiſhes a ſentence againſt Henry.

It muſt, however, be confeſs'd, that it is very difficult to conceive what the king's view was, in the agreement he pretended to make with the pope. Can it be ſuppoſed he meant to quit his newly acquired title of ſupreme head of the church of England? But he appeared ſo jealous, during the reſt of his days, of this ſupremacy, which kept the clergy in awe, whereas before, the clergy depended more on the pope, than on him, that there is no likelihood he would think of parting with this prerogative. And yet, how could the king's ſupremacy ſubſiſt, in caſe he agreed with the pope? Or, how could the pope reſolve to content him, with reſpect to his divorce, without requiring him to reſign his ſupremacy? Certainly, it is impoſſible to reconcile theſe two things; which gives occaſion to ſuſpect, the king acted not with ſincerity, in his pretended agreement with the pope, and after having juſtified his divorce, by the ſentence he would have obtained from him, meant to drop him there, and withdraw from his obedience. This ſuſpicion is confirmed, by what paſſed in England, at the very time the king diſpatched the courier to Rome, with the engagement the pope had deſired. I have obſerved, that the biſhop of Paris went poſt from London, about the end of December; 1533. that upon his arrival at Rome, he ſent a courier to the king, to acquaint him with what he had obtained of the pope; and that the king ſent back the ſame courier with his approbation. Now, what ſpeed ſoever the biſhop and courier could make, it is impoſſible the courier could return to Rome before the middle of January; but at the very time the king diſpatched the courier, he held, at Weſtminſter, a parliament, where acts were paſſed directly contrary to the agreement he ſeemed to deſire.

A remark on the king's conduct.

1534. A parliament. Hall.

The parliament meeting the 15th of January, 1534, opened the ſeſſion, with repealing the ſtatute of Henry IV, againſt hereticks. This was not with deſign to exempt them from the penalties, in that ſtatute, ſince it was enacted in this, that they ſhould be burned, but only to hinder the clergy from being ſole judges in cauſes of this nature. That was the real intent of the new act, whereby, for the future, hereticks were to be proſecuted and tried, according to the laws of the land, without any regard to the canon law.

An act to take from the clergy the cognizance of hereſy.

By another ſtatute, which the parliament paſſed, at the ſame time, it was enacted, firſt, that all convocations ſhould be called, for the future, by the king's writ. Secondly, that the king ſhould name 32 perſons, 16 of both houſes of parliament, and as many of the clergy, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with power to abrogate or confirm ſuch as they thought fit. As it is certain the parliament acted, by the directions of the court, it may eaſily be conceived, the king was not much inclined to agree with the pope, tho' by the engagement he did ſend, or had already ſent, to Rome, he ſeemed reſolved.

Another ſtatute, whereby the king is impowered to name 32 commiſſioners to reform the canons.

Here is another argument of the little regard Henry had for the pope, at the very time he was going to obtain all his deſires. Before the news came to England of the ſentence againſt the king, the parliament paſſed an act of attainder, againſt Elizabeth Barton, commonly called the holy maid of Kent, who, pretending to be inſpired, foretold, that "if the king married Ann Bullen, he ſhould "not be a king a month longer." This nun having been wrought upon, and inſtructed by a certain curate, counterfeited the propheteſs, and mixed, with her predictions, invectives againſt the king's proceedings, in the affair of the divorce, and menaces againſt his chief counſellors. Several Franciſcans countenanced her pretended revelations, ſo that ſhe was in great repute with the people; nay, archbiſhop Warham, Sir Thomas More, and John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, were deceived with the reſt. But, at length, the nun, and her accomplices, being apprehended, by the king's order, the affair was ſo carefully examined, that the whole contrivance was diſcovered, and the counterfeit propheteſs condemned to die, with her corrupters. However, as the affair had made a great noiſe, the king was pleaſed it ſhould be brought before the parliament, to render their condemnation more authentick. Sanders would fain reckon this 1534. this nun and her accomplices for martyrs, tho' their own confeſſions ſufficiently juſtified their condemnation. If the king had really intended to be reconciled to the court of Rome, nothing could be more unſeaſonable, than to paſs this act, when the affair of the divorce, ſeemed to be upon the point of being adjuſted, to his ſatisfaction.

The king and parliament offended at the news of the pope's ſentence. Herbert.

Whilſt the parliament was employed, in theſe matters, Henry received news of the ſentence, given and publiſhed againſt him, at Rome, with all the circumſtances, demonſtrating the little regard the pope had for his perſon and dignity. Theſe haſty proceedings convincing him, there was nothing more to be expected from Rome, he no longer delayed to execute his reſolution, to break off all correſpondence with the pope; and the parliament was no leſs offended than the king, with the pope's conduct. So, the whole legiſlature, being in the ſame mind, reſolved, utterly, to aboliſh the papal authority, in England. After what Clement had done, there was no other way; it was neceſſary either to withſtand him vigorouſly, or prepare to indure all the ſeverities and indignities, to which England was liable, in the reigns of Henry II, and John Lackland. But the times were altered; for the Engliſh were no longer willing to ſubmit to the baſe actions required, by the popes, of their anceſtors, neither was the king's intereſt different from that of his ſubjects. Thus, every one being equally tired of the pope's yoke, it was deemed more honourable to demoliſh, at once, that formidable power, under which the kingdom had ſo long groaned, than vainly to expect, it would, of itſelf, be reduced within due bounds. It may be eaſily judged, the favourers of the new religion were not ſparing of their pains, to bring things to this ſtate. The reſolution that had been taken was quickly put in execution. In a few days, an act was paſſed, containing ſundry articles, all tending to the ſame point.

An act aboliſhing the papal authority.

The firſt, confirmed the ſtatute, for aboliſhing the annates, or firſt-fruits.

By the ſecond, it was enacted, that for the future, the pope ſhall have nothing to do, in the nominating or preſenting of biſhops; but that, when a biſhoprick ſhall become vacant, the king ſhall ſend to the chapter, a Conge d'elire, and in caſe the election ſhall not be over, within 12 days after the licenſe, it ſhall belong to the king. That the biſhop elect, ſhall ſwear fealty to the king, and then be recommended by his majeſty, to the archbiſhop to be conſecrated. That if the biſhop elect, or archbiſhop, refuſe to obey the contents of this act, they ſhall be liable to the penalty of Præmunire. Moreover, all perſons were expreſly forbid, to apply to the biſhop of Rome, for bulls, palls, and the like.

Stat. c. 21. By another act, were aboliſhed, Peterpence, all procurations, delegations, expeditions of bulls, and diſpenſations coming from the court of Rome; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury was appointed to grant all ſuch diſpenſations, &c. as ſhould not be contrary to the law of God, on condition, that part of the money, thence ariſing, ſhould be paid into the king's exchequer. Moreover, all religious houſes, exempt and not exempt, ſhould be ſubject to the archbiſhop's viſitation. 1534.

Stat. c. 22. By another act, it was enacted, that the king's marriage with Catharine, widow of his brother, prince Arthur, ſhould be held null and void, and that ſhe ſhould be reputed only princeſs dowager of Wales. On the contrary, the king's marriage with Ann Bullen, is declared valid, and the ſucceſſion to the crown ſettled upon their iſſue. Moreover, it is ſaid, that any perſon of what quality ſoever, who ſhall ſpeak or write againſt the king's marriage, ſhall be adjudged a traytor to the king and ſtate, and that all the king's ſubjects, without diſtinction, ſhall be obliged to ſwear, they will obſerve and maintain the contents of this act. After this, follows a liſt of the marriages forbid by the law of God, among which, is that of a man with his brother's widow; and it was enacted, that no ſuch marriages ſhould be allowed for the future, and that ſuch as were then in being, ſhould be diſſolved.

The people rejoice at it.

Thus, was the papal authority aboliſhed, in England, by act of parliament. Indeed, there were few biſhops and abbots preſent when the act paſſed. However, there was but one ſingle biſhop who refuſed to ſet his name to it, becauſe they made a great difference between ſubmitting to an act paſſed, by a lawful authority, and giving their vote for it. The generality of the people expreſſed great joy, to ſee themſelves freed from a yoke, which neither they nor their forefathers could bear. None but the monks exclaimed againſt it, and drew upon themſelves the king's indignation, the effects whereof they afterwards felt. Thoſe who wiſhed for the reformation, were highly pleaſed to ſee the main obſtacle removed, believing the reſt would quickly follow. But this reformation, which they ſo impatiently expected, made not, in this reign, all the progreſs, they imagined they had reaſon to hope.

Oath taken by the ſubjects, according to the act. Act. Pub.

The parliament breaking up, the 30th of March, after all the members had ſworn to obſerve what was enjoined, in the fore-mentioned act, the king ſent commiſſioners throughout the kingdom, to adminiſter the ſame oath to all his ſubjects. The Collection of the Publick Acts, contains the oaths of ſeveral abbots and fryers, of all orders, to this effect: That they would be faithful to the king, the queen, their heirs and ſucceſſors; that they owned the king for ſupreme head of the church of England; that the biſhop of Rome has no more juriſdiction than any other biſhop; that they renounced his obedience; that they would preach, ſincerely, doctrines agreeable to the holy ſcriptures; that, in their prayers, they would pray, firſt, for the king, as ſupreme head of the church of England, then for the queen, and her iſſue, and laſtly, for the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Some time after, Lee, archbiſhop of York, 1534. certified, by a writing of the 5th of May, that in the convocation of his province, it was declared, the pope had no more power in England, than any other biſhop. Only John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, late chancellor, refuſed to ſign the act of parliament, which, as has been ſeen, contained three principal articles; the ſucceſſion of the crown, the nullity of the king's firſt marriage, with the validity of his ſecond, and the aboliſhment of the papal authority. They offered to ſign the firſt article; but for the other two, they ſaid, their conſcience would not ſuffer them to conſent to them, whereupon, they were committed to the tower.

Henry acquaints Catharine with the act of parliament. Herbert.

Whilſt theſe oaths were adminiſtring, throughout the kingdom, the king ſent the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of Durham, to tell Catharine, ſhe muſt forbear aſſuming the title of queen, and lay before her the reaſons that moved the parliament to deprive her of it; but ſhe anſwered, ſhe believed her marriage, with the king, good, and lawful, and ſhould hold it as ſuch, to her dying day; that ſhe had never conſummated her marriage with prince Arthur, and they who affirmed it, ſpoke not the truth; that ſhe was not bound to ſubmit to the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſentence, ſince the pope had nulled it, and decreed the contrary; that the king's marriage with Ann, was not valid, as being made during the appeal; that ſhe was not obliged to ſubmit to the acts of the parliament, not being the king's ſubject, but his wife; that beſides, theſe acts were made by the king's ſubjects, upon an affair wherein he was party.

The queen's anſwer.

Negotiation between Francis and Henry fruitleſs. Herbert.

Tho' Henry would have been very glad of Catharine's ſubmiſſion, to what the parliament had enacted, it was not her obſtinacy that gave him the moſt uneaſineſs. The emperor having undertaken to execute the pope's ſentence, Henry was naturally to expect to be attacked by that powerful enemy. In order, therefore, to prevent him, or to put himſelf in a ſtate of defence, he deſired to make a league with Francis, by a new treaty, which ſhould render their union more effectual, for their common defence. Francis ſeemed very ready to comply, but meant that all the terms ſhould be to his advantage, and to make Henry ſubſervient to his deſigns elſewhere; for he had ſtill an eye upon the duchy of Milan, as upon what belonged to him of right, and had been unjuſtly taken from him, and deſigned to recover it, tho' he had expreſly renounced it, by the treaty of Cambray. To this end, he had ſacrificed the honour of his houſe, in marrying his ſecond ſon, to a baſtard-branch of the family of the Medici, becauſe he did not think he could proceed without the pope; but, on the other hand, he was afraid of loſing the fruit of that alliance, by uniting too cloſely with the king of England, whom the pope could now conſider, but as an open enemy. In this perplexity, he endeavoured to perſuade Henry to act only privately, by ſending large ſums to the German Proteſtants, to foment the diſſention between them and the emperor, and embroil him ſo, as to hinder him from thinking of Italy. Henry did not abſolutely reject the propoſal; for he was very willing, to aſſiſt the Proteſtants, with a good ſum of money; but pretended withal, that Francis ſhould attack Navarre, with a powerful army, whilſt, on his part, he carried war into Flanders. But Francis could not reſolve to join ſo openly with England, for fear of offending the pope; beſides, he turned all his thoughts to the Milaneſe, where an accident, about the end of the laſt year, gave him an opportunity to carry his arms. As this accident was the occaſion or pretence of a new war, between the emperor and the king of France, it will be neceſſary, briefly, to mention it. 1534.

The duke of Milan beheads Merveilles the king of France's envoy. Bellay.

Franceſco Sforza was no ſooner reſtored to Milan, upon very hard terms, but he wiſhed to be freed from the emperor's yoke, and the obligation to pay him the ſum he had promiſed. Francis having ſome knowledge of Sforza's diſpoſition, believed he ſhould cheriſh it, in hopes of reaping by it, one day, ſome advantage. But, as Sforza greatly feared to give the emperor ſuſpicion, and, conſequently, the affair was to be managed very privately, Francis found means to keep, at Milan, an envoy, who could not be ſuſpected. He choſe for that purpoſe, a Milaneſe gentleman, called Merveilles, who having been, formerly, baniſhed from Milan, by Ludovico the Black, had lived in France ever ſince. The troubles of the Milaneſe being entirely ended, by the peace of Cambray, Merveilles returned home, with a letter of credence for the duke, to which the duke ſent an anſwer, receiving the gentleman as envoy of France, tho', in publick, he treated him not as ſuch. However ſecret Merveilles's negotiation might be, the emperor had ſome notice of it, and made great complaints to the duke, who, to remove all ſuſpicion, reſolved to ſacrifice to him this envoy. Accordingly, he ſuborned a perſon to pick a quarrel with Merveilles, which ended in the murder of the party employed, who was killed by Merveilles's ſervants, without, however, their maſter's being preſent. Whereupon, Merveilles was committed to priſon, and, two days after, beheaded, without any one being ſuffered to ſpeak with him. Francis hearing of it, wrote a threatening letter to the duke, and acquainted all his allies, with what had happened. The duke would have excuſed himſelf, by denying that Merveilles was, at Milan, as envoy. What he ſaid was true, in reſpect to the publick; but he could not diſown his own letter to the king, in anſwer to the letter of credence. When the French ambaſſador informed the emperor of the outrage committed, at Milan, upon Merveilles, he coldly replied, he could not conceive, how the king of France could be affected, with the death of a ſubject of the duke of Milan, whom his ſovereign had puniſhed, according to his deſerts. This anſwer made the king believe, the emperor was concerned in Merveilles's death, which was a freſh cauſe of diſguſt,

and

1534. and inflamed his deſire of revenge. But, on the other hand, he was not ſorry the ſatisfaction he demanded was refuſed, becauſe he intended to take occaſion, from thence, to enter the Milaneſe, ſword in hand. To that purpoſe, he ordered a levy of Lanſquenets, in Germany, and demanded paſſage of the duke of Savoy, to go and chaſtiſe the duke of Milan; but that prince, fearing to diſpleaſe the emperor, would not grant it; for which reaſon Francis, who could not enter the Milaneſe, but by paſſing through the duke of Savoy's dominions, reſolved to make war upon him, uſing, for pretence, certain claims, he had, in right of Louiſa, his mother, to the inheritance of the late duke of Savoy. Till every thing was ready to begin this war, he ſpent the whole year in divers negotiations, tending to create the emperor troubles, and diſable him to aſſiſt the duke of Savoy.

Clement VII's death.

Whilſt Francis was, thus, employed, the ſituation of the affairs of Italy was ſomething changed, by the death of Clement VII, who was carried off by a fit of ſickneſs, the 25th of September. The 12th of October following, cardinal Farneſe was choſen pope, and aſſumed the name of Paul III.

Paul III. ſucceeds him. Guicciard.

The affairs of Germany. Sleidan.

There were, likewiſe, this year, in Germany, ſome alterations, which put the affairs of the Proteſtants in a tolerable ſituation. The landgrave of Heſſe defeated king Ferdinand's army, commanded by the count Palatine, and reſtored the duke of Wirtemberg to his dominions. Ferdinand, not being able, any longer, to reſiſt the landgrave, was forced to agree to the duke's reſtoration; but withal obtained, that both the duke and the landgrave, ſhould acknowledge him for king of the Romans. Soon after, the elector of Saxony acknowledged him alſo, having firſt got a promiſe from him, that he would not ſuffer any perſon to be moleſted in the empire, on the account of religion.

Henry is bent to ſtand to the rupture with the pope. Burnet.

Clement VII's death cauſed no alteration, in the meaſures taken by the court of England, to ſhake off, entirely, the pope's yoke. Matters had been carried too far, ever to recede. Beſides, the king not having much to fear from abroad, by reaſon of the troubles, the emperor was like to be involved in, and his ſubjects being inclined to ſupport him, it would have been imprudent to neglect ſo favourable a juncture, and leave his work unfiniſhed. So, the parliament meeting the 3d of November, paſſed ſeveral material acts, of which it will ſuffice to relate the ſubſtance, in order to ſhew, they all tended to the ſame point, that is, to break all the bonds which had ſerved to hold the Engliſh, in ſubjection to the popes.

Divers acts paſſed upon that occaſion.

I. Act confirms the king's title of head of the church.

The firſt act confirmed, the king's title of ſupreme head of the church of England, already given him by the clergy. Tho' Henry had very willingly accepted this title from the clergy, nay, had not left them the liberty to refuſe it, he ſeemed, however, to doubt, whether he ſhould receive it, when offered by the parliament. He was pleaſed, firſt, to adviſe with his council, and conſult ſome of the biſhops, whether out of ſcruple, or to ſhew it was not extorted. They whom he conſulted having ſatisfied him, that the authority aſſumed by the biſhop of Rome, over the whole church, had no foundation in ſcripture, he baniſhed all his ſcruples, if it be true that he had any, and from thenceforward, took all occaſions to improve the prerogatives which flowed from this new title. 1534.

II. Treaſon to ſpeak evil of the king.

By a ſecond act, it was declared treaſon to ſpeak, write, or imagine any thing againſt the king or queen.

III. Concerning ſanctuaries.

The third, debarred perſons accuſed of treaſon, of the benefit of ſanctuary.

IV. Form of oath.

By a fourth, the parliament preſcribed a form of oath, concerning the ſucceſſion, to be taken by all the king's ſubjects, and annulled all former oaths upon that head.

V. Grants the firſt-fruits and tenths to the king.

The fifth was very grievous to the clergy, as it gave the king the annates and firſt-fruits of the benefices; whereas, by the act already paſſed, the eccleſiaſticks were in hopes of being ever freed from that burden. Moreover, by the ſame act, the yearly revenue of the tenth part of all livings, was granted to the king.

VI. Suffragan biſhops.

By a ſixth ſtatute, proviſion was made for 25 ſuffragan biſhops, each of whom was to depend on his dioceſan, who was to preſent two to the king, for him to chuſe one. Thus, was revived, in the church of England, the uſe of Chorepiſcopi, introduced into the primitive church, but, afterwards, diſcontinued, for ſeveral centuries.

Fiſher and More are condemned by the parliament. Burnet.

Laſtly, the parliament condemned Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, to perpetual impriſonment, and confiſcated all their eſtates, for refuſing to take the oath, enjoined by the act, of the former ſeſſion. This ſentence was conſidered, by ſome, as very unjuſt, whilſt others admired, in the ſame, the effects of God's juſtice upon perſons, that had been violent perſecutors of the Lutherans.

A general pardon. Burnet.

Before the parliament broke up, the king granted a general pardon, from which, however, Fiſher and More were excluded.

A proclamation againſt the name of pope. Stow.

Soon after, the king iſſued out a proclamation, forbidding to give the biſhop of Rome the name of pope, and commanding that name to be razed out of all books, to deſtroy the remembrance of it, if poſſible. Then the biſhops, voluntarily, ſwore to renounce, expreſly, all obedience to the biſhop of Rome. Gardiner, now biſhop of Wincheſter, was not the laſt to take this oath, tho', in his ſoul, he abhorred it, as very unjuſt; but a blind condeſcenſion for the king, in this reſpect, was, then, the only means to preſerve his favour; beſides, Gardiner was thereby enabled to croſs, upon other points, the reformers, who daily gained ground.

The progreſs of the reformation in England. Burnet.

It was not only in Germany, that the reformation had made ſome progreſs, but, alſo, in many other places. In England, it had been countenanced, in ſome meaſure, by cardinal Wolſey, as, during his miniſtry, no perſon was proſecuted for hereſy, tho' the clergy wanted not occaſions to exerciſe their uſual ſeverities, 1534. severities, had they been left to take their own course. After Wolsey's disgrace, Sir Thomas More, being made chancellor, persuaded the king, that what did him the most injury, at the court of Rome, was, the report of his being a favourer of the innovators, and to remove this false imputation, the most infallible way, was, to shew a zeal for religion. Henry following this advice, ordered, the laws against hereticks to be rigorously executed, and, very strictly, prohibited the importing any of their books into the kingdom; but this prohibition was not capable of hindering several, of Luther's treatises, from being brought into England, with Tindal's translation of the new testament, who was retired into Flanders. The bishop of London having notice of it, caused some copies to be seised, and publickly burnt by the hangman. But this was so far from hindering the reformation, that it rather turned to its advantage. Many persons, full of indignation, at this impious act, inferred, that the scriptures were contrary to the religion generally professed, since the clergy took such care to hinder the bible from being read, and that, alone, raised their desire to read it. On the other hand, the dislike the English had taken to the pope, greatly increased, by the reading of the Lutheran writings.

The bible burnt in London. Hall.

A persecution in England. Burnet.

As the reformation gained ground, the zeal of its enemies, was inflamed against such as embraced it; for, whilst More was chancellor, he spared no pains to destroy them utterly. Many suffered martyrdom, with a wonderful constancy, which very much contributed to strengthen their brethren. At length, the king having to manage the German Protestants, because he might, afterwards, want them, suspended More's persecution. On the other hand, Ann Bullen very much mollified the king, in that respect; archbishop Cranmer contributed to it, likewise, to the utmost of his power, and Thomas Cromwell, now in great esteem with the king, seconded their endeavours, as far as in him lay. But they had a strong party against them, consisting of the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, Longland, bishop of Lincoln, almost all the churchmen, who had any access to the court, and those who, when they preached before the king, filled their sermons with invectives against the reformation. All these had gained Henry's confidence, by their compliance, in the affair of the divorce, and the supremacy, tho', in the last, they acted contrary to their sentiments. By this condescension, they were enabled, effectually, to oppose the reformers, in all the articles which concerned not the pope, and, especially, in that of the real presence, which the king deemed unquestionable, and thought so all his life. In spite of all this, the heads of the reformed despaired not of inclining him, by degrees, to a farther reformation, because of the connection, the articles of religion have, one with another; besides, their party grew stronger every day, by the junction of such as read the holy scriptures, and the religious books which were handed about, notwithstanding the king's prohibition. Nothing shews more the number and strength of that party, than the readiness wherewith the parliament passed the acts, which tended to lessen the clergy's power, and shake off the papal yoke. 1534.

Francis I. seems to favour the reformation.

The reformation made, likewise, some progress, in France, the king himself expressing an inclination for the doctrine of the Protestants, which was, privately, countenanced, by his sister Margaret, queen of Navarre; but the cardinals of Tournon and Lorrain, who were in great credit with him, dissuaded him from it, so earnestly, that they gained him, at last, nay, made him a violent persecutor.

Peace between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

Before I close what relates to the events of the year 1534, I must not forget to mention, that a twelve-month's truce, concluded the last year, between England and Scotland, was turned into a peace, the 11th of May, this year. By the treaty, the peace was to last till the death of one of the two monarchs, and Henry might, without breaking it, keep the Douglasses, in England.

1535. An ambassy of France, to sift Henry. Bellay.

In the beginning of the year 1535, Francis I. sent an ambassy to Henry, under pretence of discharging the duty of a good friend and ally, but, in reality, to try to deceive him, by feigning to acquaint him with his secrets, and ask his advice. The occasion of the ambassy was this; the emperor having resolved to carry his arms, into Africa, had a mind to amuse Francis, lest, in his absence, he should attack the duke of Savoy, and so open a way to the duchy of Milan, as he seemed to intend. To that purpose, he had dispatched an ambassador to him, with orders to propose a marriage, between his third daughter, and Philip, prince of Spain; and another between the dauphin and Mary, daughter of Henry and Catharine of Arragon; Moreover, he had offered him a pension of 100,000 crowns for the duke of Orleans, upon the duchy of Milan, and the duchy itself, after the death of Francesco Sforza, who had no heirs. It was evident, these overtures were designed only to amuse Francis, who considered them, himself, upon no other foot; neverrheless, he imagined they would serve to procure him some advantage from Henry, if he let him know he was courted by the emperor. To this end, he sent into England, admiral Chabot Seigneur de Brion, on pretence, to advise with the king upon these offers; but his chief view was, to make him uneasy, and induce him to offer some advantageous proposals. It appeared, in the sequel, he would have persuaded him to things, which were very far from his thoughts. The admiral having discharged his commission, Henry answered, he much wondered, the emperor should pretend to marry his daughter, over whom he neither had, nor ever should have any right or power; that it was manifest, he only sought to break the union between France and England, and, therefore, he hoped the king of France would not 1535. not be ſo much his own enemy, as to hearken to ſuch overtures. Soon after, he ſent orders to his ambaſſador, at Paris, to tell Francis, he would give Elizabeth, his daughter and heir, to the duke of Angouleſme, his third ſon, upon the following conditions; that Francis himſelf, his three ſons, the princes of the blood, the principal nobility of France, the parliaments, and univerſities, ſhould ſolemnly promiſe to cauſe to be revoked the ſentence given againſt him, by the biſhop of Rome; that the duke of Angouleſme ſhould be ſent into England, to be educated; that, in caſe, by his marriage, he ſhould come to the crown of England, the duchy of Angouleſme ſhould be independent of the crown of France. Theſe conditions were afterwards mitigated, and Francis I. ſeemed to agree to them; but he required, in his turn, that Henry ſhould aſſiſt him in the war of Savoy, and forgive him the perpetual annuity of 100,000 crowns, which he was bound to pay by a treaty. Henry perceiving Francis's inſincerity, told the admiral, that inſtead of forgiving the penſion, he expected, the king, his maſter, ſhould pay the arrears, and clear by the time appointed, all his other debts. This anſwer put an end to the negotiation, which, probably, was undertaken only to ſound Henry, concerning the penſion.

Francis's projects.

Francis's grand project, was, to recover the duchy of Milan, under colour of revenging the affront done him, by Sforza; but to execute this deſign, it was neceſſary to raiſe the emperor troubles, which ſhould hinder him from aſſiſting that duchy. There were four ſeveral quarters from whence he hoped to embroil the emperor; firſt, from the pope and princes of Italy; ſecondly, in Germany, by means of the league of Smalcald; thirdly, by fomenting diſcord between Henry and the emperor; laſtly, by drawing the Turks into Germany. In order to all this, he had married his ſon, the duke of Orleans, to Catharine de Medici; lodged 100,000 crowns, in the hands of the duke of Bavaria, to be ready upon occaſion; perſuaded Henry to end the affair of the divorce, in the manner we have ſeen; and had ſecret agents, at Conſtantinople, to treat of an alliance with Soliman, emperor of the Turks. But moſt of theſe expedients, which he thought infallible, had, proved unſucceſsful. The firſt had miſcarried by the death of Clement VII, and by the election of a new pope, whom it was not eaſy to gain to his intereſt. The king of the Romans had fruſtrated the ſecond, by agreeing with the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the duke of Wirtemberg. As for the third, he could not hope much from thence, becauſe the king of England's intention was not to make war upon the emperor, but, only to ſtand upon the defenſive. Conſequently, it was, in the emperor's power to keep him quiet, by not attacking him firſt. The Turks, therefore, alone, could, properly, be ſubſervient to his projects. But, to rely upon them, it was neceſſary to commence the war in Italy, otherwiſe it was not likely, Soliman would be perſuaded to begin it in Hungary. Upon this account he continued, at Conſtantinople, a negotiation, which was diſcovered by a letter intercepted by the duke of Urbino, who ſent it, immediately, to the emperor. In the interim, Francis ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution to attack the duke of Savoy, and open a paſſage to the Milaneſe; for he reckoned, the peace of Germany could not hold long; that the emperor and Henry would never live in a good underſtanding; and that, when once the war was begun, the pope, the potentates of Italy, the king of England, would readily aſſiſt, to reduce the power of the houſe of Auſtria, within due bounds. Above all, he depended upon the princes of the league of Smalcald, fancying they would embrace this opportunity, to free themſelves from their uneaſineſs, cauſed by the advancement of that houſe. To this end, he continued his intrigues with them, and pretended to be ſo far enclined to their religion, that he was going to invite Melancthon into France, to confer with him. But withal, he plainly ſhewed he acted only upon political views, ſince he cauſed to be burnt, in France, thoſe that ſeparated from the church of Rome. In the interim, as there was ſome difference between Luther and Calvin, about religion, and as thoſe that were burnt, in France, were Calviniſts, the rigid Lutherans, not conſidering them as their brethren, imagined Francis might treat them with the utmoſt ſeverity, without loſing his regard for the Lutheran religion. Francis reſolving to uſe his endeavours to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, attacked the duke of Savoy, and in the firſt campaign, took from him Savoy and la Breſſe. 1535.

Deſigns of Charles V.

Whilſt Francis was labouring to accompliſh his deſigns, Charles V. was forming vaſt projects, which tended to no leſs than eſtabliſhing his dominion over all Europe. Indeed, France and England being cloſely united together, could have oppoſed a ſtrong fence againſt his ambition; but he did not deſpair to diſunite them, in the end. That was his chief care, whilſt on one hand, he excited the Iriſh to a rebellion, and the king of Scotland to a rupture with England. But whilſt he was endeavouring to embroil his enemies, in hopes of finding his account in it, he was himſelf uneaſy with regard to Soliman, who threatened Germany, under pretence of ſupporting the intereſts of John de Zapol, whom he had cauſed to be crowned king of Hungary. On the other hand, he ſaw with extreme concern, the great progreſs of Haradin Barbaroſſa, the famous corſair, who after expelling Muley Haſſam, had made himſelf king of Tunis. Such a neighbour could not but diſquiet him, becauſe, to hinder him from ravaging the coaſts of Spain, Naples and Sicily, it would have been neceſſary, conſtantly, to maintain a fleet in the Mediterranean, which could not be done without a great expence, and this would have diſconcerted his other deſigns. So, conſidering the war, he had reſolved to wage with Haradin, as the moſt urgent affair, he made this ſummer, an expedition into Africa,

Henry's diſpoſition, as to religion.

Henry gladly ſaw the emperor engaging in wars, which, probably, would keep him long employed; whereupon, he reſolved to improve this interval, to compleat the regulation of his domeſtick affairs, which were yet in a very doubtful ſtate. He had aboliſhed the papal authority, and been declared ſupreme head of the church of England, by acts of parliament; but tho' by the conſtitution of the government, theſe acts ſeemed to be above all contradiction, it was, however, but too true, that this was not ſufficient. As religion was concerned, and conſcience cannot be compelled, the ſtatutes themſelves wanted to be ſupported by force, that an outward obedience, at leaſt, might be paid them. It is certain, the uniformity, which appeared in the determinations of the parliament and clergy, was, in many, the effect of fear, rather than of inward perſuaſion; nay ſome, as Fiſher and More, were ſo hardy, as, openly, to diſapprove theſe ordinances, and notwithſtanding the ſeverity exerciſed upon them, ſtill perſiſted in the ſame opinion. It is true, theſe inſtances of rigour, to perſons of ſuch diſtinction, made people ſilent; but were not capable of convincing them of the reaſonableneſs of the ſtatutes. Thus, tho' the king found no publick oppoſition, it was eaſy for him to ſee, that an obedience proceeding from fear, could laſt no longer than compulſion ſubſiſted. On the other hand, he beheld, with concern, the triumph of the Proteſtants, who imagined, that after aboliſhing the papal authority, he was going to renounce all the errors they combated, tho' nothing was farther from his thoughts. In the interim, it was every where publiſhed, that he was upon the point of forſaking the antient religion; ſome aſſerting it out of malice, to render him odious; and others, becauſe they wiſhed it. To clear himſelf, therefore, from theſe imputations, at the very time he refuſed to recogniſe the pope's authority, he ordered thoſe, who were called Sacramentarians, to be burnt. By this conduct, he made himſelf hateful to the Catholicks and Proteſtants. As for the Proteſtants, he bore their ill-will without much concern; beſidss that, he feared them not, he approved of their doctrine, the articles only that oppoſed the papal authority, and their ſentiments of the fryers, with whom he was extremely incenſed, becauſe they laboured, with all their power, to alienate from him, the affections of his people. It is true, he valued and loved Cranmer and Cromwell, with ſome others, who countenanced the reformation; but he did not look upon them as Proteſtants. He believed them men of ſolid virtue and piety, who, preſerving the eſſential doctrines of religion, were deſirous of reforming the abuſes crept into the church. But, as among theſe abuſes, he himſelf acknowledged only what concerned the pope and the fryers, he imagined the reformers kept within the ſame bounds. They who perfectly knew him, took care not to diſcover all their thoughts; but, by conforming themſelves to his ſentiments, on theſe two articles, they hoped to induce him, by degrees, to advance the reformation, when by their pains he ſhould become more enlightened; for which ſon, the reformation began, in England, with theſe two points. As to the others, which had no relation to theſe, they were not meddled with, during this reign, or, at leaſt, but ſlightly; and the reaſon is, becauſe Henry would never ſuffer his ſubjects to go greater lengths than himſelf. But to ſpeak the truth, his underſtanding was always directed by his intereſt; for if all the changes made in religion, in his reign, be examined, they will all be found to concur directly to eſtabliſh an abſolute power over his ſubjects; which was ever the principal, and, perhaps, the ſole motive of his proceedings, when he perceived the rupture with Rome to be an admirable means to that end. Hence the enemies of the reformation took occaſion to ſay, it was eſtabliſhed, in England, on political views. This may be true, if the perſon of Henry VIII, be only conſidered; but, it does not follow, that they who promoted and embraced it, acted upon the like motive. Beſides, what was the reformation in Henry VIII's days? Only a bare renouncing of the papal power, whilſt thoſe were burnt that would have carried it farther. So, let what will be ſaid of Henry's perſon, and his motives to throw off the papal yoke, I do not ſee that the Proteſtants are much concerned, to undertake his defence. 1535.

Henry finding that many of his ſubjects approved not his conduct, would have been very glad to take from them the pretence they uſed, of the ſentence publiſhed againſt him, by the pope. To this purpoſe, he would have engaged all France to join with him, in procuring a revocation; but that method was impracticable, and a reconciliation with the court of Rome no leſs ſo. He could never have reſolved to part with the title of head of the church of England, and the pope would never have conſented to an agreement, unleſs things were reſtored to their antient ſtate; ſo Henry, ſeeing himſelf obliged to purſue his point, reſolved to overcome by force, the obſtinacy of ſuch of his ſubjects, as refuſed to ſubmit to the laws lately enacted. But on the other hand, deſiring to purge himſelf of the imputation of hereſy, wherewith he was charged, he affected to puniſh ſeverely, thoſe that embraced the new opinions. In this ſort of medium, which pleaſed neither party, he paſſed the reſidue of his days. But this is ſaying too little; for it muſt be farther added, that conſidering himſelf as a pattern for his ſubjects, he compelled them to keep within the ſame bounds, and would not ſuffer them to believe more or leſs, than himſelf.

It was impoſſible, that after ſuch a reſolution Henry ſhould not live in a continual miſtruſt of his ſubjects, which obliged him to have always an eye upon what paſſed in the kingdom. Moreover, he had likewiſe to guard againſt the emperor's attacks, who had openly threatened 1535. threatened him. He was, ſenſible, if he were once engaged in a war, thoſe that durſt not look him in the face, during his proſperity, would not ſcruple to declare againſt him, if his arms were unſucceſsful. The king of Scotland, his nephew, was the perſon moſt to be feared. As for the king of France, who profeſſed himſelf his friend, and, indeed, was much obliged to him, he had ſhewn too plainly, how ſelf-intereſted his friendſhip was, to be relied on. They both intended to embroil the emperor, but with different views. Each meant to make his ally ſubſervient to his deſigns, and to improve the advantages which flowed from their union. Thus, Henry ſaw no reſſource but in his own ſubjects, among whom, however, there were many male-contents. But as he had acted for ſome time, with great haughtineſs, he found, if he relaxed on this occaſion, it would certainly be aſcribed either to his ſcruples, or to a ſenſe of his weakneſs, than which nothing could be more prejudicial to him. This conſideration, joined to his ſtern and haughty temper, rendered him altogether untractable. From thenceforward, he became fierce, cruel, inſenſible of his people's calamities, and executing without mercy, the laws dictated by himſelf to his parliament. In ſhort, he may, in ſome manner be ſaid, to be no longer the ſame king that had before reigned. All that can be alledged in his vindication, is, that he was often provoked by perſons, who, endeavouring to alienate the hearts of his ſubjects, attacked him in the moſt ſenſible part, becauſe his whole reliance was upon the aſſiſtance of his people.

The reaſon of the great ſubmiſſion of the Engliſh to Henry.

It will, doubtleſs, be ſurpriſing to ſee, in this reign, the Engliſh ſo patient and ſubmiſſive to their ſovereign's pleaſure, that hardly do we find, from the beginning of the affair of the divorce, that the parliament refuſed him any thing, tho' his demands were very extraordinary. But it is eaſy to diſcover the reaſon. Religion was the ſole cauſe. The king, as it was obſerved, kept a ſort of medium, with regard to religion; but, as no man could believe it poſſible for him, to remain long, in that ſituation, thoſe who deſired the reformation, imagined they could not do better than comply with him in all things, to induce him to advance it, by degrees; and, in like manner, the friends of the old religion, ſeeing ſuch beginnings, were afraid he would proceed, and their oppoſition but make him finiſh his work the ſooner. So, each party ſtriving to gain him to their intereſt, there reſulted for him an authority, which none of his predeceſſors had ever enjoyed, and which he could not have uſurped, in any other circumſtances, without hazarding his crown But both parties were alike deceived; for Henry kept in the ſame medium, all the reſt of his life, and made them both feel the ſad effects of that abſolute power they had ſo eaſily ſuffered him to aſſume. It is true, he was always ſo prudent, as not to act contrary to law; but he made uſe of his power to procure ſuch laws as he pleaſed, and then executed them without mercy. This will frequently be ſeen, in the ſequel. But after ſhewing Henry's character and motives, his actions muſt be related, which will confirm what has been obſerved. 1535.

The monks become odious to the king.

Tho' the acts concerning the king's marriage, and the papal power, bore the ſeal of the publick authority, they were very far from being univerſally approved. As they were not aſcribed ſo much to the two houſes, as to the king, on whom it was that the whole blame was caſt. Among all the male-contents, the monks were the moſt open, by their attempts to blacken him in the minds of the people. They could not bear his ſetting himſelf up in the pope's room, whom they had always conſidered, and ſtill did conſider, as their true head, notwithſtanding the ſtatutes made againſt him. Theſe were the men that cauſed the pretended Kentiſh propheteſs to ſay, if the king put away queen Catharine, and married another, he ſhould die in a month, and come to a tragical end. A Franciſcan, named Peto, preaching before the king, was ſo hardy as to tell him to his face, "That God's judgments "were ready to fall upon his head; that he "was always ſurrounded with a croud of lying "prophets, who foretold him good ſucceſs; "but for himſelf, like another Micaiah, he "warned him, that the dogs ſhould lick his "blood, as they had done Ahab's." This frier's inſolence, and the daily reports of the invectives, which were every where ſpread againſt him, provoked him extremely againſt them, as well as againſt thoſe that had the boldneſs to ſpeak opprobriouſly of the acts of parliament. However, he was very patient for ſome time, imagining that people would, at length, be calmed; but when he ſaw they did not ceaſe to aſperſe him, with all ſorts of calumnies, he called a council, to conſider how he ſhould behave towards thoſe who affected to contradict the laws, and ſpeak evil of him. Some of the council were for taking no notice of theſe offences, for fear too great a ſeverity ſhould have a quite contrary effect to what he deſired; but others repreſented to him the ill conſequences of ſuch a conduct. They ſhewed him, that theſe people's view was, to ſtir up the people againſt him, to give the biſhop of Rome opportunity to aſſert his pretended authority, and, therefore, they were for putting the laws in execution, with the utmoſt rigour. The king himſelf was of this opinion, as moſt agreeable to his fierce and ſtern temper, which could not bear contradiction; beſides, he ſaw to what he ſhould be reduced, in the end, if his enemies ſucceeded in their project to render him odious to the people. It is not, therefore, very ſtrange, that ſeeing himſelf, thus, provoked, he reſolved to treat with rigour people, who laboured with all their power to ruin him.

Priors and monks executed with ſome Proteſtants. Hall.

The reſolution being taken of executing the laws, without mercy, certain priors, monks, and others, who had been too free with the new ſtatutes, were apprehended, tried, and executed, according to the utmoſt rigour of the laws; but, at the ſame time, the king fearing left this ſeverity ſhould be aſcribed to the inclination, he was charged with, for the new religion,

1535. religion, affected to uſe the ſame rigour to thoſe who had openly embraced the reformation, and put them to death with the others; and, at laſt, to keep every one in awe, by an example which ſhould make the boldeſt tremble, he reſolved to deliver up to the rigour of the laws, Fiſher and More, then priſoners in the tower. To this end, Fiſher was required to take the oath of ſupremacy, it being ſuppoſed he would refuſe it, as he did, indeed. About the ſame time Paul III. created him cardinal, tho' he had declared, that, if the cardinal's hat was laid at his feet, he would not ſtoop to take it up. But the pope, whoſe view was to encourage ſuch as oppoſed the king, conferred, however, that dignity upon him, with the pompous elogy, that he conſidered him as the cardinal of cardinals. This unſeaſonable honour haſtened, in all likelihood, Fiſher's death, who being condemned, was executed the 22d of June, a month after his being made cardinal, and ſome days before the hat, ſent him by the pope, came to London. After that, Sir Thomas More being required to take the ſame oath, refuſed to reply, ſaying, "The "act of parliament is like a ſword with two "edges; for if a man anſwer one way, it "will deſtroy the ſoul, and if he anſwer ano-"ther, it will deſtroy the body." Upon his refuſal, he was condemned and executed. He was a man of great learning, and excellent parts, but ſo addicted to jeſting, that even the preſence of death could not make him lay aſide his uſual facetiouſneſs; for, when upon the point of being executed, he had laid his head on the block to receive the blow, he perceived, his beard was got under his chin; whereupon, haſtily riſing up, he bid the executioner ſtay a little, till he had put his beard aſide, ſince having committed no treaſon, it was not juſt it ſhould be cut off.

Paul III. excommunicates Henry, without publiſhing it. Herbert.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, in England, pope Paul III, ſtill kept ſome correſpondence with Sir Gregory Caſſali, who was at Rome, tho' without character. The pope earneſtly wiſhed, that ſome expedient might be found to heal the breach made by Clement VII's too great precipitation, and conferred from time to time with Caſſali. But when news came of the execution of the monks, and of Fiſher and More, for denying the king's ſupremacy, he deſpaired of ſucceeding. He perceived there was no more ceremony to be uſed, ſince all regard for him was thrown off in England, and a ſettled deſign ſhewn of ſupporting what had been done. So, to maintain the honour of his ſee, he drew up a thundering bull, excommunicating Henry, and abſolving his ſubjects from their oath. Moreover, he ordered all the eccleſiaſticks to depart his dominions, and the nobility to take arms againſt him. He put the kingdom under an interdict, and forbid all Chriſtians to have any commerce with the Engliſh. He annulled all the treaties made by foreign princes, with Henry, before his marriage with Ann Bullen, declaring their iſſue already born, or to be born, illegitimate. In the interim, as he was ſenſible, theſe ſpiritual thunders would produce no great effect, unleſs ſupported with temporal arms, which were not yet ready, he deferred the publiſhing of this bull, to a more convenient ſeaſon. 1535.

But, tho' the bull was not publiſhed, as no great care was taken to conceal it, it quickly came to Henry's knowledge; whereupon, he reſolved to join with the Proteſtants of Germany, and keep the emperor employed in that country. He, therefore, diſpatched Edward Fox to the league of Smalcald, whilſt Francis made uſe, for the ſame purpoſe, of William du Bellay, lord of Langeais. But it was very difficult for a good and hearty union to be formed between theſe two monarchs, and the Proteſtants of Germany. The Proteſtants meant only to preſerve the liberty of profeſſing their religion unmoleſted, whereas the ſole view of Francis and Henry was, to excite them againſt the emperor, without any regard to the Proteſtant religion, which they were perſecuting in their kingdoms. It is true, to gain the Proteſtants, they feigned an inclination for their religion, and a deſire to eſtabliſh it in their dominions; nay, Henry very much improved the conformity of his ſentiments with theirs, concerning the papal authority; but the rigour wherewith theſe two monarchs treated ſuch of their ſubjects as had embraced the new religion, deſtroyed whatever their ambaſſadors could ſay. For this reaſon, the the Proteſtants always inſiſted upon ſettling the points which concerned religion, and continued to require, that Henry ſhould openly delare for the Augsburg confeſſion, that their union might be built on a ſolid foundation. Henry feigned to approve of what they propoſed, and to make them believe it the more, wiſhed them to ſend ſome of their divines to confer with thoſe of England. But he never really intended to conform himſelf to their notions; for he rather wanted the Germans, as well as the Engliſh, to learn of him what they were to believe; and for this cauſe, the project of the propoſed union was never executed. However, this negotiation made the pope and the emperor very uneaſy, who plainly ſaw, that in attacking Henry, there was danger of really engaging him to unite with the league of Smalcald.

An ambaſſy to the Proteſtants of Germany. Herbert.

But Henry did not depend ſo much upon foreign aſſiſtance, as upon his own ſtrength. In the interim, as his ſubjects were daily corrupted by the monks, who inſinuated to them, that he was going to overturn all religion, he reſolved to take all poſſible precautions, to prevent the pernicious deſigns of theſe dangerous adverſaries. To this end, it was moved in the council, whether it would not be proper to ſuppreſs, at once, all the monaſteries. This queſtion was debated with great warmth, by reaſon of the two contrary parties in the council. Cranmer and Cromwell looked upon the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, as a great ſtep to the reformation; but, on the other hand, the duke of Norfolk, the biſhops of Wincheſt, Lincoln and others, who had with reluctance ſubſcribed to what had been done againſt the pope, could not reſolve to conſent to this ſuppreſſion; for they ſaw, after that, the 1535. the kingdom would be irrecoverably loſt to the pope, without reckoning that the diſſolution of the monaſteries might produce yet greater effects, with regard to religion. The king having heard the arguments on both ſides, found he ſhould not be able to ſuppreſs the monaſteries all at once, without giving offence to the greateſt part of his ſubjects; he, therefore, reſolved with himſelf, to accompliſh it by degrees, and to begin with a thing abſolutely neceſſary; viz. to remove the people's prejudice, in favour of the monks. To this end, he ordered a general viſitation of the monaſteries, to know perfectly the titles of their eſtates, the behaviour of the fryers and nuns; how the rules of each order were obſerved, and other things of the like nature. He did not queſtion, this viſitation would diſcover ſeveral conſiderable abuſes, which, being made publick, would ſenſibly diminiſh the people's veneration for the religious, and pave the way to his deſign. He was extremely incenſed with the monks, whom he looked upon as diſturbers of his repoſe. On the other hand, the hopes of profiting by their eſtates, did not a little contribute, without doubt, towards his puſhing this affair with great earneſtneſs. Thomas Cromwell was choſen to manage this inquiry, by the name of viſitor-general. This choice was a plain indication of the king's intent, ſince he employed a perſon who was utterly averſe to the monks. Cromwell having appointed ſubſtitutes, or commiſſioners, gave them very particular inſtructions, under 86 articles, and the viſitation began in October. It may be eaſily judged, that among ſo great a number of monaſteries as were in the kingdom, moſt of which had never been viſited but very negligently, many were found abounding with irregularities, as well in reſpect of the lives of the fryers and nuns, as in regard to the obſervance of the rule, and the management of the temporalities. The viſitors, who were not their friends, and, doubtleſs, had orders to terrify them, told them, they were going to be expoſed to the king's utmoſt ſeverity, and the rigour of the law. Then, they ſuggeſted to them, that to ſave themſelves harmleſs, and withal to hide their diſorders, the beſt way was to reſign their houſes to the king, who, upon that conſideration, would take care to provide for each, in particular. A good number of priors being terrified by the viſitors, choſe to follow their advice, their monks agreeing to it, ſome to avoid puniſhment, others to enjoy their liberty, and ſome for want of reſolution to reſiſt. The reports of the commiſſioners were publiſhed, that all might be ſatisfied, the king had not without reaſon and neceſſity, ordered this general viſitation. The truth is, in ſome monaſteries were diſcovered monſtrous diſorders and horrible crimes, not only with reſpect to the debaucheries of the fryers and nuns, but chiefly on the account of the images and relicks, for which a ſhameful trade was driven to enrich the monaſteries, by cheriſhing the people's ſuperſtition. This occaſioned an ordinance of the king, who, as ſupreme head of the church of England, diſcharged from their vows ſuch as were profeſſed under 24 years of age, and allowed all the reſt to quit their houſes, and live like ſeculars, if they pleaſed. But as moſt were accuſtomed to an idle life, and perceived, when they forſook their monaſteries, they ſhould be forced to work for their livelihood, the liberty given them by the king, produced no great effect. Beſides, there were, doubtleſs, many, who, out of conſcience, thought not proper to uſe it. So, Henry was obliged to take other meaſures. 1535.

It was but this year, that cardinal Campegio loſt the biſhoprick of Salisbury, which was given to Nicolas Shaxton, a friend to the reformers. Soon after, the ſee of Worceſter was taken from Ghinucci, an Italian, and conferred on Hugh Latimer, a great friend to Cranmer. John Hilſey was promoted to the ſee of Rocheſter, vacant by the death of Fiſher, and Edward Fox to that of Hereford.

Several abbots and priors ſurrender their houſes to the king. Burnet.

Among all the king's enemies, or enviers, none gave him more uneaſineſs than his nephew, the king of Scotland, and not without reaſon. During the whole time of that prince's minority, Henry had fomented the troubles of Scotland, and even ſhewn, that his deſigns tended to become maſter of that kingdom. James was fully informed, and tho' he ſhewed great regard for the king, his uncle, he let him ſee, however, he did not conſider him as a friend. Henry, therefore, was in danger, that, if the innovations in religion cauſed diſturbances in the kingdom, the king of Scotland would take occaſion to be revenged, by aſſiſting the male-contents. This fear was the more juſt, as the emperor knowing the king of Scotland's diſpoſition, had already laboured to inſpire him with ſuſpicions and jealouſies of France and England; nay, he would have concluded a league with him, as I obſerved, had not Francis broken his meaſures, by procuring a peace between England and Scotland. But notwithſtanding this peace, Henry was always in diſtruſt of that quarter; and, to make himſelf eaſy, he formed the project, to inſtill into the king of Scotland the reſolution to follow his example, and renounce the pope's obedience. He conſidered this as a ſure means to preſerve, between the two kingdoms, a ſtrict union, which would be very advantageous in his preſent circumſtances. He ſent him, therefore, in the firſt place, a long letter, declaring the reaſons of his conduct, with regard to the pope. Then, he diſpatched an ambaſſador, to propoſe an interview, fancying that a conference with him, would produce a greater effect, than whatever he ſhould ſay to him, by letter or ambaſſy. But tho' the reformation had already crept into Scotland, James had no inclination to embrace it. So, the eccleſiaſticks, about his perſon, eaſily diſſuaded him from accepting the interview, where they were afraid ſome things might paſs very prejudicial to their religion. In the interim, James, not being willing openly to refuſe the conference, deſired by the king, his uncle, gave him hopes of his

When the brief came, he gave the king, his uncle, notice of it, who, having prepared for his journey, was extremely offended at this refusal. Hence sprung a quarrel between them, which I shall have occasion to mention hereafter.

Death of the duke of Milan. Herbert.

Before I conclude the year 1535, I must not forget to relate an event, which very much changed the face of the affairs of Europe; I mean the death of Francesco Sforza, duke of Milan, which happened in the month of October. As this prince left no issue by Catharine of Denmark, the emperor's niece, whom he had lately married, the duchy of Milan, as fief of the empire, was fallen to the emperor, to be disposed of as he pleased. So, the fears and jealousies of the pope, the king of France, and the Venetians, were revived on this occasion; each of these potentates having cause to fear the emperor would keep Milan for himself, or give it to his brother, the king of the Romans. In that case, Italy would of course, fall again into slavery, and the king of France lose his hopes of recovering that duchy. To make them easy, the emperor declared he had no design to keep Milan, but intended to present some prince with it, who should cause no suspicion to those that were concerned to preserve the peace of Italy. Afterwards, he wisely made use of it for a lure to amuse the king of France; but in reality he never desired to dispossess himself of it *.

1536. Death of queen Catharine. Burnet.

Queen Catharine ended her days the beginning of the year 1536. Tho' her virtue had gained her an universal esteem, she died, however, little lamented by the publick, because she equally embarrassed her friends and enemies. Before she expired, she dictated a very tender letter to the king, who seemed to be extremely moved with it †; but, in all appearance, his grief was of no long continuance. He was very fond of her, when first married, her mildness and modesty having a greater influence upon him, than she could expect from her beauty, which was not extraordinary. In time, his affection abating, he treated her with indifference, tho' ever with much civility. At last, after he had resolved to put her away, her obstinate refusal to comply with his will, made him consider her as an enemy. Accordingly, he used her rigorously when the sentence of divorce was pronounced, even to the not suffering her to keep servants, who treated her as a queen. At last, he publickly forbid to give her that title, tho' he was forced to connive at her disobedience.

1536. A parliament meets.

The parliament meeting the 4th of February, finished the work begun, by abolishing every thing relating to the pope's power, not to leave the least pretence to acknowledge his authority. But the king had a farther view, viz. to suppress the monasteries, as well to be revenged of the monks, and prevent their ill designs, as to procure their estates. In all appearance, the late visitation of the monasteries had convinced him, that the monks were as unserviceable to religion, as prejudicial to his affairs, in his present circumstances.

Reasons of altering the ecclesiastical constitutions.

As among the constitutions observed in the church of England, there were not a few that had a manifest relation to the papal authority, it was absolutely necessary to annul them, and make others, which should have for foundation, the king's supremacy. The parliament had already passed an act, empowering the king to nominate 32 commissioners to examine such as were to be abolished; but the king had not hastened this nomination, because, by this confusion, his authority was much more extensive. Indeed, the papal power was abolished by act of parliament, and yet it still subsisted in the constitutions, which, not being abrogated, threw the clergy into great perplexities, because they knew not what to do. But this was what the king desired, that the clergy might be more at his devotion, since he could equally prosecute them as guilty, whether they did or did not observe them. The parliament taking this contrariety into consideration, would have cured it, by confirming the power formerly given the king, to appoint commissioners to alter these constitutions. This was a sort of reproach for his negligence, in that respect; but he feigned not to mind it, and left the affair in the same state it was.

An act for suppressing the lesser monasteries. Act. Pub.

He had another thing in his thoughts, which affected him much more, viz. to execute his design upon the monks. In this session, he represented to the parliament, that the great number of monasteries in the kingdom, were a burden to the state, and earnestly desired them to remedy the evil, by such means as they should judge proper. Whereupon it was enacted, that all houses of 200 pounds a year, and under, should be suppressed, and their effects given to the king. Of this sort there were 376, and a revenue of 32000 pounds a year, fell to the crown, with above 100,000 pounds worth of plate, goods, ornaments of the churches, and the like. A new court was erected, called the court of the augmentation of the king's revenue, which was to take cognizance of all matters concern-

She also desired he would provide matches for her maids, who were but three; and "that he would give her servants one year's wages more than was due to them." She was a devout and pious princess, and led a severe life. In her greatness she wrought much with her own hand, and kept her women well employed about her, as appeared when the two legates came once to speak with her. A reſolution to let the people have the bible in Engliſh. Burnet.

The convocation ſitting, as uſual, at the ſame time with the parliament, a motion was made there, that there ſhould be a tranſlation of the bible in Engliſh, to be ſet up in all churches, and the ſame was approved of. It muſt be obſerved, the king's intent was only to ſhew the people, there was nothing contrary to the holy ſcriptures, in what was done againſt the pope; but Cranmer, Cromwell, and the reſt of the reformers, had much farther views; for they hoped, when the bible was in the hands of the people, they would ſee their error in many other things, which, hitherto, had been deemed eſſential to religion. But they took care to hide their deſigns from the king, knowing how contrary they were to his; for Henry was abſolutely againſt all reformation of doctrine, and, conſequently, they were to bring him inſenſibly, and by degrees, to what they deſired. They partly ſucceeded, but they fell extremely ſhort of what they had expected, at firſt; however, they thought it very conſiderable to obtain his conſent, that it ſhould be moved in the convocation, to give the people the bible, in Engliſh, and to have cauſed the motion to be approved. As there was then no other Engliſh verſion of the bible but Tindal's, made, at Antwerp, without the publick authority, the convocation petitioned the king for a good tranſlation, which he was pleaſed to take upon himſelf.

The parliament is diſſolved. Burnet.

Henry having obtained of the parliament all he deſired, thought it time to diſſolve it, which he did the 14th of April, after having continued it ſix years. Never had parliament held ſo long, ſince the beginning of the monarchy.

The care Henry took, to ſecure himſelf from the cabals of the Monks, and his other domeſtick enemies, did not prevent him from thinking of his foreign affairs, and of means to avoid the emperor's attacks. Francis was invading Savoy, and it was but too manifeſt, that his intent was to open a paſſage into the Milaneſe. But, as this was a great undertaking, conſidering the then ſituation of France, the emperor could not believe, he had engaged in it, without being firſt ſure of Henry's aſſiſtance. Wherefore, he reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavours, to break their union. From the death of Sforza, he had continued a private negotiation with Francis, to reſign the duchy of Milan to one of his ſons, and acted ſo artfully, that the treaty ſeemed to be very near a concluſion. This could not but inſpire Henry with jealouſy; for he plainly ſaw, if the negotiation ended to the king of France's ſatisfaction, he would be regardleſs of his intereſts. On the other hand, the emperor no ſooner heard of the death of his aunt, qeeen Catharine, but he ſent and offered Henry to renew their alliance, with a mutual oblivion of all that was paſſed. But, leſt he ſhould be taken at his word, he required 1536. three conditions, which left him the liberty to prolong the affair as much as he pleaſed, his view being only to ſow diviſion between Francis and Henry, by making them ſuſpicious of each other. The firſt of theſe conditions was, that Henry ſhould be reconciled to the pope, to which end, he offered his mediation. By the ſecond, he demanded a powerful aſſiſtance againſt the Turks. By the third, that, purſuant to their treaty, in 1518, he ſhould join with him, in the defence of Milan, againſt the attacks of the French king. Henry anſwered, that what had been done againſt the pope, could not be revoked; that as ſoon as Chriſtendom ſhould be in peace, he would act againſt the Infidels, as became a Chriſtian prince; that he was ready to renew his alliance with the emperor, provided it was done without prejudice to the king of France, his ally, that being friend of both, he might be better enabled to labour the reconciliation, or, if he could not ſucceed, to aſſiſt him that ſhould be unjuſtly attacked; that as to the reſt, he refuſed not to agree with the emperor, provided he would own the rupture came from him. The emperor perceiving Henry was upon his guard, thought not fit to puſh this affair any farther. Indeed, Henry could eaſily ſee, his view was to ſet him at variance with France, ſince, at the very time theſe things paſſed, Francis imparted to him the private negotiation, concerning the duchy of Milan. Moreover, he warned him, that the emperor intended to force him to return to the pope's obedience, and, it was only upon that condition, he offered to reſign the Milaneſe.

Henry tries to ſide with the league of Smalcald. Sleidan.

All theſe proceedings of the emperor, convincing Henry that he ſought occaſion to attack him, he reſolved to purſue his negotiation with the Proteſtants of Germany, to make him a diverſion in that country, which ſhould break his meaſures, with regard to England. To this ſame end, he had ſent Edward Fox to them, laſt year; but they would not be his dupes, not imagining, as he would feign have made them believe, that he was inclined to their faith, whilſt he ordered their brethren to be burnt, in England. So, not to be engaged, by faint hopes, to be ſubſervient to his deſigns, at their expence, they delivered, to his ambaſſador, the terms on which, they were willing to be ſtrictly united with him. The terms were, that he ſhould embrace the Augsburg confeſſion, and defend it, with all his power, in a free council; that he ſhould approve of no place for holding the council, without their conſent; that if the pope called a council at his own pleaſure, Henry ſhould join with them, in proteſting againſt it; that he ſhould accept the title of Protector of the League; that he ſhould never return to the pope's obedience; that he ſhould not aſſiſt their enemies; that he ſhould find 100,000 crowns, for the occaſions of the league, and 200,000, if the war laſted any time; and, laſtly, they added, that when he 1536. he ſhould have declared himſelf upon theſe articles, they would ſend ambaſſadors, and agree with him upon the reſt.

Henry is at a loſs about the propoſals.

Theſe propoſals threw Henry into ſome perplexity; for he ſaw, the ſole view of the Proteſtants, was, to ſupport their religion, and, that, however, was the thing which diſturbed him the leaſt, being by no means ſatisfied with the Augsburg confeſſion, and yet he perceived, in caſe he openly rejected it, there was no likelihood of his being able to join with the league of Smalcald. On the other hand, it was his intereſt to continue this negotiation, as well becauſe the Proteſtants might be ſerviceable to him, as to keep the emperor in awe, by that conſideration. So his intereſt required, that, he ſhould, favourably, hear theſe propoſitions; but withal, he reſolved to inſert, in his reply, ſomething which ſhould afford him occaſion to break, if he thought proper. He anſwered, therefore, that he was willing to furniſh the ſum required, in caſe a league, of which he would treat with their ambaſſadors, ſhould be concluded between him and the Proteſtants; that tho' he was ſenſible, to what the title of Protector of the League would expoſe him, he was content to accept it, provided there were, between him and them, a conformity of doctrine, otherwiſe he could not engage to defend a faith, of whoſe truth he was not convinced; that, therefore, he deſired them to ſend commiſſioners, with powers, to mitigate ſome articles of the Augsburg confeſſion, which he could not approve. Moreover, as to the ſupplies, he required, that the engagement ſhould be mutual, whether he or they were attacked. In fine, he demanded an authentick approbation of his divorce; and their promiſe to juſtify it, in a council. Theſe propoſals, on both ſides, were of a nature to keep a treaty long on foot. But, tho' the members of the league of Smalcald ſaw no great likelihood of a ſtrict union, they appointed, however, Sturmius, Draco, Bucer, and Melancthon, to go and confer with Henry, and his divines. It was eſpecially provided, in their inſtructions, that nothing ſhould be concluded to the prejudice of the emperor or empire. This negotiation was interrupted by the death of Ann Bullen, which happened ſoon after, and, which very much altered the face of affairs, as well as the king's mind, in reſpect to the reformation, which ſhe openly countenanced.

The king falls in love with Jane Seymour, and grows jealous of the queen. Herbert.

The king was poſſeſſed, at the ſame time, with two paſſions, a violent love for Jane Seymour, maid of honour to the queen, and an extreme jealouſy of his wife. Very likely, the latter was a conſequence of the former. When Ann Bullen's enemies found, ſhe no longer held in the king's heart the place ſhe had formerly enjoyed, inſtead of fearing to accuſe her of unfaithfulneſs to the king, her ſpouſe, they believed they ſhould pleaſe that ſpouſe, who began to be himſelf unfaithful. It is certain, the king had loſt that affection for the queen, which made him ſurmount ſo many obſtacles to poſſeſs her; whether enjoyment had quenched this firſt flame, or the queen's indiſcretions given the king cauſe to ſuſpect her, he ſo gave himſelf over to jealouſy, that it was not in his power to overcome it, or, perhaps, he never much endeavoured it. However this be, the occaſion was this. The queen had a great friendſhip for her brother, the lord Rochford, but could not indure his wife, who lived very ill with her husband, and had an infamous character, as will evidently appear hereafter. It was this lady that whiſpered in the king's ear, the firſt report that the queen was unfaithful, and had a criminal commerce with her brother, the lord Rochford. Theſe ſeeds fell upon a ſoil already prepared to receive them; for the king, now prejudiced by his paſſion for Jane Seymour, was overjoyed to find in the pretended unfaithfulneſs of the queen, a means to procure the poſſeſſion of the perſon he loved. As ſoon as queen Ann's enemies ſaw how the king ſtood affected towards her, they took care to ruin her quite, in his favour, by accuſing her of ſundry intrigues with her own domeſticks. Theſe enemies were the ſame, with thoſe of the reformation. They imagined, ſhe had put the king upon all his proceedings againſt the pope, on purpoſe to favour the new religion. But tho' ſhe had not done this, it was ſufficient to heat her, that ſhe had been the cauſe, by inſpiring the king with love, ſince that had occaſioned Catharine's divorce, and conſequently all the innovations in religion. Policy might likewiſe enter into their project; for they were ſenſible, ſo long as Ann lived, ſhe would be an invincible obſtacle, to a reconciliation with Rome, whereas if ſhe were dead, they hoped, all difficulties would be eaſily removed. The duke of Norfolk, inwardly burned with a deſire to ſee religion again eſtabliſhed upon the ſame foot it was before theſe alterations, tho', like a good courtier, he took care not to diſcover it to his maſter. His quality, zeal, and credit, had made him head of the party of the old religion, and, as he had the king's ear, he could eaſily do ill offices to the contrary party; the king's jealouſy of the queen, was, too fair an occaſion to be neglected, ſince he could at once ſerve his party, and make his court to his maſter. So, it is commonly believed, this lord contributed moſt to the queen's ruin, becauſe among all her enemies, he had moſt acceſs to the king. But, however, whether it was he, or another, the king was inſpired with a jealouſy which threw him into a ſort of fury. This is not very ſtrange, conſidering his temper, the moſt impetuous and moſt impatient that ever was. The queen was accuſed of a criminal commerce, not only with the lord Rochford, her brother, but alſo with Henry Norris, groom of the ſtole, Francis Weſton and William Brereton of the king's privy chamber, and one Mark Smeton, a muſician. It muſt be confeſſed, the queen had ſome indiſcreet ways, which the king never minded, whilſt he was not prejudiced againſt her, but which afterwards were too capable of confirming his ſuſpicions; beſides, as ſoon as he hearkened to what was ſaid againſt

Without doubt, Hen- was ſome time tormented with jealouſy, before he diſcovered it, but, at laſt, it broke out at the ſolemn juſts, held at Greenwich, from whence he ſuddenly withdrew, with ſigns of great anger, the cauſe whereof could not be gueſſed. It is likely, he had obſerved ſomething that confirmed his ſuſpicions, of which none but himſelf took notice. Sanders ſays, the queen dropping her handkerchief, one of her gallants took it up, and wiped his face with it; but this author is the only perſon that relates this circumſtance. However this be, the king was no ſooner gone from the juſts, but he ordered the lord Rochford, Norris, Weſton, Brereton, and Smeton to be arreſted; and, at the ſame time the queen was confined to her chamber, and the next day conveyed to the tower. But what plainly ſhewed the deſign of her enemies to deſtroy her, was their procuring an order for the archbiſhop of Canterbury to retire to his palace, at Lambeth, for fear, if he could ſpeak with the king, he would find occaſion to vindicate her.

She is apprehended. Burnet.

Snares are laid for her. Burnet.

It is not ſurpriſing, this princeſs, in her ſad condition ſhould be diſordered, and having none to adviſe with, ſhould be enſnared by her enemies. Her uncle's lady, the lady Bullen, was appointed to lie in her chamber, with whom ſhe was at great variance, and from this lady, who was placed there to watch her, it came to be known, that during her confinement, ſhe ſaid ſome things which helped to confirm the king's ſuſpicions. However, upon her examination, ſhe poſitively denied, ſhe had ever been falſe to the king; only when ſhe was told that Norris, Weſton, Brereton and Smeton had accuſed her, tho' ſhe might have eaſily ſeen it was purely to draw from her ſome confeſſion, ſhe believed ſhe ought not to conceal certain things which had paſſed between her and them. She ſaid concerning Norris, that asking him one day why he did not go on with his marriage, he anſwered, there was no haſte; whereupon, ſhe ſaid, ſhe plainly ſaw he was in hopes of having her, in caſe the king died. This ſeems to argue there was ſome familiarity between her and Norris; otherwiſe, ſuppoſing the truth of the fact, it is hard to conceive that a queen ſhould think of talking, thus, to one of her domeſticks.

As for Smeton, the muſician, ſhe ſaid, he was never in her chamber but twice; that the laſt time ſhe ſaw him there, ſhe asked him why he was ſo ſad; and that in her converſation with him, he had the boldneſs to tell her, "No, no, madam, a look ſuffices me."

As for Weſton, ſhe owned he had taken the liberty to tell her, he loved her, and that ſhe thereupon defied him.

But after all, the queſtion is to know, whether the regiſters from whence this examination is taken are true, or whether the examination was impartially written. Indeed, this doubt alone is not ſufficient to clear the queen; but then, when it is conſidered, ſhe had for adverſary a husband who was king, and jealous even to madneſs, very likely, they who were employed to examine her, gave her words ſuch a turn and ſenſe, as favoured the king's deſigns, by pretending to ſet down the ſubſtance of her anſwers inſtead of her very words. 1536.

As for the lord Rochford, all the evidence for his pretended familiarity with the queen, his ſiſter, amounted to no more, than that he was once ſeen leaning on her bed.

Depoſition of the complices. Burnet.

When theſe men were examined, Norris ſwore he believed the queen innocent, and perſiſted in his aſſeveration to his laſt breath. Smeton confeſſed, he had known the queen, carnally, three times; but he was never confronted with her; nay, he was condemned before ſhe was brought to her tryal, that he might not be a witneſs. This makes very much for the queen, ſince it is not likely ſuch an evidence would have been voluntarily neglected, had it been deemed as good as it appears to be; but, probably, it was feared that Smeton would retract, or the queen confound him, if brought face to face with her. The reſt pleaded not guilty; yet, however, were condemned and executed.

The queen is condemned with the lord Rochford. Hall.

Three days after, the queen and the lord Rochford, her brother, were tried by their peers, the duke of Norfolk being lord high-ſteward for that occaſion. The queen was accuſed of proſtituting herſelf to her brother, and four other men, and conſpiring the king's death; but this laſt charge being without any foundation, it was not thought proper to inſiſt upon it. The queen and the lorn Rochford pleaded not guilty, and yet were condemned, without its being ever known upon what evidence the ſentence was grounded. Judgment was given, that the lord Rochford ſhould be beheaded and quartered; but, as for the queen, ſhe was condemned to be burnt or beheaded, at the king's pleaſure.

Remarks on the ſentence.

Very probably, the king believed the queen guilty, and under his preſent prejudice, ſigns and tokens were to him as good proofs; but can the ſame thing be ſaid of the peers who condemned her? Did their conſcience ſuffer them to condemn a queen to death, upon bare ſurmiſes? I ſay ſurmiſes, ſince had there been ſolid proofs, they would very likely have been publiſhed, in order to juſtify a ſentence of this nature, which was unprecedented, in England. Such reſerve was not afterwards uſed with regard to another of Henry's queens, who was really guilty of the like crime. All that can be ſaid in favour of thoſe who paſſed ſentence on Ann Bullen, is, that their dread of turning againſt themſelves the king's fury, if they complied not with his humour, made them conſider ſigns as real proofs. It is obſervable, there were but 26 peers preſent at the tryal, tho' there were then 53, in England, as appears by the ſummons to parliament directed to them ſoon after. This gives occaſion to conjecture, that, according to the method introduced by cardinal Wolſey, in the condemnation of the duke of Buckingham, care was taken to remove thoſe, who were ſuſpected not to have ſo much complaiſance as to gratify the king's paſſion, at the expence of their conſci-ence. As for Dr. Burnet's saying, in his Hiſtory, that Ann Bullen's father was among her judges, it is known he retracted it afterwards.

The ſentence was executed the 19th of May. Ann ſuffered death with great conſtancy, after a ſhort ſpeech to thoſe that were preſent, wherein ſhe neither confeſſed, nor denied the crime, for which ſhe was condemned; contenting herſelf with acknowledging her obligations to the king, with praying for him, and deſiring the prayers of the people for herſelf. It is generally believed, her fear of drawing the king's anger on her daughter Elizabeth, prevented her from inſiſting upon her own innocence; for, as ſhe knew the king's temper perfectly, and could not vindicate herſelf, without charging him with injuſtice, ſhe was afraid Elizabeth would become the ſacrifice of the king her father's reſentment. However, this was the tragical end of Ann Bullen, whom ſome have vehemently defamed, and whoſe conduct others have as carefully juſtified, without any poſſibility yet of knowing, for certain, whether ſhe was guilty or innocent. The enemies to her daughter Elizabeth, and the reformation, have blackened her reputation as much as poſſible, imagining thereby to give a mortal wound to the Proteſtant religion. For a contrary reaſon, the Proteſtants have forgot nothing that could conduce to give of her, a quite different idea. But both have reaſoned upon a falſe principle, ſince the goodneſs of a religion depends not upon the life and converſation of the profeſſors. For my part, if I may ſpeak my opinion, I can never believe, the peers, her judges, had ſufficient evidence to condemn her, as guilty of defiling the king's bed. However, it cannot be denied, that by ſome familiarities unbecoming a queen, ſhe gave too great an advantage over her. As ſhe was young and handſome, without doubt ſhe was not diſpleaſed to ſee the effect of her beauty upon all ſorts of people, imagining that the love ſhe inſpired them with, greatly heightened her merit. We ſee too many ladies liable to this infirmity. Be this as it will, it is certain, the ſpirit of party, has not a little contributed to the diverſity of opinions, concerning the queen. Had ſhe not countenanced the reformation, ſhe would have, undoubtedly, fewer accuſers among the Catholicks, and had ſhe led the king to perſecute the reformed, not many of theſe would undertake her vindication. This is the way of the world. People are innocent or guilty, according to the party they are of. But beſides this general cauſe, a particular reaſon may alſo be found in the carriage of Ann Bullen. She was of a very gay temper, which had charmed the king, but which, after ſome years of enjoyment, ſerved only to raiſe his jealouſy. On the other hand, it cannot be denied ſhe had very good qualities, and, particularly, great charity to the poor, to whom, a few days before her diſgrace, ſhe had given 2000 pounds. A circumſtance in the ſtory of her death, ſhews, likewiſe, ſhe had a very tender conſcience. After ſhe was condemned, ſhe fell upon her knees to the lady Bullen, her ſiſter-in-law, and conjured her, for God's ſake, to tell the princeſs Mary, ſhe begged her pardon for her ill-uſage of her. This charity, and this tenderneſs of conſcience, would little become a woman, who ſhould have had a ſhameful and criminal commerce with four men and her own brother; but they would be very conſiſtent with great indiſcretion and a little coquetry. 1536.

Henry nulls his marriage with Ann Bullen. Hall.

Tho' the king had procured the queen's condemnation, he was not ſatisfied; for he was pleaſed to give her, before ſhe died, a freſh cauſe of mortification, by annulling their marriage. To this end, he cauſed her to be turned ſo many ways, that, at laſt, ſhe confeſſed a contract between her and the lord Percy, now earl of Northumberland, tho' that lord proteſted, upon his ſalvation, there never was any formal promiſe of marriage between them. It was believed this confeſſion was drawn from her, by an intimation, that the king would, on no other condition, be prevailed with to mitigate that cruel part of her ſentence of being burnt, into the milder part of being beheaded. However this be, upon this ſame confeſſion, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was forced to paſs a ſentence of divorce between the king and her, and declare their daughter Elizabeth, illegitimate. What is moſt ſtrange in the king's proceedings, is, the artifice he uſed, in cauſing the queen to be condemned before her marriage was nulled. Had the ſentence of divorce been paſſed before the tryal, ſhe could not have been condemned for adultery, ſince her marriage with the king muſt have been conſidered only as a concubinage. But Henry had acquired ſuch an abſolute ſway, over his ſubjects, that his will was the ſole meaſure of juſtice and law; nay, he ſo little regarded the publick, and his own reputation, that he married Jane Seymour the next day after Ann Bullen's death; wherein he expreſſed a paſſion which ſerved greatly to juſtify the deceaſed queen.

The king marries Jane Seymour. Hall.

The death of Ann Bullen revived the hopes of Mary, the king's daughter, by his firſt wife Catharine. Her attachment to the queen, her mother, and her obſtinate refuſal to ſubmit to the late acts of parliament, had quite thrown her out of the king's favour, who could not bear contradiction. But the late event cauſing the friends of Rome, to imagine the king might be reconciled to the pope, they adviſed Mary to accommodate herſelf to the times, for fear of loſing the fruit, this change might produce. As there was nothing now that obſtructed the union of the king with the emperor, it was hoped the act, which declared her illegitimate, might be repealed, provided ſhe made her ſubmiſſion to the king, her father. To this end, ſhe reſolved to write a very humble and reſpectful letter to the king, proteſting, for the future, ſhe would have no other ſentiments but his. But Henry not ſatisfied with a ſubmiſſion expreſſed in ſuch general terms, inſiſted, before he reſtored her to favour, upon her ſigning certain articles, which ſhe had, hitherto, rejected; viz. the ſupremacy, the renunciation of the biſhop

Mary tried all poſſible ways to be excuſed; but, at length, finding the king remained inflexible, ſhe ſigned them, tho' contrary to her opinion, in hopes that the ill ſhe committed in acting againſt her conſcience, might be productive of much good. As for the princeſs Elizabeth, then about three years old, ſhe was diveſted of the title of Princeſs of Wales, which ſhe had enjoyed from her birth. However, the king ſtill continued to educate her, at court, with all the care and tenderneſs of a father.

A parliament. A new act of ſucceſſion. Hall.

A new parliament meeting the 8th of June, an act was paſſed to ſettle the ſucceſſion, that made, after their marriage, being void by the ſentence of divorce between the king and Ann Bullen. By this new act, the other was repealed, and the iſſue of the king's two firſt marriages declared illegitimate, and diſabled from ever inheriting the crown; moreover the act confirmed Ann Bullen's ſentence, as being grounded upon very juſt cauſes, and ſettled the crown, after the king's death, upon the iſſue of queen Jane, or of any other queen whom he might afterwards marry. Finally, they gave the king full power to declare the ſucceſſion to the crown, either by his letters patents under the great ſeal, or by his laſt will, ſigned with his hand; and, if any ſo deſigned to ſucceed in default of others, ſhould endeavour to uſurp upon thoſe before them, or to exclude them, they were declared traytors, as were alſo thoſe who ſhould maintain the lawfulneſs of the former marriages. Hence it may be eaſily gueſſed, with what an abſolute ſway Henry then ruled, ſince, without any examination, the parliament approved of all his actions, and granted him even more than he deſired, by giving him power to ſettle the order of his ſucceſſors. By that, it was in the king's power to replace Mary and Elizabeth in ſuch order, as he pleaſed, or exclude them entirely. This is a clear evidence, that the parliament had not juſtice and equity ſo much in view, as pleaſing the king.

The pope tries to make up matters with Henry. Burnet.

When pope Paul III. heard of Ann Bullen's death, he entertained hopes of a revocation of what had been done, in England; and, therefore, declared his thoughts to Sir Gregory Caſſali, formerly the king's ambaſſador, and after ſome excuſes concerning the ſentence of excommunication which he had given, but was not yet publiſhed, told him, he would willingly cloſe with any expedients that ſhould be deemed proper, to procure a good agreement between the king and him. But Henry, who, ſome few years before, would have done much to obtain the pope's favour, was now of another mind; nothing being capable of inducing him to diſpoſſeſs himſelf of the authority acquired over the clergy, as well as over the reſt of his ſubjects, and which rendered his power more extenſive than he expected, at firſt. On the contrary, entirely to deſtroy the pope's expectations, he cauſed the parliament to confirm, by two new acts, whatever had been done againſt him. By the firſt, all perſons were to incur the pains of a Præmunire, who endeavoured to reſtore, in England, the authority of the biſhop of Rome; and all officers both civil and eccleſiaſtical were commanded, under ſevere penalties, to puniſh thoſe who ſhould dare to violate this ſtatute. The ſecond nulled and aboliſhed all diſpenſations, immunities, and privileges, flowing from the court of Rome, ſaving to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the power of confirming what ſhould not be contrary to the law of God, or common decency, which confirmation was to paſs under the great ſeal.

Statutes againſt the pope. Burnet.

In this ſeſſion, two conſiderable acts were alſo paſſed, but which related not to religion. By the firſt, it was forbid, under ſevere penalties, to marry in the next degrees of the blood-royal, without the king's licenſe firſt had. This ſtatute was made on account of Thomas Howard, the duke of Norfolk's brother, to whom Margret Douglaſs, the king's niece, and daughter to the queen of Scotland, then living in the Engliſh court, had plighted her faith, without acquainting the king, her uncle. Henry offended at their boldneſs, ſent them both to the tower, and to prevent the like for the future, procured the foremention ed act. By the ſecond, it was provided, that all uſurpations of the parliament upon the royal authority, before the king was 24 years of age, might be repealed by letters patents under the great ſeal. Thus, both houſes of parliament employed their whole authority, to give the ſovereign a power, which his predeceſſors had never enjoyed, as if they had been aſſembled for that purpoſe.

Another about the marriage of the king's relations.

The clergy approve of the king's divorce. Burnet.

But it was not only with reſpect to the civil government, that the bounds of the royal authority were enlarged; for the clergy, unwilling to yield to the parliament, in that point, uſed the ſame endeavours to become agreeable to the king, by approving all his proceedings.

The convocation being met, at the ſame time, confirmed the ſentence of the invalidity of the king's marriage with Ann Bullen, upon the ſame ground which had ſerved to procure it, viz. a pre-contract with the lord Percy, tho' that lord denied it upon oath.

Complaints againſt the reformers. Burnet.

A few days after, the lower houſe of convocation ſent to the upper houſe 67 opinions, which they thought worthy to be condemned; and, at the ſame time, the deputies made great complaints againſt thoſe who were for making innovations in religion. Theſe complaints were levelled, at Cranmer, Cromwell, Shaxton, Latimer, and ſome others, who were noted as heads or promoters of the reformation, tho' they were not named *; and care was taken, to mix with theſe 67 opinions, moſtly drawn from the doctrine of the Lutherans, ſeveral tenets of the old Lollards and the Anabaptiſts, to inſinuate, that thoſe who were complained of, embraced them all alike; the enemies of the reformers hoping to make them forfeit the king's favour, who affected a great

1536. great rigour againſt ſuch as were termed hereticks. After the death of Ann Bullen, they ſcarce doubted that all whom ſhe had loved or protected, would ſhare in her ruin; but they were diſappointed in their expectations; for Cranmer and Cromwell were never more in the king's favour, who even gave preſently after to Cromwell, a freſh mark of his eſteem, by conſtituting him his vice-gerent in all eccleſiaſtical matters. So, the convocation's complaints, inſtead of being prejudicial to the reformation, or reformers, ſeem rather to have increaſed the credit of the two heads. This was quickly perceived, when it was ſeen that they had perſuaded the king to advance the reformation, by retrenching, in the publick worſhip, ſuch ceremonies as were not founded upon the word of God. This reſolution being taken, the king acquainted the convocation, that he wiſhed them to examine the ceremonies, to the end ſuch as were uſeleſs and inſignificant, might be retrenched.

Articles propoſed by the king to the clergy. Hollingſh.

But thoſe who were againſt the reformation, had a much greater cauſe to be alarmed, when ſome days after, Cromwell brought into the upper houſe of convocation, articles drawn by the king himſelf, containing ſundry alterations in the doctrines, with orders to examine them, and report to the king the reſult of their debates. Then it was, that the two parties openly divided, the one to promote, and the other to oppoſe the reformation. Cranmer was at the head of the firſt, being ſupported by Goodrich, biſhop of Ely, Shaxton of Sarum, Latimer of Worceſter, Fox of Hereford, Hilſey of Rocheſter, Barlow of St. David's. Lee, archbiſhop of York, was chief of the ſecond; and with him were Stokeſly, biſhop of London, Tonſtal of Durham, Gardiner of Wincheſter, Longland of Lincoln, Sherburn of Chicheſter, Nix of Norwich, Kite of Carliſle. Theſe, who were private favourers of the pope's intereſt, ſtill hoping a reconciliation with Rome, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed all innovations, for fear the breach ſhould become wider. But this party lay under a great diſadvantage, as Cromwell and Cranmer, who had the king's ear, ſuggeſted to him, that moſt of the abuſes which they deſired to be aboliſhed, directly tended to ſupport the pope's uſurpations. In ſhort, after many debates, the convocation agreed upon certain articles, which were digeſted in form of conſtitutions, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

Conſtitutions made by the clergy. Herbert.

I. The holy ſcriptures are laid down as the foundation of faith, jointly with the three creeds, the Apoſtles, the Nicene, and Athanaſian, and the four firſt general councils.

II. The neceſſity of baptiſm is eſtabliſhed in the ſecond, which forbids alſo, to repeat it.

III. In the third, penance is reckoned neceſſary to ſalvation, conſiſting of contrition, auricular confeſſion, and amendment of life.

IV. The fourth eſtabliſhes, as a fundamental doctrine, the real preſence of Chriſt's body, in the euchariſt.

V. In the fifth, it is ſaid, that juſtification is attained by regeneration, which conſiſts of contrition, faith, and charity.

VI. It is appointed in the ſixth, that images ſhould ſtand in the churches, but that incenſing, kneeling, and offering to them, people ſhould not do it to the image, but to God and his honour. 1536.

VII. In the ſeventh, ſaints are to be honoured, but without believing, ſuch things are to be obtained at their hands, as belongs only to God to beſtow.

VIII. In the eighth, ſaints are to be prayed to, provided it be done without ſuperſtition. The days ſet apart for their memories are to be obſerved; unleſs the king ſhould leſſen the number of them, which if he did, it is to be obeyed.

IX. The ceremonies uſed in the church, are to be retained, as the veſtments of the prieſts, holy-water, holy-bread, bearing candles on Candlemas-day, giving aſhes on Aſh-wedneſday, bearing palms on Palm-ſunday, creeping to the croſs on Good-friday, and kiſſing it, hollowing the font, and other exorciſms and benedictions.

X. The tenth declares it good to pray for the dead, but that it is neceſſary to correct the abuſes advanced under the pretence of purgatory, the pope's pardons, maſſes ſold in certain places, or before certain images. In fine, that ſince the ſtate and place of ſouls after death, are unknown, they ought to be recommended to God's mercy, in general terms only.

The king approves them.

Theſe conſtitutions being preſented to the king, who corrected them in ſeveral places, were ſigned by Cromwell, Cranmer, 17 biſhops, 40 abbots and priors, and 50 archdeacons and proctors of the lower houſe of convocation, among whom was Polydore Virgil, archdeacon of Wells, author of a Hiſtory of England, publiſhed afterwards by the king's order. Their publication occaſioned great variety of cenſures. Thoſe that deſired a reformation had gained ſome ground, with reſpect to images and purgatory, but, chiefly in, that the ſcriptures were made the ſtandard of faith, becauſe they hoped from that principal, to draw one day very great conſequences. But the determinations concerning auricular confeſſion, and the real preſence of Chriſt's body, in the euchariſt, troubled them extremely; for not only were theſe articles directly contrary to their ſentiments, but they ſaw how difficult it would be to meddle with them again, by reaſon of the king's prejudice, who believed them unqueſtionable. The other party were under an unſpeakable conſternation, to ſee articles ſo long ſince determined, brought under examination, the papal authority aboliſhed, and the exiſtance of purgatory called in queſtion. Thus theſe conſtitutions pleaſed neither party. The one thought the reformers had acted too faintly in not advancing the reformation, and could not forbear blaming their compliance, in ſuffering doctrines ſo repugnant to truth, to be eſtabliſhed. But it was anſwered, that every thing could not to be done at once, and that it would have been imprudent, obſtinately, to require that the errors, the people were not yet ſenſible of, ſhould be ſuddenly retrenched.

The opinions of the two parties upon theſe articles. Burnet.

The

1536. The other party were very angry, alſo, with the biſhops, for ſo baſely abandoning truths, embraced for ſo many ages, by the Catholick church. But, indeed, it was not in the power of either to act otherwiſe; for the king himſelf managed the whole, having ſettled in his cabinet-council, what he thought fit to alter or keep. But there was not any in this council that dared to oppoſe his opinion, or believed it prudent to combat his ſentiments, for fear a too great oppoſition, ſhould produce a quite contrary effect; and, all that could be done, was to try to enlighten the king gently and inſenſibly, without ſtriving to bring him, by a ſort of compulſion, to what was thought reaſonable.

The king being cited to a council, adviſes with the convocation. Burnet.

Before the convocation broke up, the king communicated to both houſes, a ſummons he had received to a council, which was to meet, at Mantua. The pope, without conſulting him, had called this council, in concert with the emperor, and was to preſide by his legates. So Henry might well expect to loſe his cauſe before ſuch a council, had he been ſo unwiſe as to ſubmit to its deciſions. Indeed, he had appealed from the pope to a general council; but there are many queries to be reſolved, in order to know whether this called at Mantua, was lawful, and fortified with a ſufficient authority. In the interim, before he anſwered the ſummons, he was pleaſed to adviſe with the clergy, who, after mature deliberation, preſented to him a writing to this effect; that a true and lawful general council, was a very good means to preſerve the peace and union of the church; but before a council was called, it was neceſſary to conſider, firſt, who had authority to call it; ſecondly, whether the reaſons for calling it were weighty; thirdly, who ſhould aſſiſt as judges; fourthly, what ſhould be the order of proceedings; fifthly, what doctrines were to be diſcuſſed. Then, it was declared, that neither the pope nor any prince in the world, had power to call a general council, without the conſent of all the ſovereigns, in Chriſtendom. According to this declaration, Henry publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the council, which was to meet at Mantua, ſpeaking very plainly and freely of the deſigns and conduct of the pope; and concluded with ſaying, that he could not conſider as free and general, a council where the biſhop of Rome ſhould preſide, which ſhould meet in a ſuſpected place, and which muſt be compoſed only of a ſmall number of prelates, till the war between the emperor and France was ended.

The parliament is prorogued.

The 18th of July, the parliament was prorogued, after a ſeſſion but of 40 days, wherein, however, ſeveral acts of moment were paſſed.

Reginald Pole falls out with the king. Burnet.

At this time cardinal Pole was in high repute for his learning and eloquence. His name was de la Pole, but every were, except in England, he is ſo well known by that of Polus, that he cannot be called by any other, without danger of confounding the reader. He was deſcended of Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and favourite to Richard II*. From that time, this family had been continually advanced, ſo that in the reign of Henry VI, the earl of Suffolk was honoured with the title of duke. After that, a lord of this family married a daughter of the duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV. Of this marriage was born, among other children, Reginald de la Pole, or Polus, the cardinal I am ſpeaking of, who, conſequently, was couſin to the king. Being a younger brother, he was deſigned for the church, for which alſo his natural quallities rendered him very proper. In his younger years, he made ſo great progreſs in all the ſciences, that the king intending to raiſe him to the higheſt dignities of the church, conferring on him the deanery of Exeter, with ſeveral other benefices, that he might go and finiſh his ſtudies abroad. He went firſt to Paris, where he ſtaid ſome years, and forfeited, in ſome meaſure, the king's favour, for refuſing to concur with his agents, in procuring the determinations of the French univerſities, in the affair of the divorce. Notwithſtanding this, he returned into England, where he aſſiſted as dean of Exeter, at the convocation, which acknowledged the king ſupreme head of the church of England. There is even reaſon to preſume, he was not of the number of thoſe who oppoſed this new title, becauſe he kept his deanery ſeveral years after. At length, he travelled into Italy, and lived ſome time at Padua, where he contracted a friendſhip with Bembo, Sadoletti, and other celebrated wits. The reputation he accquired in that country, made the king deſirous to recall him, intending to reward his merit, which was univerſally known; but Pole ſtill declined, on ſome pretence or other, to comply with the king's deſire. At laſt, finding delays could prevail no longer, he was forced to write to the king the true reaſon of his refuſal, which was, he could not approve either of his divorce, or ſeparation from the apoſtolick ſee. Henry, who was extremely deſirous to gain him, ſent him a writing, containing his apology, and the reaſons of his proceedings againſt the pope. Upon which Pole wrote his book De Unitate Eccleſiaſtica, wherein he takes the liberty to ſpeak of the king, in very offenſive terms, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and exhorting the emperor and the reſt of the princes, to turn their arms againſt him. He was not ſatisfied with ſending him his book, in manuſcript, but cauſed it to be printed and publiſhed. Henry provoked, as may be eaſily judged, at ſuch a violent and diſreſpectful behaviour, tried to allure him into England, by writing to him, how much he eſteemed his book, deſiring him withal to come and explain ſome difficult paſſages, by word of mouth; but Pole took care not to be, thus, inſnared. So the king perceiving this artifice took no effect, diveſted him of all his dignities, the loſs whereof was amply repaired by the pope and the emperor. Some time after, he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat. He thereby became ſtill more attached to the pope's intereſt, and a greater enemy to the king, who not being able to reach his perſon, made

The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries. Burnet.

The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries, enacted in the laſt ſeſſion of the late parliament, was not executed till Auguſt, tho' the commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe, had received their inſtructions, in April. Probably, the king had a mind to ſee the iſſue of the new parliament, before they proceeded. As their report was ſuppreſſed in the reign of queen Mary, it cannot poſitively be ſaid, what it contained. Thus much is certain, the adherents of the pope, and the old religion, accuſed them of committing numberleſs extortions and robberies, and of making falſe reports of what they diſcovered, in this viſitation, to leſſen the horror of their oppreſſions. This may be partly true; nay, it is not unlikely, that theſe men, either from a deſire to make their court to the king, or from a greedineſs to enrich themſelves, exceeded their inſtructions; and, on the other hand, it is alſo probable, their accuſers highly aggravated the crimes laid to their charge. However this be, immenſe numbers were extremely diſpleaſed at the ſuppreſſion of ſo many religious houſes, which were had in great veneration. All the friers of theſe ſuppreſſed houſes, who wiſhed to become ſecular, had a diſpenſation from the king, and the reſt were removed to the larger monaſteries, which were untouched. The churches and cloyſters were pulled down, and the materials ſold to the king's uſe.

Abundance of people diſcontented. Burnet.

It may be eaſily judged, the monks ſpared no pains to excite the people to rebel. They found it the more eaſy, as great diſcontents reigned every where; for the nobility and gentry took it very ill, that the king ſhould have the lands of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries, moſt part whereof were founded by their anceſtors; beſides, they were deprived of the conveniency of providing for their younger children, when they had too many, and of lodging, as they travelled, in theſe houſes, where they were always well entertained. The poor murmured ſtill louder, becauſe multitudes lived by the alms, which were daily diſtributed in theſe houſes. In ſhort, the devout bigots thought, the ſouls of their anceſtors muſt now lie in purgatory, ſince ſo many maſſes, which were ſaid for their deliverance, were aboliſhed, by the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries.

The diſorders of the ſuppreſſed houſes publiſhed. Burnet.

The court hearing of theſe murmurs, endeavoured to compoſe them, by publiſhing the diſorders, diſcovered in theſe houſes; but this ſignified nothing. Beſides, that theſe reports were deemed very much aggravated, it was ſaid, why were not theſe abuſes ſeverely puniſhed, and reformed, without deſtroying whole houſes for ever? At laſt, Cromwell found an expedient to allay theſe diſcontents, in great meaſure, by adviſing the king, to ſell the lands of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries, at very eaſy rates, and oblige the purchaſers, under ſevere penalties, to keep up the wonted hoſpitality. But this expedient was not capable of entirely appeaſing the murmurs of the people, tho' the king ſtrove to give them ſome ſatisfaction, by re-endowing 31 of theſe houſes. 1536.

Injunctions to the clergy. Herbert.

Whilſt people were in this fermentation, the king publiſhed, in the name of the vice-gerent, ſome injunctions to regulate the behaviour of perſons, in holy orders, many of whom led very irregular lives. Theſe injunctions, contained nothing but what had been ordained by ſeveral ſynods, and yet the clergy were extremely offended, becauſe they could not endure to ſee themſelves ſubject to the orders of the vice-gerent, by whom, they ſaid, they were going to be inſlaved, much more than by the pope. Thus, the inferior clergy, the monks, and the bigots, being equally concerned, in what had been done, and in what, very probably, was intended to be done, inſpired thoſe on whom they had any influence, with a ſpirit of rebellion, which quickly broke out into a flame.

An inſurrection in Lincolnſhire. Hall.

The firſt riſing was in Lincolnſhire, where Dr. Mackerel, prior of Barlings, drew after him a great body of men, whom he headed, under the name of Captain Cobler. The rebels ſent their grievances to the king, in a very humble manner, telling him, they acknowledged his ſupremacy, and were content he ſhould enjoy the tenths and firſt-fruits of the livings, but, withal, prayed him, to adviſe with his nobility, concerning the redreſs of their grievances. This was taxing the king, indirectly, with following the counſels of Thomas Cromwell, who was of a mean extraction. Theſe grievances were, that he had ſuppreſſed a great number of monaſteries; that large ſubſidies had been granted, by parliament, without any occaſion; that he admitted into his council, perſons of mean birth, whoſe ſole view was to enrich themſelves, inſtead of conſulting the good of the ſtate; that ſeveral biſhops had ſubverted the antient faith, and embraced new doctrines, at all times condemned by the church; and, that having ſeen ſo many religious houſes plundered, they were afraid the churches would undergo the ſame fate.

The king's manifeſto. Speed.

The king returned an anſwer to theſe grievances, in a large manifeſto. But, as his reaſons were grounded upon principles, not admitted by the male-contents, the manifeſto had no great effect. In the interim, the king was greatly embarraſſed; his troops were few, and he had certain advice, that a like inſurrection was preparing in Yorkſhire, and other neighbouring counties. He ordered, however, the duke of Suffolk to march, tho' with very few troops, and try to ſtop the progreſs of the rebels; but the duke finding himſelf too weak, thought it more proper, to endeavour to appeaſe the commotion, by way of nogotiation, than by arms. So, when he ſent to the male-contents, the king's reply to their grievances, he took occaſion to let them know, they ſhould not deſpair of pardon. Upon which, ſome of their heads privately ſent him word, they had joined with the rebels only to reclaim them, wherein they hoped to ſucceed, provided the king would be

1536. be pleaſed to grant them a general pardon. The duke diſliked not this overture, which afforded him an opportunity to write to the king, and ſollicit him in their behalf, offering, however, to march againſt the rebels, if he was ordered. At the ſame time, the king received news, that the Yorkſhire-men had taken arms, and as he feared the others would join them, made haſte and iſſued out a proclamation, granting an abſolute pardon to all that ſhould return to their homes. The proclamation ſucceeded, according to expectation; for the rebels, immediately, diſperſed, and ſo freed the king from great perplexity. Some, however, choſe rather to join the Yorkſhire rebels, than accept of the pardon.

A more dangerous rebellion in Yorkſhire. Stow.

The inſurrection of Yorkſhire, was much more dangerous, than that of Lincolnſhire. This laſt ſeemed to have been accidental and ſudden; the other was, in purſuance of a ſettled deſign, wherein were concerned ſeveral perſons of note, who only waited, before they declared, to ſee how the people, in general, were diſpoſed. One Robert Aske, a man of good judgment, headed the male-contents of thoſe parts, where the diſtance of the court, and the neighbourhood of Scotland, rendered the people more bold than elſewhere, beſides, that the monks had ever been in more credit, in the northern counties, than in all the reſt of the kingdom. Since July, Aske had tried to gain the lord Dacres, who had amuſed him, ſome time, with hopes that his negotiation would ſucceed. Probably, this lord ſent the king the firſt notice of the plot. At laſt, the male-contents took arms, and aſſembled, in very great numbers, about the end of Auguſt, juſt after the Lincolnſhire rebellion broke out. When they ſaw themſelves ſtrong enough, they would not ſuffer the lords and gentlemen to remain neuter, at home, but forced them either to fly, or join with them, and ſwear they would be true to the cauſe, for which they intended to fight. This cauſe was, properly, religion, as they plainly intimated, by putting a crucifix in their banners; beſides, they re-eſtabliſhed the monks, in ſome of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries. As they met with no oppoſition, becauſe the king's forces were employed againſt the rebels of Lincolnſhire, they made great progreſs, at firſt, and ſtill much greater, after Richmondſhire, Lancaſhire, the biſhoprick of Durham, and the county of Weſtmoreland, engaged on their ſide. George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, was the only perſon that ventured to take arms for the king, without receiving his commiſſion, tho' he was not ignorant, that, at ſuch a juncture, his proceedings might be miſinterpreted. But, as he meant well, he hoped the king would forgive a fault committed, purely, for his ſervice; and, indeed, the king ſent him a commiſſion, conſtituting him his lieutenant againſt the rebels. At the ſame time, he ordered the duke of Suffolk not to ſtir from Lincolnſhire, leſt the male-contents there, ſhould think of joining thoſe of the north. Moreover, he gave commiſſions to ſeveral lords to levy troops, whilſt, on his part, he aſſembled as many as poſſible, in order to form an army, the command whereof he deſigned for the duke of Norfolk; but, either from the backwardneſs of the people, or for ſome other reaſon, the army was not ſufficiently numerous to reſiſt the rebels. 1536.

The archbiſhop of York, and the lord d'Arcy, ſurrender Pontefract, and are ſuſpected. Herbert.

Whilſt the king was making his preparations, Aske was not idle; for he approached Pontefract-caſtle, where the archbiſhop of York, and Thomas, lord d'Arcy, were, and forced them to ſurrender the place. As theſe two lords were reckoned well-affected to the pope, many believed they were not ſorry, that the want of proviſions furniſhed them with a pretence to deliver Pontefract to the rebels, and march, with them, in their other expeditions. Soon after, Aske took alſo York and Hull, and, by fair or foul means, obliged all the nobility of the country to join his army. Thus, this affair grew, daily, more important, and the court became apprehenſive, that the reſt of the kingdom would follow the example of the northern counties; and this apprehenſion was the more juſt, as, at the ſame time, there were, in all parts, men who made it their buſineſs, to ſpread reports capable of inciting the whole nation to rebel, by putting them in fear of the utter ſubverſion of the religion they had, hitherto, profeſſed.

The king tries to amuſe the rebels.

In the interim, the king choſe to amuſe the rebels, till his army was ready. The 20th of October, he ſent a herald with a proclamation, to be read to the troops. Aske gave the herald audience, ſitting in ſtate, with the archbiſhop on the one hand, and the lord d'Arcy on the other; but when he heard the contents of the proclamation, he ſent him away, without ſuffering him to publiſh it. Henry finding matters were in an ill way, diſpatched the duke of Norfolk, with what troops he had aſſembled, which were to be joined by thoſe commanded by the earl of Shrewsbury, and ſome others, levied in haſte, by the marqueſs of Exeter. But theſe three ſmall bodies bore no proportion to the forces of the rebels. So the king found himſelf obliged to publiſh a proclamation, commanding all the nobility to meet him, at Northampton, the 7th of November. In the interim, Aske, at the head of 30,000 men, advanced towards Doncaſter, where the duke of Norfolk, the marqueſs of Exeter, and the earl of Shrewsbury, were encamped, with 5000 men only, and having no other refuge, but to defend the paſs of the river, between the two armies; but, as it was fordable, in ſeveral places, they would, doubtleſs, have been extremely embarraſſed, if a great rain, which fell very ſeaſonably, had not made the river unpaſſable. This was, certainly, a very fortunate accident for the king; for, if his troops had been defeated, on this occaſion, as it was very likely, conſidering their ſmall number, it would have done him an unſpeakable damage.

Sentiments and conduct of the duke of Norfolk.

I have before obſerved, that the duke of Norfolk approved not of the alterations made in religion; and, therefore, it could not but be very diſagreeable to him to command the king's 1536. king's army, againſt people who had taken arms, in a cauſe which he could not diſlike. In the interim, he ſaw himſelf in a very dangerous ſituation, ſince he was as much afraid of conquering as of being conquered. In the firſt caſe, a victory over the rebels would infallibly ruin the party he ſecretly favoured. In the ſecond caſe, he ran the riſque of being ſuſpected by the king, and forfeiting his favour. Happily for him, his inability to hurt the rebels, freed him from this embarraſſment, by affording him a pretence to proceed with them, by way of negotiation. As he held intelligence with ſome of their leaders, he ſo ordered it, by their means, that they came to a reſolution to preſent a very humble petition to the king; that done, they acquainted the duke with it, intreating him to ſecond it, with his intereſt. The duke readily granted their requeſt; but told them, that to obtain a favourable anſwer from the king, there muſt be a ceſſation of arms, during which he took upon him to go himſelf and preſent their petition. This propoſal being accepted, the ceſſation was concluded, and the duke departed for London. At ſuch a juncture, this ceſſation was very advantageous to the king, becauſe his army being very weak, he wanted time to raiſe more forces. For this very cauſe, many of the rebels ſeeing that, contrary to all reaſon, the king had leiſure given him to aſſemble his troops, and imagining they were betrayed by their leaders, withdrew to their homes.

Henry tries to gain time. Herbert.

The diſcord which began to ſpread among the rebels, gave the king ſome hopes of coming off, upon eaſy terms; and, therefore, he delayed ſending an anſwer to their petition, expecting their army would diſperſe, by degrees. But the leaders perceiving, at length, that the court purpoſely prolonged the negotiation, and that thoſe delays muſt utterly ruin their affairs, renewed their hoſtilities, and reſolved once more to attack the royal army. Had this reſolution been executed, it would have, probably, changed the face of affairs very much; but another great rain ſo ſwelled the river which parted the two armies, that it was not poſſible for them to paſs it. The king hearing of this, thought it neceſſary to give them ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, for fear they ſhould execute their reſolution before he was ready. To this end, he ſent them an anſwer to their petition; but it was expreſſed in ſuch general terms, that they could not depend upon what was promiſed therein; and at the ſame time, he propoſed, that if they would ſend 300 deputies to Doncaſter, commiſſioners ſhould meet them there, and treat of a peace. His view was to gain time, in hopes the 300 deputies would diſagree, and their diſſention, by prolonging the negotiation, give him time to prepare his army. A few days after, the duke of Notfolk returning to Doncaſter, ſent word to the rebels, that he had brought them a general pardon, 10 only excepted, ſix of whom were named, and four not; but this pardon was unanimouſly rejected, becauſe the ſix perſons named, were ſome of the heads, and every one was in fear of being one of the four whom the king had reſerved; and indeed, the king had no other view than to ſow diſcord among them, and make way for the treaty at Doncaſter, which they accepted, at laſt, and ſent their 300 deputies thither. The court had expected, theſe deputies would never agree about their demands, and ſo would afford the time that was wanted; but, as it was eaſy for the leaders to diſcover the court's intention, they gave the deputies their inſtructions in writing, from which they were not to depart. Theſe inſtructions contained 10 demands, which the deputies made, at the conference held, at Doncaſter, the 6th of December. 1536.

The rebels demands. Burnet.

I. They demanded a general pardon, without any exception.

II. That a parliament ſhould be held at York.

III. That a court of juſtice ſhould be erected there, that the inhabitants of the northern counties might not be brought to London upon any law-ſuit.

IV. That ſome acts of the late parliaments, which were too grievous to the people, ſhould be repealed.

V. That the princeſs Mary ſhould be declared legitimate.

VI. That the papal authority ſhould be reeſtabliſhed upon the old foot.

VII. That the ſuppreſſed monaſteries ſhould be reſtored to their former ſtate.

VIII. That the Lutherans, and all innovators in religion, ſhould be puniſhed ſeverely.

IX. That Thomas Cromwell, and Audley, lord chancellor, ſhould be removed from the council, and excluded from the next parliament.

X. That Lee and Leighton, viſitors of the monaſteries, ſhould be impriſoned, and brought to account for their briberies and extortions.

The conference breaks up.

As the deputies had not power to qualify theſe demands, ſo the king's commiſſioners were not authorized to grant them; the king took care not to deſtroy, in a moment, the work of many years. Thus, the conference ended, without any fruit. The duke of Norfolk was very ſorry to ſee, that the affair was like to be decided by arms. He heartily wiſhed, the king would grant the rebels all their demands; but knew too well, his humour and character, to venture to make him ſuch a propoſal. In the interim, he was extremely embarraſſed; for he muſt either betray the king's intereſt, or reſolve to fight the rebels, contrary to his own inclination, and with great danger of a defeat; at leaſt, he could not avoid, purſuant to the intent of the court, to prolong the affair till the king was ready to march, and then he ſaw, the ruin of the rebels was inevitable. In this perplexity, he choſe to write to the king, that the number of the rebels daily increaſing, there was danger of their making ſome attempt, which it would be difficult to reſiſt; and, therefore, to prevent the threatened miſchief, it was his opinion, if his highneſs pleaſed, that ſome of their demands ſhould be granted. Upon this letter, 1536. letter, the king impowered him to offer them a general pardon, without exception, and promiſe them, in his name, that the next parliament ſhould be held in the north; but withal, he ordered him not to make uſe of theſe remedies, except in extremity, and when there was no other reſſource. The duke receiving theſe powers, thought proper to uſe them without delay, ſince it was the only way to free him from his preſent embarraſſment; for he was unwilling, openly, to betray the king's intereſts, and, on the other hand, did not care to be inſtrumental, in the rebels deſtruction, whoſe ſentiments he approved, tho' he durſt not ſhew it. So, after having, by his correſpondents, prevailed with the leaders to comply with the king's offers, the agreement was concluded, and every man returned to his home, to the great ſorrow of the monks and bigots, who had expected quite another thing from their efforts, to excite the people to rebel. But this agreement hindered not the friers and eccleſiaſticks of thoſe parts, from continuing to foment, among the people, a ſpirit of rebellion, which broke out again, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Something muſt now be ſaid of the emperor's affairs, with the king of France, wherein all Europe was concerned.

The affairs between the emperor and Francis. Bellay.

When Francis I. began the war, in Savoy, about the end of the laſt year, the emperor was, in Sicily, upon his return from his Tunis expedition, but unable to aſſiſt the duke of Savoy. This made him chuſe to try to cool the king of France's ardour, by a negotiation, till he could aſſiſt his ally. The death of Franceſco Sforza, which happened in the interim, furniſhed him with an opportunity. He intimated to the French ambaſſador reſiding, at his court, that he would not diſpoſe of the duchy of Milan, till he knew the king of France's ſentiments. Francis being informed of it, demanded the duchy for his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, and the emperor put him in hopes, he would give it to his third ſon, the duke of Angouleſme, upon certain terms, which left it in his power to prolong the negotiation, as much as he pleaſed; and, indeed, he amuſed him in this manner, till April, 1536, one while inſiſting upon the perſon of the duke of Angouleſme, another while ſeeming inclined to confer the duchy on the duke of Orleans. Francis willing to end this affair, and knowing, the emperor intended to go to Rome, ſent the cardinal of Lorrain for a poſitive anſwer, but left the events of the war ſhould bring ſome obſtacle to this negotiation, he ordered admiral Brion, who commanded in Piedmont, to ceaſe hoſtilities.

The emperor arrives at Rome.

He offers, before the pope and cardinals, to decide his quarrel with the French king, in ſingle combat.

Whilſt the cardinal of Lorrain was on his journey, the emperor arriving at Rome, went, a few days after, to a publick conſiſtory, which was aſſembled at his requeſt; and there, before the pope and the cardinals, he inveighed againſt the king of France, intimating, he was the ſole author of the wars that had afflicted Europe, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne. He thence took occaſion to ſay, that inſtead of ſhedding ſo much innocent blood, it would be better to decide their quarrel by ſingle combat, with ſword and poignard, in their ſhirts, in ſome iſland, or in a boat; but the next day, the French ambaſſador demanding whether he deſigned to challenge the king, his maſter, he anſwered, he had no ſuch intention, but meant only, that the expedient he propoſed, ſeemed to him more reaſonable than a war. 1536.

He prepares his forces.

Some time after, the emperor being at Sienna, the cardinal of Lorrain waited on him, and in his audiences, diſcovered he had never intended to give the duchy of Milan to a prince of the royal family of France; wherefore, he wrote to the king, that he was to expect war. And, indeed, the emperor was now aſſembling all his forces, propoſing to bring three armies into the field, one in Piedmont, which he intended to command, in perſon, another in Picardy, and a third in Champagne. This deſign was already ſo publick, that Francis could not be ignorant of it; ſo, believing the emperor meant to make his moſt powerful effort in Picardy, he recalled the greateſt part of his army, in Piedmont, having ordered Turin, and his other conqueſts in that country, to be well ſtored with ammunition.

The emperor marches into Provence.

The French troops quitting Piedmont, the emperor cauſed Turin to be inveſted, and during the ſiege, headed his army, and marched towards Provence. Francis, who was then at Lyons, ſpeedily provided Marſeilles with neceſſaries, and ordered two camps to be fortified, one at Cavaillon, commanded by the marſhal de Montmorency, the other at Valence, where he came himſelf. There he received the ſad news of the death of his ſon, the dauphin, poiſoned by Montecuculli.

The emperor beſieges Marſeilles, and raiſes the ſiege.

The emperor having entered Provence, took Aix, and then laid ſiege to Marſeilles, which was begun the 25th of Auguſt, and raiſed the 9th of September. He had ſo ill taken his meaſures, that not knowing how to ſubſiſt his army, in Provence, he was forced to retire in the utmoſt diſorder, not without danger of being defeated in his retreat, if Francis had thought proper to attack him. He came to Genoa the 2d of October, and imbarqued for Spain. This was the ſucceſs of the Provence expedition, which he had been long meditating, and by means of which he hoped to give a mortal wound to France.

Campaign in Picardy.

Whilſt the emperor was waging war in Provence, the count of Naſſau entered Picardy with an army of 30,000 men, and took Guiſe by ſtorm; after that, he beſieged Peronne, which was relieved by the duke of Guiſe.

Marriage of the king of Scotland with Magdalen of France. Buchanan.

Francis returning to Paris, with unſpeakable ſatisfaction, at having diſappointed the emperor's deſigns, met upon the way James V, king of Scotland, who was come to demand his daughter Magdalen, in marriage. He was not without great difficulty prevailed with to grant his requeſt, becauſe the princeſs being ſickly, it was thought marriage would but ſhorten her days. However, the king of Scotland expreſſing a very earneſt deſire for the marriage, it was concluded, in December, and the nuptials were celebrated the 1ſt of January, 1537. nuary, 1537. Let us return now to the affairs of England.

Henry breaks his word with the rebels. Herbert.

The northern rebellion was appeaſed, but in ſuch a manner, that the cauſe ſtill ſubſiſted, the male-contents having received no redreſs of their grievances, except only that the king had promiſed to call a parliament in the north, which he never intended to do. The pretence he uſed was, that they left in the monaſteries the monks, they had reſtored; but this was a precarious excuſe, if ever there was one, ſince it was not their buſineſs to turn them out, but the king's, who had the power in his own hands, whereas they had nothing more to ſay, after quitting their arms. The king knowing how the people of the north ſtood affected, ordered the duke of Norfolk to remain there with his army, to keep them in awe. So the duke was employed for ſome time, with cauſing perſons of all conditions to ſwear to be true to the king, a very improper remedy for ſuch ſort of evils, ſince the ſame compulſion which extorts oaths from a diſcontented people, ſerves alſo for pretence to break them upon occaſion. In the interim, Aske, who had commanded the rebels, was ordered to court, where he was well received; but the lord d'Arcy, who had not ſo readily obeyed the like order, was ſent to the tower, upon his arrival at London.

A new inſurrection puniſhed. Hall.

Soon after, two gentlemen of the north, Nicholas Muſgrave and Thomas Tilby, put themſelves at the head of 8000 male-contents, and appeared before Carliſle, in order to take the city; but being repulſed, and thereupon ſuddenly attacked by the duke of Norfolk, they were entirely routed. Muſgrave had the good fortune to eſcape, but Tilby and 74 others, taken with him, were hanged on the walls of Carliſle. Sir Francis Bigod and one Halam, with another body of rebels, attempted, at the ſame time, to ſurpriſe Hull; but were made priſoners themſelves, and executed.

Aske and the lord d'Arcy executed. Herbert.

Theſe attempts rendered the king ſo fierce, that he put to death Aske and the lord d'Arcy, notwithſtanding the general pardon to appeaſe the firſt inſurrection. The lord d'Arcy accuſed the duke of Norfolk of favouring the rebels, which, perhaps, was too true; but the duke cleared himſelf, or rather, the king thought not fit, ſtrictly, to examine this accuſation. In the interim, as he knew, the emperor was contriving ſome plot in Ireland, he gave order that Thomas Fitz-gerald, ſon of the late earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles, after a long impriſonment at London, ſhould ſuffer death for a terror to the Iriſh; but the earl of Kildare's youngeſt ſon had the good fortune to eſcape, and fled, for refuge, to cardinal Pole.

Six of the families of Kildare put to death. Hall.

The king ſtrives to ſuppreſs all the monaſteries. Burnet.

The king could not be perſuaded but that it was the monks, who moſt contributed to preſerve and foment the people's diſcontents. He conſidered them as the chief authors of the late inſurrections, and, conſequently, as his perſonal enemies. He believed to ſee in their behaviour, that if they had power, they would not ſpare him, and, therefore, he projected their ruin, to prevent their deſigns. 1537. Herein he found two conſiderable advantages, the one to free himſelf from his enemies, and the other to enjoy their ſpoils. It is not to be doubted, this laſt conſideration had alſo a ſhare in his project of vengeance upon them; for the ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries having only whetted his appetite, he reſolved to ſuppreſs all the reſt, and ſeiſe their immenſe poſſeſſions; and the more eaſily to accompliſh his project, he uſed the ſame means, he had practiſed to ſuppreſs the leſſer monaſteries; that is, he appointed a very ſtrict viſitation of thoſe that remained, not queſtioning but the diſcoveries which ſhould be made, would promote his deſign.

The birth of prince Edward. Hall. The death of queen Jane.

The 12th of October, the queen was delivered of a prince, who was called Edward; but his birth coſt his mother her life, who died two days after her delivery. As the king had cauſed his two daughters, by his former marriages, to be declared illegitimate, nothing could be more acceptable than the birth of a ſon, who put the ſucceſſion of the crown out of all diſpute; and, therefore, in a few days, he conferred on him, as his heir apparent, the title of prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter. At the ſame time, he created Edward Seymour, the queen's brother, and the new-born prince's uncle, earl of Hertford.

The war continues between the emperor and Francis. Bellay. A truce for Picardy and Italy.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, in England, the war ſtill continued between the emperor and the king of France, but was interrupted, in Picardy, by a ſix months truce, concluded in July, which was followed by another, in November, for Italy. As by the laſt truce, it was agreed that each ſhould keep what he poſſeſſed, the duke of Savoy remained equally deſpoiled by his enemies, and by thoſe he had called to his aſſiſtance; the common fate of petty princes!

The death of the queen of Scotland. Buchanan.

The queen of Scotland died, in July, to the great joy of thoſe who dreaded the progreſs of the reformation, becauſe that princeſs had been educated, by her aunt, the queen of Navarre. Buchanan affirms, the cuſtom of wearing mourning was firſt introduced into Scotland, on occaſion of her death, which cuſtom, tho' of 40 years ſtanding, was, however, not yet eſtabliſhed in his time. James V. removed the uneaſineſs of thoſe, who were afraid of his being biaſſed by the deceaſed queen, in favour of the new religion, by demanding, in marriage, Mary of Guiſe, ſiſter to the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal of Lorrain.

Diviſions in Germany, about religion. Sleidan.

The affairs of religion daily grew more important, in a great part of Europe, by reaſon of the progreſs of the reformation. Thoſe who had embraced it, wiſhed only to live in quiet, with liberty of conſcience; but this was what the old religion would never allow them; for the glory of God, and zeal for the intereſts of the church, ſerved for pretence, to this refuſal. But the real cauſes were, firſt, the pride of moſt men, who cannot bear to be told that their opinions are wrong; ſecondly, the temporal intereſt of the clergy, who, wherever the 1537. the reformation was eſtabliſhed, ſaw themſelves deprived of their rich benefices, the revenues of the church being applied by the reformed, to uſes very different from thoſe in which they had, hitherto, been employed; thirdly, the pope's intereſts, who daily loſt his ſubjects, his revenues, his credit, his authority. There was another particular cauſe, in Germany, which inflamed the troubles, occaſioned by religion, and that was, the emperor and his brother, the king of the Romans, had formed a deſign to uſe the pretence of obliging the Proteſtants to re-enter the pale of the church; for this reaſon, inſtead of healing, they fomented the diviſions to the utmoſt of their power. The Proteſtants complained, among other things, that a council was called at Mantua, contrary to an expreſs promiſe that it ſhould be in Germany; beſides, they meant not to ſubmit to the deciſions of a council, where the pope preſided, and which, as they perceived, would be far from being free. The emperor amuſed them with evaſive anſwers, till things ſhould be ready to attack them. In the interim, the pope, having deferred the opening of the council from May to November, charged, in that interval, the cardinals Contarini, Sadoletti, Pole, Bembo, all perſons of great reputation, to examine wherein the church wanted reformation. Theſe able divines found nothing amiſs, as to the doctrines. They only drew up, as to diſcipline, a liſt of ſundry trifles, which, in their opinion, deſerved to be rectified. To theſe alone they thought the reformation ought to be confined.

The emperor's deſigns.

In the interim, the emperor was very ſeriouſly thinking of the affairs of Germany, tho' he took great care to conceive his deſigns from the Proteſtants; and in order to free himſelf from all other incumbrances, and attack them with advantage, he had concluded the truce with Francis, in hopes it would ſoon be followed by a peace. He perceived, the Smalcaldick league would be an everlaſting obſtacle to the execution of his vaſt projects, by Francis's and Henry's endeavours to gain it to their intereſts. So, his chief view was to diſſolve that league, that he might, afterwards, proceed againſt England, with all the forces of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low-Countries.

1538. Final reſolution to ſuppreſs all the monaſteries. Herbert.

Henry eaſily judged, Charles V. and Francis I, had agreed to a truce, only in order to conclude a peace very ſoon, which would rob him of the aſſiſtance of France. So, finding he had no refuge but in his own forces, in caſe of attack, he conſidered early of means to prevent inſurrections, at home, which muſt have greatly embarraſſed him, if he ſhould be engaged in a foreign war. He knew, the monks hated him mortally. They were the perſons that inſpired the Engliſh with a ſpirit of rebellion, the more dangerous, as religion was the principal cauſe. So, to deprive the pope and the emperor of ſuch a ſupport, in his own realm, he reſolved to ſuppreſs all the religious houſes, ſtill remaining in England. He had a farther motive, which was not inconſiderable, viz. to have a fund ſufficient to maintain the war, without being forced to over-burden his ſubjects. But as the ſuppreſſion of part of the monaſteries had already occaſioned troubles in the kingdom, it was likely, the ſuppreſſion of all would raiſe ſtill greater; wherefore, he believed he ſhould prevent all commotions, by removing the people's veneration for the monks. To this end, the report of the laſt viſitation being brought to him, he ordered it to be, immediately, publiſhed. Very probably, the facts inſerted concerning the diſorderly lives of the friers and nuns, were ſet forth ſo as to be ſubſervient to the king's deſigns; but what conduced moſt to recover people out of their ſuperſtitious fondneſs for the religious houſes, was the diſcovery of the frauds committed there, with reſpect to relicks and images. Had the buſineſs been only the debaucheries of the monks and nuns, it might have been objected, that it ſufficed to make ſtrict inquiry of thoſe who were guilty, and to puniſh them ſeverely; but for the pious frauds, as they are called, it could hardly be thought, but that the whole ſociety was concerned. For this reaſon, therefore, the king, to make them as viſible as the ſun, took care publickly to expoſe the counterfeit relicks found in the monaſteries, and the ſprings by which the images of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, or any of the ſaints, were made to move, which was looked upon, by the ignorant multitude, as the effect of a divine power. If the reader deſires to ſee a particular account of theſe pious impoſtures, he will find it, tho' withal very ſhort, in the Hiſtory of the Reformation of England. Theſe frauds being thus detected, whatever had ſerved to engage the people in ſuperſtition, was, by the king's order, burnt in publick; but what grieved the votaries moſt, was, to ſee the bones of Thomas Becket, commonly called St. Thomas of Canterbury, publickly burnt. They accuſed the king of acting from a motive of a ſacrilegious avarice, in order, to have a pretence, to ſeiſe the rich ſhrine of that ſaint, whereon, beſides other precious ſtones, was a very fine diamond, offered in 1179, by Henry I, king of France, when he came, in pilgrimage, to Canterbury *. This proceeding, ſo exaſperated the adherents of the old religion, that they wrote, in a virulent manner, to Rome, againſt the king, comparing him to the greateſt tyrants that ever lived. Whereupon, at Rome, and other places, numberleſs ſatyrs were penned, which painted Henry as the moſt execrable of men, to thoſe who were not uſed to the hyperbolical expreſſions of the Italians. The king had Becket's bones burnt, and his ſhrine ſeiſed. Herbert.

* For 300 years he was accounted one of the greateſt ſaints in heaven, as appears from the accounts of the leger-books of the offerings to the three greateſt altars in Chriſt's Church, in Canterbury. In one year there was offered at Chriſt's altar, 3 l. 2 s. 6 d. At the Virgin's altar, 63 l. 5 s. 6 d. But at St. Thomas's, 832 l. 12 s. 3 d. The next year the odds grew greater; at Chriſt's altar not a penny; at the Virgin's only 4 l. 1 s. 8 d; but at St. Thomas's, 954 l. 6 s. 3 d. Stow.

1538. his ſpies at Rome, who, acquainting him with what was publiſhed againſt him, told him, withal, that to cardinal Pole the informations ſent from England were, generally, addreſſed, and that his ſtile was viſible in ſome of the ſatyrs. This ſo highly incenſed the king, againſt the cardinal, that he made all his family and friends feel the effects, inſomuch, that he would ſooner have pardoned any crime, than a correſpondence with him. It is ſtrange that the cardinal, who ſeemed, otherwiſe, very prudent and moderate, ſhould ſo give way to his zeal, or his paſſion againſt the king, that he feared not, by ſo unadviſed a behaviour, to expoſe his friends to Henry's utmoſt reſentment. His obſtinacy, in this reſpect, was ſo great, that, at length, he was the occaſion of his mother's loſing her head on the ſcaffold, as will be ſeen hereafter.

Paul III. publiſhes a bull againſt the king. Burnet.

All the king's proceedings convincing the pope, that he was to expect no change in him, he publiſhed, at length, the bull of excommunication, drawn and ſigned, in 1535; moreover, he tried to excite all the princes of Chriſtendom againſt Henry, and offered the kingdom of England, to the king of Scotland; nay, Pole maintained, in a book, publiſhed ſoon after, that it was more meritorious to fight againſt Henry, than againſt the Turk; but the pope's thunders had ſo loſt their force, in England, that the bull cauſed no commotion, or if it produced any affect, it was quite contrary to what the pope expected. Henry being more provoked with him, took ſo good precautions to hinder him from executing his deſigns, that he thereby advanced the reformation much more than he intended. As ſoon as he had heard of the bull's being publiſhed, he required the biſhops and abbots to ſwear again to renounce the papal authority; and, at the ſame time, the new tranſlation of the bible being preſented to him, he ordered 1500 copies to be printed, and ſet up in the principal churches, being ſatisfied that nothing would be found there to ſupport the exhorbitant power aſſumed by the pope, over all Chriſtendom.

Henry orders the new verſion of the bible to be printed. Burnet.

The vice-gerent's injunctions about images. Burnet.

Soon after, an injunction was publiſhed by the vice-gerent, to teach the people the Lord's prayer, the creed, and the ten commandments, in Engliſh; moreover, all incumbents were ordered to inſtruct the people, by declaring they muſt not truſt in other men's works, but in their own; and that relicks, beads, and the like, were unneceſſary to ſalvation. They were alſo to take down all images, to which offerings were wont to be made, and to ſuffer no candles to be ſet up before any image, except our Saviour's. In fine, they were to ſuppreſs all the Ora pro nobis's, which were added to the prayers addreſſed to the ſaints.

The ſubmiſſion of the Engliſh to the king's will. Burnet.

This injunction was deemed a mortal wound to the old religion, whoſe adherents were in the utmoſt conſternation; but no man dared to ſtir, ſo abſolute a ſway had the king acquired over his ſubjects; nay, the moſt diſcontented affected a blind ſubmiſſion to his will, knowing the leaſt ſuſpicion would ruin them.

1538. Gardiner puts the king upon proſecuting the reformed. Burnet.

Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was now returned from his ambaſſy to France. He was one of the zealous adherents of the old religion; nay, he was ſuſpected of being privately reconciled to the pope, and of holding correſpondence with the emperor; but he artfully diſſembled his ſentiments, that he perſuaded the king, it was only the devices of his enemies, on purpoſe to ruin him. However, it is certain, tho' the king ſeemed ſatisfied, he had no great eſteem for him, and yet ſuffered him to be near him, on account of his extreme ſubmiſſion. His blind condeſcenſion to the king's will, afforded him many opportunities to ſerve the party he privately favoured; and the king conſidering him not as a ſuſpected perſon, ſince he ſo readily complied with his orders, freely liſtened to him, when he ſpoke againſt the Sacramentarians, being ſtill extremely prepoſſeſſed in favour of the doctrine of the real preſence of Chriſt's body, in the ſacrament. Then Gardiner could explain his ſentiments without fear, becauſe they agreed with the king's. He inſinuated to him, that ſo long as he left that doctrine untouched, he would never be accuſed of changing his religion, but would rather be extolled for having purged it, in preſerving the eſſentials. Thus, Gardiner engaged him to perſecute the Sacramentarians, not ſo much from a religious as from a political motive. He knew the king's temper to be impatient of contradiction; and, therefore, by engaging him to maintain a doctrine, which thoſe of a new religion could not admit, he hoped their reſiſtance would provoke him againſt them, and thereby he would be more eaſily led to be reconciled to the pope; that is to ſay properly, he employed, to alienate the king from the Proteſtants, the ſame means they uſed to prejudice him againſt their adverſaries. But neither could ſucceed; for Henry reformed himſelf but by halves, and was never reconciled to the court of Rome; and as he was grown abſolute, he would never ſuffer his ſubjects to go farther than himſelf, but compelled them to ſtop where he was pleaſed to ſtop, equally ſevere, or rather unmerciful, to thoſe who refuſed to follow him, and to thoſe who would go beyond him. This year he ſhewed an inſtance of his rigour, capable of making the reformers deſpair of any farther progreſs.

Henry diſputes publickly with Lambert.

One John Nicolſon, alias Lambert, being informed againſt, as a Sacramentarian, the king convened a great aſſembly, in Weſtminſter-hall, where he was pleaſed himſelf, to diſpute, publickly, with the party accuſed. The match was by no means equal; Lambert ſtood alone without a ſecond; but the king was ſurrounded with a croud of perſons, who applauded his arguments, and deemed them invincible; whereas none dared to approve what Lambert urged. The diſpute ended with the king's putting it to the choice of the unfortunate Lambert, either to abjure his opinion, or be burnt. But whatever advantage the king ſeemed to have, he may be ſaid to be vanquiſhed, ſince he was forced to fly to ſo rigorous a method to convince his adverſary, after flattering himſelf to perſuade him by dint of 1538. of reaſon; otherwiſe, probably, he would not have engaged in the diſpute. However, he ſucceeded not by this extraordinary way, ſince Lambert choſe rather to die than to abjure the opinion he ſtill believed. Henry had no occaſion to be flattered. He had but too good a conceipt of himſelf. Nevertheleſs, Gardiner and the reſt of his party took occaſion from this diſpute, to extol him above the moſt learned divines of the age. They inſpired him with ſuch an opinion of his learning, that he thought his notions ought to be a ſtandard to all; but contrary to the expectations of his flatterers, this conceipt of himſelf was no leſs fatal to them than to the other party, ſince he reſolved to puniſh ſeverely and indifferently, all who dared to ſwerve from what he himſelf deemed reaſonable.

Negotiations with the German Proteſtants. Herbert.

About this time the emperor concluded with France, a 10 years truce, of which I ſhall ſpeak preſently. Henry, not doubting, it was in order to invade him, conſidered of means to raiſe him troubles, which ſhould divert him from his purpoſe. The Smalcaldick league furniſhed him with a good opportunity; but the preſervation of the Augsburg confeſſion, being the ſole foundation of that league, he did not ſee that he could poſſibly join in it, to ſupport a religion, all whoſe articles were not approved by him. So his deſign was either to bring the Proteſtants to conclude with him a general league, which ſhould not be limited to the defence of their religion, or prevail with them to be ſatisfied with the reformation he had himſelf introduced into England. To this end, he ſent ambaſſadors, with inſtructions to ſee who were the confederates, and in caſe the league was confined to religion only, to deſire them to ſend ſome of their ableſt divines, to try, whether a common religion might not be agreed upon. The Proteſtants anſwered, their league conſiſted of 26 imperial cities, and 24 princes, among whom the king of Denmark was lately admitted; that, at preſent, they could not be without their divines, but deſired him to declare himſelf poſitively upon the propoſition made him, of embracing the Augsburg confeſſion. Some time after, they ſent ambaſſadors capable of diſputing upon the points of religion; but this ambaſſy was fruitleſs; for Henry found in the Germans, men of a very different ſtamp from his own ſubjects, and little inclined to compliance. They would not allow him communion in one kind, private maſſes, auricular confeſſion, celibacy of prieſts, and gave him their reaſons in writing; to which he anſwered, tho' to very little purpoſe. As he could not put the ſame choice to them as he had done to Lambert, he was forced to diſmiſs them, without any concluſion, being as little ſatisfied with them, as they were with him.

The intereſt of the reformers declines at court. Burnet.

In the interim, the intereſt of the reformers began viſibly to decline at court, ſince the queen's death. There were only Cromwell and Cranmer that ſupported it, by their credit and merit. The firſt, however, was accuſed of being too ſelf-intereſted, and of thinking much more of his own, than of the concerns of religion. As to the reſt of the lower rank, there were few of eminent note. Shaxton, biſhop of Sarum, was proud and litigious; Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter, was deſpiſed for his weakneſs and ſimplicity; Barlow, who had been prior of Biſham, and afterwards biſhop of St. Aſaph, had no great judgment. In general, the preachers of the new religion ſuffered themſelves to be carried away with an indiſcreet zeal, and without conſidering the king's temper, followed the motions of their conſcience, let what would be the conſequence. So, never troubling themſelves about the effects of their zeal, they publickly preached doctrines, not yet approved by the king, which very much conduced to prejudice him againſt them, and all others who deſired to advance the reformation. 1538.

Bonner made biſhop of Hereford, and then of London. Burnet.

In the interim, Edward Fox, biſhop of Hereford, departing this life, the reformers thought to do a good act, in procuring Edmund Bonner that ſee, who had been ambaſſador, in Spain, and afterwards, in France, from whence he was latley recalled, at the inſtance of Francis I, who was not pleaſed with him. Soon after, they cauſed him to be promoted to the ſee of London, vacant by the death of Stokeſly; but they were greatly miſtaken in their choice, ſince this ſame prelate, who was ſo much obliged to them, became afterwards one of their moſt mortal enemies.

Cranmer and Cromwell project to marry the king with a Proteſtant. Herbert.

At length, Cromwell and Cranmer ſeeing their party decay, and, that the king began to liſten to the enemies of the reformation, in ſuch a manner, as made them dread the conſequences, deemed it neceſſary to ſupport their party, by means of a queen, who ſhould afford them protection. They had happily experienced, how much Ann Bullen and Jane Seymour had helped to ſoften the king's temper towards the reformed, and they did not queſtion, that in caſe they could give him a wife, of the like diſpoſition, ſhe would produce the ſame effect; for this reaſon, they turned their eyes towards Germany, and Cromwell undertook to negotiate a marriage between the king and Ann of Cleve, ſiſter to the duke of Cleve and the ducheſs of Saxony. We ſhall ſee, next year, the ſucceſs of this negotiation, after a brief mention of the foreign affairs.

The truce between the emperor and Francis is prolonged. Mezerai.

The emperor's and the king of France's forces were too equal, for either to expect any great advantages from a war they were left to wage all alone. Francis had ill taken his meaſures, in imagining that Henry would declare for him, that the potentates of Italy would endeavour to ſhake off the emperor's yoke, and that the Proteſtants of Germany would embrace the opportunity of the war, to eſtabliſh the liberty of conſcience, to which they aſpired, and of which they were threatened to be deprived; but nothing of all this happening, he ſaw himſelf charged alone, with almoſt an inſupportable burden. On the other hand, the emperor was afraid, Francis would, at length, unite all theſe powers againſt him, and the emperor of the Turks improve ſo favourable a juncture, to invade Germany. The pope alſo feared the ſame thing, and that the Truce for 10 years.

In the interim, as the peace between the emperor and the king of France could not be effected, by reason of the many difficulties which occurred, the pope obtained, of the two monarchs, at last, their consent to a ten year's truce, which was, almost, as effectual as a peace. The truce being concluded, Paul III, immediately, thought of means to form a league against the Turks. But, as several reasons hindered the kings of France and England from coming into it, he was forced to conclude it with the emperor, the king of the Romans, and the Venetians.

Francis I. slights Henry. Herbert.

When Francis had nothing more to fear from the emperor, he grew very cool to Henry, tho' he had extremely carressed him, so long as he stood in need of him. Henry was exceedingly incensed, and shewed his resentment, by ordering Bonner, in his return from Spain, to stop at the French court, and demand an English rebel, who was retired into France, and the arrears of his pension, there being now four years due. Bonner, who was naturally very bold, delivered his message so haughtily, that Francis, offended at his insolence, sent an express to Henry, to know, whether he had ordered his ambassador to use such language, and to desire Bonner might be recalled. Henry thought fit to comply with his demand; but, it appeared, he was not very angry with Bonner, since, at his arrival, he promoted him, as has been said, to the see of Hereford, and soon after, to that of London.

Cardinal Pole labours to raise the king troubles. Herbert.

Whilst Henry used all possible precautions to secure himself, from the attacks of his enemies, cardinal Pole was labouring, with all his power, by means of his correspondents in England, to alienate from him, the hearts of his subjects, by publishing every where, that he had subverted all religion, to set up his own fictions. This accusation was the most sensible wound that could be given the king, since he pretended, religion consisted not in the things he had changed, but in those he had retained. This is what he strove to demonstrate to the people, because he plainly perceived, the general accusation, of 1538. having subverted religion, could not but greatly poison their allegiance. Accordingly, Pole, and his emissaries, chiefly insisted upon this, in order to raise disturbances in the kingdom. Several have thought, the cardinal had some private views, which concerned not religion. He was of the house of York, by his mother, and is said, also, to have an inclination for the princess Mary, and to bestir himself thus, in order to marry, and set her on the throne, in the room of her father; at least there is reason to suspect, his extraordinary zeal was fortified by some hidden views, and that, in acting for the pope, he was labouring his own advancement. But this is only conjecture. However, Sir Jeffrey Pole, near relation of the cardinal, privately acquainted the king, that he held correspondence with Henry Courtney, marques of Exeter, grandson to Edward IV; with Henry Pole, lord Montague; with Sir Edward Nevil, and with Sir Nicholas Carew, master of the horse, and knight of the Garter; and that his instruments were, a priest and a marriner. Upon this information, these persons were apprehended, condemned and executed, but the informer was pardoned, as a reward for his intelligence. No other circumstances of their tryals are known, but their corresponding with Pole; an unpardonable crime, as the king then stood affected to that cardinal.

Suffragan bishops. Act. Pub.

During the course of this year, Henry established several suffragan bishops. He required also, of all the religious, a new oath, whereby they expresly renounced the papal authority, and acknowledged the king's supremacy. There were some that refused to swear, but I know not in what manner their obstinacy was punished.

The council is removed to Vicenza. Bellay.

The pope and the emperor being then employed in their preparation against the Turk, his holiness made use of that pretence, to put off the meeting of the council, to the 1st of May, 1540, and, at the same time, removed it from Mantua to Vicenza.

The new queen arrives in Scotland.

The marriage between the king of Scotland, and Mary of Lorrain, being concluded, this year, the new queen came to Scotland, about the middle of June.

1539. The surrenders of the monasteries to the king. Burnet.

The last visitation of the monasteries tended only, as has been observed, to seek apparent reasons to suppress them. The king had now resolved it, and the enormities, true or false, of the monks, were only a cover for his revenge, and, perhaps, for his avarice. The visitation being over, he sent into the several counties, commissioners to receive the surrenders, the abbots and priors were to make of their houses. There are extant, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, many of these surrenders, which tho' very involuntary, contained, however, the feigned reasons which had moved the monks, and their superiors, to resign, of their own accord, all their lands to the king. In some, they were made to say only, they were induced thereto, by just and reasonable causes; but in others, of greater length, they were made to alledge, "That "what 1539. "what they had, hitherto, obſerved, conſiſted "only in dumb ceremonies, and conſtitutions of the biſhops of Rome, and other foreign potentates, who had taken no care of their inſtruction, or, to reform the many abuſes which had, hitherto, prevailed, in their houſes; but that deſiring to live, for the future, according to the rule preſcribed by Chriſt, the evangeliſts, and the apoſtles, they deemed it expedient for them to be governed by the king, their ſupreme head on earth; that, therefore, they ſubmitted themſelves to his mercy, and ſurrendered to him their houſes, with all things belonging thereto; that they beſought him to grant, to each of them, a penſion, for their ſubſiſtance, and an expreſs licenſe to take a ſecular habit, and be admitted into livings, like other eccleſiaſticks." Others ſaid, "They had conſidered, that Chriſtianity conſiſted not in the practice of ceremonies, in wearing black, grey, or white habits, and in nodding with the head, wearing cords, with great knots about their middle, and the like, wherein they had been inſtructed and ſeduced; but that the true way of ſerving God was taught in the goſpel; and, therefore, deſiring, for the future, to walk by that good rule, they ſubmitted themſelves to the ſupreme head of the church of England, and renouncing all ſuperſtitions, and foreign traditions, they reſigned their houſes to the king, with all things thereunto belonging." Others ſurrendered their houſes by way of agreement, between them and the king, for the cauſes ſpecified in the deed itſelf. But there are not, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, any deeds of this kind, at full length, where any of theſe cauſes may be ſeen. It can only be gathered from what ſome authors ſay, that theſe cauſes were, either the houſes were overwhelmed with debts, or the revenues had been ill managed, or there had been comitted, crimes deſerving a ſevere puniſhment, from which they were exempted, on account of the ſurrender. Be this as it will, the king having reſolved, at any rate, to ſuppreſs all the monaſteries, the oppoſition of the abbots, priors and monks, would have been ineffectual. Accordingly, perceiving plainly, that by fair means or foul, they ſhould be forced to ſubmit to his will, the greateſt part thought it moſt prudent to do it, with a good grace, and make the beſt bargain they could for themſelves. The abbot, or prior, with the chief monks of each houſe, being gained beforehand, either by promiſes or threats, the reſt had hardly courage enough to make a fruitleſs reſiſtance.

The firſt ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries, was done by act of parliament; but the king was pleaſed this ſhould appear, to be entirely voluntary, as if the abbots, priors and monks, had been induced of themſelves, 1539. to ſurrender their houſes. A thing, however, ſo notoriouſly falſe, that not a ſoul could be ignorant how forced theſe ſurrenders were. It muſt be confeſſed, that, herein, Henry ſtrangely abuſed the abſolute power he had acquired over his ſubjects, of whom not a man dared, publickly, to find fault with his conduct, and ſtill leſs, openly, to oppoſe his will; however, he uſed artifice, to make this ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, to be received with leſs concern. Whilſt the commiſſioners were receiving the ſurrenders, he called a parliament, for the 28th of April; and, at the ſame time, he cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the kingdom was going to be invaded. He confirmed the report, by going, in perſon, to viſit the coaſts, by commanding forts and redoubts to be built, in ſeveral places, and, by giving preſſing orders to fit out a fleet, and keep the troops in a readineſs to march, upon the firſt notice. The intent of all theſe proceedings was, to let the people ſee, that the parliament would be obliged to lay heavy taxes, to reſiſt the pretended invaſion; but that the king, acquiring a large revenue, by the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, would have no occaſion for a ſubſidy. The yearly value of the religious houſes, amounted to 161,100 pounds ſterling, according to the rate they had been laſt farmed at *. But it muſt be obſerved, the abbots and priors foreſeeing the impending ſtorm, had ſet the rents very low, and raiſed the fines very high, that they might have wherewithal to ſubſiſt, when they ſhould be out of their houſes. The king pretended not to mind it, being, on the contrary, very glad, the people were not acquainted with the whole profit, which accrued to him from theſe ſuppreſſions. Beſides the rents of the lands, belonging to the monaſteries, the king had, moreover, a very conſiderable ſum ariſing from the church-ornaments, plate, goods, lead, bells, materials, which he thought not proper to have valued; but it may be judged of by this ſingle article, viz. that in the abbey of St. Edmundsbury alone, there was found 5000 marks of gold and ſilver, in bullion.

The revenues of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries. Burnet.

The ruin of the monks was a great occaſion of joy and triumph, to thoſe who had, already, embraced the reformation, or who wiſhed it could be embraced without danger. But they had not cauſe long to rejoice; for Henry reſolving to ſhew, that in aboliſhing the papal authority, and deſtroying the monaſteries, he had not changed his religion, gave, very ſoon, an unqueſtionable proof of it. The parliament meeting, the 28th of April, immediately, made, by the direction of the court, a law, entitled, "An Act for "aboliſhing diverſity of opinions in certain "articles, concerning Chriſtian religion". This is the law, that is more commonly

II. Who maintained, that communion in both kinds was neceſſary.

III. Or, that it was lawful for prieſts to marry.

IV. Or, that vows of chaſtity may be broken.

The laws concerning religion, ſerve to increaſe the king's authority.

By this, and ſome former laws, which ſettled what was to be believed, in matters of religion, all the ſubjects were, almoſt, equally liable to the pains enacted therein. Indeed, this laſt law, with thoſe that were made before againſt the pope's authority, contained the king's belief, but not the nation's; for there was hardly a perſon in the kingdom, but what believed either more or leſs, and yet no one dared, openly, to ſwerve from it, either to the right or left. The reformed, however, were the greateſt ſufferers by it, and, indeed, it was levelled againſt them; for Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was the real author of it. He had intimated to the king, that it was the only means to hinder a league from being formed againſt him; that what he had aboliſhed, not being eſſential to religion, nor conſidered as ſuch, by the generality of Chriſtians, no man, of ſound judgment, could deem him heretical, ſo long as he maintained theſe ſix articles, which, entirely, diſtinguiſhed true Catholicks from ſectaries and innovators. This was, really, taking the king by his weak ſide; but, beſides this motive, the king had another, which was no leſs powerful, viz. by adding this law, to thoſe already made againſt the pope, he rendered his ſubjects ſo dependent upon him, that there was ſcarce a man but what was obnoxious to be called to an account. So the pope's friends, and the reformed, were equally in his power; and, conſequently, they were equally concerned not to diſpleaſe him, in any thing, but rather, blindly, to ſubmit to his will. Cranmer, alone, ventured publickly, and for three days together, to argue againſt the bill, before it paſſed; but, as ſoon as it had received the ſeal of the publick authority, he ſent away his wife, into Germany, till better times.

The parliament grants the lands of the monaſteries to the king. Burnet.

By another act, the parliament granted to the king, the lands of the religious houſes, which were ſuppoſed to have been, freely, ſurrendered to him. So, this ſtatute was rather a confirmation of what had been done, than an ordinance for the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries. As the king had intimated, that he intended to employ the revenues, he had acquired, in uſeful foundations, the parliament paſſed a bill, for giving him power to erect new biſhopricks.

Never was parliament more devoted to the king's will; for they were not ſatisfied, with approving whatever the king had done, but alſo, whatever he might do for the future. It was enacted, this ſeſſion, that the ſame obedience ſhould be paid to the king's proclamations, or to the orders of the council, during a minority, as to the acts of parliament. It was pretended, that caſes might happen where the king had not time to call a parliament, and yet it was neceſſary, for the good of the realm, that his orders ſhould be executed, otherwiſe there might be danger of falling into great inconveniencies. Thus, to avoid a poſſible, but withal an uncommon inconvenience, another, much more conſiderable, was run into, by giving the ſovereign a deſpotick power; for, if his orders were to be obeyed, without the concurrence of the parliament, he had no occaſion to call one, if he did not think it proper. It is true, there were ſome limitations in this act, as, that no perſon ſhould be deprived of life, or eſtate, by vertue of the king's proclamation, nor any laws or cuſtoms broken, or ſubverted thereby; but theſe reſtrictions were ſo ambiguouſly expreſſed, that it was eaſy for the king to evade them. Upon this act were grounded the great changes of religion, in the non-age of Edward VI. 1539. An extraordinary act, for increaſing the royal power.

In this ſame ſeſſion, the parliament paſſed an act, to regulate the precedency of the officers of ſtate; by which Cromwell, the king's vice-gerent, in eccleſiaſtical affairs, tho' a lockſmith's ſon, had the precedence of all perſons, next the royal family. Another, about precedency.

Laſtly, the parliament confirmed the ſentence of death paſſed upon the marqueſs of Exeter, and the reſt who had been executed, for holding a correſpondence with cardinal Pole; moreover, for the ſame reaſon, they attainted the counteſs of Salisbury, the cardinal's mother, and the marchioneſs of Exeter, without bringing them to a tryal. This laſt act met with great oppoſition, in the parliament, many objecting, that to condemn perſons unheard, was a breach of the moſt ſacred and unalterable rules of juſtice; but Cromwell, having ſent for the judges to his houſe, asked them, whether the parliament had power to condemn perſons accuſed, without a hearing? The judges anſwered, it was a nice and dangerous queſtion; that equity, juſtice, and all ſorts of laws, required, that the accuſed ſhould be heard; that, however, the parliament being the ſupreme court of the realm, from which there could be no appeal, the validity of their ſentences, of what nature ſoever they were, could not be queſtioned. This was ſaying, in other words, that the parliament would, therein, commit an injuſtice, for which they could not be called to an account. Cromwell having reported to the parliament the opinion of the judges, the two ladies, of the blood royal, were condemned to die, by a ſentence which eſtabliſhed a precedent, the moſt pernicious that had ever been ſeen in England, and which proved fatal to its author, as will appear. In the interim, the king granted a full pardon to the marchioneſs of Exeter, and a reprieve to the counteſs. The ſentence againſt the marqueſs of Exeter, &c. is confirmed. Counteſs of Sarum. and marchioneſs of Exeter, attainted. Burnet.

1539. countess of Salisbury, who was not executed till two years after. Thus, the king daily acquired some fresh degree of authority; and it might be said he usurped it not, since it was given him by the parliament, if the circumstances of the times had not rendered the very parliament slaves to his will.

The king takes care to encourage Cranmer. Burnet.

Cranmer had strenuously opposed the law of the six articles, and such an opposition would have infallibly ruined any other person but that prelate; but the king had an esteem for him, which could not be easily changed, because he was persuaded the archbishop acted according to the dictates of his conscience, whereas he had a quite contrary notion of the rest of his ministers and courtiers. Their blind compliance, served only to make him despise them, tho' he liked to reap the advantage of their baseness. So having a real esteem and sincere affection for Cranmer, and imagining, he must have been extremely mortified, that the act had passed contrary to his opinion, and even apprehensive of having displeased him by his opposition, he sent the duke of Norfolk to encourage him, and assure him of his constant kindness. Cranmer very thankfully received this testimony of the king's esteem and goodness. Soon after, the king talked with him himself, concerning the law of the six articles, and was pleased that he explained to him the reasons which led him to oppose it; nay, he ordered him to put all his arguments in writing, tho' by the statute itself, it was a crime worthy of burning; but Cranmer, trusting to the king's equity, drew up a memorial, which he intended to give him. This writing being accidentally lost, was found by one who was going to carry it to the king, if Cromwell had not prevented him. Dr. Burnet represents this to be an unexpected and happy escape for Cranmer; but since the king himself ordered him to compose this writing, the danger does not seem to be so great, unless it be supposed the king would have condemned him unheard. But this supposition destroys itself, by the particular esteem the king had for him.

Shaxton and Latimer resign their sees, and are sent to the tower. Act. Pub.

Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, and Latimer of Worcester, were not treated so favourably. As they could not resolve to approve of the law of the six articles, they believed that in resigning their bishopricks, they should be less exposed to the attacks of their enemies. But they did not come off so easily; for they had no sooner put the instruments of resignation into the king's hands, but they were presented, as having spoken against the six articles, and committed to the tower.

An inquiry of those who rejected the six articles. Burnet.

When the parliament broke up, the king sent commissioners into the several counties, to make inquiry of those who were against the six articles, being determined rigorously to execute the statute. As Cromwell and Cranmer could not but be suspected, in this affair, the enemies of the reformation easily made the king sensible, that to leave to them the nomination of these commissioners, would be labouring in vain; and, indeed, persons who strongly opposed the act, were very unfit to see it executed, as the king desired. Some of the contrary party, therefore, were appointed, who 1539. discharged their commission with such immoderate zeal and passion, that they frustrated the designs of those who employed them. In the city of London alone, there were within few days, above 500 persons thrown into prison, and involved in the breach of the statute; nay, the king was shewn, that, contrary to his intention, the commissioners had laid snares for these prisoners, to oblige them to discover opinions which they intended to conceal, in obedience to the laws. Besides, since in so short a space, such numbers were imprisoned in London, it was easy to judge how many there might be in all the rest of the kingdom, and of what ill consequence to execute the law upon numberless persons of all ages and sexes. This, the chancellor, who was no enemy to the reformation, represented to the king, and prevailed with him to pardon all the prisoners. From this time to Cromwell's death, the proceedings upon this act were suspended, tho' it still subsisted, and might have been executed, if the king had pleased. Thus, every thing was regulated by the king's will, who hastened or retarded the execution of the laws, according to the times and persons. This gained him a blind condescension from both parties, every one having to fear his own ruin, according to the king's humour and disposition. It is certain, those that desired a reformation, were constrained to feign an approbation of many things, which in their hearts they detested, and that Cromwell and Cranmer, who had most access to the king, dared to press him only indirectly to advance the work already begun. Hence they preserved their credit, and were enabled to do their party service. Their adversaries took the same course, and went still greater lengths in their compliance, well knowing it was the only way to gain the king's confidence. Bonner, bishop of London, tho' a favourer of the pope, and persuaded that the king had no spiritual authority, took a commission from him, which adjudged to him both the spiritual and temporal power of his bishoprick, during his good pleasure. After this, the excessive power which the king daily acquired must not be thought strange, since every one strove to submit to his will. Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, was one of the principal favourers of the old religion, to which he was very serviceable, by a profound dissimulation. He expressed great zeal to execute as well the act of the six articles, as those made against the pope. He thereby maintained his credit, tho' the king had but little esteem for him.

The value of what the suppression of the monasteries produced. Burnet.

The actual suppression of the monasteries was begun and ended, in the course of this year. The commissioners appointed for that purpose, settled every thing relating thereto; they awarded pensions to the abbots, priors, monks, and nuns, for their livelihood; they valued the plate, goods, ornaments of the priests, of the altars, of the churches, and ordered what buildings should be demolished, and what left standing. I have already observed that the rents of all the suppressed monasteries amounted to 160,100 pounds sterling; 1539. but, if it be true, that this valuation was made only upon the foot of the laſt leaſes, and that theſe were not above the tenth part of the real value, as ſome affirm, it follows that theſe rents were worth above 1,600,000 pounds, beſides the ready money, which accrued to the king by the ſale of the effects. Here was wherewithal to make uſeful foundations to the church and ſtate, had all theſe riches been employed that way. The king ſeemed, at firſt, to have formed ſuch a deſign; nay, it was what had ſerved for the principal ground of the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries; but the greedineſs of the courtiers and favourites allowed but a very ſmall part to be expended on things uſeful and neceſſary. Henry had, at firſt, reſolved to erect 18 new biſhopricks, but as the money was laviſhed away, he found reaſons to reduce them to a much ſmaller number. In a word, he contented himſelf with founding ſix, and eſtabliſhing canons in ſome cathedrals, which the monks had poſſeſſed; and in all this, he employed but a revenue of 8000 pounds. He laid out, likewiſe, part of the money in fortifying ſome ports, and all the reſt was ſquandered away in preſents, and other needleſs expences. For this cauſe, he could not avoid the blame of having plundered the church; whereas, had he employed the beſt part of theſe lands in things uſeful to the church and ſtate, he would have gained the bleſſings of his ſubjects, and their poſterity. As to the parliament, they are inexcuſable for having put into the king's hands ſuch immenſe riches, deſigned for pious uſes, without taking care how they were to be employed. This is no ſlender evidence of what has been already obſerved, that the parliaments met in this reign, only to be inſtrumental in gratifying the king's paſſions, without ever examining either the motives or conſequences of what he required. Henry had alſo formed the project of founding a college for young ſtudents, that they might be qualified for the ſervice of the ſtate, either in ambaſſies, or other affairs of the government; but this project miſcarried, with many others, becauſe the king having ſold the lands of the ſuppreſſed abbies, was very loth to put to ſuch uſes the ready money raiſed by the ſale. He choſe rather to laviſh it upon his pleaſures, or his courtiers, who uſed all ſorts of artifices, condeſcenſions, and baſe flatteries, to procure ſome part of theſe vaſt treaſures.

Remarks upon the conduct of the parliament.

The Proteſtants avoid the emperor's ſnares, Sleidan.

Whilſt Henry was employed in his domeſtick affairs, he had an eye, however, to what paſſed abroad. The emperor feigned, the laſt year, a firm deſign to adjuſt the religious differences which occaſioned troubles, in Germany. But this was only to draw money from the Proteſtants, to be expended in his war with the Turk; for, he expected, that upon the bare hopes, he was pleaſed to give them, of redreſſing their grievances, they would on his account drain themſelves of men and money, and ſo become leſs formidable. But the Proteſtants would not ſuffer themſelves to be deceived to ſuch a degree; for they plainly replied to his demand, that they could do nothing for him, without ſufficient ſecurity of being left in peace.

Henry finding that a rupture between the emperor and the Proteſtants, was not very remote, ſent freſh ambaſſadors to Germany, to ſtrengthen the reſolutions of the Smalcaldick league, by hopes of his coming into it, and being declared protector. But the Germans had now diſcovered his deſign, which was to amuſe them, and keep the emperor in continual fear of his uniting with them; they returned, therefore, the ſame anſwer as before, that the ſole intent of their league was to maintain the Augsburg confeſſion, and if the king refuſed to admit that confeſſion, it was in vain to treat of other points; that, moreover, they heard, with extreme grief, that he perſecuted, in his realm, ſuch as held the ſame opinions with them, on ſundry articles of religion, and, therefore, ſo long as the act of the ſix articles ſubſiſted, there was no likelihood that he really intended to join with them. Melancthon even wrote him a letter, in very ſtrong, tho' reſpectful terms, to ſhew him the unreaſonableneſs of that ſtatute. 1539. and Henry's.

Gardiner diverts the king from his deſigns to join with the Proteſtants. Burnet.

Henry, to whom all was obedient, in England, and whoſe will was a law, was offended at the firmneſs of the German princes. On the other hand, Gardiner, who dreaded of all things, the king's union with the Smalcaldick league, failed not to uſe this occaſion to divert him from it, by flattering his vanity. He repreſented to him, that it was very ſtrange, petty princes ſhould pretend to be a pattern to a great monarch, and dictate to the moſt learned prince, in Europe, in matters of religion; adding, that whatever the Proteſtants might pretend, they would never approve of the ſupremacy, in England, becauſe it would be a tacit engagement to own, that his emperor had the ſame right, in Germany. This was falſe reaſoning, ſince there was a wide difference between the authority which the king had over his ſubjects, and that which the emperor could claim over the ſovereigns and free cities of Germany. However, he attained his ends, that is, he begot a great coldneſs between the king and the Proteſtants.

Bibles are ſet up in the churches.

Gardiner's artifices might have been more prejudicial to the reformation, if, on the other ſide, the reformers had not raiſed a counter-battery, of which they made wonderful uſe. The king was ſo jealous of his ſupremacy, that he neglected nothing to ſupport it. Indeed, the abſolute power acquired over his ſubjects, placed him above all oppoſition, but he wiſhed, of all things, the nation was convinced of the juſtice of that prerogative. Hence the reformers took occaſion to remonſtrate to him, that nothing but the reading of the holy ſcriptures could undeceive the people, of their falſe notion of the papal authority. By this means, they had already obtained, that there ſhould be a bible faſtened, with a chain, in every church, to be freely peruſed by all perſons; but as many ſcrupled, publickly, to read the ſcriptures, for fear of being ſuſpected of hereſy, Cranmer, meeting with a favourable opportunity, repreſented to the king, that it was neceſſary to give his ſubjects leave to have a bible in their houſes, inſinuating to him, 1539. him, that every one having liberty to read it, would eaſily be convinced, that the pope's pretended authority had no foundation in the ſcriptures. This was an innocent ſtratagem, to procure the people an opportunity to inſtruct themſelves, in many other articles, tho' the king had only one in view. Gardiner readily perceived the conſequence of the archbiſhop's requeſt, and ſeeing the king inclined to grant it, did all he could to divert it; for he diſputed upon this ſubject with Cranmer, in the king's preſence, who heard them very attentively; at laſt, perceiving ſolid learning in what Cranmer ſaid, and nothing but vanity in the reaſonings of his adverſary, he ſuddenly roſe up, ſaying to Gardiner, that ſuch a novice as he, was not fit to contend with an old experienced general. Soon after, he iſſued out a proclamation, declaring, he was deſirous to have his ſubjects attain the knowledge of true religion, in God's word; and, therefore, he would take care they ſhould have an exact tranſlation of the bible. However, he forbid, in order to prevent the inconveniencies which might ariſe from the difference of the verſions, the ſelling of any bible but what ſhould be approved by the vice-gerent.

The emperor croſſes France to go to Gaunt. Burnet.

About the end of this year, was ſeen a freſh effect of the mutual confidence, which appeared between Charles V, and Francis I. A mutiny ariſing in Gaunt, by reaſon of a tax laid upon wine, by the governor of the Low-Countries, the mutineers applied to the king of France, to implore his protection, and even offered to ſubmit to him; but he did not think proper to accept of their offers. On the contrary, he informed the emperor of what was plotting againſt him. This ſeems ſomething ſtrange, conſidering that, hitherto, he had never profeſſed much generoſity to that monarch; but the reaſon of this proceeding was, the emperor ſtill allured him with the hopes of the duchy of Milan, and ſo diverted him from the thoughts of recovering it by arms. However this be, the emperor's preſence in Flanders, being alone capable of appeaſing the ſedition of Gaunt, he was at ſome loſs which way to get thither in time. It was dangerous going by ſea, as well on account of the ſeaſon, as becauſe he had no fleet to convoy him. The way thro' Italy was no ſafer, by reaſon he could not afterwards croſs Germany, without paſſing thro' the territories of the Proteſtant princes. There remained no other way but by France, which he reſolved upon, tho' he had as much reaſon to ſuſpect that kingdom, as Germany. But he hoped to amuſe the king, by means of the duchy of Milan, as he did in effect. He ſet out, therefore, and entered France with a ſmall train, upon the bare ſecurity of a ſafe-conduct; nay, he refuſed to take in hoſtage, the dauphin, and his brother, the duke of Orleans, who came and received him at Bayonne, offering to ſtay in Spain ſo long as he ſhould be in the king's dominions. Wherever he came, the ſame reſpect was paid him as to the king himſelf, and he arrived at Paris the 1ſt of January, 1540.

Henry's marriage with Ann of Cleves, being, at length, concluded, by Cromwell's diligence, who had been charged with the negotiation, the princeſs arrived, in England, about the end of the year, 1539, at the time the emperor was travelling through France, in his way to the Low-Countries. Henry receiving advice of her arrival, at Rocheſter, went down incognito, being very impatient to ſee whether he had been deceived; but, to his ſorrow, he found her very different from what her picture, drawn by Hans Holbin, had cauſed him to expect. This firſt ſight gave him ſuch an averſion for her, that he would have immediately broke off the marriage, if he had not been prevented by ſtrong reaſons. The ſame conſiderations which had made him conclude it, ſubſiſted, and there were others which obliged him to conſummate it. The duke of Cleves was the emperor's neighbour, in Flanders, and had alſo a pretenſion as well as he, to the duchy of Guelders, after the death of the duke of that name; and conſequently, in caſe of a war between the emperor and England, that prince could give the emperor a very troubleſome diverſion, in Flanders. On the other hand, his ſiſter was married to the duke of Saxony, head of the Smalcaldick league, with whom it was of great moment to the king, to live in a good underſtanding. But this was not all; for the emperor, then in France, was labouring with all his power to diſengage Francis I, from the intereſts of England; nay, Henry had private intelligence, that the emperor offered to give the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans, upon that conſideration. If, therefore, in ſuch a juncture, he had ſent back the princeſs of Cleves, without marrying her, he ran the hazard of an entire rupture with the princes of the Smalcaldick league, at a time when he ſaw himſelf upon the point of being forſaken by the king of France, who, by degrees, forgot the aſſiſtance he had received from him, in his moſt urgent occaſions. So, lamenting his misfortune to be forced to marry a princeſs, for whom he had conceived an averſion, he reſolved to make this ſacrifice the 6th of January, 1540. But he was ſtill leſs pleaſed after his marriage, than before, and from that very moment was determined to be divorced from her. He concealed his ſentiments, however, as much as poſſible, tho' it was eaſy for all to ſee his vexation and trouble. Cromwell, who had drawn him into this marriage, quickly felt the effects of his reſentment, tho' the king was exceeding careful to hide it from him.

and bears Cromwell an ill-will. Burnet.

The parliament meeting the 12th of April, Cromwell made a ſpeech to both houſes, informing them, that the king ſeeing, with extreme concern, ſo great diviſion among his ſubjects, in matters of religion, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the points in diſpute, that the articles of faith might be fixed without reſpect of parties, by the word of God; that he was very deſirous his people ſhould have the knowledge of the truth; but then he was reſolved to puniſh, without mercy,

Knights of St. John ſuppreſſed. Hall.

During this ſeſſion, the parliament ſuppreſſed the order of the knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, who are now called knights of Malta. Their dependence on the pope and the emperor, was the cauſe, or pretence, of their ruin. There is no doubt, the deſire of enjoying their ſpoils, induced alſo the king to procure their ſuppreſſion; and, indeed, the parliament gave him all their lands, as they had given him thoſe of the abbies. Tho' they had large revenues both in Ireland and England, the king allowed, however, but 3000 pounds for their maintenance, after their ſuppreſſion. The affair being ended, the parliament was prorogued to the 25th of May.

Cromwell's diſgrace. Burnet.

A few days after, there fell upon Cromwell, a ſtorm, which, probably, had been gathering ſome time before. This miniſter had many enemies, and enviers. He was ſon of a farrier or lock-ſmith; and tho' his birth was ſo mean, he was raiſed to great honour, even to the having the precedence of all the lords in the kingdom, except the royal family. All the nobility envied him; and the whole popiſh party alſo hated him mortally, deeming him the firſt adviſer of the ſuppreſſion of the abbies, and one of the principal encouragers of the king, to all the innovations he had made in religion. Among theſe, who were very numerous, the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner were the perſons that could do him moſt hurt, becauſe they had free acceſs to the king. Theſe two courtiers perceiving the king's coldneſs for the new queen, doubted not of his ill-will to Cromwell, for engaging him in this marriage, and reſolved to make uſe of this occaſion to ruin him. They hoped, when he was removed, it would not be impoſſible to procure an agreement between the emperor and the king, and then, a reconciliation with the pope, which Cromwell had always oppoſed, to the utmoſt of his power. Two other things greatly contributed alſo, to the downfal of this miniſter. The king had always employed him, in his correſpondence with the Smalcaldick league, and ſo long as he thought he wanted that league, he could not be without his aſſiſtance; but growing cold, at length, to the German princes, as I before obſerved, and knowing, the dreaded union between Charles V, and Francis I, was only a chimera, and, conſequently, he ſhould have no need of Germany, Cromwell became leſs neceſſary. The ſecond thing which helped to ruin Cromwell was, the king fell in love with Catharine Howard, the duke of Norfolk's niece. Norfolk finding his credit conſiderably increaſed, made uſe of it to procure the miniſter's deſtruction; and as ſoon as he had a fair opportunity, he repreſented to the king,

The duke of Norfolk ſtirs up the king againſt Cromwell.

"That there were many male-contents in the "kingdom, and good men could not be perſuaded that a prince like him, would willingly give any occaſion of diſcontent to his 1540. "people; that they inferred from thence, he "muſt have been ill-ſerved by his miniſter, "who, doubtleſs, had abuſed his confidence; "that as the people ſeemed diſſatisfied, only "with regard to religion, it was natural to "think this happened through the vice-gerent's fault, whoſe conduct, perhaps, it "would be proper to examine; that he was "accuſed, by the publick, of many things, "which, if true, rendered him the moſt guilty of all others, conſidering the favours "heaped on him, by the king; that beſides, "tho' no particular fact could be proved upon him, it was, however, a very great "crime to rob the king of the hearts of good "part of his ſubjects; that he took the freedom, therefore, to tell him, in order to "quiet their minds, there was no better way "than to ſacrifice to them ſo odious a miniſter." Theſe inſinuations, which were, doubtleſs, ſeconded by Gardiner, and other enemies of Cromwell, produced, at length, the deſired effect. The king, prejudiced againſt him, reſolved to diſpatch him out of the way, without knowing yet of what he was guilty. But he found in his death a double advantage. Firſt, he diſcovered his reſentment againſt him, on account of the marriage, he had drawn him into; ſecondly, he believed to make his people a ſacrifice, capable of ſilencing all their murmurs. This reſolution being taken, and the parliament meeting the 13th of June, the duke of Norfolk accuſed Cromwell of high-treaſon, at the council-board, and received orders to arreſt him, and ſend him to the tower. This illuſtrious priſoner had the common fate of all diſgraced miniſters. In a moment, he was forſaken by all but his friend Cranmer, who, alone, ventured to write to the king, in his favour, tho' to no purpoſe.

Cromwell's death is decreed.

He is condemned without being heard. Burnet.

Cromwell being in the tower, the articles of his impeachment were drawn, conſiſting in generals, of which not ſo much as the leaſt proof was offered to be given; for the king knew, if his proceſs was made according to the uſual forms, he might produce warrants, which would fully clear him, and which could not be diſclaimed; and for this reaſon, it was thought proper to bring his affair before the parliament, and cauſe a bill of attainder to be paſſed againſt him, without allowing him to make his defence. In this manner, had he himſelf proceeded, in the affair of the marchioneſs of Exeter and the counteſs of Salisbury, and, therefore, could not think it ſtrange the ſame thing ſhould be practiſed in his caſe. The parliament, ever ſlaves to the king, deemed the impeachment juſt, tho' deſtitute of proof. So by an act, declaring him attainted and convicted of hereſy and treaſon, he was condemned as a traytor and heretick, the parliament leaving it to the king's choice to make him ſuffer the puniſhment of either of thoſe crimes. This, joined to ſome other foregoing, as well as following inſtances, ſhew to what height the king had carried his authority, ſince to diſcover his will was ſufficient to be, immediately,

The king is determined to null his marriage. Stow.

Henry was ſo tired of his queen, that he could not bear the vexation to ſee himſelf engaged for the reſt of his life, in ſo diſagreeable a marriage; wherefore, he reſolved to divorce her, let what would be the conſequence, eſpecially, as the reaſons which induced him to marry her, no longer ſubſiſted. He had loſt all hopes of making a league with the Proteſtants of Germany, and his fears of the emperor were vaniſhed, ſince he ſaw every thing tending to a rupture between him and France. He only wanted a pretence to demand a divorce, and give ſome colour to the proceedings of the clergy and parliament, of whoſe concurrence he was ſure, however ſlight the pretence might be. He found one, in a pre-contract between the queen and the duke of Lorrain's ſon; but this contract was ſo ſlight, that the conſequences were to be much preſſed, to make it ſerve for the foundation of diſſolving Ann's marriage with the king. The duke of Cleves and the duke of Lorrain had, formerly, it ſeems, in a treaty, agreed upon a marriage between Ann of Cleves and the prince of Lorrain, both minors. This agreement had never been confirmed by the parties, when of age. On the contrary, the ambaſſador of the duke of Gueldres, who acted as mediator in that treaty, declared, afterwards, by an authentick inſtrument, that this article was deemed null. However, when Henry's marriage with Ann, was concluded, this pre-engagement raiſed a difficulty. But the ambaſſadors of Saxony and Cleves poſitively promiſed to clear that point, and put it out of all doubt, as ſoon as the princeſs ſhould arrive in England. Ann being come to Greenwich, the king, who liked her not, inſiſted upon this ſame point, in order to ſend her back. For that purpoſe, he called a council, and ſending for the ambaſſadors, the explanation, they had promiſed, was demanded; but they had brought nothing with them, looking upon this difficulty, as little material. In the interim, the council telling them that good proofs were expected, and not bare words, they offered to produce, within three months, an authentick abſtract from the chancery of Cleves, to prove what they had alledged. This alone would not have been capable of inducing the king to proceed, if, as has been ſaid, there had not been ſtrong reaſons to cauſe him to accompliſh his marriage; ſo, the council was of opinion, that if there were no other objection, the marriage might be lawfully ſolemniſed. The abſtract from the chancery of Cleves being come, great exceptions were found to it, upon the ambiguity of the word eſpouſals, becauſe it was not expreſſed whether they were eſpouſals, by the words of the preſent, or of the future tenſe; but as the king would not yet commence the affair of his divorce, he cauſed the abſtract to be kept, in order to make uſe of it when there ſhould be occaſion; wherefore upon this, he reſolved to found his divorce.

1540. The parliament prays the king to examine the validity of his marriage. Hall.

The parliament, after a prorogation of ſome days, meeting again, Henry ſent the queen to Richmond. A few days after, a motion was made in the houſe of lords, to preſent an addreſs to the king, to deſire him to ſuffer his marriage to be tried. After what has been ſeen, it can't be imagined, any lord would be ſo hardy as to dare to make ſuch a motion, unleſs he was ſure of the king's approbation. So, the motion being aſſented to, the lords deſired the concurrence of the commons; after which, they went in a body to preſent their addreſs to the king. Henry proteſted to them, that he ſought only the glory of God, the good of his people, and the declaration of truth. Then he agreed, that the affair ſhould be referred to the clergy, who, immediately, appointed commiſſioners to examine the witneſſes; and all that could be gathered from the king's own diſpoſition, and thoſe of the witneſſes, was, that there had been a pre-contract between the queen and the prince of Lorrain, which was not ſufficiently cleared; that the king having eſpouſed the queen againſt his will, had not given an inward conſent to his marriage, without which, it was affirmed, his promiſes could not be obligatory, a man's act being only what is inward; that the king had never conſummated the marriage; that the whole nation had a great intereſt in the king's having more iſſue, which they ſaw he could never have by the queen.

Extraordinary reaſons alledged for the divorce. Burnet.

The king muſt have had a very ill opinion of the convocation, the parliament, and the publick, to alledge ſuch extraordinary cauſes of his divorce. The firſt had been diſcuſſed before the celebration of the marriage, and the council was of opinion, it could be no juſt impediment; and, as to the ſecond, if that maxim took place, contracts would be of no uſe, ſince one of the parties might ſay, he had not given an inward conſent. This would be eſtabliſhing, without remedy, inſincerity, fraud and perfidiouſneſs, in the higheſt degree; and as for the third, the king had, doubtleſs, forgot what he had alledged, in the proceſs of his divorce, with Catharine; for he then maintained, purſuant to his clergy's opinion, that the conſummation of Arthur's marriage with Catharine, was not neceſſary to render it valid, but, that the bare conſent of the parties made it compleat. The fourth was of no greater weight, ſince there was no neceſſity of nulling the marriage, under colour that the king was not pleaſed to lie with the queen; beſides, he had now an heir. In ſhort, his word muſt be taken, when he ſaid, he had not conſummated his marriage; his word, who ſued for the divorce, and who uſed this argument to obtain it. In the interim, the clergy thought theſe reaſons ſolid, and paſſed a ſentence of divorce upon them, and the parliament were ſo abject, as to proſtitute themſelves to the king's paſſion, and confirm the ſentence. There is no diſtinction to be made here, ſince neither in the convocation, nor in Sentence of divorce. Burnet.

1540. the parliament, was there one ſingle vote againſt the divorce; ſo much did every one dread to incur the king's diſpleaſure. This is a remarkable evidence of what I have often intimated, that in every thing tranſacted in England, during the latter part of Henry VIII's reign, the parliament and clergy ought to be conſidered only, as the king's inſtruments to gratify his paſſions. To him is due the praiſe of whatever was good and uſeful, and he it is that ought to be blamed for whatever was amiſs. However, the parliament and clergy are inexcuſable for not having endeavoured to ſupport the cauſe of juſtice and truth, when they believed them to be oppreſſed.

Ann conſents to the divorce. Hall.

The queen was not much troubled at what had been done, in her abſence, and even without her being examined. Probably, ſhe had entertained no great affection for a ſpouſe, who had never given her any token of his love. However, tho' the king had thought it needleſs to ask her approbation, when he was meditating the divorce, becauſe then the clergy and parliament only were concerned, whom he knew to be at his devotion, he demanded her conſent to what had been done, thinking, no doubt, the better to juſtify himſelf to the world; and at the ſame time, he offered, by letters patents, to declare her his adopted ſiſter, with a penſion of 4000 pounds a year, and her choice, either to live in England, or return home. She agreed to all, without ſollicitation, and choſe to live in England, where ſhe hoped to paſs her time more agreeably than at Cleves, in her brother's court; beſides, it is likely ſhe believed her penſion would be more ſecure, if ſhe remained in England, than if ſhe lived abroad. Every thing being thus ſettled, ſhe wrote to the duke, her brother, that ſhe approved of the divorce, and deſired him to live in good underſtanding with the king.

An act to moderate the pains of one of the ſix articles. Burnet.

This grand affair being finiſhed, the parliament paſſed an act to moderate one of the ſix articles, in the bloody ſtatute. This article, as the other five, made it death for the prieſts to break the vow of chaſtity; but by this laſt act, the pains of death were turned to forfeiture of goods.

Proofs of the ſlaviſh attachment of the parliament.

All the reſt of this reign will be only a continued ſeries of ſenſible proofs of the ſlaviſh ſubjection the Engliſh nation was reduced to; but in this very ſeſſion of parliament, there are three, which ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence.

The parliament confirms whatever the king ſhall pleaſe to to enjoin, in matters of religion.

The commiſſioners appointed by the king, purſuant to an act of parliament, to examine the doctrines of religion, having drawn a long memorial, and ſet down certain articles, as undeniable and abſolutely neceſſary, it was moved in the houſe of lords, to paſs into a law, what theſe commiſſioners had already done, and whatever they ſhould do for the future, by order of the king. This motion being received, a bill was brought in, immediately, and, when paſſed, ſent down to the commons, who agreeing to it, ſent it up again the next day. By this ſtatute, it was enacted, that not only the memorial drawn by the commiſſioners, provided it were approved by the king, but likewiſe whatever the king ſhould enjoin for the future, in matters of religion, ſhould be believed and obeyed by all his ſubjects. This was inveſting the king, with the infallibility taken from the pope. Greater ſigns of ſlavery can hardly be ſeen, ſince the parliament gave the king power over conſcience, after having in a manner rendered him maſter of life and fortune. Moreover, a clauſe was inſerted in this act, which under colour of limiting the king's authority, ſenſibly enlarged it, viz. "That nothing ſhould be "done or determined, by vertue of this act, "which was contrary to the law of the realm." Theſe contradictory clauſes, in the ſame ſtatute, rendered the king arbiter of the lives of his ſubjects, ſince on the one hand, they were enjoined to ſubmit to the king's will, in matters of religion, without knowing, however, what he would pleaſe to preſcribe, and on the other, were forbid to do any thing contrary to the laws. Conſequently, in caſe the king commanded any thing contrary to the law, they were liable to be proſecuted, by vertue of this ſtatute, whether againſt law, they obeyed the king, or, in obedience to the law, refuſed to comply with his will. The acts paſſed, in this reign, are full of ſuch contradictions, which were not inſerted without deſign. 1540.

A law about marriage, in favour of the king.

The parliament paſſed another bill, which carried no leſs marks of ſervitude. It was enacted, that a marriage already conſummated, ſhould not be annulled, on pretence of precontract, or any other impediment not mentioned in the law of God. Without doubt the parliament had, or, perhaps, feigned to have, forgot, that the king's marriage with Ann Bullen was annulled by reaſon of a precontract, and upon this ſame foundation, during this very ſeſſion, they had approved the diſſolution of his marriage with Ann of Cleves. It is true, the king declared, it was not conſummated; but Catharine of Arragon proteſted the ſame thing, with reſpect to her marriage with prince Arthur, and yet it was decided, that a party concerned ſhould not be believed even upon oath, when there were preſumptions to the contrary. Theſe were real contradictions, but not minded by the king, his view being to legitimate the princeſs Elizabeth by vertue of the former branch of the act, and to remove, by the latter, the impediments in the canon law, to his intended marriage with Catharine Howard, who was couſin-german to Ann Bullen.

Money granted to the king by the clergy. Burnet.

Before the parliament broke up, the clergy of the province of Canterbury, aſſembled in convocation, offered the king a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound, of all eccleſiaſtical preferments, to be paid in two years, in acknowledgment, as they ſaid in their addreſs, of his care to free the church of England from the tyranny of the pope. The king gladly accepted their preſent, which was readily confirmed by the parliament. But this was not ſufficient for the king's occaſions; for in a few days, he demanded alſo an aid of money of the commons. Tho' for ſome time, the parliament had been want to ſubmit, without examination 1540. on to king's pleaſure, this demand met with ſome ſort of oppoſition in the lower houſe. And, indeed, it could not but ſeem ſtrange, coſidering the king was in peace with all the world, and beſides, he could not be imagined to have already conſumed the money, procured by the ſuppreſſion of the abbies. Some of the commons repreſented, that, if in time of peace, and within the ſpace of one year, the king had ſpent ſuch immenſe ſums, there was nothing more to do, but to give him all the lands in the kingdom, which too would not ſuffice for the expence of few years. But theſe ſpeeches had no great effect. It was replied, by the king's party, that he had laid out vaſt ſums in ſecuring the coaſts, and that the keeping his ſubjects in peace and plenty, coſt him more than the moſt burthenſome war. Theſe reaſons, tho' very weak, paſſed for inconteſtable, and the commons granted the king a ſubſidy, as large as if he had been actually engaged in a dangerous war. This is a third proof of the parliament's ſlavery. In the interim, the people could not conceive what was become of all the money the king had lately received, and which ſhould have ſupplied his neceſſities for many years.

The parliament is diſolved. Burnet.

This parliament, which had given the king ſo great teſtimonies of a boundleſs compliance, was diſſolved the 24th of July. But the king was pleaſed, firſt, to requite his ſubjects, with a free and general pardon, as it was called, tho' the exceptions limited the benefit to few perſons. All thoſe were excluded, who had been condemned for denying the king's ſupremacy, or for tranſgreſſing ſome one of the ſix articles of the bloody ſtatute, and even thoſe who were only accuſed of theſe crimes, which were then unpardonable. The counteſs of Salisbury, cardinal Pole's mother, and Thomas Cromwell were excepted by name.

Cromwell's execution. Hall.

As Cromwell's execution had been deferred, he was in ſome hopes of obtaining his pardon, and the more, as having wrote to the king, a very ſubmiſſive letter, he was ſo moved with it, that he cauſed it to be thrice read; but the ſollicitations of the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner, ſeconded by thoſe of Catharine Howard, who acted in their favour, rendered the endeavours of the priſoner fruitleſs. The king ſigned a warrant to cut off his head, the 28th of July, about ſix weeks after his condemnation. As Cromwell left a ſon, of whom he was very fond, he would ſay nothing on the ſcaffold, that might do him a prejudice, contenting himſelf with ſhewing, that he willingly ſubmitted to the ſentence the law had paſſed on him, praying for the king's proſperity, and declaring he died in the profeſſion of the Catholick religion. Theſe laſt words were variouſly interpreted, according to the paſſions and prejudices of the two parties, in matters of religion. Tho' it was certain, Cromwell * had lived in the opinions of the Lutherans, the contrary party maintained, he recanted at his death, and that by the Catholick religion, was to be underſtood, the old religion, profeſſed in the kingdom, before all the innovations. The others pretended, theſe words ought to be taken in a more general ſenſe, and, at moſt, to ſignify only religion which was then eſtabliſhed. However this be, the care Cromwell took, when he came to die, to ſay nothing that might offend the king, turned to his ſon Gregory's advantage, who was this very year created a peer of the realm, by the title of lord Cromwell. The office of vice-gerent, enjoyed by the father, died with him, no one deſiring a poſt ſo obnoxious to envy, and ſo fatal to the firſt poſſeſſor; beſides, the duke of Norfolk and the biſhop of Wincheſter, who were then in great credit, took care not to ſollicit the king, to fill a place, which would engage the perſon who held it, to uſe all his intereſt to hinder a reconcilation with Rome. 1540.

Several perſons of both religions executed. Hall.

Some days after Cromwell's death, was ſeen, at London, a ſight, which very much perplexed both parties. This was a company of people condemned and executed all together; ſome for denying the king's ſupremacy; others for maintaining the Lutheran doctrines. Among theſe laſt were Robert Barnes, doctor of divinity, Thomas Gerard, parſon of Hony-lane, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney. Theſe three being impeached before the parliament, were condemned to be burned, upon a general accuſation of ſowing hereſy, perverting the ſcriptures, and maintaining errors deſtructive of religion, without the act's mentioning any particulars, and in all appearance, without the parliament's examining the proofs. By the ſame act were condemned to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment, four men, one of whom was accuſed of maintaining the papal authority; another for holding correſpondence with cardinal Pole; a third for deſigning to ſurpriſe Calais; a fourth for harbouring a rebel; and laſtly, three more convicted of denying the king's ſupremacy. All theſe were burned or hanged, at the ſame time and place. It is to be preſumed, they were not admitted to ſpeak for themſelves, ſince Barnes, after a declaration of his faith to the people, asked the ſheriff whether he knew why he was to ſuffer. The ſheriff anſwering, he did not, he turned to the ſtake, and ſaid, the puniſhment he was going to ſuffer, plainly taught him the crime of which he was ſuppoſed to be guilty. He prayed, however, for the king, and even for Gardiner, whom he ſuſpected to be the author of his death. The biſhop endeavoured to clear himſelf by a printed apology; but had the misfortune not to be believed.

Catharine Howard declared queen. Herbert.

On the 8th of Auguſt, Catharine Howard, the duke of Norfolk's niece, was declared queen, the king having privately married her ſome time before. She was ſo devoted to the

* He obtained ſucceſſively, the offices and dignities of privy councellor, maſter of the jewel-houſe, clerk of the hanaper, principal ſecretary of ſtate, juſtice of the foreſts, maſter of the rolls, lord privy-ſeal, baron, the king's vice-gerent in ſpirituals, knight of the Garter, earl of Eſſex, great chamberlain of England. duke, 1540. duke, her uncle, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, that ſhe was entirely guided by their counſels; and as ſhe had a great aſcendent over the king, very likely ſhe would have induced him to give himſelf over to the guidance of theſe two miniſters, who were preparing to procure, by her means, great alterations in religion, had not her fall, which will be preſently related, confounded their projects. However, they improved as much as poſſible, ſo favourable a juncture, to ſtrike at the reformation and the reformed. Certainly Cranmer was then in a very dangerous ſituation; for he could not doubt, that the authors of Cromwell's ruin, deſired his deſtruction with the ſame ardour, nay, were privately working it, complaints of him being already heard in ſeveral places, and even a member of parliament ſaid openly in the houſe, he was the protector and head of the innovators. Theſe things would have, doubtleſs, taken effect, had his enemies had a little more time to prepare all their plots; but as they knew the king had a real eſteem for him, they intended to proceed, by degrees, plainly perceiving, they could not without danger to themſelves, preſs his ruin, ſo directly as Cromwell's; beſides, there was but one article which gave them any advantage upon Cranmer, viz. religion, in which too he had been very cautious, well knowing that the way to advance the reformation under ſuch a prince as Henry, was not directly to oppoſe his will.

Expoſition of the Chriſtian doctrine, which every one was obliged to receive. Burnet.

The change produced, at court, by Cromwell's diſgrace, and the new queen's advancement, was quickly perceived. The commiſſioners appointed to draw up a declaration of the Chriſtian doctrine, having preſented their work to the king, he ordered it to be immediately publiſhed. Tho' this declaration corrected ſundry abuſes, the popiſh party had ſo prevailed, that inſtead of promoting, it ſenſibly put back, the reformation, as it is eaſy to ſee by the abſtract Dr. Burnet gives of this book, in his Hiſtory of the Reformation of England. However, as ſeveral principles were laid down, which might be of great uſe in a more favourable juncture, the reformers were glad, in hopes theſe principles would ſerve one day to deſtroy the errors advanced in the declaration. On the other hand, the popiſh party thought they had gained much, becauſe they ſaw doctrines laid down, to which, probably, the reformers would never conſent, and hoped this oppoſition would draw the king's indignation upon their whole party; and as for themſelves, having always had an abſolute compliance for the king, they intended to purſue the ſame courſe, in order to put him entirely into the diſpoſition they deſired. Other commiſſioners, who were ordered to reform the Miſſals, made ſo ſlight alterations, that excepting a few razures of thoſe collects, in which the pope was prayed for, there was nothing changed, nor was it neceſſary to re-print the maſs-books. Thus, by the credit of the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner, ſupported by the new queen, archbiſhop Cranmer, and thoſe of his party, ſaw a ſtorm approaching, which, probably, would overwhelm them all. Perhaps, it was very fortunate for them, that the king was diverted ſome time, by other affairs, from his attention to what concerned religion. 1540.

The emperor's paſſage through France, ſeemed, at firſt, to create a ſincere reconciliation between him and Francis. During his ſtay, at Paris, he poſitively promiſed to give the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans; but when Francis preſſed him to ſign an inſtrument of inveſtiture, he replied, ſuch an act would be looked upon as extorted, if dated in France, and that it was more honourable for him and the king too, that it ſhould be ſigned in ſome town of Flanders. Afterwards, when he was out of France, he found ſome freſh excuſe not to perform his promiſe. In the interim, he ſubdued the Gantois, and puniſhed them ſeverely for the trouble they had given him of a journey to Flanders. After that, when Francis claimed his promiſe, he clogged it with ſuch reſtrictions, that it was eaſy to perceive he had no mind to part with a country, by which Spain had a communication with his other dominions, in Italy and Germany. Francis vexed to be thus deceived, turned out of favour chancellor Poyet, and conſtable Montmorency, who had adviſed him to take the emperor's word. The emperor breaks his word with Francis. Bellay.

About the end of the year 1540, there were ſome beginnings of a quarrel between Francis and Henry, which ended, at length, in a war. Francis ordered a fortreſs to be built at Ardres, and a bridge to be made over to the Engliſh pale; but the governor of Calais not ſuffering this incroachment, ſent a detachment of his garriſon, and beat down the bridge. The French re-built it, and the Engliſh demoliſhed it a ſecond time; whereupon, the king of France ordering marſhal de Biez to raiſe troops, in Picardy, Henry re-inforced the garriſon of Calais, and repaired the fortifications. In the interim, the two kings, willing to avoid a rupture upon ſo ſlight an occaſion, agreed to ſend commiſſioners upon the ſpot, with powers to adjuſt the difference; but this conference producing no good effect, each provided for his defence, in caſe of an attack. The beginning of a quarrel between Francis and Henry. Herbert.

It was this year, that the famous jeſuitical order was founded, by a bull of Paul III, dated the 27th of September. The order of the Jeſuites.

1541. The uneaſineſs the emperor had given Henry, for ſome time, was now almoſt vaniſhed, ſince Francis had been diſappointed, in the affair of Milan; for Henry knew, ſufficiently, that prince's temper and character, to foreſee, without much difficulty, that he would ſoon break with the emperor. A war between theſe two monarchs, could not but be advantageous to Henry; for it would, of courſe, procure him quiet, and enable him to preſerve an equality of power between them, which was the firmeſt foundation of his own and his kingdom's ſecurity. So fearing nothing from the pope, or the emperor, or the king of France, or his own ſubjects, whoſe attempts muſt be in vain, without a foreign aid, he confined himſelf, wholly to his domeſtick Henry fears nothing from the emperor and pope.

1541. domeſtick affairs. He had, chiefly, two things in view; the firſt, was, to preſerve, and even enlarge the authority he had acquired; the ſecond, to take care that no alterations ſhould be made in religion, but ſuch as he, himſelf, judged reaſonable. Theſe were the two affairs which wholly employed him. As he was poſitively bent upon theſe two points, and the parliament durſt not oppoſe his will, it may be eaſily judged, that none of his miniſters had the courage to contradict him, in any thing. So, it was himſelf, alone, that ordered every thing, according to his fancy, his council only approving his motions. However, there were in the council, as well as in the kingdom, two oppoſite parties, with reſpect to religion; but every one had, always, his eyes upon the king, to try to diſcover his thoughts, for fear of combating his opinion.

Cranmer's character. Burnet.

Archbiſhop Cranmer was at the head of the party, who wiſhed for a greater reformation. He was ſtill very much eſteemed by the king, eſpecially on account of his integrity; but ſincerity, which he profeſſed, rendered him unfit for political affairs, in a court, where, inſtead of hearkening to reaſon, juſtice, and equity, the king's inclination, only, was to be conſidered.

Audley's.

Chancellor Audley was a perſon of good ſenſe. He ſerved the reformers, when he could without danger; but he was too much a courtier, to inſiſt upon what he judged reaſonable, if the king was againſt it.

The duke of Norfolk's.

The duke of Norfolk, was as eminent for his merit, as for his birth. He was reckoned a good general, but was, ſtill, a better courtier. Ever ſubmiſſive to the king's will, he outwardly approved whatever he was pleaſed to command him; but, in private, he grieved at all the late innovations in religion, and could not endure, either the reformation, or the reformed. He would have been glad, to ſee the king reconciled to the pope; but, the ſmall hopes of their reconciliation, made him very cautious how he offended ſo unforgiving a maſter; nevertheleſs, as the king was not always in the ſame diſpoſition, the duke found frequent occaſion to ſerve his party, eſpecially, in the puniſhment of thoſe who diſliked the ſix articles, and were ſo hardy, as, publickly, to ſhew it. In ſhort, he was as head of the favourers of the pope, and the old religion; but he, carefully, concealed from the king, his inclination for the former; and as for the latter, he ſhewed his zeal only, in ſupporting what the king had retained.

Gardiner's.

Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was in the ſame ſentiments, and behaved in the ſame manner; but he was very far from being ſo much eſteemed by the king, who made uſe of him, however, becauſe he was pliant and dextrous, and had an extenſive knowledge of foreign affairs. As this knowledge rendered him of greater inſight, than the reſt of the miniſters, he, ſometimes, engaged the king in proceedings, the conſequences whereof, might be advantageous to his party, and of which the king, himſelf, did not always know the motive. By a blind ſubmiſſion to the king's will, he kept himſelf in ſome degree of favour, being convinced himſelf, and having alſo convinced his friends, that this compliance was the only means, to procure a revocation of what had been done againſt the pope. 1541.

Bonner's.

Bonner, biſhop of London, was alſo one of the heads of the ſame party, but, however, always ready to ſacrifice every thing to his fortune. He was naturally bold, paſſionate, and exceſſively cruel, as he plainly ſhewed, upon many occaſions. As he was of very little merit, he ſupported himſelf by making court to thoſe who were in favour, and, by taking the king's will for the rule of his actions.

The queen's.

Queen Catharine, blindly followed the direction of the duke of Norfolk, her uncle, and uſed what power ſhe had, over the king, to ſupport the credit of the enemies of the reformation.

Such was the ſituation of the court, when the king, freed from his foreign affairs, was wholly employed in his domeſtick concerns. However, the kingdom was in profound tranquillity, becauſe the terror with which people were ſeiſed, ſilenced all contradiction. In December, the laſt year, he began the foundation of the new biſhopricks, by converting the abbey of Weſtminſter into a biſhop's ſee. In this year, 1541, he founded three more, Cheſter, Glouceſter, and Peterborough, and the next year Oxford, and Briſtol. Theſe foundations, and ſome others of little conſequence, were the only charitable uſes to which he applied the immenſe riches acquired, by the ſuppreſſion of the abbies. His courtiers magnified theſe pious acts, whilſt others took notice of the little proportion betwe 7 or 8000 pounds a year, employed in theſe uſes, and what was acquired by the ruin of near 700 religious houſes.

Six new biſhopricks. Act. Pub.

The king declares hereticks, all thoſe who refuſe the expoſition. Herbert.

In the interim, Henry had a mind to ſhew his zeal for religion, as if his ſole view was, to procure the eternal ſalvation of his people. The book of the expoſition of Chriſtian faith being printed, he prefixed an ordinance, declaring all thoſe to be hereticks, who believed more, or leſs, than was contained in that book. However, as it was not poſſible that all ſhould conform to it, and it does not appear, any perſon ſuffered, upon that account, in the courſe of this year, it is likely, the king had intimated, that he deſired not his ordinance to be, rigorouſly, executed.

Francis prepares to make war upon the emperor. P. Daniel.

Whilſt Henry was congratulating himſelf upon triumphing over the pope, and enjoying a tranquillity, which the court of Rome had, in vain, attempted to diſturb, the eyes of all Europe were fixed, upon what paſſed between the emperor, and Francis I, and upon the preparations in Turkey. The war, between the emperor and Francis, was going to be renewed, but very unſeaſonably for the emperor, when Soliman was preparing to invade Hungary, on occaſion of the death of John de Zapol, competitor of the king of the Romans. Theſe two princes, after long contending for the crown of Hungary, being, at laſt, tired of war, were agreed, that Zapol ſhould hold, during his life, what he poſſeſſed, 1541. with the title of king, but, after his death, the crown ſhould deſcend to Ferdinand. Zapol dying, and leaving a ſon, called Stephen, under the guardianſhip of his mother, Ferdinand expected, that the treaty ſhould be executed, and would have taken poſſeſſion of all Hungary; but young Zapol's mother, implored Soliman's protection, which he readily granted, intending to improve this diſſention, to become maſter of Hungary, and penetrate, afterwards, into the imperial territories.

The emperor's artifice to divert Soliman from invading Hungary.

The emperor ſeeing Hungary threatened, with a powerful invaſion, which might be of fatal conſequence to Germany, uſed all his art to pacify the Proteſtants, without giving them, however, any ſatisfaction, endeavouring only to amuſe them, and obtain ſome aſſiſtance againſt the Turk. On the other hand, he laboured to perſuade Soliman, that he was in perfect union with the kings of France and England, that the dread of a general league, of the Chriſtian princes, might divert him from his deſign; wherefore, he tried to amuſe Francis, with putting him in hopes, he would give the Low-Countries to his ſecond ſon, and erect them into a kingdom; and, at the ſame time, he gave the Ottoman port to underſtand, this affair was, in a manner, concluded. Francis fell not into the ſnare; but hearing from all parts, that the emperor's miniſters, every where, gave out, the negotiation was on the point of concluſion, he reſolved to ſend an ambaſſador to Venice, and another to Conſtantinople, to undeceive the emperor of the Turks, and the ſenate of Venice. He choſe, for theſe ambaſſies, Rincon and Fregoſa, who ſet out, in order to paſs through Italy; but the marqueſs of Guaſto, governor of Milan, receiving advice, that they were to embarque, at Turin, and go down the Po, cauſed them to be ſo narrowly watched, that they were murdered in the boat. Francis made great noiſe about this aſſaſſination; but the emperor gave him no ſatisfaction; which was a freſh occaſion of the rupture between the two monarchs.

The Interim granted in Germany, to the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

About the ſame time, the emperor called a diet, at Ratisbon, for the 5th of April. As it was then no proper juncture to diſturb the Proteſtants, the diet reſolved, at laſt, to grant them a ſecond delay, which was called the Interim, that they might continue quiet, and, more readily, engage to furniſh ſupplies againſt the Turks.

The battle of Buda, gained by the Turks.

In the interim, the king of the Romans ordered Buda, capital of Hungary, to be inveſted, in hopes of taking it before the Turks ſhould arrive; but, the ſiege proving more difficult than was expected, the Turks had time to relieve it, and give the Germans battle, over whom they obtained a ſignal victory. Soon after, Soliman coming to Hungary, made his entry into Buda, and, under pretence of taking young Zapol under his protection, became maſter of the city, and great part of the kingdom.

In the mean while, the emperor, having ended the diet, inſtead of marching into Hungary, to aſſiſt the king, his brother, took the rout of Italy, and, embarquing, at Portovenere, with an army of 20,000 men, ſailed for Africa, to make war upon Barbaroſſa, who had made himſelf king of Algiers. This proceeding gave occaſion for many ſpeculations. It was ridiculed in the French court, as if, inſtead of fighting the Turks, he had ſought a pretence to fly from them. But as the African expedition was projected the beginning of the year, and the troops were now on the coaſt of Italy, it is certain, he would not have had time to relieve the king of the Romans, if he had attempted to march his army into Hungary. However this be, he landed his army, near Algiers, the 22d of October; but two days after, a ſudden and violent ſtorm deſtroyed part of his fleet, which accident obliged him to re-embarque, the beginning of November, after having loſt good part of his troops and ſhips. It is pretended, Francis, out of meer generoſity, would not proclaim war againſt him, whilſt employed in this expedition. It is, however, difficult to believe that Francis, who actually held intelligence with Soliman, and, afterwards, ſcrupled not to make uſe of the aſſiſtance of the Turks, ſhould ſtick at interrupting the emperor's projects againſt the Infidels of Africa. 1541. The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Henry ſaw, with pleaſure, that the king of France, and the Turks, were going to find the emperor employment, which would hinder him from thinking of England; but tho' he was eaſy in that reſpect, he was, however, in ſome pain, with regard to the king of Scotland, who, tho' his nephew had no reaſon to love him, and could eaſily aſſiſt the Engliſh male-contents, who were very numerous, in the northern counties. Henry was afraid, alſo, that a religious zeal would carry that prince, to undertake ſomething againſt him, becauſe he began to ſuffer himſelf to be governed by the churchmen, who, under colour of perſuading him to deſtroy hereſy, ſtrongly attached him to the pope's intereſt. The reformed had, now, been burned many years, in Scotland; but theſe puniſhments cauſed, there, the ſame effects as elſewhere, that is, they increaſed, inſtead of leſſening the number, and yet the clergy were, ſtill, obſtinately bent to root them out, with fire and ſword. James V, was a prince much addicted to his pleaſures, and very greedy of money; beſides, he had ſeveral natural ſons, whom he could not inrich as he wiſhed, becauſe he had exhauſted his treaſure, in needleſs expences. There were two parties in his court, whereof the one favoured the king of England, and the reformed, and the other, chiefly conſiſting of churchmen, was entirely againſt Henry, and continually ſtrove to induce the king to extirpate all, who ſwerved from the old religion. The former endeavoured to perſuade him, to imitate the king of England, his uncle, and ſecure a large revenue, by the ſuppreſſion of the abbies. The latter repreſented to him, that, by ſtrictly executing the laws againſt hereticks, he would raiſe, by forfeited eſtates, above 100,000 crowns a year. After ſome conſideration, Henry reſumes his deſign of gaining the king of Scotland. Buchanan.

Henry perceiving the king, his nephew, to be, thus, governed by perſons wholly addicted to the court of Rome, feared he would, at laſt, be led to unite againſt him, with the pope and emperor. This apprehenſion ſeemed to him the more juſt, as he could hardly rely any longer on the aſſiſtance of the king of France, who was wont to direct the court of Scotland, becauſe that ancient ally was grown extremely cold to him; whereupon, he reſolved to uſe all his art to gain the king, his nephew, and perſuade him to break, like him, with the pope. To this end, he ſent ambaſſadors to deſire an interview at York, not queſtioning, that in an amicable conference, he ſhould have eloquence enough to perſuade him to what he pleaſed. James accepted the overture, and promiſed to come to York, where Henry went and expected him; but the Scotch eccleſiaſticks, and their whole party, ſo beſtirred themſelves, to prevent this interview, the conſequence whereof they perceived, that they ſucceeded, at laſt, and prevailed with the king to find ſome pretence to be excuſed.

Henry goes and ſtays for him at York. Burnet.

In the interim, Henry, who knew nothing of this change, impatiently waited, at York, for the day appointed for the interview. In this interval, he iſſued out a proclamation, that all who had been aggrieved for want of juſtice, by any of his former miniſters, ſhould come to him and his council for redreſs. His view was to throw all paſt miſcarriages on Cromwell, and put his ſubjects, particularly the northern people, in hopes of better times; but whilſt he was preparing for the king of Scotland's reception, he received letters of excuſe, that he could not have the honour of waiting upon him. He was extremely provoked, and this refuſal, which he deemed an affront, ſoon after cauſed a breach between the two kingdoms; but his vexation, at this affair, was not comparable to the unexpected affliction he met with, upon his return to London.

The queen's lewdneſs is diſcovered. Hollingſh.

Since his laſt marriage, he daily bleſſed God for the happineſs he enjoyed with his queen, and upon all occaſions, publickly teſtified his extreme ſatisfaction; nay, during his journey to York, deſiring to give God thanks, in a manner ſuitable to the ſentiments of his heart, he ordered his confeſſor to draw up a particular thankſgiving, and prayed him to join with him in the ſame. All this ſhewed his eſteem and tender affection for the queen, who ſeemed to have the ſame fondneſs for him; but when he came to London, he heard things, which it would have been well for him never to have known. Whilſt he was at York, one John Laſſels came to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who remained at London, and told him, that his ſiſter, an old ſervant of the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, under whoſe care the queen was brought up, ſaid to him, that the queen had been very lewd before, and ſince her marriage, and that two men, among others, viz. Dirham and Mannock, had often enjoyed her. Cranmer communicating the ſecret to the lord chancellor and other privy-counſellors, it was agreed, that the archbiſhop ſhould inform the king of it, as ſoon as he returned to London, tho' they were not ignorant of the danger they expoſed themſelves to, if the accuſation could not be proved; but on this occaſion it was no leſs dangerous to be ſilent. 1541.

Cranmer informs the king of it. Burnet.

Cranmer not knowing how to execute his commiſſion, choſe to ſet it down in writing, and put it in the king's hands, deſiring him to read it in private. Henry took it, at firſt, for a calumny, reſolving in himſelf to puniſh the authors ſeverely; nay, it was with this view only, that he was pleaſed thoroughly to examine the matter, tho' with all poſſible ſecrecy, for fear of vexing the queen. He ordered, therefore, the lord privy-ſeal to examine Laſſels in private. Laſſels boldly ſtood to what he had ſaid, upon his ſiſter's report, who alſo confirmed what ſhe had told her brother. Upon theſe depoſitions, ſome pretence was uſed to arreſt Dirham and Mannock, who diſcovered, in their examination, more circumſtances than were deſired. They confeſſed not only, that they had lain with the queen, but alſo that three court ladies, her confidents, were commonly eye-witneſſes to her lewd practices. One of the three was, the lady Rochford, who accuſed the lord Rochford, her Husband, of a criminal commerce with queen Ann Bullen, his ſiſter. They farther depoſed, that the king being at Lincoln, one Culpeper, by the lady Rochford's means, was brought into the queen's chamber, at 11 a clock in the night, and ſtaid there till four in the morning, and that, when he went away, the queen gave him a gold chain and a rich cap. Moreover, the queen had taken Dirham into her ſervice, which ſhewed ſhe intended to continue the ſame courſe of life. The queen, at firſt, denied all; but in a ſecond examination ſhe confeſſed, that before marriage, ſhe had proſtituted herſelf to ſeveral men. This confeſſion ſhook the king's reſolution, who lamenting his misfortune, could not forbear burſting out into tears. In ſhort, after Dirham, Mannock, and Culpeper were condemned to die, he was pleaſed the queen's impeachment ſhould be brought before the parliament, which met the 16th of January, the next year, 1542.

1542. An act of attainder againſt the queen, and her complices. Burnet.

The commiſſioners named by the parliament to examine the queen, reported, that

* George Buchanan, the famous Scotch hiſtorian, was in danger, at this time, and would have died with the reſt, had not he eſcaped out of priſon. See his Hiſtory of Scotland, l. 14. The ſharpneſs of his Poems againſt the clergy was the cauſe of his confinement. He went beyond ſea, and lived 20 years in exile, and was forced to teach ſchool moſt part of the time. In his writings there appears not only all the beauty and graces of the Latin tongue, but a great vigour of mind, and quickneſs of thought. His ſtile is ſo natural and nervous, and his reflections on things ſo ſolid, beſides his immortal poems, that he is juſtly ſtiled the beſt of our modern authors. Burnet.

1542. the facts ſhe was accuſed of, were ſufficiently proved; whereupon both houſes declared her guilty, and petitioned the king, that ſhe might be puniſhed with death, together with the lady Rochford, complice of her lewd practices, the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, the lord William Howard and his lady, the counteſs of Bridgewater, five other women, and four men, for miſpriſion of treaſon, in concealing what they knew of the queen's vicious life. Here again may be obſerved, the ſervitude of the parliament, who did not dare to condemn the queen and her complices, without knowing whether the king would be pleaſed to ſuffer them to be puniſhed. They did not proceed in this manner, with regard to Ann Bullen and the lord Rochford, becauſe the king's authority was not arrived to that height, as at the time I am ſpeaking of. The king conſenting they ſhould be puniſhed, they were condemned to die, by an act of attainder. There was alſo a very extraordinary clauſe in the act, declaring, "That whoever knew any "thing of the incontinence of a queen, ſhould "reveal it, under the pains of treaſon; that "if the king, or his ſucceſſors, ſhould intend "to marry a woman as a virgin, if ſhe, not "being ſo, did not declare the ſame to the "king, it ſhould be high treaſon; and all "who knew it, and did not reveal it, were "guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon; that if the "queen or the princeſs of Wales ſhould pro-"cure any by meſſages or words, to know her "carnally; or any other by meſſages or words "ſhould ſollicit them; they, their counſellors "and abettors, are to be adjudged high "traytors."

The queen is beheaded. Hall.

Henry giving his aſſent to the act, by his letters patents, the queen and the lady Rochford were beheaded, on tower-hill, the 12th of February. The queen ſtood to what ſhe had confeſſed, concerning the miſcarriages of her former life, before ſhe was married; but denied, upon her ſalvation, that ſhe had ever defiled the king's bed. As for the lady Rochford, ſhe died unlamented by all; but her death and infamy ſerved, at leaſt, to raiſe again the reputation of the lord Rochford, her husband, and of queen Ann Bullen, whoſe death ſhe procured by her evidence, which her own condemnation cauſed to be univerſally ſuſpected.

The act of parliament is cenſured. Burnet.

The extreme ſeverity of the parliament to the queen's relations, was much cenſured by the publick. It was thought unnatural to puniſh a grandmother for not diſcovering her grand-daughter's incontinence. Accordingly, the king moderated the ſeverity, by pardoning her, and moſt of thoſe who were condemned, ſome of whom, however, remained long in priſon. As for the laſt clauſe, which made it treaſon for a woman, courted by the king, not to reveal the loſs of her virginity, it was turned into ridicule. People jeſtingly ſaid, the kings of England, for the future, could only marry widows, there being no reputed maid, who would run the hazard of being attainted of treaſon, in caſe the king happened not to like her.

This affair being ended, the parliament confirmed an act paſſed in Ireland, whereby that iſland was erected into a kingdom; and, from thenceforward, the kings of England inſerted among their titles, that of king of Ireland, whereas before they were ſtiled only lords.

1542. Ireland is erected into a kingdom. Herbert.

Before the parliament broke up, the king began in ſome meaſure to ſhew his intention to ſeiſe the colleges and hoſpitals, as he had done the abbies. But the execution of this deſign was very difficult; for, by the local ſtatutes of moſt of them, the governors, preſidents, or any of the fellows, had no power to ſurrender the lands belonging to their houſes, without the conſent of the whole ſociety; ſo it was not eaſy to gain whole bodies of men, who were ſo much concerned to keep the revenues, on which they ſubſiſted. It is true, the king had prevailed with ſome, who were not bound by ſuch expreſs ſtatutes, to reſign their houſes to him; but, as he had his eye upon all, an expedient was to be found, for the reſt to follow this example, without breaking their oath. To this end, all the local ſtatutes of colleges and hoſpitals were annulled by act of parliament, and the governors, preſidents, and fellows were no more to be ſworn to the obſervance thereof. This obſtacle being removed, a few more were ſurrendered to the king; but this affair was not entirely finiſhed till 1545, by a much ſhorter method.

The king deſigns to ſurpriſe the colleges and hoſpitals. Burnet.

An act to pave the way.

A diſpute concerning the verſion of the bible. Burnet.

Whilſt the king's affairs were, thus, doing, in the parliament, the convocation, which ſat at the ſame time, were much divided about the new tranſlation of the bible, that was going to be publiſhed; many affirming, it was full of faults, and to ſuffer it to be read before it was reviſed, would be very injurious to the people. Gardiner moved this diſpute, in hopes this reviſal would take up ſome time, and the king, in the interim, alter his mind. His party was ſo numerous, that he would have carried his point, if Cranmer, who perceived his deſign, had not moved the king to refer the peruſing of the tranſlation to the two univerſities, where he had much more intereſt than in the convocation. Several biſhops ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and ſome even entered a proteſtation againſt it; but all ſignified nothing, ſince the king declared it to be his pleaſure; nay, he granted, the 12th of March, a privilege to a London bookſeller to print the bible in Engliſh. This gives occaſion to preſume, the univerſities reviſed not the tranſlation, ſince it was impoſſible they ſhould have examined it, in ſo ſhort a ſpace.

The king wants the commons to offer him a ſubſidy. Stow.

The king wanted money for the war with Scotland, on which he was entirely bent, but durſt not ask the commons; not that he doubted of ſucceſs, but was afraid of alienating the hearts of his ſubjects, who were much more tender of matters of intereſt, than of all others. He wiſhed the commons would voluntarily offer him money, without being asked; and, it was in order to gain their affection, that he commanded a ſheriff to be impriſoned for arreſting a member of parliament, and offered to leave it to them to puniſh him as 1542. as they thought fit. On the other hand, he every where borrowed money to let them ſee his neceſſity; but, for once, the commons feigned not to underſtand this language, being unwilling to introduce the pernicious cuſtom of granting the king ſubſidies unasked; beſides, as they were yet ignorant of the deſign of a war with Scotland, they ſaw no occaſion to offer him money. So, the parliament broke up without granting the king any thing, except the act concerning the colleges and hoſpitals; which was a ſeed, the fruit whereof he was to gather in due ſeaſon.

Henry endeavours to hinder the king of France from aſſiſting Scotland. Herbert.

The war with Scotland being reſolved, Henry ſent Sir William Paget to France, to ſound Francis I, and try to hinder him, by ſome treaty, from aſſiſting the king of Scotland. The ambaſſador's inſtructions were, to demand of the king of France, that the treaty of perpetual peace between France and England, ſhould be renewed. Francis eaſily perceived, there was ſome hidden myſtery in this overture. As he knew Henry was diſpleaſed with the king of Scotland, he did not doubt that he deſired the peace to be renewed, on purpoſe to inſert in the new treaty, ſome article to tie up his hands, and prevent him from aiding his ally. He anſwered, therefore, that it was needleſs to renew a treaty, the conditions whereof the king of England had not performed. The ambaſſador anſwered, there was no ſort of terms in the treaty of peace, and, conſequently, his maſter could not be accuſed of breaking them. But this diſpute was entirely founded on a miſtake; for the ambaſſador underſtood by the treaty of peace, a private treaty of one ſingle article; viz. that there ſhould be a perpetual peace between France and England; but Francis meant ſome other treaties, ſigned the ſame day, and which belonged to the firſt, tho' this was written apart. It was this ſeparate treaty which Henry wanted to renew, imagining he ſhould thereby hinder Francis from aſſiſting the king of Scotland. But Francis did not deſign that, under this pretence, Henry ſhould be ſuffered to cruſh an antient ally of France, and France not be able to oppoſe it; on the contrary, he deemed it a manifeſt breach of the peace, to attack his allies, without any juſt cauſe. In the interim, as neither would mention the king of Scotland, tho' both had him in their thoughts, Francis, to embarraſs Henry, demanded, purſuant to the former treaties, his aſſiſtance to recover the Milaneſe. Henry required, on his part, that Francis, according to his promiſe, ſhould aboliſh the papal authority in France. Theſe reciprocal demands were more apt to produce a breach, than a renewal of the treaties. Beſides, the Engliſh had already begun hoſtilities, by ſeiſing ſome French ſhips which were ſuppoſed to be pyrates, and the French had detained ſome Engliſh veſſels by way of repriſal. So, the ambaſſador having taken his leave without effecting any thing, reported to his maſter, that the king of France was ill-affected to him; that is, he would not, without oppoſing it, ſuffer the king of Scotland to be oppreſſed. This was the meaning of Francis's being ill-affected to England, he being, at that time, very far from wiſhing a war with the Engliſh, ſince he was juſt going to begin another, which he much more deſired. 1542.

Ambaſſy of France to the diet, of no effect. Sleidan.

Francis was ſo provoked at all the emperor's artifices, that, to proclaim war againſt him, he only ſtaid to ſee him ſo embroiled with the Smalcaldick league, that there ſhould be no more hopes of agreement. To foment this diſſention, he had ſent ambaſſadors to the diet aſſembled at Spire, in February, under colour of clearing himſelf from the pretended calumnies he was aſperſed with, and particularly from the imputation of making an alliance with the Turks. His ambaſſadors complained to the diet, in very ſtrong terms, of the murder of Rincon and Fregoſa, pretending that Rincon was ſent to Conſtantinople, only to diſſuade Soliman from his deſign of carrying war into Germany. However, in the ſequel of their diſcourſe, they would have perſuaded the German princes, that it was their intereſt to fortify their frontier towns, and abandon Hungary to the Turks. So their preſence at the diet, having produced no great effect, they were returned very diſſatisfied.

The pope offers a council at Trent. Herbert.

Soon after their departure, the pope's nuncio offered to the diet, in his maſter's name, a council at Trent. The Catholicks gladly accepted the offer, and thanked the nuncio; but the Proteſtants rejected it, becauſe they would not have a council called by their adverſary, and in a ſuſpicious place, ſince the city of Trent belonged to the king of the Romans. The diet, however, ended to the emperor's and Ferdinand's ſatisfaction, after having unanimouſly reſolved to give them a powerful aſſiſtance, under the conduct of the elector of Brandenburg.

The calling of the council of Trent.

Tho' the Proteſtants refuſed the pope's offer, Paul III. called a council at Trent, for November following, by a bull of the 22d of May; but this was only to amuſe the world; for he knew, that when a war between the emperor and France, was going to commence, there would be obſtacles enough to hinder the council from aſſembling.

Francis invades the emperor in five places. Bellay.

And, indeed, at this very time Francis I. was bringing five armies into the field, to attack the emperor in five places at once; viz. in Rouſillon, Luxemburgh, Piedmont, Flanders, and Brabant. But the ſucceſs anſwered not his expectations; for the great effort he made this year, to invade his enemy, ſerved only to diſable him to do the like again, when he came himſelf to be attacked. The dauphin beſieged Perpignan, in vain; the duke of Orleans, his brother, took Luxemburgh and Montmedy; but theſe places were retaken before the end of the campaign; and, as for the other three armies, they performed nothing conſiderable.

Heny reſolves upon a war with Scotland. Buchanan.

Whilſt Francis was vainly endeavouring to be revenged of the emperor, Henry came to a final reſolution to make war upon Scotland. He had been in hopes, that in the expected conference with the king, his nephew, he 1542. ſhould perſuade him to renounce the papal authority, and was extremely concerned to ſee himſelf diſappointed. This affair ſeemed to him of the utmoſt importance, becauſe not having much to fear from abroad, where the naval forces were not comparable to his, Scotland was the only country which could give him any uneaſineſs. From thence alone could the Engliſh male-contents receive any ſuccours, and he remembred with terror, the danger he ſhould have run when the rebels were in arms in the north, had they been ſupported by a Scotch army. In his war, therefore, upon Scotland, his view was not to make conqueſts, but to bend the king of Scotland to his will, by force, ſince he could not do it by fear means; which he deemed abſolutely neceſſary, in order to procure a ſettled peace. At the time of the northern rebellion, the junctures were very favourable to him; for, being then in ſtrict union with France, king James could not engage to ſupport the Engliſh male-contents without Francis's conſent, who inſtead of approving ſuch a deſign, would have rather diverted him from it; but affairs were now upon another foot, ſince Henry could no longer rely upon the king of France's friendſhip. It is true, that prince was not to be much feared, whilſt at war with the emperor; but he conſidered, that the equality of theſe two monarch's forces would, probably, oblige them to make peace very ſoon, and this peace, in which no doubt the pope would interpoſe, neceſſarily be to his prejudice; nay, it was a queſtion whether it would not occaſion a league againſt him, and the king of Scotland join in it. In that caſe, England could be invaded in the north, with more eaſe, as the northern counties were moſt inclined to rebel. It was, therefore, of very great conſequence to Henry, to gain the king of Scotland to his intereſt, ſince, being ſecured from that ſide, an invaſion was not to be much feared, which he looked upon as impoſſible, conſidering the ſuperiority of his naval forces.

He intended to make uſe of two ways to gain the king of Scotland, in the propoſed conference. The firſt way was, to ſhew him, that it was in his power to ſecure to him the ſucceſſion of the crown of England, after his ſon Edward, or remove him from it, ſince, by the act of parliament made for that purpoſe, he could call to the ſucceſſion, his daughters Mary and Elizabeth, or exclude them for ever. In the former caſe, king James could not pretend to the crown, till after the poſterity of theſe two princeſſes was extinct; but in the latter caſe, he came immediately after prince Edward. As, therefore, to gain two degrees, was a conſiderable advantage for the king of Scotland, Henry hoped he would not be ſo unwiſe as to ſlight it. The ſecond way he deſigned to make uſe of, to win that prince, was to lay before him the advantages which would accrue to him, in caſe he renounced the pope, as well by reaſon of the facility this would give him, to ſucceed to the crown of England, if there ſhould be occaſion, as by the riches he would acquire in ſuppreſſing the monaſteries of Scotland. As James was very greedy of money, Henry did not queſtion ſucceeding by this ſecond means, tho' the firſt ſhould prove ineffectual. He was, therefore, extremely vexed to ſee himſelf diſappointed of his hopes, by the king his nephew's refuſal to meet him at York. He found the new queen had too grat an influence over him, and even ſuſpected it to be the effect of the intrigues of the pope, the emperor, and perhaps, the king of France. So, deſpairing to ſucceed in his project, by fair means, he reſolved to try to accompliſh it by force. 1542.

The deſign of the war.

Scotland was little able to reſiſt England, without the aſſiſtance of France; but Francis was ſo employed, that there was no likelihood of his interpoſing in the quarrel; Henry hoped therefore, if he could gain, at firſt, ſome advantage, he ſhould render the Scots leſs intractable, and more eaſily diſpoſe the king, his nephew, to hearken to his propoſals. Thus, the war he intended to wage with Scotland, was properly deſigned to oblige the Scots to a compliance with his deſires, and not founded upon caprice only, or to be revenged of the affront he received, as the hiſtorians pretend. However, as he could not diſcover the real motives, without doing himſelf a prejudice, he pretended a violation of the truce, James's denial of ſome lands of ſmall value, lying on the frontiers, and his reception of ſome Engliſh rebels. But as all this was not very capable of deceiving the world, he bethought himſelf of reviving the old pretenſions of the kings of England, to the ſovereignty of Scotland. To that purpoſe, he ſet out a long declaration, in which was inſerted the memorial largely ſpoken of, in the reigns of Edward I, and Henry VII, containing the pretended proofs of the homage, Scotland had formerly paid to England. This declaration was, however, ſo ambiguouſly expreſſed, that it plainly appeared, Henry was willing to have it in his power to quit his pretenſions, without injuring his honour. It is entirely needleſs to repeat the contents of the memorial; it will ſuffice to obſerve, that the Engliſh writers ſpeak of it, as if the ſovereignty of the kings of England over Scotland was there demonſtrated, and the bare citation of it ſufficient to carry the cauſe. Doctor Burnet, tho' a Scotchman, ſeems to give into this opinion, univerſally ſpread in England, ſince he ſpeaks of this memorial in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, without making any remarks. Perhaps, he did not think proper to combat the ſentiments of the Engliſh without any neceſſity, in reſpect to his Hiſtory.

A war with Scotland. Herbert.

Henry publiſhed not his declaration, till his army, was juſt entering Scotland. His deſign was to ſurpriſe the Scots, which he believed the more eaſy, as there appeared to be no juſt cauſe of breach between the two kingdoms. However, king James hearing that ſoldiers were raiſing in England, put himſelf in a poſture of defence, in caſe he ſhould be attacked. In the interim, he ſent two ambaſſadors to the king, his uncle, to ſee to content him, if poſſible, or, at leaſt, to gain time, till the king of 1542. of France could aſſiſt him. Theſe ambaſſadors were long detained, at the court of England, upon frivolous pretences, and whilſt Henry was making his preparations, he gave them no anſwer; nay, they were not ſuffered to return, but with the army, which was to enter their country, commanded by the duke of Norfolk, and where they were as priſoners. Two other ambaſſadors of Scotland, who were going to London, meeting the Engliſh upon their march, were alſo detained, till the army arrived at Berwick.

Buchanan. Burnet. Hall.

In the interim, king James hearing the duke of Norfolk was marching towards the north, at the head of 20,000 men, ſent a body of 10,000 to the frontiers, commanded by George Gordon, expecting the reſt of the troops, who were marching from ſeveral parts to join him. But Gordon could not hinder the duke of Norfolk from entering Scotland, about the end of October, and ravaging the country north of the Tweed. After this ſhort expedition, the Engliſh army retired to Berwick, the ſeaſon which was now very bad, preventing them from advancing any farther. In the mean time, king James ordered the lord Maxwell to march with 15000 men, whilſt the Engliſh were retiring to Berwick. The Scots pretend, upon the news of Maxwell's march, the Engliſh retreated in ſuch confuſion, that they might have been eaſily defeated, if, Gordon had ventured to attack them, and that the king was extremely angry with him for this diſappointment. However this be, James heading his army, in perſon, held a council of war, and appeared fully reſolved to give battle, let what would be the conſequence. But he was alone of that opinion. On the contrary, the danger to which the kingdom would be expoſed, in caſe of a defeat, was ſtrongly repreſented to him. In ſhort, as he would not alter his reſolution, the generals and nobles told him, they would not obey him, if, without any neceſſity, he obſtinately expoſed the kingdom to ſo manifeſt a hazard. This oppoſition threw him into a fury. He ſwore he would puniſh their diſobedience, and called them all traytors, ſince they hindered him from obtaining, as he thought, a certain victory. Cardinal Beaton inſpired him with this notion, by telling him, it was impoſſible for ſuch hereticks as the Engliſh, to conquer him. The truth is, James was a little diſturbed in his fancy, ever ſince he had unjuſtly put to death a nephew of the duke of Albany, whoſe apparition was ever preſent to his imagination. So being extremely troubled to be thus diſobeyed, he left the command of the army to the lord Maxwell, with orders to march towards the enemy, and remained himſelf within diſtance to joyn him, in caſe there was occaſion to fight. But a few days after, as he was extremely incenſed with his generals, and grealy miſtruſted them, he gave a commiſſion, in ſorm, to Oliver Sinclair, his minion, to command the army. The new general, very unfit for ſuch a poſt, repairing to the camp, cauſed his patent to be publickly read, at which all were offended. This bred ſuch diſcontent among the troops, that they began to disband, when a body of 500 Engliſh horſe appeared on a hill, where they were poſted to watch the motions of the enemy. This ſight increaſed the confuſion among the Scotch troops, who imagined the whole Engliſh army was approaching to give battle. In this condition, being without a general, ſince Maxwell's commiſſion was revoked, and none would obey Sinclair, they choſe to retire in a fright, which permitted them not to look back, and obſerve the ſmall number of their enemies. The Engliſh horſe ſeeing them fly, with ſuch precipitation, cloſely purſued them, and without meeting any reſiſtance, ſlew great numbers, took priſoners ſeven lords, 200 gentlemen, 800 ſoldiers, with 24 pieces of ordnance. Never was victory ſo eaſily won. Among the chief priſoners were, the earls of Glencairn and Caſſilis, the lords Maxwell, Somerville, Oliphant, Gray, and Oliver Sinclair, the king's favourite.

The rout of the Scotch army. Buchanan.

The news of this rout, threw king James into a diſmal melancholy, to which he was already too much inclined. He fancied, his generals and nobles had betrayed him, and, in this belief, reſolved to put moſt of them to death. His vexation was ſtill increaſed, upon hearing that a herald, ſent by the duke of Norfolk, was murdered by an Engliſh refugee. He, immediately, apprehended the ill conſequences of ſuch an accident, after his late misfortune. So imagining it would be impoſſible to free himſelf from his preſent embarraſſment, he could not withſtand his immoderate grief, which brought him to his grave, the 14th of December, 1542. His death happened ſeven days after the birth of a princeſs, called Mary, of whom his queen was delivered, and who was his only heir. A little before, he loſt two ſons in one day.

The king of Scotland is reſolved to fight.

The nobles refuſe to follow him. Buchanan.

Henry not knowing what paſſed in Scotland, had ordered the Scotch priſoners to be brought to London, where they arrived the 19th of December; and the next day, they were conducted thro' the city from the tower where they had been confined, to Weſtminſter, where the king was pleaſed to ſee and talk with them. He expoſtulated with them, for having, by their pernicious counſels, perſuaded their king to quarrel with him, and told them they juſtly bore the puniſhment of a war, raiſed by themſelves. Nevertheleſs, as he intended to make uſe of them to procure ſuch a peace as he deſired, he ended his diſcourſe with ſome obliging expreſſions, and granted them more liberty, by putting them in the cuſtody of ſeveral noblemen. The earl of Caſſilis had the good fortune to fall into the hands of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to receive from him, during his ſhort ſtay at London, ſuch inſtructions as induced him to embrace the reformation, when he returned to his own country.

A few days after, the news of the birth of Mary, princeſs of Scotland, and of the king her father's death arriving together, Henry thought it a favourable juncture to unite Scotland to England, by marrying his ſon Edward to the new queen of Scotland. He cauſed the captive

This condition being accepted, they were conducted to Newcaſtle, from whence they returned into their country. We ſhall ſee, preſently, what was the iſſue of this project.

1543. The parliament; grants the king a ſubſidy. Herbert.

The parliament of England meeting the 22d of January, granted the king a ſubſidy, as well for his charges in the war with Scotland, as for his other occaſions. By that was meant, a war with France, of which there was no longer room to doubt, ſince the king was upon the point of concluding a league with the emperor. The union which was going to be formed between theſe two monarchs, was like to be ſo favourable to the adherents of Rome and the old religion, that they queſtioned not but the deſtruction of the reformation, in England, was approaching. However, at this very time they had the mortification to ſee an act of parliament paſſed, which much checked their hopes. This act, moved, and at length obtained by Cranmer, ran, that lords, gentlemen, merchants, might have, in their houſes, an Engliſh bible, with ſome other religious books, mentioned in the act, for the inſtruction of their families; but it was expreſly forbid to print, ſell, buy, or keep any other religious books, and to preach or ſpeak againſt the ordinance of the year 1540. There was alſo a very conſiderable clauſe, in this ſtatute, that the offenders, if eccleſiaſticks, ſhould not be condemned to be burnt, till the third offence; and the puniſhment of the laity, not extend beyond forfeiture of goods and chattels, and perpetual impriſonment. Moreover, the act allowed the party accuſed, to bring witneſſes for his own purgation, which had never been practiſed before, in the caſe of hereſy. Laſtly, it was enacted, that the accuſed ſhould be tried within a year, at fartheſt, after the indictment. But on the other hand, the law of the ſix articles was confirmed, and the parliament left it in the king's power to annul or alter the act, at his pleaſure. By this laſt clauſe, the king ſtill continued to be maſter of the lives of the reformed, ſince by repealing this act, he could proſecute them upon the former ſtatutes.

Henry concludes a league with the emperor. Act. Pub.

A fortnight after the parliament broke up, Henry concluded with the emperor, a league, which, however, was not publiſhed till June. It was not the intereſt of England, that the king ſhould join with the emperor to render him more powerful, he being already but too potent. On the contrary, it would have been much more proper, in order to keep the balance even, to have aſſiſted France; at leaſt, it is undeniable, that a neutrality would have been advantageous to the Engliſh. But the king's paſſion ran counter to the nation's intereſt. He was extremely diſſatisfied with Francis, upon ſeveral accounts. In the firſt place, he obſerved in him a great indifference for his concerns, ever ſince he had not wanted his aſſiſtance. Secondly, he perceived, at length, that all his promiſes to renounce, like him, the papal authority, tended only to amuſe him. He knew, Francis, on ſeveral occaſions, had blamed his conduct, with reſpect to religion; and ridiculed his marriages. In the next place, he paid neither the yearly penſion of 100,000 crowns, nor that of 10,000 for the ſalt of Brouage, tho' bound by divers treaties. As for the debt of 2,000,000, Francis, indeed, could produce acquittances for good part of that ſum, but then Henry had received no money, the acquittances being in lieu of the ſuccours he had voluntarily promiſed to lend him, in his former wars. However, there was a round ſum ſtill left unpaid, and the debtor never endeavoured to ſatisfy him. Moreover, Henry had preſented the king of France with what was due to him from the emperor, ſolely on condition he would perform the treaties, and complained, Francis had not been punctual. But what moſt offended Henry, was, the obſtacles Francis had raiſed him, in Scotland, by means of a faction, which openly oppoſed his deſigns. Here was ſufficient cauſe for a breach, if the nation's intereſt had been the ſame with the king's; but in ſuch an oppoſition, ſeldom does it happen that the people's advantage prevails over the ſovereign's. Henry reſolved, therefore, to make the king of France ſenſible, that it was worth his while to have ſhewn a greater regard for him, and to this end, choſe to be reconciled with the emperor, and join in a league with him. 1543.

The advantages of this league on the emperor's ſide.

Charles V. deſired nothing more earneſtly; for he plainly ſaw, that with the aſſiſtance of England, he ſhould ſoon bring the king of France to reaſon, and deſtroy all his hopes of recovering Milan by arms. His conſtant fear of Henry's uniting with France and the German Proteſtants, cauſed him to conſider the alliance with England, as what would enable him to accompliſh his ambitious deſigns. He found his account much better in hindering Francis from ſetting foot again in Italy, and, in ſubduing the Proteſtants, than in executing, or rather in trying to execute the pope's ſentence againſt Henry; an undertaking which, probably, would not have ended to his honour. Beſides, the death of queen Catharine, his aunt, had much leſſened, and it may be entirely ſtifled, his deſire to revenge her. So, at the very time he was complaining to all the princes of Europe, that Francis held private intelligence with the Infidels, he ſcrupled not to court the alliance of an excommunicated king, who, according to the principles of the Romiſh church, ought not to have been looked upon with leſs horror than the Turk. One ſingle difficulty retarded the concluſion of this alliance. The emperor would have Mary, queen Catharine's daughter, acknowledged for legitimate, which Henry obſtinately refuſed; nay, he could not grant it without condemning his divorce with Catharine, and all his proceedings upon that occaſion. He promiſed, however, that purſuant to the power granted him by parliament, he would give Mary a place in the ſucceſſion; but would never conſent, this article ſhould be inſerted in the treaty. The emperor's 1543. emperor's friends, in England, adviſed him to be ſatisfied with this verbal promiſe, apprehenſive as they were that the league, from whence they expected great advantages, would be delayed by this obſtacle. Bonner, biſhop of London, who had been ſent into Spain for this negotiation, willingly and ardently endeavoured to accompliſh it, in hopes, that an union between the emperor and the king, would re-eſtabliſh religion, in England, upon the ſame foot as before the divorce.

The treaty of league between the emperor and Henry. Act. Pub.

The treaty was, therefore, concluded at London, the 11th of February, 1543. It contained a league for England only, with what Henry held in Picardy; and on the emperor's part, for the provinces of the Low-Countries under his dominion, without any mention of Spain or Germany. The league was to this effect:

That the emperor and the king of England ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to the king of France, to declare to him, that by his ſollicitations only the Turks had invaded Chriſtendom; that, therefore, the two confederate monarchs exhorted him to break his alliance with the Infidels, to hold them for enemies, and renounce his correſpondence with them. That they demanded, moreover, he ſhould ſatisfy the damages done to Chriſtendom, by his calling in thoſe cruel enemies; that he ſhould give over the war he had begun in ſeveral places, that the emperor might apply himſelf to the defence of Chriſtendom; that he ſhould cauſe the town of Maran, taken by the Turks, to be reſtored to king Ferdinand, and to the emperor, Caſtro-novo, which they had beſieged with the aſſiſtance of 12 French gallies; that he ſhould repair the loſſes the Germans had ſuſtained by the Turkiſh invaſion; and laſtly, that he ſhould ſatisfy the king of England for whatever he owed him, and give him ſecurity for the payment of the 100,000 crowns.

After theſe preliminaries, the two confederate monarchs agreed, that they would not make peace or truce, but upon theſe conditions; that Francis ſhould pay the king of England whatever was due to him, and for ſecurity of the yearly penſion, ſurrender into his hands the earldom of Ponthieu, Boulogne, Montreuil, Ardres and Terouenne, free from all homage, for which, however, Henry ſhould conſent that the annual revenues thence ariſing, ſhould be in lieu of the penſion; moreover, that Francis ſhould reſtore to the emperor, the duchy of Burgundy.

That, if the king of France ſhould delay but 10 days to accept theſe conditions, the two confederate monarchs ſhould proclaim war againſt him, with a declaration that they would never make peace, till the king of England was in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Guienne, and the kingdom of France, and the emperor of Abbeville, Amiens, Bray, Corbeil, Peronne, Ham, St. Quintin, and the whole duchy of Burgundy.

Laſtly, They agreed, that each ſhould take the field, and invade France with 25000 men, of whom 5000 ſhould be cavalry.

* This is Buchanan's character of him. Rapin.

1543. Theſe were vaſt projects; but theſe princes were too wiſe to imagine, that with 25000 men each, they were able to conquer France; wherefore, it is likely they agreed in the treaty, to bring into the field ſo ſmall a number of troops, only to engage Francis to make preparations accordingly. And, indeed, we ſhall ſee hereafter, that they invaded France with above 100,000 men. 1543.

Henry's chief view.

One of the chief reaſons why Henry joined in a league with the emperor, was to find the king of France ſo much employment at home, that it ſhould not be in his power to break his meaſures, for the union of Scotland with England, by a marriage between Mary and prince Edward. Henry had this affair extremely at heart, and very juſtly, as it is eaſy to imagine; but unhappily for him, there was a queen dowager, in Scotland, of the houſe of Lorrain, and a cardinal archbiſhop of St. Andrews, who being both devoted to France and the pope, laboured with all their power to defeat his projects. As the affairs of Scotland will be very ſoon intermixt with thoſe of England, it is abſolutely neceſſary to ſee what paſſed in that country, after the deceaſe of James V, without which it would be very difficult to underſtand what will be ſaid hereafter.

The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

After the death of James V, Scotland was in a very ill ſituation. The late king had not ſettled the regency during his daughter's minority. The next heir to Mary, was James Hamilton, earl of Arran, a perſon of a very mean genius, a lover of books and eaſe, but little capable of managing the publick affairs, and ſtill leſs thoſe of war*. He had ſhewn ſome inclination for the new religion, and thereby rendered himſelf as much ſuſpected and odious to the clergy, as agreeable to thoſe who had embraced the reformation. The queen dowager, ſiſter to the cardinal of Lorrain and the duke of Guiſe, had an extreme averſion to the reformed; and this averſion was cheriſhed, by cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, a violent and cruel man, who had already given ſeveral proofs of his barbarous temper, towards thoſe who embraced the new religion. Moſt of the lords who, by their counſels, could have ſupported the ſtate in ſuch a juncture, where either ſlain in the late rout, or in the hands of the Engliſh. But tho' they had been alive, or in Scotland, it would have been very difficult to ſucceed; for there had long been ſuch a diviſion among the nobles, that what one moved was ſure to be oppoſed by another. This was the conſequence of the factions, raiſed by the kings of France and England, in the kingdom, and which were continued by different opinions in religion. To all theſe evils was added that of a war againſt a powerful neighbour, who had juſt gained a very conſiderable advantage, and could eaſily improve the conſternation, all Scotland was under.

In the midſt of this confuſion, cardinal Beaton ſeeing none able to withſtand him, formed the deſign of ſeiſing the regency. To this end, he forged a will for the late king, wherein he 1543. was appointed regent or viceroy, during Mary's minority, with three counſellors, or aſſiſtants, of whom the earl of Arran was one, and cauſed it to be publiſhed, till the parliament ſhould meet and confirm it. In the interim, he ſtrove by all ſorts of ways, to gain proper perſons to ſupport him, as well among the people, as among the great men. The queen dowager was the firſt that declared for him.

But, whilſt the cardinal was labouring to ſtrengthen his party, the friends and relations of the earl of Arran, were earneſtly ſolliciting him, not to yield the regency to one who had no right to it. They repreſented to him, that the will, on which the cardinal grounded his pretenſions, was a forgery, becauſe the late king never valued him, ſo as to commit the regency to him, to the prejudice of the princes of the blood; that it was a contrivance to deſtroy the Hamiltons, with their whole party, and hinder the progreſs of the reformation; that the cardinal was known to be a man of ill principles, of little or no conſcience, cruel, and ſuperſtitious, and, if once he had the power in his hand, the flames of perſecution would quickly be kindled, all over the kingdom, not only againſt the reformed, but againſt all, in general, who would not, blindly, ſubmit to his orders; that, infallibly, the princes of the blood, and the chief of the nobles, would be firſt ſacrificed to his ambition and jealouſy. The earl of Arran was of a peaceable temper, and without ambition; for, if he had followed his own inclination, he would have left the cardinal, quietly, to enjoy the authority he had uſurped; but his friends having, in a manner, forced him, by their remonſtrances, to proſecute the right due to his birth, he reſolved to demand the regency, and ſhew the forgery of the pretended will, on which the cardinal reſted.

Hall. Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the priſoners, who had been releaſed, came to Scotland, and, with them, Archibald Douglaſs, earl of Angus, and William Douglaſs, his brother, who had been 15 years exiles, in England. By their arrival, the earl of Arran's party was, conſiderably, ſtrengthened, whereas the cardinal loſt many followers, who had joined with him more out of fear than affection. It was publickly ſaid, that the earl of Arran's right was indiſputable, tho' the king had capriciouſly diſpoſed of the regency, in favour of the cardinal, which, however, was incredible. The parliament meeting, in March, the will was examined, and, the forgery being detected, the cardinal was removed, and, the earl of Arran declared regent, with, almoſt, unanimous conſent. It was not without reaſon, that moſt of the lords and nobles, were deſirous to free themſelves from the dominion of cardinal Beaton; for, before the parliament met, a paper was found, written with the king's own hand, wherein were ſet down, the names of 300 lords and gentlemen, whom he had reſolved to diſpatch. As moſt of theſe, proſcribed perſons, were of the reformed religion, or favoured the reformation, it was not doubted, that the cardinal had, greatly, contributed, to put the king upon this barbarous reſolution, by repreſenting to him, that thoſe who had refuſed to fight againſt the Engliſh, were ſecret friends of the king of England, and favourers of the new opinions. It is certain, many of the nobility were of the reformed religion, or well-wiſhers to the reformation. The earl of Arran was of this number, and upon that account was ſo well ſupported, when he demanded the regency, becauſe thoſe of the new religion intended to make him their protector; but this was an ill choice, the earl's unactive and timorous temper rendering him very unfit to ſupport the party, who put themſelves under his protection. 1543.

Whilſt the parliament was ſitting, Henry ſent an ambaſſador to Scotland, to propoſe the marriage of prince Edward, his ſon, with the young queen, according to the agreement with the captive lords. The ambaſſador was furniſhed with a good ſum of money, to facilitate the negotiation, Henry knowing, by experience, how effectual that means was in Scotland. The queen and cardinal Beaton, uſed all their credit and addreſs, to cauſe the overture to be rejected; but, as their party was too weak, to balance the king of England's, the cardinal made it his buſineſs, to confound all the conferences held upon this occaſion, by long ſpeeches, affected diſputes, invectives againſt the contrary party, with deſign to raiſe quarrels, which would obſtruct the concluſion of this affair. His artifices being, at laſt, perceived, he was confined to a room, till the debates were ended. The moment the cardinal no longer appeared, the king of England's propoſal was accepted, without much difficulty, and the parliament appointed ambaſſadors to go and treat, at London, with the king, concerning a peace, and the marriage. George Douglaſs, the earl of Angus's brother, and ſome other lords, were charged with this negotiation, which ended, at length, in two treaties, concluded at London, the 1ſt of July, 1543. The firſt was, to ſettle a good and firm peace between the two kingdoms; and the ſecond, for the marriage of prince Edward, with the young queen of Scotland. Henry did all he could, to have Mary put into his hands; but the Scotch ambaſſadors not conſenting, it was, at laſt, agreed, ſhe ſhould not be brought into England, till ſhe was 10 years of age; that, in the interim, the parliament of Scotland ſhould appoint four lords, to take care of her education, and Henry might add a fifth, of his own nation, to convey his advices to the governors; that the parliament of Scotland ſhould give the king ſix hoſtages of diſtinction, for ſecurity, that the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

A treaty between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

This affair being ended, the cardinal had a little more liberty granted him, by being given in cuſtody to the lord Seaton; but that lord, ſuffering himſelf to be corrupted by his priſoner, afforded him means to make his eſcape. As ſoon as he was at liberty, he uſed all Buchanan.

1543. all his art to break the treaties with England, wherein he was, powerfully, aſſiſted by the queen dowager; and, as they were both firmly attached to France, and the old religion, they could not ſee, without extreme grief, the alliance lately concluded with a prince, whom they looked upon as a heretick, and whoſe intereſts had, for ſome time, been contrary to thoſe of Francis I. They plainly perceived, this alliance was capable of producing great alterations, as well in church, as ſtate, and would, infallibly, deſtroy the antient union between France and Scotland. To prevent this, the cardinal aſſembled, at his houſe, the heads of the clergy, and repreſenting to them, that religion was in danger, he obtained a large contribution, to aſſiſt him, to ſupport it. This money ſerved him to maintain his creatures, and gain ſome of the contrary party. In a word, he ſo well caballed, that he, quickly, put things in extreme confuſion. By his ſollicitations, and intrigues, he ſo managed, that the priſoners, who had been releaſed, reſolved not to go and redeem their hoſtages. The earl of Caſſilis, alone, could not be prevailed with, upon any conſideration to break his word. In ſhort, the cardinal's party being grown very numerous, by his liberalities, ſtrongly oppoſed the ſending of the hoſtages promiſed to the king of England, by the treaty. Beſides this, the cardinal reſolving, at any rate, to ſet the two nations at variance, cauſed the Engliſh ambaſſador to be highly affronted, by ſome of his party, and his ſervants to be inſulted. But the ambaſſador, knowing how deſirous the king, his maſter, was, that the treaties ſhould be executed, bore all with patience, for fear of raiſing an unſeaſonable quarrel, which he ſaw to be the cardinal's deſign. Thus, the cardinal had brought things to ſuch a paſs, that the regent, who wanted reſolution, tried, in vain, to ſtop theſe violent proceedings, ſince his commands were, openly, diſobeyed.

At laſt, the day being come, that the three hoſtages were to be delivered, the Engliſh ambaſſador demanded them of the regent, complaining, withal, of the affronts he had received. The regent told him, "He was "very ſorry any diſreſpect had been ſhewn "to his perſon, and character, and would "give him, at a more convenient ſeaſon, "what ſatisfaction he deſired, but, at preſent, it was no proper juncture; that he "was, himſelf, witneſs of the troubles raiſed "by the cardinal, and how contemptible the "authority of the government was rendered, "by that prelate's cabals; as for the hoſtages, it was no longer in his power to put "them into his hands, ſince the cardinal, and "his whole party, were againſt it, who were, "now, grown too ſtrong to be compelled." The ambaſſador was, ſufficiently, convinced of the truth of what the regent ſaid; and, as he ſaw little appearance of a change in favour of the king, his maſter, he contented himſelf with ſummoning the priſoners to return to England, according to their promiſe. But in that, he ſucceeded no better; for they refuſed to return, tho' they were releaſed only upon parole. The earl of Caſſilis, alone, abhorring the perfidiouſneſs of his fellow-priſoners, ſet out for London, and put himſelf into the king's hands. This action met with its due reward; for Henry very civilly received the earl, commending his faithfulneſs, and, making him rich preſents, diſmiſſed him without ranſom. In the interim, finding his party in Scotland was neither very ſtrong, nor firm enough to his intereſt, he reſolved to proclaim war with that kingdom. He might eaſily have ſubdued it, ſome months before, if he would have taken advantage of the conſternation of the Scots, after their defeat, and the death of their ſovereign. 1543.

The queen and the cardinal, having accompliſhed their enterpriſe, with reſpect to a rupture with England, conſidered of means to procure the government of the kingdom, by ſupplanting the earl of Arran, head of the contrary faction. Indeed, they did not much fear the earl, as they had lately ſhewn; but he bore the title of regent, and very poſſibly, by the counſels of the able men of his party, and the king of England's aſſiſtance, he might find means, in the end, to make himſelf formidable. The war, Henry had juſt proclaimed againſt Scotland, afforded them an opportunity to execute their project. They repreſented to the king of France, "That it was "almoſt impoſſible for Scotland, to maintain "a war againſt England, without a powerful "aſſiſtance from him; that the earl of Arran, regent of the kingdom, favoured the "Engliſh; and, inſtead of oppoſing them, "would certainly make uſe of them, to "eſtabliſh his authority, and compleat the "queen's projected marriage; that, probably, "this marriage would break the old alliance "between France and Scotland, and produce a "ſtrict union between Scotland and England; "that he might plainly ſee, how much he "was, himſelf, concerned in a war, which, "as it would, infallibly, be unſucceſsful, "would cauſe him to loſe Scotland; that, "indeed, they perceived how difficult it was "for him to aſſiſt them, when he wanted all "his forces againſt the emperor; but they "had deviſed an expedient to gain time, in "breaking the meaſures of the contrary party. The expedient was, that he ſhould "ſend over Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox, who was in France, that they might "oppoſe him to the Hamiltons, whoſe ſworn "enemy he was, becauſe they had killed his "father; that this lord, being in Scotland, "would be, immediately, acknowledged for "head of the party, againſt the regent, and, "by the aſſiſtance they were ready to ſend "him, would become ſo ſuperior, that it "would not be poſſible for the regent to execute his deſigns, in favour of England." The better to perſuade the earl of Lenox to come to Scotland, they put him in hopes of marrying the queen dowager, and of being placed on the throne, in caſe the young queen died before ſhe was married. They told him, this would be ſo much the eaſier, as before the 1543. the birth of Mary, the late king had deſigned him for his ſucceſſor, tho' farther removed than the earl of Arran, becauſe he looked upon this laſt as a baſtard, by reaſon of the unlawfulneſs of his father's marriage. Theſe remonſtrances had the deſired effect. Francis I, glad to ſtrengthen his party in Scotland, without being forced to ſend great ſupplies, ſent away the earl of Lenox, with all ſpeed, promiſing him his protection.

The cardinal hinders the regent from having the queen's perſon in his power.

In the interim, the regent having ſome notice of this project, reſolved to ſupport himſelf, by becoming maſter of the queen's perſon, then in the caſtle of Limnuch, or Linlithgoe; but as he was not ſecret enough, the cardinal, who was informed of it, came to Linlithgoe well attended, in order to hinder the queen's removal. Soon after, the earl of Lenox arrived from France, and after ſaluting the regent, withdrew to his own houſe where he aſſembled his friends, to conſult with them what was beſt to be done. He acquainted them with the motives of his return, and the hopes given him of being put in poſſeſſion of the regency, the queen-mother, if the young queen happened to die. The friends he conſulted, being all enemies to the regent, they unanimouſly adviſed him to improve the preſent opportunity, and each made him an offer of his perſon, his eſtate, his vaſſals, and his friends. So the earl being determined to purſue his point, drew together 4000 men, and putting himſelf at their head, came to the queen, under pretence of guarding her againſt the attempts of the regent, for fear ſhe ſhould be delivered to the enemies of the kingdom. Indeed, the earl of Arran had reſolved to ſecure her, nay, was preparing to execute his deſign; but when he found himſelf prevented, and conſidered, the queen could not be got out of the hands of the earl of Lenox, without coming to an open war, he ſent to treat of an agreement. Lenox conſented, on condition the queen ſhould for the future, be educated in Sterling-caſtle, and four neutral lords, whom both parties could equally truſt, appointed to guard her, and take care of her education. The four lords being choſen and approved of, the queen was removed to Sterling-caſtle, where, a few days after, ſhe was crowned.

The regent fides with the queen and the cardinal.

The regent ſeeing the party of his enemies daily gathered ſtrength, believed himſelf unable to withſtand the ſtorm, which was forming againſt him; ſo, his courage and reſolution failing him, when moſt wanted, he choſe to give way to the torrent, rather than ſtrive, in vain, as he thought, to reſiſt it. Perſuaded as he was, that he ſhould be too weak to oppoſe the queen-mother and the cardinal, he believed he ought to alter his meaſures, and ſtrictly unite with them. But even here, he met with difficulties, which he could not ſurmount, without acting againſt his conſcience; for he had, hitherto, almoſt openly profeſſed the new religion; but the queen and the cardinal, as they could not reſolve to be reconciled to him, ſo long as he was engaged in the party of the reformed, managed him ſo well, that, at laſt, they perſuaded him to abjure, in the church of the Franciſcans, at Sterling. By this action, he loſt all his old friends, and was reduced to depend upon the contrary party, with whom the cardinal had more power than himſelf. From thenceforward, he was wholly guided by the counſels of that prelate, who was the true regent, whilſt the earl, that bore the name, was only the ſhadow. 1543.

The queen and the cardinal try to ſend back the earl of Lenox to France.

When the queen and the cardinal, were poſſeſſed of the government, they were at a loſs about the earl of Lenox, to whom they were no longer willing to perform their promiſe; ſo their chief care was to be rid of this lord, who greatly embarraſſed them. They agreed, therefore, to deſire the king of France to recall him, and whilſt an anſwer was expected, the queen ſhould continue to cheriſh his hopes, but withal ſhould uſe ſundry artifices to put off her marriage, concerning which he began to be very urgent with her. This project was executed, as it had been reſolved. The queen, for ſome time, amuſed her lover, who, not ſuſpecting what was contriving againſt him, ſpent his time in procuring her diverſions, imagining, that would haſten his marriage; but the queen ſtill found ſome freſh excuſe to defer it. This behaviour, at laſt, bred in him ſuſpicions, which were confirmed by ſome friend of greater penetration, or better informed than himſelf. He heard the queen and the cardinal had wrote to the court of France, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the king's intereſt, than his ſtay in Scotland, ſince they had gained the regent to their ſide.

The earl of Lenox takes up arms.

Lenox was ſo provoked, at being, thus, mocked, that he ſwore to be revenged, and without taking leave of the queen and the cardinal, retired to Dunbarton. In the interim, Francis, who was not yet informed of the alterations, in Scotland, ſent 30,000 crowns to the earl of Lenox, to be diſtributed among thoſe of the party, or to gain ſome of their adverſaries. By theſe means, the court of France had long maintained a faction, in Scotland, whilſt the court of England oppoſed her by the ſame methods. This money arriving, when Lenox was at Dunbarton, he ſent part to the lords, who had the care of the young queen, and gave ſome to his own friends; but the cardinal had none, tho' he had flattered himſelf with having the beſt ſhare, and expected it with impatience. He was ſo very angry, that he perſuaded the regent, to raiſe an army and ſurpriſe Glaſcow, where Lenox was retired with his money. The preparations which were making, at court, tho' under other pretences, giving the earl of Lenox ſuſpicion they were deſigned againſt him, he reſolved to put himſelf in a poſture of defence. It was not difficult for him to draw forces together. The cardinal had many enemies, and the regent had loſt his friends, ſince they had been forſaken by him. So, the regent's levies were made very ſlowly, whilſt the earl's viſibly increaſed; for, within a few days, he raiſed 10,000 men, and ſent the cardinal word, he would ſave him the trouble of coming to Glaſcow. The cardinal received this defiance, with 1543. with a ſeeming contempt, and pretended to purſue his enterpriſe; but it was not his intention to come to a battle. He did not ſufficiently rely on the regent's experience, who was no warrior; beſides, he foreſaw, that by prolonging the time, he ſhould oblige his enemy to diſmiſs his troops, becauſe he wanted wherewithal to keep them long on foot.

The cardinal has all the power under the regent's name.

What the cardinal had foreſeen came to paſs; for the earl of Lenox finding himſelf deſtitute of money, and ſeeing the deſertion was great in his army, was forced, at laſt, to accept a peace that was offered him. He came to Edinburgh, where he was outwardly reconciled with the regent and the cardinal; after which, they went together to Sterling; but a few days after, having notice that the court had ill deſigns againſt him, he privately withdrew, and returning to Glaſcow, furniſhed the biſhop's palace, with a garriſon and ammunition, and ſhut himſelf up in Dunbarton. There he was informed, that the king of France had been ſo prejudiced againſt him, that there was no hope of obtaining his aſſiſtance for the future. Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Scotland, when Henry reſolved to renew the war againſt that kingdom. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in England.

The king's ſixth marriage. Herbert.

In July, Henry married his ſixth wife, the lady Catharine Parr, widow of John Nevil, lord Latimer, verifying what was only ſaid in raillery, upon the act paſſed in 1541, that the king muſt marry a widow. The new queen was a favourer of the reformed; but ſhe was to proceed with great caution, not to offend a husband, whoſe abſolute will it was, that none ſhould believe, but what was believed by himſelf; for which reaſon ſhe durſt not, juſt after her marriage, intercede for three Proteſtants, who were burnt at Windſor, at the inſtigation of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter. This prelate never miſſed an opportunity, to exaſperate the king againſt thoſe who refuſed to ſubmit to the ſix articles; but he ſhewed not the ſame zeal againſt thoſe, who were attached to the pope. However, this affair went farther than he deſired, ſince it occaſioned the diſcovery of a plot, formed to ruin ſeveral families, at Windſor, upon falſe accuſations. The king was ſo offended at theſe diabolical practices, that he would have the affair thoroughly examined. The iſſue was, that the contrivers of the plot were carried on horſeback, with their faces to the horſe-tails, and then ſet in the pillory. It is ſaid, Gardiner had a great ſhare in this project; but he was a very crafty man, who knew how to conceal the hand that gave the blow, when he thought it dangerous to ſhow it.

Proteſtants burnt at Windſor. Burnet.

A plot againſt Cranmer. Burnet.

It was eaſy for the enemies of the reformation to perceive, that Cranmer moſt obſtructed the execution of their projects, and they ſhould never ſucceed ſo long as he was in favour with the king; whereupon, they reſolved to apply themſelves, before all things, to his deſtruction, after which, they imagined, the ruin of his whole party would follow of courſe. There were in this undertaking, two contrary things, whereof one ſeemed to promiſe good ſucceſs, and the other rendered the execution very difficult. The firſt was, the king ſeemed fully bent not to ſpare thoſe, who were called hereticks; that is, thoſe who did not entirely conform themſelves to the declaration of faith, lately publiſhed. Now every one knew the archbiſhop was of this number, tho' he uſed great caution not to give his enemies any advantage, either by word or deed. The ſecond was, the king's ſingular eſteem for the archbiſhop, againſt whom ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts had been made. Notwithſtanding this, his enemies thought, if they could convince the king, that Cranmer's opinions were very different from his, it would, in ſome meaſure, incenſe him. After that, they hoped the king would require of him, as of the reſt of his ſubjects, a blind ſubmiſſion, and that Cranmer's oppoſition, would deſtroy the king's affection for him. The buſineſs, therefore, was, to inſpire the king with ſuſpicions, which ſhould induce him to examine what were the archbiſhop's opinions upon religion. To this end, no occaſion was loſt, to hint to the king, that it was in vain, to puniſh hereticks, whilſt their chief ſupporters were ſuffered to live unmoleſted. Henry perceiving Cranmer was aimed at, made no anſwer, hoping his ſilence would demonſtrate, it was, in vain, to try to incenſe him againſt that prelate; but, at laſt, theſe inſinuations were ſo often repeated, that he ſeemed to give ear to them, in order to know their intent. He hearkened, therefore, to whatever was ſaid againſt Cranmer, and deſired to have the intended articles of accuſation, with the names of his accuſers. The duke of Norfolk, the biſhop of Wincheſter, and their party, believed the archbiſhop ruined, ſince the king was pleaſed to examine his conduct; but they took care not to make themſelves parties, their deſign being to appear unconcerned, to ſtrike the ſurer. They cauſed, therefore, the accuſation to be drawn by ſome prebendaries of Canterbury, and certain Kentiſh juſtices of the peace, whom they perſuaded to be his accuſers. The articles being put into the king's hands, he went in his barge to Lambeth, the archbiſhop's palace, on the other ſide of the Thames. Cranmer hearing the king was coming, haſtened down to his ſtairs, to receive him, and by his order went into the barge. When the king was alone with him, he lamented the growth of hereſy, in the kingdom, and told him, he was endeavouring to find out the chief encouragers of it, to puniſh them according to the utmoſt rigour of the law, about which he was come to ask his opinion. Cranmer replied, without any concern, that his zeal was laudable; but intreated him, for God's ſake, to conſider well what hereſy was, leaſt, inſtead of puniſhing hereticks, he fought againſt God. After ſome converſation upon this ſubject, the king told him, at laſt, he was the man, who was accuſed of being the protector and chief encourager of the hereticks, and then gave him the articles of accuſation againſt him. Cranmer peruſing them, fell on his knees, and freely owned to the king, he was ſtill of the ſame

He is accuſed to the king.

The king informs him of the whole plot and orders him to proceed againſt his accuſers.

1543. same mind he was of, when he opposed the six articles; but that he had done or said nothing against them. Then he humbly desired to be tried by the laws, because he was sure he should never be convicted of transgressing them; whereupon the king asked him, whether it was true that he was married. Cranmer confessed it, but said he had sent his wife to Germany, upon the passing of the act of the six articles. Henry, who had long seen about him only such as dissembled their sentiments, was charmed with the archbishop's candor and sincerity; and instead of being displeased with his confession, he could not forbear admiring his steddiness, which made him dare the greatest danger he had ever been in, and that he so wisely allied it, with an inviolable regard for the laws; wherefore he gave him a very sensible proof of his esteem and affection, in discovering to him the plot, his enemies had laid against him, naming his accusers, and ordering him to proceed against them. Cranmer excused himself; but the king told him, positively, he would be obeyed, and that he should name his judges himself. If Cranmer had been vindictive, he had a fair opportunity of being revenged on those who would have ruined him, and, particularly, on Gardiner, chief contriver of the plot, as appears in letters under his own hand; but he shewed so great backwardness to push this affair, that, at length, the king was tired with pressing him, since he did it so unwillingly. In the interim, he had not the less value for him; for soon after, one of his secret enemies, known for such, by the king, tho' he himself had no suspicion of him, desiring his assistance in a suit he had at court, he went, immediately, and spoke to the king, in his behalf. The king surprised to see him speak for this person, asked him if he knew him well; and upon his replying, that he took him for his Friend; "No, answered the king, "he is your mortal enemy, and I command "you, when you see him next, to call him "knave." Cranmer modestly replyed, such language did not become a bishop; but the king insisted upon his compliance; nevertheless Cranmer found means to be excused, and the king, content with admiring his goodness, would not press him any farther. Thus, the plot, contrived for the archbishop's ruin, served only to indear him the more to the king, and demonstrate to his enemies, how dangerous it was to attack him.

The queen's brother is made earl of Essex. Herbert.

The 23d of December, the king created the lord Parr, the queen's brother, earl of Essex, and conferred on Sir William Parr, her uncle, the title of lord Parr of Horton, with the office of chamberlain to the queen *.

Continuation of the war between the emperor and France. Bellay.

Whilst these things passed, in England, the war between the emperor and the king of France was carrying on, in several places. In the beginning of the campaign, Francis had some advantages, in the Low-Countries, where he took Landrecy, Emery, Bapaume, Maubeuge and Luxemburgh; but the emperor arriving, about the end of the summer, with a strong supply of Spanish troops, Francis, being inferior in number, was obliged to keep at some distance. This gave the emperor an opportunity to invest Landrecy, of which, however, he was forced to raise the siege, upon Francis's finding means to throw in succours; but he made himself amends, by taking Cambray. 1543.

Siege of Nice by the French and the Turks.

At the same time, Barbarossa, admiral of the Turks, coming to Marseilles, the beginning of July, with 110 Turkish gallies, found there the earl of Enghien, of the house of Bourbon, with 22 French gallies,; and, after their junction, they went together, and attacked Nice, the 10th August, and, on the 20th, became masters of the town; but the castle made so brave a defence, that the Turkish admiral, finding he lost both time and reputation, before the place, retired, and wintered in Provence, from whence he returned to Turky, the beginning of the spring. I shall say nothing of the war in Piedmont, because it produced no remarkable event, 1544. The emperor's and Henry's vast projects. Hall.

During this whole campaign, Henry assisted the emperor only with a small body of troops, under the conduct of Sir John Wallop; but they both formed vast projects, for the next year; for they intended to enter France, the one by Champagne, the other by Picardy, each at the head of 40,000 men, and to join about Paris. To execute this project, it was necessary to act with union, and a good understanding. So, Henry could not dispense with performing his promise to the emperor, to give the princess Mary a place in the succession. The parliament meeting the 14th of January, 1544, immediately, passed an act, settling the order of those who could pretend to the crown, after the the king's death. I have frequently observed, that the parliament was held in subjection, and did nothing but what the king pleased. Several instances have been seen, but none more flagrant than the following. In this act, prince Edward was ranked first, with his issue; in the second place, the heirs male, by the king's present, or future marriage, with their issue; in the third place, the princess Mary, and her line; and lastly, the princess Elizabeth, and her heirs. But there was no mention of the king's divorces with the queens, mothers to these two princesses. So notwithstanding the act, which approved and confirmed these divorces, and were never repealed, the parliament seemed to consider these princesses as legitimate, tho', before, they had been declared bastards, and, as such, excluded from the succession. On the other hand, to convince them, they were indebted to the king, their father, for this favour, the act made them liable to such limitations, or conditions,

* Also, some of the Irish nobility that came and submitted to king Henry, June 3, were, on July 1, advanced to the following honours; viz. William Boruck, or Bourk, alias Macwilliam, was created earl of Clanreckard, and baron Dunkellyn. Mawer Obrien, earl of Tomon, or Thomond, and baron Insykwyne. And Conaught Obrien, baron of Ibrackayn. Sir Conaught O-Neal came also, and made his submission to king Henry, and was created earl of Tyrone. Rymer's Fœd.

1544. conditions, as the king ſhould pleaſe to declare, by his letters patents, on pain of forfeiting the right which was granted them. Moreover, in caſe of diſobedience, on their part, or if they died without heirs, the parliament gave the king power to ſettle the crown on any other, by his letters patents, or his laſt will, ſigned with his own hand. Was not this conſidering theſe two princeſſes as baſtards, ſince their right to the ſucceſſion, was made to depend on the king their father's pleaſure? Without pretending to queſtion the right of the king, and repreſentatives of the nation, to ſettle the ſucceſſion, as they pleaſe, I cannot forbear remarking, that this right was carried, on this occaſion, as far as it can be ſtretched. Suppoſing theſe two princeſſes baſtards, the parliament impowered the king to call them to the throne, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm, ſince the conqueſt; and, on the other hand, ſuppoſing them legitimate, they left the king free to exclude them from the ſucceſſion, contrary to the ſame laws and cuſtoms, ſince it was in his breaſt, to impoſe on them conditions, impoſſible to be performed. This was a power no king of England had ever enjoyed, and which ſhews, this act flowed not ſo much from the parliament, as from the king himſelf. To palliate, in ſome meaſure, theſe contradictions, care was taken not to mention, in the act, the king's divorces with Catharine and Ann. Only every one was free to gueſs the motives of the act, which was not very difficult, ſince there was no other, than that of complying with the king's will. By a clauſe, in this ſtatute, all perſons were obliged to take a new oath againſt the authority of the biſhop of Rome; which whoſoever refuſed, or ſhould break any of the articles of this act, was to be adjudged a traytor.

The king's title ſettled for ever.

By another act paſſed this ſame ſeſſion, the title of King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and Supreme Head of the Church of England and Ireland, was united for ever to the crown of England.

An act to limit the juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical courts.

By another it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould be indicted on the ſtatute of the ſix articles, but upon a preſentment by th e oaths of 12 men, before commiſſioners appointed by the king; that no perſon ſhould be impriſoned but upon an indictement; and laſtly, that the preſentment ſhould be made within 40 days after the pretended offence was committed, otherwiſe it ſhould be rejected. Hereby the eccleſiaſtical courts were tied up, in ſome meaſure, from oppreſſing the ſubjects, on pretence of hereſy, ſince the ſame privileges were allowed for that crime, as were enjoyed by the Engliſh, with regard to all other offences.

The parliament declares the king clear of all debts,

Laſtly, the parliament granted the king a ſubſidy, in a manner unheard of before, by enjoining, that thoſe who had lent him money, ſhould be obliged to forgive the debt. However unjuſt this act was, with reſpect to the particular perſons, who had lent the money, the parliament was not ſorry, the king deſired it, in order to put a ſtop to the cuſtom of loans, which in time would have rendered parliaments uſeleſs.

1544. and revive the authority to appoint commiſſioners.

The power formerly granted the king, was alſo revived, during life, of appointing commiſſioners to examine all canons and conſtitutions eccleſiaſteal, and to make the neceſſary alterations, which the king had, hitherto, neglected.

The lord Wriotheſley made chancellor.

Before the end of the ſeſſion, Thomas Wriotheſly, a great friend of the old religion, was made lord chancellor, in the room of the lord Audley, deceaſed.

The war in Piedmont. P. Daniel.

In the beginning of the year, Francis I, ſent into Piedmont, the earl of Enghien, who was but 22 years old, to take the command of the army, in the room of Boutiers, who had not been very ſucceſsful. This young prince engaging the marqueſs of Guaſto, at Ceriſoles, obtained, the 14th of April, a ſignal victory over him, which coſt the Imperialiſts 10,000 men, beſides the wounded and priſoners. In the conſternation the marqueſs of Guaſto was under, after the loſs of the battle, he would have found it very difficult to keep Milan for the emperor, if the earl of Enghien had not been ſtopped in the midſt of his career, by expreſs orders. As the king of France was informed, that the emperor and the king of England were to join and invade him in the center of his dominions, with an army of 80,000 foot, and 22,000 horſe, he deemed it more neceſſary to provide for the defence of his kingdom, than to think of making conqueſts in Italy. For this reaſon, he ordered the earl of Enghien, to ſend him 12000 men of his army. This diminution diſabled the young prince to reap any other advantage from his victory, than the taking of Carignano, which he reduced to the king's obedience.

A war with Scotland. Buchanan.

In the interim, the formidable armies which were to invade France, not being yet ready, Henry reſolved to make uſe of part of his troops, to finiſh the affair of Scotland, which he had ever at heart. Tho' he had declared war againſt Scotland, it was not to make conqueſts upon that kingdom, but ſolely to compel the Scots, by the terror of his arms, to agree to the marriage of their queen, with the prince, his ſon. He could not conceive, that in their preſent circumſtances, they could flatter themſelves with the hopes of ſucceſs, in a war ſo unequal and capable of ruining of Scotland in one ſingle campaign; but cardinal Beaton, an obſtinate man, if ever there was one, who governed in the regent's name, choſe rather to expoſe the kingdom, to become a prey to the Engliſh, than conſent to a peace, which could not be made without ruining his fortune. So Henry ſeeing it was neceſſary to preſs him more cloſely, reſolved to ſend into Scotland, part of the troops deſigned againſt France. The lord Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, and Sir John Dudley, lord Liſle, high-admiral, were appointed for this expedition. The former led the army to Newcaſtle, where the admiral arrived with a fleet and 200 tranſport ſhips, on which the troops embarqued. The earl of Hertford landing near 1544. near Leith, took that town, without difficulty, and then marched directly to Edinburgh, of which he became master, with the same ease. The regent and cardinal had not provided for their defence, imagining the king's menaces would be without effect. The city of Edinburgh, was sacked and burnt; but the English attacked not the castle, for fear of being engaged in too long a siege. After that, they returned to Leith, and burning the town, retired to Berwick the 18th of May. If Henry had resolved to improve his advantages, he would have subdued all Scotland, considering the great consternation of the Scots, upon this invasion. But two reasons prevented him. The first, that he wanted his troops to send them to France, where he intended also to go in person. The second, that his view, was only to let the Scots see, what they were to expect, if they did not speedily resolve to execute the treaty, for their queen's marriage, and he scarce doubted but this method would succeed. In the interim, it must have been thought very strange, that he should court the young queen of Scotland for the prince, his son, in so extraordinary a manner, and the world was of opinion, either he had done too much, or did not do enough.

The earl of Lenox sides with Henry. Buchanan.

Tho' Henry had withdrawn his army out of Scotland, he had not, however, relinquished his project of harrassing the Scots, till he forced them to agree to the marriage. To this end he improved an opportunity to give the regent and the cardinal, fresh disturbances. The earl of Lenox, as I said, having quitted the court, was retired to Dunbarton, the governor whereof was devoted to him, but found himself greatly embarrassed. His friends, in France, had informed him, that the king was exceedingly incensed against him, and accused him of having lavished away the money sent him, to maintain the war against the English. This was in effect what had been hinted to Francis, by the queen dowager, the regent, and the cardinal, who were seconded by the cardinal of Lorrain, and the duke of Guise. In this manner the French historians represent it. The earl, willing to clear himself, had sent a man into France, to acquaint the king with all that had passed in Scotland, since his arrival, and with the present situation of affairs; but the king, prepossessed by the cardinal of Lorrain, refused to give the messenger audience, nay, was going to order him to prison. The earl seeing himself thus forsaken, both by the king of France, and those, who had, at first, joined him, in Scotland, sent to the king of England, to know whether he would take him into his service, with the earl of Glencarn, his intimate friend. Henry received the overture more favourably, than the two lords durst have expected. He promised them his protection, on certain conditions, which he would settle with them, if they would send some trusty person to England. Whereupon the earl of Glencarn came himself to Carlisle, with the bishop of Cathness, brother to the earl of Lenox, and two others. In a few days after their arrival, they concluded with the king's commissioners, a treaty, wherein the earl of Lenox and Glencarn promised; 1544.

The conventions between Henry and the earl of Lenox.

I. That they would cause the pure word of God to be preached, in their territories.

II. That they should hinder, to the utmost of their power, the young queen from being carried out of Scotland, and do their endeavour to deliver her into the hands of the king of England.

III. That they would assist the king, with all their forces, to procure him the direction of the government of Scotland, and the title of protector of the realm.

IV. That the bishop of Cathness, and Hugh Cuningham, should be given in hostage to the king of England.

The king promised on his part;

1. That his army should not oppress their lands.

2. That he would constitute the earl of Lenox, regent of the kingdom, provided he would do nothing without his express consent.

3. That he would give him out of the revenues of the crown, what should be reasonable to support the dignity of regent.

4. That, in case the young queen should die, he would support the earl of Lenox, in obtaining the crown, against the pretensions of the earl of Arran.

5. That he would give the earl of Glencarn an annual pension of 1000 crowns.

6. That he would consent, that Margaret Douglass, his niece, should espouse the earl of Lenox, provided she was willing.

This treaty was signed, at Carlisle, the 17th of May, whilst the English army was quitting Scotland and retiring to Berwick.

Other conventions. Herbert.

Some days after, the earl of Lenox came to the court of England, where the foregoing treaty was confirmed the 26th of June, with the following additional articles.

That the earl of Lenox should surrender to the king, the castle of Dunbritton and the isle of Bute.

That if he married Margaret Douglass, he should assign her an honuorable dower.

That the king engaged, on his part, to assist him, with 500 men, to give him a pension of 1700 marks for himself, and one of 100 marks for George Striveling, governor of Dunbritton.

The earl of Lenox cannot surrender Dunbritton to the king. Herbert.

In consequence of this treaty, the earl of Lenox came to Dunbritton, with 13 ships, and about 600 men. Upon his arrival, he went to the castle with a few followers, to try to persuade the governor to deliver the place to the king of England; but the governor prefering his duty to his affection for the earl, refused to admit the English. This attempt failing, Lenox ravaged the isles of Arran and Bute, where he met with no opposition. Then he made a descent upon Kintyre, and after plundering some villages, sailed to Bristol, where he expected the king's return, who was now in France.

In the interim, the earl of Arran and cardinal Beaton, prosecuted, with the utmost rigour, rigour, the earl of Lenox's friends, confiſcated their eſtates; but a freſh invaſion of the Engliſh, who, tho' few in number, took Jedborrough, Kelſoe, and Coldingham, cauſed them to ceaſe theſe proceedings, and raiſe an army to enable them to repulſe their enemies. The Scotch army amounting to 8000 men, being ready to march, the queen-dowager, the regent, and the cardinal, led them to Coldingham, where the Engliſh, when they retired, had left a garriſon. But whilſt they were employed in this ſiege, the regent having advice, that the Engliſh were marched from Berwick to relieve the town, was ſeiſed with ſuch a panick, that ſpeedily mounting his horſe, he fled all alone to Dunbar. This haſty flight, threw the whole army into ſuch a conſternation, that there was no hindering the ſoldiers from diſbanding. The earl of Angus, alone reſolved to ſtay, with a few men, and carry off the artillery, which was going to be deſerted. The Scots being diſperſed, the Engliſh ravaged, without mercy, Teviot, March, and Lauderdale, compelling the inhabitants to ſwear allegiance to the king of England. Buchanan adds, that the earl of Angus reviving the regent's courage, they aſſembled ſome troops, and cauſing the Engliſh to fall into an ambuſh, ſlew 800 of their men, and took 1000 priſoners; but there is nothing like this, in the Engliſh hiſtories.

The diet of Spire favourable to the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

Whilſt the king of England was acting againſt Scotland, till things were ready to begin the war, in France, the emperor was at Spire, where he had called a diet, to try to obtain ſome aſſiſtance from the princes of Germany. The Proteſtants, at firſt, ſcrupled very much to aſſiſt him, whilſt he left them expoſed to the inſults of their enemies; but, the moment they obtained a decree, that they ſhould not be diſturbed, in the exerciſe of their religion, they granted whatever was required. This was all they deſired, and it was deemed a ſignal favour to grant it, even with ſuch limitations, and ambiguous clauſes, as would, one day, render it fruitleſs. So the diet broke up, about the end of May, to the mutual ſatisfaction of the ſtates of the empire. The pope alone was offended at the decree, in favour of the Proteſtants, and, to hinder them from long enjoying the toleration granted, till the council ſhould meet, he fixed the opening of the council of Trent, to the 25th of March, 1545.

The emperor takes Luxemburgh. Bellay.

Whilſt the emperor was at Spire, he ordered Luxemburgh to be inveſted, which ſurrendered about the end of May. Then, he headed his army, in perſon, to begin the execution of the projects concerted with Henry. Since the concluſion of the treaty, in February, laſt year, whereby they were, each, to bring into the field, but 25000 men, they had agreed to encreaſe the number of their troops, to invade France with two armies, which, together, were to make above 100,000 men, and to join them about Paris. The emperor's firſt exploits, till the king of England's arrival, were, the taking of Commercy, and Ligny, in le Barrois. After that, he entered Champagne, and beſieged St. Didier, the 8th of July. This place, tho' weak, held out above ſix weeks, and then, was taken by a falſe intelligence, carried to the governor. 1544.

The duke of Norfolk joins the count de Bure. Hall.

The war with Scotland, having prevented Henry from being ready, ſo ſoon as he had promiſed, it was about Whitſuntide before he embarqued part of his army, for Calais, under the conduct of the duke of Norfolk. As for himſelf, he ſtill remained, in England, with the reſt of his troops, till the middle of July. When the duke of Norfolk was beyond ſea, he joined the count de Bure, who commanded 10,000 men of the emperor's troops, and they, jointly, beſieged the town of Montreuil. This was, probably, with the emperor's conſent, who, at the ſame time, laid ſiege to St. Didier. He was in hopes, that place would detain him but few days, and then he ſhould march to Paris, whilſt Henry was advancing to join him. Had this project been executed, according to agreement, Paris, and all the country, as far as the Loire, would have been in great danger, ſince Francis had not above 40,000 men. But the emperor was prepoſterouſly bent upon the ſiege of St. Didier, which ſtaied him, above ſix weeks. In the interim, Henry arriving, at Calais, with the reſt of his army, found, that the emperor's deſign was, to leave him, to march, alone, to Paris, and keep the king of France employed, whilſt he purſued his affairs in Champagne. So, perceiving, that, inſtead of marching to the rendezvous, the emperor was employed in a ſiege, he ordered likewiſe, Boulogne to be inveſted, and came, himſelf, to the ſiege, the 26th of July. By this means their project was ſuſpended, whilſt they, ſeparately, amuſed themſelves with the taking of towns; which error proved the ſafety of France. From thenceforward theſe two princes, mutually, charging one another with non-performance of agreement, had, no longer, any confidence in each other; and, therefore, the emperor, by indirect means, cauſed a peace to be offered to Francis, whilſt Henry, more openly, granted a ſafe-conduct for French ambaſſadors, to come and treat with him, at a league from his camp.

The emperor takes St. Didier. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the emperor, having, at laſt, taken St. Didier, about the middle of Auguſt, ſent to Henry, to march towards Paris, as was agreed. Henry replied, that, ſince he had given the emperor time to take St. Didier, it was but reaſonable, the emperor ſhould ſtay till he had taken Boulogne, which could not be long. After the taking of St. Didier, the emperor advanced to Chateau, Thierri, and filled Paris with terror and confuſion; but Henry's anſwer convincing him, it would be very difficult to execute their projects, during the reſt of the campaign, he renewed his private negotiation with France, which had been ſuſpended. Soon after, he concluded, with France, a ſeparate peace, ſigned at Crepy, the 19th of September, not only without including Henry, but even without acquainting him, for fear of prevention.

The treaty of Crepy, between the emperor and French Mezerai.

1544. Henry was not much ſurpriſed at the emperor's proceedings; for he ought not to have expected leſs from ſuch a friend, who was reconciled to him only in order to do his own buſineſs. It is certain, Charles V, no more than Maximilian and Ferdinand, his paternal and maternal grandfathers, never pretended much to ſincerity, nor was integrity his principal virtue. Henry complained of his breach of faith; but it was eaſy to alledge ſundry reaſons, little capable, however, of balancing the oath he had taken, to conclude neither peace nor truce, without the conſent of his ally. But theſe oaths are generally ſo ill kept, in moſt leagues, that they ſeem to be conſidered only as a ſort of form, not much to be relied upon. Happily for Henry, Boulogne had capitulated the 14th of September, before the treaty of Crepy was ſigned.

Henry complains of the emperor in vain.

Act. Pub. Boulogne ſurrenders by capitulation.

The emperor thought himſelf very politick, in eaſing himſelf of the burden of the war, and leaving Francis and Henry imbroiled. Indeed, it was a great advantage, had it not been acquired by breach of faith. Immediately, after the concluſion of the treaty, he ſent orders to the count de Bure, to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil, which obliged Henry alſo, to recall the duke of Norfolk. In the ſituation of Henry's affairs, he had nothing to do but retire, for fear the dauphin, who was advancing by long marches, ſhould oblige him to fight with great diſadvantage, or retreat with precipitation. Beſides, that the dauphin was at the head of 40,000 men, he would have found the Engliſh army much leſſened, as well by their loſſes at two ſieges, as by the numerous garriſon they were forced to leave at Boulogne. So, having well ſtored that place, and left admiral Dudley governor, Henry departed for England, the 30th of September, whilſt his troops were returning to Calais.

The dauphin fails in his attempt to ſurpriſe Boulogne. Bellay. Act. Pub.

The dauphin came a few days after, but did not think proper to purſue the Engliſh, who were too far before him, and too near Calais for him to expect to overtake them; wherefore he contented himſelf with trying to ſurpriſe Boulogne, the breaches whereof the Engliſh had not time to repair. He was very like to have ſucceeded in his attempt; for the French were now maſters of the lower-town, where all the Engliſh ordnance lay, when a ſally from the upper-town compelled them to retreat in diſorder. Marſhal Montluc, in his Commentaries, ſpeaks of this action, in a different manner from the Engliſh hiſtorians, tho' he agrees with them, that the French were repulſed. Some days after, a conference was held at Calais, to try to procure a peace between the two monarchs. But the view of the French being to perſuade the Engliſh to reſtore Boulogne, upon the bare hopes of a peace, it is not ſtrange, the conference ſhould be fruitleſs.

Henry fortifies his maritime places. Herbert.

Henry, at his return to England, took care to put in a poſture of defence, the places on the Thames, and on the ſouthern coaſt, imagining Francis would not fail to invade him the next year; and, at the ſame time, he ſent into Scotland, the earl of Lenox, who took Dumfries. 1544.

This year, moſt part of the colleges, collegiate churches, and hoſpitals were ſurrendered to the king by acts and deeds, ſeemingly voluntary, but which were no more ſo than thoſe ſigned by the abbots and priors, when they reſigned their monaſteries.

Colleges and hoſpitals reſigned to the king. Act. Pub.

1545. In the beginning of the year 1545, the marſhal de Biez encamped near Boulogne, in order to raiſe a fort at Portet, to command the harbour of Boulogne; but the earl of Hertford, who had ſucceeded Dudley, ſallying out with a body of troops, diſlodged the marſhal from his poſt, and forced him to put off his project, till another time.

Preparations of France againſt England. Stow.

In the interim, Francis was making great preparations againſt England, in hopes of retaking Boulogne, and even Guiſnes and Calais, in order to expel the Engliſh entirely out of France. To this end he equipped, in the ſeveral ports of France, 150 great ſhips, and 60 ſmaller ones, with 10 hired of the Genoeſe; moreover, he had ordered 25 gallies to be brought from the Levant, in imitation of Lewis XII, who, on the like occaſion, had ſent for four from thence; and, at the ſame time, he prepared to raiſe an army of 40,000 men, with whom he intended to join 12,000 Landſquenets, levied in Germany. His project was, to attack Boulogne by land, and ſo block it up by ſea, that it ſhould be impoſſible for the Engliſh to relieve it. To execute this deſign, he ſent a reinforcement to the marſhal de Biez, ordering him to build at Portet, the fort he had been forced to leave unfiniſhed, being unwilling to approach Boulogne, before this fort was in a ſtate of defence. The marſhal putting him in hopes, the work would be finiſhed by the middle of Auguſt, he came about the end of June, to Havre de Grace, to give orders for an expedition by ſea. His gallies and ſhips arriving ſoon after, he commanded the fleet to ſail towards England; but in ſeeing it depart, he had the vexation to behold one of his largeſt, called the grand Carracon, burnt before his face, ſhe having taken fire, whilſt the anchor was weighing.

Expedition of the French fleet. Hall.

Admiral Annebaut, who commanded the fleet, arrived, the 18th of July, at the Iſle of Wight, in ſight of Portſmouth, where lay the Engliſh fleet of 60 ſhips only. Notwithſtanding the diſproportion between the two fleets, the Engliſh approached the French; but after a ſlight ſkirmiſh retired behind the ſands, with deſign to draw the enemies after them. The French admiral conſulting how they might be attacked, was told, it was an impoſſible thing, becauſe the channel, which led to the place where they lay, was ſo narrow, that hardly could four ſhips ſail abreaſt; that beſides, there was no venturing among the ſands, without pilots. Theſe difficulties obliged the admiral to content himſelf, with provoking the Engliſh to fight, by means of the gallies, in order to draw them from 1545. from their poſt. At firſt the gallies, favoured by a great calm, annoyed the Engliſh ſhips; but a land-breeze ariſing, deprived them of their advantage, and cauſed them to row off, for fear of being run down by the large ſhips. The Engliſh did not purſue them very far, their deſign being to draw the enemies among the ſands, with which they were unacquainted.

Deſcent of the French on the Iſle of Wight. Hall.

At laſt, the French ſeeing the Engliſh would not loſe the advantage of their poſt, landed in three places in the Iſle of Wight; but all this ended only in burning ſome villages. It was moved in a council of war, to fortify and keep the iſland; but it was judged impracticable, chiefly, by reaſon of the time which ſuch a project would neceſſarily require. The admiral, therefore, was ſatisfied with ordering a deſcent on the coaſt of Suſſex, imagining the king, who was at Portſmouth, would ſend out his fleet to aſſiſt the country. But he was miſtaken; for the Engliſh fleet ſtill lay behind the ſands, and the deſcents, which the French made, in three ſeveral places, gained them no conſiderable advantage, becauſe the coaſts were well guarded. In the interim, the Engliſh fleet daily increaſing, conſiſted now of 100 ſail. So, Annebaut ſeeing little hopes of making great progreſs, retired towards France, after having watered at the Iſle of Wight, not without loſing ſome ſoldiers and officers.

It is driven upon the coaſt of England. A ſhort engagement.

Some days after, a ſouth wind blew the French back, towards the coaſt of England, and put their fleet in confuſion, which the Engliſh reſolved to improve, if the wind continued favourable. And, indeed, the two fleets engaged for two hours; but, as the wind was very changeable, each endeavoured to gain it, without engaging, however, too far. At laſt, they parted without much loſs on either ſide; and, thus, ended the greateſt effort France had ever made at ſea.

The deſign of beſieging Boulogne and Guiſnes miſcaries by de Biez's fault. Herbert.

The attempt to fight the Engliſh fleet, or to ravage the coaſt, was not, however, the principal motive of this powerful armament. The taking of Boulogne was the king of France's chief end, and the fleet was properly intended only to block up that place by ſea. But, as the Landſquenets were not yet arrived, and the fort marſhal de Biez was building not finiſhed, Francis was exceedingly vexed to ſee the time proper for executing his projects, inſenſibly ſlide away. At length, hearing the Landſquenets were on the borders, he ſent to view the fort, which, contrary to his expectation, and marſhal de Biez's promiſe, was yet very far from being finiſhed. Beſides, it was built in a different place from what was appointed, and did not command the harbour. The marſhal alledged, if it had been built at Portet, the garriſon would have wanted water; but he affirmed, the fort he was raiſing at Outreau, would be finiſhed in eight days. Whereupon, the king ſent him his whole army, of which he gave him the command, and remained himſelf at Chateau-Montier, about 10 leagues from Boulogne.

The marſhal de Biez lay encamped near the fort, till it was finiſhed, his deſign being 1545. to throw in 10,000 men to awe the garriſon of Boulogne, whilſt he beſieged Guiſnes. But the engineer had ſo ill contrived his work, that after much time ſpent in it, he was forced almoſt to begin again. This occaſioned a delay, which broke all the meaſures that were taken. In the interim, the king haſtened the work the more, as he knew that 10,000 Landſquenets, and 4000 horſe, raiſed for the ſervice of England, were marching for Picardy. In ſhort, the marſhal perceiving the ſeaſon would be too far advanced, before his fort could be put in a ſtate of defence, pretended to have certain advice, that the king of England deſigned to land a ſtrong army, at Calais, to relieve Boulogne by land; this is, at leaſt, what du Bellay imputes to him, in his Memoirs. However, the marſhal leaving the fort unfiniſhed, encamped on mount Lambert, to be ready to oppoſe the ſuccours. But the Engliſh appeared not. As for the Landſquenets, ſent for by Henry from Germany, they returned home, becauſe they received not on the borders the money, they were made to expect. In the interim, the French army continued encamped, without undertaking the ſiege either of Guiſnes or Boulogne, tho' Francis had made ſo great an effort for that purpoſe.

Death of the duke of Orleans Mezerai.

In the interim, the duke of Orleans died, at Chateau-Montier, to the great grief of the king, his father, who, by his death, ſaw the peace with the emperor very much ſhaken, ſince it was properly founded upon that prince's life, as will quickly appear.

The French army being encamped on mount Lambert, within cannon-ſhot of Boulogne, there were ſkirmiſhes every day in the ſpace between the mount and the town. In one of theſe conflicts, the duke d'Aumale, known afterwards by the name of the duke of Guiſe, was wounded with a lance, which entering at the corner of his eye, came out behind his head. This wound, tho' deemed mortal by all, was, however, cured by the great skill of Ambroſe Pare, the king's ſurgeon, who was even forced to draw out with pincers, the head of the lance which remained in the wound. The ſcar in the duke's face, gained him the ſirname of Balafre, or Gaſhed.

The French army ravage Terre d'Oye. Herbert.

The ſeaſon was now ſo advanced, that the ſiege of Boulogne was not practicable; ſo Francis was forced to be contented, with ordering the marſhal de Biez to ravage Terre d'Oye, belonging to the king of England; but the ſudden rains made the country ſo watry, that the marſhal was ſoon obliged to retire with his army. Indeed, the inhabitants were great ſufferers, becauſe the garriſon of Calais, which ſhould have protected them, was unable to reſiſt ſo numerous forces. On the other hand, Briſſac, afterwards marſhal of France, defeated a body of 2000 Engliſh. Theſe were all the damages Henry ſuſtained, during the campaign, from an army of above 200,000 men, which had put his enemy to a prodigious expence. In all like-1545. likelihood, this expence, and the ill ſucceſs of the campaign, contributed moſt to the peace, which was ſoon after concluded.

Francis's motives to make peace with Henry.

Beſides that France was exhauſted, Francis had ſtill another motive to make peace with England. He was apprehenſive of being ſoon compelled to renew the war with the emperor. By the treaty of Crepy, it was agreed, that the duke of Orleans ſhould marry one of the daughters, either of the emperor, or of the king of the Romans, and on accouut of this marriage, ſhould have the duchy of Milan, or the earldom of Flanders. In conſideration of ſo advantageous a ſettlement for the duke, his ſon, Francis had reſigned above 20 places, which he held in Piedmont, or Montferrat, and relinquiſhed the intereſt of his brother-in-law, the king of Navarre. So, the hopes of the advantages this marriage was to procure, vaniſhing by the death of his ſon, Francis was to find ſome other way to obtain them, or break a treaty now become uſeleſs. For this reaſon, being deſirous to know the emperor's intentions, he ſent admiral Annebaut to Antwerp, to offer him to renew the treaty of peace upon other conditions, ſince the death of the duke of Orleans had rendered thoſe of the treaty of Crepy of no effect. But the emperor plainly intimated, that by the death of that prince, he believed himſelf freed from his engagement, when he told the ambaſſador, he would not attack the king of France, if he was not firſt attacked. Francis eaſily judged by this reply, he ſhould infallibly have a war with the emperor. This, added to the little progreſs he had made during the laſt campaign, made him deſirous of a peace with England.

He got the Proteſtant princes to negotiate for him. Sleidan.

But as he was unwilling to ſue for it, he applied to the princes of the Smalcaldick league, who offered to become mediators. This mediation ſeemed the leſs precarious, as the Proteſtants themſelves were highly concerned to procure a peace between the two kings. They ſaw themſelves upon the brink of being attacked by the emperor, ſince he had made peace with France, and knew moreover, he was negotiating a truce with the Turks. Nothing, therefore, could be more for their advantage, than a good underſtanding between France and England, that both monarchs might be able to protect them. They ſent, therefore, to France, Chriſtopher de Veninger, John Bruno of Nidepont, and John Sturmius; and to England, Lewis Bambach, and John Sleidan, to perform the office of mediators between the two kings, in the name of the league. Theſe ambaſſadors meeting the plenipotentiaries of France and England, between Ardres and Guiſnes, preſently found it was not eaſy to make peace. Francis inſiſted, that Henry ſhould reſtore Boulogne, and Scotland be included in the peace; but Henry abſolutely rejected both theſe articles. Whereupon a truce only was negotiated, but with no better ſucceſs, becauſe Henry would never agree, that the Scots ſhould be compriſed in the treaty. This appears in the primitive inſtructions, ſent to Sir William Paget, one of the Engliſh ambaſſadors, and inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts. We find alſo in his inſtructions, that Sir William Paget attempted to bribe Bruno, one of the German mediators, with the offer of a conſiderable penſion, and, in all appearance, the mediator hearkened to his propoſals. In the interim, to obtain the better terms, Henry feigned a deſire to be reconciled with the emperor, and even ſent in ambaſſy to him, the biſhops of Wincheſter and Weſtminſter; but this was only to give a jealouſy to Francis. 1545.

Cranmer procures biſhopricks for his friends. Burnet.

Cranmer took the advantage of Gardiner's abſence to advance the reformation, which he knew that prelate would oppoſe with all his power. Some vacant biſhopricks were, by his means, given to perſons who favoured the reformation, and he had thereby among the biſhops a much ſtronger party than ever; nay, he found means afterwards, to obtain the king's conſent to ſome alterations advantageous to religion. But Gardiner, who was then, at Bruges, with the emperor, having notice of it, ſent the king word, that the pope and emperor being joined in a league againſt the Proteſtants of Germany, the leaſt innovation, in England, with reſpect to religion, would be apt to induce them to give the king of France all the ſatisfaction he could deſire, to engage him in their league, in order to act all together againſt him. This cauſed Cranmer to find more difficulty than he expected.

The death of the duke of Suffolk. Hall.

In Auguſt, this year, Cranmer loſt a good ſupport, by the deceaſe of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who had always continued in the height of favour. He was Cranmer's friend, and would have willingly agreed to a farther reformation; but he was too much a courtier, to attempt directly to oppoſe the king's will. However, as Henry was not always in the ſame diſpoſition, with regard to religion, this lord did the reformed good ſervice, when he ſaw the king in a favourable ſituation.

Continuation of the war with Scotland. Buchanan.

The war with Scotland was faintly continued on both ſides. Henry's deſign was only to terrify the Scots, and induce them to excute the treaty concerning their queen's marriage. On the other hand, the Scots, had no thoughts of invading England. Nevertheleſs, Francis, who, as was obſerved, had formed vaſt projects againſt England, ſent betimes to the regent an ambaſſador, called la Broſſe, to aſſure him of his protection, and a powerful aid, which was inſtantly to depart. Beſides that a diverſion in Scotland could not but be advantageous to him, he was alſo excited by the Lorrain princes, who were deſirous to ſupport the queen, their ſiſter. So, cauſing the Seigneur de Lorge, count of Mongommeri, to embarque with 5000 men, he ordered him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours, to perſuade the Scots to make a powerful diverſion, on the frontiers of England. Mongommeri arriving in Scotland, the 2d of July, joined his troops with the Scots, and both making together 15000 men, advanced towards the Tweed. For ſome days ſeveral parties paſſed the river, and did ſome damage to the Engliſh; but the French general 1545. ral could never perſuade the Scots to venture with the whole army, beyond the Tweed. On the contrary, upon news that the earl of Hertford was advancing at the head of 12000 men, they haſtily retired, and preſently after diſbanded as uſual. This is all that paſſed, in Scotland, worth notice, during the campaign of 1545.

The parliament grants the king a ſubſidy, and the lands of the colleges, &c. Burnet.

The parliament of England meeting the 23d of November, the convocation continued for two years the ſubſidy given the king for ſix. At the ſame time, the parliament ſuppreſſed by an act, all the colleges and hoſpitals, and gave their lands to the king. The motive, or rather pretence of this ſuppreſſion was, the abuſe of theſe foundations. The parliament deſigned it alſo, towards the expence of the king's wars with France and Scotland. But this not ſufficing, the commons granted him, moreover, a large ſum, and as they were aſſembled only for that purpoſe, they were diſmiſſed the 24th of December. Before the ſeſſion ended, the king came to the houſe of lords in great ſolemnity, and made a fine ſpeech, ſaying, among other things, that never had prince a greater affection for his people, or was more beloved than himſelf. He added many ſuch expreſſions, which, tho' very far, for the moſt part, from the truth, were, however, received by the people, with loud acclamations.

The affairs of Germany. Sleidan.

During this year, the German Proteſtants began to feel the effects of the emperor's late peace with France, and of the truce he was juſt going to conclude with the Turk. Hitherto, they had been uſed ſomewhat gently; but the emperor coming to Worms, where the diet of the empire was held, plainly declared to them, he could not any way diſpenſe with their ſubmitting to the council, which was to meet at Trent. This convinced them, there was, in reality, a deſign to reduce them by force, and the more, as a certain rumour was ſpread of a league between the pope and emperor, which could not but be againſt them. Their ſuſpicions were farther confirmed, by a ſermon preached by a certain Franciſcan, before the emperor, to whom he repreſented in very ſtrong terms, that he could not diſcharge the duty of a good emperor, unleſs he laboured to the utmoſt of his power, to extirpate the Lutherans. They knew, alſo, the emperor had wrote to the king of Poland, to excite him againſt them. Moreover, he ſummoned the archbiſhop of Cologne to appear before him, within 30 days, becauſe he had embraced the reformation, and tried to introduce it into his dioceſe. All this ſhewed plainly, what they were to expect. Nevertheleſs, as the emperor had not yet concluded the truce with the Turk, and as things were not quite ready, he ordered that a new diet ſhould be held at Ratisbon, the following January. But the better to amuſe the Proteſtants, he decreed, that the divines of both parties ſhould come to Ratisbon, a month before the diet, and hold a free conference, that ſomething might be afterwards ſettled in matters of religion. The Roman Catholicks did not like this conference, and the Proteſtants were ſtill leſs pleaſed with it, becauſe they foreſaw that the ſtiffneſs of the divines of both ſides, on the points which would be the ſubject of their conference, would give the emperor and the diet, a pretence to refer the deciſion to the council of Trent. The diet breaking up, the 18th of Auguſt, the emperor returned to the Low-Countries. Some time after he received advice, that the truce with the Turks was concluded. He thereby ſaw himſelf at full liberty to make war upon the Proteſtants, and under that pretence, to ſet about the execution of his project, to become maſter of the empire.

1545.

A remark on the council. Sleidan.

It was, properly, at the inſtance of the Proteſtants only, that the council was to meet; but it was very far from being ſuch a council as they had required. They expected it to be held in Germany, in an unſuſpected place, and it was convened at Trent, a city belonging to the king of the Romans, whom they juſtly conſidered as their enemy. Their deſign was to combat the papal authority, and it was the pope who was to preſide by his legates. They intended to ſhew, that the Romiſh clergy had corrupted religion, both in doctrine and diſcipline, and it was the Romiſh clergy who were to aſſiſt as judges. Nay, it was uncertain, whether they ſhould be allowed to produce their reaſons. In the interim, it was pretended, that out of great condeſcenſion, a council was called for their ſakes, and at their ſollicitation; wherefore, it is no wonder, they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to ſuch a council, which they as much feared, as they deſired one free and impartial. So the emperor and the Proteſtants acted directly contrary to their firſt proceeding. The Proteſtants rejected a council, after deſiring it with great earneſtneſs, and the emperor, after amuſing them many years on that account, preſſed, with all his power, the meeting of the council of Trent, the authority whereof he intended to make uſe of to oppreſs them. The pope would have been glad to have had no council at all, but finding he was too far engaged with the emperor to recede, had fixed the opening to the 15th of March. After that, he put it off, becauſe on that day, there were too few biſhops at Trent. But he had a much ſtronger reaſon. He was very glad to wait the iſſue of the diet of Worms, in hopes, that vigorous reſolutions would be taken there, againſt the Proteſtants, which would engage both parties in an open war, and furniſh him with a pretence, either to delay the opening of the council, or to remove it to ſome town in Italy. But the emperor, who had now formed his plan, of making uſe of the council's authority to proceed againſt the Proteſtants, cauſed the pope, at laſt, to order it to be opened at Trent, the 13th of December. That day the legates, meeting in the cathedral, declared, the council was aſſembled for three cauſes, to deſtroy hereſy, to reform diſcipline, and to ſettle a laſting peace between Chriſtian princes. This firſt ſeſſion was, properly, held only for the opening of the council. There were ſo few

The opening of the council of Trent. F. Paul.

1545. prelates at Trent, that it would have been ridiculous for ſo ſmall a number of perſons, to pretend to make decrees upon the articles for which the council was called.

1646. The Proteſtants ſeeing a council opened, quite different from what they had required, eaſily perceived no good was to be expected from it. They had the more reaſon to fear it, as the kings of France and England being at war with each other, there was no hopes of aſſiſtance from them. In the interim, tho' the German mediators had not ſucceeded in their negotiation, the peace between France and England, was not more remote. The reaſon was, both monarchs were equally concerned to end a war, which only did them damage, without a poſſibility for either to expect any conſiderable advantage. The war continued, however, during the winter of the year 1546. The earl of Surrey, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, who commanded at Boulogne, having intelligence that the French were conducting a convoy to the fort of Outreau, ſallied out with part of the garriſon, to intercept it; but he ſucceeded ſo ill, that inſtead of taking the convoy, he was himſelf defeated, and forced to retreat in great diſorder. This news extremely troubled the king, who was not wont to receive the like. Whether he thought it owing to the earl's imprudence, or ſuſpected him of ſome hidden deſign, he recalled him, immediately, and ſent the lord Gray to command in his room. A few days after, he ordered the earl of Hertford to depart with about 10,000 men, for fear the French ſhould ſeiſe ſome poſt, and cut off the communication between Boulogne and Calais. And, indeed, that was their deſign. But the earl of Hertford, preventing them by two days only, poſted himſelf at Ambleville, where he ran up two forts, which ſecured the communication. The French having miſſed their aim, encamped on mount Lambert; and as the two armies were not far from each other, there were ſkirmiſhes every day, but which decided nothing. It was equally the intereſt of both kings to run no riſque, for fear of breaking off the negotiation of the peace, which was treating between Ardres and Guiſnes.

Henry and Francis wiſh for a peace. Act. Pub.

The reaſons of both kings, for a peace.

Francis wiſhed for a peace, becauſe his exchequer was drained, by his great and continual expence from the beginning of his reign, and, particularly, by the naval armament of the former campaign. Beſides, as he was juſt entering into a war with the emperor, he wanted ſuch a friend as the king of England. In fine, he perceived, that after his fruitleſs efforts to retake Boulogne, it would be very difficult to recover that place by force. Henry was no leſs deſirous of peace, for ſeveral reaſons. He was grown ſo fat and corpulent, that it was a trouble for him to move; nay, he had occaſion for an engine, with pullies, to lift him up and down ſtairs. This made him extremely uneaſy, and gave him a diſtaſte for buſineſs, ſo that he attended to affairs with ſome reluctance. In the next place he had no farther thoughts of making conqueſts, in Picardy. His ſole view, was, to procure what was due to him, before Boulogne ſhould be reſtored, which was of little uſe to him, ſince Calais could ſerve all his purpoſes. But he had ſtill a more urgent motive to renew his old friendſhip with Francis; for he ſaw the emperor, with the pope's aſſiſtance, upon the point of making war on the Proteſtants, and much queſtioned their ability to withſtand him. In this belief, he was afraid the emperor, after ſubduing Germany, would turn his arms againſt England, with all the forces of the empire, Spain, Italy, and the Low-Countries. He could uſe the pretence of executing the pope's ſentence, and even cauſe a like ſentence to be paſſed by the council of Trent. It was, therefore, not at all advantageous to Henry, to be in war with France. It was rather his intereſt to have Francis's friendſhip, as it was alſo very advantageous to Francis, to be ſecure of Henry's aſſiſtance, in caſe the emperor turned his arms againſt France. 1546.

The obſtacles to the concluſion of this peace, conſiſted in Henry's demand of what was due to him, and in Francis's want of money to content him; beſides, Francis inſiſted upon Boulogne, and upon Scotland's being included in the treaty. Theſe difficulties would have been ſufficient to hinder the concluſion of the peace, if more urgent motives had not induced the monarchs to ſeek expedients to ſurmount them. Henry conſented, at laſt, to the article concerning Scotland, and as to the reſt, a way was found to ſatisfy both. Henry was to keep Boulogne, till he was paid, and Francis promiſed to diſcharge the debt in eight years. Every thing being, thus, ſettled, the peace was ſigned the 7th of June. The treaty ran:

The difficulties of a peace.

That the king of France ſhall pay, regularly, the penſion, due by the treaty of More, of the 30th of Auguſt, 1525, confirmed by ſeveral ſubſequent treaties; as alſo, the penſion of ſalt, contained in a treaty of the 25th of April, 1527, valued, afterwards, at 10,000 crowns a year. But, as Henry pretends, the ſaid penſion, given in lieu of the ſalt, is to be perpetual; and, as Francis maintains, on the contrary, that it is to ceaſe at Henry's death, it is agreed, that the diſpute ſhall be, amicably, decided by umpires; and, if the penſion ſhall be found to be perpetual, Francis ſhall pay it to Henry, and his ſucceſſors, for ever.

A treaty of peace, between France and England Hall.

Moreover, Francis ſhall pay to the king of England, on the feaſt of St. Michael, 1554, or within a fortnight after, the ſum of 2,000,000 of crowns de ſoleil, as well for the arrears of the penſion of the 10,000 crowns, as for Henry's expence in the ſiege of Boulogne, undertaken, ſolely, to procure his money, and in keeping and maintaining that place.

As to the article of 500,000 crowns, which Henry preſented to Francis, on condition he punctually preſerved the treaties, as the two monarchs differ in point of fact, it is agreed, the diſpute ſhall be decided by commiſſioners, appointed on both ſides, within ſuch a time, or by four impartial lawyers, in caſe the commiſſioners end not the affair.

It

1546. It is farther agreed, that Henry ſhall keep Boulogne, with its territories, the limits whereof are ſettled by the treaty, till he receive whatever is due to him.

That when all the ſums ſhall be paid, Boulogne ſhall be reſtored to Francis, and nothing, that is faſtened to the ground, ſhall be impaired, or carried away.

That from the date hereof, to the ſurrender of Boulogne, neither of the two princes ſhall raiſe any fort, or new fortification, within the territory of Boulogne, but thoſe already begun may be finiſhed.

The emperor was included by both parties, in the peace. As for Scotland, Henry agreed, it ſhould be, included, on condition, the Scots gave him no freſh cauſe to make war upon them; and in caſe they did, they were to be deemed included, no otherwiſe than according to the treaty of the 5th of April, 1515.

Henry's advantages in this treaty.

Henry could hardly expect greater advantages, than thoſe he received from this peace, which ſeemed to ſecure him not only the payment of what was due to him, but alſo the yearly and perpetual penſion of 100,000 crowns. But the moſt ſolemn treaties are not always ſufficient ſecurity for the performance of what ſovereigns promiſe. It will appear in the following reigns, that Francis's ſucceſſor, not only broke this treaty with reſpect to Boulogne, and the ſums for which his father was bound, but that even the penſion was never charged in the treaties he made with England.

The peace proclaimed at London.

The peace was very ſolemnly proclaimed, at London, the 13th of June, with a general proceſſion, wherein were carried all the richeſt ſilver croſſes, and the fineſt copes worn, for the greater pomp. But this was the laſt time theſe things appeared in publick; for ſoon after, Henry called them in, together with the church-plate, into his treaſury and wardrobe, without giving any other reaſon than his will and pleaſure.

Charges of the late war. Herbert.

It is ſaid, the late war with France coſt Henry 586,718 pounds ſterling, and the charges of keeping Boulogne eight years, amounted to 755,833 pounds. So large a ſum, which was not to be re-paid under eight years, had conſumed whatever had been granted by the parliament, and received from the chapels, colleges and hoſpitals; ſo that he was forced in the beginning of the year to lay a tax upon his ſubjects, under the name of benevolence, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The peace reſtored between the two kings the good underſtanding which had been interrupted ſome years, rather by the artifices of the emperor and his party, in England, than for any juſt cauſe. Catharine de Medici, dauphineſs of France, being, at this time, delivered of a princeſs, and Henry deſiring to ſtand godfather, he called her Elizabeth. Preſently after, the two kings ſent ambaſſadors to each other, to receive the oaths concerning the peace, and choſe for theſe ambaſſies their two high admirals. It is ſaid, that whilſt admiral Annebaut was at London, he began a negotiation about religion, and that the two kings intended to aboliſh the maſs in their dominions. As for Henry, very likely, if he had lived, he would have advanced the reformation; nay, it is certain, that on account of this negotiation, he ordered Cranmer to ſet down in writing how ſuch a change might be effected, and to ſtrengthen all with arguments and paſſages from the ſcriptures. But this project ſoon vaniſhed into ſmoke. Probably, Francis had entered into this negotiation, only becauſe he deſired to be in ſtrict union with Henry, and knew by experience, that the bare propoſal of conforming himſelf to his ſentiments, in point of religion, was a moſt effectual way to ſucceed. But it is not likely he really intended to admit of any reformation, in his kingdom. And, indeed, at this very time he was kindling the flames of perſecution all over France againſt the reformed, of whom 14 this year were burnt at Meaux, and many others at Paris, and in other places; not to mention the maſſacre of Cabrieres and Merindol, for which none were puniſhed. The cardinals of Lorrain and Tournon, his chief miniſters, were too much incenſed againſt the Proteſtants, for any man to believe, that ſo long as they were in favour, the king very ſeriouſly thought of aboliſhing the maſs, in France. 1546.

The emperor prepares to attack the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

Before the peace, between England and France, was ſigned, the Proteſtant princes of Germany, ſeeing themſelves going to be attacked by the emperor, who had, at laſt, taken off the maſk, ſince his peace with France, and truce with the Turks, ſent to Henry, prince Philip, brother to the elector Palatine, to deſire aſſiſtance. It appears, in the king's letter to this prince, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Henry had ſent to deſire him to come, and the lord Herbert affirms, that Philip aimed at marrying the princeſs Mary. However this be, the king anſwered his demand of aid, by ſeven propoſitions, containing the terms on which he was willing to enter into a defenſive league, with the Proteſtants. But as his propoſitions tended only to render him head, and ſole director of the league, they did not think proper to put themſelves, blindly, into his hands. They only told him, if he would depoſit, ſomewhere in Germany, 100,000 crowns, to ſerve for the defence of the league, they would prefer his alliance to that of Francis. But, finding they offered no advantage for himſelf, he had no ſuch zeal for the Augſburg confeſſion, from which he was yet very remote, as to engage in its protection, without reaping any benefit. The truth is, the Proteſtants were perſuaded, he had no deſire to be really united with them, but intended only to encourage them, for fear they ſhould ſubmit to the emperor, as alſo, to hinder them from putting themſelves under the French king's protection, with whom he had not, yet, peace. For the ſame reaſon it was, that, under colour of continuing the negotiation, he kept the count Palatine at his court, till he ſaw the peace, with France, was near a concluſion.

1545. It was now ſome time ſince the pope and emperor had formed the project of a league, againſt the Proteſtants of Germany. They had agreed upon all the articles; but the emperor had thought proper to defer the ſigning, that he might ſay, he did it merely in his own defence. At laſt, about the middle of June, he ſent the cardinal of Trent to Rome, where the league was ſigned the 26th of the ſame month. The pope promiſed to find for ſix months, 12000 foot, 500 horſe, and 200,000 crowns, for the war in Germany; moreover, he gave the emperor a moiety of one year's revenue of the benefices in Spain, with power to alienate 100,000 crowns-worth of church-lands. This was a demonſtration, that it was a religious war, tho' the emperor affected to publiſh the contrary.

League between the pope and emperor againſt the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

The German war.

The emperor having notice, that the pope's troops were beginning to march; that the count de Bure had forwarded his levies, in the Low-Countries; and duke Maurice of Saxony, whom he had engaged in his party, was ready to act, when there ſhould be occaſion, aſſembled his army about Ratisbon. His deſign was to meet the pope's troops, who were croſſing Tirol, under the conduct of Octaviano Farneſe. At the ſame time, to hinder this junction, the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe marched the ſame way, with an army of 40,000 men. Without entering into the particulars of this firſt campaign, I ſhall only ſay, in general, that the Proteſtants, tho' ſuperior in number, could not hinder the junction of the Italian troops, not of thoſe of the Low-Countries, with the emperor. The different tempers of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe, did not a little contribute towards their taking wrong meaſures. In ſhort, the campaign laſting till November, without either of the two armies deſiring to engage, the elector of Saxony received the ill news, that the king of the Romans and duke Maurice were deſtroying his country, with fire and ſword. This obliging him to march with part of the army, to the relief of his ſubjects, the landgrave, grown too weak by this ſeparation, choſe likewiſe to retire into his dominions. Thus, the emperor meeting with no more oppoſition, took Francfort, Ulm, and ſeveral other towns belonging to the league, which furniſhed him with the money he wanted, for the maintenance of his army.

Continuation of the council of Trent. Herbert.

Whilſt the war was carrying on, in Germany, the council languiſhed at Trent, and proceeded very ſlowly; beſides that the members were very few, they were wholly dependent on the legates, who durſt not themſelves undertake any thing, without orders from Rome. But it was the pope's intereſt to prolong matters, becauſe he hoped, time would procure him, at laſt, ſome occaſion to diſſolve the council, or remove it to Italy. Thus, the council was but an empty name, made uſe of by the pope and emperor for their own private views, and to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the publick.

Religion began alſo to cauſe troubles, in Scotland, or, at leaſt, to produce the ſeeds thereof, by the deſpair to which thoſe that embraced the reformation were driven. Since cardinal Beaton and the earl of Arran had enjoyed the peace, procured them by Francis, they thought only of being revenged on their enemies. Religion furniſhed them with a pretence, becauſe the oppoſite faction almoſt wholly conſiſted of the reformed. In the courſe of this year 1546, they put to death ſeveral perſons for religion, at Perth, St. Andrews, and other places. The regent ſuffered himſelf to be ſo led by the cardinal, that he gloried in delivering to the flames, thoſe whom he had formerly conſidered as his brethren. Among thoſe who were ſacrificed to the furious paſſion of the cardinal, a miniſter called Sephocard, who ſuffered martyrdom, at St. Andrews, was particularly remarkable. This man being condemned to the fire, the regent, at the inſtance of one of his friends, would have ſaved his life, and to that end ſent a note to the cardinal, deſiring him to ſuſpend the execution; but the barbarous prelate, without regarding the regent's requeſt, not only cauſed the ſentence to be executed, but would alſo feed his eyes with the ſad ſpectacle, ſitting in ſtate, in a great window of his caſtle. It is ſaid, that, before he was delivered to the flames, the miniſter told the executioner, "That within few days "the prelate, who beheld him with ſuch "pride from yonder high place, ſhould lie "in the ſame as ignominiouſly, as now he "was ſeen proudly to reſt himſelf." This prediction proved but too true for the cardinal; for preſently after, he was murdered in his own palace, and his body thrown into the ſtreet; but of the very window from whence he looked on, while Sephocard was burning.

1546. The ſtate of religion in England.

As for England, religion was ſtill upon the ſame foot, as the king had been pleaſed to eſtabliſh it. The reformation had made ſome progreſs; but was far from being brought to perfection, and yet the reformed could not forbear hoping, the king himſelf would carry it much farther. In this belief, they thought it prudent not to provoke him, and that they effectually conſulted the welfare of their religion, by remaining in ſilence, and waiting for better times. This is the true reaſon, why there were fewer perſons that ſuffered for religion, in England, than in France. It is not to be queſtioned, that if there had not been hopes of a farther reformation, many people would have openly declared the opinions which theſe hopes induced them to conceal. For much the ſame reaſon, thoſe who retained all the tenets of the old religion, durſt not directly oppoſe the king, for fear their oppoſition ſhould carry him beyond the bounds he ſeemed to have preſcribed to himſelf. From hence ſprung a blind and univerſal complyance with the king's will, and the exceſſive power he had acquired, over all his ſubjects, of which he made a very ill uſe. He had been troubled for ſome time with an old ſore in his leg, which was grown very painful; this, added to his monſtrous corpulency, 1546. lency, which rendered him almoſt unable to ſtir, made him ſo froward and untractable, that none approached him without trembling. He had been always ſtern and ſevere, but was incomparably more ſo towards the end of his days, than in the beginning. Flattery had ſo corrupted his judgment and ſenſe, that he deemed it an unpardonable crime, to contradict his opinions, tho' he changed them himſelf very frequently. I have obſerved, that he treated with admiral Annebaut of aboliſhing the maſs, and changing it into a communion, after the manner of the Proteſtants, and yet ſoon after, Shaxton, who had reſigned the biſhoprick of Salisbury, and been long a priſoner for refuſing to conform to the ſix articles, being accuſed afreſh of denying the real preſence in the ſacrament, the king was pleaſed to have him tried according to the rigour of the law, and he was condemned to be burnt. But this man, who had endured the hardſhips of a long impriſonment, could not behold with the ſame firmneſs the puniſhment prepared for him. The king having ſent the biſhops of London and Worceſter, to perſuade him to recant, he was prevailed upon, and abjuring his pretended hereſy, the king granted him his pardon. He became, afterwards, a cruel perſecutor of the reformed.

Ann Askew burnt. Burnet.

This example was not capable of moving Ann Askew, who was accuſed of the ſame crime, and rigorouſly proſecuted, tho' ſhe had good friends at court, where ſhe was well known. She firmly perſiſted, notwithſtanding all the promiſes to ſave her life, in caſe ſhe would recant. Some court ladies, touched with compaſſion for her, having ſent her ſome money, when in priſon, for her ſubſiſtence, were the occaſion of her being more cruelly tormented. Chancellor Wriotheſley, a great enemy to the earl of Hertford, hoping to draw ſomething out of the priſoner againſt that lord or his counteſs, cauſed her to be racked; nay, 'tis ſaid, he would be preſent himſelf, and obſerving the executioner was moved with pity to the priſoner, threw off his gown, and taking upon him the honourable office, drew the rack ſo ſeverely, that he almoſt tore her aſunder. But this is a fact, that ſcarce ſeems credible. However, the woman's bones being put out of joint, ſhe was carried in a chair to the place of execution, and burnt, with four men condemned for the ſame crime. But to add to their ſufferings, they were made to hear a ſermon preached by Shaxton their falſe brother, who upbraided them with obſtinacy, in very bitter and abuſive terms. All this was not capable of ſhaking their conſtancy, which endured to their laſt breath.

Deſigns againſt Cranmer, and the queen. Burnet.

The enemies of the reformation, ſeeing the king incenſed againſt the ſacramentarians, thought it a favourable opportunity to ruin the queen and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom they conſidered as the grand protectors of the reformed. Among the ſupporters of the old religion, the chief were, chancellor Wriotheſley, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surrey, his ſon, Bonner, biſhop of London, Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter; and theſe had, doubtleſs, among the courtiers, and the king's ſervants, creatures who failed not to be ſerviceable on occaſion. But whatever project they formed, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſtill in their way, who having great influence over the king, commonly broke their meaſures. So, to be entirely freed from this formidable adverſary, they reſolved to complain of him openly to the king, and accuſe him of being the head and protector of the ſacramentarians, and of all, in general, who rejected the ſix articles. This reſolution was executed. The perſon who took upon him to ſpeak to the king, told him, there were evident proofs ready of what was alledged againſt Cranmer, and if he were ſent to the tower, ſo many witneſſes would appear againſt him, that the king would be himſelf ſurpriſed. Henry was not ignorant that Cranmer was againſt the ſix articles, in his mind, ſince he had himſelf frankly owned it; but he really loved him, and, therefore, would not expoſe him to a trial, which muſt have been fatal to him; beſides, he took it very ill, that ſuch pains were taken to deſtroy a man, for whom he had ſo often and ſo openly declared. However, reſolving to ſee how far the malice of his enemies would go, he conſented that he ſhould be the next day called before the council, and ſent to the tower, if they ſaw cauſe. But in the night the king ſent for Cranmer, and telling him what had been reſolved, deſired to know how he meant to anſwer for himſelf. Cranmer thanked the king, and prayed him, that ſince he was to be queſtioned for his religious opinions, judges might be aſſigned him, who underſtood thoſe matters. The king replied, he went the wrong way to ſave his life, for, moſt certainly, his enemies had witneſſes ready to convict him, in ſuch manner, that the judges would be forced to condemn him; and, therefore, ſince he took ſo little care of himſelf, he would look to it. So he ordered him to deſire the council, to uſe him as a privy-counſellor, and, as they would expect to be uſed in the like caſe, that is, that his accuſers might be brought face to face, before he was ſent to the tower; and, if his requeſt was not granted, he was to appeal to the king. At the ſame time, he pulled off his ring, and, giving it to him, ſaid, if his appeal was rejected, he ſhould ſhew the council that token of his protection. Next morning Cranmer coming to the council-door, was ſo long kept waiting, in the lobby, that the king, hearing of this diſreſpect, ſent word, that he ſhould be preſently brought in. It happened as the king foreſaw, ſo that Cranmer was forced, at laſt, to produce the king's ring, which terribly mortified his enemies. Then they all roſe up, and went and informed the king of what had paſſed, who told them, he thought he had a wiſer council than now he found

Cranmer is openly accuſed. Burnet.

1546. they were, and, laying his hand on his breaſt, ſwore, that he took the archbiſhop to be the moſt faithful ſubject he had. The duke of Norfolk, willing to excuſe the council, ſaid, they meant the archbiſhop no harm, but only to vindicate his innocence by ſuch a tryal as would have freed him from all aſperſions. But the king looking ſternly at him, anſwered, "He would not ſuffer men who were ſo "dear to him, to be, thus, handled with im-"punity. He knew the factions that were "among them, and their malice to one ano-"ther, which he would either extinguiſh, or "very ſpeedily puniſh." Then he commanded them all to be reconciled to the archbiſhop. They, immediately, obeyed, tho' it was but in outward appearance; but for Cranmer, he heartily forgave them, as he plainly ſhewed afterwards.

The queen is accuſed, who, happily, brings herſelf off. Herbert.

It ſeems, ſo great a mortification ſhould have made theſe men more cautious; but their extreme deſire to ſucceed in their plot, would not ſuffer them to deſiſt, with regard to the queen. They perceived, if the king had oppoſed their accuſation of Cranmer, it was not to hinder the execution of the law of the ſix articles, but, from a pure motive of affection for that prelate; that, therefore, their proceedings could not have diſpleaſed him, as to the thing, but, only in reſpect of the perſon. This made them think, they ſhould find it eaſier to deſtroy the queen, becauſe the king would never, willingly, ſuffer, that his own wife ſhould differ from him, in matters of religion. Catharine Parr, who was then on the throne, had gained the king's affection, by her extraordinary care of him, and by giving him, daily, freſh marks of her gratitude. She was a reformer in her heart, and even, ſometimes, took the liberty to have ſermons preached, in her privy-chamber, before ſome of her ladies. It came to the king's ears, but he took no notice of it; nay, he ſuffered her to diſpute, with him, upon religion, imagining, ſhe did it, only, for inſtruction. But, at laſt, theſe diſputes having been carried too far, he expreſſed his diſpleaſure at them, and even began to look more coldly upon the queen, than formerly. This made her enemies fancy it a fair opportunity to work her ruin, whilſt, ignorant of their deſigns, ſhe was ſeeking occaſions to inſpire the king with favourable thoughts of the reformation.

Burnet.

The king firſt vented to Gardiner, his diſpleaſure with the queen. He could not pitch upon a more partial man. Gardiner failed not to cheriſh the king's reſentment, by aggravating the queen's obſtinacy, and her pains to inſtill her notions into the ladies, who ſerved her. The chancellor, who was alſo let into the ſecret, confirmed what Gardiner had ſaid, and hinted to the king, that the queen had encouraged Ann Askew, in her obſtinacy, and even inſinuated, that ſhe was plotting againſt the ſtate. In ſhort, they went ſo far, that articles were drawn againſt her, and ſigned by the king. The chancellor, putting up the paper, careleſly, in his pocket, it dropt from him, and the perſon that found it, carried it to the queen, who, ſeeing the king's hand to ſuch a paper, concluded herſelf loſt. However, being adviſed, by one of her friends, to go to the king, and try to appeaſe him, ſhe came into his room with a ſettled countenance, as if ſhe knew nothing of what had paſſed. The king received her very kindly, and began to talk of religion. She anſwered, theſe things were above her, and ſhe ought to learn of him, what ſhe was to believe. "Not ſo, by St. Mary, ſaid the king, you "are become a doctor, and able to inſtruct "us." The queen, feigning to be ſurpriſed, at his manner of ſpeaking to her, anſwered, very mildly, "She ſaw, with grief he was "offended at the freedom ſhe had, ſome-"times, taken to diſpute with him, in mat-"ters of religion, but ſhe had done it inno-"cently, with the ſole view of diverting him, "knowing what pleaſure he took in talking "of thoſe things, which none underſtood bet-"ter than himſelf; her chief view had been, "not only to make him forget his pain, by "ſuch ſort of diſcourſes, but alſo to receive "inſtruction herſelf, and, indeed, ſhe had "profited much; and if ſhe had ſtarted ob-"jections, it was only to give him occaſion "to clear the difficulties, which were above "a woman's underſtanding." "And is it e-"ven ſo, ſaid the king, then we are friends "again." So he embraced her with great affection, and ſent her away with very tender aſſurances of his conſtant love to her. On the morrow, which was the day appointed for carrying the queen to the tower, the king going to take the air, in the garden, ſent for her, and preſently after came in the chancellor, with 40 of the guard; but the king ſtept aſide to him, and after a little diſcourſe, was heard to call him, in an angry tone, knave, fool, and beaſt. Then he came again to the queen, who, ſeeing him in a paſſion with the chancellor, endeavoured to appeaſe him; but the king told her, ſhe had no reaſon to plead for him.

The king begins to hate the enemies of the reformation. Burnet.

Theſe two attempts, againſt the archbiſhop and the queen, not only proved unſucceſsful, but alſo very prejudicial to the enemies of the reformation; for, from thenceforward, the king could not endure them, being ſatisfied, their chief view was, to overthrow whatever he had eſtabliſhed. Gardiner was turned out of favour, immediately, and the king would not ſuffer him to be preſent in the council.

The king reſolves to put the duke of Norfolk, and the earl of Surrey to death. Burnet.

But a greater ſtorm fell on the duke of Norfolk, and his ſon, the earl of Surrey. Henry almoſt choaked with fat, and perceiving his leg, viſibly, to grow worſe, plainly ſaw he had not long to live. In this belief, he conſidered the duke of Norfolk, and the earl of Surrey, as two lords who could greatly embroil the prince, his ſon, during his minority. The duke of Norfolk was, as it were, the head of the favourers of the pope, and the old religion, tho', like a good courtier, he had, outwardly, complied with all the king's 1546. king's innovations. Henry was contented with this external compliance, tho' he knew he was ever attached to the pope, whoſe party was ſtill very powerful, in England, and that his ſon, the earl of Surrey, was in the ſame ſentiments. This ſufficed to inſpire him with a juſt fear, that, after his death, theſe two lords, aſſiſted by the pope, the emperor, and their friends, would labour to ſet the crown on the head of the princeſs Mary, and ſo, what he had been at ſuch pains to eſtabliſh, during his reign, would be entirely overthrown. And, indeed, he could not queſtion, if that party prevailed, they would deem his divorce, with Catharine of Arragon, null and void. In which caſe, Mary was his only lawful iſſue, and the prince, his ſon, a baſtard. He could hope for no remedy to this evil, from the parliament, having learnt, by long experience, with how much eaſe that body, conſiſting of ſo many members, was carried away with the prevailing party. He thought, therefore, the beſt and ſhorteſt way to prevent theſe miſchiefs, and free himſelf from his fears, was, not to leave theſe two lords behind him, whom he believed capable of diſturbing his ſon's minority, and even of robbing him of the crown. For this ſole reaſon, their ruin was reſolved, after which, ſome pretence was to be found; and this is ſeldom wanting, to thoſe who have the power in their hands. As ſoon as it was perceived, his affection for the father and ſon was grown cold, there were perſons ready to inſinuate, they had pernicious deſigns againſt the ſtate, and only waited his death to put them in execution; that the earl of Surrey had refuſed ſeveral good matches, ſince the loſs of his counteſs, and it was generally reported, he aſpired to the princeſs Mary; that it was not without ſome private reaſon he uſed the arms of St. Edward the Confeſſor, tho' his father had taken them out of his eſcutcheon, but, however, the duke himſelf had left that quarter blank, in order to reſume that at a proper ſeaſon. Upon theſe general accuſations, the king ordered them to be arreſted, and ſent to the tower; after which, care was taken to let the publick know, that they who had any thing to ſay againſt the priſoners, ſhould be graciouſly heard, and the king would pardon all perſons concerned in any plot with them, who would come and make a diſcovery *.

The two univerſities are preſerved. Herbert.

Some time before this affair was begun, the king reſtored the two univerſities, of Oxford and Cambridge, to all their eſtates, rents and privileges, tho' by the act of parliament, which gave the lands of the colleges to the king, they were to be ſuppreſſed. It might be thought very ſtrange, the parliament ſhould not diſtinguiſh theſe two univerſities, from the reſt of the colleges, conſidering their antiquity, and the advantages the kingdom had thence received, and daily did receive, if it had not been now frequently ſeen, that they had long acted, ſolely, by the direction of the court. It is probable, the king remained long doubtful, whether he ſhould diſſolve or preſerve theſe two univerſities, ſince, having received their humble petitions the beginning of the year, he made them wait for his reply till October; nay, it was talked at court, for ſome time, of making great alterations in their charters. But, at laſt, the king reſolved to continue them upon ths ſame foot they had all along been; and, ſoon after, on the 19th of December, he founded Trinity-College, in Cambridge, which is one of the nobleſt foundations, of that kind, in Europe. 1546.

The king ſtrikes Gardiner out of his will. Burnet.

In the interim, diligent ſearch was making by the king's order, after every thing that could ſerve to form an impeachment againſt the duke of Norfolk, and the earl, his ſon; the king, who found himſelf near his end, being abſolutely bent, they ſhould go out of the world before him. In this interval, he ordered his will, made juſt before his late expedition into France, to be brought him, and peruſing it, cauſed Gardiner's name to be ſtruck out of the number of the counſellors appointed for the council of ſtate, during Edward's minority. Sir Anthony Brown, who was preſent, would have ſpoke in the biſhop's behalf; but the king anſwered, he knew Gardiner, and tho' he himſelf could govern him, yet none of thoſe who were to come after him would be able to do it.

Act. Pub.

This will, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, is dated December the 30th, 1546, and the king's name is at the bottom, with thoſe of 10 witneſſes; but it is hard to know for certain, whether it was ſigned with the king's own hand. This was afterwards queſtioned. Mr. Rymer, who collected the records, would have done well to have put the thing out of diſpute, and informed the world, whether he had the original in his hands, and and if ſo, whether the king's name was his own hand-writing. This he might have eaſily known, by comparing his name on the will, with his uſual ſignings, of which, doubtleſs, he had ſeveral by him. The importance of this inquiry conſiſts, in that the act of parliament, impowering the king to ſettle the ſucceſſion, ordered, it ſhould be by letters patents under the great ſeal, or by his laſt will, ſigned with his own hand. Now it happened afterwards, that the line of Scotland, not being placed in the order which belonged to them, queſtioned the validity of the will, maintaining, that Henry had not ſigned it with his own hand-writing. Indeed it could be alledged againſt this pretenſion, that the the will being dated a month before the king's death, there was no room to ſuppoſe, Henry was then unable to ſign it. On the 1546. other hand, it is not impoſſible, that having ordered his will to be tranſcribed the 30th of December, he delayed to ſet his hand, and ſo was prevented by death. But there is moreover a ſtrong preſumption, he did not ſign it with his own hand, viz. he was, very probably, unable to write ſeveral months before his death, doubtleſs, by reaſon his fingers were ſo ſwoln, that he could not hold his pen. This conjecture is confirmed by two papers, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, both prior to the will. The firſt is a power of the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1546, given by Henry to three of his miniſters to ſign in his name, all the royal commiſſions, and acts of grace. The ſecond is a like power of the 16th of October following, to ſome of his council to put the king's ſtamp to, and ſeal with his ſignet, all acts to which the king's hand was required. The reaſon alledged for theſe powers, was taken from the multiplicity of affairs, wherewith the king was overwhelmed; but as he had never leſs than at that time, it is extremely probable, this was only a cloke to hide his indiſpoſition. However as this diſpute, which concerned only the royal family of Scotland, was ended by the acceſſion of that family to the throne of England, it is now of no conſequence; and, therefore, it ſuffices to mention wherein it conſiſted. Here follows the manner, wherein Henry ſettled the ſucceſſion, purſuant to the power given him by act of parliament, in the year 1543.

The Order of the ſucceſſion.

I. Prince Edward and all his poſterity.

II. The children he might have by his preſent queen, or any other whom he ſhould marry after her.

III. The princeſs Mary and her iſſue, provided ſhe married with the aſſent and conſent of the executors of his laſt will and teſtament, or of the major part of thoſe who ſhould then be alive, given under their hands and ſeals. This conſent of the executors, was a condition ſo annexed to the right he granted Mary to ſucceed in her turn, that without it, his intent was, ſhe ſhould entirely forfeit her title to the crown.

IV. The princeſs Elizabeth upon the ſame condition with Mary.

V. Frances Brandon, eldeſt daughter of his ſiſter Mary and the duke of Suffolk.

VI. Eleanor Brandon, Frances's younger ſiſter.

If all theſe perſons ſhould happen to die without heirs, or their iſſue come to fail, it was the king's will, that the crown ſhould go to the next rightful heirs. By that he could mean only Mary, the young queen of Scotland, grand-daughter of his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, who ought naturally to have preceded the children of the king's younger ſiſter Mary.

Laſtly, he added, that in caſe Mary performed not the condition required of her, the crown ſhould devolve to Elizabeth, as if Mary had died without heirs.

In like manner, if Elizabeth neglected to perform the ſame condition, his intent was, that the crown ſhould go to Frances Brandon, as if Elizabeth had died without iſſue. 1546.

He appointed for executors of his laſt will 13 lords, moſt of whom were privy counſellors, as the archbiſhop of Canterbury, chancellor Wriotheſley, the earl of Hertford, young Edward's uncle, &c. Theſe 13 executors were alſo nominated for the prince his ſucceſſor's privy-council, till he was 18 years of age; moreover, he named certain perſons who were to be called to the council, upon extraordinary occaſions. Executors.

He ordered his executors, to pay, firſt, all his debts, and then to make good all his grants to ſeveral particular perſons. Debts.

He made the prince, his ſon, heir of all his goods, plate, jewels, money, cannons, ammunition, ſhips, with all things belonging thereto, and charged him to be guided by the advice of thoſe who were appointed for his privy-counſellors, till he had attained to 18 years of age. Heir.

He gave till their marriage, to his daughters Mary and Elizabeth, a yearly penſion of 3000 pounds ſterling, and to each a portion of 10,000 pounds or more, if the executors thought proper. Legacies.

He left his queen a legacy of 3000 pounds, either in jewels or plate, as ſhe pleaſed, and 1000 pounds in ready money, beſids her dower.

Laſtly, he gave 500 marks to each of his executors, who were lords, and to the others 300 each.

The moſt extraordinary thing in this will was, the king's paſſing over in ſilence, the poſterity of his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, or, at leaſt, his placing them after the line of his youngeſt ſiſter Mary. Beſides, the clauſe in his will, which ſaid that after the poſterity of Eleanor Brandon, the crown ſhould go to the next heir, muſt have been favourably explained for this firſt branch, ſince theſe general words were liable to ſundry interpretations. This was the effect of the power, the parliament had given the king, to ſettle the ſucceſſion, or rather to unſettle and put it in a horrible confuſion, if divine Providence had not taken more care of it than he. It is not poſſible to deviſe any other reaſon of his proceedings, than his hatred of the Scots, and his fear that the kingdom of England would one day fall under the dominion of a prince or princeſs of that nation, which, however, all his precautions could not hinder. Remarks on Henry's ſettlement of the ſucceſſion.

1547. Whilſt the king was ordering his will to be tranſcribed, the duke of Norfolk's and the earl of Surrey's proceſs was forming with great warmth. The king being reſolved to diſpatch theſe two lords, nothing was able to ſave them. The ſon was brought to his tryal at Guild-hall, before the lord chancellor, the lord mayor, and other commiſſioners, and put upon an inqueſt of commoners, becauſe he was not a peer of the realm, the duke, his father, being alive. Several witneſſes were examined, whoſe depoſitions the lord Herbert has inſerted in his Hiſtory; but there appears nothing

1547. nothing ſufficient to convict him of high-treaſon, of which he was accuſed. What was chiefly urged againſt him was his giving St. Edward's arms, from whence it was inferred, he aſpired to the throne. However, the king being reſolved he ſhould die, he received ſentence of death, and was beheaded, on tower-hill the 19th of January.

The duke of Norfolk tries in vain to obtain his pardon. Herbert. Burnet.

In the interim, the duke of Norfolk uſed all ſorts of means to obtain the king's pardon. He knew him well enough to be ſenſible, that nothing but an intire ſubmiſſion was capable of appeaſing him. To this end, he wrote him a very humble and ſubmiſſive letter, declaring he could not call to mind he had ever offended him, and intreated him for God's ſake to let him know the cauſe of his diſgrace. He prayed likewiſe, that his accuſers might be brought face to face before his majeſty, or, at leaſt, his council, that his cauſe might be maturely examined. He knew not, he ſaid, that he had offended any man, otherwiſe than in appearing very zealous againſt the Sacramentarians; but therein he had only complied with his majeſty's ſentiments and orders. He concluded with conjuring him, to be ſatisfied with taking all or part of his lands and goods, as he pleaſed, leaving him only a ſubſiſtance.

This letter produced a quite contrary effect to what the duke expected; by clearing himſelf, he accuſed the king of injuſtice, an offence which would not have been eaſily pardoned, tho' his diſtruction had not been reſolved. Herbert. Burnet. The duke ſeeing the king unmoved, ſigned, the 12th of January, before the lord chancellor and ſeveral other privy-counſellors, a writing wherein he confeſſed, "That on ſeveral occaſions he had been guilty of high-treaſon, in concealing from the king that his ſon, the earl of Surrey, bore the arms of St. Edward the Confeſſor, which did only belong to the king: That himſelf had born in the firſt quarter of his arms, ever ſince his father's death, the arms of England, with a difference of the labels of ſilver, which were the proper arms of the king's eldeſt ſon, and of no other. That he owned this to be high-treaſon, by the laws of the realm; and that he ſigned this ſubmiſſion without compulſion, or advice, and and threw himſelf entirely upon the king's mercy."

He is attainted in parliament. Burnet.

Very probably, the duke was induced of himſelf, or by the advice of his friends, to make this confeſſion, in the belief, he ſhould never obtain his pardon, unleſs he confeſſed himſelf guilty, that the king might have room to ſhew mercy. But it was all to no purpoſe; for his ruin was reſolved, and the king was not wont to deſiſt from ſuch reſolutions, when once they were taken. In the interim, as it was eaſy to ſee that the peers, who were the duke's proper judges, could not condemn him upon the evidences which were to be produced againſt him, the king thought he ſhould more eaſily compaſs his ends, by an act of attainder. So the parliament meeting at this time, a bill of attainder was brought into the houſe of lords, and read three times, on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of January, and paſſed. In all likelihood the duke's confeſſion under his own hand, contributed very much to the paſſing of the bill; at leaſt, it ſerved for an excuſe to thoſe who durſt not oppoſe it. The bill being ſent down to the commons, was read thrice, and ſent up alſo paſſed on the 24th of January. According to the method, too frequently practiſed in this reign, it contained only general accuſations, without ſpecifying any thing, except the duke's bearing the arms of England, with three labels of ſilver. It was very ſtrange, that his arms ſhould not have been taken notice of before, which he had born ſo long in the ſight of the king himſelf, and the whole court, which he had received from his anceſtors, and for which he had the opinion of the heralds. The bill having paſſed in both houſes, the lord chancellor, the earl of Hertford, and ſome other lords were commiſſioned under the great-ſeal, to give the royal aſſent; after that a warrant was ſent to the lieutenant of the tower, to cut off the duke's head, the 29th of January. But happily for him, the king died the night before, and the council did not think it adviſeable to begin the new reign, with the execution of one of the greateſt lords of the kingdom. It is to be obſerved, that during all the proceedings both of the court and the parliament, againſt the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Surrey, the archbiſhop of Canterbury withdrew to Croydon, without ever appearing at court. As theſe two lords were juſtly deemed his moſt mortal enemies, he would not be accuſed of being concerned in what was tranſacting againſt them. 1547.

The king's death approaches.

Whilſt theſe proceſſes were forming, the king was ſeiſed in his bed, with an illneſs, which brought him inſenſibly to his end. However, the conſideration of the account he was going to render to God, was not capable of moving him to uſe compaſſion towards two lords, of one of the moſt antient families in England, who had done him great ſervices, and, hitherto, were guilty of no crime which deſerved ſo ſevere a puniſhment. On this occaſion, prevailed, as on many others, paſſion and policy in the king's mind, over juſtice and mercy. He was bent, at any rate, to ſacrifice theſe two lords to his ſon's ſafety, and to eſtabliſh, by their death, all the alterations he had made in religion, being perſuaded they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to deſtroy them. The ſequel plainly ſhewed, he was not miſtaken with regard to the duke of Norfolk, who ſurvived him. This lord's life, preſerved by a ſort of miracle, was a demonſtration, how vain are humane precautions, when contrary to the decrees of God.

He is warned of his approaching end. Burnet.

The king's illneſs continually increaſed, and no man dared to warn him of his approaching end, every one being afraid, that a prince, who was always approached with trembling, would look upon this charitable warning as a crime, and puniſh it according 1547. to an act of parliament, by which, thoſe who ſhould dare to foretel the king's death, were adjudged traytors. But, at laſt, Sir Anthony Denny, one of his privy-counſellors, had the courage and charity, to warn him, that he had but a few hours to live. The king thanked him, and expreſſed his great grief and horror for all the ſins of his paſt life. Whereupon, Denny asked him, if any clergyman ſhould be ſent for, and he ſaid, if any, it ſhould be the archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Cranmer, being then at Croydon, could not come till the king was ſpeechleſs. He had but juſt time to deſire him, to give ſome ſign of his dying in the faith of Chriſt. The king ſqueezed his hand, and, preſently after, expired, in the night, between the 28th and 29th of January, 1546-7, in the 56th year of his age, having reigned 37 years and 9 months. His death was kept private three days. Probably, the council took time to conſult, whether the duke of Norfolk ſhould be executed. At laſt, after three days, the lord chancellor ſignified to both houſes, that the king was dead, and the parliament thereby diſſolved *. 1547. He dies. Herbert.

Henry ſhews ſigns of repentance. Burnet.

* The reader may ſee Henry's character drawn at length, by the lord Herbert; but, as his life and actions ſufficiently make him known, I ſhall only add, what biſhop Burnet ſays of him, at the end of his firſt volume of the Hiſtory of the Reformation. King Henry VIII, is rather to be reckoned among the great than the good princes. He exerciſed ſo much ſeverity, on men of both perſuaſions, that the writers of both ſides, have laid open his faults, and taxed his cruelty. But, as neither of them were much obliged to him, ſo none have taken ſo much care to ſet forth his good qualities, as his enemies have done to enlarge on his vices. I do not deny, that he is to be numbered among the ill princes, yet, I cannot rank him with the worſt.

DIRECTIONS

DIRECTIONS concerning the Genealogical Tables.

HISTORY repreſents to us four things, which are eſſential to it: 1. The events: 2. The place where: 3. The time when they happened: 4. The perſons who were the actors. If, therefore, in order to underſtand a Hiſtory perfectly, it is neceſſary to have a knowledge of the country where the ſcene of the actions lies, by means of geography, and of the times wherein they were tranſacted, by chronology; it is no leſs requiſite to know the perſons concerned, by the help of genealogies, which very often diſcover the motives and reaſons of things. Nay, genealogy has this great advantage above geography and chronology, that whereas theſe laſt preſent to the mind ſome particular actions only; the bare names in a genealogical table, form, if I may ſo ſay, an abſtract of all the remarkable events in thoſe perſons lives.

Nothing is more eaſy than to make genealogies; but it is very hard to draw them up in a clear and diſtinct manner, and to obſerve a fixed and conſtant method, which repreſents to the eye and mind what one looks after, without the leaſt trouble. This I have endeavoured to do, by means of the following rules, which it will be proper to lay before the reader.

1. The genealogical tables are divided by horizontal lines, marked, 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. On the firſt line is placed the name of the common ſtock, whoſe poſterity is ſet down on the other lines. Thus, all that are placed on the ſame horizontal line, or between the ſame figures, are at an equal diſtance, or in the ſame degree, from the common original. Hence may be ſeen, by the caſt of an eye, the number of generations from the common root, and the degrees of conſanguinity between the deſcendants. For inſtance, in the table of Woden's poſterity, Woden being the common ſtock of the Anglo-Saxon kings, Hengiſt, firſt king of Kent, is placed on line (6), by which is meant, that Hengiſt is the fifth deſcendant from Woden. Afterwards, in the genealogical table of the kings of Kent, Hengiſt is placed on a line marked (6), by which means, one may immediately ſee, how many degrees any one of Hengiſt's deſcendants were removed from Woden.

England, ceaſing to be under the dominion of the Saxons, by the conqueſt of the Normans, inſtead of Woden, William the Conqueror, is made the common root of the Engliſh kings, down to the preſent time; accordingly, in the genealogy of William the Conqueror, his name ſtands upon the line marked (1), to denote his being the ſtock from whence all others ſprung. For inſtance, Edward III, in this table, being on line (9) in the table of his own poſterity, he is placed at the ſame number, to ſhew, it is only a continuation of the genealogy of William the Conqueror.

2. The ſons are always placed according to the order of their birth, from the left hand towards the right, by which means, the eldeſt branches are diſtinguiſhed from the younger, at one view. The ſame order is not obſerved, with reſpect to the daughters, who are placed in the void ſpaces, ſo as to prevent the lines from running out to too great a length; but, however, the elder ſtands always on the left hand of the younger ſiſter.

3. The children of the ſame prince are placed ſo, that their father ſtands in the line over them, juſt in the middle, which ſaves a great deal of trouble and confuſion.

4. As the only end of theſe genealogical tables, is to facilitate the reading of this Hiſtory, ſeveral perſons who died young, or unmarried, or without iſſue, and the like, are omitted.

5. One of the chief things, which render genealogies plain and uſeful, is, to load them with as few words as poſſible; by which means the blank ſpaces will remain the larger between the names, than which, nothing contributes more to make the tables clear and diſtinct. This is the reaſon, the following abbreviations are made uſe of, as, E. for earl, D. for duke, K. for king, Q. for queen, W. for wife, d. for died. The names written in Italian character, under thoſe that are part of the genealogy, denote the husband or wives. For inſtance,

Sledda
Ricula of Kent.

This ſignifies, that Sledda married Ricula, princeſs of Kent. When two or more names are under another, with numbers before them, this means, 1ſt wife, 2d. wife, 3d. wife, or huſband, &c.

6. Laſtly, Each king has a number annext, to denote the order of ſucceſſion, and in what rank each ſucceeded to the crown. This is abſolutely neceſſary, in the ſucceſſion to the throne of England, where the order of the branches was not always obſerved.
